Had our author thought fit to explain what he expreſſes obſcurely, and thereby to enable the editors of Moreri, to make the article of Almain curious, methinks he would have ſaid at leaſt in general what I have juſt obſerved; but in order to render himſelf thoroughly intelligible, it would have been neceſſary for him to particularize the relation which he finds between that Doctor's book, and the circumſtances of the time, for in France there is no debate carried on concerning the queſtion, whether the authority of the people be ſuperior to that of the King; and as to what concerns the queſtion whether councils be ſuperior to the Pope, it was ſeaſonable at Paris during the pontificate of Innocent XI, but from that time it is fallen into oblivion, and whoever ſhould attempt to revive it, would render himſelf odious. It is not therefore eaſy to know that the circumſtances of the time ſhould have engaged Mr Vaultier to ſpeak of Almain's book with ſome exactneſs.

We could ſhew, by other examples, that we had reaſon to ſay, we might have made more marginal notes than we have made. Notwithſtanding we do affirm, that the critical remarks of which we here give a ſecond edition, deſerve to be read: they are ſhort and lively, and will not tire any man's patience. If we had a mind to prepoſſeſs the readers in favour of them, we would not fail to take advantage of what is ſet forth in the Kings royal licence, that they have been approved by Mr Pouchard. This is the name of a formidable Critic who has vexed ſeveral authors in the Journal des Savans. The ſociety that writes this journal had a great loſs by his death: he embelliſhed this work by the wit which he diffuſed through the articles that fell to his ſhare, and which good judges readily diſtinguiſhed; and he did not poſſeſs in a leſs degree than his brethren the talent of giving a ſufficient idea of a large book in few words. This is a rare talent among the Journaliſts, ſome of whom cruelly fatigue the reader by bringing him back three or four times to the ſame book, which ſometimes happens to be a very indifferent one, and would be treated with complaiſance enough if it were but once mentioned. I think Mr Pouchard ſufficiently ridiculed them, and with more reaſon than he ridiculed ſome other books, for it muſt be confeſſed that his criticiſm was a little too ſevere. People loudly complained of it, as will appear by the following inſtance. 'If the productions of wit had been formerly cenſured in the ſame manner as they are now, the empire of learning would be a deſart, and ſeveral of thoſe whoſe firſt performances ſucceeded ill would have ceaſed to write, and would not have become the ornament of France and the admiration of all Europe, where their writings are ſpread. At this day there are ſtill to be ſeen, ſome, who began to make their appearance in the world by nothing higher than plain elegies, and who are grown to be lights of the Church. In fine the church, the bar, and ſeveral

(b) Page 613, of the Latin Hiſtory of the College of Navarre.

‘ ſocieties of the kingdom are full of learned men whoſe firſt performances made no great ‘ figure (c).’

(c) Mercure Galant for the month of January 1706 pag. 226 in the place where it ſpeaks of the death of Mr Pouchard who condemned almoſt all the productions of wit.

What a prejudice would it not be in favour of the remarks upon the new edition of Moreri, that Mr Pouchard had allowed them to be ſolid! But as we have no mind to impoſe upon the reader, we honeſtly declare here that the approbation which is ſpoken of in the privilege, conſiſts only in this, that Mr Pouchard declares he has read them by order of the Lord Chancellor, and that he has found nothing in them which can hinder their being printed. The meaning of this is no more than that they contain nothing againſt religion, morality, or the government.

If it be objected to our author that he ſhould have communicated his remarks to the Paris editor, and not have publiſhed them, he may anſwer that he was willing that the Dutch editors, and the tranſlators of Moreri into Engliſh, and German ſhould reap the advantage of them: and after all, none but ſuch moroſe Critics as can ſuffer nothing to eſcape their cenſure, will find fault with him for having publiſhed his diſcoveries, and for reſolvimg to make himſelf further uſeful to the editors of the Hiſtorical Dictionary; for, as I ſaid before, it is a matter of great conſequence that a work of ſuch a nature ſhould be purged of all its defects. It is ſurpriſing that after having paſſed ſo many times under the eyes of the reviſers and correctors of the preſs, it ſhould be ſo full of groſs faults, that, for example, we ſtill find there that Poſtellus born about the year 1477, died in the year 1581, aged near a hundred years (1). No book ſhould have been made ſooner correct than this, for it has been read by more people than moſt other books, and the moſt ignorant readers are capable of diſcovering ſome faults in it. The firſt thing they do is to look out for their native country, and the towns where they have made ſome ſtay. The miſtakes of Moreri in ſuch articles cannot eſcape them. They ſhould therefore inform the Bookſellers of theſe miſtakes, which would be a very eaſy thing, and as every reader may obſerve the falſities of this Dictionary in matters that come within his reach, it would not be difficult for him to communicate a liſt of them which might ſerve for the correction of new editions. It muſt be confeſſed that the indolence of readers has been very extraordinary, for they have almoſt all neglected to give notice of the miſtakes which they had obſerved. How is it poſſible that among ſo many people who had been at Briſac, and who knew that according to Moreri that town had a ſtone bridge upon the Rhine, there has not been one who has had the charity to tell, or cauſe the Printers or editors to be told, that it was neceſſary to correct that paſſage (2). I ſhould be glad that this reproach might ſerve to cure the almoſt lethargic indifference of the greateſt part of readers.

But it would not be enough that every one ſhould furniſh a liſt of the faults he had obſerved; the labour of thoſe who take upon them ex profeſſo to correct Moreri, would ſtill be very great. There will never be a thorough correction made, unleſs they take the pains to viſit all the ſources from whence Mr Moreri has drawn his materials. It is a troubleſome piece of work, but not ſo terrible as it appears to thoſe who conſider the multitude of authors whom he quotes at the end of ſeveral articles, for we muſt not believe that he has conſulted all theſe authors. I am certain that with regard to the Greek, and Latin Hiſtorians, he has generally conſulted only Voſſius, and that with reſpect to Eccleſiaſtical affairs and Eccleſiaſtical writers he has hardly conſulted any but Baronius, Spondanus, Godeau, and Father Labbe. To what end therefore has he quoted ſo many others? I know not, but it ſeems to me that ſuch an affectation which coſt him little, ſince he did no more than name the authors whom Voſſius &c. had cited, tends much leſs to the profit of the readers, than to perſuade them falſly that he turned over an infinite number of books. He might have contented himſelf with referring to Voſſius &c. Thoſe who had Voſſius would have known at the ſame time all the other writers mentioned at the end of Moreri's articles. I would not however adviſe the ſtriking out theſe quotations which have ſtood ſo long, but it would be neceſſary to make them all intelligible; there are ſome of them which are not ſo, becauſe they have too much abridged the names of the authors or the titles of the books. They have done worſe ſometimes, for they have disfigured both the titles of the books and the names of the authors. A book de Venatione which Moreri had cited, has in the Dutch editions been metamorphoſed into a book de Veneratione. He has expreſſed himſelf ſo ill at the end of the article CALENTIO, that deſigning only to quote one author he quotes two, and disfigures the name of the latter. Cornellius Tollius, ſays he, in Append. Pierre Valere, de infelicit. Litterat. This ſhould be rectified in the following manner, Cornelius Tollius in the appendix to the treatiſe of Pierius Valerianus de infelicit. Literat (3).

---

(1) Mr Bayle takes notice hereafter of a like blunder, with regard to Mr de Sallo. See his remarks on our author's concluſion.

In the laſt edition of Moreri, printed at Paris 1725, it is ſaid that Poſtel died on the ſixth of September 1581 aged ſeventy-ſix years, three months, and nine days. This date is taken from the Memoires de Litterature of Mr de Sallengre, Tom. I. pag. 24. who had it from the Hiſtory of the Priory of St Martin in the fields, by Martin Marrier, a Monk and Prior Clauſtral of that monaſtery, where Poſtel was buried: Regalis Monaſterii Sancti Martini de Campis, Pariſienſis, Ordinis Cluniacenſis Hiſtoria; Pariſiis 1637 in 4to. NEW OBSERVATION.

(2) See hereafter the preface of the author of the Critical Remarks. NEW OBSERVAT.

(3) In the edition of Moreri publiſhed at Paris in the year 1712, they changed Pierre Valere into Petr. Valerius: in that of 1725, they have corrected this fault, and put Pierius Valerianus; but they have left the reſt as it was, ſo that they continue to cite two authors, though they deſign to quote no more than one. NEW OBSERVAT.

By

By conſulting the authors whom Moreri has made uſe of, it will be found that he has often miſtaken their meaning, that he has not choſen the moſt material circumſtances, that he has maimed a great many things; and thus by comparing the copy with the original the work might be greatly improved and perfected.

In ſome things this compariſon would not be ſufficient. Moreri with reſpect to the Low-Countries had almoſt no other guide but Lewis Guicciardin, who made a very good deſcription of them; but as great changes have happened in the towns of that country ſince the year 1587, when Lewis Guicciardin publiſhed the laſt edition of that work, there are ſeveral things which he affirmed with truth, but which cannot be affirmed now without a groſs falſhood, and nevertheleſs Moreri affirms them juſt as he had read them in Lewis Guicciardin.

For example, Guicciardin ſays that near Mechlin, or Malines, a little beyond the gate St Catherine, on the road to Antwerp, there is a very large monaſtery built almoſt like a fortreſs, in which is a houſe conſecrated to St Alexis, where above 1500 and ſometimes even 1600 nuns continually reſide, having the liberty to take care of their affairs, to go abroad, and even to marry if they pleaſe. Moreri has not failed to copy this. There is to be ſeen, ſays he, in the ſuburbs of Malines (or Mechlin) the monaſtery of St Alexis, where there are fifteen or ſixteen hundred nuns who have the liberty to go out to take the air, to make and receive viſits, and to marry when they think fit. This paſſage of Moreri always appeared ſuſpicious to me, for as in our time ſeveral armies have encamped in the neighbourhood of Mechlin, and as many officers have paſſed and repaſſed by the ſame city, it ſeemed to me incredible that no body ſhould mention this convent of fifteen or ſixteen hundred canoneſſes, and that nevertheleſs it ſhould be one of the rarities of Mechlin. My ſuſpicions were ſtrengthened by the reflexion I made, that when armies encamp near Remiremont, or Maubeuge &c. the public almoſt conſtantly hears of the aſſiduity of the principal officers in viſiting the canoneſſes of thoſe places. But I have diſcovered at laſt that it is a long time ſince this monaſtery of St Alexis is no more in being, it was razed to the ground during the civil wars near the end of the XVIth century. Thus we ſee that in order to rectify the Hiſtorical Dictionary, as to what concerns the Low-Countries, it is not ſufficient to compare it with Guicciardin, the original which Mr Moreri followed, we muſt likewiſe conſult more modern writers (4).

Since an occaſion has offered to take notice of a groſs error in the article of Malines, which paſſed from edition to edition till the (d) firſt reviſal of Mr Vaultier 1699, at leaſt incluſively; I ſhall add, that part of the other errors are corrected in the Dutch editions, but that theſe are ſtill left, viz. the inhabitants of Malines are free from all taxes on account of the good ſervices which they did to Charles the Bold, Earl of Flanders, at the ſiege of Nans upon the Rhine. He ſhould have ſaid Nuis, and not Nans, and Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, and not Earl of Flanders, for though he was Earl of Flanders, he never bore that title. The firſt of theſe two faults has been corrected in the edition of Paris 1699, but not the ſecond (5). Neither have they corrected the name of the river which runs by Malines: it is called Dile, and not Dele (6). They have not obſerved that the Seignory of Malines is one of the ſeventeen provinces of the Low-Countries, and that the great royal council inſtituted in the year 1473, was not then fixed at Malines. It was ambulatory (I mean that it followed the court of the Prince) till ſuch time as Philip of Auſtria, upon his going to Spain in the year 1503, ſettled it at Malines (7).

(d) I ſpeak thus becauſe I have not that of 1704.

The more we ſhould deſcend to particulars, the more would the readers be convinced that a thorough correction of Moreri cannot be the work of a ſingle man. Mr Vaultier alone might very well be the director-general, and the laſt reviſer of the whole, but he would ſtand in need of coadjutors, I mean people who ſhould work under him according to the different parts he ſhould aſſign them. He would eſpecially want one of thoſe ſowre, and, if you pleaſe, humourſome and fantaſtical critics, in whom the leaſt ſhadow of irregularity breeds ſtrong ſuſpicions that the author is miſtaken. Such a critic would not have had the patience to read twice the firſt lines of the article Madruce (Madruzzo) in Moreri, without ſuſpecting that they ſerved as a kind of den to ſome wild beaſt. It would have ſhocked him at the firſt glance. Theſe lines are as follows:

MADRUCE or LIBER (Chriſtopher) called the Cardinal of Trent, was ſon to John Gaudence Liber, Baron of Madruce. It is not impoſſible but that one and the ſame family

---

(4) This miſtake had paſſed into the edition of 1707; and the reviſer of that of 1712, only added that theſe nuns were called Beguines. In the edition of 1725 (article MALINES) it is corrected thus: In the ſuburbs was to be ſeen the monaſtery of St Alexis, where there were 1500 or 1600 nuns called Beguines who had the liberty to go out, to take the air, to make and receive viſits, and to marry when they thought proper: but this monaſtery was entirely demoliſhed during the civil wars near the end of the XVIth century. NEW OBSERVAT.

(5) This ſecond fault was ſtill in the editions of 1707 and 1712. In that of 1725, it is ſaid that the inhabitants of Malines are free from all taxes on account of the good ſervices which they did to Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, and Earl of Flanders, at the ſiege of Nuis upon the Rhine. NEW OBSERVAT.

(6) The edition of 1707 had ſtill Dele: that of 1712 ſays Deule: and in that of 1725 there is Dile. NEW OBSERVAT.

(7) In the edition of 1725 they take notice that the great royal council, inſtituted ambulatory by Charles Duke of Burgundy, in the year 1473, was fixed at Malines in the year 1503. They have not obſerved that the Seignory of Malines is one of the ſeventeen provinces of the Low-Countries, they only ſay that this Seignory is encloſed within one of the ſeventeen provinces, in Brabant. Nevertheleſs at the word Low-Countries, it is reckoned among the ſeventeen provinces. NEW OBSERVAT.

may have the names of Madruce and Liber, and that thus ſome ſhould call it Madruce and others Liber, and conſequently that the author of a Dictionary following the ſafeſt courſe might make uſe of the disjunctive or without committing a fault; but there is nevertheleſs in all this, I cannot tell what ſtrange want of probability that detains and ſtrikes a ſuſpicious and attentive reader. He conſiders before he proceeds further, and he may poſſibly conjecture that Moreri deceived by ſome French author, or not underſtanding the Latin writers who have mentioned this Cardinal of Trent, has improperly divided Liber Baro, and taken the firſt of theſe two words for the name of the family, inſtead of taking it for the character of the quality of Baron. It is well known that the Emperors of Germany create barons who hold immediately of the empire, and who are thereby diſtinguiſhed from the barons that are vaſſals to ſome other member of the empire. A baron that holds immediately of the empire, is called a free baron, Liber Baro. It is very (e) probable that the firſt of the family of Madruce, or Madruzzo, who was created baron, was one of thoſe free barons, and that from thence it comes that the Latin authors who have mentioned the Cardinal of Trent and his father, have given them the title of Liber Baro. If this be the caſe, what a blunder has Moreri fallen into? And how could it ſo long eſcape the editors (8)?

(e) I expreſs myſelf thus becauſe I have not the Latin authors quoted by Moreri.

I ſhall occaſionally inform them that they ought to correct a miſtake concerning Cardinal Lewis Madruce (or Madruzzo). He was not made Biſhop of Trent after his promotion to the Cardinalſhip, as Moreri affirms, he was Biſhop of Trent before by the reſignation of his uncle Cardinal Chriſtopher Madruzzo, when Pius IV preſented him with the hat in the year 1561, and ſent it to him even while he was at Trent, by a particular favour (9). They ought beſides to correct the alternative of the time of Cardinal Chriſtopher Madruzzo's promotion. They ſhould fix the date thereof to the year 1542, and not leave it undetermined as Moreri does between the year 1542 or the year 1544 (10). It is ſhameful not to know the true time of the creation of a Cardinal of the XVIth century, and when a perſon corrects the work of a man who was ignorant of that, and who was lazy enough not to clear up the fact, that perſon ſhould think himſelf obliged not to be guilty of the ſame lazineſs. We may likewiſe acquaint the editors that they will do well to make up ſome omiſſions. The State of Madruzzo erected into a barony, and ſituated in the country of Trent, requires a ſmall Geographical article which is wanting in Moreri (11). The family of Madruzzo wants a Genealogical article which ſhould bring it down from the time that it began to enjoy a title of honour, or to make a figure, to the preſent time. Cardinal Madruzzo the creature of Clement VIII, and who came to be ſo conſiderable that he was looked upon as a man qualified for being elected Pope in the conclave where Urban VIII was choſen in the year 1623, likewiſe requires an article (12).

There are a great number of paſſages in Moreri which abound as much in omiſſions and blunders as the article of Madruzzo.

I am not ignorant that ſome people will pretend that it is of no manner of importance to the public to know whether the family Madruzzo was called Liber, or whether Chriſtopher Madruzzo came to the Cardinalſhip in the year 1542, and not in the year 1544, or whether Lewis Madruzzo was already Biſhop of Trent when he obtained the Cardinal's hat. The Journaliſts of Trevoux may poſſibly make this objection, for after having treated as trifling (f) the remark made by our author that Giles Boileau died in the year 1669, and not as Moreri affirms, in 1671 (13), they add, the world forſooth will think itſelf much concerned in this error of the Dictionary! But the editors of Moreri, if they are wiſe, will not regulate themſelves upon this falſe taſte of the Journaliſts of Trevoux. They will be of opinion that it is the duty of every corrector of a book to take from it all the falſe facts, and to ſubſtitute true facts in their room, and that if under pretence that an error in fact hurts neither the fortune nor morals of any body, it muſt be left in a book; there would be very few lies in the Hiſtorical Dictionary which ought not to be ſpared and carefully preſerved. A judicious man is pleaſed with knowing the truth even in things that neither concern his virtue nor the welfare of his family, and one ought to look upon it as an undoubted truth that if Father Paul, who has made ſo much mention of the Cardinals Chriſtopher Madruzzo and Lewis Madruzzo, had fallen into the miſtakes which I have taken notice of, his antagoniſt Pallavicini would have cenſured him for it, and the Journaliſts of Trevoux would not condemn that cenſure. They themſelves would be very ſorry to be convicted of an error like that which concerns Giles Boileau, and if any one accuſed them falſly of ſuch a miſtake they would juſtify themſelves with a great deal of vivacity. They would not content themſelves with anſwering that the world does not concern itſelf much in errors of this nature.

(f) In the Memoirs for June 1706. pag. 948.

---

(8) This fault had paſſed in the editions of 1707 and 1712. In that of 1725 we find:

‘ Madruce (Chriſtopher) called the Cardinal of ‘ Trent, ſon of John Gaudence, free Baron of Ma-
‘ druce, &c.’

They obſerve that Pope Paul III gave him a Cardinal's hat in the year 1542. New Observat.

(9) This is corrected in the edition of 1725. New Observat.

(10) See, above, note (8). New Observat.

(11) This Geographical article is to be found in the edition of 1725, at the word Madruzzo or Madruce. It is taken from the Dictionary of Maty. New Observat.

(12) In the edition of 1725, there are three or four lines added concerning Charles Madruzzo, created Cardinal by Pope Clement VIII. New Observat.

(13) See hereafter at the word Boileau. New Observat.

One of the things wherein the editors of the Hiſtorical Dictionary have ſucceeded beſt, is that they have reduced to more reaſonable bounds the exceſſive praiſes which Moreri had prodigally beſtowed upon a great many perſons, and the great ſlanders that he had thrown upon many others. He was guided by the ſpirit of a declaimer who frequently mounts the pulpit, and did not remember that he aſſumed the character of an Hiſtorian. But even in this point his work has not yet been brought to perfection. There remain ſtill in it ſeveral flatteries and injurious reflexions which ought to be left out, and it is certain that by ſtriking out ſome encomiums a perſon will do a good office to thoſe on whom they were beſtowed, and will act not only from a principle, of love for truth, but likewiſe from a motive of brotherly charity. I am going to give an example of this.

It is affirmed in Moreri that a Marſhal of France whoſe name I do not mention, commanded armies with a great deal of prudence, ſucceſs, and glory. Let a reader be never ſo unattentive, and eager in purſuing his journey, he will ſtop ſhort at meeting with ſuch an encomium, and reflect upon ſo ſurprizing an object. For above the ſpace of fifteen years, will he ſay to himſelf, have I traced ſtep by ſtep the Gazettes, and other news-writers, and I do not remember any kind of event on which to ground this prudence, this ſucceſs, and this glory that I find here. I can point out the time and place where the enterprizes of this warrior were extremely unfortunate, but not the time and place of their good ſucceſs. His moſt glorious campaigns are thoſe where he formed no project, and where no project was formed againſt him. Either my knowledge is very imperfect or theſe encomiums are very unjuſt, for they cannot be juſt but in conſequence of ſome actions which had ſuch a fortunate and glorious iſſue, that they have been ſufficient to eclipſe the frequent and remarkable diſgraces of which all Europe is informed, and which have been the burden of a thouſand ſatirical ſongs ſpread over the whole world. Whence can it come that I ſhould be ignorant of theſe actions which are ſo glorious? I muſt go directly and enquire.

It is plain that ſuch a reader will deſire all thoſe he ſhall meet with to inform him, and that he will find no body who knows more of the matter than himſelf, ſo that he will be the cauſe why an infinite number of people who thought no more of this Marſhal, will recapitulate all his diſgraces. It will therefore be doing him a piece of very good ſervice to leave this paſſage out of the Dictionary. By this means will they remove a ſtumbling block, a troubleſome Memento. The readers not finding it in their way will proceed without ſtopping, and thus many reflexions will be ſuppreſſed, which would be to the diſadvantage of this Marſhal of France. This encomium is nothing leſs than an officious lie, and bears a much greater reſemblance to the praiſes which the moſt inveterate hatred and malice beſtows, Peſſimum inimicorum genus laudantes. However I own it was not made with that view.

The editor could not but know the opinion of all France, and that if the wiſhes of the nation had been regarded, the warrior of whom we ſpeak had very ſoon been removed from the command of armies; but it looks as if the Prince had been willing to ſhew in this that he thought himſelf as much ſuperior to his ſubjects by the clearneſs of his diſcernment, as by the dignity of his character. The editor could not excuſe himſelf upon a certain humour which the French are obſerved to have, and which a modern author pretty well deſcribes: The French, ſays he, often times are very incomprehenſible. They love their King and their country, they love the honour of their nation, they entertain the higheſt opinion of it that it is poſſible for them to have: and yet their nation itſelf does nothing to pleaſe them: they always imagine that ſome thing better might be done. The wiſeſt anſwers, the moſt ſucceſsful enterprizes, and the beſt concerted meaſures ſeldom eſcape their cenſure. They commend foreigners, praiſe their works and their troops, admire their counſels, and extol their good ſucceſſes. Diſtance heightens reſpect (g). They deſpiſe and find fault with every thing that France produces. Let the number of thoſe whom this character ſuits be as great as it will all over the kingdom, an author is not however obliged to be ruled by them in his praiſes or cenſures; but as they were not the only perſons that exclaimed againſt the general in queſtion, and ſince, on the contrary, they did no more than join their voice to that of the public, the editor could not clear himſelf without alledging ſome other reaſon than this. If he ſhould try to excuſe himſelf by ſaying that the perſon whom he commends has rather gained than loſt ground in his maſter's favour, it would be a very weak defence. This indeed proves that fortune which never followed him to the field, has been a faithful companion to him at court, but we can draw no conſequence from that againſt the public evidence, and if a Prince has a mind to diſtinguiſh himſelf by acting a part ſo ſingular, as that of magnificently rewarding ill ſucceſs, an author has no right upon that account to beſtow praiſes which all the world knows to be falſe. If inſtead of theſe words, prudence, ſucceſs, and glory, Moreri had made uſe of the terms, affection, zeal, good intention, he would not have ſcandalized the public, nor have done ſuch an ill office to the warrior whom he commends. But, once more, the beſt way will be to leave out the encomium and to put nothing in the room of it.

To ſpeak once more of the pains which a good correction of Moreri requires. I ſhall obſerve that the firſt editions of that Dictionary, though they be more faulty than the Dutch ones, may nevertheleſs be of great uſe in correcting them. The editors therefore ſhould always have theſe firſt editions before their eyes, and compare them line by line with the following. Among the ſeveral examples of the corruptions that have crept into the latter, I ſhall only take notice of one. Mr Moreri had ſaid in the article of GILLES LE MAÎTRE, that the Duke of Mayenne, and the other chiefs of the League, named John le Maître Preſident of the Parliament of

(g) E longinquo reverentia major.

Paris in the room of Barnaby Briſſon, and that in this quality they were deputed to the pretended States of the kingdom held at Paris in the year 1593. That the Legate propoſed there the publication of the Council of Trent, without any reſtriction or modification, that it was a nice affair in itſelf; that le Maître and du Vair, then a Counſellor, had orders to examine it, &c. There is a fault here which is corrected in the Dutch editions, where they have put he was deputed, inſtead of they were deputed, but they have committed an error in another place, for inſtead of le Maître and du Vair, then a Counſellor, they have put le Maître and du Vair, then Counſellors. This error is in the edition of Paris 1699, and ſhews that the attention of the editors is ſometimes very remiſs, for in reading the word Counſellors they did not remember that two or three lines before they had read that le Matîre was deputed in quality of Preſident (14).

The laſt thing I ſhall obſerve is, that new errors will continually creep into the editions of Moreri notwithſtanding all the attention and ability of the reviſers, if they themſelves do not take the trouble exactly to correct all the proofs, or if they do not get them to be corrected by men who are both very knowing and very attentive. It is owing to the negligence of the corrector of the preſs that we find in the edition of Paris 1699, at the article Lodrin, a very groſs fault which had been corrected in the Dutch editions. I ſhall quote this article according to the edition of Lyons 1688.

LODRIN, a city and gulf of Albania in Greece. It muſt not be miſtaken for LODRON, a lordſhip of the country of Trent in Italy, near Braſlan.

All this is in the edition of Paris 1699. Bnt in the Dutch edition which I make uſe of, and which is that of the year 1698, they have put, as it ſhould be, Breſſan, inſtead of Braſlan, and they have retained the line immediately following which is,

LODRON. See Lodrin.

It has been left out in the Paris edition, but it would have been better to let it ſtand as it was, becauſe there are a great many readers who do not find that which they look for in a Dictionary, unleſs it appears there at the beginning of a new line. The beſt way of correcting it would be to leave out theſe words it muſt not be miſtaken for, and to put what follows in a line by itſelf. They are words which without any further caution ſufficiently ſhew the readers that they ought not to miſtake Lodron for Lodrin (15). We may likewiſe hint to the editors that they will do well to lengthen the article Lodron both as Geographers and as Genealogiſts. They ought to know that the curioſity of the readers increaſes very much with reſpect even to places that are pretty obſcure, when the Gazettes happen to mention them often. Such perſons who never had the leaſt deſire to know where the Oglio is, and the Adda; nor what kind of places are Salo, Dezenzano, Gavardo, Montechiaro &c. have complained a thouſand times for theſe four or five years paſt, that they did not find in Moreri very particular articles upon the ſource, and the courſe of theſe rivers, and upon the ſituation, and the qualities of theſe towns. People have at preſent the very ſame curioſity with reſpect to Lodron. Beſides it is not a bare lordſhip, but an antient county, and it is a great while ſince the Counts of Lodron have made themſelves famous. The ſeries of their Genealogy would make a curious article in Moreri (16). The learned will think themſelves concerned in it becauſe Joſeph Scaliger pretended that his grand-mother Berenice, or Veronica, of Lodron, was daughter to the Count of Lodron. Scioppius in his Scaliger Hypobolimæus ſays this is falſe, and alledges ſeveral facts which may ſerve for materials to the editors.

I make no excuſe for the length of this preface, or advertiſement, which I have joined to the ſecond edition of the Critical Remarks firſt publiſhed at Paris. Every one will ſee that this may ſerve as a ſupplement.

---

(14) In the edition of 1707 &c ſeq. we find a ſeparate article of JOHN LE MAÎTRE, where inſtead of they were deputed, they have put he was deputed; and the words then a Counſellor are left out. NEW OBSERVAT.

(15) In the laſt editions this article runs as follows:

LODRIN, a city and gulf of Albania in Greece, ought not to be miſtaken for LODRON, an antient county of the country of Trent in Italy, near the Breſſan.

Thus they ſtill make but one article of Lodrin and Lodron, inſtead of making two according to Mr Bayle's remark. NEW OBSERVAT.

(16) They have not yet given us in Moreri's Dictionary the Geographical deſcription of Lodron, nor the Genealogy of it's Counts. NEW OBSERVAT.

THE PREFACE

TO THE

PARIS EDITION.

WHAT I now publiſh is not a criticiſm upon Moreri's Dictionary; I am not raſh enough to make ſuch an attempt. Mr Bayle, after great efforts, has not fully executed it (1). Mr le Clerc, who came after him, and had the advantage of his obſervations, has only committed new faults, added to the old ones which he has not taken the trouble to correct: and indeed the edition which he publiſhed in the year 1699, to ſpeak properly, is not exact in any thing beſides the articles that have ſome conformity with thoſe which we find in the Critical Dictionary of Rotterdam (2). The two editions which were publiſhed one upon the other at Paris, are not near ſo faulty as the former ones; and thoſe who had the care of them, have purged them of ſeveral errors which we ſtill find in the edition of 1699. The laſt eſpecially ſeems to have been carried to a degree of perfection which a work of that nature may attain to: the chronology has been corrected; inſtead of varying as it did in ſeveral places, it is fixed to a certain order. The articles are put in a form more convenient to the reader, and purged of a great many falſe facts, which only ſerve to ſtifle the true ones, and to make people queſtion the moſt fundamental points of hiſtory, when authors have had the indiſcretion to confound both together: in ſhort, every thing there is placed in an order that is agreeable to an eager reader, and uſeful to a learned one: and it muſt be ſaid to the praiſe of Mr Vaultier, who has ſuſtained alone the immenſe burthen of this labour, that it wanted a man of his patience and aſſiduity not to ſink under the weight of ſo great an enterprize; eſpecially when it is known that he was aſſiſted by none, and that if you except one Friar, whoſe knowledge is limited to one certain kind of erudition, he was abandoned by every body elſe. It is true it might be objected to him, that he has received ſome memoirs, and that if he had ſhewed that he made any account of them, people would have furniſhed him with more, during the impreſſion, and in proportion to the good reception they ſhould have ſeen him give to the firſt. But this is not the queſtion here, and as to what concerns me I have no complaint to make againſt him before the tribunal of the public.

---

(1) Our author pretends, that Mr Bayle undertook in his Dictionary to cenſure all Moreri's faults; but that after great efforts, he has not fully executed that undertaking. Mr Bayle never had ſuch a deſign. He does not criticize Moreri but when he gives an article that is likewiſe to be met with in the Dictionary of that author. I have put by themſelves in a remark, ſays he in his preface, the errors I have imputed to Moreri. I have not touched upon thoſe that are found in the articles given by him, and not by me, though they are not leſs conſiderable, nor leſs frequent in theſe articles than in thoſe I have given. A little after he ſubjoins: For the ſake of youth, who want to have their judgment formed, and to be made ſenſible of the moſt ſcrupulous exactneſs, I have taken notice of the leaſt faults of Moreri in the ſubjects we both handle: as for the miſtakes that are in other places, I do not meddle with them as I ſaid before. Here is a very plain proof of the little exactneſs of our Critic. His Remarks are almoſt every one taken from Mr Bayle's Dictionary, as will be ſhewn hereafter; and yet he has not at all attended to what Mr Bayle ſo expreſsly declares in his preface. NEW OBSERVAT.

(2) This author does not do juſtice here to Mr le Clerc, who has corrected an infinite number of faults in the Dutch editions of Moreri's Dictionary, and has made very conſiderable additions to it. He has not ſeen theſe editions: what he ſays of them is borrowed from the reviſer of Paris, who, the better to recommend his labour, had undervalued that of Mr le Clerc, at the ſame time that he made uſe of it. Mr le Clerc ſhewed the injuſtice of his proceeding in a memoir inſerted in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for February 1700, Art. VII, pag. 207, & ſeq. He even obſerved, that the Paris reviſer had left ſome faults that were corrected in the laſt Dutch editions; for example, at the article CAB, there was Cumbertund, inſtead of Cumberland. This error ſtill continues in the edition of 1725. NEW OBSERVAT.

After ſuch a particular account, it will be eaſy to judge of the nature of this little work: it contains only ſome remarks that have eſcaped Mr Vaultier; they are even, if you will, ſome faults which any other author, over-charged with ſuch a prodigious labour, would infallibly have committed; and he might have eſteemed himſelf happy if he had not been guilty of ſtill greater ones. Among theſe faults there are ſome which particularly relate to certain nations, to certain countries, and even to certain diſtricts, and which conſequently do not much intereſt a reader, who has not ſeen theſe countries any where but in a map; but as I hope theſe Remarks may be of ſervice to the firſt edition that ſhall be publiſhed of Moreri's Dictionary, I would not omit taking notice of theſe ſlight errors, being perſuaded that it will be much eaſier for an editor to make a proper uſe of them when he finds them collected together in a ſmall volume. There are other faults among thoſe which I have cenſured, that will require a more ſerious conſideration, and the correcting of which, as any reader may obſerve, was eſſential to the perfecting of the Hiſtorical Dictionary.

For example, it would never perhaps have come into the thoughts of the new editors, that there is no ſtone bridge upon the Rhine, and perhaps alſo if it were not for the remark I make on this ſubject, an editor who might have been preſent at the laſt ſiege of Briſach (a), would notwithſtanding continue to write after Mr Moreri, that they croſs the Rhine there upon a fine ſtone bridge. The remark, I own, is trivial; it neverthelеſs ſerves to correct an error which has run thro' twelve editions, and into which that ſkilful Geographer Mr le Clerc, who pretends to criticiſe Quintus Curtius, has fallen as well as the reſt: I grant it is an error proceeding from want of attention, it cannot even be of any other kind (b); but is it the leſs an error upon that account? How many of thoſe little authors who have no other ſtock for compoſing books, but the great Hiſtorical Dictionary, will believe hereafter that they croſs the Rhine at Briſach upon a fine ſtone bridge? Theſe little books, which are copied one from another, having once given a run to that falſe tradition, would be ſufficient, in a few centuries, to make a probable opinion of what is ſaid now, that there is a ſtone bridge at Briſach: and from thence would ariſe controverſies among the Geographers; of the ſame nature with that which we ſee in our days, between Mr le Clerc, and Mr Perizonius, upon ſome paſſages of the celebrated Hiſtorian of Alexander the Great.

Will not what is ſaid in the new edition of Moreri, concerning the year in which King James II died, be likewiſe one day the ſubject of a diſpute among the Chronologers? Grounded upon inconteſtable records, ſome will place his death in the year 1701; others upon the authority of the edition of 1704, will maintain, that this Prince died (c) not 'till the year 1702. There will be a multitude of writings, and perhaps of ſlanders and abuſe, and all this through the negligence of an Hiſtorian.

(a) There is too much hyperbole here: it is not in the leaſt probable that an editor who ſhould have ſeen with his own eyes, that the bridge of Briſach is not of ſtone, ſhould neverthelеſs have neglected to correct this error of Moreri. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(b) Our author will give me leave to ſay, that the error he takes notice of may not only be of another kind than errors proceeding from want of attention, but that it actually is ſo, for though we attend ever ſo much to Moreri's words, we cannot judge that he is miſtaken in ſaying that the bridge of Briſach is a ſtone bridge. None but ſuch as know by ſome other way that the thing is falſe can perceive he is miſtaken. But here follows the example of an error that proceeds from want of attention. Moreri, ſpeaking of a river called LE MORIN, ſaid that it is in Brie, that it takes its ſource near Sedane, that it runs through la Ferté Gaucher, through Colmier, &c. He did not copy this laſt word right, for Coulon, his original, ſays, Colomier (he ſhould have ſaid Colomiers); but as for the word Sedane he copied it faithfully. They who have corrected Moreri, have changed Sedane into Sedan, although, without doubt, they knew enough of Geography, not to be ignorant that Sedan is at a great diſtance from Brie. It is therefore owing to want of attention that they have put in their editions of Moreri, that the Morin, a river of France in Brie, takes its ſource near Sedan. They ſhould have ſaid near Sezane. As to what concerns Colmier, they might believe that there was a place of that name in Brie, but with a little more application they would have found that it ſhould be Colomiers, and not Colmier (3). Perhaps Mr Moreri followed, more than he ought to have done, the cuſtom of ſeveral Frenchmen, which is to pronounce, with two ſyllables, the names that are written with three. It is thus that ſome authors who have written againſt Mr de Vallemont, call him Valmont, and that others call Malment an author who writes his name Mallement: from hence it will proceed one day or other that the Bibliographers will give us an author whoſe name is Vallemont, and another whoſe name is Valmont, &c; but Mr Moreri would not be excuſable from the cuſtom that he might have taken of pronouncing Colgne and not Cologne, Colnie and not Colonie. He ſhould have written proper names not according to his own pronunciation; but according to their Orthography. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(3) In the edition of 1725, it is ſaid that this river takes its ſource near Sezanne, and that it runs through Coulomier. NEW OBSERVAT.

(c) I believe this falſe date is an error of the preſs; neverthelеſs, the Critic was not obliged to enquire whether it came from the editor or Printers. It is the fate of authors that they muſt bear the blame of the negligence of the correctors of the preſs. I do not pretend to affirm in general, that an author may not ſometimes be miſtaken as to epochs, that are both very remarkable, and very late. The author of the Supplement to Moreri fancied, that Marſhal Turenne made the whole campaign of the year 1675. He did not remember one thing which all the world knew, viz. that Marſhal Turenne was killed by a cannon-ball on the twenty-ſeventh of July 1675. Here follow the words of the author of this Supplement in the article MONTECUCULI: But in the year 1675, Montecuculi could do nothing in Alſatia, becauſe Marſhal Turenne broke all his meaſures. Nothing can be more falſe than this, for Montecuculi did not go into Alſatia till after Marſhal Turenne's death (4). I ſhall ſay, by the by, that they ſhould not only have cor-

By theſe two inſtances, ſingled out from ſeveral others, one may judge of the uſefulneſs of theſe Remarks, which only relate to the matters themſelves; for if we had been willing to take the errors of the preſs into conſideration, there would have been matter enough to make a large volume.

---

rected this blunder in the Dutch editions, but likewiſe have made that article more compleat. It was not to be expected that the author of the Supplement ſhould have enlarged much upon the glory of Count Montecuculi. That General was not loved in France; they conſidered him as the principal cauſe of their loſing all the conqueſts of the year 1672; but for that very reaſon the Dutch editions ſhould have given us a long article of this General of the Imperial armies, and adorned it with the fineſt encomiums which he deſerved. Such an omiſſion is more blameworthy than to partake in the error which has not been corrected, concerning the age of Montecuculi. The Supplement ſays, that this General died in the year 1680, aged more than eighty years. It is nevertheleſs true that he lived but ſeventy-two years and eight months. He was born in the year 1608, as we find in his life printed before his memoirs, at Geneva in the year 1704, and thereby we correct the fault of the Printers of that life, who fix his death on the ſixteenth of October 1681, inſtead of 1680 (5). MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(4) This remained in the editions of 1707 and 1712. It was ſtruck out in that of 1725. NEW OBSERVAT.

(5) This likewiſe remained in the editions of 1707 and 1712. In that of 1725 it is ſaid, that Count Montecuculi died on the ſixteenth of October 1680, aged ſeventy-two years and eight months; and at the end of his article they take notice that he had preſented to the Emperor, in the year 1665, his Memoirs, compoſed during his campaigns in Hungary, publiſhed in the year 1704 by Mr Hayſſen, a German gentleman, Governor to the Prince of Muſcovy. NEW OBSERVAT.

CRITICAL REMARKS UPON THE
NEW EDITION
OF MORERI'S HISTORICAL DICTIONARY,
Publiſhed in the year 1704.

A.

ACTOR.

MR BAYLE had already cenſured Mr Moreri for changing this word into that of Actorius. This error indeed has been corrected in the new edition; as well as that where it is ſaid that Ovid ſpeaks of one Actorius: for theſe words, quæ fuit Actoridæ cum magno ſemper Achille, ought not to be underſtood of a man named Actorius, but of Patroclus, whom the Poets generally diſtinguiſh by the Patronymic name of Actorides, which ſignifies nothing elſe but deſcended from Actor. The explication which Mr Bayle has given of the Poet's thought is very full; and it is their fault who publiſhed the editions of 1699 and 1704, that they did not reap the benefit of it, ſince they needed only to have conſulted the Critical Dictionary. I confeſs it is troubleſome to conſult upon every article all the Critics, and all the interpreters; but in that very reſpect will theſe Remarks be of great uſe to thoſe who ſhall hereafter undertake to publiſh a new edition, ſince I collect into a very ſmall volume part of the faults which were left in the old editions, ſo that one may run them over in a ſhort time.

But if the new editor, on whoſe edition I make Remarks, has corrected this article in ſome places, he has changed it for the worſe in ſeveral others; the proof of which follows.

In the article of ACTOR the Locrian, the editor ſhould have obſerved, that Peleus, the ſaid Actor's ſon-in-law, was grandſon to his (a) wife Ægina; and that therefore Polymele, the daughter of Actor and Ægina, was at the ſame time Peleus's aunt and wife; ſhe was his aunt, as being ſiſter to his father Æacus (1): beſides, Jupiter was (b) grandfather

---

(a) That is to ſay, Actor's wife. The word his is very ambiguous here. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) In the edition of 1725 it is ſaid, that ACTOR, born in Locris, or according to others in Theſſaly, was ſon to Myrmidon, and grandſon to Jupiter, that he married the nymph Ægina; and that he gave his kingdom with his daughter Polymene (it ſhould have been Polymele) to Peleus, the ſon of Æacus, and father of Achilles. NEW OBSERVAT.

(b) This wanted proof, for we do not ſee that Jupiter was father either to Actor or Ægina. He had a ſon by Ægina; but Polymele, daughter to the ſaid Ægina, was daughter to Actor, which made no conſanguinity between Jupiter and Polymele. MR BAYLE'S REM.

grandfather to Polymele, and likewiſe to Peleus. In the article of Actor, the ſon of Axeas, and father of Aſtioche, the editor is miſtaken when he ſays that Aſtioche had two ſons by Neptune; it was by Mars that ſhe had theſe two ſons, who commanded the troops of Aſpledon (c) and Orchomene at the ſiege of Troy (2). The editor might have taken this Actor, for the Actor of whom Pauſanias ſpeaks in his fifth book, and who was ſon to Neptune and Agamede, the daughter of Augeus (3). On this head you may conſult the tenth book of the Iliad. We ſee from thence that the editor has confounded theſe two articles, and that of two Actors he has made but one, whom he makes the father-in-law of Neptune; whereas that god was father to the ſecond of the two whom I have juſt now mentioned.

(c) Aſpledon and Orchomene are names of towns: the reader might poſſibly take them for names of men. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(2) In the ſame edition we find that Actor, the ſon of Axeus, or Azeus, was father to Aſtioche, and that this nymph had by Neptune two ſons, &c. Yet Mr Bayle had obſerved, that it was by the god Mars ſhe had theſe two ſons. New Observat.

(3) In this edition they have not given us the article of Actor, ſon to Neptune and Agamede, the daughter of Augeus, though they might have taken it from Mr Bayle.

Our author has copied almoſt every thing that he ſays here from Mr Bayle. But he is miſtaken in citing the fifth book of Pauſanias. That quotation in Mr Bayle relates to another Actor, ſon to Phorbas. New Observat.

ADAM.

Moreri ſays that Joſephus relates, that Adam engraved upon two different tables the obſervations which he had made upon the courſe of the ſtars. Theſe are not the words of that antient Hiſtorian; he only ſays in the ſecond chapter of the firſt book of his antiquities, that the offspring of Seth, the ſon of Adam, were the inventers of Aſtrology, and that they cauſed the principles which they had diſcovered, to be engraved upon two pillars, the one of brick and the other of ſtone, in order to ſecure them from the general deſtruction, which, as Adam had foretold, was to happen once by fire, and another time by water (1). Moreri likewiſe ſays, that the firſt man gave names to the plants, whereas the Scripture only aſcribes to him the invention of the names of beaſts. The editor has adopted the firſt of theſe errors (2), but has corrected the ſecond.

---

(1) This Remark is taken from Mr Bayle. New Observat.

(2) This is corrected in the edition of 1725. New Observat.

ADAMITES.

Moreri makes St Epiphanius ſay, that the churches of the Adamites were infamous places, on account of the abominable crimes which they committed in theſe caverns of horror and proſtitution. That holy Father does not ſpeak ſo in the ſummary of his ſecond book; he only ſays, ‘that the Adamites meet together as naked as they were born, and in that condition go thro’ their lectures, prayers, and other religious exerciſes.’ Beſides, Moreri has too raſhly affirmed, that there was a ſect of theſe Heretics in England. This is abſolutely falſe, and the editor has corrected that place, but he has not had the ſame precaution with reſpect to the text of St Epiphanius (1).

---

(1) All this is taken from Mr Bayle. What concerns St Epiphanius has been corrected in the edition of 1725; and Mr Bayle is quoted at the end of the article. New Observat.

ADRICHOMITES (a).

Moreri is miſtaken in this article, when he takes Trajectum for Utrecht, inſtead of taking it for Maeſtricht. He ſays afterwards that Adrichomites himſelf publiſhed his Theatre of the Holy Land; whereas it is certain that this book was not publiſhed till after his death; beſides, this ſame Bibliographer divides that work into two, by obſerving that the Theatre of the Holy Land, is different from the Deſcription of the Holy Land, whereas it is but one and the ſame work. The editor has corrected the firſt fault, and adopted the ſecond (1).

(a) He ſhould have ſaid Adrichomius, for ſo do we find that word written in the Dictionary of Moreri. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(1) This Remark is likewiſe taken from Mr Bayle, at the article Adrichomius. All theſe faults are corrected in the edition of 1725. New Observat.

ADRIAN VI.

In an article where mention is made of this Pope, he is ſaid to be of the houſe of Fieſchi. I ſee very well that the author meant Adrian V, who was really of that family. But, after all, it is ſtill a fault which it is neceſſary to correct in the editions that may be publiſhed hereafter; for nothing can be more different than Ottoboni di Fieſchi, who was Pope under the name of Adrian V, and Adrian Florentius, who was ſo under that of Adrian VI. The former lived in the XIIIth century, and the latter in the XVIth (1).

---

(1) They have put Adrian V in the edition of 1707, and the following ones. New Observat.

AINS.

This article was right in the preceding editions, and they have ſpoiled it in this. The river Ains *, which comes from the county of Burgundy, and divides Breſſe from Bugey, is in the laſt edition improperly called the river of Dain. Guichenon, who has written the hiſtory of theſe two little provinces, is the proper judge of this queſtion. We need only conſult him, and we ſhall ſee how he criticizes Cognatus (a) and Maſſo upon the ſubject of this river (1).

* Ens, Indis, Indus, Danus, & Idanus, in Latin.

(a) That is to ſay, Gilbert Couſin (Gilbertus Cognatus, who had been Eraſmus's ſervant), and Papyrius Maſſo. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) In the edition of 1725, at the article AIN (l') it is ſaid that the river Ain runs between Breſſe and Bugey. NEW OBSERVAT.

ALCIATUS.

In the article of Andrew Alciatus, a Civilian of Milan, the editor has forgot to mention the following book, among thoſe which he aſcribes to him: Rerum patriæ ſeu Hiſtoriæ Mediolanenſis, lib. iv. ex M. S. Bibliothecæ Ambroſianæ. One would think he could not forget, in the article of a celebrated author, the work which he dedicated to the glory of his native country (1).

(1) There is no mention made of this work in the laſt edition: but at the end of this article they have added: thoſe who would know the catalogue of Alciatus's works need only conſult the Eloges des Hommes Sçavans de Mr de Thou, by Teiſſier, Tom. I. They ſhould have referred to the edition of theſe Eloges, publiſhed in 1715, where they have collected the judgments of ſome learned men upon that hiſtory of the Milaneze. NEW OBSERVAT.

ALEANDER.

Moreri, ſpeaking of this Cardinal's death, had not determined what book he was about to publiſh when he died; but the editor tells us, that Moreri's words are to be underſtood as relating to his great work againſt the Profeſſors (Opera contra i Profeſſori: Lorenz. Craſſo); nevertheleſs, it is not ſure that it was the ſame which the Cardinal was writing when he died, and Mr Bayle is not certain of it (a). Therefore when a Critic of that penetration wavers upon any ſubject, another ſhould not raſhly form his opinion (1). The editor, in reckoning up the works of that great Cardinal, has forgot to mention his Tables of the Greek Grammar (2).

(a) This ought not to be underſtood as if Mr Bayle expreſſed ſome doubt upon that head: he neither affirms nor denies any thing: he only quotes the words of Paul Jovius, and thoſe of Lorenzo Craſſo. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) Our author ſhould have aſſigned his reaſons for doubting that the Work againſt the Profeſſors was that which Aleander was writing when he died; and have ſhewn that Paul Jovius and Lorenzo Craſſo are miſtaken. Otherwiſe we have a right to conſider his doubt as a pure imagination: and indeed it is only grounded upon a falſe ſuppoſition that Mr Bayle had raiſed doubts concerning it. NEW OBSERVAT.

(2) There is no mention made in the new edition of Moreri of Aleander's Tables of the Greek Grammar; though Mr Bayle ſpeaks of them, and it is from him that our author has taken this particular. NEW OBSERVAT.

ALEXANDER.

I ſhould have believed that the editor would have corrected in this article a bad phraſe which his author makes uſe of; at leaſt I call it bad, becauſe it is ſuſceptible of a double meaning: it is this; Darius n'avoit point voulu faire le dégât dans l'Aſie, ſelon l'avis de Memnon (i. e. Darius had refuſed to lay Aſia waſte according to Memnon's advice). To judge of this expreſſion according to its obvious ſenſe, we are as much inclined to believe that Memnon had not adviſed ſuch waſte to be made, as that he had adviſed it; ſo true it is, that the meaning often depends upon the order in which the words are placed, and upon the turn of a phraſe. If the editor had carefully peruſed all the Remarks that have been made upon the different editions of Moreri, this fault would not have eſcaped him (1).

(1) This ambiguous expreſſion has paſſed into the edition of 1725, where it is ſaid that Darius n'avoit point voulu faire de dégât dans l'Aſie ſelon l'avis de Memnon. Mr Bayle had already taken notice of it in the article Memnon, remark [D]; but in a more diſtinct and preciſe manner than our author, who ſtill copies him here. NEW OBSERVAT.

ALMAIN.

When Moreri ſpeaks of that famous doctor of the univerſity of Paris, and is enumerating his works, he ſhould not have forgot that which concerns the Laity. The very circumſtances of the time ſhould have engaged the editor to ſpeak of it with ſome exactneſs (1).

(1) Our Critic commits here ſeveral faults which Mr Bayle has particularized above in his Preface. NEW OBSERVAT.

ARLENIUS.

I ſhould have expected that this author, who lived in the reign of Charles V, and who called himſelf in the world (a) by the name of Peraxylus, would have found a place in the new edition of the Dictionary. The fine Greek edition of Joſephus, which he publiſhed from the excellent manuſcript of Dom Diego de Mendozza, the Emperor's Ambaſſador at Venice, in whoſe retinue he was, ſhould have entitled him to that place: beſides, Arlenius was an excellent Poet. Moreri, and thoſe who ſince him have been employed in reviſing his Dictionary, are not the only perſons who were ignorant of the merit of this great man (1).

(a) That is to ſay, in the learned world. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) Our author (as I ſaid before) has taken almoſt all his Remarks from Mr Bayle's Dictionary; but he has concealed or diſguiſed theſe little thefts as much as he could. Here, for example, he produces, under the word Arlenius, what Mr Bayle had ſaid in the article Peraxylus. What is ſingular in the caſe is, that he complains that Moreri, and thoſe who ſince him have been employed in reviſing his Dictionary, make no mention of Arlenius; and indeed they ſay nothing of him under that word; but they have given him a very good article, taken from Mr Bayle, at the word Peraxylus. NEW OBSERVAT.

B.

BASIN.

ARmand Baſin de Beſons is not Archbiſhop of Aix, as the editor affirms, but of Bourdeaux, and he ſucceeded in that dignity to the late Mr de Bourlemont (1).

---

(1) This miſtake is corrected in the edition of 1725, at the article BAZIN (Claude). NEW OBSERVAT.

BAVARIA.

This article is not exact, and the editor varies in his chronology. The Emperor Frederic III was not father-in-law to Albert IV, Duke of Bavaria, who is ſuppoſed to have married Cunegonda, that Emperor's daughter; on the contrary, Frederic III married for his ſecond wife Cunegonda, daughter to Lewis of Bavaria, his greateſt enemy; and he had by that ſecond marriage Elizabeth, wife to Walter, Count of Schwartberg (1). Now Lewis of Bavaria, who was afterwards Emperor, and the third of that name, was great grandfather's grandfather of Albert IV, Duke of Bavaria. How then was it poſſible for him to be ſon-in-law to the Emperor Lewis III (a), and conſequently his cotemporary (2)?

The editor perhaps meant that Albert IV, Duke of Bavaria, married Cunegonda, daughter to the Emperor Frederic IV. But if he calls this Frederic III, he muſt then not reckon in the number of Emperors Frederic, called the fair, the third of that name, ſon to the Emperor Albert I, and grandſon to the Emperor Rudolph I (3).

It

---

(1) Our author pretends that the Emperor Frederic III, (called the fair) married Cunegonda, daughter to Lewis of Bavaria, his greateſt enemy. He has probably taken this from the work he criticizes: for in Moreri, at the word Auſtria, pag. 877, we find that the Emperor Frederic, called the fair, married for his ſecond wife Cunegonda of Bavaria, daughter to the Emperor Lewis, by whom he had Elizabeth, wife to Gonthier Count of Schwartzemberg. But, 1. Ritterſhuſius does not take notice that Frederic the fair had two wives: he only mentions Iſabella of Arragon. 2. Heiſſ. in his Hiſtory of the Empire, only ſays that Duke Frederic of Auſtria, and Duke Lewis of Bavaria, who diſputed the empire with one another, were couſin-germans. 3. In Moreri, at the word Bavaria, and the article of the Emperor Lewis, pag. 135, we find no Cunegonda among the children whom he had by his two wives, and who are nine in number. Our author confounds here, after Moreri, Frederic the fair, who died in the year 1330, and had been competitor to Lewis of Bavaria, with Frederic the Pacific, who died in 1493. This laſt had by Eleanor of Portugal, a daughter named Cunegonda, who was married, in the year 1487, to Albert IV, Duke of Bavaria, as may be ſeen in Ritterſhuſius, fol. 57, and 66, of the edition of Tubingen 1664; and as it has been obſerved in Moreri, at the article Bavaria, pag. 136, (where the Printers have by miſtake put Albert V, inſtead of Albert IV) and at the word Auſtria, pag. 878. NEW OBSERTAT.

(a) He ſhould have ſaid Frederic III. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(2) Mr Bayle imagined that they had put here Lewis III, inſtead of Frederic III. In effect, the connection of the ideas and of the reaſoning required that our author ſhould have ended by proving that Albert IV could not have been ſon-in-law to Frederic III: but we muſt not expect that he ſhould be ſo exact. After laying it down as a certain fact that Cunegonda was daughter to the Emperor Lewis of Bavaria, he concludes from thence that Albert IV could not have been her huſband, ſince Lewis of Bavaria was Albert the fourth's great grandfather's grandfather, and conſequently was not even ſo much as his cotemporary. NEW OBSERVAT.

(3) Ritterſhuſius and Heiſſ. give the title of Frederic III to Frederic the Pacific. Other writers call him with our author, Frederic IV. This matter is pretty

It is true that the Emperor Lewis of Bavaria diſputed the Empire with him; but Pope John XXII, and a great part of the Princes of Europe, acknowledged him. Be that as it will, the editor ſhould be conſiſtent in the principles of his Chronology, and he is ſo far from being ſo, that he calls that Prince Frederic III, when he makes him father-in-law to Albert IV, Duke of Bavaria, and Frederic IV, when he obſerves that Lewis of Bavaria called the Rich, tore by way of contempt the letters which that Emperor wrote to him in the year 1457 (4).

As for the reſt, it was the death of the Emperor Henry VII, of the houſe of Luxembourg, which gave occaſion to the double election of Frederic of Auſtria, and of Lewis of Bavaria: it is this ſame Henry who was ſaid to have been poiſoned by a hoſt or conſecrated wafer.

pretty well cleared up in Moreri. At the article of Frederic called the Fair, pag. 192, that Emperor is named Frederic III, and they add that ſome authors do not reckon him among the Emperors: and at the article of Frederic called the Pacific, pag. ibid. they put Frederic IV, Emperor, or III. according to others. They likewiſe call him Frederic IV, at the word Auſtria, pag. 878. The caſe is the ſame with reſpect to the Emperor Lewis, of whom mention has been juſt made. Our author ſays Lewis of Bavaria III of that name: Moreri at the word Bavaria, pag. 135, calls him IV of that name; and at the article Lewis, pag. 219, IV, or V, of that name: and Heiſſ. ſays V, of that name. New Observat.

(4) In the laſt edition, at the word Bavaria, pag. 136, there is Frederic III. New Observat.

BEAUPOIL.

Lewis de Beaupoil of St Aulaire is improperly called the Marquis Danmarie: they ſhould have ſaid (a) Lanmarie. It is a fault which is peculiar to this edition, and the editor where he ſpeaks of the late Mr Perrault has commited it (1).

(a) The Mercure Galant for the month of April 1702, ſays Lamarie, and ſpeaks of the Marquis de Lamarie Captain-Lieutenant of a company of the Gendarmery, married to the daughter of Preſident Perrault, a lady of above two hundred thouſand crowns fortune. But as proper names are ill ſpelt in the Mercure Galant, it would not be reaſonable to prefer Lamarie to Lanmarie. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(1) In the edition of 1707, and the following, at the article Beaupoil, they have always put Lanmary. They likewiſe write Sainte Aulaire, and not Saint Aulaire as our author does, who is likewiſe miſtaken in ſaying Perrault, for Perault. I have not been able to find the place where he pretends that this fault lies. New Observat.

BELLAY.

In all the editions of the Hiſtorical Dictionary, and in this laſt as well in the firſt, when they ſpeak of the dignities of the Church of Bellay, they omit that of Archdeacon, and ſubſtitute in the room of it that of Chanter. The latter is not a dignity in the ſaid Church, and that of Archdeacon is the ſecond (1): beſides the laſt letter but one of Belley is not an a but an e. This Church has produced great men.

(1) In the edition of 1725, at the word Beley, it is ſaid that the chapter of the Cathedral Church of Beley is compoſed of nineteen Canons, and of four Dignitaries, which are the Dean, the Arch-prieſt, the Archdeacon, and the Primicier. New Observat.

BOILEAU.

Gilles Boileau, Steward of the King's privy-purſe, brother to the celebrated Mr Deſpreaux, and to the Abbot Boileau, Doctor of the Sorbonne, was dead before the year 1671, which all the editions of Moreri aſſign for the year of his death; ſince Mr de Montigny who ſucceeded him in the French Academy, was admitted there in 1669. This fault has gone through all the editions, in this as well as in the former (1).

(1) This fault is corrected in the edition of 1707. Mr Bayle had taken notice of it in his Réponſe aux Queſtions d'un Provincial, Tom. I. chap. XVIII. pag. 134. New Observat.

BRANCAS.

The Abbot Brancas, who is ſtill living, is not the ſon of Magdalen Clara of Lenoncourt, firſt wife to the late Duke of Villars, but of Magdalen Girard his ſecond wife (1).

(1) Since theſe Remarks were deſigned for the correcting of Moreri, our author ſhould have pointed out the place where this fault lies. New Observat.

BRISACH.

There is a fault here which has eſcaped Mr Vaultier, as well as Mr le Clerc, and the other editors (a) of Moreri's Dictionary. Is it allowable for one to be ignorant that there is no ſtone bridge upon the Rhine? and that the rapidity of this river has always hindered any ſuch from being built? Nevertheleſs they all affirm very poſitively in the article Briſach, that this town is ſituated upon the Rhine, which has there a ſtone bridge over it: this river has no bridges but ſuch as are of wood (1), and even theſe are only (a) We may add that Mr Baudrand is in the ſame caſe, ſince he ſays in his Geographical Dictionary, ſpeaking of Briſach cum ponte lapideo ad Rhenum fluvium; - - - - with a ſtone bridge over the Rhine. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(1) In the edition of 1707 and the following ones, at the word Brisac or Brissac, they ſay that there was formerly at that place a bridge of wood over the Rhine, which was demoliſhed after the peace of Riſwick. In the edition of 1725, they always write Briſach. New Observat.

(b) We only bridges (b) of boats. The firſt bridge that we find in going up towards the ſource of this river, is the bridge (c) of Conſtance; and the laſt is that of Straſbourg. It is true that formerly Cæſar built a wooden bridge below Mentz, in order to tranſport his army, but there is no ſuch thing now (d).

(b) We can hardly conceive that the bridge of Briſach was a bridge of boats, when we remember that the reaſon alledged by France why ſhe did not forthwith evacuate that fortreſs, which by the treaty of Riſwick ſhe was obliged to reſtore to the Emperor, was that they wanted a great deal of time for pulling up the piles which ſupported the bridge. It had been ſtipulated by that treaty of peace, that the bridge of Briſach ſhould be demoliſhed. Thoſe who read the account of the battle that was fought in the year 1678, between the French and the Germans at the bridge of Rhinfeld will ſtill be at a greater loſs to conceive that this bridge is only a bridge of boats. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(c) The Sieur Coulon in his book of the rivers of France Tom. 2. pag. 504. Says that there are twelve bridges upon the Rhine, the firſt of which is at Stein, and the laſt at Straſbourg: now he ſays pag. 508, that Stein is near the place where the Rhine comes out of the lake of Conſtance. Our author had expreſſed himſelf more accurately if he had ſaid, the laſt bridge that we find in going up towards the ſource of this river is the bridge of Conſtance, (or of Stein according to the Sieur Coulon; but he is miſtaken for there is a bridge upon the Rhine at Conſtance) and the firſt is that of Straſbourg. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(d) As the end of theſe marginal notes is the ſame with that of the remarks of the text, viz. to make the future editions of Moreri's Dictionary more perfect, we ſhall ſay here occaſionally that there is ſomething in the article Briſgaw which ſhould be ſtruck out. We read there that Briſach was formerly its capital, but afterwards Friburg got the ſtart of it, and is become memorable by its riches and other advantages. It is likewiſe ſo on account of the famous battle which the Duke d'Anguien . . . . won in the year 1644, where General Merci was killed. It will be proper in a new edition to ſtop at Friburg got the ſtart of it. The reſt is miſplaced and ſhould come in under the word Friburg (2). Beſides it is not true that General Merci was killed at the battle of Friburg in 1644. He was killed at the battle of Nortlingen in the year 1645. He had a brother named Gaſpar who was killed at the battle of Friburg in 1644. This is what deceived Moreri. In the article of General Merci, Moreri obſerves that he was wounded at Nortlingen on the third of Auguſt 1645. It ſhould have been ſaid that he died of his wounds. This capital omiſſion ought to be ſupplied in the firſt edition that ſhall be publiſhed (3). Mr Bayle's Remark.

(2) This is corrected in the edition of 1725, after the following manner: Briſach . . . . . was formerly the capital city, but afterwards Friburg, more famous on account of its riches, deprived it of that rank. The reſt is wholly left out. At the article Friburg mention is made of the victory obtained by the Duke d'Anguien. New Observat.

(3) All theſe faults are corrected in the laſt edition. New Observat.

C.

CAMUS.

THE editor calls the famous Biſhop of Belley, John-Peter le Camus, inſtead John-Peter Camus. It is a fault which he has not taken from the old editions, but which he himſelf has made without doubt, by confounding the families of le Camus and Camus, which are nevertheleſs very different (1). The firſt is an antient family of the Robe at Paris; Cardinal le Camus is of that family. The ſecond is a family of military gentlemen though ſome branches of it at this day wear the Robe. Since I am ſpeaking of John-Peter Camus, Biſhop of Belley. I ought to remark that the author of the Paris Gazette, when he mentioned laſt year, or the year before, the death of Mr Camus, Abbot and General of the Order of St Ruf, is in the wrong to ſay that this Abbot was nephew to that Biſhop; they were of the ſame family, but certainly the Biſhop was not the Abbot's uncle.

(1) This fault is not in the edition of 1725. New Observat.

CANADA.

This article is curious enough, but it muſt be confeſſed that the author, ſpeaking of the firſt Apoſtles who planted the faith in theſe newly diſcovered countries, ſhould not have forgot to give the Jeſuits their due (1). There are few religious ſocieties to which the world is ſo much obliged as it is to this, and few that have acted with ſo much courage and zeal in declaring the truths of Chriſtianity to theſe ſavage nations.

(1) Nothing has been added thereupon in the laſt editions. New Observat.

CHRISTINA OF BADEN.

The editor has confounded himſelf when he ſpeaks of this Princeſs, who was third wife to Albert Marquis of Anſpach; it is in the article of Brandenbourg Anſpach. He obſerves firſt of all that Albert was only twice married (1), and afterwards forgetting no

---

(1) This error is corrected in the edition of 1725, at the word Brandenbourg, pag. 455. New Observat.

no doubt the firſt propoſition which he had advanced, he names the three Princeſſes who were wives to this Marquis. I do not know our author's real opinion touching this hiſtorical point; but whatever it be, it is moſt certain that Chriſtina of Baden Dourlach was third wife to Albert of Brandenburg, Marquis of Anſpach, and this Prince is grandfather to the new Princeſs of Hanover (2).

(2) Willelmina-Carolina, the late Queen-conſort of England. New Observat.

CLAIRVAUX.

This abbey is not the chief of the order, it is only one of the four principal daughters of Citeaux. Now if this abbey were chief of the order, the Abbot would not be ſubject to the juriſdiction of the Abbot of Citeaux; it is nevertheleſs a certain fact, and eaſy to be proved that he is ſo (1).

(1) In the edition of 1725 it is ſaid, that the abbey of Clairvaux is the third daughter of Ciſtaux, elective and regular. New Observat.

CLEMENT XI.

There is a fault here which is owing to nothing but want of attention, for beſides that it is not common to all the articles where mention is made of this Pope, it is impoſſible to believe the editor ſo ignorant as not to know that Clement XI, who now fills St Peter's chair, is not the immediate ſucceſſor to Alexander VIII, ſince Innocent XII, whoſe government will one day be ſo famous in hiſtory, on account of the great events which happened in his time, reigned between theſe two Popes; it is nevertheleſs affirmed in the new edition, that Clement XI ſucceeded Alexander VIII (1).

(1) Our author ſhould have pointed out the place where this error lies. New Observat.

CLUSA.

They ſeem to doubt, in the article of James Cluſa, a Ciſtertian Friar, who became afterwards a Carthuſian, whether this author be a different perſon from him who is known under the name of James de Paradiſo; it even looks as if the author of the new edition was unwilling to diſtinguiſh theſe two authors. This article ſhould not have been treated ſo ſuperficially, and the authority of thoſe who diſtinguiſh James de Cluſa, and James de Paradiſo, is not of ſuch ſmall weight that this queſtion deſerved to be treated ſo careleſsly (1).

(1) In the laſt edition they have put Cluse (James de), who, according to moſt authors, is the ſame with James de Parades: and at the word James de Parades, they refer to de Cluse (James). New Observat.

COMO.

Among the authors who have ſpoken of Como, or of the lake of Como, the editor does not mention an hiſtory or a deſcription of that city, which does not indeed contain above two pages, and which was compoſed by Mr Duker, who took it from ſeveral authors. There has been added to it the plan of that city. Mr Duker was poiſoned in Sicily in the year 1635. Camillus Ghilini, a writer of the XVIth century, and one of the beſt Latin authors of that time, has alſo given a deſcription of the lake of Como. The piece does not exceed three pages, and has had no better fate than Duker's, that is to ſay, it has been forgot, as well as the deſcription of the lake of Como in eight pages, written by Paul Jovius. It is ſtrange that in one ſingle article three authors of ſuch diſtinction ſhould be forgotten (1).

(1) Theſe authors are ſtill forgotten in the edition of 1725. Their deſcriptions of the city and of the lake of Como are inſerted in the third volume of Mr Grævius's Theſaurus Antiquitatum Italiæ. New Observat.

CREMONA.

The editor, in reckoning up the authors who mention this city, has forgot Lewis Cavitelli, who wrote the annals of it from its foundation to the year 1583 (1). They are very extenſive, becauſe the author does not ſo much confine himſelf to his ſubject, but that he often takes in facts which have a relation to the general hiſtory of Italy, and even to divers other parts of Europe. This work, tho' written in an age when learning begun to revive, is not the more correct on that account. The editor, as negligent as Moreri was, does not ſo much as give a particular article of Cavitelli.

(1) This author is quoted in the laſt edition; but inſtead of Cavitelli, the Printers have put Camtelli. This work of Cavitelli's is likewiſe to be found in the third volume of the Theſaurus Antiquitatum Italiæ. New Observat.

CREQUI.

There is an error in the laſt edition, touching the Marquis de Crequi, who was killed at the battle of Luzzara. It is obſerved there that the ſaid Lord left ſome daughters by the lady N . . . . d'Aumont, his wife, which is abſolutely falſe: this Marquis left no poſterity, and by his death the Count de Canaples, his uncle, at preſent Duke de Leſdiguieres, who was ſecond ſon to Charles II, Sieur de Crequi, who was killed at the ſiege of Chambery, in the year 1630, has got poſſeſſion of the entailed eſtate: it is eaſy to judge that the entail would not have taken place in his favour, if the Marquis de Crequi had left daughters (1).

---

(1) All this is corrected in the laſt edition. NEW OBSERVAT.

D.

DENIS (Dionyſius Ryckelius).

THE encomium upon this Carthuſian Friar is exceſſive; it is juſt (a), I confeſs, but then the author ſhould have ſhown upon what he grounded it; and ſhould have ſaid ſomething of the admirable works of this Anchoret; of theſe works, I ſay, which obliged Pope Eugenius IV to cry out in reading them, Lætetur Mater Eccleſia quæ talem habet filium. - - - Let mother church rejoice in having ſuch a ſon. The book then which has done the greateſt honour to Denis, the Carthuſian, is his treatiſe concerning the authority of the Pope, and of the Council; and I do not doubt but it was the reading of that work which drew the exclamation from the ſovereign Pontif. Denis Rikel was certainly one of the greateſt lights of his order, and even of the Church (b).

(a) It is difficult to conceive how an encomium that is exceſſive can be juſt; or if it be juſt, how it can be exceſſive. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(b) Our author might have given ſeveral other hints touching this article; Moreri has forgot to mark the place where this Carthuſian died; it was the Charterhouſe of Ruremonde in Guelderland (1). He was in the wrong to ſay that they ſirnamed him Extatic, on account of his attachment to contemplation, he ſhould have added, that it was chiefly becauſe it was thought he had divine inſpirations during his extaſies (2). There are ſeveral ſingularities in his life which would much adorn his article in the new editions of Moreri. The moſt common opinion is that he died at the age of ſixty-nine years: nevertheleſs, Valerius Andreas, pag. 190, of his Bibliotheca Belgica, ſays, that Denys the Carthuſian affirms, that he compoſed his book of Meditations (which was his laſt production) at the age of ſeventy-nine years (3). MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) In the edition of 1725 it is obſerved, that he entered into the Carthuſian monaſtery at Ruremonde in 1423, and lived there forty-eight years. NEW OBSERVAT.

(2) We ſtill find in the laſt edition that his continual attachment to contemplation got him the name of Extatic Doctor. NEW OBSERVAT.

(3) In the laſt edition it is ſaid that he died on the twelfth of March 1471, aged ſixty-nine years. They do not quote Valerius Andreas at the end of that article. NEW OBSERVAT.

DEODATUS (in Moreri) DIEU-DONNE'.

It is ſurpriſing that this article has not been corrected in any edition of Moreri's Dictionary; here they commit a capital error, for they confound two Popes into one. Certain it is that there have been two Popes of the name Deodatus, or Deus-dedit; the firſt ſucceeded Boniface IV, in the beginning of the VIIth century, that is to ſay, in the year 614: but beſides the Deodatus of whom Moreri ſpeaks, there was another, who ſucceeded Vitalianus about the year 669, the year in which the latter died. Moreri has taken this error from Platina and Onuphrius, who confound theſe two Popes. But what ſurprizes me is, that we find the two Deodatus's in the chronological table of the Popes, at the article of Rome. This ſhews the little exactneſs and attention of the editors; beſides the ſecond à Deo datus reigned ſeven years, two months, and ſeventeen days; therefore the time of his adminiſtration is long enough to deſerve to be mentioned (1). His pontificate was even remarkable for ſome things, which might have ſerved as an epoch to the hiſtorians. It was this Pope who allowed the Venetians to chooſe a chief for themſelves, and to create a Duke.

---

(1) In the edition of 1725, theſe two Popes are very well diſtinguiſhed: but the article of the ſecond is brought in at the word ADEODAT. The chronology of our author is not followed there, for it is affirmed that Adeodatus ſucceeded Vitalianus in the year 671, and that he died on the eighteenth of May 676, after having held the ſee five years, two months, and ſeventeen days. NEW OBSERVAT.

DIEPPE.

Dieppe is twelve leagues from Roüen, even according to the moſt exact calculation; conſequently it is at leaſt a fault in point of exactneſs, to ſay that theſe two cities are only ten leagues diſtant from one another. I will confeſs, if you pleaſe, that the fault is of no great conſequence, but it may nevertheleſs appear worthy of a Geographer's attention; and in an Univerſal Dictionary care ſhould be taken to ſatisfy every body (1).

---

(1) In the laſt edition it is ſaid that Dieppe is twelve leagues from Roüen. New Observat.

E.

EGHMONT (a).

It is not an exact way of ſpeaking, to ſay that the only perſon who remains of the illuſtrious (b) family of Eghmont is the Count d'Eghmont, who married Madam de Coſnac; however this is what our editor ſays, as if he had viſited all the provinces of Flanders, on purpoſe to ſee whether that great family was reduced to the ſingle perſon of the Count d'Eghmont now in France (c).

(a) Our author ſhould have warned the editors to correct this Orthography: it ſhould be writ Egmont: and if cuſtom did not authorize Egmont, it would be ſtill better to write Egmond: the Latin authors ſay Egmonda, Egmondanus &c. Strada ſhould not have made uſe of the word Egmontius (1). Mr Bayle's Remark.

(b) Moreri ſays that it is the principal family in Holland. He ſhould have ſaid one of the principal, &c. (2). Mr Bayle's Remark.

(c) The editors ſhould have been told that Moreri is miſtaken, when he ſays that the Count d'Egmont who was beheaded at Bruſſels on the fifth of June 1568, left three ſons and eleven daughters; he ſhould have ſaid three ſons and eight daughters (3). He ſhould not have forgot the date of the erection of Egmont into a county, he ſhould have ſaid that it was done in favour of John d'Egmont by the Emperor Maximilian I, in the year 1488 (4). The Count who was beheaded at Bruſſels deſerved a longer article: they may enlarge it, if they pleaſe, in a new edition, and they will do well to conſult the laſt Hiſtory of the Duke of Alva (5). Mr Moreri has only followed the writers that were enemies to King Philip II. This was not diſcharging the duty of an Hiſtorian, he ſhould have conſulted the authors of both ſides, and perhaps it would appear from thence that the ſaid Count was not clear from the crime of high-treaſon. It is not unlikely that he artfully endeavoured to manage matters ſo that Philip II, ſhould not be King of the Low-Countries upon any other condition, than ſending ſuch orders there as were ſuitable to the advice given by the Nobility of the land. Thoſe who aſpired at this kind of ſovereignty, connived at the mutinies of the populace and the pillaging of the churches. Count d'Egmont was accuſed of this perhaps with a good deal of reaſon. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(1) In the laſt edition at the word Eghmont, family, they refer us to Egmond, where, in effect, we find the article of that family. This laſt article is preceded by that of Egmont, village, ſo ſpelt, though in the following article they write Egmond. New Observat.

(2) In the edition of 1712, and thoſe that follow, it is ſaid that the village of Egmond has given its name to one of the principal families in Holland, &c. New Observat.

(3) In ſome editions they ſay, that Count had three ſons and ten daughters. New Observat.

(4) Nothing has been added upon this head in the edition of 1725. New Observat,

(5) They have not enlarged this article in the laſt edition. New Observat.

ENCYCLOPEDIA.

This word puts me in mind that they have forgot to mention the book which Andrew-Matthew Aquaviva, Duke of Atri in the kingdom of Naples, compoſed under that title (1). The family Aquaviva has produced learned men.

---

(1) In the laſt edition at the word Aquaviva, and in the article of Andrew-Matthew d'Aquaviva III of the name (it is thus that our author ſhould have named him) they take notice that this Duke, after he he had been preſent at two battles that were loſt &c; having a particular inclination for learned men and letters, conſecrated the remainder of his life to ſtudy, and even became an author. But they make no mention of his Encyclopedia. New Observat.

ESPERNAY.

The author of the new edition does not do juſtice to the antient city of Eſpernay, when he makes it to be no more than a borough. One had reaſon to expect that he would have corrected the firſt editions in this article. Thoſe who are deſirous to be informed of the antiquity of that town, which is in Champaign, need only conſult a letter directed to Father de Villers, and inſerted in the Memoires de Trevoux for the month of May of this preſent year: but the writer of that letter wrongs the author of the new edition of the Dictionary, when he reproaches him with having ſaid, that Eſpernay

Eſpernay is only a village; the editor is nearer the truth, ſince he gives that place the title of borough (1).

(1) In the edition of 1725, they have put, ESPERNAY, a city of France in Champain, &c. and they quote the Memoires de Trevoux, 1725. NEW OBSERVAT.

ESPINAY DU RETAL.

This Genealogical article is not exact; it is ſaid therein that Richard d'Eſpinay was High-ſteward and Great-Chamberlain of Bretagne; which is a miſtake, ſince it was Robert, father to Richard, that was poſſeſſed of theſe dignities (1). They commit another fault in the ſame article, when they affirm that Guy II d'Eſpinay married Jane d'Eſtouteville: it was not Guy II, who married that lady, it was Henry d'Eſpinay (2). In fine, they do not tell us that Claudius d'Eſpinay, who was ſon to Margaret d'Eſpreaux, and who married Jane de la Rochefoucauld, left beſides Frances, Charles d'Eſpinay, who married Margaret de Rohan, by whom he had no children, and conſequently his eſtate returned to his ſiſter (3). It will concern thoſe who ſhall have the care of the next edition of Moreri, to improve this article, purſuant to theſe Remarks.

(1) In the ſame edition we find that ROBERT d'Eſpinay, the firſt of the name, was High-ſteward of Bretagne, and firſt Chamberlain to Duke John VI; that ROBERT, the ſecond of the name, grandſon (and not ſon) to Robert I, was High-ſteward of Bretagne; and that RICHARD, ſon to Robert II, was Chamberlain to Duke Francis II. NEW OBSERVAT.

(2) We likewiſe find there that GUY II married Frances de Villefranche; and that HENRY married Catharine d'Eſtouteville. NEW OBSERVAT.

(3) This is corrected in the laſt edition: but whereas our author ſays Margaret d'Eſpreaux, they have put Margaret de Scepaux; they have written Dureſtal, inſtead of Du Retal; and in the room of Jane de la Rochefoucault, there is Frances de la Rochefoucault. They obſerve there that CHARLES dying without iſſue, his eſtate went to Charles de Schomberg, his ſiſter's ſon. NEW OBSERVAT.

ESTE.

The editor has varied ſpeaking of Mary Eleanor d'Eſte, now Queen of England: in ſome places ſhe is omitted, and in others not put in her right place. This Princeſs is daughter to Alphonſo IV, Duke of Modena and Reggio, and to Laura Martinozzy, the late Cardinal Mazarin's niece; the late Duke of Modena, Francis II, was her brother, and the preſent Duke of Modena, formerly Cardinal d'Eſte, is her uncle. This Prince, who ſucceeded his nephew, who died without iſſue, is brother to the late Duke Alphonſo IV. Such are the amendments to be made in this article in the ſubſequent editions (1).

(1) This article is corrected in the laſt edition. NEW OBSERVAT.

F.

FELIBIEN.

IN the article of Meſſieurs Felibien, they have forgot the Abbot Felibien, Archdeacon of Chartres, and, if I am not miſtaken, brother to him who has given us that fine hiſtory of Painters. The Abbot Felibien is ſufficiently known in the learned world to deſerve being mentioned upon this occaſion. The Pentateuchus Hiſtoricus, &c. which he publiſhed ſome months ago, ſhould, methinks, have ſecured him a place in a Dictionary where his family holds a conſiderable one already (1).

(1) In the edition of 1725, we find the article of JAMES FELIBIEN, who is the man in queſtion here, brother to Andrew Felibien des Avaux. NEW OBSERVAT.

FRANCIS II.

In the article of this Prince, they place his birth in the year 1543 (on the twentieth of January); they meant (a), without doubt, 1544. The miſtake is of no more than one year; but one year is conſiderable when we talk of a Prince that lived only ſixteen years, and ſome odd months. This Prince died on the fifth of December 1560. Now from the twentieth of January 1543, to the fifth of December 1560, they would certainly find it to be more than ſeventeen years (1).

(a) This error proceeded from their making the year to begin only at Eaſter, and conſequently the month of January 1543, according to our way of reckoning, belongs to the year 1544. The editors of Moreri ſhould be very exact, either in giving notice of the difference which ariſes from the time of beginning the year, or in reducing the dates to the preſent calculation. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) In the edition of 1707, it is ſaid that FRANCIS II was born on the twentieth of January 1543, according to the old way of reckoning. In that of 1712, the date of the day is corrected, and they put the nineteenth of January. But theſe words, according to the old way of reckoning, are left out in the laſt edition, and it is expreſly ſaid that this Prince was born on the nineteenth of January 1544. NEW OBSERV.

FURAN.

Is a ſmall river of Bugey, which goes winding at a league's diſtance from Belley, and falls into the Rhône near Pierre-chatel. The editor calls it improperly le Foran (1).

(1) As Moreri gives no particular article of this river under the name of Foran, or Furan; our Critic ſhould have pointed out the place where this fault is to be found. In the article Bugey, of the laſt edition, it is called le Furan. New Observat.

G.

GENOA.

IN ſpeaking of this city and of James Bracelli, who was of Sarzana, in the Republic of Genoa, Moreri and his Continuators make uſe of an unpardonable exaggeration. James Bracelli, ſay they, left alſo a book concerning the illuſtrious men of Genoa, which he inſcribed to Lewis of Piſa a Jacobin, &c. Do theſe words ſuit a ſmall piece of three or four pages, which is tacked to another of the ſame ſize, intituled, A Deſcription of the coaſt of Genoa, that is to ſay, of the country which extends from the Var to the Macra (1)? What Foglieta, Juſtiniani, Leander Alberti, Faſcio, and de Voragine, have written upon the ſame ſubject, is more particular. Philip Beroaldus compares Bracelli's ſtile to that of Cæſar.

(1) In the edition of 1725 the following alteration is made here: James Bracelli alſo left a ſhort deſcription of the coaſt of Genoa; to which is added a ſmall treatiſe on the illuſtrious men of Genoa, inſcribed to Lewis of Piſa, a Dominican. Theſe two pieces of Bracelli are inſerted in the firſt volume of the Theſaurus Antiquitatum Italiæ. New Observat.

GASPARD BARTHIUS.

The famous Gaſpard Barthius was aged only ſeventy-one years and three months wanting five days when he died; the editor does nevertheleſs ſuppoſe him to have lived ſomewhat above ſeventy-two years; which I thus prove to be a miſtake. Barthius was born on the twenty-ſecond of June 1587, and died on the ſeventeenth of September 1658: we need only reckon the difference between theſe two years (1). This author, ſo famous among the learned, was very ill treated by Voſſius, and he treated Scioppius very ill in his turn, being one of his ſevereſt adverſaries. Barthius was a copious writer; and if we may juſtly blame any thing in the books which he publiſhed, it is the eaſineſs with which he compoſed them.

(1) In the laſt edition they have put that Barthius died on the ſeventeenth of September 1658; which is taken from Mr Bayle, whom they quote. For the reſt, our author ſhould have ſpoken of Barthius under the letter B, and not under the letter G: but this prepoſterous order is pretty common with him. New Observat.

J.

JAMES II.

IN all the articles where mention is made of the late King of England, James II, they place his death in the year 1702. It is amazing that at three or four years diſtance from a matter of fact people ſhould be already miſtaken in a year. What would the caſe be then, if that Prince had died thirty or forty years ago? It is an inexcuſable fault, ſince to avoid it, the editor needed only to have taken up the firſt almanack that came in his way, he would have learned there that the ſaid Prince died in the year 1701, and he would have fixed his Chronology by that (1).

(1) They have corrected this fault in the laſt editions. New Observat.

S. JUSTIN.

In the article of this Father, the editor ſhould not have forgot to ſay, that he was one of Ariſtotle's greateſt adverſaries. If he had conſulted the ſeventh book of Euſebius, and St Jerom's catalogue of Eccleſiaſtical Authors, he might have ſeen with what warmth (a) this Father of the Church inveighed againſt the Prince of Philoſophers. He publiſhed a treatiſe, in which he confuted ſeveral tenets of Ariſtotle's Philoſophy, and wherein he ſhewed the dangerous conſequences that might be drawn from them (1). If we ſearch into paſt ages, we ſhall find few which have not produced adverſaries to the Peripatetic Philoſophy; it is true, all thoſe who have attacked it have not been alike ſucceſsful in decrying it; and it ſeems that it was reſerved for (b) Mr Des Cartes to give it the deepeſt wounds.

(a) All this wants to be corrected; for, 1. He ſhould have told us what work of Euſebius he means, when he ſays the ſeventh book is to be conſulted, whether it be his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, or his Evangelical Preparation, or his Evangelical Demonſtration. 2. In the catalogue which Euſebius has left us of St Juſtin's works in the eighteenth chapter of the fourth book of his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, we find no mention made of any treatiſe againſt Ariſtotle. 3. St Jerom's catalogue of Eccleſiaſtical Authors makes no mention of ſuch a treatiſe written by St Juſtin. The treatiſe againſt Ariſtotle, which appears among St Juſtin's works, is accounted ſuppoſititious. See the Bibliotheque of Mr du Pin in the article of that Father of the Church. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) In the edition of 1712, and thoſe that follow, we find only that Photius mentions ſome treatiſes of Juſtin, againſt Marcion and againſt Ariſtotle. NEW OBSERVAT.

(b) Mr Des Cartes did not make any particular refutation of the Peripatetic ſyſtem: the miſchief he has done it proceeds from his having laid down other principles, which have given people a diſtaſte for the ſchool Philoſophy. It was Gaſſendus, who, by attacks in form, ſhewed the falſity of the Peripatetic doctrines. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

L.

LE FERON.

IN this article it is ſaid that the late Ducheſs of Chaulnes had neither brother nor ſiſters, in a word, that ſhe was an only daughter. The Marquis de la Frete, who is now living, would not readily agree to this aſſertion (1).

---

(1) In the laſt edition, at the word Feron, it is ſaid that Elizabeth le Feron, who married the Duke of Chaulnes, for her ſecond huſband, was the only daughter of Dreux le Feron. They add, that her mother, Barbara Servien, was married in ſecond wedlock to Peter de Gruel, Lord of la Frete . . . and left children by him. NEW OBSERVAT.

LE JAY.

This article is faulty, for they have ill ſpelt the name of Catherine de la Boutiere, who lately died, and who was married to the late Nicholas le Jay, Baron de Tilly, & de la Maiſon rouge, and Counſellor in the parliament of Paris, who died in 1700: they write it N . . . . de la Boutire (1). Beſides, in the ſame article they place the death of the late Mr le Jay, Biſhop of Cahors, in the year 1679; as to this laſt point there is only a miſtake of about twelve years, ſince the late Mr le Jay, who ſucceeded Mr de Noailles, at preſent Cardinal and Archbiſhop of Paris, in the biſhopric of Cahors, has been dead not above that ſpace of time (2).

---

(1) In the edition of 1725, we find at length, Catherine de la Boutiere. NEW OBSERVAT.

(2) In the ſame edition it is obſerved, that Henry-William le Jay, named Biſhop of Cahors in the year 1679, died in 1693: and in the article of the Cardinal de Noailles it is ſaid, that he was, in the year 1679, made Biſhop of Cahors, and transferred to Chalons-ſur-Marne in 1680. NEW OBSERVAT.

LODI.

In the article of Lodi, a town in Italy, no notice is taken of the Hiſtory which Otho Morena wrote upon that ſubject, and which his ſon Acerbus Morena continued (1). This work is, properly ſpeaking, the hiſtory of what Frederic Barbaroſſa did in Lombardy, from the year 1154 to the year 1168, chiefly with reſpect to the town of Lodi. The two Morena's died before that Prince, conſequently they could not bring their hiſtory further down. They were both in the intereſt of Frederic; from whence we we may juſtly conclude that their writings were not quite impartial. It was this no doubt that obliged Baronius to uſe them ill in his Eccleſiaſtical Annals: he ſpeaks of them in very diſobliging terms; but that Cardinal was ſtill more partial to the Pope, than the Morena's were to the Emperor, notwithſtanding that they writ, if we may ſay ſo, under his very eyes. What may be ſaid in favour of theſe two authors, is that they writ nothing but what they had ſeen. Their Latin ſtile is ſuch as prevailed in the XIIth century, that is to ſay, very bad. Felix Oſio, Profeſſor of Rhetoric at Padua, has made upon that Hiſtory long notes which deſerve to be read.

---

(1) In the laſt edition no mention is made of the Hiſtory of Morena; but only of that of Defendente Lodi. It is intituled, Diſcorſi Iſtorici intorno la Citta di Lodi, and was printed in the year 1629, at Lodi in 4to. NEW OBSERVAT.

(2) In

The editor gives us an article of Morena, but he ſays in a very confuſed manner, that Otho Morena compoſed the Hiſtory of Frederic Barbaroſſa, and that his ſon finiſhed it; which is abſolutely falſe, ſince that Emperor out-lived them: beſides that book is rather the Hiſtory of the wars of Lodi, than that of the ſaid Emperor. By the Hiſtory of a man is commonly meant, a particular account of his actions, from the beginning of his life to his death. Now the Morena's could not poſſibly have writ a particular account of Frederic Barbaroſſa's actions, ſince both of them died before that Emperor (2).

(2) In the laſt edition, at the article MORENA, it is ſaid that OTHO MORENA begun the Hiſtory of what the Emperor Frederic Barbaroſſa did in Lombardy, from the year 1154 to the year 1168, chiefly with reſpect to the town of Lodi; and that his ſon ACERUS MORENA, finiſhed what his father had not been able to do. That Hiſtory is inſerted in the third volume of the Theſaurus Antiquitatum Italiæ. NEW OBSERVAT.

LE MERCIER.

The editor ſpeaking of John le Mercier, Royal Profeſſor of the Hebrew tongue at Paris, does not expreſs himſelf ſo exactly as he ought to do, when he ſays that this learned man tranſlated from Greek into Latin Harmenopulus. From theſe words, any body would be apt to believe that le Mercier has tranſlated all the works of that Greek author; it is nevertheleſs certain that he has only tranſlated his Prochiron, or promptuarium juris civilis. Thoſe who only know Harmenopulus's works by the idea which Moreri, or his Continuators, give of them, will not heſitate a moment in believing, by what they ſay, that le Mercier had tranſlated them all, becauſe they have been all collected in one body (1).

(1) Our author has taken this remark from Mr Bayle's Réponſe aux Queſtions d'un Provincial, Tom. I. Cap. LIII, pag. 482, & ſeq. In the edition of 1725 we find that John le Mercier, when he ſtudied the Law at Avignon, tranſlated from Greek into Latin, the Prochirum or promptuarium juris civilis of Harmenopulus. NEW OBSERVAT.

LEYME.

This word was right in the firſt editions, and they have made it wrong in the preſent by putting Leyne, inſtead of Leyme: it is an abbey of nuns in the dioceſe of Cahors, of which mention is made in the article Noailles, upon the ſubject of Frances de Noailles, great aunt to the Marſhal and to the Cardinal de Noailles, who was abbeſs there, and died not long ago (1).

(1) In the laſt edition at the word NOAILLES, and the article of HENRY Lord of Noailles, Count of Ayen &c. they have put Leime. NEW OBSERVAT.

LORRAINE.

In the article of Lorraine the editor has committed a very groſs fault: he ſays that Catherine de Bourbon, ſiſter to Henry IV, and wife to Henry Duke of Bar, was mother to the Princeſſes Nichola and Claudia de Lorraine; the firſt of whom was married to Charles, afterwards Duke of Lorraine, and the ſecond to Francis de Vaudemont, grand-father to the preſent Duke of Lorraine. Theſe two Princes, who were brothers, were firſt couſins to thoſe two Princeſſes who were daughters to Henry Duke of Bar, and afterwards of Lorraine, by his ſecond wife; for Catherine de Bourbon his firſt wife, lived only ſix months with him, being of different religions they fell out and parted; Catherine died in the year 1604 (1).

In this ſame article the editor is miſtaken in the liſt of the Dukes of Lorraine. Gerard, who died in the year 1048, was never Marchis of Lorraine, as it is ſaid in the new edition; it was his ſecond ſon Gerard who was ſo by his marriage with Hedwige, heireſs of the county of Namur, which her mother Hermengarde had left her (2).

(1) This is corrected in the edition of 1725, pag. 209, col. 1. NEW OBSERVAT.

(2) In the ſame edition pag. 207. col. 2. Gerard, who died in 1048, is called Count and Marchis of Alſatia; and Gerard, his ſon, Duke and Marchis of Lorraine. NEW OBSERVAT.

LUCIAN.

It plainly appears that the editor had a mind to correct what Moreri ſays concerning the Metamorphoſis, or golden Aſs of Apuleius, nevertheleſs what he himſelf ſays on this occaſion is not ſo exact as it ought to be; for to ſay that the golden Aſs is a paraphraſe on the ſame ſubject which Lucian had taken from Lucius of Patras, author of a book of Metamorphoſes, or transformations, which Photius mentions, is not an exact expreſſion; he ought to have ſaid that Lucius of Patras had been abridged by Lucian, and paraphraſed by Apuleius: and thus that article ſhould have been corrected (1). In the ſame manner, when they ſpeak of Apuleius of Madaura (2), ſhould they have forgot in reckoning up his works, the Letters to Corellia, which, to ſay the truth, are (a) written in a very free ſtyle, and his other treatiſes de Republica, de Numeris, de Muſica, and his Ludicra, of which he ſpeaks himſelf in his apology (3)? It is (b) a pretty ingenious Poem (4).

---

(1) Our author has taken this remark from Mr Bayle's article of Apuleius, remark (M). They have made no alteration here in the laſt edition of Moreri, except that inſtead of Lucius of Patras they have put Lucius Patras; but Lucius of Patras was right. New Observat.

(2) By the manner of our author's expreſſing himſelf one might believe that Apuleius of Madaura is different from the Apuleius he was ſpeaking of: he is however the ſame. New Observat.

(a) He ſhould have ſaid were, for it is a long time ſince theſe letters have been loſt. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(3) Nothing has been added upon this in the laſt edition. New Observat.

(b) It is very probable that the Ludicra of Apuleius was a collection of divers pieces ſome of which were in verſe, and others in proſe. He ſays that a letter contained in that collection had been objected to him; which letter was writen in verſe, and treated of the care to be taken in keeping one's teeth clean, de dentifricio. This does not prove that the Ludrica was a Poem. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(4) Our Critic having found in Mr Bayle the following words of Apuleius: legerunt è Ludicris meis epiſtolium de dentifricio, verſibus ſcriptum, imagined that the Ludicra of Apuleius was a Poem; and though this work be not now extant, he ſpeaks of it as if he had read it, and aſſures us that it is a pretty ingenious Poem. New Observat.

LUCIUS BRUTUS.

Moreri has followed the authority of Dionyſius Halicarnaſſenſis preferably to that of Livy, in ſpeaking of this generous Roman. Dionyſius Halicarneſſenſis makes him ſon to a daughter of Tarquinius Priſcus King of Rome, who was ſiſter (a) to Tarquin, whereas Livy makes him the ſon of Tarquinia ſiſter to the laſt Tarquin. Mr Bayle demonſtrates with an irreſiſtible evidence, that the ſentiment of Dionyſius Halicarnaſſenſis, upon this occaſion is not to be defended, and that we muſt neceſſarily follow the opinion of Livy. I refer the reader to him (1).

(a) This is very obſcure, for to which Tarquin muſt we ſuppoſe that the daughter of Tarquinius Priſcus was ſiſter? Was it to the laſt Tarquin? But in that caſe the opinion of Dionyſius Halicarnaſſenſis, which our author rejects, would not be different from that of Livy, which he would have us follow; and we ſhould ſay that Tarquinius Priſcus was father to the laſt Tarquin, which is entirely wrong, as Dionyſius Halicarnaſſenſis has plainly proved. The Tarquin who is ſaid here to have been the brother of Brutus's mother, whom they make daughter to Tarquinius Priſcus, would neceſſarily be the ſon of Tarquinius Priſcus, but Hiſtory ſays nothing of ſuch a ſon except that he died before his father, and left two ſons behind him. See Dionyſius Halicarnaſſenſis at the beginning of the fourth book. Mr Bayle's Rem.

(1) In the edition of 1712, and thoſe that follow, it is ſaid Lucius Junius Brutus was ſon to a ſiſter of Tarquin King of Rome, and nephew to Tarquinius Superbus. New Observat.

LYCURGUS.

They have made ſome alteration in this article, I confeſs, and it is not ſo faulty as it was in the ſupplement of the Dictionary, but after all it is not yet exact: for they ſeem to me not to diſtinguiſh the two Lycurgus's, one an Athenian Orator, ſon to Lycophron, and grand-ſon to another Lycurgus whom the thirty tyrants put to death; the other the Lacedemonian Legiſlator. Theſe two perſons were entirely different, and it was a groſs fault to confound them, as the author of the Supplement (a) did; but in ſhort as we find only one Lycurgus mentioned in the new edition (b), it ſtill ſhews a diſpoſition in the editor to confound them (1).

The author of the Supplement had committed a great many blunders in this article; one of the chief of them was, that by miſtaking Plutarch's words, he makes him ſay that Lycurgus drove out all idle and vagabond perſons, whereas the Greek word rendered by that of maleficus only implies that he drove out all bad people. He afterwards makes him conqueror in the games that were celebrated in the preſence of the people, though Plutarch, does not ſay a ſingle word of it. He committed ſeveral other groſs faults which convince me that this author was no great Grecian. Mr Faydit, when he ſpeaks of Lycurgus in his new book *, doubts (c) whether there had been two Lycurgus's, and he ſeems to confound the King of Thrace with that of

* Remarques ſur Virgile, &c.

(a) This cenſure is wrong, Moreri had given us the article of Lycurgus the Lacedemonian Legiſlator. Since therefore the author of the Supplement gave us the article of ſome other Lycurgus's, and particularly that of Lycurgus an Athenian Orator (by which epithet he diſtinguiſhed him from the very firſt line) he did not confound the Lacedemonian Legiſlator with the Orator of Athens. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(b) As I have not this new edition, I content myſelf with ſaying that there are ſeveral Lycurgus's in the Paris edition of 1699, and that the Lacedemonian Legiſlator is there plainly diſtinguiſhed from the Athenian Orator. He has been placed among the other Lycurgus's. But in the Amſterdam edition of 1698 there are above fifty pages between theſe and Lycurgus the Legiſlator. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(1) The edition of 1707 diſtinguiſhes all the Lycurgus's very well; and there is reaſon to believe that the edition of 1704 does the ſame. New Observ.

(c) I have looked in this book of Mr Faydit for the neceſſary page, and without being at all aſſiſted by the index I found that it is page 540. I did not find there the fault which is taken notice of here, that is to ſay, the doubt whether there had been two Lycurgus's. Mr Faydit does not condemn the authors who diſtinguiſh the Lycurgus King of Thrace, from the other of Lacedemon, he only ſays that they all agree that theſe two Lycurgus's lived more than three hundred years after the deſtruction of Troy; it is upon this that he refers us to Moreri, and afterwards he concludes ‘ that ‘ it was abſurd in Virgil to make Æneas ſay, when ‘ ſpeaking to Dido, that he had paſſed through the ‘ kingdom of the Thracians, where the ſevere Lycurgus ‘ had formerly reigned in old times. Thraces arant, ‘ acri of Lacedemon. In ſhort after ſhewing that he was very uncertain on this head, he refers his reader to Moreri. This authority ſhould not be of any great weight for ſuch an high-ſpirited author as Mr Faydit appears to be in his works.

‘ acri quondam regnata Lycurgo.’ But, 1. We do not find in Moreri that Lycurgus, King of Thrace, lived after the war of Troy. We find nothing preciſely determined there as to the time of that King. We only find enough to make us conclude that he lived in the fabulous times. 2. It is certain that the Antients who have mentioned that Prince make him live before the war of Troy. Homer, in the ſixth book of the Iliad, introduces Diomedes (one of the Grecian Captains at the ſiege of Troy) relating, as an old ſtory, the puniſhment of that Lycurgus for having driven out Bacchus. Apollodorus, in the third book of his Bibliotheca, pag. m. 175, deſcribes the adventures of Bacchus, with reſpect to Lycurgus, King of Thrace, in ſuch a manner, that, by a plain conſequence, this Lycurgus muſt have lived ſeveral generations before the war of Troy. This juſtifies Virgil, and demands a reparation of the injury done him. I ſhould be very curious to know the name of the authors who have owned that Lycurgus, King of Thrace, lived more than three hundred years after the deſtruction of Troy. I do not know one that ſays ſo. As for the reſt, the article of that King of Thrace is ſtill very faulty in Moreri. There are ſeveral things wanting that ought to be there, and they have only quoted Plutarch and Propertius, who hardly ſay any thing of what is there related. MR BAYLE's REMARK.

M.

MARTIN AKAKIA.

MORERI and his Continuators have committed a great error concerning the native country of this Phyſician; they have tranſlated the word Catalaunenſis by Catalan or of Catalonia, inſtead of Chalonois or of Chalons. If they had carefully read Quenſtet, in his book de patriis viror. to which they refer us, they would not have been guilty of ſuch a blunder (1). I hope theſe remarks will prevent all miſtakes in the following editions, concerning the native country of the chief of a family that is very conſiderable in the faculty of Phyſicians at Paris.

(1) This remark is taken from Mr Bayle. In the edition of 1725, we find that Akakia was born at Chalons on the Marne. NEW OBSERVAT.

MATTHEW BOSSULUS.

He is different from another John Boſſulus likewiſe a Frenchman, who lived above a century before him, but who, as well as he, has been very much forgotten in his own country. Mr Bayle had complained much that Matthew was ſo little known in the Republic of Letters, notwithſtanding he had acted ſuch a conſiderable part in the world. He was preceptor to Don Carlos ſon to Philip II, King of Spain: he had before that taught Rhetoric in the Univerſity of Valencia. Theſe marks of honour have not however been able to reſcue him from oblivion; and notwithſtanding the tender anxiety of Mr Bayle he ſtill continues in oblivion. Who could have believed that Mr Vaultier, who is ſo much concerned for the glory of his country, would have neglected to inform poſterity, that France had given to the court of Spain a man of that conſequence? It has been thought that the cauſe of this oblivion was his not having writ any books. If immortality can only be had at the price of being an author, it muſt be confeſſed that it would often be a greater advantage to remain buried in the duſt with the generality of mankind, and to be of the number of thoſe whoſe name does not go beyond the firſt generation (1).

(1) In the laſt edition of Moreri we find a good article of Boſſulus; they have made great uſe there of Mr Bayle's Dictionary, of which our author is no more than the tranſcriber in this place. NEW OBSERVAT.

MAZZOLIN.

The editor has adopted the error which prevailed in all the other editions concerning Sylveſter Mazzolin, called Prierio or Prierias. That General of the Dominicans (a) did not die at Rennes in Bretagne on the twentieth of October 1520. Since he dedicated his book de Strigi-Magarum Dæmonumque mirandis, to Cardinal Auguſtin Trivulſo, on the firſt of March 1521. I do not wonder that the editors have copied that error one from another, ſince not one of them mentions this book, which would have ſerved to rectify their Chronology. I believe they have taken Francis Sylveſter, who

---

(a) There is reaſon to believe that Sylveſter Prierias never was General of the Dominicans. MR BAYLE's REM.

who was likewiſe General of the Dominicans for this Mazzolin. Francis, it is true, died in the courſe of his viſitation at Rennes in Bretagne; but if we ſhould even allow theſe two Generals, who are very different, to be no more than one and the ſame perſon, the error would not be the leſs groſs upon that account, ſince Francis Sylveſter died, not in the year 1520, but in 1528: ſo that granting the editor's ſuppoſition to be true, there would ſtill be an anachroniſm of eight years (1).

(1) All this is taken from Mr Bayle, Réponſe aux Queſtions d'un Provincial. Tom. I. Chap. LXVI, pag. 618, & ſeq. In Moreri's edition of 1725, they have given us the article of Sylveſter de Priero, at the word MOZOLINO, upon what Father Quetif and Father Echard ſay of him in their Bibliotheque of the Dominican writers. Mozolino died at Rome in the year 1523, being then Maſter of the ſacred palace. He never was General of the Dominicans. We find in Father Quetif and Father Echard the article of Francis Sylveſter, General of the Dominicans, who died at Rennes on the nineteenth of September 1528, aged fifty-four years. This article is not in the laſt edition of Moreri, where they will do well to correct the following reference: ' SYLVESTER called de Pri-' erio, General of the Dominicans, ſee MOZOLIN:' Theſe words, General of the Dominicans, ſhould be ſtruck out. There is likewiſe another fault to be corrected in the article Mozolino: the Printers have put Edward Brow, inſtead of Edward Brown. NEW OBSERVAT.

MEDICIS.

In reckoning up the authors who have wrote the life, or who have made mention, of the famous Marquis of Marignano, John-James de Medicis, brother to Pope Pius IV, it is ſurpriſing that the editor ſhould not ſpeak of the Hiſtoria Ciſalpina of Erycius Puteanus, or rather of the Hiſtory of the actions of John-James de Medicis on the borders of the lake of Como. Erycius Puteanus is ſo well known in the learned world, that one has reaſon to be ſurprized at Moreri and his Continuators for not naming him among the Hiſtorians of the Marquis of Marignano. The Hiſtory of John-James de Medicis, which he compoſed, ends with the unfortunate battle of Pavia, where Francis I. was taken priſoner by the Spaniards, and carried to Madrid. In a word, Erycius Puteanus was the chief author that ſhould have been conſulted in order to give us ſure and faithful memoirs concerning the life of the famous Marquis of Marignano, ſince he was beſt acquainted with it, and knew the moſt ſecret circumſtances of it (1).

Beſides, in the article of Erycius Puteanus, the editor, when he ſpeaks of his works, ſays nothing at all of that above-mentioned (2). Galeazzo Capella has compoſed a ſhort Hiſtory not exceeding five pages, which may ſerve by way of ſupplement to that of the Marquis of Marignano, written by Erycius Puteanus: and indeed they have been printed together: the latter is an account of the war of Muzzo, a ſmall town on the weſt ſide of the lake of Como. The Marquis of Marignano was, properly ſpeaking, the author of that little war; he got by it the town of Marignano, a large ſum of money, and the title of Marquis. This ſupplement has been forgotten as well as the work to which it is ſubjoined (3).

(1) In the laſt edition, at the word MEDICIS, MEDICI, or MEDIQUIN, (John-James) Marquis of Marignano, they quote, Erycius Puteanus, Hiſt. Ciſalpina. This Hiſtory is in the third volume of the Theſaurus Antiquitatum Italiæ. NEW OBSERVAT.

(2) In this edition at the article PUY (Henry du), or ERYCIUS PUTEANUS, they do not give the catalogue of this author's works: they only take notice in general, that he left a very great number of treatiſes concerning Hiſtory, Rhetoric, Mathematics, Philoſophy, and Philology, an account of which may be ſeen in Valerius Andreas's Bibliotheca Belgica. NEW OBSERV.

(3) They have not yet inſerted this particular in the article of the Marquis of Marignano; nor mentioned the book of Galeazzo Capella de Bello Muſſiano, which Grævius has inſerted in the third volume of his Theſaurus Antiquitatum Italiæ. NEW OBSERVAT.

MILLET.

That name has been ill ſpelt in this edition, where they have put Milet inſtead of Millet, and that fault is peculiar to this edition, ſince it is not in the others. It is very neceſſary to take notice of it, that it may be avoided in the following editions. When I ſay very neceſſary, it is with reſpect to one of the greateſt Mathematicians of the paſt age, who bore that name. I mean Claudius Francis Millet de Chales, a Jeſuit, who beſides, was of one of the moſt conſiderable families in Savoy; a family of which there have been Archbiſhops in the Tarentaiſe, firſt Preſidents to the Chamber of Accounts of Chambery, and ſeveral other dignified perſons (1).

(1) In the edition of 1725 we find, ' MILET DE ' CHALES (Claudius Francis), a Jeſuit, ſee CHALES:' and under the word Chales, there is CHALES (Claudius-Francis Millet de) a Jeſuit, &c. NEW OBSERV.

MILTON.

This article is not very correct. The editor would have given us a juſt idea of that author, if he had told us what were his true ſentiments concerning religion. Milton, who wrote ſo much in vindication of the wicked and ſucceſsful attempts which his countrymen made upon the life of the unfortunate King Charles I, their ſovereign, was a man of no religion; he indeed profeſſed ſeveral religions, but he did no more than flutter upon the ſurface of every one; for he was firſt of the church of England; afterwards finding the ſect of the Puritans, who are rigid Calviniſts, that ſprung up in England in the year 1565 more to his liking, he embraced it. The ſame fickleneſs which had made him quit the church of England, made him likewiſe deſert the ſect of the Puritans, in order to join the Anabaptiſts; people believed then that Milton was entirely fixed, but they were miſtaken; the declaration which he made at his death that he was attached to no religon, ſhewed, at laſt, what he was, that is, a downright Infidel (a).

Milton was a very bad Poet, and ſtill a worſe Orator: his poems are wretched; there is hardly any line in them where the laws of quantity are truly obſerved; one perceives in reading them, that it is a ſchool-boy's performance; conſequently he had no occaſion to tell us ſo, it appears plainly enough upon a ſlight peruſal. Some authors pretend that he did not write the apology for the people of England, and that he only lent his name to the work of a French ſchoolmaſter, who at that time taught children at London (1).

The

(a) Our author ſhould not have contented himſelf with informing the editor of Moreri that theſe things are wanting in the article of Milton: he ſhould likewiſe have pointed out to him the ſources where the proofs were to be had, for one of the moſt eſſential laws which the author of an Hiſtorical Dictionary ſhould obſerve, is not to advance any thing without citing authorities. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) Although our author had before him Mr Bayle's Dictionary, where there is a very good article of Milton, he has nevertheleſs aſcribed to Milton ſentiments which he was far from entertaining. Inſtead of relating them ſuch as they were in themſelves, he has judged of them according to his own prejudices, and has afterwards denominated them according to the judgment he made of them. This is not acting the part of an Hiſtorian, but that of a diſputant, or of a declaimer. He even adds, of his own head, ſome circumſtances that are abſolutely falſe. Let us come to the fact. Mr Bayle, ſpeaking of Milton's religion, ſays after his Hiſtorian, that the ſect which pleaſed him moſt in his youth was that of the Puritans; but, adds he, in his riper years he liked beſt the Independents and Anabaptiſts, becauſe they allowed more liberty to every private perſon, and in his opinion ſeemed to come neareſt to the primitive Chriſtians: but in the latter part of his life, he ſeparated himſelf from all communions, and did not frequent any Chriſtian aſſembly, nor in his houſe did he make uſe of the form of worſhip of any ſect. As for the reſt, he expreſſed the profoundeſt reverence to God, as well by his actions as by his converſation. Theſe particulars have changed their nature and ſhape in paſſing through our author's hands. Milton, ſays he, was a man of no religion; he indeed profeſſed ſeveral, but he did no more than flutter upon the ſurface of every one; he was firſt of the church of England; afterwards finding the ſect of the Puritans . . . more to his liking, he embraced it. The ſame fickleneſs which had made him quit the church of England, made him likewiſe deſert the ſect of the Puritans in order to join the Anabaptiſts; people believed then that Milton was entirely fixed, but they were miſtaken; the declaration which he made at his death, that he was attached to no religion, ſhewed at laſt what he was, that is to ſay, a downright Infidel. Nothing can be more falſe than the idea which this author gives of Milton, as being a man of no religion, and a downright Infidel. The works which he publiſhed evidently ſhew that this is a falſe and ſlanderous aſperſion. The declaration which he is ſaid to have made at his death, that he was attached to no religion, is another notorious falſhood. How could our author have the aſſurance to advance a thing which all England knows to be a lye.

He adds, that Milton was a very bad Poet, and ſtill a worſe Orator; that his poems are wretched, and that ſome authors pretend he did not write the apology for the people of England, and that he had only lent his name to the work of a French ſchoolmaſter. He found all this in Mr Bayle, who took it from Salmaſius's anſwer to Milton, but Mr Bayle has obſerved that they were idle ſtories with which ſome flatterers amuſed Salmaſius. All theſe are fables, ſays he, which I am glad to recite, that authors may learn to give no credit to calumnies wherewith people fill their heads againſt their antagoniſts. They think they make their court by this means to thoſe authors, and occaſion their publiſhing an hundred impertinencies. This remark has made no impreſſion upon our Critic, it has not hindred him from making a grave and ſerious narrative of all thoſe impertinencies. In the laſt editions of Moreri, they have corrected the article of Milton from the Dictionary of Mr Bayle: but it is not yet entirely free from faults. I ſhall obſerve ſome of them here. 1. They call Milton's firſt wife Mary Pouvel, it ſhould be Mary Powell. 2. They give the book aſcribed to Charles I, the title of Icon regia, they ſhould have ſaid Icon Baſilike. 3. Mr Bayle obſerves that Milton abſconded at the reſtoration of King Charles II, and did not appear in public till the amneſty was proclaimed. He obtained a pardon, adds Mr Bayle, and lay under no other penalty, but that of being excluded from all public offices. In Moreri, it is ſaid that he obtained from Charles II a pardon, without being ſubjected to any other penalty, than that of being excluded from public offices. But this was the Parliament's buſineſs, not the King's. It is true the author of Milton's Life ſays that in the act of Indemnity, the Parliament contented themſelves with excluding him from public offices. But Milton is not named in that act; and this was ſufficient to ſhelter him, without his having occaſion for a pardon: for in the act itſelf it was declared that all thoſe who were not by name excluded from the Indemnity, ſhould be looked upon as compriſed therein, and exempted from all penalties, in the ſame manner as if they were expreſsly named. John Goodwin, a famous Divine, who had publiſhed a book to juſtify the execution of Charles I; was excluded from public offices. 4. The new editors ſay, that Milton in his book of the true religion, &c, excludes none but Roman Catholics from ſalvation. They ſhould have ſaid, as Mr Bayle has done, that he excludes none but Roman Catholics from the benefit of a Toleration; and ſhould have added the reaſon which moved him to exclude them from it. Milton, ſays Mr Bayle, ſhews that Popery ought to be wholly deprived of the benefit of a Toleration, not as it is a religion, but as it is a tyrannical faction which oppreſſes all others. 5. The editors have ſpun out this article by the recital of what paſſed at Oxford, in the year 1683. The univerſity of Oxford, ſay they, being met in a body, on the 2d of July (they ſhould have ſaid the 21ſt of July) 1683, declared XXVII propoſitions, extracted out of Milton's works, to be heretical and ſcandalous, and contrary to the allegiance which ſubjects owe to their King, &c. But theſe XXVII propoſitions were not all extracted from Milton: ſeveral of them were taken from Knox, Buchanan, Baxter, and ſome other Engliſh and Scotch writers. They add, that the Engliſh very much changed their way of thinking afterwards; as well as Bayle himſelf, who had commended them at that time, [in his Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for the month of April 1684, Art. III. p. m. 141] They ſhould not have ſaid that Mr Bayle changed his way of thinking afterwards, without giving proofs of it. As for the Engliſh, it would be eaſy to ſhew that they have not changed their way of thinking. By the Engliſh, we are not to underſtand the Court, nor the univerſity of Oxford; but the Engliſh nation in general: and if we conſult the Hiſtory of thoſe times, we ſhall find that the Engliſh nation was entirely averſe to the arbitrary government, which the court was labouring to introduce; and that the ſpirit of liberty, which reigned in the two laſt Parliaments of King Charles II, was the occaſion of their being diſſolved. 6. In the new edition of Moreri, they may add, that on the 23d of March 1710, the Houſe of Lords cauſed the decree of the univerſiry of Oxford, which we have been ſpeaking of, to be burnt by the hand of the hang-man. NEW OBSERVAT.

(b) Theſe

The two moſt tolerable poems of Milton (b) are in blank verſe; the firſt is intituled, Paradiſe Loſt: the ſecond, Paradiſe Regained. The firſt is much better than the ſecond; which gave occaſion for ſome people to ſay, that Milton is readily found in Paradiſe Loſt, but not in Paradice Regained. Salmaſius was the great (c) antagoniſt of Milton, he diſcredited him much.

(b) Theſe two poems are in Engliſh, and they are accounted maſter-pieces. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(c) This expreſſion is too indeterminate: Salmaſius having written an Apology for King Charles I, was confuted by Milton. He wrote a Reply, which was not printed till long after his death. It is therefore certain that he publiſhed nothing at all againſt Milton. Can this be a ſufficient reaſon for ſaying that he was his great antagoniſt? MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

MONTROSE.

It is ſurpriſing, that in ſpeaking of this Marquis, they have forgot the name of his family: this is the firſt thing that ſhould be obſerved when a perſon of diſtinction is treated of; and when a circumſtance ſo eſſential to Hiſtory is omitted, it is to be feared that the whole body of the article ſuffers by the author's negligence. But it would not be enough to make the reader take notice of this omiſſion, if I did not ſupply it: I muſt therefore tell him, that the name of the Marquis of Montroſe was John Greme (1).

---

(1) This Marquis was not called John Greme. In the edition of 1712, they have put James Gremme; and in that of 1725, James Gremme, or Graham. James is right; but the other word was never ſpelt Greme nor Gremme. If our author had conſulted ſome Engliſh book, he would have ſeen that it ought to be written Graham. It is true that the pronunciation of Graham, comes near the French Gréam or Grême: but we are not allowed to change the Orthography of foreign names, and to expreſs their pronunciation according to the French Orthography. By this means they would be entirely diſguiſed. For example, if a Frenchman ſhould write Lak, or Lac; who could gueſs that he ſpeaks of Mr Locke, that celebrated Philoſopher? As for the reſt, in the edition of 1712, they had wrongly writ Mont-Roſe, and placed that article among the names which are ſo divided: in that of 1725 they have put Montroſe, which is right; but they have thereby miſplaced that article; ſince it comes in before thoſe of Montagnana, Montagne, &c.

I ſhall add, that ſpeaking of the Marquis of Montroſe, they ſhould have obſerved after Father d'Orleans, that this lord had at firſt gone with the torrent, and carried arms for the cauſe of liberty. They ſhould likewiſe have ſet down the reaſons which the Scotch alledged to juſtify their manner of putting him to death; &c. The laws of Hiſtory require that the pro and con ſhould be fairly ſtated. Laſtly, they might have conſulted authors who were more impartial, and better informed, than Du Verdier, and Abbé Raguenet, who are quoted at the end of this article. NEW OBSERV.

MORIGGIA.

In this article they confound the Jeſuits and Jeſuates, ſince they give the title of General of the Jeſuits to Paul Moriggia, who was only General of the Jeſuates: theſe are two very different orders. This error has eſcaped all the editors of Moreri; and it is ſo much the leſs excuſable, as it is not natural to ſuppoſe that one ſhould be ignorant to what order a writer of Father Paul Moriggia's reputation belonged; a writer, I ſay, who has enriched the Republic of Letters, with ſixty-one different Treatiſes (1).

---

(1) In the laſt edition, at the word MORIGIA (Paul), they have very well ſaid that he was General of the Jeſuates. NEW OBSERVAT.

N.

NITARD.

THE editor is miſtaken with reſpect to Cardinal John Everard Nitard, whom he ſtiles Confeſſor to the King of Spain, Charles II. Father Nitard the Jeſuit, was not Confeſſor to the King of Spain, but to the Queen his mother, Mary-Anne of Auſtria (1); and the thing is ſo much the leſs to be doubted of, as it was the blind confidence which that Princeſs repoſed in him, that brought upon him thoſe diſgraces of which the late Madame d'Aunoy has given us ſuch a particular and curious account in her Memoirs of the Court of Spain. It is true that this good Father was obliged to leave the kingdom of Spain ſomewhat abruptly, but to comfort him he was preſented with a Cardinal's cap, upon his arrival at Rome. They had no other rewards to give him; for it is well known that the Jeſuits do not accept (a) of Biſhoprics, and that conſequently there is no way of crowning their ſervices, but by the Roman purple.

---

(1) This is corrected in the laſt edition. NEW OBSERVAT.

(a) It will be proper to read upon this ſubject what Mr Daillé ſays of it in the twentieth chapter of the third part of his Reply to Father Adam and to Cottibi. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

P.

PATRICIUS.

MR Bayle had taken care to warn the editors of Moreri, that Francis Patricius the Venetian, who lived towards the end of the XVIth century, never was a Profeſſor of Padua. If they had conſulted Thuanus's Hiſtory, they would not have copied this fault from the old editions. Patricius, after having been ſeventeen years a Profeſſor at Ferrara, retired to Rome, whither he was brought by the liberalities of Clement VIII, and from that time he never left it (1). This Antiperipatetic propoſed ſuch ſingular tenets (2) concerning the five Categories of Porphyry, that the greateſt part of the Philoſophers of his time fell upon him.

---

(1) In the edition of 1707, and the following, they have put, that he taught Philoſophy at Ferrara, and at Rome, &c. NEW OBSERVAT.

(2) To know the error that is contained in theſe words, you muſt conſult Mr Bayle's Dictionary, in the article PATRICIUS (FRANCISCUS), remark [B]. NEW OBSERVAT.

PAUL III.

Moreri and his Continuators, only ſay that Paul III had a ſon and a daughter, before he was created Pope. That expreſſion is not particular enough; they ſhould have ſaid that this Pope had two children by a lawful (a) marriage, and this declaration was ſo much the more neceſſary, as the obſcure expreſſion of Moreri authoriſes the opinion which prevails among the greateſt part of readers, that the children of Pope Paul III were not legitimate, and conſequently that the preſent family of Parma is derived from the baſtards of the firſt houſe of Farneſe; which is abſolutely falſe: Alexander Farneſe, before he was Pope under the name of Paul III, had Conſtance, who married (b) Baſio Sforza, the ſecond of that name, Count of S. Fiore, and Peter Lewis Farneſe, who was firſt Duke of Caſtro, and afterwards of Parma and Placentia (1). The famous Alexander Farneſe, who came into France at the head of a numerous army, was his grandſon.

The Abbot Faydit, ſpeaking in his new book of the tragical death of Peter Lewis Farneſe, whoſe intereſt obliged him to join the Fieſchi againſt the Doria's, calls the latter Dauria's, as in another place, where he mentions the Abbot Cotin of the French Academy, he calls him Cautin. This odd Orthography ſerves only to diſfigure names, and to make it impoſſible to know them. Thuanus, in giving them a Latin turn, has corrupted them, and others diſfigure them by ſpelling them ill: both he and they only affect to be (c) ſingular.

(a) It would have been proper here to give proofs of the marriage contracted by Alexander Farneſe, before he had entered into the Eccleſiaſtical Order; to name the wife that he married, to point out the time and place, and to quote creditable authors: till this is done, it is in vain to condemn thoſe who expreſs themſelves as Moreri does. MR BAYLE's REMARK.

(b) He ought to have ſaid Buoſo, and as I obſerved, before, he ſhould have named the wife, by whom Alexander Farneſe had this daughter, and the ſon from whom the Dukes of Parma deſcend. This was ſo much the more neceſſary, as he confeſſes here, that the greateſt part of the readers believe that the children of Paul III were not legitimate. Sanſovino, a famous Italian author in the XVIth century, expreſsly ſays, in his book of the Families of Italy, fol. 170, that Peter Lewis Farneſe was natural ſon to Paul III. He ſpeaks thus immediately after having beſtowed great encomiums upon that Pope. Could he have been ignorant of the marriage, which a man of ſo diſtinguiſhed a family, and who in the character of Cardinal, and afterwards in that of Pope, ſignalized himſelf ſo many ways, is ſuppoſed to have contracted? The Abbot Faydit, ubi ſupra, pag. 376, ſays that Peter Aloiſio Farneſe was lawful ſon to Alexander Farneſe, who after his wife's death, was created Pope, under the name of Onuphrius III, and afterwards under the name of Paul III. Our author has perhaps only this voucher for that Pope's marriage. We deſire both one and the other in a very ſerious manner, that they would communicate to the public, the proofs of a thing ſo little known as this is. I obſerve, by the by, that according to Sanſovino, ibid. Alexander Farneſe at firſt took the name of Honorius V. This is more probable, than to ſay that he took the name of Onuphrius III, for there has been no Pope called Onuphrius. He muſt therefore have taken the name Onuphrius I, and not of Onuphrius III. MR BAYLE's REMARK.

(1) In the edition of 1712, and thoſe that follow, they have ſaid that, Paul III had been married before he entered into the Eccleſiaſtical Order, and by his marriage, had a daughter named Conſtance, who was married to Boſio Sforza, ſecond of that name; and a ſon called Peter Lewis Farneſe, whom he made duke of Parma. But they give no proof of his marriage. NEW OBSERVAT.

(c) I believe that they who ſpell names ill are only to be charged with negligence, or a bad memory: I do not however pretend to excuſe them upon that account. MR BAYLE's REMARK.

PAULICIANS.

Moreri and his Continuators are only miſtaken in about a century, as to the time in which Paul and John, two brothers, who were heads of the ſect of Paulicians, lived. If the editor had given himſelf the trouble to read the celebrated Biſhop of Meaux's Hiſtoire des Variations, he would have ſeen in the 11th book, that theſe two brothers lived in the VIIth century, and not in the VIIIth, as he has too ſlightly advanced upon the credit of thoſe who had compiled before him the great Hiſtorical Dictionary (1). The fundamental doctrine of theſe Heretics, was, that there were two principles, Co-eternal, and Independent the one upon the other.

---

(1) In the laſt edition they ſay, after Mr Bayle, that the Paulicians were ſo called from one Paul, who made himſelf the head of that ſect in Armenia in the VIIth century. New Observat.

PELISSON.

I do not know whether the editor deſigned in this article to correct Mr Bayle, on the ſubject of Raymund Peliſſon, one of the anceſtors of Mr Peliſſon, Member of the French Academy: in the Critical Dictionary, Raymund Peliſſon is Firſt-Preſident of the Parliament or Senate of Chambery: and in the new edition of Moreri, they change this title into that of Firſt-Preſident of Dauphiné. It is nevertheleſs very certain that this Raymund was Firſt-Preſident of the Senate of Savoy, and not of the Parliament of Dauphiné: this is a fact known all the world over (1).

---

(1) In the edition of 1725 we find that Raymund Peliſſon was, in the year 1537, made Preſident in the Senate of Chambery, and Intendant in Savoy. Mr Bayle has cited Borel, Treſor des Antiquitez Gauloiſes & Françoiſes, who ſays that Raymund Peliſſon was Firſt-Preſident at Chambery: notwithſtanding this our author expreſſes himſelf as if Mr Bayle had ſaid that of his own head. New Observat.

PENELOPE.

I was ſurprized to find in the article of this Queen of Ithaca, the queſtion ſo ill diſcuſſed, whether Homer was really one of her lovers. The editor contents himſelf with telling us in general terms, that, according to ſome authors, Homer praiſed Penelope ſo much, only becauſe he had been in love with her: he would have been able to determine it in the negative, if he had taken the trouble to read Meziriac's notes upon Ovid's Epiſtles: that learned man brings demonſtrative reaſons (a) to prove, that Penelope was a very chaſt woman; beſides, what Auſonius ſays of her in his 135th Epigram (b), is an unanſwerable proof of her virtue. The kiſſes of Penelope were hardly known during ſo great a number of years to her ſon Telemachus, becauſe he was not her huſband, for whom ſhe kept all her careſſes. I agree that Floridus Sabinus, in his book Lectionum ſubciſivarum, Lycophron, Herodotus, and Dempſterus, in his Paralipomena, do not ſay the ſame thing: but after all, the proofs of Auſonius (c), ſet in their full force by the learned Mr de Meziriac, ought to prevail on this occaſion; and the editor ſhould have declared what he thought on this queſtion, as he has done on ſeveral other queſtions, perhaps much leſs intereſting (1).

(a) The reader will be a little at a loſs to underſtand our author's reaſoning, for to prove it to be falſe that Homer commended Penelope ſo much, only becauſe he had been in love with her, would require other reaſons than this, viz. that Penelope was very chaſt, which is nevertheleſs the only reaſon that he makes uſe of. Beſides, he does not think that Meziriac has proved by demonſtrative reaſons, that Penelope was a very chaſt woman, nor even that he has ſo much as attempted to confute thoſe who have ſpoken ill of her. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(b) This Epigram is no proof. Auſonius makes Penelope ſpeak, it is therefore no more than a teſtimony which ſhe bears to herſelf, and one could only infer from it, that the Poet had a very good opinion of that lady's virtue. Every body ſees the difference there is between praiſing a woman, and ſhewing, by unanſwerable proofs, that ſhe was virtuous. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(c) To make a right judgment of the ſolidity of theſe words one needs only examine the two foregoing Remarks. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(1) All the learning which our author diſplays here did not coſt him much; he has taken it from Mr Bayle: but the reaſonings are entirely his own. In the laſt edition of Moreri, after theſe words: Some antient authors have ſpoken in a very diſadvantageous manner of Penelope's conduct, and have written that Homer commended her ſo much, only becauſe he had been in love with her; they add, ſee upon this head Bayle's Dictionary. New Observat.

PHILIP D'AQUIN.

It was not a circumſtance to be omitted in the new edition, that Philip d'Aquin, who was Profeſſor of the Hebrew tongue at Paris, in the reign of the late (a) King Lewis XIII, and of whom great mention is made in the trial of the late (b) Marſhal d'Ancre, had been a Jew. The very nature of that trial ſhould have engaged the editor tor to examine this fact in a particular manner; beſides, the religion of authors ſhould always be the chief thing minded by Hiſtorians (1).

---

(a) See the following remark at the end. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(b) It was needleſs to put here the word late, conſidering what a long time it is ſince that Marſhal died; beſides, that his memory has always been held in abhorrence. Several people think that we ſhould never make uſe of this word late but when thoſe to whom we direct our ſpeech are ignorant whether the perſons talked of be alive or not. They maintain, that a woman, ſpeaking to people who know very well that ſhe is a widow, ſhould only ſay my huſband, and not my late huſband. They would not therefore approve of our author's writing in the year 1706; The late King Lewis XIII. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(1) In the edition of 1725, the article Aquin (Philip) is taken from Mr Bayle's Dictionary, which is cited; but they have not taken all that was eſſential in Mr Bayle. They ſhould have obſerved, 1. That d'Aquin had been a Jew. 2. That we find ſome curious particulars concerning him in the trial of the Marſhial d'Ancre. 3. That Flavigny accuſed him of having corrupted the Hebrew text of Mr le Jay's Bible. 4. They ſay that he taught Hebrew at Paris in the reign of Lewis XIII, in the XVIIth century. After naming Lewis XIII it was needleſs to add, in the XVIIth century. New Observat.

PHRÆA.

In the article of the Engliſhman John Phræa (not Phreas) the editor has forgot to ſpeak of that author's maſter-piece, which, at the ſame time, was the firſt attempt he made in writing: I mean his tranſlation of the diſcourſe of Syneſius, who, among the Greek authors, is the moſt difficult to be underſtood, and whom all the tranſlators before that time had been afraid to meddle with. That diſcourſe was an encomium upon baldneſs; Moreri and his editors are not the only perſons that have forgot to ſpeak of this tranſlation (1).

(1) In the laſt edition, at the word Phræa, they ſpeak of the tranſlation of Syneſius's diſcourſe, copying after Mr Bayle's Dictionary, from whence our author has taken what he ſays here. New Observ.

PHILOSTRATUS.

Moreri did not conſult this author, when he placed the death of Apollonius Tyaneus in the year 97 or 99. This fault ſhould have been corrected in the new edition, ſince it is certain that this Philoſopher died in the reign of Nerva, that is to ſay, in 96, or at moſt, in the beginning of the following year (1). There has been publiſhed, in the year 1704, a new book upon this ſubject, which ought to be conſulted (2).

(1) In the edition of 1725, at the article Apollonius Tyaneus, it is obſerved that ſome make him die in the year 97, and others in the year 99. New Observat.

(2) This book is intituled, Hiſtoire d'Apollonius de Tyane convaincuë de fauſſeté & d'impoſture. Mr du Pin is the author of it. They have made uſe of it in that edition, in relating the judgments of antient and modern authors concerning Apollonius Tyaneus. New Observat.

PRÆTEXTATUS.

It is a long time ſince Moreri has been cenſured for relating ill the ſtory that is told of the young Papyrius Prætextatus; but this has not hindered his Continuators from copying the faults which he had committed in this article, and for which he had been ſo many times reproved. Firſt, it is not true that Prætextatus, in order to get rid of the importunities of his mother, who preſſed him to tell her what had paſſed in the Senate, where his father had carried him one day, declared to her, that a reſolution had been taken, by which, for the time to come, every huſband ſhould have two wives; on the contrary, he told her the debate had been whether that would be more for the advantage of the Republic, than to order that a wife ſhould marry two huſbands. Thoſe two things, you ſee, are very different. Secondly, Moreri had been called upon to confirm that tradition by an authority of greater weight than that of Macrobius; in effect, that author's teſtimony alone would not be enough to ſilence the Critics. It is very well known that he loved a jeſt, and ſought rather to divert his reader, than to inform him of the truth of facts; but for all this they have added no other teſtimony to that of Macrobius in the new edition; they ſhould have quoted that of Cato, and that of Aulus Gellius, who ſpeaks of that affair in his firſt book (1).

(1) In the edition of 1725, they have corrected this article, at the word Papyrius, from Mr Bayle's Dictionary, from which our author has taken all he ſays here. New Observat.

PRIOLO.

I own they have done juſtice in the new edition to the memory of the late Mr Priolo, which had been cruelly beſpattered in the firſt edition of Mr Bayle's Critical Dictionary (a), and in the Sorberiana; but ſtill the editor might have been more particular in deſcribing the works which Mr Priolo had written, and which, I believe, have not yet been publiſhed: here follow the titles of them, which they may inſert, if they pleaſe, in the next edition of Moreri's Dictionary. Libri iv. de ſtultitia humanæ gentis. (He might at leaſt have compoſed a dozen more upon the ſame ſubject) Libri iii. quæſtionum naturalium, &c. Opus emunctum, triginta annorum meditatio, quod jam celebratur ſub apertiori titulo, &c. De vita & geſtis Henrici Rohanni Ducis. De vita & moribus Cæſaris Cremonini. It is even ſaid that he wrote notes upon that author's treatiſe of the Soul. Vita Benjamini Prioli. Judicium de Scriptoribus Græcis & Latinis. Epiſtolarum ſenilium ad

---

(a) Our author ſhould have obſerved here what he obſerves at the end of the article; viz. that Mr Bayle had only ſpoken upon the credit of the Sorberiana, which he had quoted in Italicks without warranting any thing. All readers ſhould take notice of this, and ſhould always go directly to the ſource and ſtop there, without making thoſe anſwerable who barely quote from it. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(1) In ad maximos Europæ proceres centuria ſingularis (1). The author of the Eſſais de Litterature, had likewiſe uſed that author very ill *, upon the credit, no doubt (b), of Mr Bayle; as the latter had done upon the credit of Meſſieurs Sorbiere and (c) Graverol; but he (d) retracted afterwards †.

* Eſſay for Febr. 1703.

† Eſſay for April 1703.

(1) In the laſt edition, they have ſaid at the end of the article Priolo, that this author 'promiſed ſeven 'different books, the titles of which are in the laſt 'page of his Hiſtory. Among theſe we find his own 'life, and that of the Duke of Rohan, which are not 'yet publiſhed.' This is taken from Mr Bayle's Dictionary, of which our author is barely the tranſcriber here. New Observat.

(b) To know whether it was upon credit of Mr Bayle, we ſhould conſult the Memoirs of Trevoux, pag. 476 of the fifth volume, Amſterdam edition. Our Author would have ſpoke, otherwiſe if he had ſeen the cenſure paſſed in that Journal upon the Eſſais de Litterature. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(c) Mr Bayle has neither quoted, nor was he obliged to quote upon that occaſion, Mr Graverol who has not joined his teſtimony with that of Sorbiere, Mr Bayle's Remark.

(d) That is to ſay, the author of the Eſſais de Litterature. Mr Bayle's Remark.

PRISCILLIAN.

Mr Bayle often cenſures Moreri; the Continuator of the latter, might, in his turn, have attacked that celebrated Critic. He furniſhed him with ſufficient matter for cenſure in the article of Priſcillian, eſpecially when he ſays that the Priſcillians (a) were condemned, in the IVth and Vth centuries, upon certain points that were canonized in St Auguſtin, and confirmed by the deciſions of the Church: we muſt conſult upon this head the XCIIId Epiſtle of St Leo (1).

(a) He ſhould have ſaid the Priſcillianiſts. It is very true that the matter is ample and conſiderable, but it does not properly belong to a Dictionary purely Hiſtorical. In an Hiſtorical and Critical Dictionary, ſuch a thing might properly be placed; it is a moſt curious ſubject, the queſtion is to know whether, as St Auguſtin makes liberty to conſiſt in this, that the mind wills without conſtraint although neceſſarily, we can approve his doctrine, and condemn that which ſuppoſes the acts of the human will to proceed from a fatal neceſſity, as the Priſcillianiſts taught. It is eaſy to prove that there is no diſtinction alledged by the followers of St Auguſtin, which the Priſcillianiſts had not adopted, and conſequently that their doctrine is at bottom the ſame with that of St Auguſtin. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(1) See Mr Bayle's Dictionary at the article Priscillian, remark [H]. New Observat.

PRODICUS.

An Heretic of the IId century, being founder of a new ſect, which, at that time, made a great noiſe, ſhould not have been forgot in the new edition; I ſpeak of the ſect of the Adamites (1).

(1) In the edition of 1725 we find the article of this Prodicus. They have made uſe of Mr Bayle's Dictionary there, though without quoting him. New Observat.

PUTEANUS.

The Continuators of Moreri had been told that they ſhould correct their Chronology concerning the death of Erycius Puteanus; but not much minding the informations that are given them, which they ſeldom take the trouble to read, they have continued to place his death in the year 1646 (a). Mr Bullard, in his ſecond volume of the Academie des Sciences, places that author's death preciſely (b) in the year 1644. Speaking of the book Statera pacis & belli, they might have added, (c) that it was a book wholly to the advantage of his Catholic Majeſty (1).

(a) They were in the right to continue to ſay that Puteanus died in the year 1646. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(b) Bullard does not ſay in expreſs terms, that Puteanus died in the year 1644. We can only infer this from his making him ſeventy years old, and placing his birth in 1574. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(c) But to add this ſo as to be underſtood, it would have been neceſſary to obſerve 1. That Puteanus adviſed the King of Spain to make peace with the United-Provinces (they inſinuate this in Moreri). 2. That this peace would have been ſerviceable to the King of Spain, if we judge of it by the ill ſucceſs of the war which he continued, and which, after a world of expence and diſgrace, he did not get rid of at laſt in the year 1648, but by an ignominious peace wherein he granted the Dutch every thing that they were pleaſed to aſk. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(1) Our Critic, who has taken all that he ſays here from Mr Bayle, would have us place, as Bullart does, the death of Puteanus in the year 1644. Yet Mr Bayle had obſerved, that having conſulted the life of Puteanus, he had found there that he died in the caſtle of Louvain, on the ſeventeenth of September 1646. The editors of Moreri have corrected the article of Puteanus from Mr Bayle's Dictionary. They had ſaid firſt: It is obſerved in his life, that he died in the caſtle of Louvain, on the ſeventeenth of September 1646: other writers place his death in the year 1644. They added afterwards: the Funeral Oration upon Ericius Puteanus was pronounced at Louvain, on the nineteenth of September 1646, the day of his burial . . . . which ſhews the true time of his death. New Observat.

Q.

QUINTUS CURTIUS.

IN this article the editor has corrected part of the faults that had been cenſured in Moreri: but after all he tells us nothing about the time or age in which Quintus Curtius lived. Nay he ſeems afraid to declare his opinion. But why not prefer to any other the ſentiment of Father le Tellier, who makes that famous author to have lived in the reign of the Emperor Claudius? This opinion appears more probable than that which the editor ſeems to favour: he does not venture to ſay that he lived in the reign of Veſpaſian, but he inſinuates it; ſuch caution ſhews his uncertainty (1).

---

(1) Our Critic pretends that the opinion of Father le Tellier, concerning the time in which Quintus Curtius lived, is the moſt probable; but as he does not prove it, his Remark cannot be of any uſe. NEW OBSERVAT.

R.

RAMUS.

THIS article ſhould have been more enlarged; the exact temperance of this Philoſopher, compared with the delicacy and profuſion at the tables of thoſe who live now-a-days, particularly deſerved ſome reflexions (1).

---

(1) The article of Ramus is very large in the laſt edition. They have corrected and improved it from Mr Bayle's Dictionary: but an error has crept into it. They ſay that Ramus was ſon to a gentleman, who . . . was obliged to follow the buſineſs of a coal-man for his livelihood: it was not his father but his grandfather, as may be ſeen in Mr Bayle. They do not ſpeak of the temperance of Ramus, which has furniſhed Mr Bayle with a Remark. NEW OBSERVAT.

RAPIN.

They have forgot a good many things in making an encomium on this learned Jeſuit, eſpecially when they give an account of his books; they have not ſaid a word of that which did him the greateſt honour: I mean the Diſſertatio de nova doctrina, ſeu Evangelium Janſeniſtarum. This book was printed at Paris in the year 1658. The anonymous letter (a) which he publiſhed in 1680, likewiſe made a great deal of noiſe, and annoyed the party which he attacked: the late Cardinal Cibo, to whom it was addreſſed, gratefully thanked the learned author for it (1).

(a) See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, January 1686, at the fourth article of the catalogue of new books. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) Our author copies Mr Bayle here, according to cuſtom. In the laſt edition of Moreri they have made great uſe of the Critical Dictionary to improve the article of Father Rapin. NEW OBSERVAT.

RIPAMONT.

All the editors of Moreri have forgot, in the article of Joſeph Ripamont, to ſpeak of his Hiſtory of the Milaneſe; they have indeed quoted the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the city of Milan, which he publiſhed; but beſides that work, he compoſed the Hiſtory of the Milaneſe; and theſe are two different books: beſides, thoſe editors conſtantly write Ripamont, whereas I maintain it ſhould be Ripamonte (1).

---

(1) In the edition of 1725, at the article of Ripamonte, they have added nothing concerning the Hiſtory of the Milaneſe, written by this author. Mr Grævius has inſerted it, together with the continuation, in the ſecond volume of his Theſaurus Antiquitatum Italiæ. NEW OBSERVAT.

RONSARD.

This article is not very exact: the editor places the birth of that famous Poet in the year 1524, and ſeveral authors ſay that he was born the ſame year that Francis I. was taken priſoner in the battle of Pavia: this æra will appear ſingular to the reader: however, ſome authors have made uſe of it. Now Francis I. was taken priſoner before Pavia (and who does not know it?) on the twenty-fifth of February (a), in the year 1525. Ronſard was therefore born in the year 1525 (1). The editor names the mother of that Poet Jane Chaudrier, whereas it is Jane Chandrier (2). The family of Chandrier was ſo illuſtrious, that they ought to have known the true way of ſpelling its name. They might have told us ſomething of the law-ſuit, which Ronſard carried on againſt Joachim du Bellay, for the recovery of ſome Odes, which the latter had ſtole from him. This affair was for a long time an amuſement to the Court; but Ronſard did not conſider it as a trifle, he was extremely warm in it. Mr Gueret, in his ingenious fiction *, cenſures Ronſard, for the harſhneſs and obſcurity of his ſtyle, they are faults that other authors have likewiſe reproached him with; beſides this Poet often tranſgreſſes the rules of modeſty; and we find in his works ſome expreſſions that give us no great idea of the purity of his morals. The Critics eſpecially have very much exclaimed againſt ſome verſes in the ſecond Ode of the ſecond book, and not altogether without reaſon.

* Le Parnaſſe reformé.

The editor ſhould have cleared the queſtion whether Ronſard was really a prieſt, as ſome Proteſtant miniſters called him by way of reproach: for my part, I am convinced that he was in Holy Orders; but I do not believe he had taken that of prieſthood. I ground the firſt part of this propoſition upon the very terms of his anſwer, to the miniſters who had attacked him (3).

(a) Apply here, what has been obſerved above, in the article Francis II, Note (a), concerning the way of making the year begin at Eaſter. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(1) In the laſt edition, they ſay, that Ronſard was born on the 25th of February, 1525. New Observ.

(2) This error, is ſtill in the edition of 1725. New Observat.

(3) All that our author ſays here, is taken from Mr Bayle's Dictionary. New Observat.

RUFINUS.

Mr Bayle refers us to Moreri's Dictionary, concerning the circumſtances, and the year of the death of this favourite to the Emperor Theodoſius. I readily agree to the circumſtances, but I abſolutely reject the epoch (a) of his death: in effect it is more reaſonable, upon this occaſion, to follow Mr Flechier, who places this death (b), under the year 397, in his Hiſtory of Theodoſius the Great, than to follow Moreri (1). Beſides ſome reflexions of the editor, upon the doubts which the inſolent fortune of Rufinus, raiſed in Claudian, whether there was any ſuch thing as a providence, would certainly have been a great embelliſhment to this article.

(a) That the readers might not have the trouble of conſulting other books, this author ought to have ſet down the year, in which, according to Moreri, Rufinus was killed. It was the year 395. He is in the wrong to reject this epoch; it is a true one, as might eaſily be proved. I content myſelf with ſaying that Socrates in the firſt chapter of the ſixth book, of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, fixes the death of Rufinus on the 27th of November, of that ſame year, in which the Emperor Theodoſius died. Now Mr Flechier ſays, and he ſays right, that this Emperor died on the 17th of January 395. For the further information of the reader, I muſt tell him, that Mr Flechier does not ſay, in expreſs terms, that Rufinus died in the year 397. It can only be inferred from this, that under the year 392, ſpeaking of ſome injuſtices, committed by Rufinus, he adds, that five years after, Rufinus was one of the cauſes, &c. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(b) If our author had conſulted Mr Flechier's book, he would have expreſſed himſelf otherwiſe. See the foregoing remark. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(1) In the edition of 1712, and the following, they have ſaid that Rufinus was killed in the year 395, or 397, according to Mr Flechier. New Observat.

S.

SCHOMBERG.

In the article of this Cardinal, the editor has forgot to ſpeak of the fine letter which he wrote upon the death of Sir Thomas More, Chancellor of England. This Cardinal was a near relation (a) to the Nun whom Luther married (1). It was upon this ſubject, that he pronounced in the Sacred College a diſcourſe ſo moving, that it drew tears from ſeveral

---

(a) Mr de Seckendorf has confuted this: it would be neceſſary to know whether in the Eſſais de litterature, they quote any author who has mentioned this moving diſcourſe, on the ſubject of that Cardinal's relation having married Luther; for, as I ſaid before, the author of the Eſſais de litterature, is only to be credited ſo far as he brings good vouchers. It is even proper to conſult the authors whom he quotes, for ſometimes he makes them ſay more than they have ſaid. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(1) In the laſt edition, they have corrected the article of this Cardinal, from Mr Bayle's Dictionary; but they have not thought fit to ſpeak of the letter which he wrote upon the death of Sir Thomas More, nor ſeveral of the Cardinals: mention has been made of this diſcourſe in one of thoſe periodical pieces * which have appeared in ſo great number for ſome time.

* Eſſais de Litterature.

---

nor of his pretended relation to the Nun whom Luther married; the firſt of theſe facts being not of conſequence enough to be inſerted in Moreri; and Mr Bayle having obſerved, that Mr de Seckendorf had affirmed the ſecond to be falſe. New Observat.

SCIOPPIUS.

It would ſeem that the editor could not clear up the true date of Scioppius's death, for he ſays nothing at all of it. It is true, that people have ſpoke very differently as to the time when it happened, but that very reaſon ſhould have obliged our author to declare what he thought of it. Mr Baillet relates the different opinions of the authors of that time on this point; but moſt certainly Scioppius died in the year 1649. The proofs which Mr Bayle alledges are deciſive: Patin likewiſe places his death in the ſame year, and we cannot doubt of it, when we read the fifteenth Letter (of the firſt edition) in the collection of that author's letters which are publiſhed (1). They have forgot in the new edition to ſpeak of the moſt virulent book which he publiſhed againſt the Jeſuits, for whom he had an implacable hatred; it is intituled, Anatomia Societatis, (a) & de Stratagematis Jeſuitarum. This book made a great noiſe, and did not do Scioppius all the honour he expected. His beſt books are thoſe (b) which have not been publiſhed, and which remained in the hands of the learned Pieruccius his univerſal heir. The conformity between the principles of that famous Critic, and thoſe of the Jeſuit Melchior Inchoffer has giving occaſion to believe that the memoirs of the one had paſſed through the hands of the other, who had made uſe of them againſt the Jeſuits.

---

(1) In the editions of 1707 and 1712, they had ſaid that Scioppius died in 1649, aged above fourſcore: but in that of 1725, they take notice that he died in the year 1649, at the age of 73. In effect, Mr Bayle quotes a paſſage of Scioppius, where he affirms that he was in his ſeventeenth year, in the year 1593. New Observat.

(a) The Anatomia Societatis is not the ſame book, with that de Stratagematis Jeſuitarum, as our author ſuppoſes here. They are two different works: the Jeſuit Forerus, who has anſwered this Anatomia, reckons up ſeveral other of Scioppius's books againſt the ſociety, and proves that he had often copyed himſelf. He falſely aſcribes to him the myſteria Patrum Jeſuitarum, which is a book written by Andrew Rivetus, Profeſſor of Divinity at Leyden. For the reſt, I think the editors of Moreri ſhould labour to find out the cauſe of Scioppius's hatred to the Jeſuits, for he behaved in a civil manner to them for ſome time. He vindicated them in his Eccleſiaſticus, from the accuſations which the King of Great Britain had brought againſt them. It is true that his apology is indirect, for it only conſiſts of a numberleſs heap of paſſages from Luther, which animate the Proteſtants, &c. to extirpate the Kings and Princes who adhere to the Pope, and oppoſe the reformation of the Church. Never did any man more warmly excite the Roman Catholic Princes, to the extirpation of Hereſies than Scioppius, and neverthleſs he charges (in his Stratagemata) that ſpirit of violence, as a crime upon Forerus. So true it is that he only wrote out of paſſion. He rather choſe to contradict and criticiſe himſelf, than not to cenſure his enemies. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(b) This may be true as to ſome of them; but there are others (thoſe for example which he wrote to explain the prophecies) that are not ſo good as what he publiſhed. Few people were more maſters of the Holy Scripture than he: upon all occaſions he found means to apply paſſages of Scripture in his diſputes againſt the Proteſtants: one may particularly obſerve this method in his Eccleſiaſticus, which was printed in the year 1611, and is a confutation of King James's apology for the oath of allegiance. But he puts new and forced conſtructions upon the greateſt part of the paſſages which he quoted from Scripture. If he did this before, he was a viſionary, judge what his writings upon the prophecies muſt be, when he was become a kind of fanatic. It is to be obſerved that his controverſial works have always ſome new turn; and as he had read from end to end, all Luther's works, in order to extract out of them every paſſage which a ſatirical wit can ſo repreſent, as to make that Reformer odious and contemptible, he improved his talent in this particular, more than the greateſt part of the other writers in controverſy have done. He ſhews more ſtrength in quoting facts than in alledging reaſons, tho' in this laſt reſpect, he is not weak. His fine Latin is no ſmall ornament to his writing. Mr Bayle's Remark.

SENNERT.

The editor is miſtaken as to the year of this famous Phyſician's birth, and he puts it five years back, without having any probable reaſon for it. He places it in the year 1577, whereas moſt certainly it comes under the year 1572; beſides our author ſays in a very conciſe and dry manner, that the opinion of this Philoſopher, viz. that the ſouls of beaſts are not material, cauſed him to be charged with impiety. Speaking of this tenet, he ſhould have told us every thing that accompanyed it, and the arguments by which Sennert ſupported it. This Phyſician did not only affirm, that the ſouls of beaſts are not material, but he rejected (lib. 1. de plaſt. ſeminis facultate) the opinion of thoſe who maintain, they are not of a more noble nature than the elements (1); and he ſaid that they are naturally as much immortal, as the ſoul of man; ſo that if the latter does not periſh with the body, as well as the former, it is owing to a particular favour of the Creator. He owned indeed that the ſouls of beaſts were not produced from matter, conſequently

---

(1) Our author, who has ſeldom or never given himſelf the trouble of quoting, has altered his method here; and to prove that Sennert rejected the opinion of thoſe, who maintain that the ſoul is not of a more noble nature than the elements, he quotes, in a parentheſis, (lib. I. de plaſt. ſeminis facultate;) to inform us that this was the book where Sennert rejected that opinion. He imagined, no doubt, that this ſtroke of learning, would embelliſh his remark. What pity it is, that he did not ſucceed? He went very artfully about it. Thus; Mr Bayle, whom he copies here verbatim, had quoted Sennert. ubi ſupr. c. 9. p. 137. Our Critic being willing to fill up this ubi ſupr. and to give the title of the book, to which this quotation refers, ran backwards over conſequently he laughed at the eduction of the ſchoolmen. But after all, ſo long as he did not ſay that their ſouls were really immortal, there was no room for taxing him with impiety (2).

---

over a dozen of quotations; but unluckily for him he ſtopped at this: vide Jacobum Schegkium, lib. i, de plaſt. ſeminis facultate, apud Sennert. ibid. cap. v, pag. 127; where, as you ſee, Mr Bayle quotes a book of Schegkius's, and not of Sennert's. New Observat.

(2) In the laſt edition this article is corrected from Mr Bayle's Dictionary, which has ſupplied our author with what he ſays here. New Observat.

SEXTUS AB HEMMINYA (a).

This article has been omitted, or perhaps this author is not known (1); he ſhould be very well known to the Aſtrologers, ſince he was in his (b) time with reſpect to them, what the famous Picus of Mirandola was in his: no man was ever more attached to that ſcience than Sextus in the firſt part of his life; but having had time to diſcover the fallacy and uſeleſsneſs of it, he became afterwards one of its greateſt adverſaries, and gave it terrible blows (c). Happy had it been for the world, if he could have ſucceeded in wholly undeceiving mankind as to an art which has already ſeduced ſuch great numbers. The Sextus, of whom I ſpeak, was a great Geometrician, and it was by the progreſs he had made in that mother of the ſciences (d), that he diſcovered the vanity of Aſtrology, and reſolved to write againſt its principles. Aſtrology has had illuſtrious favourers; Mr Faydit, in his Remarks upon Virgil and Homer, ſays, that Pope Paul III was ſtrongly attached to it, and that he gave the biſhopric of Civita Vecchia to Luke Gauricus de Fano, becauſe he was very well ſkilled in it: this fact wants ſome proofs (e).

(a) He ſhould have ſaid Sextus ab Hemminga. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(1) We find this article in the edition of 1707, and the following ones, at the word Sixte de Hemminga. New Observat.

(b) Our author's Remarks ſhould be ſuited to the character of Moreri's Dictionary, which is a work chiefly deſigned for the inſtruction of readers that have no learning. A work of that nature ſhould explain every thing without making it neceſſary to conſult another book. Our author, after the manner he ſpeaks here, does not inform us when Sextus ab Hemminga and Picus of Mirandola lived; inſtead of his age, he ſhould have ſaid the XVIth century; and a little lower inſtead of in his, he ſhould have ſaid in the XVth. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(c) He ſhould have told us what method Hemminga took to combat Aſtrology. It was this. He drew the horoſcope of thirty perſons, moſt of them Princes, Kings, Popes, &c. obſerved in theſe horoſcopes the rules of art with great exactneſs, and ſhewed that nothing had happened to theſe thirty perſons of what ſhould have happened to them according to the rules of judicial Aſtrology. Thoſe who will give the article of that author may conſult Suffridus Petri, in the ninth chapter of the thirteenth decad of authors born in Frieſland. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(d) I wiſh our author had quoted ſome authority upon this head, it does not appear, that, in order to know the vanity of Aſtrology, a perſon muſt make a progreſs in Geometry. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(e) It is certain that Thuanus relates, in the fourth book of his Hiſtory, pag. m. 87. that Paul III being much attached to judicial Aſtrology, had for that very reaſon a great friendſhip for Luke Gauricus, admitted him to his converſation and table, and at laſt gave him the biſhopric de Civitate. Ac tandem Civitatenſi Epiſcopatu donavit. There are books written by Luke Gauricus, in the titles of which he is ſtiled Epiſcopus Civitatenſis. The Abbot Faydit is only miſtaken in believing that the biſhopric which Paul III gave to Gauricus was that of Civita Vecchia, and that Gauricus was a native of Fano. Civita Vecchia is not an epiſcopal city, and it belongs to the Pope, but the biſhopric which Gauricus had lies in Apulia, in the kingdom of Naples, under the Archbiſhop of Benevento, and is not the ſame with that of Civita Ducale, as is affirmed in Moreri at the word Gauric (Luke). Gauricus was not born in Fano, but in a place called in Latin Geophanum, and in Italian Giſoni, which is in the kingdom of Naples, in the hither principality five miles from Salerno. Conſult Mr Baudrand under the word Geophanum.

It will not be amiſs to confute here a thing which Mr Teiſſier, in his additions to Thuanus, has related on the teſtimony of Tollius, in Appendice de infelicitate Litteratorum. He tells us that Luke Gauricus having foretold that John Bentivoglio ſhould be baniſhed out of his native country, and deprived of his ſovereignty, incurred the indignation of that Prince who cauſed him to be tortured to death. This cannot be true for John Bentivoglio was expelled Bologne by Pope Julius II, in the year 1506, and died at Milan in 1508; and it is certain that Luke Gauricus was made a Biſhop by Paul III, whoſe Papal dignity commenced only in the year 1534. Mr Teiſſier ſhould have contented himſelf with ſaying, that John Bentivoglio, enraged at Gauricus's threatening predictions, cauſed him to be put to the rack; and he ſhould have added, that he did not die on that occaſion. Cardan treats him as a Quack, and accuſes him of having rather conjectured the ruin of the Bentivoglio's from the ſituation of things, than of having foreknown it by the ſtars. Gauricus, ſays he, in libro Geniturarum, pag. m. 206. à Bentivolis tortus in eculeo. Id certe ex aſtris non viderat, quamvis excidium familiæ ominaretur plus ex conjectura rerum quam aſtrorum, fuit enim Sycophanta egregius. Thuanus having ſaid in one place that Gauricus was a Biſhop, and in another, that he died in the year 1559, it was eaſy to infer that he did not die upon the rack. Is it reaſonable to think that a Biſhop of Italy ſhould have been treated in this manner, eſpecially by a family ſuch as that of the Bentivoglio's, who had no where any ſovereign power. Mr Bayle's Remark.

SIMONIS.

Theodore Simonis, or Simon, is an author who has made noiſe enough to deſerve a place among the many articles of the Simons and the Theodores that we find in the new edition. I confeſs I expected with impatience to ſee how the editor would treat this article: I do not know whether he had any reaſons for omitting it, or if it was a mere forgetfulneſs (1). Simonis was one of the moſt particular friends of the famous

---

(1) The article of Simon or Simonis was ſtill omitted in the edition of 1712: it is in that of 1725, taken from Mr Bayle's Dictionary. New Observat.

Biſhop of Ypres (a), and if any thing did hurt to the memory of Janſenius, it was chiefly his intimacy with that German, to whom (b) is aſcribed the book de Atheiſmo in Polonia, ex atheo libello, &c. Some authors have attempted to clear him of this terrible accuſation, but they have not had all the ſucceſs they expected. There was one Francis Simonis, to whom has been aſcribed the book de fraudibus Hæreticorum, written by Father Heſtrier (c) (2).

(a) This appears to me very falſe, and is at leaſt very contrary to the facts which have been related in the Critical Dictionary, in the remark [I], of the article JANSENIUS, and in the remark [Y], of the article SIMON. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(b) It is by no means true that the impious book of which our author ſpeaks is aſcribed to Theodore Simon or Simonis, who had ſome conferences with Janſenius. He does not give us the right title of it which he might eaſily have found in the Critical Dictionary, pag. 2719, of the ſecond edition. The title of that book, printed at Cracow in the year 1588, is Simonis Religio. By the date of the impreſſion it is evident that the Theodore Simonis, of whom we ſpeak here, is not the author of that book, for he was a young man when he had ſome diſputes with Janſenius, about the year 1630. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(c) He ſhould have ſaid that Father Eſtrix, a Flemiſh Jeſuit, is the author of the book de fraudibus Hæreticorum, which has appeared under the falſe name of Francis Simonis. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(2) Our author has confounded himſelf ſtrangely in relating what he had found in Mr Bayle: this is a pretty common thing with him; but he may be ſaid to have out-done himſelf here. NEW OBSERVAT.

SOPHRONIA.

The editor has not corrected the faults which Moreri had committed on the ſubject of this Roman lady. It is true Euſebius Cæſarienſis ſpeaks of her beauty and chaſtity in the fourteenth chapter of his eighth book; but he does not name her, neither do we know from whence it comes that Hiſtorians afterwards gave her the name of Sophronia. Mr Bayle, whom few things eſcape, owns that he no where found the name of Sophronia; conſequently the editor ſhould not have cited Euſebius, as his voucher with reſpect to this name. This is not the only fault which he has copied from the firſt editions; for example, his expreſſion is not juſt when he ſays that this lady may be called the Chriſtian Lucretia; this is not the meaning of Charles Stephens's words, which Moreri and his Continuators have ill tranſlated (1).

---

(1) In the laſt edition the article of this lady is corrected from Mr Bayle's Dictionary, which our author continues to copy here. NEW OBSERVAT.

SPANHEIM.

In this article mention is made of the late King of England, William III, as if he were ſtill living: that Prince died in the year 1702, and the Dictionary was finiſhed about the end of 1704; conſequently the article Spanheim being in the laſt volume, which was printed more than two years after that Prince's death, they ſhould have avoided this expreſſion, William, Prince of Orange, (a) now King of England, ſince that King had been dead two whole years when they made uſe of the word now (1).

(a) That cenſure is well-grounded, and I ſhall take this opportunity to warn thoſe who ſhall publiſh new editions of Moreri in Holland, that they ought to rectify certain things in the article of William III, King of England. In the firſt place, they have ſaid in this article that while he was yet Prince of Orange he gave battle thrice to the French, at Senef, at St Denys, and at Mons. This ſhews they did not know that the battle of St Denys, and that of Mons, are the ſame; and thus inſtead of three battles they only mention two. They have forgot that of Caſſel. Beſides this they ſhould have ſet down the date of every one of theſe three battles, and not have made uſe of the word gave, as it ſignifies that the Prince of Orange was the attacker: which is not true. He was attacked at Senef; they met him at Caſſel; he attacked only at St Denys, and that too when the French, knowing that the peace was ſigned at Nimeguen, were not upon their guard. Laſtly, they ſhould have told us whether the Prince was victorious or vanquiſhed in every one of theſe three battles. In the ſecond place they affirm, that he ſet out in his expedition to England on the firſt of November 1688. They ſhould have ſaid the twenty-ninth of October 1688. In the third place they ſay, that contrary winds having obliged him to put back, he ſet out a ſecond time on the eighth, they ſhould have ſaid the eleventh. In the fourth place they affirm, that he afterwards gave battle twice to the French, once at Steenkerken, and another time near Londen (they ſhould have ſaid Landen). The ſame negligences that I have obſerved upon the firſt article are to be found here; the date is wanting as well as the circumſtance whether this Prince was the attacker or attacked, the vanquiſher or vanquiſhed. I make uſe of the Dutch edition of 1698. That of Paris 1699 has ſtruck out the greateſt part of this article of William III. I hope what I have been ſaying will be of ſome uſe to thoſe who ſhall take the trouble to give us new reviſals of Moreri. They will ſee in what manner an hiſtorical article ſhould be filled up, and that without being very long, it may contain the moſt eſſential circumſtances. They will do well to correct the article of the Marſhal de Luxembourg. It is falſly affirmed there that the Prince of Orange was obliged, in the year 1674, to raiſe the ſiege of Charleroi, and that he was worſted at the battle of St Denys near Mons, in the year 1678 (2). MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) This has been corrected in the edition of 1712. NEW OBSERVAT.

(2) See the advertiſement to the ſecond edition of the Critical Dictionary, near the end. NEW OBSERVAT.

STOFLERUS.

In the article of this famous Mathematician, it was natural to expect ſome account of the friendſhip which he had for his diſciple Munſter, to whom he left copies of all his works, of which the latter knew afterwards very well how to make a profitable uſe to himſelf, and by that means to publiſh excellent treatiſes in his own name (1).

(1) Mr Bayle, in the article of Stoflerus, ſays, that he had a great friendſhip for his diſciple Munſter, and that this did no ſmall ſervice to the learned world; ſince if it had not been for the copies which he allowed him to take of his books, they would have been loſt for ever when the originals were burnt. Here is the uſe that our author makes of theſe words, according to his manner of conceiving things, and of relating them. 1. He pretends that it was natural to expect, in the new edition of Moreri, ſome inſtances of the friendſhip which Stoflerus had for his diſciple Munſter, but this is ſaid at a venture, for Mr Bayle, his ſole and only author, takes notice of no other mark of his friendſhip than what we have juſt ſeen. 2. He affirms that Stoflerus left Munſter copies of all his works, which is as much as to ſay, that Stoflerus did himſelf write, or cauſed others to write, copies of his works, and that he left them at his death to Munſter: but neither of theſe things is true, he only ſuffered him to take copies of his books. 3. He adds, that Munſter knew afterwards very well how to make a profitable uſe of them to himſelf, and by that means to publiſh excellent treatiſes in his own name: that is to ſay, that Munſter gave himſelf for the author of Stoflerus's works, publiſhed them as his own, and took the glory of them from his friend: but what proof does he give of this? None at all: it is not his way to give proofs of what he aſſerts. NEW OBSERVAT.

STROZZY.

The article of Philip Strozzy is very dry: that generous citizen, who made himſelf a ſacrifice for the liberty of his country, deſerved to have ſomething more ſaid of him: particularly they ſhould not have forgot this line of Virgil, which that brave Florentine wrote upon his chimney with the point of his dagger, a moment before he died (a):

Exoriare aliquis noſtris ex oſſibus ultor (1).

(a) He ſhould have ſaid before he killed himſelf. This would have inſtantly informed the reader what kind of death that Florentine died, a remarkable particular. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) In the laſt edition we find a very good article of this Strozzy, taken from Mr Bayle's Dictionary, from which our author has borrowed what he ſays here. NEW OBSERVAT.

SULPICIUS SEVERUS.

The Continuators of Moreri had already been told, that it is not certain this Hiſtorian was of the Agenois, and that his ſaying in his works that Phœbadius of Agen was his Biſhop, is no reaſon for concluding he was himſelf of that dioceſe; they have nevertheleſs made ſhort work with the difficulty, which, notwithſtanding their deciſion, ſubſiſts ſtill, and is even favoured by many (1).

(1) Mr Bayle, in the article of SEVERUS (Sulpicius), obſerves, that he was undoubtedly of the province of Aquitaine; but that it is not certain whether he was of the dioceſe of Agen: and he puts the following note in the margin: he ſays, that Phœbadius, Biſhop of Agen, was his Biſhop. This does not prove that he was born in that dioceſe. This occaſioned our author's ſaying, that the Continuators of Moreri had already been told, &c. They have not yet made uſe of Mr Bayle's Remark. In the edition of 1725, we find that Sulpicius Severus was born at Agen in Aquitain, or in that dioceſe, ſince, according to his own teſtimony, Phœbadius of Agen was his Biſhop. NEW OBSERVAT.

T.

TASSO.

THE name of the author of this Poet's life is wrong, the editor writes it Decharné, inſtead of de Charnes: he is Dean of Villeneuve lez Avignon, a man diſtinguiſhed by his love for learning, and by the works he publiſhed ſome years ago: he is now writing the Life of Petrarch; but what the editor might have added to his article, and which would have been a great embelliſhment to it, is, that John Baptiſta Pigna, who compoſed the Hiſtory of the Princes of Eſte, to whom he was a domeſtic, was that enemy to Taſſo, of whom Taſſo complains on ſeveral occaſions without naming him, and whoſe character and manners he has deſcribed ſo ingeniouſly in his Aminta, under the name of Mopſus. This obſervation was neither made by Mr Menage in his Commentary upon the Aminta, nor by the Abbot de Charnes in his Life of Taſſo; I owe it to the author of the Eſſais de Litterature, who gave an extract of the Life of that Poet in his Eſſay (a) of June and July 1703 (1). Mr Bayle, who has ſaid

(a) As I have not read that Eſſay, I do not know whether the author quotes any writer who may have told him this particular concerning John Baptiſta Pigna: if he has cited no authority, the editors of Moreri would be very much to blame if they inſerted this particular in the article of Taſſo: they ought to miſtruſt, as a romantic invention, every thing that is aſſerted without proof in the Eſſais de Litterature. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) In the laſt edition no mention is made of Pigna in the article of Taſſo. They have written the name of the Abbot de Charnes well. In the Memoires ſaid but two words of Taſſo, in the firſt edition of his Critical Dictionary, had promiſed to enlarge the article of that Poet in the ſecond edition; he has not kept his word; I call upon him in the name and behalf of the learned, to fulfil his promiſe in the Supplement to that Dictionary, which, as they write from Holland, he is going to publiſh.

Memoires de Litterature, of Mr de Sallengre, Tom. I, pag. 184, he is called Mr de Charner. This is, no doubt, an error of the preſs. New Observat.

TAVERNIER.

In the article of this famous traveller, the editor has forgot to tell us ſomething of the diſputes which he had formerly with the Dutch authors. He was the aggreſſor in his Hiſtoire de la conduite des Hollandois en Aſie, wherein he uſed the directors of the Eaſt-India company very ill. Soon after, the author of l'Eſprit de Mr Arnauld vindicated theſe gentlemen: Mr Jurieu eſpouſed their cauſe, and inveighed in a baſe manner againſt the poor Mr Tavernier, who likewiſe found himſelf engaged afterwards in the quarrel between Father Tellier, and Mr Arnauld. This traveller did not ſpeak of the Jeſuits with due moderation in the relation he gave of his travels; which conduct drew upon him ſome ſatirical ſtrokes in the ſecond part of the Defenſe des nouveaux Chrétiens. Mr Arnauld, it is true, afterwards vindicated him in the third volume of his Morale pratique (1). Who could ever have imagined that a Merchant ſhould have any-wiſe been concerned in the controverſy between theſe two learned Divines? Methinks this fact, and the firſt that I mentioned would have been no ſmall embelliſhment to the article Tavernier (2).

(1) Our author has taken all this from Mr Bayle. New Observat.

(2) In the edition of 1725, where the article of Tavernier is corrected from Mr Bayle's Dictionary, they mention this traveller's book concerning the conduct of the Dutch in Aſia: but no notice is taken of Father Tellier's complaints, nor of Mr Arnauld's anſwer. It was thought theſe particulars did not belong to Moreri's Dictionary, New Observat.

TETTI.

This article deſerved a place in the new edition: Scipio Tetti made ſo much noiſe in the XVIth century, that he ought not to have been forgotten in this work: he was a man, they will ſay, who held bad principles of religion, the remembrance of which it is proper to extinguiſh. According to this way of reaſoning we muſt ſay, that St Epiphanius had given himſelf a very needleſs trouble, and even that his work may have dangerous conſequences, he who has given us a collection of all the Hereſies that had been formed in the boſom of the Church down to his time. Such a work as that is ſo far from being dangerous to religion, that, on the contrary, I believe, with an holy Father, it is very uſeful towards the eſtabliſhment of it. Is not that diverſity of ſentiments, that perpetual oppoſition between thoſe who have abandoned the fixed point of unity, an invincible proof for the Divinity of our religion? Does it not ſhew, that without this unity of the Church, there is nothing but illuſions, precipices, and dangers?

To return to Scipio Tetti; what brought troubleſome diſgraces upon him, ſuch particularly as they are deſcribed by Thuanus (in vita ſua lib. 1.) was his ſhort treatiſe de Apollodoris. Mr Baillet, who ſpeaks of it in his works, puts a high value upon it; that Bibliographer ſhould nevertheleſs have praiſed it moderately; the errors of which Tetti was accuſed, and which they pretended were to be found in that ſmall piece, were not a juſt ground for Baillet to ground his eſteem upon (a). That work excepted, Tetti's morals were good, and Benedictus Ægius, who publiſhed that author's book, praiſes him very much in his notes; and I am perſuaded, that, if Tetti had not lived in a country where the appearance and ſhadow of a crime in certain matters paſſes for the crime itſelf, he would not have found himſelf in thoſe melancholy circumſtances to which he was reduced in his latter days (1).

(a) The treatiſe of Scipio Tetti de Apollodoris, was printed at Rome in the author's life-time, and from thence we may conjecture that it contains no Hereſies. But we ſhall be fully convinced by reading it, that there is nothing in that ſmall book which can offend the Inquiſition: neither indeed was this the thing which cauſed him to be perſecuted, and ſent to the gallies. Mr Baillet therefore was not in the wrong to commend that treatiſe, and could not have been hindred from doing it by the errors which they ſaid were to be found there: no body had ſaid ſo. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(1) In the edition of 1712 we do not find the article of Scipio Tetti: but they give it in that of 1725, taken word for word from Mr Bayle's Dictionary. New Observat.

TIMOMACHUS.

The editor ſometimes is miſtaken in his Arithmetical calculations; for inſtance, in the article of Timomachus he ſays, that Cæſar bought of this Painter the picture of Medea and Ajax, for 80 talents, which are equal to the ſum of 48000 crowns: he is miſtaken, 80 talents make a larger ſum in French money; if we believe the learned Jeſuit, who has given us that fine edition of Pliny, where mention is made of Timomachus, and of the purchaſe which Cæſar made, we ſhall find that 80 talents are equal (a) to 19200 livres (1).

(a) Our author's Printers have omitted a cypher here, and have thereby made him contradict himſelf, for 19200 livres are a ſmaller ſum than 48000 crowns. Father Hardouin, (in Plin. tom. 5. pag. 230.) who is the Jeſuit quoted here, pretends, that the 80 talents of Pliny make 192000 livres. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(1) Our author, in copying Mr Bayle here, has very ill expreſſed himſelf. He ſays the picture of Medea and Ajax, as if it were only one picture. Mr Bayle obſerves that this Painter drew an Ajax and a Medea, which were bought, &c. In the laſt edition of Moreri, where they have corrected this article from the Dictionary of Mr Bayle, they have ſaid, that, among other pictures, he drew a Medea and an Ajax, which Cæſar bought, &c. New Observat.

TIRANNION.

This article has been pretty well corrected; but they ſhould not have forgot to mention the number of books which that author wrote. That which he compoſed to prove that the Latin tongue was derived from the Greek, deſerved particularly to be taken notice of in a book of the nature of a Dictionary (1).

(1) In the edition of 1725 the article of Tirannion is corrected from the Dictionary of Mr Bayle, from which our author has taken what he ſays here. But there is a fault committed in it. They ſay that Tyrannion was before called Diocle; it ſhould be as Mr Bayle writes it, Diocles. New Observat.

TIRESIAS.

Several things are wanting in the article of this antient ſoothſayer: by correcting it too much, they have entirely disfigured it. They ſay nothing concerning Necromancy, which Tireſias openly profeſſed, nor concerning the opinion which Lucian aſcribes to him in his treatiſe of Aſtrology (1).

(1) They have likewiſe corrected this article from Mr Bayle's Dictionary: but they have not inſerted the two particulars which our author mentions here, and which he has taken from Mr Bayle. New Observat.

TANAQUIL.

This article is maimed, the merit of that illuſtrious Queen is not known, by what Moreri and his Continuators ſay of her. The ſingle merit of knowing how to make ſtuffs (which is all that the editor ſays of her) would not have been a ſufficient reaſon to tranſmit her name to poſterity, and to engage St Jerom to ſpeak of her ſo advantageouſly, in his book againſt Jovinian. That Father obſerves, that Tarquinius Priſcus is much leſs known than his wife, and that the virtue of that Queen will ever have a place in the memory of men. The only fault ſhe was reproached with, is that of having been too imperious; Juvenal ſeems to charge her with it in his ſixth ſatire: but this reproach is not conſiſtent with the exceſſive praiſes which St Jerom has beſtowed upon her. The editor ſhould have employed his parts in reconciling theſe contradictions (1).

(1) In the laſt edition we find a very good article of this Queen, drawn up from Mr Bayle's Dictionary: but they tell us nothing of the fault which it ſeems ſhe was charged with, of having been too imperious. Let the reader decide whether this reproach, allowing it to be well-grounded, is inconſiſtent with the praiſes of St Jerom; and whether the too imperious humour of a woman, deſtroys the great virtues which ſhe may otherwiſe be poſſeſſed of. New Observat.

TANNERUS.

This article has been omitted, and I think that it ought not to be ſo in a new edition. Tannerus was a very learned Jeſuit in Germany, who has made himſelf famous by his works, and particularly by the anatomy of the Confeſſion of Augſburg, which he publiſhed, and which raiſed terrible adverſaries againſt him (1).

(1) We find the article of Tannerus in the laſt edition. New Observat.

TRUSCHES.

The editors of Moreri ſhould long ago have diſcovered a groſs fault, which they have committed in ſpeaking of Gebhard Truſches, Archbiſhop of Cologn, whom they make immediate ſucceſſor to John Gebhard of Mansfeld, likewiſe Elector of Cologn. Ought they not to know that there were three Electors between Mansfeld and Truſches; in this the laſt editor is leſs excuſable than the preceding ones, ſince if he had taken the trouble to conſult the works of the Critics, he would have diſcovered the error of thoſe who publiſhed the firſt editions, and of late he needed only to have conſulted the Réponſe aux queſtions d'un Provincial, of the celebrated Mr Bayle, where he would have found a particular article, in which that ſubject is very minutely handled. As Truſches is near the end of the Dictionary, which was only finiſhed in the laſt months of the laſt year; and as Mr Bayle's book had appeared in France about the middle of the ſame year, the editor had ſtill time enough to correct that fault, but it coſts people too much trouble to do things with the utmoſt exactneſs. There is a great reſemblance between the conduct of theſe two Electors. Truſches, after the example of Mansfeld, finding the law of celibacy too harſh for him, ſhook off the yoke, and married; but he did not imitate the docility of his predeceſſor, who, being convinced of the inconſiſtency between a wife and an Archbiſhopric, ſubmitted to the laws of the Church, and quitted his dignity with a good grace; whereas Truſches, to the laſt hour of his life, inſiſted upon keeping both. The likeneſs that there is between the adventures of theſe two Prelates, is, no doubt, what obliged Moreri and his Continuators to bring them ſo near one another (1).

---

(1) Mr Bayle had cenſured this fault of Moreri, in his Réponſe aux Queſtions d'un Provincial, Tom. I, Chap. LX, pag. 536. In the edition of 1725, they have made uſe of the particulars which he relates concerning Gebhard Truſches, though they do not cite him at the end of that article. New Observat.

U.

URCEUS.

THE native country of this learned man ſhould not have been the ſubject of a paradox (a): the editor finding Mr Bayle uncertain in this point, and wavering (b) between the different ſentiments of Pierius Valerianus and Geſnerus, heſitated after his example. But the doubt was not difficult to remove, upon this occaſion the authority of Pierius Valerianus ought not to counter-balance that of Geſnerus, becauſe the latter ſpeaks upon the credit and teſtimony of Bartholomæus Bononienſis, who has written the Life of Urceus. Now an Hiſtorian, an author who has laboured ex profeſſo (to make uſe of that phraſe) in writing the life of a man, is much more to be credited than another who has done no more than compiled, and who has rather ſtudied to give us the elogies of ſome learned men, than to give us an exact Hiſtory of their Lives. An author of this laſt kind is not much ſollicitous to go to the bottom of every ſubject; that would carry him too far: he makes it more his buſineſs to collect a vaſt number of materials than to chooſe the beſt; but a particular Hiſtorian, ſuch as Bartholomæus Bononienſis, an author, I ſay, whoſe exactneſs is ſo well known, is much rather to be credited than Pierius Valerianus, who had more at heart the publiſhing his book (de infelicitate Litteratorum) as well as he could, than the giving a well connected and particular Hiſtory of every one of thoſe whom he mentioned in his work. Thus it is much more probable that Antony Urceus was born in Herberia, a little town in the territory of Reggio, ſeven miles from Mantua (c), than in Ravenna, as Pierius Valerianus affirms.

The editor might have given us the prayer which Spizelius puts in the mouth of Urceus (d), juſt as he was ready to expire. It is remarkable, and very proper to convince Atheiſts, if any ſuch there be in the world, that there is no intrepidity which can hold out againſt the terrors of death, and that in theſe laſt moments the ſoul, being ready to break through the bonds of ſin, begins to diſpel the darkneſs which environed it, and at laſt to ſee things ſuch as they are in themſelves. Here follows the prayer.

'Qui cœlum incolis, fer quæſo opem peccatori, noli me, qui tuum in ſinum confugio ſupplicem rejicere. Si unquam peccantem hominem voti reum feciſti, ſic mihi extrema oranti dextram ab alto porrigas oro. - - - - O thou who dwelleſt in heaven, help a ſinner, I beſeech thee, and do not reject me, while I thus fly, in a ſuppliant manner, to thy boſom. If ever thou didſt hear a miſerable ſinner, ſtretch forth, I beſeech thee, thy right hand to me from on high, now that I am making my laſt prayer.'

For

(a) He ſhould have ſaid of a problem. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(b) An author cannot be charged with being uncertain and wavering, unleſs he has confeſſed that he does not know which to chuſe between the two opinions he relates: for to relate two opinions without ſaying, in expreſs words, that he embraces this or that, is not a good proof that he wavers and heſitates, it is only ſhewing that he contents himſelf with being an Hiſtorian, and that he leaves the reader the liberty of chuſing. Mr Bayle has plainly enough intimated which is the preferable ſide of the queſtion, ſince he ſays that Geſnerus, quoting Bartholomæus Bononienſis, makes Herberia the native town of Urceus, and ſince he obſerves that Bartholomæus Bononienſis wrote the Life of Urceus. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(c) He ſhould have ſaid Modena, and the ſame fault muſt be corrected in Mr Bayle's Dictionary. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(d) Note, That Spizelius only relates what he had read in the Life of Urceus, compoſed by Antony Bononienſis. It is the latter who may juſtly be ſaid to have put that prayer in the mouth of Urceus. Mr Bayle's Remark.

For the reſt, never did any learned man more juſtly deſerve a place in Pierius Valerianus's book, than Antony Urceus. The deſpair he ſhewed at the burning of his library and papers, is enough to terrify all thoſe who ſhall read the circumſtances of it. And indeed the reſolution which he took to withdraw for ever from the ſight of men, and to retire into the thickeſt part of the foreſts, could only have been dictated by the greateſt deſpair (1).

---

(1) In Moreri's edition of 1712, they corrected the article of Urceus Codrus from Mr Bayle's Dictionary: but what Mr Bayle ſays of that author is not exact. He had not the life of Codrus; and he was obliged to follow Spizelius and Pierius Valerianus, who have committed ſeveral faults in ſpeaking of Codrus. His life, written firſt in Italian by the brother of Codrus, was tranſlated into Latin, and publiſhed with additions by Bartholomeo Bianchino, Bartholomæus Blanchinus, who had been Codrus's diſciple, and his intimate friend. The authors quoted by Mr Bayle, call him Bartholomæus Bononienſis, taking the name of his country for his true name. This life is prefixed to the works of Codrus. See what Mr de la Monnoye has ſaid concerning Codrus, in his Additions to the Menagiana, Tom. I. pag. 336, and Tom. III. pag. 180, & ſeq. of the Paris edition.

Mr de Saint Hyacinthe has given us a very long extract of Codrus's Works, in his Memoires Litteraires, Tom. I. Art. V. pag. 259, & ſeq.

I ſhall take from that extract almoſt word for word a continued narrative of Codrus's life, which may ſerve as a corrective and Supplement to Mr Bayle's Dictionary; and the new editors of Moreri, may make uſe of it if they pleaſe.

URCEUS (Antony) ſirnamed Codrus, was born at Herberia, a ſmall town in the territory of Reggio, on the 15th of Auguſt 1446. His great-grandfather, a Potter's ſon in the country of Breſcia, was the firſt of the family, who ſettled at Herberia. He was ſo poor that all his labour could ſcarcely ſupply him with bread. He had a ſon called Bartholomew, who got his livelihood for ſome time by fiſhing; afterwards as he was digging in a field, he found a pot filled with a pretty large ſum of money, part of which he laid out in the purchaſe of the field itſelf, and with the reſt, he ſet up a Perfumers ſhop. Cortheſius, ſon to Bartholomew, had by his wife Gherardine, two ſons: Antony, who is the ſubject of this article, and another called Peter-Antony; the birth of the latter, coſt his mother her life. The father died after the eighty-firſt year of his age. He did not neglect the education of his ſons; he provided them with proper maſters: but it is ſaid that our Codrus, while he was ſtill very young, left him and went to Modena, with a deſign to ſtudy under Tribac, a man ſufficiently learned for thoſe days. Some months after, he returned to Herberia, from whence his father ſent him to Ferrara, to ſtudy under Baptiſta Guarini, a famous Profeſſor in the Greek and Latin tongues: he likewiſe attended the Lectures of Lucas Ripa, Profeſſor in Rhetoric, and a man whoſe modeſty was equal to his parts. Codrus made ſuch progreſs under theſe two maſters, that he far ſurpaſſed all his other companions, and thereby confirmed the great hopes, which his relations had conceived of him.

Some ſay that he began to teach children at Ferrara, tho' he was then ſcarce twenty-two years old; but Blanchini doubts of this particular. What we know for certain, is, that he remained five years at Ferrara, and afterwards was called to Forli, to teach the languages, where they gave him more conſiderable appointments, than had been allowed to his predeceſſors. He writes in his letter to Mengo, that he was there for ten years public Profeſſor of the Belles Lettres; and his Hiſtorian ſays (which does not at all contradict this) that for thirteen years Codrus inſtructed the youth there, and in particular Sinibaldo, ſon to the Prince of Forli, at whoſe houſe he had his board and lodging.

About this time an accident happened to him, which had like to have made him diſtracted. He had in the inner part of the palace, a room ſo dark, that without the aſſiſtance of a lamp, he could not ſo much as diſtinguiſh the walls of it at break of day; this obliged him when he had a mind to ſtudy early to make uſe of a lamp, which was very neatly wrought, and upon the top of which he had engraved theſe words, ſtudia lucernam olentia optimè olent. - - - Studies that ſmell of the lamp, have an excellent odour. One day that he went abroad without putting it out, his papers took fire, which ſpread to every thing that was in the room: (for no body perceived it till ſuch time as the flames came out at the windows:) a book which he had compoſed with the title of Paſtor, was burnt with all his papers. It is ſaid that when he heard the firſt news of this fire, he was ſo tranſported with rage, that he run to the palace, and ſtopping at the chamber-door, (for the flames would not allow him to enter) 'O Chriſt, ſaid he, what great crime have I then committed? Whom of thine have I ever offended, that thou ſhouldſt excerciſe ſuch an implacable hatred againſt me?' Afterwards turning towards an image of the Virgin Mary; 'O Virgin, ſaid he, hear what I ſay to thee ſedately, and from the bottom of my heart, if peradventure, at the hour of death, I ſhall come in a ſuppliant manner to implore thy aſſiſtance, do not hear me, I beſeech thee, neither receive me into the number of thine, I am reſolved to take up my reſidence in Hell.' Here follow the very words of his Hiſtorian: Ad primum incendii nuntium, tantam animo imbibiſſe iram, ut exclamans veluti furore quodam concitus ad Regiam uſque præcipiti gradu ire pergeret: pro foribuſque cubiculi adſtans, (neque enim ob incendium late cuncta depopulans ingredi licebat) Quodnam ego, inquit, tantum ſcelus concepi, Chriſte? quem ego tuorum unquam læſi, ut ita inexpiabili in me odio debaccheris? Converſus poſtmodum ad ſimulachrum Virginis, Audi, Virgo, ait, ea quæ tibi mentis compos & ex animo dicam, ſi fortè cùm ad ultimum vitæ finem pervenero, ſupplex accedam ad te opem oratum, neve audias, neve inter tuos accipias, oro; cum in Infernis diis in æternum vitam agere decrevi. Thoſe who were preſent, endeavoured to ſoften his paſſion, but he would hear nothing; he earneſtly begged his friends not to follow him, and, like a mad-man, he ruſhed with a precipitant pace into the middle of an huge foreſt, where he paſſed the remaining part of the day in the deepeſt affliction. He came back to the city in the evening; but finding the gates ſhut, he lay down upon a dunghil, and there waited the return of morning. At break of day, having got into the city, he went and hid himſelf in a Joiner's houſe, where he remained ſix months alone, and without books.

After the death of the Prince of Forli, and of Sinibaldo, his ſon, who died ſix months after him, Codrus ſtayed ten months longer in that city, being uncertain what reſolution to take. Then he went to Bologna, where he was choſen Profeſſor of the Greek and Latin tongues, and of Rhetoric, in the univerſity. He continued there all the reſt of his life, and died in the year 1500, in the monaſtery of St Salvatore, whither he had deſired to be carried. Codrus was at that time, fifty-four years of age.

The day before his death, his diſciples on their knees, and with their eyes bathed in tears, ſo earneſtly beſought him to tell them ſomething worthy of himſelf, that he found himſelf obliged to comply with their requeſt. His Hiſtorian relates the diſcourſe, which, as he ſays, Codrus made upon that occaſion: this diſcourſe is an exhortation to virtue, but it is ſo long and ſo methodical, that there is reaſon to ſuſpect Blanchini of having embelliſhed it. Codrus there betrays marks of an extreme vanity. He ſays to his diſciples, pray to God that you may be like me. The day on which he died, he made another ſhort diſcourſe, wherein he proves that death is the ſupreme good. He complained that he had not been able to write before he died what he had deſigned: 'If I die, ſaid he, for I can perceive that the hour of my death draws near, alas, how many fine things ſhall be buried with me!' Si ego, inquit, moriar, nam prope ineluctabilem legem fati mei adeſſe ſentio, heu quot bona mecum interibunt!

The night of his death, he ſhewed marks of a diſordered imagination; he fancied that he ſaw a perſon of an enormous ſize, with his head ſhaved, his beard reaching to the ground, and flaming eyes, carrying torches in either hand, and having his whole body in a violent agitation: Codrus quaking for fear, ſaid to this ſpectre, Who art thou, that thus alone with the air of a Fury, walkeſt about at the time when every body is aſleep? Come not to me as an enemy, to me, I ſay, who am God's friend. Tell me, what ſeekeſt thou? Whither wouldſt thou go? Having ſaid this, he jumped out of bed to ſhun the ſpectre.

People had always doubted, whether he had any religion while he lived, his Hiſtorian confeſſes, that he gave occaſion to it by his converſation, circa Chriſtianum dogma, ſi non re, ſaltem verbis, plerumque claudicabat. Nevertheleſs, at the hour of death, he himſelf deſired to have the Sacraments adminiſtred to him, and when they brought him the hoſt, he beat his breaſt like a man truly touched with repentance, ſaying, that he was a wretch, who had always been in a ſtate of blindneſs. He likewiſe raiſed his eyes and hands towards heaven, and fervently implored the aſſiſtance of the Holy Virgin: fer quæſo opem miſero peccatori, noli me, qui tuum in ſinum confugio, ſupplicem rejicere. He received the Viaticum with great reſpect, ſhedding tears, and recommending himſelf and his ſoul to God: Deo & ſe animamque ſuam commendans.

After his death, he was carried to the grave by his ſcholars, followed by all the ſtudents of the univerſity. Blanchini cauſed the following words to be engraved upon his tomb, CODRUS ERAM. Codrus had ſo deſired it.

The name of Codrus, was given him in this manner. Being at Forli, the Prince met him on the road, and recommended himſelf to him, the Profeſſor anſwered, ſmiling, 'things go well, Jupiter recommends himſelf to Codrus:' Jupiter Codro ſe commendat. From that time, every body called him Codrus.

Codrus was of a middle ſtature; his perſon was thin and ſlender, his face pale and meagre, his eyes whitiſh, and ſomewhat hollow, he had a Roman noſe, few hairs, and his looks were ſometimes ſilly, but always mild. He had been always ſickly, from his birth to the age of forty-four years. He had a weak ſtomach, and ſometimes laboured under ſo great a decay of his ſpirits, that he remained the whole day in bed, like a dying man, without ſpeaking, or even bemoaning himſelf; but as ſoon as the evening returned, his ſtrength returned alſo. He had a bad memory, which gave occaſion to his often reading his ſpeeches in public, inſtead of pronouncing them by heart; and tho' his pronounciation was diſagreeable, he was nevertheleſs heard with extraordinary pleaſure. He was ſuch a rigorous judge of the works of others, that the old Beroaldus uſed to ſay he knew no Critic of more ſeverity and penetration. He excelled in the art of teaching boys, he knew how to correct them, and make them fond of him, being ever ready to do them all the ſervices that lay in his power: it nevertheleſs ſometimes happened that he chaſtiſed them immoderately; for tho' he had a mild and complaiſant air, he was at the ſame time extremely ſevere and paſſionate. Blanchinus gives us inſtances of it. Another fault he cenſures in him, is, that he never praiſed any Modern. When any body aſked him his opinion concerning the great men of that age, he commonly anſwered, with reſpect to them all, Sibi ſcire videntur, they fancy themſelves to be learned.

No man of his time gave more credit to preſages than he, he believed that there was a particular providence concerned in them. For example, if his boy's lamp went out, 'take care, unhappy youth, take 'care, would he cry to him, ſome great misfortune 'threatens you;' and to preſerve him from it, if any thing was then to be done, Codrus would do it himſelf. But the moſt ſingular thing of all was, that when they told him of any prodigy, inſtead of thinking that it was either a Prince, or a country threatened with ſome misfortune, he only believed that it was a preſage which threatened him or ſome other Profeſſor. His Hiſtorian tells us, that in his orations, he pronounced ſeveral facetious things, which have not been preſerved in writing. We may judge by thoſe which Codrus has left in them, what theſe facetious things were, which he ſtruck out. When ſomebody aſked him upon this ſubject, why he mingled ſo many pleaſantries in his diſcourſes, he anſwered, 'men are ſo 'framed by nature, that jeſters are agreeable, and 'ſtory-tellers entertaining.'

Codrus made his will ſome days before his death. The will begins thus: I ANTONY URCEUS, ſon to Cortheſius Urceus, hope and wiſh for Salvation from the eternal God. . . . . Afterwards he recommends his ſoul to God, and adds that he always believed it immortal, againſt the opinion of Epicurus, and of thoſe, who under the name of Chriſtians, do nothing that is Chriſtian. After certain pious legacies, and ſome other, which he bequeaths to his brothers and ſiſters by a ſecond marriage, he names with a great deal of friendſhip, Peter Antony his brother by the mother's ſide, for his ſole heir and executor.

Concerning his works, Blanchinus ſays that Codrus has not put the laſt hand to them: that he applied himſelf firſt of all to make Greek and Latin verſes: that he added many things to the Greek Vocabulary: that he corrected many other books: that he reſtored ſome other things which had been loſt in the ruins of the Latin tongue. 'Among the moſt conſiderable 'works of this learned man, we find, ſays he, ſeveral 'fine orations, which may be compared to a table of 'diſhes, alike exquiſite and numerous: they are cor'rect, elegant, ſprightly, full of learning, and of a 'profound erudition. I never heard, continues he, 'any thing more agreeable: the diction of them is ſo 'pure, that one would be apt to ſay, that none but 'Codrus ſpeaks Latin: and tho' his orations be ſo 'full of graces, pleaſantries, mirth, and good humour, 'the gravity of the diſcourſe, is nevertheleſs not at all 'weakened by it.' This is the judgment of Blanchinus, in which friendſhip may poſſibly have had a great ſhare. After all, Codrus has paſſed for a learned man, and he deſerves that title better than many others, on whom it has been beſtowed, if it was not vanity that made him ſay, when ſpeaking of the learned, Hic vivimus ambitioſa paupertate omnes, ſumus litterarum pauperes, & volumus videri omnia ſcire. 'We live all in a ſtate of proud poverty, we are poor 'in knowledge, and we would ſeem to know every 'thing.'

Among the friends of Codrus, they reckon the Princes of Forli and of Ferrara, thoſe of Bologna, Politian, Buti, Aldus, Tiberti, Magnani, Garzoni, Guarini and Ripa who had been his maſters, Lambertini, Mimo Roſcio, Laurenzo Roſcio, and Pompeo Foſcarini. Galeazzo Bentivoglio, Apoſtolical Protonotary, had his picture drawn by Francia, a man that wonderfully kept up the reputation which the Francias had acquired by painting.

Among the great number of his ſcholars, they diſtinguiſhed John-Baptiſta Palmari, Cornelius Volta, Camillus Paleoti, Antony Albergatti, Peregrin Blanchini, and Philip Beroaldus the younger, who was alſo Profeſſor at Bologna.

The works of Codrus were printed for the firſt time at Bologn in the year 1502, by John Antony Platonides, in folio. They conſiſt of fifteen Orations; ten Letters; two books of Sylvæ; with ſome Odes to the number of twenty-two; two Satires; one Eclogue; ninety-ſix Epigrams; and one Song for Martinmas-day. But among the pieces of Codrus, we likewiſe find in this edition a preface written by Philip Beroaldus the younger, and inſcribed to Antony Galeazzo Bentivoglio, where we are informed that it is to the latter we owe the collection of Codrus's works, of which ſeveral people were endeavouring to take the honour. We likewiſe find there a letter of Boroaldus; ſeven Poems of Virgilius Portus; a Letter and an Epigram written by a learned man of Toulouſe called John Pin, and an Epitaph which he made for Codrus; an Epiſtle of Blanchinus; and the Life of Codrus, written by the ſame Blanchinus. The works of Codrus, together with the pieces juſt mentioned, were reprinted at Venice in the year 1506, in folio: at Paris, in the year 1515, in 4to; and at Baſil, in the year 1540, likewiſe in 4to.

We have ſeen that Blanchinus, ſpeaking of Codrus's works, ſays 'that he reſtored ſome things 'which had been loſt in the ruins of the Latin 'tongue:' he means chiefly the Aulularia of Plautus, which Codrus reſtored by ſupplying the end, which was loſt. This Supplement contains 122 verſes. There is an edition of that Comedy, printed at Leipſic in 1513, in folio, with the following title: Plauti lepidiſſimi Poetæ Aulularia, ab Antonio Codro Urceo, utriuſque Linguæ doctiſſimo, priſtinæ formæ diligenter reſtituta; illius enim finis antea deſiderabatur.

Codrus had written a book of antiquities, which is loſt; and another of fables, which death hindered him from finiſhing. He likewiſe deſigned to write, as well in Greek as in Latin, a book of ſecrets and hidden things.

Blanchinus

Blanchinus ſays that ſeveral perſons made fine epitaphs upon him, but particularly Hermico Caiado, a Portugueſe Poet, and Philip Beroaldus the younger. They have not publiſhed them in the works of Codrus, though they have inſerted thoſe which Virgilius Portus made upon him: I ſhall quote one of them:

Codrus eram, natale ſolum Herberia, ſed quæ
Me ſepelit Graium dixit & Auſonium.

'I was Codrus, Herberia is my native place; but 'that where I lie buried ſays that I was both a Grecian and a Roman.' New Observat.

W.

WESTPHALUS.

IT is true that the editor has corrected the article of John Weſtphalus, who is an imaginary Divine, to whom Moreri aſcribes abominable errors. But he has done more than was required at his hands, for it was not demanded of him that he ſhould ſuppreſs the whole article, but only that he ſhould take from John Weſtphalus the title of Divine, which certainly was not his due, and reſtore to him that of Printer, which belongs to him. This John Weſtphalus, or John de Weſtphalia, was not ſuch an obſcure perſon but that he deſerved a place in the Dictionary. He was the firſt Printer in the Low-Countries; he ſettled at Louvain in the year 1475, and Ariſtotle's Ethics was the firſt book (a) that he printed (1).

(a) This is the opinion of Gabriel Naudé, but the Sieur de la Caille, in his Hiſtory of Printing, pag. 30, affirms, that as early as the year 1473, John de Weſtphalia printed at Louvain ſeveral books, ſuch as Petr. Creſcentius de omnibus Agriculturæ partibus, &c. in folio. Mr Bayle's Remark.

(1) Here again our author does no more than copy Mr Bayle, who has made it appear that the John Weſtphalus of Moreri, a Lutheran Heretic, &c. is an imaginary perſon. It is true, adds Mr Bayle, there was a John de WESTPHALIA; but this was a Printer who ſettled at Louvain in the year 1475; and for that he quotes Gabriel Naudé. This Printer called himſelf ſometimes Johannes de Weſtphalia, ſometimes Johannes Weſtfalia Paderbornenſis, ſometimes Johannes de Paderborn in Weſtphalia, and ſometimes Johannes Padelboern de Weſtphalia. He printed not only at Louvain, but likewiſe at Aloſt and Nimeguen. In the year 1475 he entered into partnerſhip with Theodoric Martini of Aloſt. He put out in the year 1475 Juſtiniani Inſtitutiones cum Gloſſa, in folio, and added to it this kind of enigmatical advertiſement, according to the cuſtom of the firſt Printers: Inſtitutionum præſens opus inſigne . . . Johannes de Paderborne in Weſtfaliâ almâ in univerſitate Lovanienſi reſidens non fluviali calamo ſed Arte quâdam characteriſandi moderniſſimâ ſuo proprio ſigno conſignando feliciter conſummavit Anno incarnationis Dominicæ MCCCC LXXV. menſis Novembris die XXI, &c. Twenty years after he printed Aur. Auguſtinus in libr. de Trinitate, Lovanii per Johannem Padelboern de Weſtphalia, folio. At the end of the book we find this:

Numine ſancte tuo Pater ô tueare Johannem
Padelborn: præſens qui tibi preſſit opus.

Lovanii per Johannem Padelboern de Weſtphaliâ in profeſto nativitatis Chriſti finiente anno nonageſimo quinto.

Guard holy Father by thy pow'r divine
John Padelborn, a Printer here of thine.

See Mr Mattaire's Annales Typographici, Tom. I. New Observat.

X.

XENOPHANES.

THE article of this Philoſopher is very deficient: if we were to judge of his doctrine by what is ſaid of it in the new edition of the Hiſtorical Dictionary, and by what Diogenes Laërtius ſays of it in the Life of the Philoſophers, and Cicero in his book de natura Deorum, one would be tempted to think that they were ſpeaking of two different perſons. The editor only tells us that he believed there were four elements, and an infinite number of worlds. If his whole doctrine had been reduced to theſe two principal heads, would it have appeared ſo pernicious to ſome learned men? and would it have given them room to infer that Spinoza had taken the foundation of his impious ſyſtem from this antient Philoſopher? In ſhort, would there be any thing more in this doctrine than what we find contained in the ingenious works of the celebrated Mr Huygens and Mr de Fontenelle. But Xenophanes had other principles of a very different nature nature; he expreſsly affirmed that the underſtanding is God, and that every thing which is infinite is God. Euſebius Cæſarienſis charges him with having taught that nature is eternal à priori, and à poſteriori, and that ſhe is always like to herſelf. If we believe the conjecture of a learned Critic, this Philoſopher pretended that the divine underſtanding endeavoured to give to all creatures a ſtate of perfection; but that having met with invincible obſtacles in matter or body, he could not always execute his deſigns; and conſequently was forced, on certain occaſions, to produce bad things: and this, without doubt, is the deteſtable ſource from which Manes took the doctrine of his two principles, the one the author of all good, and the other that of all evil. I do not ſay but that this principle, when conſidered in one particular light, is ſuſceptible of a favourable interpretation; for if this Philoſopher meant that the ſweets of life do not equal the bitters which accompany it, we ſhall eaſily judge that he was not much in the wrong, and that his moral ſeldom fails to be true; and I am of opinion it was from Xenophanes that the famous Natural Hiſtorian, who appeared ſeveral ages after him, borrowed this thought, when he ſaid in the beginning of his ſeventh book, that the good things which nature meaſures out to us, are mixed with ſo many evils, that he does not know ſi parens melior homini an triſtior noverca fuerit. - - - whether nature is not rather a cruel ſtepmother, than an indulgent parent, to mankind (1).

THESE are the Remarks which I have made upon the laſt edition of Moreri; I might have enlarged their number, but I was willing before-hand to know how the public would reliſh them: if they are approved of, and be eſteemed uſeful towards a new edition, I may poſſibly give the ſequel of them.

I muſt not however conclude without mentioning the conſiderable additions that we find in the new edition of 1704. It contains ſeveral articles that were not in the former ones; as Diſſertations, Genealogies, and other important Remarks. For example, we find in the firſt volume a very curious Diſſertation upon the title of Royal Highneſs, which has been given to ſo many Princes of late years. The article which concerns Mr de Sallo (the father and author of all the literary journals) has been corrected with a great deal of exactneſs (a). The article of Duranti is improved by a curious Diſſertation upon the book de ritibus, &c. It is the buſineſs of Father Merſenne (b), or his followers to examine the worth of it.

The article of the Abbey of la Trappe has been added: the genealogies are reduced to a very convenient and intelligible method. That of Saulz-Tavanes, it is true, wants reviſing, for the two branches of that family are not well enough diſtinguiſhed, and we do not know who was father to the laſt Count de Tavanes, who married Madam d'Agueſſau. I know that he was ſon to James de Saux, and Loüiſa-Henrietta Poitiers-Trêmes, whereas they make the latter to have been the father of the Marquis de Tavanes, who married N . . . . de Bourbon Buſſet, deſcended from a natural ſon of the Cardinal Charles de Bourbon (1).

---

(1) All this is taken, whether right or wrong, from Mr Bayle's Dictionary. In the edition of 1725, after theſe words, he believed there were four elements, and an infinite number of worlds, they have added, he believed that the moon was inhabited, and had ſeveral other impious principles, as may be ſeen in Mr Bayle. But why ſhould they rank among the impious principles of Xenophanes his having believed that the moon is inhabited; an opinion, which, on the contrary, does him a great deal of honour, as Mr Bayle has obſerved. NEW OBSERVAT.

(a) I am nevertheleſs told that an Arithmetical error, which has paſſed from edition to edition, is not corrected in that of 1704, no more than it was in that of 1699. This error conſiſts in ſaying that Mr de Sallo, who was born in 1626, died in 1669, aged forty-nine years. It plainly appears from theſe years of his birth and death that he lived no more than forty-three years (1). I wiſh the editor had confuted a lie which traduces Mr de Sallo in a cruel manner, and which, having at firſt been publiſhed by the Carthuſian Friar, who diſguiſed himſelf under the name of Vigneul Marville, has already appeared in a Latin book printed in Germany, and will, no doubt, in a little time paſs from book to book, and from country to country, if a ſtop be not put to the unlucky ſpreading of it. For this reaſon I affirm here, upon the authority of the Abbot Gallois, that nothing is more falſe than the following paſſage of Vigneul Marville, (tom. i. des Melanges, pag. 304.) that Mr Sallo died in the year 1665, of a diſtemper to which the children of the Muſes are very little ſubject, and for which there is no remedy either in Hippocrates or Galen, for he died of grief for having loſt at play 100000 crowns, that is to ſay, his whole eſtate. It is certain that he died in 1669, and that gaming did not in the leaſt contribute towards it. The book of a learned German (Struvius) where this paſſage of Vigneul Marville has been quoted, pag. 79, was printed at Iëna in the year 1704, with the title of Introductio ad notitiam rei litterariæ & uſum Bibliothecarum. We may juſtly wonder, that though Mr de Sallo left both children and friends, yet no body has contradicted a public lie which traduces him in ſuch a cruel manner, and that the authors of the Journal des Sçavans, who have a greater intereſt than others in his glory, and who have not ſpared Vigneul Marville upon other occaſions, have nevertheleſs ſpared him upon this. There is in the new letters of Mr Bourſault, pag. 357, of the Dutch edition of 1698, a thing ſo ſingular, and ſo much to the honour of Mr de Sallo that they will do well to adorn his article with it in the next edition of Moreri. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) This fault continued in the editions of 1707, 1712, and 1718, and was only corrected in that of 1725. NEW OBSERVAT.

(b) He ſhonld have ſaid Martenne. He is a Benedictine Monk of the congregation of St Maur. MR BAYLE'S REMARK.

(1) This is corrected in the laſt edition. NEW OBSERVAT.

The genealogy of Savoy has been very well cleared up, and ſeveral others have been added, ſuch as thoſe of Rouſſelet-Chateau-Renauld, of Roiſin, of Marca or la Marque, of Servient; of Tonnelier-Breteüil; of Tournebu; of Hoſtung-la Baume; of Tournemine, the ſame family from which the learned Jeſuit Tournemine is deſcended; of Conſtantin-Tourville; of Valbelle; of Vincent de Mauleon; of Saignez-d'Auſtraud de Cauſans; of Frezeau la Frezeliere, and Fouquet.

That of Phelipeaux has been corrected. That of Bignon has been put in its proper order.

In the genealogy of Voyer they ſhould correct the word Revau, which is wrong ſpelt, it ought to be Rivau (1).

---

(1) This is alſo corrected in the laſt edition. NEW OBSERVAT.

A
DISSERTATION
CONCERNING THE BOOK OF STEPHANUS JUNIUS BRUTUS,
Printed in the year 1579.

IT is univerſally agreed, that he who compoſed under this name the book intituled, Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos, ſive de Principis in Populum, Populique in Principem legitima Poteſtate, was not called ſo; but there are ſtill different opinions concerning his true name. The moſt virulent of all the libels that were ſent us from France by the poſt, in the year 1689, on account of the Revolution of England [A], aſcribes Junius Brutus's book to Mr du Pleſſis Mornai: which is ſomewhat ſurpriſing; for after the proofs that the author of another libel (a), has taken from ſeveral very common writings, no body ought to be ignorant, that Hubert Languet and Junius Brutus are the ſame perſon. Here follow ſome miſtakes concerning this famous book.

I. Deckher's error.

Mr Deckher (b) Advocate in the Imperial Chamber of Spire, pretends, that if the author had called himſelf Lucius Junius Brutus, he had taken a name more proper, and better founded on Livy's Hiſtory, than that of Stephanus Junius Brutus, which he took in the Hanaw edition of the year MDVC; and he obſerves that Boeclerus (c) has cited him under the name of Lucius Junius Brutus. But firſt, this ſhews he was ignorant that the Prænomen Stephanus had appeared in the preceding editions, and even in the firſt, which is pretended to have been made at Edinburgh in the year 1579. The French verſion printed in the year 1581, in 8vo, bears alſo the name of Stephen Junius Brutus. Secondly, why muſt the author have had more regard to Brutus, who delivered Rome from Tarquin's tyranny, than to Brutus, who delivered it from Cæſar's? If there was no reaſon for his preferring one of them before the other, there was no reaſon for his calling himſelf Lucius rather than Marcus; he might therefore, as well have taken the Prænomen Stephen, as any other. Let no man ſay, that the manner of Marcus Brutus's reſiſting the tyrant, is not as agreeable as that of the other Brutus to the author's principles; nor let it be added in confirmation of this, that he allows perſons in any office, as Lucius Junius Brutus, who was tribune of the Celeres, to excite the people to take up arms, but that he denies that privilege to private perſons, and much more, that of aſſaſſinating the tyrant, except in caſe of a Divine Inſpiration, in which he will even have a man to examine himſelf carefully. Let no one uſe theſe arguments, I ſay; for the author has clearly declared (d), that Brutus and Caſſius are in the caſe of thoſe murderers of tyrants, to whom the laws promiſe rewards, and erect ſtatues. He has ranked Cæſar in the number of thoſe uſurpers, againſt whom it is lawful for any man to conſpire. And ſo Mr Deckher's criticiſm is falſe, and little better than the pitiful and inſipid jeſt of ſome people, who have ſaid, that Hubert Languet diſguiſed himſelf, amongſt other names, under that of Stephen, not with reſpect to that Stephen, who aſſaſſinated the Emperor Domitian, to whom Apollonius Tyanæus cryed out at three

(a) Important Advice to the Refugees.

(b) De Scriptis Adeſpotis, pag. 89, Edit. Amſtel. 1686.

(c) In Grotium de Jure Belli & Pacis, lib. i, cap. iv, pag. 271.

(d) See his Queſtion III, pag. 198, & 211.

[A] The moſt virulent of all libels ... concerning the Revolution of England.] It is intituled The new Abſalom, &c. and it is aſcribed to Mr Arnauld: this opinion is printed in a book, called, The Hiſtory of the troubles cauſed by Mr Arnauld after his death; or Mr Santeuil's quarrel with the Jeſuits (1). This is found at page 29. If the author of this Hiſtory is not miſtaken as to the author of the libel, he is ſo at leaſt, as to the place of the impreſſion; for it is falſe that Mr Arnauld publiſhed this book in Holland. Nay, I do not think he was there at that time. The Hiſtorical and Political Mercury of the year 1696, has occaſioned the diſcovery of the author of this libel, ſpeaking of this Controverſy of Mr Santeuil.

(1) It was printed at Paris, in the year 1696; but neither the place of the impreſſion, nor the name of the Printer was put to it.

three hundred leagues diſtance, cheer up, ſtrike the villain (e) ; but with reſpect to St Stephen, the firſt martyr of the Goſpel, and the firſt victim of Chriſtian patience.

II.
Barclay's error.

But Deckher's criticiſm is nevertheleſs more tolerable, than the argument uſed by William Barclay (f), to prove Stephanus Junius Brutus's book to be pſeudonymous, and that the author only choſe the name of Brutus, to ſet out with greater diſtinction, on the foot of deliverer of the people; becauſe, ſays he, it is not probable, that the poſterity of him, who expelled Tarquin, continued to our age, ſince one of the beſt Hiſtorians affirms *, that he died the laſt of his family, in the war againſt the Veientes. Certainly, this is racking one's brain to no purpoſe: for it could never have entered into the head of any reader, that this writer might be deſcended in a right line from Junius Brutus, who aboliſhed the Roman monarchy; and I do not think, that in reading the books of modern authors, whoſe true names are Brutus, any one will be ſo ſilly as to believe they are deſcended from the family of the ancient Brutus's.

III.
Hotman thought to be the author of the book.

The error of thoſe, who father the book on Francis Hotman, is nothing near ſo great as the foregoing (g). There are ſtill ſome learned men, who aſcribe it to him; ſuch as Mr Conſtant (h), a famous miniſter and profeſſor at Lauſanne, in his abridgment of Politics (i).

IV.
The author of the News from the Republic of Learning cenſured.

He who wrote the three firſt years of the News from the Republic of Letters, having ſaid by the way (k), that Hotman was thought to be concealed under the name of Junius Brutus, gave ſome time after (l), for his voucher, a book printed at Paris in the year 1589, intituled, A Treatiſe concerning the power of Kings againſt the King of Navarre. But if he had been well acquainted with d'Aubigné's Hiſtory, he might have likewiſe informed us, both that Hotman was the reputed author of Junius Brutus's book, and that it was aſcribed to him without any foundation. I am going to ſhew what d'Aubigné has ſaid of it: I begin with an author, who has been very curious in theſe ſorts of inquiries (m); his words are theſe: 'Mr Daillé told me, he heard that the author 'of the book, intituled, Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos, under the name of Stephanus Junius 'Brutus, was Hubert Languet, a learned man, and a great Politician. Which I have 'had ſince confirmed by Mr Legoux of Dijon, who added, that Mr de la Mare, Coun'ſellor of the ſame town, had obſerved this in making Hubert Languet's elogy. Others 'attribute this book to Mr du Pleſſis, to whom I could as readily aſcribe it on this te'ſtimony of d'Aubigné †: There came out another book, called Junius Brutus, or a de'fence againſt tyrants, written by a learned gentleman of this kingdom, famous for many 'excellent books, and ſtill living with great figure. In another place of his Hiſtory ‡, 'd'Aubigné ſays, that this gentleman confeſſed to him, that he was the author of it.' There was juſt reaſon upon ſuch paſſages to atribute the book to Mr du Pleſſis, as readily as to Hubert Languet. But if this author had known d'Aubigné's ſecond edition, he could not have been in ſuſpence; for he would have ſeen that after the year 1616, the date of the firſt edition, d'Aubigné had diſcovered the whole myſtery. Let us hear then what he ſays in the ſecond edition, which is of the year 1626. '(n) Many pens in all kinds of writing were imployed both on account of religion 'and government. The firſt ſubject produced a great many books; as for the ſecond, 'there was one in vogue, of which I will take a particular notice, called A 'Defence againſt Tyrants: in this, it was fully examined how far obedience to 'Kings extends, for what cauſes, and by what means, people may take up arms, and to 'whom it belongs to authorize them; whether foreigners may be called in; whether 'they may lawfully give aſſiſtance. Hotman was a long time wrongfully ſuſpected to 'be the author of it; but afterwards a French gentleman, who is living when I write, 'confeſſed to me, that he was the author of it. But it appeared at laſt that he was 'the editor, it having been depoſited with him by Hubert Languet, of Franche 'Comté (o), agent in France for the Duke of Saxony.' In another place of his Hiſtory (p), he repeats the ſame thing in theſe words: There appeared another book which was intituled, Junius Brutus, or A Defence againſt Tyrants, owned by one of the learned gentlemen of this kingdom, celebrated for many excellent books, and living ſtill in great repute; treating the queſtions concerning the bounds of our obedience to Kings; in what caſes it is lawful to take up arms againſt them; who ought to attempt it; whether neighbouring foreigners may juſtly give their aſſiſtance; in what manner all things ought to be managed: all this he handles like a great Lawyer, and a great Divine. Since that, Hubert Languet (q) is known to be the true author of it.

Colomie's cited, and a reflexion upon the citation.

V.
Three obſervations on d'Aubigné.

I ſhall make three obſervations upon theſe two paſſages of d'Aubigné.

The firſt is, that I do not believe the book in queſtion was ever called Junius Brutus, and ſo this Hiſtorian muſt have taken the name of the author for the title of the work; which, at moſt, is but a little deviation from rigorous exactneſs. Not but at bottom, the book might have been intituled, Junius Brutus, and might be cited ſo. But this is not the matter in hand; we know well enough that a proper name has often been the title of a book, and that there is a tract of Cicero intituled Brutus; we know likewiſe that cuſtom gives great privileges for the abridging of a citation. This is not therefore the matter in queſtion. The queſtion is, Whether the book we ſpeak of had the title which d'Aubigné and Boëclerus give it.

(e) Xiphilin. in Domit. ſub fin.

(f) Lib. iii. contra Monarchomachos, cap. i, pag. m. 311. Vide etiam, p. 189.

* Dionyſ. Halicarn. lib. v.

(g) See the remark [H], of the article HOTMAN.

(h) He is known by many good Latin and French books, and lately by a ſyſtem of Morality in Latin.

(i) At p. 300, of the Frankfort edition 1687.

(k) In the News for Sept. 1684, Art. VI, pag. m. 697.

(l) See a Latin letter printed at the end of the treatiſe of Deckherus, de Script. Adeſp. p. 360, edit. Amſt. 1686.

(m) Colomiés, in his Opuſcula, pag. 130, Utrecht edition 1669, the firſt edition is of Paris 1668.

† Tom. ii, lib. ii, cap. ii, pag. 108.

‡ Tom. i, lib. ii, cap. xv, pag. 91.

(n) D'Aubigné, Tom. i, lib. ii, cap. xvii, p. 124.

(o) D'Aubigné is miſtaken, Languet was of Viteaux in the duchy of Burgundy.

(p) Tom. ii, lib. ii, cap. ii, pag. 670.

(q) D'Aubigné has it Humbert Languet, which is an error of the preſs.

My IId obſervation is ſomewhat more conſiderable. D'Aubigné was much in the wrong, to leave in his ſecond edition what he had ſaid in the firſt, to denote Mr du Pleſſis Mornai; for ſince he afterwards underſtood, that Hubert Languet was the true author of the book, and that du Mornai only publiſhed it, he ſhould no longer have affirmed, that du Mornai had confeſſed to him, he was the author, and that the book was owned by du Mornai. This was repreſenting Mr du Pleſſis Mornai to all Europe as a liar, who adorned himſelf with borrowed plumes. But this will never appear true to thoſe who know his virtue, and the glory he acquired. On the other hand, there is no probability that d'Aubigné would have inſerted ſuch a fact in his Hiſtory, if he had not firmly believed that he remembered du Pleſſis, who was ſtill alive, had ſpoken to him in thoſe terms. But what I am going to ſay ſeems to me the unriddling of the myſtery. Mr du Pleſſis had owned this work in expreſſions which are applicable both to the writer of a book, and to the editor of it; as for inſtance, that he had obliged the public with the book of Junius Brutus; that it was to him the public was indebted for that preſent; and d'Aubigné, not weighing well thoſe expreſſions determined them to the particular ſenſe of being the author of the book. Whilſt he had no other information, it was a ſmall fault to have limited to a definite ſenſe, what was capable of another; but having at laſt publiſhed the truth of the matter, he could not leave his text as it was at firſt, without making du Pleſſis Mornai paſs for a lying plagiary. Such a negligence in not recalling his memory, which probably might have ſhewn him, that this gentleman expreſſed himſelf no otherwiſe than as the editor of a book would have done, is much leſs pardonable, than the negligence we have obſerved elſewhere in the makers of additions (r).

(r) See the article ACIDALIUS, remark [G]; and the ſecond article MALDONAT, remark [I], at the end.

III. D'Aubigné ſeems to fall into a ſtrange anachroniſm by the two epochs he has fixed for Junius Brutus's book. By his firſt paſſage he will have it, that it came out before the conſpiracy of Amboiſe, and that it was one of the books which encouraged the Proteſtants; and by the other, that it appeared the year after the maſſacre of St Bartholomew's-day. Which ever of theſe two dates we chooſe, no credit can be given to the account I ſhall extract hereafter from Simon Goulart's Funeral Oration, which is the moſt authentic piece we have for the hiſtorical ſyſtem of Junius Brutus's book. This is not the only fault d'Aubigné falls into, with reſpect to the time and the ſubject of the libels of that age.

VI.
Reflexions upon Placcius.

Mr Placcius, Profeſſor at Hamburgh, has inſerted in his book concerning anonymous and pſeudonymous writers, Mr Colomiés's paſſage, without adding the amendment of d'Aubigné's ſecond edition. He recites alſo a paſſage of Boëclerus, which I find much altered in my edition (s), though there is no notice given in the title-page that it differs from the firſt; but as to the ſubſtance of what Mr Placcius relates, I find it entire in my edition, viz. 1. That Grotius in his Apology againſt Rivetus, aſcribes Junius Brutus's book to du Pleſſis Mornai: 2. That, nevertheleſs, ſome pages of this book were ſeen at Lauſanne, written with Languet's own hand, and as an author writes [B]. He means, doubtleſs, that there were ſeen in it references and raſures, or ſuch other characters as diſtinguiſh the original of an author from the tranſcripts. However, by that citation of Placcius it does not appear, that Boëclerus was fully certain that Languet compoſed the book; and he ſeems leſs ſo in another work cited by the ſame Placcius (t): but in his Political Diſſertations, printed after his death (u) by Mr Obrecht, his ſon-in-law, he expreſſes no uncertainty; but poſitively aſcribes this work to Hubert Languet (x).

(s) Printed Gieſſæ Haſſorum 1687.

(t) It is his Muſæum, where he ſays, qui ſe Bruti nomine diſſimulat, ſive Mornæus is eſt, ſive Hubertus Languetus.

(u) At Straſbourg in 1674, with his Inſtitutiones Politicæ.

(x) See the IId Diſſertation, p. 322, and the XVIth, p. 209.

VII.
Du Pleſſis Mornai accuſed by Gro-

The place where Grotius affirms that Junius Brutus's book was written by Mornai, is at the ninety-firſt page of his laſt book againſt Rivetus. It is a poſthumous piece, printed in the year 1645, with the title of Rivetiani Apologetici pro Schiſmate contra

THE firſt edition of Junius Brutus. An examination of what Voëtius ſays of it.

[B] Some pages of this book were ſeen at Lauſanne, written with Languet's own hand, and as an author writes.] The firſt edition of it might have been printed at Lauſanne. Rivetus above-cited certifies it was not done in France: no body believes the title importing that it was at Edinburgh. Barclay, according to Voëtius (2), ſays, in Præfat. libri de regno, &c. that he uſed a copy printed at Edinburgh in the year 1579, but this he takes to be a trick of the Bookſeller. I do not find that paſſage in my edition of Barclay, which is of Hanaw in 1617, wherein there is not even a preface: but I have lately found it in the Paris edition 1600, in 4to, which contains a preface of four pages. Beſides what Boëclerus ſays here of ſome pages of the original ſeen at Lauſanne, Deckher, page 90, affirms, he heard, in the year 1667, that the original was found in the ſame town. I do not know why Voëtius conjectured, that the firſt edition of this book was in the year 1587. I confeſs that Draudius's catalogues make nothing againſt his conjecture, though they ſay, that Junius Brutus's book was printed at Edinburgh in 1580; for as they have been brought down to the year 1610; in the edition cited by Voëtius (3), Junius Brutus's might have been ſo mentioned, whether it was printed the firſt time in 1587, with the antedate of 1580, or whether the firſt edition was of 1580, without any antedate. But what will he ſay againſt the Epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque, printed in 1583, where Junius Brutus is found as printed at Edinburgh in 8vo in 1580 (4)? What will he ſay of Francis du Verdier's Bibliotheque, printed in 1585, where (5) we find the French tranſlation of this book, as printed in 8vo by Francis Stephens in 1581? Theſe are convincing proofs, that if the firſt edition be not of the year 1579, as the title imports, yet, at leaſt, it preceded the year 1587 by ſome years.

(2) Voët. Diſp. Tom. iv, pag. 233.

(3) According to Voëtius, Draudius, pag. 913, ſays, Stephani Junii Vindiciæ contra tyrannos, &c. Edembergæ 80 & 81. Latinè & Gall. Draudius's edition, which I uſe, is of 1625. It mentions this book four times, viz. pag. 809, (where the Edinburgh edition 1579, and the Straſbourg in 12mo, are mentioned,) pag. 1235, where the edition of Amſterdam 1611 is mentioned: pag. 1275, where the Straſbourg edition is again mentioned; and p. 84, of the French books, where we find the title of the tranſlation as it is in Du Verdier.

(4) Pag. 766, and thereby it appears that Voëtius ought not to take any advantage of Du Verdier's not mentioning Junius Brutus in the Supplement to this Epitome, ſince this Supplement concerns only the omiſſions of the Epitome.

(5) Pag. 300.

tius of being Junius Brutus. How juſtified by Rivetus.

Votum Pacis facti, Diſcuſſio. In a former writing, I mean, in his Appendix de Antichriſto, he would not name Mornai. Boucher's execrable book, ſays he (y), concerning the depoſition of Henry III, King of France, was taken, both as to the arguments and expreſſions, not from Mariana, or Santarel, but from Junius Brutus, (I know very well who he is; but let him be concealed, ſince he deſires it), and ſome other learned men of the ſame ſect. Liber flagitioſiſſimus Boucherii de abdicatione Henrici III Galliarum regis non argumentis tantum ſed & verbis deſumtus eſt, non ex Mariana aut Santarello, ſed ex Junio Bruto (quis is ſit ſat ſcio, ſed quia latere voluit, lateat) & ex viris doctis quidem at factionis ejuſdem. In a letter (z) which he wrote from Paris on the twenty-eighth of February 1643, he does not uſe that reſerve. I think I have written, ſays he, that the author of Junius Brutus is Philip de Mornai, and that Lewis Villiers was he who got it printed; I repeat it again, becauſe Mareſius ſays that he is an unknown author: the thing however is known to a great many. Puto ſcripſiſſe me antehac auctorem Junii Bruti eſſe Philippum Mornæum Pleſſiacum, editorem Ludovicum Villerium, Loiſelerium. Repeto id quia ignotum eſſe ſcriptorem dicit Mareſius, cùm plurimis ea res nota ſit: & idem Pleſſiacus teſtamento generos & amicos ſuos hortatus ſit, arma ut ſumerent, ſi Edicta à Rege non ſervarentur (aa). In another letter (bb) he ſpeaks of one Ruſdorf, a German author, who has cited Junius Brutus under the name of Mornai. The Printers have blundered here; for inſtead of Ruſdorfius in Defenſione cauſæ Palatinæ, they have put cauſæ politicæ.

It is certain that Mareſius, in his anſwer to Grotius's Appendix in 1642, ſtill maintained that Junius Brutus was an unknown and obſcure perſon, whoſe work none of the Reformed would maintain, nor had ever praiſed or approved. He went ſo far as to ſay, that perhaps it was a Papiſt, as King James had ſuſpected, who had publiſhed this work under the diſguiſe of a Proteſtant, in order to render the Proteſtant religion odious. Quid quæſo ille ipſe Junius Brutus quem nobis exprobrat (homo anonymus, obſcurus, ignotus, cujus ſcriptum privata emiſſum autoritate Reformatorum nemo tueri velit (cc);) ..... Junius Brutus quiſquis ille ſit (dd) .... Nobis multo crimini dandum quod quæ ſecus quàm par eſſet ille (Junius Brutus) ſcripſerat, homo à nemine noſtrûm nec laudatus, nec approbatus, Boucherius ex malis peſſima fecerit & in virus tranſmutârit (ee) .... Qui verò poſſet conferri Junius Brutus, qui ſine Autoris nomine, ſine ulla approbatione prodiit, forte etiam confictus ab aliquo Pontificio in odium Reformatorum, ut ſuſpicabatur Rex Jacobus, cum hoc Santarelli Tractatu, &c (ff).

Rivetus, anſwering Grotius's poſthumous book, ſays indeed, that no proofs can be given of what is advanced againſt Mr du Pleſſis; but that in caſe he was the author of Junius Brutus, ſome regard muſt be had to his age, and the circumſtances of time, that is, he ought to be excuſed on account of his youth, and the horrible perſecutions the Proteſtants ſuffered at that time (gg). From whence it follows, that if Rivetus does not confeſs that Junius Brutus is the fictitious name of Mr du Pleſſis Mornai, he does not deny it neither: which ſhews that he was more inclined to believe it than not. The only thing he clearly affirms, is, that the book was printed out of the kingdom, during the heat of perſecutions and maſſacres, when Mr du Pleſſis was very young. But this plainly ſhews that Rivetus was not initiated into the myſtery, and that he knew little better than d'Aubigné the true date of the book. It is ſurpriſing that neither Grotius, whom hardly any thing eſcaped in the Republic of Letters, nor Rivetus, nor Mareſius, whoſe reading was very extenſive, ſhould know nothing either of what d'Aubigné had ſaid concerning Junius Brutus, in his ſecond edition in 1626, or of Simon Goulart's Funeral Oration, ſpoken and printed at Geneva, in the year 1628. The Learned are a ſtrange ſort of people, they run after remote and fleeting things, and neglect what they have as it were under their very noſes (hh). It is much like a hunter,

Tranſvolat in medio poſita & fugientia captat (ii).

As a huntſman loves to chaſe his prey
But would not take it if it lay in 's way. CREECH.

VIII. The diſcovery made by Goulart's Funeral Oration.

At the death of Simon Goulart, the ſeals were opened for a full revelation of the myſtery. Theodorus Tronchin (kk), Divinity-Profeſſor, making this Miniſter's Funeral Oration declared, that his memory and reading were almoſt infinite; and that people reſorted to him as to an oracle, to know the truth of what they deſired to know. A proof of which is, that King Henry III being exceedingly deſirous to know the author, who was concealed under the fictitious name of Junius Brutus, and all the means he uſed for this purpoſe having failed him, reſolved, at laſt, to effect it by a ſhorter way, as he ſuppoſed; which was to apply to Simon Goulart. But he, that he might not expoſe thoſe who were concerned in it, was ſilent at that time; though he had ſeen the original of the author, and knew it was compoſed by Hubert Languet, and that du Pleſſis Mornai having got the manuſcript into his hands after the author's death, cauſed it to be printed by Thomas Guarin.

By this it clearly appears, 1. That this book, at ſooneſt, was not printed till the end of the year 1581, ſince Languet died but on the firſt of October of that year.

2. That

(y) Grot. Append. de Antichr. pag. 59, Edit. in 12mo, Amſt. 1641.

(z) It is the DCXLIſt of the ſecond part.

(aa) Grot. Epiſt. pag. 949.

(bb) The DCXLVth of the ſecond part.

(cc) Sam. Mareſius, Antichr. revel. lib. i, p. 336, 337.

(dd) Id. ib. lib. ii, pag. 50.

(ee) Ib. p. 52.

(ff) Ib. p. 61.

(gg) Rivet. Operum, Tom. iii, pag. 1163.

(hh) See Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Arianiſm, Tom. i, p. 247, Edit. of Holland.

(ii) Horat. lib. i, Sat. II, ver. 108.

(kk) See his article above in its place.

2. That all was fictitious in the title of the firſt edition, the time and place of the impreſſion, as well as the name of the author; for the book was ſaid to be printed at Edinburgh in 1579 (ll). Beſides, there was a preface added to it in the name of the Publiſher, in which, he took the fictitious name of Conon Superantius, Vaſco, and a falſe date both of time and place was uſed; viz. Soleurre, the firſt day of January 1577. It is eaſy to prove, that du Pleſſis was not in Swiſſerland, in the interval between Languet's death and the publication of Junius Brutus's book; and I do not think, that any one will affirm, that Thomas Guarin was a Bookſeller of Edinburgh (mm). It appears in the third place that the excuſes alledged by Rivetus are not good, ſince it is certain, that when Languet died, France was no longer in a condition of perſecuting the Proteſtants, except by civil-wars, in which each party ſuffered, and that Mr du Pleſſis who was thirty-two years of age, had already written ſome very excellent books, the beſt perhaps he ever wrote, viz. his Treatiſe concerning the Church, and that concerning the Truth of the Chriſtian Religion.

IX. Voëtius's Diſſertation cenſured by Placcius.

Voëtius (nn), Divinity-Profeſſor at Utrecht, a man of immenſe reading, might perhaps, as well as Grotius, Rivetus, and Mareſius, have been ignorant all his life, of this unriddling of Theodorus Tronchin, had not the Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos been reprinted at Amſterdam, in the year 1660, in which, to theſe words, Stephano Junio Bruto Celta, this was added, ſive, ut putatur, Theodoro Beza Auctore. The magiſtrates of Geneva being informed of it, thought themſelves obliged to vindicate Beza's name, from this falſe imputation. They feared it would be a blot upon his memory, ſeeing that Junius Brutus's book was treated with the utmoſt ignominy: for when King James undertook to vindicate the Proteſtants, from the objections occaſioned by that book, he anſwered, that probably, ſome Papiſt had fathered it on the Proteſtants, with a deſign to make them odious. Quem nobis objicit Junius Brutus, author eſt ignotus, & forte Romanenſis Eccleſiæ emiſſarius, ut per illum reformatæ religioni apud Principes conſlarent invidiam. (oo). And when the Proteſtant writers were haraſſed on the ſame account, they failed not to ſay, that they objected to them an unknown perſon, a man without any name or figure in the Church, or in the world, a phantom. This was a new reaſon for them to juſtify this great ſervant of God; however, it was much better that the reproaches ſhould fall upon Lay-men, who were the true authors of the opinions objected againſt, than upon innocent Divines. For theſe cauſes, and other conſiderations, the Magiſtrates of Geneva wrote to the Magiſtrates of Amſterdam, the proofs of Beza's innocence (pp); and thereby, probably Voëtius came to the knowledge of the myſtery revealed by Simon Goulart. Be it how it will, Voëtius publiſhed in the year 1662 (qq), an anonymous Diſſertation, which he inſerted four years after, in the fourth volume of his Theſes, wherein he ſhewed by many arguments, that Beza was not Junius Brutus, and enlarged much upon Hubert Languet.

Mr Placcius has criticiſed one of his proofs in defence of Beza. For Voëtius having ſaid, that before the year 1660, no body, either among the friends or enemies of Beza and Languet, or among the editors of Junius Brutus, had aſcribed this book to Beza, either expreſsly, or by way of ſuſpicion; and that therefore the new conjecture of an unknown man given at random (rr), was of no weight; Mr Placcius ſhews him, that in the year 1652, one John Philips an Engliſhman, who wrote an anſwer to an apology for the King and people of England affirmed, that Beza was the author of Junius Brutus's book.

X. Beza accuſed before the time mentioned by Placcius.

The thing might have been carried higher, ſince ſome French Jeſuits had a long time been beforehand with this John Philips; ſo that Voëtius is wrong in taking advantage from the ſilence not only of Becanus, Gretſerus, and Eudæmon Johannes, but alſo of the whole ſociety of the Jeſuits, totaque Jeſuitarum natio; for in the year 1611, we find that Father Coton (ss) having collected ſeveral paſſages from Proteſtant authors, which he thought afforded matter for recrimination, and having not forgotten Junius Brutus, put in the margin Theodorus Beza, ſive Stephanus Junius Brutus, in Libro cui titulus, Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos, &c. The Jeſuit Richeome (tt), with the very ſame view, and on the ſame occaſion, thus addreſſed himſelf to his adverſary: How will you excuſe Beza, who, being concealed under the ſham-name of Junius Brutus, as you under that of Anti-Coton with the addition of three letters, wrote a book, concerning the lawful power of a Prince, &c. A miniſter of Gergeau, called David Home, anſwering in the year 1612, the Apology of the Jeſuits, written by a Father of the ſociety of Jeſus of Loyola, denied what the author of the apology had aſſerted, that Beza had taken the maſk of Junius Brutus. David Home's book is intituled, le Contr'Aſſaſſin. It has theſe words in page 329: As for Stephanus Junius Brutus, whom he afterwards produces, we know no ſuch man; but we ſay, that the Jeſuit, in affirming him to be Theodorus Beza, without offering the leaſt conjecture in the world for his aſſertion, lyes Jeſuitically, that is, impudently, and like a Machiavelist, who holds that tho' a lye be ſpread about but for half an hour, it ſtill does good in ſtate matters; tho' God forbids us to bear falſe witneſs againſt any one, as this man does againſt Beza, in whoſe writings there is not one word of exhortation to kill tyrants, &c. After ſome citations, the author goes on thus: This is what Beza ſays, which ſufficiently diſproves the Jeſuit, who affirms that he is the author of the treatiſe produced under the name of Junius Brutus, which has no conformity with that of Beza,

(ll) See the remark [B].

(mm) They feigned at that time, that ſeveral books were printed at Edinburgh; ſuch as in 1574. The Reveille matin des François, written by Euſebe Philadelphe Coſmopolite (it is a fictitious name) and the treatiſe de Furoribus Gallicis publiſhed under the falſe name of Erneſtus Varamundus Friſius, 1573.

(nn) Giſbertus Voëtius.

(oo) Operum Regiorum, pag. 478, which has been thus tranſlated; Junius Brutus, whom he (Cardinal du Perron) objects to us is an unknown author; and perhaps one of the Romiſh Church hath writ it on purpoſe to make the Proteſtants odious to Princes, pag. 137, 138, of the Vindication of the Rights of Kings; printed in 1615, againſt Cardinal du Perron's harangue.

(pp) Placcius, de Script. Anonym. pag. 169.

(qq) He himſelf mentions that year in the fourth volume of his Theſes, p. 230. Placcius, ibid. puts it in 1661.

(rr) The Greek phraſe he uſes, is perhaps more emphatical; ἀεροβατοῦντι στοχασμῷ τοῦ δεῖνα.

(ss) Réponſe Apologet. à l'Anti-Coton, & â ceux de ſa ſuite, pag. 173.

(tt) At page 471, of the Categorical Examination of the libel Anti-Coton, printed in 1613. He puts in the margin, Junius Brutus de Beze de legitima poteſtate, &c.

Beza, and is in all probability, the true name of the author, ſince there are ſeveral learned men, who are ſirnamed Junius. An Iriſh Jeſuit (uu) cited Junius Brutus's book as Beza's performance, in the year 1614. I queſtion not, but many others, both before, and after the anſwers to the Anti-Coton, have imployed this calumny againſt Beza, and I expect to have quickly returned to me, what I have lent Mr Placcius; I mean, that I ſhall be ſhewn, that I might have ſtill gone higher; from whence it will ſtill be more apparent, how reſerved we ought to be upon general affirmations, tho' we ſhould have the vaſt reading of the famous Profeſſor of Utrecht; for after all, the great knowledge he had of all ſorts of books, prevented not his being ignorant: 1. That before the year 1660, Beza had been often accuſed of writing the book of Junius Brutus. 2. That two years before the Funeral Oration of Simon Goulart, the public was informed by d'Aubigné, that Hubert Languet had taken that fictitious name. 3. That Grotius had publickly named Mr du Pleſſis Mornai as the author of that piece.

XI. The Proteſtants apology for the Roman Church, by Brereley.

Expecting the return of my loan, I will ſay here that one John Brereley, an Engliſh prieſt, in his book, intituled, The Proteſtants Apology for the Roman Church (a), cites an author, called Sutcliffe (b), who ſaid, that the Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos, was a book written either by Beza or Hotman. Tho' I cannot diſcover at what time this apology was firſt printed; yet I doubt not but it was before the Jeſuits anſwer to the Anti-Coton, ſince I learn from the tranſlator, that as ſoon as it appeared in Engliſh, Bancroft, then Archbiſhop of Canterbury, ordered ſome learned Divines, and particularly Morton, to anſwer it, and that Morton's anſwer is called, Catholica Appellatio pro Proteſtantibus. Now this doubtleſs is the book of Morton, which according to the Oxford Catalogue appeared in 1606, under this title, A Catholic Appeal for Proteſtants; and therefore I ought not to believe that this Catalogue mentions the firſt edition of the apology, in theſe words of page 107, The Proteſtants Apology for the Roman Church 1608. Now, as Sutcliffe's book, cited by Brereley, is an anſwer to a petition of the Preſbyterians, and the Oxford Catalogue places the impreſſion of this anſwer in the year 1592, with this title, An Anſwer to a Petition of the Conſiſtorian faction, preſented to her Majeſty, it is evident, that Junius Brutus's book was attributed to Beza long before the Jeſuits anſwered the Anti-Coton.

It does not appear that Brereley, who produces a prodigious number of Proteſtant authors upon all ſubjects, had read Junius Brutus; for he cites nothing out of it: and for that reaſon the Biſhop of Luçon (c) did not cite it in the book he publiſhed againſt the Proteſtants, in the year 1618, wherein he objects to them ſome other writers tainted with Hubert Languet's maxims, whoſe paſſages he had found in Brereley, as Rivetus intimates, in anſwering the Jeſuit Petra Sancta. A quo (libello Epiſcopi Luſſonenſis) video non pauca te mutuatum fuiſſe, quemadmodum ille, aut potius ſacerdos Anglus qui tum ei fuit à manu ex laciniis Anglo-Papiſtarum (d). I have not ſeen this book of the Biſhop of Luçon; but what makes me think that he has not mentioned Junius Brutus, is, that David Blondel (e) anſwering this prelate, ſays nothing to him concerning this diſguiſed author. We may eaſily ſee now, why Petra Sancta (f) ſpeaks not of this author neither; it is becauſe he borrowed from the Biſhop (as Rivetus taxes him with it) all his citations of Anti-Monarchical Proteſtant authors. Hence it appears, that the author of the large anſwer to Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Calviniſm is miſtaken in ſaying, (g) That the Method aſcribed to Cardinal Richelieu, and the Jeſuit Sylveſter à Sancta Petra, have furniſhed Mr Arnauld with the objection he makes to us about the royal authority, in his Apology for the Catholics: for firſt, it is not in the Method, which was not publiſhed till after Cardinal Richelieu's death, but in a book he publiſhed before his Cardinalſhip, that he objected ſuch republican writings: In the ſecond place, if Mr Arnauld had taken his arguments from theſe two ſources, he would not have found there Hubert Languet's work, nor the Magdeburg writing, which make the ſtrength of his attack.

XII. The Magdeburg writing.

This piece of Magdeburg is intituled, de Jure Magiſtratuum in ſubditos, & officio ſubditorum erga Magiſtratûs. Brereley (h) ſpeaks of it only in general, and upon the credit of Sutcliffe, who aſcribes it to Beza. This book was publiſhed in 1550, under the name of the inhabitants of Magdeburg. I cannot tell whether it be the ſame with that of which Sleidan has given the abſtract (i). I know it only by the French edition of 1578, in 12mo. It is intituled, du Droit des Magiſtrats, &c. Of the Right of Magiſtrates over their Subjects. A Treatiſe moſt neceſſary at this time, to admoniſh both Magiſtrates and Subjects of their duty: publiſhed by the Magdeburgers, in the year MDL: and now reviſed and inlarged with ſeveral reaſonings and examples. There were ſeveral editions before this. Mr Arnauld (k) made uſe of a Latin tranſlation, printed in the year 1576, apud Joannem Mareſchallum Lugdunenſem, in 8vo, and done from the French. The author of the Commentaries De ſtatu Religionis & Reipublicæ in regno Galliæ, makes mention of a book publiſhed in the year 1573, which is the ſame with this. He owns that the author's deſign was to make an apology for the Proteſtants, who were then engaged the fourth time in a civil-war againſt Charles IX (l). Thuanus expreſly obſerves under the year 1574 (m), that there came out a new edition of a book which had been printed in Germany, at the time of the ſiege of Magdeburg, and that this new edition was enlarged with ſeveral examples and reaſonings. John Beccaria, who an-(uu) Henry Fitz Simon, in Britannomachia Miniſtrorum, printed at Douay, in 1614.

---

(a) Page 636, of the Latin tranſlation done out of Engliſh by William Raynerius, and printed at Paris, in 1615 in 4to, and pag. 653, of the ſecond Engliſh edition, printed in 1608.

(b) It is he who is called in Latin Matthæus Sutlivius (Raynerius ſhould have called him ſo): He was a good Proteſtant, but moſt oppoſite to the Preſbyterians. I have given his article.

(c) Afterwards Cardinal Richelieu.

(d) Rivetus Operum, Tom. iii, pag. 505, num. 5. Blondel, in his Modeſt Declaration, pag. 287, ſpeaks more expreſly: They borrow, ſays he, from the apology of John Brereley, an Engliſh prieſt, the invention of curtailing ſome paſſages.

(e) Modeſt Declaration of the ſincerity of the Reformed Churches. Sedan 1619.

(f) Silveſt. Petra Sancta, Not. in Epiſt. Petri Molinæi ad Balzacum.

(g) Tom. ii, pag. 286, in 4to.

(h) In Apologia Proteſtant. pag. 613.

(i) Sleid. lib. xxii, init. See the Chimerical Cabal, ſecond edition, pag. 139, & ſeq.

(k) See his Apology for the Catholics, Part. i, chap iv, p. 50.

(l) Commentar. de Statu Reip. & Relig. ad ann. 1573. fol. m. 118, verſo.

(m) Thuan. lib. lvii, pag. m. 50. I have ſeen an edition in 8vo, printed in 1574.

ſwered this book in the year 1590, repreſented it as a very new book: ‘ Quum ſuperioribus diebus commentabamur aliquid de bello, liceret ne ſcilicet Chriſtiano bellare, vel non, prodiit libellus quidam cui hic erat titulus, De jure Magiſtratuum in ſubditos, & officio ſubditorum erga Magiſtratus (n). - - - - A few days ago, when I was writing ſomething concerning war, namely on this queſtion; whether it is lawful for a Chriſtian to go to war: there came out a little book intituled, Of the Right of Magiſtrates over their Subjects, and the Duty of Subjects to their Magiſtrates.’ This ſhews there was lately a new edition of it, and that he knew nothing of the preceding. Some ſuſpect that John Beccaria is not the true name of this author (o). What is certain, is, that he was not a Catholic: he was perhaps a kind of a Socinian. He uſes his adverſary very ill, and treats him as a ſanguinary ſoul, and an enemy to peace. ‘ Videri hominem eſſe verè ſanguinarium, bello, armiſque amicum, hoſtem capitalem paci, nomini regio infenſiſſimum, verſatum in literis humanis, præſertim hiſtoriis, atque ſi divinare licet leguleium, in divinis haud adeò multum: nihil prorſus habentem illius manſuetudinis & clementiæ illius pacifici, & mitiſſimi agni Jeſu Chriſti (qui quidem dixit: † Diſcite à me, quòd mitis ſum, & humilis corde: non autem dixit, Diſcite à me contendere, & litigare, multò certè minus bellare) ſed abundare ſpiritu contentionis, ambitionis, & ſuperbiæ: neſcire prorſus quid ſit vera concordia, quid pax, quid humilitas, quid patientia, quid ſit injuriam pati: ſed optimè ſcire quid ſit injuriam inferre, vel illatam vindicare: ignorare etiam omnino quid ſit proximus, illud bene ſcire, ‡ Proximus ſum egomet mihi: Chriſti crucem nec ſcire, nec ſcire curare: omnia humana ad trutinam, id eſt, ad ſuum arbitrium ponderare (p). - - - - This author ſeems to be a ſanguinary man, a friend to war and to arms, a mortal enemy to peace, an implacable hater of the name of King; he ſeems to be ſkilled in human learning, eſpecially in Hiſtory; and if I may be allowed to conjecture he is ſome petty-fogger, very little verſed in Divinity, utterly void of the meekneſs and clemency of the mild and peaceable lamb Jeſus Chriſt (who ſaid, Learn of me, for I am meak and lowly of heart; but did not ſay, Learn of me to be quarrelſome and litigious, much leſs learn of me to make war upon your neighbour) he ſeems to be full of the ſpirit of contention, ambition, and pride, to be an intire ſtranger to concord, peace, humility, patience, and the bearing of injuries; but to know perfectly well what it is to do an injury; or to revenge an injury received; to be utterly ignorant of charity, but to abound with ſelf-love; he ſeems neither to know, nor care to know the croſs of Chriſt; and in judging of all human affairs to be guided by nothing but his own fancy.’ We muſt confeſs that Mr Arnauld had but little knowledge of this piece of Magdeburg.

A Civilian of Bavaria, named John Baptiſt Ficklerus, knew only the edition of 1576, which induced him to anſwer it in a book which was printed at Ingolſtad in 1578, with this title: De Jure Magiſtratuum in ſubditos, & officio ſubditorum erga Magiſtratus: Contra Libellum cujuſdam Calviniani, ſub eadem inſcriptione, ſed reticito nomine Authoris, & loci Typographiæ, ſuperiori anno editum; nunc autem veritatis ſtudio reformatum, retento quidem illius ſtylo, ſed pleriſque argumentis ad rei veritatem applicatis. Tractatus brevis & perſpicuus, hiſce ambiguis temporib. Chriſtiano homini lectu admodum utilis & neceſſarius.

XIII. Father Labbe's miſtake.

Let me obſerve by the by, that it is dangerous to ſpeak of books which we have not ſeen. Father Labbe, who had an almoſt infinite reading, and yet had not ſeen Brereley's Proteſtants Apology, heard of it whilſt his Diſſertation upon Eccleſiaſtical Writers was in the preſs; he would add to it ſomething that was told him, but in three lines he made two faults (q): The one is, that he calls the author Bretleius, inſtead of Brerleius; the other is, that he aſcribes to him the preface in which the Pope, St Gregory, is juſtified, whereas it is the tranſlator who has wrote it.

XIV. Beza's adverſaries who could not accuſe him.

What I have ſaid of Sutcliffe, ſhews, that the proof Voëtius has founded upon the ſilence of all the Epiſcopalians, is not better than that which he has grounded on the ſilence of all the Jeſuits. Beſides, I obſerve that among Beza's adverſaries, who Voëtius ſays, would not have ſpared him, if they could have faſtened Junius Brutus's work upon him, he reckons at leaſt five, whoſe ſilence proves nothing. Theſe he names (r); viz. Charpentier, Baudouin, Caſtalio, Eraſtus, Morellus, Saravia, Montague, Tilenus, Ladus, and Dr Bramble. As for Charpentier, who ſpoke very ill of Beza, in the violent ſatire he wrote to Francis Portus, in the year 1572 (s), he could not ſpeak of Junius Brutus's book, which did not appear till ſome years after (t). Baudoüin and Caſtalio, who died, the former in the year 1573, the latter in 1563, were ſtill leſs able to ſpeak of him. Thomas Eraſtus, it is true, wrote againſt Beza on the ſubject of Excommunication; but this was long before Junius Brutus's book appeared. Eraſtus's anſwer is dated on the twenty-fourth of December 1569: Beza's name was not in the original (u); it was inſerted by thoſe who publiſhed it in the year 1589, after Eraſtus's death. Theſe two antagoniſts had been very civil to one another at Baſil after the diſpute. As for Morellus I do not think, that after the national ſynod held at Nimes in the year 1572, where his opinion was condemned, he entered the liſts. This man had maintained, in the year 1562, that the right of Excommunication belonged not to the Conſiſtories and Synods, but to the whole body of the Church. He

(n) Jo. Beccaria, Refutat. cujuſd. Libelli, pag. 1.

(o) Voët. Diſp. Tom. iv, pag. 238.

† Matth. xi.

‡ Terentius.

(p) Beccaria, ibid. pag. 9.

(q) Tom. i, p. 786.

(r) Voët. ibid. pag. 234.

(s) Concerning this Letter ſee the remark [A], of the article CHARPENTIER.

(t) I do not think Charpentier wrote any thing after the impreſſion of Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos.

(u) See Beza's preface to the tract de Vera Excommunicatione.

He was excommunicated for this opinion; and the writing he publiſhed on that ſubject was burnt, and the reading of it was forbidden (w). He nevertheleſs perſiſted in his opinion, and in the year 1572, was one of the members of the cabal, which endeavoured to make ſuch a change in the diſcipline of the churches, that thence forward the power of the keys ſhould be adminiſtred by the whole body of the people (x). Ramus was one of the heads of this cabal (y). Beza, who aſſiſted in the national ſynod of Nimes in 1572, oppoſed this faction viva voce, and by writing, and made it vaniſh into nothing. However, it cannot be denied, but that before the year 1660, Junius Brutus's Treatiſe was often aſcribed to Beza in printed books: nevertheleſs, he who publiſhed it that year at Amſterdam, knew nothing of it; for the only reaſon he gives why he would have the title lengthened out with theſe words, ſive, ut putatur, Theodoro Beza Autore, is, that he had ſeen a copy upon which a learned profeſſor had writ, that Beza had compoſed this book. This overthrows Mr Placcius's conjecture (z), viz. That the Engliſh author he cites, was the cauſe of Beza's name appearing in the edition of 1660. I wonder he did not quote Milton, who ſpeaks thus, in one of his books: 'Doctrina 'hæc nobis haud magis quam Gallis, quos tu hoc piaculo cupis eximere, debetur: 'unde enim Francogallia illa niſi ex Gallia? unde Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos? qui liber 'etiam Bezæ vulgo tribuitur (aa). - - - - This doctrine is not derived from the Engliſh, 'more than it is from the French, whom you deſire to vindicate from this crime. For whence 'comes Francogallia, but from France? Whence the Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos, a book 'which is alſo commonly aſcribed to Beza?' For the reſt, ſeveral perſons believed, that Milton was the author of John Philips's Apology. Salmaſius affirms it roundly (bb). Others ſay, that he either wrote it, or adviſed the publiſhing of it: 'Eandem culpam 'commiſſam fuiſſe in Reſponſione Philippi Angli ad Apologiam Anonymi cujuſdam, &c. 'aliquando Hartlibo ſcripſi, cujus libri authorem eſſe Miltonium, ſaltem ejus conſilio 'publicatum, firmiſſime creditur (cc). - - - - I formerly wrote to Hartlib, that the ſame 'error was committed in the Anſwer of John Philips, an Engliſhman, to the Apology 'of an Anonymous Writer, &c. a book, which it is firmly believed was written by Milton, 'or at leaſt publiſhed by his advice.'

(w) See Thomas Eraſtus's book, de Excommunicatione, pag. 69, 70.

(x) Ant. Fayus, in Vita Th. Bezæ, pag. 49. See alſo Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſiaſt. lib. vi, pag. 34.

(y) Simler. in Vita Bullingeri, fol. 45.

(z) Placcius, ubi ſupra.

(aa) Joannes Miltonus, Defenſ. ſecunda, pag. 99, Edit. Hag. 1654.

(bb) Salmaſ. Reſponſ. ad Jo. Miltonum, pag. m. 19.

(cc) Hadrianus Ulacq, in Præfatione Apologiæ ſecundæ Miltoni, Edit. Hag. 1654.

XV.
Some late authors have been ignorant who was Junius Brutus.

Since Voëtius's Diſſertation, it has been eaſier to know what to depend upon, as to Junius Brutus; and yet Mr Colomiés, and the author of the News from the Republic of Letters, had but a ſuperficial knowledge of this matter, the one in the year 1668, the other in 1686 (dd). Nay, Mr Arnauld, compoſing his apology for the Catholics in the year 1682, and taking from Junius Brutus's book all that he could find capable of rendering the Proteſtant doctrine ſuſpected to ſovereigns, never attempted to ſtrengthen his proofs with conſiderations taken from the perſon of the author; which makes it evident, that he knew not who he was. I obſerve all theſe little things to ſhew that thoſe Proteſtants, who have ſaid theſe laſt years (ee), that Junius Brutus was an unknown man, without name, character, or authority, might ſpeak in this manner without any fraud; tho' one of the libels I have mentioned at the beginning of this diſſertation, would inſinuate the contrary: I mean, that kind of ſermon wherein we are cenſured, for a pretended proneneſs to libelling and civil-wars, with as great vehemence, as ever a miniſter expreſſed in a faſt-day ſermon, when he lays the breach of the whole Decalogue to the charge of his hearers.

(dd) See, above, num. 4, citations (k), (l), (m).

(ee) Daillon, Examen de l'oppreſſion des Réformez, 1687. Jurieu's Anſwer to Maimbourg, 1683.

XVI.
The libels of ſome private perſons diſowned.

And ſince occaſion offers, it will not be improper to ſay, that this man's violent reproaches have had a good effect. They are not perhaps the cauſe that little ſorry ſatirical books, do not come ſo thick among us as before [C]; but it is certain at leaſt, that they have obliged the moſt excellent writers of the party (ff), to inform the public, that it was unjuſt to make the body of the Refugees anſwerable for theſe bad books. So that poſterity will always have ſome cotemporary records, to clear them from the malicious imputations that may be caſt upon them. Let it not be ſaid, that theſe excellent (ff) The author of the Letters upon the Affairs of the Preſent Time; that of the Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned; that of the Defence of the Refugees againſt the Important Advice.

[C] Perhaps they are not the cauſe, that little ſorry ſatirical books come not ſo thick among us as before.] This perhaps, is not improper here; for it is very probable that two other things have leſſened their numbers; 1. The indignation that all honeſt men expreſſed againſt them. 2. The readers beginning to be tired with them; which never fails to happen when the ſame ragoo is ſerved up too often, and when amongſt the multitude of thoſe who pretend to cook it, many of them make it very flat and inſipid. It is a maxim that authors ought carefully to ſtudy; viz. that the greedineſs of the public, ought never to be abuſed, that ſatiety is to be avoided even in ſubjects of admiration; and therefore we ought not to yield with too great complacency, to this compliment of the Italian academies, Di gratia, Signor, un' altra volta. - - Again, Sir, if you pleaſe. This compliment is doubtleſs a teſtimony of approbation, and it is generally uſed to a Muſician, who has charmed more than ordinary; and then the company is not ſorry to be taken at their word: but he who ſhould abuſe the courteſy ſo far as to exceed the rule of the Greeks, δὶς καὶ τρὶς τὸ καλὸν, bis & ter quod pulchrum, - - - a good thing may be twice or thrice repeated, and even what a Latin Poet (6) has ſaid, that there are ſome poems which pleaſe, tho' ten times repeated, decies repetita placebit, would deſerve to be referred to the old proverb, twice ſodden cabbage is death, δὶς κράμβη θάνατος, crambe bis poſita mors. It is not fit the public ſhould be expoſed to the miſerable condition of thoſe teachers of Rhetoric heretofore, who were forced to hear the declamations of a whole claſs variouſly turned, concerning the overthrow of tyrants.

Declamare doces, ô ferrea pectora Vetti!
Cum perimit ſævos claſſis numeroſa Tyrannos.
Nam quæcunque ſedens modò legerat, hæc eadem ſtans
Perferet, atque eadem cantabit verſibus iiſdem.
OCCIDIT MISEROS CRAMBE REPETITA MAGISTROS (7).

(6) Horat. de Arte Poëtica.

(7) Juven. Sat. VII, ver. 150.

But

cellent writers, who diſowned thoſe libels, have done it without naming themſelves; for having anſwered for their brethren in general, whilſt none has excepted againſt their declaration, it is a proof that the whole body acquieſces in it. Add to this, that the name of him, who writes every fortnight on the affairs of the preſent time, in ſo polite and judicious a manner, is known to every body. And as for the author of the inimitable Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned, is any body ignorant of his name? A name, that has ſo long been famous both at the bar and in the church, both viva voce, and in writing; a name, which two brothers render more illuſtrious every day; the one (gg) by his eloquent ſermons, and learned anſwers to the Biſhop of Meaux; the other (hh) by the incomparable journal I have mentioned. To ſay nothing of a couſin (ii) who has relieved Caſaubon in the attack of Baronius's Annals. As to the defence of the Refugees againſt the Important Advice, the author of it is no doubt very worthy of credit (kk) when he affirms any thing in the name of his brethren. He fully anſwers the reproaches that concern the ſatirical ſpirit, and ſets forth his opinion on the other point, with a great dexterity of wit. All things well conſidered, it muſt be owned that tho' a diſavowal which had preceded the ſevere reproaches of the adverſary, and had been made by perſons appointed for this purpoſe by the Synod, would have been much more honourable and more authentic; yet none but extravagant cavillers, can henceforth renew theſe accuſations. But to return to my ſubject.

XVII.
The Funeral Oration of Goulart leaves ſome doubt.

Voëtius did not ſo far truſt to Simon Goulart's teſtimony, as to think it ſtrange, that any perſon ſhould ſtill be a Sceptic, with reſpect to Junius Brutus; and for my part, I confeſs, that I ſtill perceive in it ſome difficulties and intricacies, tho' I ſeemed ſo ſtrongly to declare for Hubert Languet, who is the perſon to whom Mr de la Mare adjudges the book. He does it in a work not yet printed [D], and I do not know whether the thing be there particularized, as in the oration of the Geneva Profeſſor, or otherwiſe; nor what proofs are given. If it could be proved that Junius Brutus's book was publiſhed before Languet's death, farewel Goulart's depoſition. This will perhaps excite ſome perſon, well furniſhed with books and time, to ſeek for ſome light upon this ſubject; and I hope Mr Baillet will exhauſt the matter in the great work the public expects from him, concerning authors who have diſguiſed their names.

XVIII.
A fault in the continuation of the Menagiana.

There is in the Continuation of the Menagiana an error which I ought not to paſs by. ‘Languet's letters have a great many good things in them. Mr Languet was Counſellor in the parliament, and a man of great merit. It is he who was the author of ‘that admirable work intituled, Vindiciæ Regiæ contra Tyrannos. He wrote this book ‘in defence of Henry the fourth's right. As the declaring himſelf the author, would ‘have endangered his life, he took ſo good meaſures with his Printer, and the ſecret was

But oh, what ſtock of patience wants the fool,
Who waſtes his time and breath in teaching ſchool!
To hear the ſpeeches of declaiming boys,
Depoſing tyrants with eternal noiſe!
Sitting or ſtanding, ſtill confin'd to roar,
In the ſame verſe the ſame rules o'er and o'er.

DRYDEN.

The condition of ſchoolmaſters is not better at preſent. They dictate an exerciſe to a whole claſs, to have it turned ſeveral ways by their ſcholars; literally by ſome, paraphraſed by others; in verſe or in Greek by a third ſort, and in two ſorts of Latin proſe by a fourth. It is ſtill the ſame exerciſe, ſtill the ſame thing under different words. The public not being paid for this, has no reaſon to ſuffer it. Now it is certain our ears have ſo often tingled with the ſame things, and the number ten hath been left ſo far behind, that we need not wonder that theſe ſhowers fall not ſo thick as formerly. Every body ſet up for the ſame trade (8); it is no wonder therefore that it proved good for nothing.

[D] Mr de la Mare adjudges the book to Hubert Languet. He does it in a work not yet printed.] I ſpoke thus in the year 1696; but now I muſt ſay that it has been printed at Hall in Saxony, in the year 1700. I have not found in it what I expected, but am left in all the uncertainty I was in before. Mr de la Mare ſays (9), that the year 1580 abounded with Political Writings, ſince beſides the treatiſe of Voluntary Slavery, compoſed by la Boëtie, and the Franco-Gallia of Hotman, there came out Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos, written by Hubert Languet. This is moſt certain, ſays he, I have a great many proofs for it, and had I only this I am going to mention it would be ſufficient. Ad Vindicias redeo, quas etſi nonnulli tribuere videantur Franciſco Hottomano, certiſſimum tamen eſt illarum auctorem eſſe Languetum, cujus rei quamvis alia me deficerent argumenta, ſunt autem quam plurima, unum inſtar omnium hoc erit, quod modo ſum prompturus Antonii Vioni Herovalli fide (10). This great proof, the only one that Mr de la Mare has been pleaſed to communicate to the public, conſiſts in this, that he had heard Mr Vion d'Herouval ſay, that Henry III, underſtanding that Simon Goulart knew who was the author of the Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos, immediately ſent for him, and aſked his name; that Goulart only anſwered, that his oath obliged him to conceal it during the author's life; that the King in vain added threatenings to entreaties; and that nothing was capable of ſhaking Goulart's reſolution, who by a rare inſtance of fidelity and friendſhip, perſiſted to conceal, during Languet's life, the ſecret which had been truſted to him alone. Cui (Henrico III) cum Gulartius præfracte reſpondiſſet, non niſi poſt auctoris obitum nomen illius revelare ſibi licitum eſſe, quod ſolemni ſacramento obſervaturum ſe promiſerat, Rexque precibus minas adderet, perſtitiſſe tamen in propoſito Gulartium, neque precibus neque minis adduci unquam potuiſſe, ut priuſquam fato functus fuiſſet Languetus, quod ſibi ſoli commiſerat arcanum proderet, raro conſtantis fidei & amicitiæ exemplo (11). Now here is a proof which can be of no uſe to us: for though Mr Vion d'Herouval ſhould have better known the circumſtances of the fact, he would have taught us only what we knew before. It is plain that he had mediately or immediately, from the Funeral Oration of Simon Goulart, the particulars he related to Mr de la Mare. He could not therefore be a new evidence. Now either for want of memory, or becauſe others had miſinformed him of Theodorus Tronchin's account, he related it very ill, ſince it is falſe that Henry III ſent for Goulart, entreated and threatened him, and that Goulart anſwered, his oath engaged him to be ſilent, and that the ſecret was committed only to him. I wonder Mr de la Mare believed that a Miniſter anſwered Henry III, in that manner, with impunity. I ſay nothing of the falſe dates he gives of Stephen de la Boëtie's, and Francis Hotman's books.

[E] An

(gg) Mr Baſnage, Miniſter of Rotterdam.

(hh) Mr Baſnage de Beauval, a Civilian.

(ii) Mr Baſnage de Flottemanville, Miniſter at Zutphen.

(kk) It was a Miniſter called Coulan, who died in England two or three years ago. I write this in 1696.

(8) Expectes eadem à ſummo minimoque poëta. Juven. Sat. I, ver. 14.

(9) Vita Huberti Langueti, pag. 123.

(10) Ibid. pag. 124.

(11) Ibid. pag. 125.

'was ſo well kept, by the mutual intereſt they had in it, that it was not known to 'be his book till long after his death; and the Printer, who after the peace declared 'he had printed it, diſcovered alſo to Henry IV how the matter was ordered.' 1. This expreſſion, Counſellor in the parliament, ought to ſignify here that Hubert Languet had that place in the parliament of Paris. But it is certain he had it not in any parliament of France. 2. His book had not the title of Vindiciæ Regiæ, nor ought to have it. 3. Mr Menage would never have called it admirable, if he had known what ſubject it treats, and upon what principles it goes. 4. Nothing could be more pernicious to Henry IV, than Languet's book, ſince it authorized the French to depoſe Henry III, and to place the crown on the head of the Duke of Guiſe. 5. Laſtly, all the reſt of the account, the ſecret of the Printer, and the diſcovery of the myſtery after the peace, are quite contrary to truth, and all probability. I do not deny that in ſome ſenſe Mr Menage might have thought that this work of Languet is an admirable piece: he might have found in it learning and art, a great order and method, and the beſt and moſt ſolid arguments that can be offered for the rights of the people, which is a very problematical point. It has ſeveral fair ſides (ll), and may be maintained with ſo many plauſible reaſons, that it muſt not be thought ſtrange, that not only factious, turbulent, and reſtleſs men ſhould have eſpouſed it, but alſo ſeveral perſons of great judgment and of an exemplary virtue. I may reckon among the latter Stephen de la Boëtie, who wrote the diſcourſe intituled, de la Servitude volontaire, or du CONTRE-UN. There never was a better citizen, nor a greater enemy to commotions than he, and he would have much rather employed his skill and learning in order to ſuppreſs them than to raiſe them (mm). What cannot be juſtified is, that frequently the ſame perſons who write for the rights of the people, would write for arbitrary power, if affairs ſhould change; that is, if a deſpotic power came to be exerciſed in their favour, and to the great prejudice of a party which they hate. When the Catholics of France, in the XVIth century, ſaw the wars of religion ariſe, they wrote very much for the right of Kings; but when they ſaw the right of ſucceſſion devolved on a Proteſtant Prince, they changed their principles (nn), and wrote very much for the right of the people. We have ſeen this ridiculous caprice in the article of Claudius de SAINTES. I queſtion whether, after the death of Henry III, Arnaud Sorbin would have written what he publiſhed in the year 1576 (oo). Would Peter Charpentier have written againſt the civil-wars in the year 1590, what he wrote a little after the death of Charles IX? He received a ſmart anſwer intituled, Petri Fabri Reſponſio ad Petri Carpentarii famelici Rabulæ ſacrum de retinendis armis & pace repudianda Conſilium ad V. C. Lomanium Terridæ, & Sereniaci Baronem. - - - - Peter Faber's anſwer to the advice of Peter Charpentier, a hungry pettifogger, concerning the continuance of the war, and the rejecting of a peace: dedicated to Mr de Lomanie, Baron of Terride and of Seriniac. It was printed at Neuſtad in the year 1575, and publiſhed in French the year following with this title, Traitté duquel on peut apprendre en quel cas il eſt permis à l'homme Chreſtien de porter les armes, & par lequel eſt reſpondu à Pierre Charpentier, tendant à fin d'empeſcher la paix, & nous laiſſer la guerre: par Pierre Fabre, à Monſieur de Lomanie, Baron de Terride & de Seriniac. - - - A treatiſe wherein we may learn in what caſe it is lawful for a Chriſtian to bear arms; and in which Peter Charpentier is anſwered, tending to hinder a peace and continue the war: by Peter Faber, dedicated to Mr de Lomanie, Baron of Terride and of Seriniac. It was neceſſary I ſhould ſet down this French title; for the readers had never believed, by the Latin title, that Charpentier exhorted the people to lay down their arms, and only propoſed to them an evangelical ſubmiſſion (pp). In all parties there are ſome indiſcreet perſons who publiſh books, which are afterwards upbraided to the whole body. An Engliſhman, named William Allen, under Cromwell's uſurpation, publiſhed a book intituled, Killing no murther. A Canon of Aneci immediately imputed this doctrine to the Proteſtants, in a work that was anſwered by the late Mr Turretin. Was not this reproach ridiculous? Can the wiſeſt and the beſt regulated communions reſtrain the unruly pen of every private member? Guy Patin ſpoke judiciouſly of this Engliſh book, but he was ill informed of the circumſtances. They have printed in Holland, ſays he (qq), a little book intituled, A Political Treatiſe, &c. that the killing of a tyrant is no murther. It is ſaid to be tranſlated from the Engliſh, but that book was firſt written in French by a gentleman of Nevers, called Mr de Marigni, who is a great wit. This doctrine is very dangerous, and it were better to be ſilent about it. I do not love that there ſhould be ſo many books de venenis (concerning poiſons) for the ſame reaſon: I have always the public good in view, and I do not love thoſe who do any thing that may be prejudicial to it. It is not true that the Engliſh piece was written by Marigni: an Engliſhman is the author of it, and Marigni was not capable of writing ſo grave and ſo ſerious a book.

XIX. Another book publiſhed under the falſe name of Junius Brutus.

For the reſt, Languet is not the only perſon who diſguiſed himſelf under the name of Junius Brutus. The famous Socinian Crellius did it alſo in a book concerning liberty of conſcience. The catalogue of the Bodleian library mentions it in this manner: Junius Brutus Polonus; Vindiciæ pro Religionis libertate, and refers us to Val. Magnus. But if you conſult the article of Father Valerian Magni, you will find nothing relating to this Junius Brutus Polonus, except that there is mention made of a book printed like his

---

(ll) We have here a notable inſtance of the uncertainty of human knowledge; for that ſame cauſe which has ſo many fair ſides, has others that are frightful.

(mm) See Teiſſier, Eloges tirez de Mr de Thou, Tom. i, pag. 216. He quotes Montagne, chap. xxvii, of the firſt book of his Eſſays, and Thuanus, book lvii.

(nn) See the article HOTMAN, remark [I].

(oo) He publiſhed a book intituled, Le vray Reſveille-matin des Calviniſtes & Publicains François, où eſt amplement diſcouru de l'Autorité des Princes & du Devoir des Sujets envers iceux.

(pp) The French title does not clearly expreſs the poſition which Charpentier had maintained.

(qq) Patin, Letter CLIV, pag. 604, of the firſt volume. It is dated the 21*ſt of November* 1659.

his at Eleutheropolis (rr); and there alſo the catalogue refers us to Pet. Haberkornius, though Dr Hyde has not put under that name any thing relating to Father Valerian, or Junius Brutus Polonus. We are referred ſtill from the article Petrus Haberkornius, to that of Feurbornius, where we find nothing that has any affinity with the other articles. I am not ignorant of the relation that is between the Capuchin Valerian Magni, and the Profeſſor Haberkorn; they diſputed againſt each other viva voce, and Haberkorn has publiſhed, amongſt other books, an Anti-Valerian [E], which Mr Baillet has not forgotten in his curious collection of Anti's (ss). But ſince Dr Hyde mentions nothing of this, methinks his references are to no purpoſe, and that it is a little want of exactneſs, in one of the moſt exact works that have been made in that kind.

I ſhall conclude this Diſſertation with a paſſage of the preface to the Sorberiana. ‘I have not been able to know what is become of his (tt) little treatiſe de Pace & Concordia inter Chriſtianos concilianda, nor of the tranſlation he made of a book printed ‘in the year 1637, and intituled Junii Bruti Poloni Vindiciæ pro Religionis libertate, ‘which was not written, as ſome have thought by the learned Hubert Languet, tho’ ‘he formerly diſguiſed himſelf under that name in his Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos, and ‘which ought to be looked upon as a continuation of the treatiſe de Libertate Eccleſiaſtica, printed in the year 1607, which was doubtleſs written by Caſaubon, who, ‘beſides, ſpeaks of it plainly enough in his 539th letter of the Hague edition, ‘though he had ſpoken of it in ambiguous words in two or three other foregoing ‘letters.’

Since the firſt edition of this Dictionary I have learned a particular which I thought very curious (uu). It is in an Engliſh book which was printed at London in the year 1649, as an apology for a book which the Miniſters of that great city had lately publiſhed, and as an anſwer to the invectives diſperſed in a book of John Price. The book in which this particular is to be found, is intituled, A modeſt and clear vindication of the ſerious repreſentation, and late vindication of the Miniſters of London, from the ſcandalous aſperſions of John Price, in a pamphlet of his intituled, Clerico Claſſicum, or The Clergies Alarum to a third war. John Price had made this reproach to the Miniſters that ſeveral of them had publiſhed books which tended only to raiſe rebellions, and he had put Beza in the fourth rank, as being the author of the Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos. You are much in the wrong, ſays the anſwer, to follow in this the Popiſh writer of a book intituled, Imago utriuſque Eccleſiæ, Hieroſolymæ & Babylonis, per P. D. M. This writer, who is thought to be Tobias Matthews, ſaid in the 105th page, that Junius Brutus's book was written by Beza: can you do juſtice to ſo orthodox a Divine as Beza, when you take up the calumnies of the Papiſts againſt ſo zealous a Proteſtant? Does not the ſame author, who accuſes him of writing the Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos, accuſe him alſo of having uſurped the pariſh and wife of another man? The firſt accuſation is as falſe as the laſt. It is eaſy to prove that he is not the author of that book: would ſo wiſe and ſo learned a man have affirmed, in one book, the contrary of what he had taught in another? In all his writings he labours to ſhew that we ought to be obedient to magiſtrates; he ſays nothing of the depoſing or murdering of Kings, which is the only end of Junius Brutus's book. A great many paſſages, directly oppoſite to Brutus's principles, might be drawn from the works of Beza: here is one or two. Private perſons, ſays he †, who are the ſubjects of a tyrant, have no remedy allowed them, beſides amendment of life, prayers, and tears. He will indeed have them to diſobey the orders of a Prince when they are contrary to the law of God, but not to take up arms againſt him. Aliud eſſe non parere quàm reſiſtere, vel ad arma ſe comparare quæ à Domino non acceperis ‡. - - - There is a difference between diſobeying and reſiſting, or recurring to arms, which God has not put in our hands. He wrote a book de Hæreticis à Magiſtratu puniendis; but he never ſaid one word de Magiſtratibus ab Hæreticis puniendis. This work of Junius Brutus, continue they, which good authors, as you ſay, aſcribe to Beza, was, in truth, written by a Jeſuit. We know from good hands that the Jeſuit Parſons was the author of it; ſome perſons ſtill living can witneſs, that one Rench, a Bookſeller, was condemned to be hanged for printing this book with another that the ſame author wrote under the name of Doleman. There is a parliament-man, now ſitting in the Houſe of Commons, who has cauſed Junius Brutus's work to be tranſlated into Engliſh by the ſame Walker who has written the monthly Mercuries. This tranſlation has been publiſhed; but leſt it ſhould be known that it is the [E] An Anti-Valerian.] Mr Baillet (12), ſays that the Anti-Valerian was written againſt a book of Controverſy of Father Valerian Magni, printed at Vienna in Auſtria in 1641, with the title of Judicium de Acatholicorum & Catholicorum Regula credendi. This is true; but I obſerve that this Capuchin's work is compoſed of two treatiſes which are not twins. That which concerns the rule of faith of the Non-Catholics, is ſome years older than the other. It was publiſhed at Prague, in the year 1628. Several Proteſtants anſwered it. John Major, in the year 1630. James Martini, and John Botſac in 1631, Conrad Bergius in 1639. A Socinian attacked it in the year 1633, without naming himſelf: this was Joachim Stegman, whom I have mentioned above (13). He did more injury to the cauſe than good. This Capuchin's book was re-printed at Vienna in the year 1641, with the author's replies to thoſe five antagoniſts, and with the Treatiſe intituled, Catholicorum Regula Credendi.

(rr) The Bibliotheca Antitrinitariorum, which ſays, pag. 117, that Crellius wrote a book under the name of Junius Brutus, informs us, pag. 133, that this other book was written by Joachim Stegman, with this title, Brevis Diſquiſitio quomodo vulgo dicti Evangelici Pontificios ac nominatim Valeriani Magni de Acatholicorum credendi regula Judicium, ſolidè atque evidenter refutare queant. Eleutheropoli apud Godfridum Philalethium 1633, in 12*mo*.

(ss) Num. xxxix.

(tt) That is, Sorbiere.

(uu) Mr Hill, Miniſter of the Engliſh Church of Rotterdam, was pleaſed to acquaint me with it, and to lend me the book.

† Nullum aliud remedium proponitur privatis hominibus tyranno ſubjectis præter vitæ emendationem, preces & lachrymas. Beza, in Confeſſione Fidei Chriſtianæ, cap. v, circa finem.

‡ Ibid.

(12) Baillet, Anti, num. xxxix.

(13) Citation (rr).

Jeſuit Parſons's book, Junius Brutus's name has been left out, and another title put to it.

This is the ſubſtance of the Latin extracts I cauſed to be made out of this Engliſh book. It is a curious thing, in my opinion, that Robert Parſons the Jeſuit ſhould paſs in England for the author of Stephen Junius Brutus's Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos: but I do not believe that this work ought to be aſcribed to him (xx). I can hardly think it poſſible that an Engliſh Jeſuit ſhould write at that time upon ſuch a queſtion, without ſaying any thing relating to England, and nothing but what beſpeaks him a good French Proteſtant.

(xx) Mr Hill told me, that Chriſtopher Love, Miniſter of London, who was beheaded during Cromwell's uſurpation, maintained, in a book, that Parſons is the pretended Junius Brutus.

A DISSERTATION CONCERNING DEFAMATORY LIBELS,

On occaſion of a paſſage of Tacitus, which I have recited in the article CASSIUS SEVERUS (a), and which informs us that Auguſtus was the firſt who proceeded againſt thoſe libels by the law de Majeſtate.

I. An innovation under the empire of Auguſtus, with regard to libels.

I Would fain know what reaſons the Emperor Auguſtus went upon, to involve Defamatory Libels, under the crimes of high-treaſon; for as Tacitus obſerves, before this, treacheries, which had weakened the armies, ſeditions which had weakened the people, and laſtly, an ill adminiſtration of offices which had weakened the majeſty of the Republic, were only comprehended under this kind of crimes: and actions indeed were puniſhed, but not words. 'Legem majeſtatis reduxerat; cui nomen apud veteres idem, ſed alia in judicium veniebant: ſi quis proditione exercitum, aut plebem ſeditionibus, denique male geſta Rep. majeſtatem populi Romani minuiſſet. Facta arguebantur, dicta impunè erant. Primus Auguſtus cognitionem de famoſis libellis ſpecie legis ejus tractavit, commotus Caſſii Severi libidine, qua viros feminaſque illuſtres procacibus ſcriptis diffamaverat (b). - - - Auguſtus had revived the law concerning violated majeſty; a law, which in the days of our anceſtors, had indeed the ſame name, but implied different arraignments, and crimes; namely thoſe againſt the ſtate, as when an army was betrayed abroad, when ſeditions were raiſed at home; in ſhort, when the public was faithleſsly adminiſtered, and the majeſty of the Roman people was debaſed: theſe were actions, and actions were puniſhed, but words were free. Auguſtus was the firſt, who brought libels under the penalties of this wreſted law, being provoked by the inſolence of Caſſius Severus, who had in his writings wantonly defamed men and ladies of illuſtrious quality.' For which reaſon another Hiſtorian obſerves, that it was a novelty to ſee a lady of the family of the Claudii accuſed before the people, as guilty of high-treaſon, for having ſaid in the hearing of a prodigious multitude, that ſtopt her coach, would to God my brother would return into the world, and loſe another fleet, that there might be fewer people at Rome (c). The Commentators obſerve here a two-fold novelty; one in the ſex of the accuſed, the other in entitling a ſimple wiſh, a treaſon. I do not ſee that even at preſent, it is a point of law, well eſtabliſhed, and conſtantly practiſed, that ſlanders upon the Prince's perſon, even in writing, ſhould be deemed ſtate-crimes, or high-treaſon (d). So that Auguſtus, did a thing, ſo much the more ſingular, becauſe he principally eſtabliſhed that law againſt ſatires, which did not concern his perſon. I have before related Tacitus's words, which ſhew that Caſſius Severus's libels againſt perſons of quality of both ſexes, obliged this Emperor to make this new law. I do not find that this Caſſius was accuſed of libelling Auguſtus, and I find in Suetonius, that this Emperor did not puniſh ſatirical diſcourſes nor writings that concerned him. 'Nec quidquam ultra aut ſtatim aut poſtea inquiſivit. Tiberio quoque de eadem re ſedulo violentius apud ſe per epiſtolam conquerenti ita reſcripſit, ætati tuæ, mi Tiberi, noli in hac re indulgere, & nimium indignari quemquam eſſe qui de me male loquatur, ſatis eſt enim ſi hoc habemus, ne quis nobis male facere poſſit (e). . . . . Etiam ſparſos de ſe in curia famoſos libellos, nec expavit, nec magnâ curâ redarguit, ac ne requiſitis quidem autoribus, id modo cenſuit cognoſcendum poſthac de iis qui libellos aut carmina ad infamiam cujuſpiam ſub alieno nomine ederent (f). - - - - Nor did Auguſtus make any further inquiry after theſe libels, either as ſoon as they came out or afterwards. Tiberius having written a letter to him, wherein he very earneſtly and warmly complained of that affair, he wrote back thus. My dear Tiberius, do not indulge the warmth of your youth in that matter, nor be too much provoked, that there is any body who ſpeaks ill of

---

(a) Citation (9).

(b) Tacit. Annal. lib. i, cap. lxxii.

(c) Novo more judicium majeſtatis apud populum mulier ſubiit, quod in conferta multitudine ægre procedente carpento palam optaverit ut frater ſuus pulcher reviviſceret, atque iterum claſſem amitteret quo minor turba Romæ foret. Sueton. in Tiber. cap. ii.

(d) Auberi, Hiſtory of Cardinal de Richelieu, lib. iv, p. m. 405, quotes an arreſt of the Parliament of Paris, of the 27th of April 1620, which condemned to the gallies a man convicted of high-treaſon for having had a hand in a libel againſt the ſtate.

(e) Sueton. in Aug. cap. li.

(f) Ibid. cap. lv.

'me; for it is ſufficient if we have this ſatisfaction, that no body can do us harm .... 'And when ſome libels which defamed him, were diſperſed in the court, he was neither much 'concerned, nor did he take much care to ſuppreſs them; and, without inquiring after the au- 'thors of them, he only ordered that, for the future, they who publiſhed under the name of 'another man, poems, or libels which defamed any perſon, ought to be proſecuted.'

II. Three Hiſtorians give an imperfect account of it, eſpecially Suetonius.

But who will not be ſurprized at this, that tho' three different authors have ſpoken one after another, of this law of Auguſtus, yet we do not find the circumſtances of it exactly explained and confirmed, by the mutual aſſiſtance of the three witneſſes? Tacitus barely tells us that the crime of writing Defamatory Libels, was brought under the law de Majeſtate. Suetonius who came after Tacitus, makes no mention of this law de Majeſtate; he only ſays Auguſtus ordered, that for the future, thoſe, who publiſhed ſuch Libels under another name, ſhould be proſecuted. Dion, who comes after Suetonius, likewiſe makes no mention of the law de Majeſtate, and only ſays, 1. That Auguſtus, two years before he died, ordered informations to be made againſt Defamatory Libels, and that the Ædiles of Rome, and the Governors of other places, ſhould burn all the writings of this kind that they ſhould diſcover. 2. That he puniſhed ſome Libellers. Of thoſe three Hiſtorians, Suetonius has the leaſt cleared up this matter, ſince his words would allow us to think, that provided a man wrote Libels under no name, or under his own (g), he might ſafely defame all the court and the city. Why then was Caſſius Severus baniſhed? Why were Labienus's writings burnt? Can any one believe it was becauſe theſe two authors had publiſhed their books under the names of others? What a fooliſh conceit would this be!

III. Vain attempts to juſtify Suetonius.

Torrentius would ſave Suetonius's honour by ſubſtituting, without the authority of any manuſcript, theſe words ſuo alienove nomine, - - under his own name, or that of another man, for theſe ſub alieno nomine, - - - under the name of another man. But I obſerve that this correction has been rejected with the utmoſt contempt; ſo far that Suetonius's Commentator in uſum Delphini, thought it did not make a new ſenſe, ſo little had he examined it. Others by ſub alieno nomine, &c. - - - under the name of another man, &c. will have the ſatires to be underſtood, in which the names of the perſons ſatirized, did not appear. But this explanation is only looked upon as a laſt ſhift: after all, notwithſtanding theſe expedients, might not the moſt abuſive ſatires have been publiſhed with impunity, according to Suetonius; provided they had been anonymous, or had not abuſed a man under a falſe name, but under his true name? And would not this be a ſhameful reproach to the Emperor's council? Laſtly, ſome ſay, that whereas the laws of the twelve tables had ſufficiently prohibited the making ſatires in one's own name, Auguſtus thought himſelf only obliged to condemn thoſe which were publiſhed under the name of another perſon. But 1. We do not ſee that the laws of the twelve tables concern anonymous ſatires more or leſs, than thoſe that appeared under a man's true name or falſe one. 2. It had been very needleſs to forbid only thoſe that ſhould come out with the names of the authors: and what probability is there, that the ancient laws of Rome ſhould have left ſo large a gap, for any one who had a mind to evade them? 3. Is it uſual in making any addition to a law not to renew and confirm the ancient orders? 4. Can it be conceived that if the ancient Roman laws had not puniſhed the moſt puniſhable ſatires, that is, the nameleſs ones, whoſe blows fall thickeſt and heavieſt, Auguſtus, when he was ſupplying what was wanting in them, ſhould have forgot the moſt neceſſary remedy, viz. the puniſhment of anonymous libels? It is far more probable, that it was he, who cauſed the law or the decree of the ſenate to be made, the words whereof, Ulpian has preſerved to us; 'Si quis librum ad infamiam alicujus pertinentem ſcripſit, compoſuit, 'edidit, dolove malo fecit quo quid eorum fieret, etiamſi alterius nomine ediderit, vel 'ſine nomine; uti de ea re agere liceat: & ſi condemnatus ſit, qui id fecit, inteſtabilis 'ex lege eſſe jubetur (h). - - - If any perſon ſhould write, compoſe, or publiſh a book tending 'to defame another man, or is unlawfully concerned in the writing or publiſhing of ſuch a 'book, notwithſtanding he ſhould publiſh it in the name of another perſon, or without any name; 'let him be proſecuted: and if the author of that book be found guilty, by virtue of this law, 'he ſhall be incapable of making any laſt will or teſtament.'

I confeſs the modern Hiſtorians are too prolix, and that ſome of them write more volumes upon the age they live in, than Livy wrote upon all the ages of conquering Rome, from the time of it's foundation, to the empire of Cæſar. But on the other hand the Antients are too ſhort, and it is better for our inſtruction, that a Hiſtory ſhould contain too many particulars, than omit too many.

IV. Whether libels were comprehended under the crimes of high-treaſon, becauſe they are an uſurpation of the ſupreme authority.

Perhaps ſome will think that Auguſtus needed no very refined reaſoning to ſhew, that Libellers deſerved to be proſecuted as guilty of high-treaſon, ſince it is evident that a ſubject who defames his neighbour, uſurps one of the rights of ſovereignty, and that it belongs ſolely to the ſovereign to inflict the pain of infamy, as well as that of baniſhment, impriſonment, death, &c. But this would be a very falſe way of reaſoning, and at once convert into high-treaſon, the violation of all the laws, adultery, theft, ſeducing a virgin, &c. for it may be ſaid that a robber not only deſpiſes the laws of his ſovereign, but alſo uſurps a right that belongs ſolely to him: none but a ſovereign can take away a private man's poſſeſſions, either in whole or in part. The right of fining, confiſcating, &c. muſt flow from the ſupreme power, as well as that of branding any one with infamy;

(g) Id modo cenſuit (Auguſtus) cognoſcendum poſthac de iis qui libellos aut carmina ad infamiam cujuſpiam ſub alieno nomine ederent. Sueton. in Aug. cap. lv.

(h) Baudouin, who relates thoſe words of the law, is of opinion that it was enacted under Auguſtus or Tiberius. See his treatiſe in Leges XII Tabul. cap. ix, p. m. 49, 50.

infamy; and conſequently we cannot ſay, that a ſatiriſt, who defames his neighbour, is guilty of high-treaſon, without concluding that a robber, and a fornicator, are ſo too. This would hold ſo much the truer with reſpect to fornicators, becauſe if they debauch a married woman, they hazzard the defrauding the true heirs, by the intruſion of an illegitimate coheir, and at the ſame time, they bring a great diſhonour upon the head of the huſband: if they debauch a maid, they caſt upon her an ignominious blemiſh, which reflects upon her family, and they cauſe her father a real damage and a pecuniary loſs, like that which conſiſts in the waſte of merchandiſes. For indeed a defloured maid, is like palled wine, which ſinks in its price; it is a commodity which the proprietor has ſtill upon his hands, unleſs he will put it off at a great loſs; I mean by undermatching his daughter, or giving her an exorbitant portion. We cannot therefore this way juſtify the new law of Auguſtus: the ſhorteſt way is probably to confeſs that it was not regular. I do not know but by a forced conſtruction, it was derived from a maxim or definition, that is found in Cicero, which makes it a diminution of the majeſty of the Roman people, to take any thing from the dignity, grandeur, or power of that people, or from thoſe to whom they communicated any power. Majeſtatem minuere eſt de dignitate, aut amplitudine, aut poteſtate populi, aut eorum quibus populus poteſtatem dedit aliquid derogare (i). I only believe, that by the law de Majeſtate, muſt be meant ſomething more, than Auberi means in the place I have cited, where he ſays, that Auguſtus did but renew the proſecution for a capital crime, which the laws of the twelve tables had enacted againſt the authors of Defamatory Libels. I ſhall obſerve by the way, that Mr Naudé has miſtaken the twelve tables for a decree of the ſenate. Nay, he affords a proof of his error, for what he cites from Arnobius, manifeſtly proves the juſtice of my cenſure. If the parliament, ſays he (k), had had leiſure to caſt their eyes upon all theſe Defamatory Libels, I dare ſay they would have hindred the ſale of a great part of them, had it been only to imitate the virtue of that antient Roman ſenate, of which Arnobius ſaid, if my memory does not fail me: ‘ Carmen malum conſcribere, quo fama alterius coinquinetur, & vita, decemviralibus ſcitis evadere noluiſtis impunitum. - - - By the laws of the Decemviri (or of the twelve tables), you did not ſuffer the man to paſs unpuniſhed, who wrote any malicious poem, to defame the character and life of another perſon.’

Tiberius continued this innovation of Auguſtus, eſpecially on account of ſome ſlandering writers, who attacked his perſon, and touched the moſt tender ſores of his family. ‘ Mox Tiberius conſultante Pompeio Macro Prætore, an judicia Majeſtatis redderentur, exercendas leges eſſe reſpondit. Hunc quoque aſperavere carmina incertis auctoribus vulgata in ſævitiam ſuperbiamque ejus, & diſcordem cum matre animum (l). - - - Tiberius afterwards, when Pompeius Macer the Prætor conſulted him, whether proceſs ſhould be granted upon this law? anſwered, that the laws muſt be executed. He alſo was exaſperated by ſatirical verſes, written by unknown authors, and diſperſed, expoſing his cruelty, his pride, and his mind naturally alienated from his mother.’ He afterwards extended this law to every body (m): poor Cremutius Cordus in vain pleaded (n), that he had written nothing offenſive, either againſt Tiberius, or the Empreſs, who were thoſe, ſaid he, whom the law de Majeſtate comprehended; this was not ſufficient to clear him from his pretended crime of having praiſed Brutus and Caſſius. ‘ Verba mea, Patres Conſcripti, arguuntur, adeò factorum innocens ſum. Sed neque hæc in principem aut principis parentem, quos lex majeſtatis amplectitur (o). - - - - As to facts, I am ſo guiltleſs, conſcript fathers, that my words only are accuſed: but neither are any words of mine pointed againſt the Emperor, or his mother, who are the only perſons comprehended in the law concerning violated majeſty.’ Note, That Tacitus ſeems to have forgotten what he had ſaid in the ſeventy-ſecond chapter of the firſt book: for as he makes Cremutius Cordus ſpeak, one would think that only libels againſt the Emperor, and the Empreſs were comprehended under the law de Majeſtate: But there is not any ſhadow of that reſtriction in the ſeventy-ſecond chapter.

V.
Nero bore libels ſomewhat patiently.

But I muſt not forget to ſay, that this law de Majeſtate, was not always fatal. Nero, cruel as he was, not only did not annul the decree of the ſenate, which condemned the Prætor Antiſtius only to baniſhment, and the confiſcation of his eſtate, for having publiſhed ſome ſatires againſt the Emperor (p); but he declared to the ſenate, that he permitted them fully to abſolve Antiſtius. Se qui ſeveritatem decernentium impediturus fuerit, moderationem non prohibere. Statuerent ut vellent, datam etiam abſolvendi licentiam (q). The ſenate ſtood to their firſt reſolution. Almoſt at the ſame time Fabricius Vejento, author of ſeveral libels againſt the ſenators, and the clergy of Rome (r), having been tried by Nero himſelf, was only baniſhed Italy. His books were condemned to be burnt: they were afterwards bought up and read with the greateſt eagerneſs, whilſt there was danger in doing it; but when it was permitted to have them, they were no longer minded. Convictum Vejentonem Italia depulit & libros exuri juſſit, conquiſitos lectitatoſque donec cum periculo parabantur, mox licentia habendi oblivionem attulit (s). Suetonius obſerves, as a very ſingular thing, that Nero was ſo paſſive, as to detraction, that he ſhewed no greater mildneſs to any, than to ſuch as exerciſed their ſatirical wit upon him. Some galling verſes upon him were handed about and poſted up; but he was not concerned at it, he made no ſearch after the authors; and ſome of them having been proſecuted before the ſenate, he prevented their being rigorouſly puniſhed for it. Mirum

(i) Cicero, lib. ii, de Invent. I ſay nothing of a paſſage of Cicero, Epiſt. XI, lib. iii, ad famil. wherein he ſays, as ſome will have it, that Sylla made it high-treaſon to defame any perſon; eſt majeſtas (& ſic Sylla voluit) ne in quemvis impure declamari liceret; I ſay, I do not ſpeak of it, becauſe I do not think it is well corrected. Beſides, I ſhould prefer Lambinus's explication to that of Manutius, though I am of opinion that they are both faulty.

(k) Naudé, Dialogues de Maſcurat. pag. 18.

(l) Tacit. Annal. lib. i, cap. lxxii.

(m) See Suetonius, in Tiber. cap. lviii.

(n) Apud Tacitum, Annal. lib. iv, cap. xxxiv.

(o) Ibid.

(p) Probroſa adverſus principem carmina factitavit, vulgavitque celebri convivio. . . . Exin . . . majeſtatis delatus eſt. Tacit. Annal. lib. xiv, cap. xlviii.

(q) Tacit. ibid. cap. xl.

(r) Quod multa & probroſa in Patres & Sacerdotes compoſuiſſet, iis libris quibus nomen codicillorum dederat. Ibid. cap. l.

(s) Ibid.

& vel præcipue notabile inter hæc fuit, nihil eum patientius quam maledicta & convicia hominum tuliſſe, neque in ullos leniorem, quam qui ſe dictis aut carminibus laceſſiſſent, extitiſſe. . . . Vel contemptu omnis infamiæ, vel ne fatendo dolorem irritaret ingenia (t). All the puniſhment he ordered for the galling raillery of a Cynic, who had inſulted him in the open ſtreet, and for his being ridiculed on the ſtage, was the baniſhing the Philoſopher and Comedian out of Italy. Suetonius could not tell whether there was more indolence than policy in it: For Nero, by ſhewing his reſentment would have had reaſon to fear he ſhould encourage the detractors; and every one knows Tacitus's ſentence in the thirty-fourth chapter of the fourth book of his Annals, on occaſion of a doubt like that of Suetonius: an injury, ſays he, that is deſpiſed, falls of itſelf: if you are diſturbed at it, you propagate and ſtrengthen it. ‘Carmina Bibaculi & Catulli referta contumeliis Cæſarum leguntur: ſed ipſe divus Julius, ipſe divus Auguſtus, & tulere iſta & reliquere, haud facilè dixerim, moderatione magis an ſapientiâ: namque ſpreta exoleſcunt: ſi iraſcare, adgnita videntur. - - - The poems of Bibaculus and thoſe of Catullus, ſtuffed with virulent ſatires againſt the Cæſars, are ſtill read. But even the deified Julius, even the deified Auguſtus, bore all theſe invectives and diſdained them, whether with greater moderation or wiſdom, I cannot eaſily ſay. For, if they are deſpiſed, they fade away, if you was wroth, you ſeem to avow them to be juſt.’

VI.
It is very neceſſary to reſtrain the licentiouſneſs of libels. The antient Heathens reſtrained it.

This is well enough, if the queſtion is only about pardoning the ſlanders, in which a ſovereign is perſonally concerned; but his ſubjects ought not to be left expoſed to this outrage. Domitian would deſerve to be highly extolled, had he only puniſhed thoſe who had ſlandered the perſons of the beſt quality in Rome, in which he did not uſe too much rigour (u). It ſeems therefore that the exceſſive ſeverity of Auguſtus againſt defamatory libels, if ſeparated from the abuſe his ſucceſſors often made of that law, conſiſted only in the expreſſion and in the pompous word de Majeſtate, and ſo his conduct is not in reality blamable: for this licentiouſneſs of libels, is one of thoſe that ought chiefly to be reſtrained in a government. The honour, glory, and reputation of families, things a thouſand times more precious than gold or ſilver, would be very precarious, unleſs the inſolence, and malignity of ſatirical writers were repreſſed. Indeed they would begin with perſons of an ill life; but after ſuch a beginning they would ſpread like the plague, indiſcriminately upon places both ſacred and profane, upon chaſt as well as proſtitute families. Antiquity would have had a full experience of this, had it not been at laſt prevented by good laws, and by ſubmitting libellers to the ſecular power, when jeſts were carried too far, and when thoſe who were not yet bitten by theſe mad dogs, conſidered that their turn would alſo come, and that therefore they ought to concur with thoſe who had been already wounded, to put a ſtop to ſuch a diſorder. It is in this caſe as when a houſe is on fire; the neighbours labour as much to extinguiſh it, as they whoſe houſe is actually in flames (w). Let us ſee how Horace relates the affair.

Feſcennina per hunc inventa licentia morem
Verſibus alternis opprobria ruſtica fudit,
Libertaſque recurrentes accepta per annos
Luſit amabiliter, donec jam ſævus apertam
In rabiem cœpit verti jocus, & per honeſtas
Ire minax impune domos. Doluere cruento
Dente laceſſiti, fuit intactis quoque cura
Conditione ſuper communi: quin etiam lex
Pœnaque lata, malo quæ nollet carmine quemquam
Deſcribi. Vertêre modum formidine fuſtis
Ad benedicendum delectandumque redacti (x).

Hence grew the liberty of the looſer Muſe,
Hence they grew ſcurrilous and would abuſe;
Hence thoſe looſe dialogues at marriage feaſts,
Yet ſtill they were but mirth, and country jeſts.
At laſt, they ſhew'd their teeth, and ſharply bit
And railery uſurped their place of wit.
Good perſons were abu'sd, and ſuffer'd wrong;
They loudly talk'd no law to curb their tongue:
The wounded griev'd, the ſmart provok'd their hate;
And all untouch'd bewail'd the common fate:
Till laws commanded to regard men's fame,
Severely laſh the vice, but ſpare the name.
Fear made them civil, and deſign to write
With modeſty, ſpeak well, and to delight. CREECH.

Cicero had alſo obſerved, that the antient Greek comedies ſo much abuſed the liberty they had to cenſure the bad lives of private perſons, by name, and directly, that no body

---

(t) Sueton. in Nerone, cap. xxxix.

(u) Scripta famoſa vulgoque edita, quibus primores viri ac feminæ notabantur, abolevit non ſine auctorem ignominia. Sueton. in Dom. cap. viii.

(w) Dente Theonino cum circumroditur, ecquid
Ad te poſt paulo ventura pericula ſentis?
Nam tua res agitur, paries cum proximus ardet
Et neglecta ſolent incendia ſumere vires.
Horat. Epiſt. XVIII, lib. i, ver. 82.
Let him on thee, and on thy fame depend
Whom envy bites, for thou may'ſt plainly ſee
The danger will at laſt come o'er to thee:
For you're in danger when the next's on fire,
And flames neglected often blaze the higher.
CREECH.

(x) Idem, Epiſt. I, lib. ii, ver. 145. To which may be added this paſſage, de Arte Poëtica, ver. 281.
Succeſſit vetus his Comœdia, non ſine multa
Laude, ſed in vitium libertas excidit & vim
Dignam lege regi. Lex eſt accepta, choruſque
Turpiter obticuit ſublato jure nocendi.
Next theſe old comedy did pleaſe the age,
But ſoon their liberty was turn'd to rage;
Such rage as civil pow'r was forc'd to tame
And by good laws ſecure mens injur'd fame.
Thus was the chorus loſt, their railing Muſe
Grew ſilent, when forbidden to abuſe.
CREECH.

body eſcaped the ſlanders of the ſtage, not even Pericles, who had ſo long governed the Republic both in peace and war. It had been a tolerable thing, ſaid Cicero, if the wicked citizens had been expoſed to theſe inſults, though it were better that ſuch men ſhould be reproved by the Cenſor than by a Poet; but it is intolerable that ſuch a man as Pericles ſhould not be free from them. ‘Apud Græcos antiquiores fuit lege conceſſum, ‘ut quod vellet Comœdia nominatim vel de quo vellet diceret (y); itaque ſicut in eiſdem libris loquitur Africanus, quem illa non attigit, vel potius quem non vexavit, ‘cui pepercit? Eſto: populares homines improbos, in Rep. ſeditioſos, Cleonem, Cleophontem, Hyperbolum læſit: patiamur, inquit, etſi hujuſmodi cives à Cenſore melius ‘eſt quam à Poëta notari: ſed Periclem cum jam ſuæ civitati maxima autoritate plurimos annos domi & belli præfuiſſet, violari verſibus & eos agi in Scena non plus decuit, ‘quam ſi Plautus, inquit, noſter voluiſſet aut Nævius Publio & Cneo Scipioni, aut ‘Cæcilius Marco Catoni maledicere (z). - - - - - Among the antient Greeks, their comedy ‘was by law allowed to cenſure any action, and any perſon by name. Accordingly, as ‘Africanus ſays, whom has it not attacked, or rather whom has it not galled, whom has it ‘ſpared? Be it ſo: it wounded popular wicked men, who were ſeditious in the Republic, ſuch ‘as Cleon, Cleophontes, and Hyperbolus. Let us bear this, ſays he, though it is better that ‘ſuch citizens ſhould be ſtigmatized by the Cenſor, than by a Poet; but that Pericles when ‘he had now governed the Republic for many years both in peace and war, with great reputation, ſhould be abuſed in plays, and theſe acted upon the ſtage, was as intolerable, ſays ‘he, as if our Plautus or Nevius had reviled Publius and Cnius Scipio, or Cecilius inveighed ‘againſt Cato.’ Of all the treaſures in the world, none could be more expoſed to moth and ruſt, and to the rapacious hands of robbers, than honour and a good name, unleſs the inſolence of theſe ſatiriſts was reſtrained: for as, by I know not what diſmal fatality, the ſpirit of ſlander and revenge is often united with a ſeeming auſtere life, the impunity of libels would give birth to vaſt numbers of them againſt the beſt men; and if a man ſhould provoke ever ſo little a bigot, or a choleric Enthuſiaſt, he would preſently find his reputation ſtained and blackened by that bigot's pen, and the proneneſs of the people to believe this ſort of writers would afford them a ſanctuary, even with reſpect to the moſt extravagant calumnies. If theſe people would not poſtpone the virtues with which they ought to begin a devout life, the virtues, I ſay, which make an honeſt man, and if they would follow the beſt advice that can be given them, viz. not to pretend to be devout before they are good men (aa), they would not diſtinguiſh themſelves as they do, by their ſatirical diſcourſes and defamatory libels.

VII.
What anſwer is to be made to thoſe who pretend to juſtify the writers of libels.

Hence we ſee what anſwer is to be given to thoſe, who ſay that libels are beneficial to ſociety, in as much as they hinder ſeveral perſons of both ſexes from tranſgreſſing the bounds of decency: it is a bridle, ſay they, that reſtrains them: free them from the fear of being defamed to the end of the world, and in all future ages, by ſome ingenious ſatires, and there is no extravagance but what they will run into. This is all wrong: we do not find that hitherto there has been any ſcarcity of libels, and yet the world has not been, and is not bettered by them. Beſides, would not this pretended curb become utterly uſeleſs, by the abuſe that would be made of the remedy, by defaming without quarter or diſtinction all ſorts of families?

But then, muſt ſome be allowed to commit infamous actions, whilſt others ſhall not be allowed to puniſh them with all the trumpets of fame? I anſwer, that as it does not belong to private perſons, to puniſh robbers and muderers, and the care of it ought to be left to thoſe whom the ſupreme authority has appointed for the puniſhment of malefactors; the like ought to be done with reſpect to the puniſhment of infamy. It is encroaching upon the right of the ſovereign, it is laying profane hands upon holy things, to pretend to inflict this ſort of puniſhment, when we are not commiſſioned for it by our governors. A criminal may then juſtly aſk the queſtion that was put to Moſes, who made thee a ruler and a judge over us (bb). What private perſons may lawfully do againſt thoſe who deſerve infamy, is juſt what they may do againſt a robber or an aſſaſſin. They may bring him before the Judges, and witneſs againſt him what they know; they may in like manner impeach the criminal commerce, and infamous life of others; but they muſt do it with all the characters of a formal accuſer: they muſt declare their names and the places of their abode; and eſpecially prove before the Judges, if there be occaſion for it, all their accuſations. Now where are the libellers that take this method? The firſt thing they obſerve is to conceal their names, their profeſſion, and abode. They are not very ſcrupulous about their proofs; the leaſt ſuſpicion or hear-ſay, the tattle in coffee-houſes or taverns, ſerves them for a demonſtration: and therefore they are juſtly liable to the puniſhment of ſlanderers and falſe witneſſes; for to deſerve this puniſhment, it is not neceſſary that what a man advances ſhould be really falſe; it is enough that he maintains it without knowing it, and without being able to prove it.

VIII.
Of the right of Hiſtory, and by whom

I am perſuaded that juſtice and the public good require that evil actions ſhould be brought to the tribunal of fame, there to receive the puniſhment due to them, intereſt Reipublicæ cognoſci malos (cc): but every body ought not to pretend to do this. For if the evil action you deſire to make public, is of ſuch a nature that it may be puniſhed

2 by

(y) See Horace at the beginning of the fourth ſatire of the firſt book.

(z) Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, lib. ii, cap. ix, ex Ciceronis, lib. iv, de Republicâ.

(aa) See the Réflexions ſur les Defauts d'autrui, printed at Paris in the year 1690.

(bb) Exod. ii. 4.

(cc) Exſequi ſententias haud inſtitui niſi inſignes per honeſtum aut notabili dedecore: quod præcipuum munus Annalium reor, ne virtutes ſileantur, utque PRAVIS DICTIS FACTISQUE EX POSTERITATE ET INFAMIA METUS SIT. - - - - It is no part of my purpoſe to trace all the votes of particular men, unleſs they are memorable for integrity, or for notorious infamy: this I conceive to be the principal duty of an Hiſtorian, that he ſuppreſs no inſtance of virtue, and that BY THE DREAD OF FUTURE INFAMY AND THE CENSURES OF POSTERITY, MEN MAY BE DETERRED FROM DETESTABLE ACTIONS AND PROSTITUTE SPEECHES. Tacit. Annal. lib. iii, cap. lxv.

it ought to be written. Great abuſe in this.

by the laws of the land, you muſt leave it to the Magiſtrates, or at moſt help them, by a judicial teſtimony, that the crime may at once bear a double puniſhment, that of public fame, and that of the Judges. We muſt remember that we are not to give an account of our conduct to a Poet, or any other ſuch writer, but to the Magiſtrates. This is the doctrine of a good author, as will appear by theſe Latin words. ‘ Noſtræ ‘ contra duodecim Tabulæ cum perpaucas res capite ſanxiſſent, in his hanc quoque ‘ ſanciendam putaverunt, ſi quis occentaviſſet, ſive carmen condidiſſet, quod infamiam faceret ‘ flagitiumve alteri. Præclarè, judiciis enim ac Magiſtratuum diſceptationibus legitimis ‘ propoſitam vitam, non poëtarum ingeniis habere debemus, nec probrum audire, niſi ‘ ea lege ut reſpondere liceat & judicio defendere (dd). - - - - - - Though in our laws of ‘ the twelve tables very few crimes are made capital, yet the following is of that number : ‘ namely, if any perſon ſhould publiſh or write verſes, which defame another man, or ‘ injure his reputation. This is an excellent inſtitution ; for our lives ought to be ſubmitted ‘ only to the lawful examination and judgments of the Magiſtrates, and not to the wit and ‘ raillery of Poets ; nor ought we to hearken to an accuſation againſt any man, but upon con- ‘ dition that he is allowed to anſwer, and judicially defend himſelf.’ If the evil action be of another kind, and paſſes unpuniſhed, either on account of the indulgence of the Magiſtrate, or becauſe of the perſons who commit it, neither does it then belong to every man, to take upon him to write about it. This ſhould be done by Hiſtorians; and none ſhould write Hiſtory but men choſen and authorized by the government. By this means the brand which Hiſtory ſhould fix on the name and memory of thoſe who deſerve the public infamy, would proceed from its true channel, being derived from the power of the ſword, wherewith the ſovereign is armed for the puniſhment of the wicked. As the ſacred Hiſtory was not the work of a private perſon, but of men who had received from GOD a ſpecial commiſſion to write (ee) ; ſo the Civil Hiſtory ſhould be compoſed only by thoſe whom the ſovereign of each ſtate appoints for that purpoſe, and then it might be preſumed that Hiſtory would not defame people upon falſe grounds ; whereas, as the world goes at preſent, it diſtributes puniſhments and rewards, diſgrace and praiſe, condemnation and abſolution, upon the firſt reports of fame, ſophiſticated and wreſted by a thouſand paſſions. And what is ſurpriſing, is, that the meaneſt Hiſtorian claims the privilege which belong only to ſome ; he pretends he is not bound to produce his proofs and his witneſſes. Quis unquam ab hiſtorico juratores exegit (ff)? - - - Whoever requires an Hiſtorian to bring affidavits for what he advances ?

I do not ſay but that there are inconveniencies on the other ſide ; yet there being ſome every where, the greateſt ought to be avoided, as doubtleſs are that multitude of writers, who ſully hiſtorical facts with their impure hands, ſully them I ſay, not only for the preſent time but for future ages ; ſince there will ever be too many continuators of Mellificium Pezelii, Sethus Calviſius, Sleidan's Commentaries &c. (gg) too many writers of abridgments, in uſum ſtudioſæ juventutis ; in a word, too many writers who will fetch their informations from thence, and perpetuate the falſities that are daily divulged [A]. What is ſaid of the firſt impreſſions in general, that they are of long continuance,

> Quo ſemel eſt imbuta recens ſervabit odorem
> Teſta diu (hh),
>
> What ſeaſon'd firſt the veſſel keeps the taſte, Creech.

is moſt true eſpecially with reſpect to the firſt alterations which events ſuffer from their beginning by the diſguiſed relations that are made of them in haſte, and diſperſed with all the expedition imaginable. This is an original ſin, the propagation whereof cannot be denied ; too many examples prove it ; and here lies the miſchief : for as all people pretty much reſemble thoſe of whom a Cardinal Legate ſaid, as he gave them his benediction,

ſince

(dd) Cicero, IV de Legib. apud Auguſt. lib. ii, de Civit. Dei, cap. ix.

(ee) 2 Pet. I, 20, 21.

(ff) Seneca, de morte Claudii.

(gg) If I ſpecify ſome authors, it is without any affectation or deſign ; but only becauſe I happen to remember ſcrivener's complaints Act. in Schiſm. Angl. pag. 2, of the Biblioth. Univerſ. Tom. xvi, pag. 44, & ſeq. & paſſim alibi, and thoſe of Schoockius, Fabul. Hamel. pag. 140. See alſo Wicquefort, de l'Ambaſſadeur, Tom. i, pag. 173.

(hh) Horat. Epiſt. II, lib. i, ver. 69.

[A] Too many writers will . . . . . perpetuate the falſities that are daily divulged.] I might have ſpoken of another ſort of writers. The Continuators of Pezelius, Calviſius ; the Theatrum Europæ, &c ; they who publiſh Synopſes rerum toto orbe geſtarum, and abridgements of Univerſal Hiſtory, in uſum ſtudioſæ juventutis, are I confeſs the greateſt propagators of falſe news ; but they are not the only ones, nor perhaps the moſt dangerous preſervers of falſities. There are ſome Hiſtorians, who taking a contrary courſe, deceive thoſe very perſons who pretend to be nice. I mean ſome Hiſtorians like Varillas : they love to ſay what is not to be found in common Hiſtories : they aſpire to the glory of having diſcovered ſecret memoirs, the occult qualities of the firſt miniſters, and the ſecret of intrigues and negociations, which no body knew before. If a thing has been left in oblivion by every body, they will be ſure to publiſh it for that very reaſon. Nay, they go farther ; they build a whole ſyſtem upon it : this ſerves them as a key to open the cabinets of Princes and they pretend to unfold many myſteries by this means. When thoſe gentlemen find in the corner of a library, or among the duſty old papers of an inventory, a printed piece which was unknown to them, they read it greedily, for which they are to be praiſed. But if they find in it any ſingular rare and ſuprizing particular they immediately take it up, and make it the baſis of the conjectures they deſign to vent as matters of fact, or Hiſtorical illuſtrations. For this they are not to be commended. It is very often the way to deceive people. If any of theſe men ſhould find an hundred years hence, a copy of the Paſtoral Letter, which was immediately ſuppreſſed by its author, he would make his advantage of it. He would boaſt of having diſcovered things unknown to all other Hiſtorians ; he would reaſon upon this at random, and give all Europe a new face, with reſpect to the ſecret motives

of

ſince they have a mind to be deceived, let them be deceived; and moreover ſince it cannot be doubted that a falſe report believed for three days may do a great deal of good to a nation [B], whereas a true piece of news, believed as long, may occaſion the ruin of it; it of Princes. He would revive a falſity, which lived but a few days in the common news, and would perpetuate it; for there will always be ſome Hiſtorians, who will relate what they ſhall read in Varillas, for inſtance. I muſt acquaint my reader, that the ſuppreſſion of this Paſtoral Letter, came to my knowledge only by a little pamphlet of fifteen pages in 4to, dated on the twenty-fifth of January 1696 (1). I there found (2) that the author of the Paſtoral Letters having cited, as a proof of the favourable intentions of the Allies, a project of peace drawn up by the Diet of Ratiſbonne . . . . . which had been contrived by a ſpeculative Politician of Amſterdam . . . . was ſo aſhamed of being impoſed upon by that ſpurious piece, that he immediately printed another edition of his Paſtoral Letter, in which he omitted that paſſage.

[B] A falſe report believed for three days may do a great deal of good, to a nation, &c.] This maxim is aſcribed to Catherine de Medicis, that a falſe piece of news believed three days may ſave a nation (3). Hiſtories abound with the advantages of falſe news. The heads of the League maintained themſelves a long time in Paris by that means. The Duke of Maienne not being able to deny, that he had loſt the field of battle at Ivri, made people believe that the Bearnois (the King of Navarre) had been killed, and that in other places the League was triumphant (4). Theſe are the words of an Hiſtorian: Seeing their army thus ſhattered, they had recourſe to their uſual artifices, which were to impoſe upon the Pariſians with lies, they publiſhed in abundance of papers, importing that at the firſt aſſault given at Dreux, the inhabitants had killed above five hundred of the King's troops, and wounded a greater number, and that the Marſhal Biron had been mortally wounded. That in an encounter near Poiſſi the League had obtained a great victory. That in the battle the fight was long, and the loſs almoſt equal, and that if the Bearnois was not dead, he was as good as dead (5). Peter Matthieu relates that the Count de Charolois, being under the neceſſity of encouraging his troops by the hopes of a ſpeedy ſuccour, ſuborned a Franciſcan who pretended to come from Bretagne, and ſaid that he had left the army ſo near, that it would be ſeen the ſame day . . . . . . This artifice increaſed if not the courage, at leaſt the patience of the moſt diſheartened, and the lie proved uſeful for the little time it was believed. The great deſire of ſeeing the troops of Bretagne, made it believed without any conſideration (6). Theſe laſt words are not uſeleſs here, for they ſhew the bent and diſpoſition of the people to give into ſuch artifices: they eaſily believe what flatters them, and they wait patiently. Peter Matthieu's marginal note, deſerves to be tranſcribed. When an army or a town, ſays he (7), is in expectation of relief, they muſt always be told that it is coming, and if there ſhould be news to the contrary, it is prudent in the General to ſpread about a different report. Syphax ſends word to Scipio that he cannot aſſiſt him, and that on the contrary he is for Carthage. Scipio treats and careſſes his Ambaſſadors, and gives them preſents, in order to make his ſoldiers believe that Syphax was coming, and that the Ambaſſadors returned to haſten his departure. It is with reſpect to theſe ſtratagems, that it may eſpecially be ſaid, nil ſub ſole novum, - - - There is nothing new under the ſun. The Moderns in this point are but the imitators of the Ancients (8). Sincerity was never pretended to in the freſh accounts of public misfortunes, and it would be generally prejudicial to pretend to it. Livy juſtly cenſures the Roman Conſul, who after the fatal battle of Cannæ acknowledged to the deputies of the Allies all the loſs he had ſuſtained. ‘ Auxit rerum ſuarum ſuique contemptum Conſul nimis detegendo cladem nudandoque (9). - - - - The Conſul rendered his army and himſelf ſtill more contemptible, by giving too bare and naked an account of the defeat at Cannæ.’ The effect of this plain dealing was, that the Allies concluded from it that Rome would never be able to raiſe its head again, and therefore that they ought to join with Hannibal. We learn from Plutarch that an Athenian was cruelly tortured, for telling a piece of ill news, which however was very true (10). Having heard of Nicias's defeat from a ſtranger, who was come aſhore at the port of Pyræeus, he went in all haſte to acquaint the magiſtrates with that great misfortune. They aſked him how he came by it, and becauſe he could not produce his author, he was puniſhed as a cheat and a diſturber of the public peace (11): nor was he delivered from the rack till the truth of his news was known. Had he made a falſe report of a victory, he would not have ſuffered for it: the action of Stratocles makes me think ſo. He perſuaded the Athenians to offer a ſacrifice to the gods by way of thanks for the defeat of their enemies, and yet he knew that the Athenian fleet had been beaten. The news of the diſaſter was at laſt publiſhed. They were heartily vexed with the impoſtor; but his anſwer ſatisfied them, and there was an end of it: what injury have I done you? ſaid he: I have made you live three days happily. Πολλου δ' ἂν ἔτι καὶ Σπαρτιάτας δεῆσαι τὴν Στρατοκλέους ὕβριν ὑπομεῖναι καὶ βωμολοχίαν, πείσαντος μὲν αὐτοὺς εὐαγγέλια θύειν ὡς νενικηκότας. ἐπεὶ δὲ τῆς ἥττης ἀληθῶς ἀπαγγελθείσης ἠγανάκτουν, ἐρωτῶντος τὸν δῆμον, τί ἠδίκηται, τρεῖς ἡμέρας δι' αὐτὸν ἡδέως γεγονώς. Nullo vero pacto arbitror Spartanos toleraturos fuiſſe Stratoclis ſcurrilem inſultationem, qui ſuis ut ob lætum partæ victoriæ nuncium acceptum, ſacrificarent perſuaſit: cumque ii de accepta clade vero allato nuncio ſuccenſerent, populum interrogavit ecquid injuriæ paſſi eſſent, qui ipſius opera triduum ſuavius vixiſſent (12). It was ſo much gained over the enemy, you will ſay; the Athenians gained two or three days of rejoycing by it: they put off for that time the uneaſineſs which the ill news was to give them. But in reality it is but a ſmall advantage; it is a ſad thing to be brought off from a falſe perſuaſion that has raiſed a great joy; the weight of adverſity ſits more heavily afterwards. Beſides, public rejoycings for an imaginary victory, expoſe a whole nation to contempt, and make the enemy very merry. If Stratocles had been treated as he deſerved, he had been ſeverely puniſhed. For a private perſon to do as Cicero did is a thing of no great conſequence: nay, in ſuch particular conjunctures true prudence will not ſuffer us to believe any thing too lightly, Cicero . . . . . cum Vatinii morte nunciata cujus parum certus videbatur autor, interim, inquit, uſura fruar (13). It is not certain that my enemy is dead, and perhaps in a few days I ſhall hear he is alive and well; but in the mean time I will take advantage of the current report, I will believe it; it is ſo much gain to me. This is what Cicero ſaid; whether it was only a jeſt, or an ingenuous declaration of his thoughts, it matters not. But ſhould a nation uſe this method, and take ſome meaſures upon the falſe news of the defeat of the enemy, it would ſometimes run the riſk of great misfortunes. An Hiſtorian relates that it having been reported that Scipio Africanus, and his brother, were taken priſoners, and that Antiochus had defeated the Roman army they commanded, the Ætolians immediately ſhook off the yoke of the Roman people. This muſt needs have been a pernicious ſtep. I will relate Livy's words, which contain ſome remarkable particulars. We there find a remarkable inſtance of the deceits of fame: it appears from them that the very deputies of the Ætolians in the army of the two Scipio's had ſpread that falſe report, and that only one Hiſtorian has mentioned it. ‘ Valerius Antias author eſt, rumorem celebrem Romæ fuiſſe, & penè pro certo habitum, recipiendi Scipionis adoleſcentis cauſa Cos. L. Scipionem & cum eo P. Africanum in colloquium evocatos regis, & ipſos comprehenſos eſſe, & ducibus captis confeſtim ad caſtra Romana exercitum ductum, eaque expugnata, & deletas omnes copias Romanorum eſſe: ob hæc Ætolos ſuſtuliſſe animos, & abnuiſſe imperata facere, principeſque eorum in Macedoniam & in Dardanos & in Thraciam ad conducenda mercede auxilia profectos: hæc qui nuntiarent Romam, A. Terentium Varronem, & M. Claudium Lepidum ab A. Cornelio proprætore ex Ætolia miſſos eſſe. Subtexit deinde fabulæ huic, legatos Ætolos in ſenatu inter cætera hoc quoque interrogatos eſſe: ‘ unde it cannot be thought ſtrange that the firſt relations ſhould be ſo falſified: Politics, which ſome

---

(1) It is intituled, Parallele de trois Lettres Paſtorales de Mr Jurieu, touchant l'Accompliſſement des Propheties.

(2) Pag. 14, he quotes the Paſtoral Letter of January 1695.

(3) D'Aubigné, Confeſſion Catholique de Sancy, livr. ii, ch. vi, pag. m. 413, 414.

(4) D'Aubigné, Hiſtoire Univerſ. Tom. iii, livr. iii, ch. vi, pag. 322.

(5) Hiſtoire des choſes memorables avenues en France depuis l'an 1547, juſques au commencement de l'an 1597, pag. 720.

(6) Pierre Matthieu, Hiſt. de Louis XI, livr. iii, pag. m. 144.

(7) Ibid.

(8) See the article AGESILAUS II, citations (b), and (c).

(9) Titus Liv. lib. xxiii, pag. m. 355. He relates the whole diſcourſe of the Conſul to the Deputies of Campania.

(10) Plut. in Nicia, ſub fin. pag. m. 542.

(11) Δόξας λογοποιὸς εἶναι καὶ ταράττειν τὴν πόλιν, εἰς τὸν τροχὸν καταδεθεὶς ἐστρεβλοῦτο πολὺν χρόνον. ἕως ἐπῆλθον οἱ τὸ πᾶν κακὸν ὡς εἶχεν ἀπαγγέλλοντες. Pro mendace & civitatis turbatore in rotam deligatus & diu tortus eſt, donec advenerunt qui totam cladem ordine annuntiarunt. Ibid.

(12) Plut. de Repub. gerenda, pag. 799, F. He mentions it alſo in the Life of Demetrius, pag. 893, 894, and makes him anſwer, Εἶτα τί πεπόνθατε δεινὸν, εἰ δύο ἡμέρας ἡδέως γεγόνατε. Quid tandem injuriæ accepiſtis ſi duos dies tranſegiſtis per lætitiam? This loſt battle is that of Amorgos.

(13) Quintil. Inſt. Orat. lib. vi, cap. iii, p. m. 294.

‘ unde audiſſent imperatores Romanos in Aſia captos ab Antiocho rege, & exercitum deletum eſſe? Ætolos reſpondiſſe, ab ſuis legatis ſe, qui cum conſule fuerint, certiores factos. Rumoris hujus quia neminem alium authorem habeo, neque affirmata res mea opinione ſit, nec pro vana prætermiſſa (14). - - - - - Valerius Antias relates that at Rome there went a famous report, which paſſed almoſt for a certainty. that King Antiochus having called Lucius Scipio the Conſul, and Publius Africanus, to a conference about the reſtoring of the young Scipio, had ſeized them, and having made the Roman Generals priſoners, had immediatly marched his army to their camp, attacked and taken it, and cut off all the Roman forces; that upon the news of this pretended overthrow, the Etolians had taken courage and refuſed to obey the commands of the Romans, and that their chiefs had gone into Macedon, Dardania, and Thrace, to levy auxiliary troops; that A. Cornelius, the Prætor, had ſent from Etolia Terentius Varro and M. Claudius Lepidus, to carry theſe tidings to Rome. What gave ſome authority to this falſe account was, that the Etolian deputies being aſked in the Senate among other queſtions, Who had informed them that King Antiochus had made the Roman Generals priſoners, and cut off the Roman army in Aſia; they anſwered That they had it from their own deputies who were with the Conſul. As I have no other authority for there having been ſuch a report, but that of Valerius Antias, I would neither affirm this as a certainty, nor paſs it over as an untruth.’

Don ot think that Catherine de Medicis meant that a piece of falſe news believed three days, can ſave a nation upon all occaſions. Such maxims as theſe are not without exceptions. A falſe perſuaſion is ſometimes advantageous and ſometimes pernicious: and the ſame may be ſaid of a true one. But here is a thing more generally true, viz. that it is uſeful to conceal from the people, part of the loſs ſuſtained in battles and other great misfortunes. This deception is not what we call myſteries of ſtate, Arcana Imperii, but the common ſteps of political prudence. No body ought therefore to blame a fallacious relation, that immediately follows the event. The public good requires the uſe of rhetorical figures, in order to extenuate our loſs and our enemies advantages. But it were perhaps to be wiſhed that theſe relations ſhould not be written, or at leaſt, that they ſhould not be printed: for the printing perpetuates them, and makes them ſerve as a foundation for Hiſtorians. This brings a great uncertainty upon Hiſtory, and deprives future ages of the knowledge of the truth; which is a great counterpoize, as ſome think, to the profit and pleaſure that the reading of thoſe daily papers occaſions in the world. The moſt moroſe muſt acknowledge that this reading affords many uſeful and agreeable inſtructions, and even that it may be inſtructive to polite writers. But in ſhort, will ſome ſay, there is no ſincerity in thoſe relations: they are rather Pleas than Hiſtories. Now, what is a Plea? A diſcourſe, in which a man ſtudies to ſhew only the fair ſide of his own cauſe, and only the foul one of his adverſary's. If they, who ſpeak thus, could find out a good expedient to avoid what they condemn, they would have the beſt invention of all men living. After all, the underſtanding readers are not deceived by ſuch relations: they can diſtinguiſh ſuch as come neareſt to ſincerity; but it is not poſſible to publiſh in thoſe writings all that one knows; ſomething muſt be ſacrificed to the public good, and even ſometimes to our domeſtic intereſt. Beſides; ſtratagems being allowed in war (15), the artifices of News-writers muſt be excuſed; for the pains they take to thwart the relations of the enemy are a kind of war; and therefore their writings have been called arma Anſerina by a political author. ‘ Hoc ſaltem indictum non abeat, quod auſu temerario quodam, Relationes ordinarias ſeu Novellas, uti vocantur, Armis Anſerinis meis non adjunxerim: nam, ut probe ſciam, tales ſæpe non in Sibyllarum foliis, ſed hominum cerebris naſci, creduloſque facile incertæ famæ auram captare: interim tamen etiam temporis filia comprobat, atque hactenus comprobavit, harumce ſparſiones non ſemper Oreſtis ſomnia & vanitates eſſe atque fuiſſe. Sparguntur † enim Victoriæ, deprimiturque pars adverſa. Sic conſtat, quod Literis à Pompeio per omnes provincias civitateſque dimiſſis de prælio ad Dyrrachium facto elatius inflatiuſque multo, quam res erat geſta, fama percrebuerit, pulſum fugere Cæſarem, pene omnibus copiis amiſſis; quæ ‡ fama ſane Pompeianos multis partibus auxerat. Finguntur clades ad vulgum (quia mundus, ut dicitur vult decipi) dementandum, ut iſte faveat huic vel illi parti, &c. Ita poſt cladem Ivrenſem, &c. (16). - - - I muſt not forget to mention, that I have preſumed, not to add the ordinary relations, or news (as they are called) to my Arma Anſerina: for though I well know, that ſuch relations proceed not from the leaves of the Sibyls, but are deviſed in the brain of man, and that the credulous readily catch at and ſwallow the common reports, however doubtful; nevertheleſs experience, the offspring of time, ſhews, and has already manifeſted, that the diſperſing of theſe news, is not always, nor has always been an unprofitable thing, like the dreams of Oreſtes. For to ſpread the news of our victories, and to leſſen the advantages of the enemy, is an art of policy. Thus it is known that Pompey having ſent letters into all the provinces and cities of the Roman empire, wherein he ſpoke of the battle of Dyrrachium, with much more courage and boldneſs than he had fought it, there went a report that Cæſar had been defeated, had loſt almoſt his whole army, and was now making his eſcape: and undoubtedly this report very much ſtrengthened Pompey's party. Overthrows are invented to impoſe upon the vulgar (becauſe the world, as they ſay, loves to be impoſed upon) and to make them favour this or that party, &c. Thus after the battle of Ivry, &c.’ The author adds here what I have ſaid of the Duke of Maienne.

Note, that people are ſo uſed to the Gazettes, that they would look upon the ſuppreſſion of them as an eclipſe. It would occaſion a kind of public mourning. The Republic of Letters would loſe ſeveral pieces by it, which are the very kernel and cream of the Gazettes, and contain ſome rules for a profitable reading of them. Obſerve the following paſſage. ‘ Cum vero omnes novi quid ſciendi mira flagremus cupiditate, certaque juxta ac incerta avidiſſime arripientes, quiſque pro voto interpretamur, itaque NOVELLAS undique conquirimus, ut rerum geſtarum, imò & gerandarum (tanta enim ſcribentium vel credentium vanitas eſt) cognitione ſitientem animum expleamus. Hinc anxia curioſitate legimus aut rimamur, quid Novellæ apportent Noſtrates, Jenenſes, Lipſienſes, Norinbergenſes, Hamburgenſes, imo & Pariſinæ, Hafnienſes, Amſtelodamenſes, Bruxellenſes, aut aliæ, neſcio unde acceſſitæ: Ut autem varia ſint illorum, qui eas legunt vel mirantur ingenia, ita fieri haud poteſt, quin majorem ex illis fructum alius, alius minorem accipiat, quò igitur cum Voluptate, quam novitas ſuâ ſponte conciliat, Utilitas etiam jungatur, ideo inſigni cum commodo adhiberi poterit Nobiliſſimi & Conſultiſſimi Dn. AHASUERI FRITSCHII Diſcurſus, De Novellarum, quas vocant Reve Beitungen hodierno uſu & abuſu. Imp. Jenæ 1676, 4*to*. Itemque elegantiſſimè docti CHRISTIANI WEISII in illuſtri ad Salam Auguſtæo Polit. Prof. Schediaſma curioſum, de Lectione Novellarum, quantum ſcil. illæ uſum habeant in Geographicis, Hiſtoricis, & Politicis, imò quovis curioſorum genere. Cui etiam addidit Specimen, quaſi Nucleum Novellarum, ſcil. ab Anno. 1660. ad ann. uſque 1676. Weiſſenfelſæ anno eod. exc. (17). - - - - As we all have an inſatiable deſire, and a wonderful curioſity to know ſomething new, and greedily catch at NEWS, whether certain or doubtful, whilſt every man interprets them according to his own wiſhes, we ſearch for NEWS PAPERS from all parts of the world, in order to ſlack this thirſt of the mind after the knowledge not only of paſt, but of future tranſactions: for ſuch is the preſumption of the writers of news, or thoſe who believe them, that they will pretend to the knowledge of things to come. Thus with anxious curioſity, we read and ſift the home-news, thoſe from Iëna, Leipſic, Nuremberg, Hamburgh, nay, thoſe from Paris, Copenhagen, Amſterdam, Bruſſels, and others which come from the Lord knows where. But as the genius's of thoſe who read and admire them are various, ſo it cannot but happen that ſome reap more, ſome leſs advantage by the peruſal of them. To the end therefore that profit may ſome body has defined ars non tam regendi, quam fallendi hominem - - - The art of deceiving rather than of governing men [C], will have it ſo. But men ought to own their error, which they never can do with a good grace: and tho' ſome ſhould do it, this is of little ſervice; ſo many pens having already canonized the firſt reports, that people would at leaſt be divided in their opinions about them (ii).

---

(14) Tit. Liv. lib. xxxvii, p. m. 708.

(15) Dolus an virtus quis in hoſte requirat? Virgil. Æneid. lib. ii, ver. 390.

† James Hurault des Offices d'Etat, fol. 110.

‡ J. Cæſ. de Bello Civil. lib. iii, pag. m. 284.

(16) Arma Anſerina, ſive Armatura Epiſtolaris à Doctore militari Tacito ſubminiſtrata, & in Diſſertatione Politica diducta à G. C. W. pag. 19.

(17) Michael Hertzius, Bibliotheca Germanica, ſive Notitia Scriptorum Rerum Germanicarum, Part. ii, ſub fin.

It is not enough to compare theſe baſe writers to Harpies which defile whatever they touch (kk); it may be ſaid they are executioners who diſtort and wring the neck, legs and arms of Hiſtorical facts, and even ſometimes cut them off, and apply falſe ones in their room; and this even at the very moment that an event iſſues forth from the boſom of its cauſes, and the exploits of a battle are juſt born:

> Modo primos incipientes
> Edere vagitus, & adhuc à matre rubentes (ll).
>
> As ſoon as e're they wail, as e're they ſpring,
> Still bluſhing, from the parent womb......

It was formerly ſaid of the Muſes that they were the proſtitutes even of ſlaves; this may eſpecially be affirmed of the Muſe who preſides over Hiſtory (mm): ſhe is a true ſcortum triobolare, who plies upon the high-ways, and ſells her ſelf to the firſt comer for a morſel of bread. Her bargain with the Bookſellers is much beneath that of Baudoin and (ii) See the paſſage of Tacitus which I have cited above, citat. (57), of the article USSON.

(kk) At ſubitæ horrifico lapſu de montibus adſunt Harpyiæ, & magnis quatiunt clangoribus alas, Diripiuntque dapes contactuque omnium fœdant Immundo: tum vox tetrum dira inter odorem. Virg. Æn. lib. iii, ver. 225. .... From the mountain tops, with hideous cry, And clattering wings the hungry harpies fly, They ſnatch the meat, defiling all they find, And parting leave a loathſome ſtench behind. DRYDEN.

(ll) Juven. Sat. VII, ver. 195.

(mm) It is Clio. Λέγεται τῶν μουσῶν ἡ μὲν Κλειὼ ευρηκέναι τὴν ἱστορίαν. Scholiaſt. Apollonii, in lib. iii.

‘ accompany pleaſure, which novelty of itſelf creates, it ‘ will be of ſignal advantage to read the diſcourſe of the ‘ moſt excellent and learned Mr AHASUERUS FRITSCHIUS, intituled, Of the modern uſe and abuſe of ‘ the news; which they call Reve Beitungen; printed ‘ at Iena 1676, 4to. Likewiſe the curious and moſt ‘ elegant diſſertation of the learned CHRISTIAN WEISIUS, Profeſſor of Politics, concerning the reading ‘ of news, ſhewing the great uſe of them in Geogra‘ phy, Hiſtory, Politics, and all other branches of ‘ curious learning. To which he has added, a Speci‘ men, being, as it were, the kernel and quinteſſence ‘ of news, from the year 1660 to 1676: printed at ‘ Weiſſenfels in the ſame year.'

I have read ſomewhere in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, that it were to be wiſhed that ſome body was employed in taking an account at the end of every year, of all the falſe reports that had been ſpread during that year. This would not be neceſſary with reſpect to all of them; there are ſeveral, that the Gazettes themſelves take notice of: ſuch an employment had been more neceſſary when daily news were not printed. If it had been eſtabliſhed at Rome when the Turks took Rhodes, we ſhould know abundance of falſities that were then vented in Italy. Some of them are known by the letters which Ruſcelli has collected: we know by thoſe letters, that on the tenth of December 1522, the News-writers of Rome, gave out that the ſiege of Rhodes was raiſed (18). On the twenty-eighth of February 1523, they gave out that it was not certain that Soliman had taken the town (19); and yet it had capitulated on the twenty-ſecond of December 1522. But what man will wonder at this news, when he knows, that in the year 1500, it was given out at Padua as a certainty, and even from Rome, that the Pope had been killed with a thunder-bolt on St Peter's day, and that all the citizens had taken up arms. It is only by chance, that we know that ſuch an untruth was reported. It is mentioned in a letter of Matthew Boſſus; without which probably we ſhould have known nothing of it. ‘ Hac ſub hora Auguſtine ‘ ad te dum ſcribo, ecce rumor aures implet civitatis, ‘ ſolemni Petri Apoſtoli die, paulo poſt vigeſimam ho‘ ram, Alexandrum Romanæ Eccleſiæ magnum Pon‘ tificem ictu fulminis interiiſſe, & de perjucundis ſuis ‘ Pileatis unum tactum, pariter ſuum dominum paren‘ taſſe, populares in armis eſſe, vias urbis obliquas pa‘ rum tutas, Curiales quati timoribus, Hiſpanos infe‘ ſtos & hoſtes haberi (20). - - - - At this very hour, ‘ while I am writing to you, there goes a report through ‘ the city, that a little after two of the clock in the af‘ ternoon, of St Peter's day, Pope Alexander was killed ‘ by a thunder-bolt, and that one of his merry cardinals ‘ had the ſame fate, that the people are in arms, that the ‘ by-ſtreets of the city are not ſafe, that the magiſtrates are ‘ in the greateſt fears, that the Spaniards are diſaffected ‘ and accounted enemies.' The King of Spain, the King of France, and the Duke of Alba, were at the ſame time reported in Holland to be dead, in the year 1580. This falſity was preſerved by chance in a letter of Juſtus Lipſius (21). A compilation of ſuch things would be uſeful.

Mr de Vigneul Marville has made ſome good obſervations on the Paris Gazette. Here is one of his reflexions. ‘ There is but one thing diſſerviceable to ‘ the writer of it, which is, that he is not abſolute ‘ maſter of his work, and being ſubject to ſuperior or‘ ders, he cannot ſpeak the truth with that ſincerity ‘ which Hiſtory requires. If this point was granted ‘ him, we ſhould have no need of other Hiſtorians (22).' The latter part of this paſſage is ſomewhat hyperbolical; however it is certain that author mentions the main cauſe of the miſchief; the weekly News-writers, or of any other period longer or ſhorter, dare not ſpeak all they know. It would coſt them too dear; for not to mention the puniſhment they might fear from their ſuperiors, their news would not ſell well, and they would make themſelves odious as diſaffected perſons, and in ſome manner enemies to the public good. No body will have them vent groſs lies, for the ſake of their country; but when they lie ingeniouſly, and with conjectures and reflexions equally witty, flattering and ſatirical, they are praiſed, admired, and loved, and every body reads their works. So that they find their account in following the example of the antient Comic Poet, who only deſigned to pleaſe the people.

> Poëta cum primum animum ad ſcribendum appulit,
> Id ſibi negotii credidit ſolum dari,
> Populo ut placerent quas feciſſet fabulas (23).
>
> Our Poet when he ſet his mind on writing,
> Believ'd he had no more to do, but make
> Such plays as ſhould be to the people's liking.

[C] Politics which ſome body has defined, Ars, &c.] Guy Patin mentions this definition after having a little ridiculed the Jubilees. Thus you ſee new factions in Rome, that will give us a new Pope, and then pro jucundo adventu ad Papatum, - - - for his happy acceſſion to the Papacy, a new Jubilee. The new wine of this preſent year, which is a liquor drawn from the vine, will produce more ſenſible effects in mens heads than this new devotion, which in its kind, returns but too often, ab aſſuetis non afficimur: - - - Things to which we are accuſtomed do not affect us. But the world is ſo made, populus vult decipi: - - - People love to be impoſed upon. The late John Camus, Biſhop of Belley, a learned worthy prelate, if ever there was any, ſaid, that Politica ars eſt non tam regendi quàm fallendi homines: - - - - Politics is the art of deceiving, rather than governing men. I heard him ſay this once in his chamber, in the year 1632, and I have often remembred it ſince (24). This letter of Patin is dated on the thirteenth of December 1669. He had not recited the Biſhop's words in that manner in a letter of the eighth of May 1665. He recited them on the following occaſion. Six writers, ſays he, ‘ who and du Ryer, whoſe ſtated price was to tranſlate for half a crown, or a crown a ſheet, and to write verſes for ſix ſhillings a hundred, when they were long ones, and for three ſhillings when they were ſhort (nn).

---

(18) It is thought that the ſuccours will prove needleſs, if the ſiege be raiſed, as the report goes. Jerom Negro, Letter to Mark Antony Micheli, written from Rome the 10th of December 1522, folio 86, of the Epiſtles of Princes, collected by Ruſcelli, and tranſlated by Belleforeſt.

(19) See the ſame Letter, fol. 88. It contains ſeveral things which ſhew how people deceive themſelves in things which they wiſh.

(20) Matthæus Boſſus, Part iii, Epiſt. XXI.

(21) Mors Regis Hiſpaniæ, Galliæ, & Ducis Albani nunciata nobis ſub idem tempus. Vera fama ſit in uno ſaltem ex triade illa. Lipſius, Epiſt. IV ad Theodorum Leeuwium, pag. 9, Edit. Lugd. Bat. 1649. It is dated the firſt of December 1580.

(22) Vigneul Marville, Mêlanges d'Hiſt, Tom. ii, pag. 198, Dutch Edit.

(23) Terentius, in Prologo Andriæ.

(24) Patin, Letter DIII, pag. 479, of the third tome.

> Ah! pudor extinctus, doctæque infamia turbæ
> Sub titulo proſtant, & queis genus ab Jove ſummo
> Res hominum ſupra evectæ & nullius egentes,
> Aſſe merent vili, ac ſancto ſe corpore fœdant.
> Scilicet aut Menæ faciles parere ſuperbo,
> Aut nutu Polycleti, & parca laude beatæ.
> Uſque adeo maculas ardent in fronte recentes,
> Heſternique Getæ vincla, & veſtigia flagri (oo).

Lucian has unwittingly drawn the picture of our age, ſpeaking of a war, which had produced ſuch a multitude of Hiſtorians, that one would have thought it was a modiſh trade. He compares it to the epidemical diſtemper of the Abderitæ (pp). We have ſeen, continues he, the truth of the proverb, that war is the parent of all things. Ἀφ᾽ οὗ δὴ τὰ ἐν ποσὶ ταῦτα κεκίνηται, ὁ πόλεμος ὁ πρὸς τοὺς βαρβάρους, καὶ τὸ ἐν Ἀρμενίᾳ τραῦμα, καὶ αἱ συνεχεῖς νῖκαι, οὐδεὶς ὅς τις οὐχ ἱστορίαν συγγράφει. μᾶλλον δὲ Θουκυδίδαι, καὶ Ἡρόδοτοι, καὶ Ξενοφῶντες ἡμῖν ἅπαντες. καὶ ὡς ἔοικεν, ἀληθὲς ἄρ᾽ ἦν ἐκεῖνο, τὸ, Πολέμος ἁπάντων πατὴρ, εἴ γε καὶ συγγραφέας τοσούτους ἀνέφυσεν, ἀπὸ μιᾷ τῇ πληγῇ. Ex quo res præſentes moveri cœperunt, puta bellum iſtud contra barbaros, & acceptum in Armenia vulnus, & continuæ illæ victoriæ, nemo non hiſtoriam conſcribit. Imò verò Thucydides, Herodoti, & Xenophontes nobis facti ſunt omnes. Et ut apparet, verum fuit illud, Bellum omnium pater eſt, quandoquidem hiſtoriarum ſcriptores tam multos una hac plaga procreavit (qq). - - Since theſe things happened, namely the war with the Barbarians, the overthrow received in Armenia, and thoſe frequent victories, all the world writes Hiſtory. Nay, every man ſets up for a Thucydides, an Herodotus, and a Xenophon. And it appears to be a true ſaying, that war is the parent of all things, ſince it has begot ſo many Hiſtorians in this ſingle country. The antient Romans had infinitely more reſpect for the dignity of hiſtory; for before Pompey's time no body pretended to write it but ſuch as were eminent for their birth and merit, and when this great man's tutor undertook to write the hiſtory of Pompey, and that of his father, ſome kind of inconveniency was found in that novelty, as Suetonius inſinuates. Yet this innovator had ſenſe and learning, and had taught Rhetoric, but he was a man of no birth. He was a freed-man. That was the grievance. ‘ Lucius Octacilius Pilitus ſerviſſe dicitur; atque etiam oſtiarius, veteri ‘ more, in catena fuiſſe: donec ob ingenium ac ſtudium literarum manumiſſus, accu‘ ſanti patrono ſubſcripſit. Deinde Rhetoricam profeſſus, Cnæum Pompejum Magnum ‘ docuit; patris ejus res geſtas, nec minus ipſius, compluribus libris expoſuit: primus ‘ omnium libertinorum, ut Cornelius Nepos opinatur, ſcribere hiſtoriam orſus, non ‘ niſi ab honeſtiſſimo quoque ſcribi ſolitam (rr). - - - It is ſaid that Lucius Octacilius ‘ Pilitus was a ſlave, and even a door-keeper, and that he was chained to the door, after the ‘ antient cuſtom; till on account of his parts and inclination to learning he was made free, ‘ and aſſiſted his patron. He afterwards profeſſed Rhetoric, and was Præceptor to Pompey ‘ the Great: he wrote in many books a Hiſtory of Pompey, and of his father. Cornelius ‘ Nepos is of opinion, that Octacilius Pilitus was the firſt freed-man who engaged in writing ‘ Hiſtory, which was uſually the employment of none but men of diſtinction.’

What

(nn) See Baillet, Jugemens des Sçavans, on the French tranſlators, article 948, 949.

(oo) See Balzac, Entret. IV, chap. iv.

(pp) Τὸ Ἀβδηριτικὸν ἐκεῖνο πάθος καὶ νῦν τοὺς πολλοὺς τῶν πεπαιδευμένων περιελήλυθεν. Abderiticum illud malum etiam hoc tempore pleroſque doctorum invaſit. Lucian. quomodo ſit conſcribenda Hiſtoria, pag. m. 658, Tom. i.

(qq) Ibid.

(rr) Sueton. de clar. Rhetor. cap. iii.

who got their livelihood by writing news, have been ſent to the Baſtille, within theſe three days, hominum genus audaciſſimum, mendaciſſimum, avidiſſimum ut faciant rem, &c. - - - a kind of people, who are extremely audacious, given to lying, and greedy of gain, &c. They fill their news with things they know not, and ought not to write. They have printed here and cried about the ſtreets, the Bull of our Holy Father the Pope, againſt the Janſeniſts, and three days after it was forbidden, and even, ne quid deeſſet ad rationem veræ fabulæ, - - - that nothing might be wanting to compleat the comedy, a report was publiſhed and ſpread that the commiſſary was ordered to impriſon the Printer, if he had been found in his houſe. The late Biſhop of Belley, who was an incomparable man, told me in the year 1632. Politica eſt ars tam regendi quam fallendi homines, - - - politics is the art both of governing and deceiving men, and this is no new invention, it is the ſame play acted over again; the ſame comedy, and farce; but they are new actors: the worſt of it is that this play will laſt a long time, and mankind ſuffer too much by it (25). There is a manifeſt difference betwixt the ſecond and firſt definition of politics: the ſecond is more diſcreet than the firſt; but neither of them turns to the diſhonour of the maſters of that art, ſince they aim only at the public good, which they cannot arrive to without imitating Phyſicians with reſpect to their patients. If you would know Patin's judgment upon the Paris Gazette, read what follows. They write nothing here that is good for any thing except the Gazette every Saturday, which is a very diverting and comfortable thing, for as much as this pratler never tells us bad news, though we perceive a great deal at this ſeaſon (26). Remember what Petronius ſays, Mundus univerſus exercet hiſtrioniam, - - - The whole world is a farce, and theſe verſes of Politian againſt ſuch as condemned the plays that were acted in colleges.

> Sed qui nos damnant, hiſtriones ſunt maxumi.
> Nam Curios ſimulant, vivunt bacchanalia:
> Hi ſunt præcipue quidam clamoſi, leves,
> Cucullati, lignipedes, cincti funibus:
> Superciliosſum, incurvicervicum pecus,
> Quique ab aliis habitu & cultu diſſentiunt,
> Triſteſque vultu vendunt ſanctimonias:
> Cenſuram ſibi quandam, & tyrannidem occupant:
> Pavidamque plebem territant minaciis (27).
>
> But none are greater mountebanks than they
> Who can't in colleges endure a play;
> For whilſt their lives are leud and diſſolute,
> Upright and pious men they perſonate:

The

(25) Ibid. Letter CCCLVI, pag. 61, of the ſame tome.

(26) Ibid. Letter XL, pag. 173, 174, of the firſt tome. It is dated from Paris on the ſeventh of June 1650.

(27) Politianus, in Prologo in Plauti Menaechmos, ad calcem Epiſt. xv, lib. vii, folio m. 165, verſo.

IX. The abuſe juſt mentioned favours Scepticiſm in point of Hiſtory.

What would become of the enemies of Hiſtorical Scepticiſm, if this miſchief had prevailed in the time of antient Greece and antient Rome? They are to be congratulated becauſe Printing is ſo modern an invention, and they may juſtly exclaim bono Hercule publico iſta licentia poſt caſum imperii Romani inventa eſt (ss). - - - - It is certainly an advantage to the public that this licentiouſneſs came not into uſe, till after the fall of the Roman empire. For if the antient Greeks, Romans, Perſians, Carthaginians, &c. had done what is now practiſed, they would have much ado to prove any thing to us, even with the help of inſcriptions and medals (tt), which the moderns boldly make uſe of to ſatisfy their caprices, without building upon any real fact.

X. Modern ſatires againſt ſome gallantries. Holland complained of without reaſon.

Before I go further I muſt obſerve that there have been ſuch men as Caſſius Severus at all times. We have ſeen in our days a man of quality, who not content to write ſome relations diſadvantageous to ſome court ladies, did not ſpare, as it is ſaid, the royal family, and even the head of it [D]: which ſhews that one may truly ſay of ſatires, what Malherbe ſaid of death,

Que la Garde qui veille aux barrieres du Louvre
N'en defend pas les Rois.

The guards which watch the palaces of Kings
Can ne'er ſecure them from fell ſatire's ſtings.

This

The chief of theſe are certain noiſy Friars,
With hoods, and wooden ſhoes, and rope attires;
A ſupercilious ſtiff-neck'd generation,
Differing in dreſs and mein from all the nation,
Who ſell with ſolemn face their holy wares,
Set up for Cenſors, and in all affairs
Aſſume a tyrant pow'r, and terror ſpread,
By clam'rous threats, among the trembling herd.

Take notice, that the definition which the Biſhop of Bellay gave of Politics, would expreſs a very great fault, if it denoted the mutual deceits of ſovereigns. They are not ſo uncommon as they ſhould be. I have read, within theſe three days, a very ſprightly thought: it is this; The Politicians have a language peculiar to themſelves: words and phraſes with them do not ſignify the ſame thing with other men. I do not know whether the gentlemen of the French academy have comprehended politics in the number of the arts and ſciences of which they have given us a Dictionary. This, in my opinion, would be neceſſary. For inſtance, in the political ſtile, to ſwear upon the holy Goſpels to obſerve ſuch or ſuch a treaty, ſignifies ſometimes barely that one ſwears it, but not that one will obſerve it; nay, it ſometimes ſignifies, that nothing of the treaty ſhall be performed. The generality of people do not underſtand this language; but the Politicians underſtand it well, and take their meaſures accordingly (28). I add, that if the gentlemen of the French academy would give us an Univerſal Dictionary of all arts, they would engage in an endleſs work. They would daily diſcover new arts which have terms of a particular ſignification. The art of weekly relations is one of them; the art of controverſy is another. Words do not go there in their uſual ſenſe: you ſee people who charge one another with horrid doctrines; they reply, and rejoin, and ſtill reciprocally find their adverſaries doctrine more and more abominable (29). This complaint appears almoſt in every page; and alarms the readers as if there was reaſon to fear, that, without a ſpeedy remedy, this gangrene would diffuſe its infection through the whole body. Such as are not uſed to this ſtile conceive a thouſand ſcruples; they fear they have diſobeyed St Paul's precept, a man that is an heretic reject (30); for they have converſed with the conteſting parties. Who would have believed, ſay they, that ſuch Divines, who have eat for a long time the bread of the Orthodox, ſhould have nouriſhed ſuch monſters in their hearts? We know not whom to truſt. Either one or the other of them, or perhaps both, muſt be diſguiſed wolves rather than ſhepherds. But have a little patience; ſtay till ſome expert arbitrators, initiated in that language, have reconciled the parties, and you will find thoſe words ſignify nothing leſs than what you believed. The accuſers on both ſides will be declared Orthodox. They ſhall not be cenſured, but only admoniſhed to correct ſome improper expreſſions which had eſcaped them. It is ſuppoſed then that in reality they only charged each other with theſe expreſſions, and that therefore the words pernicious Hereſy, and the like, ſignify with them only an ill choice of words. We may very well wiſh that the gentlemen of the French academy would not forget, in a Supplement which they may give to the Dictionary of arts, the proper ſignification of the words impious, Heretic, deſtroyer of the fundamentals of the Goſpel, abettor of the Socinians, &c. when they are to be found in the writings of a Theological proceſs; for otherwiſe our mother tongue will grow barbarous and unintelligible to moſt readers.

[D] A man of quality did not ſpare, as it is ſaid, the royal family, and even the head of it.] I add, as it is ſaid, becauſe, though common fame has aſcribed to the ſame author l'Hiſtoire amoureuſe des Gaules, and les amours du Palais Roial, yet this author diſowned the latter. He even denied judicially that he had compoſed it. For it is of this book we are to underſtand what he wrote to Mr de Saint Aignan in theſe words: 'My enemies ſeeing me in the Baſtille, thought my 'impriſonment would not permit me to defend my 'ſelf, and that they might ſafely accuſe me; they 'therefore told the King that I had written againſt 'him. But his Majeſty, who never condemns a 'man before he be heard, ſurprized them ſtrangely 'by ſending the Lieutenant-Criminal to examine me '(31) . . . After having ſhewn me the Hiſtory written 'with my own hand, I mean the original I have 'mentioned to you, he aſked me whether I had 'written nothing againſt the King. I anſwered that 'I was much ſurprized to have ſuch a queſtion put 'to me. He told me he had orders to do it: I 'anſwered I had not, and that there was no probability that having ſerved twenty-ſeven years without having received any favour, being twelve years 'Major-General of the light horſe, and expecting 'every day ſome recompence from his majeſty, I 'ſhould be wanting in my reſpect to him: that to 'deſtroy this probability my own hand-writing, or 'unexceptionable witneſſes ſhould be produced againſt 'me. That if either of them could be produced in 'the leaſt thing contrary to the reſpect I owed to the 'King and all the royal family, I would be willing to loſe my head: but that I alſo beſeeched his 'majeſty to appoint the ſame puniſhment for thoſe, 'who ſhould accuſe me without being able to convict 'me (32) . . . . From that time not having ſeen the 'Lieutenant-Criminal nor any other judge, I have 'been perſuaded that ſo black and ſo ridiculous a 'calumny had made no impreſſion upon the King, 'who is ſo diſcerning and hard to be ſuprized (33).' What he ſays, in another place of the late Ducheſs of Orleans, is an argument that the chief perſons of the court did not believe him guilty of this ſecond head of accuſation. The death of the Princeſs Henrietta of England, ſays he (34), was a new misfortune to me; ſhe had done me many good offices with his majeſty, and

(ss) This is a parody of Seneca, Præfat. lib. v, Controv.

(tt) See Rec. Fr. in 4to, pag. 781.

(28) Lettres Hiſtoriques, September 1696, p. 251.

(29) A ſmall piece of Dorſcheus, Profeſſor of Divinity at Straſbourg, intituled, Latrocinium Famæ Theologorum, affords ſome inſtances of this. To which one might add many others.

(30) Tit. iii, 10.

(31) Le Comte de Buſſy Rabutin, Uſage des Adverſitez, pag. 271, Dutch Edit.

(32) Ibid. pag. 272.

(33) Ibid. pag. 274.

(34) Ibid. pag. 292.

This lord has been wiſer and happier than the ſatiriſt of Auguſtus's court. The latter not amending in his exile, made his condition ſo miſerable that at laſt he had ſcarce wherewithal to cover his nakedneſs (uu); but he whom I ſpeak of, came off cheap, and applied himſelf to things more worthy of his fine wit and charming pen [E].

It would be an unjuſt thing to impute to him the bad imitations, of which he was only the accidental cauſe. But it muſt be confeſſed this maxim has been well verified,

that

I hoped for others from her. For beſides that ſhe had a great deal of wit, and ſuch a carriage as made her beloved and reſpected by every body, ſhe was naturally generous and kind. Let us wonder at the ſtubbornneſs of the public; they ſtill perſiſt to believe that theſe two pieces were written by Count de Buſſy. Nothing can diſſuade them, neither the paſſages before cited, nor the difference that is to be found betwixt theſe two pieces, which is manifeſt to good judges: for there is, much more art and genius in the firſt than in the ſecond; the latter hath none of Petronius's thoughts like the firſt. The journaliſt of the Royal Society was not ignorant of thoſe imitations of Petronius. The following words are to be found in his journal, of the month of Auguſt, 1669. 'Of late 'comparing Buſſy's Hiſtoire Amoureuſe de Gaule with 'Petronius Arbiter, out of whom I was made to 'believe he had taken two of his letters word for 'word, beſides other love-intrigues, I found in running him over, what ſatisfied me not a little in this 'very ſubject of ſnails; viz. That theſe very animals, as well as other odd things in nature, as 'truffs, muſhrooms, and no doubt too the Coſſi, or 'great worms in the oak (another Roman dainty) 'were made uſe of by the antients to incite Venery. 'You will there find that the diſtreſſed and feeble 'lover prepares himſelf with a ragouſt of ſnails necks '(Cochlearum Cervices (35).') I do not know why this Count inſerted in his Hiſtory a moſt ſharp raillery againſt Mr Menage who briſkly revenged himſelf by ſix Latin verſes, as galling as can be written (36). For the reſt I do not believe what Patin ſays, in his letter of the twenty-eighth of December, 1665 (37). Mr de Buſſi Rabutin, by the King's command, hath reſigned his employment and is removed from the Baſtille to the mad-houſe, where he has two chambers (38). Mr de Buſſy ſays, that upon the report of the King's firſt Phyſician and firſt Surgeon, he was ſet at liberty to be cured in Paris (39). This is more credible. The grief he expreſſed for having compoſed the Hiſtoire Amoureuſe des Gaules ſerved for an encomium in the ſpeech of the Academiſt who ſucceeded him: it was the Abbot Bignon. He praiſed him with delicacy, and ſhewed that if the work, which had occaſioned all his misfortunes, deſerved the cenſure of all wiſe men, the repentance which he had manifeſted for having made it, could not be ſufficiently praiſed (40).

[E] . . . . And applied himſelf to things more worthy of his fine wit and charming pen.] There went a report that he was writing the Hiſtory of France. Afterwards it was ſaid that he confined himſelf to the Hiſtory of Lewis XIV. But the event has ſhewn that the firſt report was falſe; and that the ſecond was not very well grounded; for if this Count had ſeriouſly applied himſelf to write the Hiſtory of Lewis XIV, we ſhould have ſeen a better work upon that ſubject, than that which came out in the year 1700, of which there is an extract in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (41). This extract will not permit us to doubt that this work of his was compoſed with the utmoſt negligence. Certainly he went about it when he was weary of ſome other buſineſs, and little cared to be well informed of what he wrote, or to wait till the firſt news of his village were confirmed. He threw them haſtily upon the paper, and took no pains to correct them afterwards. We cannot account more favourably for what he ſays of the paſſage of the Boyne. All Europe knows that King James quitted that poſt, and returned to France a few days after, and that King William ſucceſsfully paſſed that river, and afterwards made all the ſteps of a conqueror. And yet Mr de Buſſy affirms (42) that the Count de Lauzun, who commanded the troops of France, won the battle of the Boyne. Had he ſpoken thus out of flattery, and againſt his conſcience, he would be more to blame; it is therefore explaining the thing in the moſt favourable ſenſe, to ſay he was deceived by ſome reports which went in his village, and that valuing but little this work, he did not care whether this paſſage was right or wrong.

It had been better to have ſaid that in his diſgrace he employed himſelf in keeping a large correſpondence by letters, and in writing the memoirs of his life; for the works that were publiſhed after his death, ſhew that this was his chief occupation. To this muſt be added the care he took to make his own Hiſtory ſerve for an inſtruction to his children. His treatiſe concerning the uſe of adverſities (43), ſhews that this was his deſign. It is a little book full of good morality and religion. His memoirs in two volumes publiſhed in the year 1697, are curious and well written. His letters, printed in four volumes the ſame year deſerve the ſame encomium. They would have pleaſed more, if, upon good conſiderations, many proper names had not been ſtruck out, and many paſſages which affected the reputation of certain perſons. Perhaps ſome time or other there will come out an edition of them, which will not be caſtrated, or will have a key to them. There are ſeveral letters which ſhew that Count Buſſy weaned himſelf by degrees from the vanities of this world, that he was ſenſible of the emptineſs of it, and that at laſt he was deeply affected with the importance of his ſalvation, and the truths of the Goſpel. The beſt Chriſtians in the world could not be more charmed than he was, with Mr Abadie's excellent work concerning the truth of the Chriſtian religion (44). But obſerve that his converſion was ſomewhat ſlow. For a long time he looked behind him like Lot's wife, and tried all the means that the moſt obſtinate deſire of returning to court could ſuggeſt to an ambitious man, who could not live out of it. The ill ſucceſs of his petitions was a terrible mortification to him, but did not diſcourage him from preparing others on every occaſion. This we learn from the writings which his heirs have publiſhed: had they ſuppreſſed theſe monuments of his impatience, they had ſheltered his memory from the cenſure of ſome people, who cannot pardon a brave man his want of courage in bearing the loſs of his employments. It is not enough, ſay they, to be courageous in a battle, a man muſt alſo expreſs a great ſteddineſs and reſolution under the loſs of his eſtate. They wiſh Count Rabutin had imitated thoſe heroes of ancient Rome, who encountered a ſentence of baniſhment with contempt and indifference; and they think it ſtrange that being diſgraced like Ovid, for ſome treatiſes concerning Love, he ſhould have alſo imitated that Poet's conduct in his diſgrace: every body knows what repeated complaints Ovid ſent to Rome, in order to be recalled. That vaſt number of poems full of ſupplications and humble lamentations do more honour to his wit than to his virtue or courage. But have thoſe, who thus cenſure Count Buſſy, known the allurements of a court life? Do they know what habits and diſtempers are contracted in it? If they did, they would perhaps be more indulgent to him. However, he at laſt reſigned himſelf to the providence of GOD. Read what he wrote on the twenty-ſixth of January 1680 (45). It was a long time before I could believe it was for my good, (as my ghoſtly fathers told me) that providence laid theſe calamities upon me by ruining my fortune. But at laſt I have been convinced of it, for theſe three years; not only for my good in the other world, but alſo for my repoſe in this. GOD does already reward me in ſome meaſure for the pains of my reſignation, and I ſay at preſent of this good maſter what in my fooliſh youth I ſaid of love.

Il paye en un moment un ſiecle de travaux,
Et tous les autres biens ne valent pas ſes maux (46).

God

(uu) See, above, citation (30), of the article CASSIUS SEVERUS.

(35) Philoſophical Tranſactions, for Auguſt 1669.

(36) See, above, citation (3), of the article MENAGE.

(37) It is the cclxxxviii.

(38) Patin, Tom. iii, pag. 153. He had ſaid in his cccliv th Letter: Mr de Buſſy Rabutin has been this day (the 18th of April 1665) committed to the Baſtille, for writing a libel, at which the ſuperior powers are offended. The Prince of Condé complained of it to the King, who has cauſed him to be ſeized and impriſoned.

(39) Buſſy, ubi ſupra, pag. 281.

(40) Mercure Galant, of June 1693. The Count de Buſſy died of an Apoplexy at Autun, the ninth of April 1693. The Abbot Bignon ſucceeded him in the French Academy in June following.

(41) February 1700, pag. 162, & ſeq.

(42) See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, ibid. pag. 168.

(43) It was printed in the year 1694, and reprinted with the author's Memoirs in 1697.

(44) See the ſecond volume of his Letters, pag. 44, 128, 131, 135, 138, 142, Dutch Edit.

(45) Buſſi Rabutin, Letter cxxxv, of the ſecond part, pag. 328, Dutch Edit.

(46) See Mr de St Evremont's Reflexions on Religion, Vol. ii, of his Works, pag. 333, 334, of the Engliſh tranſlation. You will there find theſe words. The Chriſtian Religion makes us enjoy misfortunes as bleſſings, and we may ſay ſeriouſly of it what was gallantly ſaid of love. The pains of it are better than all other pleaſures.

that bad examples riſe higher and higher without ſtint [F]. How many Hiſtories have been publiſhed againſt the principal perſons of the court of France, that of Bruſſels, &c. with the names, ſirnames, and titles, of every one of them, with the moſt ſecret circumſtances, and diſcourſes, and an hundred things of ſuch a nature, that it was impoſſible ſhould have come to the writers knowledge? Gabriel Naudé might, upon this occaſion ſay, with better grounds, what he ſaid of Procopius's Secret Hiſtory, of Mathew Paris's Hiſtory, of the ſcandalous Chronicle of Lewis XI, of the Memoirs of the League, &c (ww). Here one might reaſonably exclaim,

Quod genus hoc hominum? quæve hunc tam barbara morem
Permittit patria (xx)?

What men, what monſters, what inhuman race,
What laws, what barbarous cuſtoms of the place! DRYDEN.

But this exclamation ought not to be applied to the Republic of Holland, ſince it is not true that it ſuffers the moſt illuſtrious families to be thus barbarouſly abuſed. That Republic made the following anſwer, in the year 1665, to the Biſhop of Munſter, who complained, amongſt other things, of ſome writings. ‘ Quidquid vero ſeu de hoc ſeu ‘ de aliis negotiis in noſtris terris typis divulgatum eſt, de iis aliud nihil dicemus niſi ‘ illud ſolum, non tantum hic, verum paſſim in aliis quoque regionibus ægre admodum ‘ frenari & inhiberi poſſe typographicas licentias quantumvis diligens fuerit cautela; ‘ noſque ipſi contra iſtiuſmodi abuſus ſevera ſæpe promulgaverimus edicta, eademque ‘ ſævis & rigidis confirmaverimus executionibus. - - - - As to what has been printed and ‘ publiſhed in our provinces with relation to this, or other affairs, we ſhall only ſay that the ‘ licentiouſneſs of the preſs is ſo great, not only in this country, but in many others, that it is ‘ extremely difficult to reſtrain and bridle it, notwithſtanding all the diligence and care taken ‘ for that purpoſe; and that we ourſelves have often publiſhed ſevere edicts againſt abuſes of ‘ this nature, and have confirmed theſe edicts by the moſt rigorous and exemplary puniſhments.’ Theſe words contained in a Letter of their High Mightineſſes, dated the twenty-ninth of September

God in a moment's bliſs rewards an age of woes,
All pleaſures are not worth th' afflictions he beſtows.

A thought like this had been communicated to him a long time before: theſe are the words: Do not you think I converſe with devout people as much as I can? It is indeed becauſe I find them more happy, both in their life and at their death, and I would gladly partake of their condition. There is nothing like devotion for an unfortunate perſon; it not only ſolaces troubles, but converts them into pleaſures (47). This confirms what I have ſaid in the Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes (48), and the remark [R], of the article EPICURUS.

Note, that tho' this Count's poſthumous works are ingenious and polite; yet this Hiſtoire amoureuſe des Gaules will make him more known as an author, than any other book he wrote. His fate in this is like that of Boccace (49).

For the reſt, the falſhood abovementioned, concerning the paſſage of the Boyne, calls to my mind Father Londel's Faſti (50), where we find theſe words on the eleventh of July 1690. The battle of the Boyne in Ireland: Schomberg is killed at the head of the Engliſh. This is a downright trick, which cannot be excuſed by the reaſon I have alledged to leſſen Count Buſſy's fault; for this work of Father du Londel, was compoſed with attention, and was doubtleſs carefully poliſhed and reviſed: writings of that kind are only commendable for a great exactneſs. And therefore it will be no raſh judgment to affirm that the author purpoſely uſed equivocal words, to conceal from the reader the diſadvantage of his party, and the true ſucceſs of that battle. He not only ſuppreſſed the moſt eſſential circumſtance, which is to ſhew whether the victory was doubtful, or whether it declared entirely for this or that nation; but he has artfully ſlipt in a true circumſtance, which is only fit to make one conclude that King James had the honour of that day. Schomberg falling at the head of the Engliſh is a principle, from which an hundred thouſand readers would draw this conſequence, Therefore King William was repulſed. Give it what turn you pleaſe, you will find nothing to excuſe this author: inſincerity, ſhame, or the fear of diſpleaſing, made him ſpeak as he did. Notwithſtanding this fault and ſome others of the ſame nature (51), his book is good, curious, uſeful, and convenient, and of a fine invention. Such books will be compoſed in other countries (52), but of whatever ſect or nation a man be, he ſhould get his book read by ſome impartial perſon well verſed in the art of qualifying things; for prejudices do not ſuffer us to define things exactly, a mere fight we call a battle; the loſs of a battle a check; an engagement, an encounter. The worſt is, that ſome call a defeat what others call a victory. The definitions of theſe things are no leſs different among Hiſtorians, than the definitions of doctrines among Controverſiſts (53). And as an opinion which is Orthodox in one religion, is Heretical in another; that, which is a battle won in the Hiſtorians of one nation, is a battle loſt in the Hiſtorians of another. It is a very antient abuſe, for which we ſee no remedy.

[F] Bad examples riſe higher and higher without ſtint.] Velleius Peterculus very well expreſſes this maxim, after having related that Tiberius Gracchus was maſſacred without any trial. This was, ſays he (54), the beginning of the ſlaughter of the citizens in Rome itſelf; from hence proceeded the impunity of maſſacres. Quod haud mirum eſt, adds he (55), non enim ibi conſiſtunt exempla, unde cœperunt; ſed quamlibet in tenuem recepta tramitem, latiſſime evagandi ſibi viam faciunt: &, ubi ſemel recto deerratum eſt, in præceps pervenitur: nec quiſquam ſibi putat turpe, quod alii fuit fructuoſum. ‘ And no wonder; for bad examples ſtop not where ‘ they begin: but tho' the path through which they ‘ get in be ever ſo narrow, as ſoon as they are admitted they make a new way, and extend themſelves ‘ on all ſides without any bounds. Thus when a man ‘ once quits the right road, he commonly arrives to ‘ the brink of a precipice: and no body thinks that ‘ can be a diſgrace to him which proves advantageous ‘ to another.’ The ſame maxim may be ſeen in a ſpeech of Julius Cæſar, related by Salluſt. He there ſhews that all bad examples ariſe from a good beginning (56), becauſe the innovations, which at firſt are good and uſeful, quickly give occaſion to diſorders, that continually increaſe. To this may be applied the thought of Juvenal: that man never keeps within the bounds of permiſſion (57).

[G] Theſe

(ww) Alii denique ſimiles libelli qui ſtatim in vulgus effundunt, quid Rex in aurem Reginæ dixerit, quid Juno fabulata ſit cum Jove. Hi autem omnes quoniam facta plerumque atque infecta canunt, nunciique tam ficti quam veri tenaces exiſtunt, &c. - - - In fine, there are ſeveral other libels of the ſame kind which immediately give the people to know what the King whiſpered in the Queen's ear, and what converſation paſſed between Juno and Jupiter. As all theſe writers relate, for the moſt part, things which have happened, as well as things which have not, things real, as well as imaginary, &c. Gabriel Naudæus, Bibliogr. Polit. pag. m. 70. See concerning the words printed in Roman, Plautus in Trinummo, Act. I, Sc. II, ver. 170, pag. m. 735.

(xx) Virgil. Æneid. lib. i, ver. 543.

(47) Buſſi Rabutin's Letters, Part iii, Letter CC, (dated the 14th of April 1672) p. 361.

(48) There is no ſweetneſs in a ſinful courſe of life, that can be compared to the ſweetneſs which a devout ſoul enjoys. Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes, pag. 570.

(49) See, above, remark [I], of the article BOCCACE.

(50) They are mentioned in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Febr. 1699, p. 223.

(51) For inſtance, when he ſays upon the 11*th of Auguſt* 1675, The defeat at Conſarbruck, without ſaying who thoſe were who were defeated.

(52) This has already been done in Brandenbourg.

(53) Compare with this the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, 1686, pag. 277, 309, & ſeq. 354, 645, 960.

(54) Vell. Paterculus, lib. ii, cap. iii.

(55) Ibid.

(56) Omnia mala exempla ex bonis initiis orta ſunt. Salluſt. in Bello Catilin. pag. m. 146.

(57) Nemo ſatis credit tantum delinquere, quantum Permittas: adeo indulgent ſibi latius ipſi. Juven. Sat. XIV, ver. 233.

September 1665, and printed with licence, may ſerve for a general anſwer to all complaints of the ſame nature [G].

XI.
An avowal of Count Buſſy. The Secret Hiſtory of Pope Alexander VI.

It will not be amiſs to inſert here the public avowal of Count Buſſy Rabutin. ‘Five years ago being in the country, and not knowing how to divert my ſelf, I verified the proverb, that idleneſs is the mother of all vices: for I fell a writing an Hiſtory, or rather a ſatirical romance, indeed without any deſign to make a bad uſe of it; but only to employ my ſelf, and at moſt to ſhew it to ſome friends, in order to divert them, and to be praiſed by them as a tolerable writer (yy) . . . . As true events are never extraordinary enough to be very entertaining, I had recourſe to invention, which I thought would be more pleaſing; and without any ſcruple of offending the perſons concerned, becauſe I did it almoſt only for my ſelf, I wrote a thouſand things which I had never heard of. I made ſome perſons happy, who had not ſo much as heard of it, and others who had never thought of being ſo; and becauſe it had been ridiculous to chooſe two women for the heroines of my romance, who had neither birth nor merit, I made choice of two who wanted no good qualities, and even poſſeſſed ſo many, that envy might contribute to render credible all the ill things I could invent of them (zz).’ You have here a true picture of the conduct of ſatirical writers. Whether they write out of revenge or jealouſy; or whether they do it to diſplay their thoughts, and exerciſe their pen; the main thing they aim at is the diverſion of the readers, and to be praiſed for their parts. Now becauſe they are afraid

[G] Theſe words . . . may ſerve as a general anſwer to all complaints of the ſame nature.] And yet there are very few French Roman Catholics, but ſay that certainly the States are not diſpleaſed with the liberty which the Bookſellers take to publiſh all ſorts of ſatires againſt thoſe who are not in the intereſt of their country, ſome on long and narrow ſlips of paper, and ſome in many pages, all full, ſay they, of heinous lies, eſpecially during the laſt war: This is a maſter-ſtroke of policy, ſay they, the States were very glad, to foment animoſities, and to keep up the hopes of the people, that they might more patiently bear the charges of the war, and by their hatred of a foreign government, grow more in love with their own country. The Athenians uſed the ſame policy, and if we had all they ſaid and publiſhed againſt the Perſians and Macedonians, we ſhould find that the magiſtrates gave their helping hand to it, in order to inſpire more zeal for the preſervation of a government, which beſides the public ſhews, and many other ſuch things agreeable to the multitude, afforded them the pleaſure of compoſing and reading a vaſt number of libels againſt the enemy. Beſides it was a good way of purging the ſatiriſts, by giving vent to the peccant humours which might have occaſioned defluxions on the internal parts; for had they been reſtrained with reſpect to ſtrangers, they would have vomited their gall on their own maſters. This is what the French ſay, without forgetting that their nation had been kept pure and clean from this licentiouſneſs, and that it is one of their nobleſt triumphs. But a ſatisfactory anſwer is made to them, as to all thoſe political myſteries they mention, which are only imaginary: they are deſired to conſider the conſtitution of a free ſtate, wherein it is eſſential that every member ſhould be ſecured from that rigorous proſecution, practiſed in monarchies. However I will quote an author who makes ſome complaints (58): ‘They have printed in Holland, within theſe few years, a great many libels againſt France; there are ſatirical Hiſtories againſt the moſt illuſtrious perſons of the court. It were to be wiſhed that ſome of our authors would undeceive the public on that head, and ſhew that thoſe ſorts of Hiſtories are ſuppoſititious. The authors of them are ſorry wretches, who write them in order to get a little money from a greedy Printer, and write all that comes into their head. How could ſuch people know all the ſecret particulars which they relate? How came they by the letters which they have the impudence to print as genuine? They who beſt know the court, and have been there ſeveral years, could ſcarce tell ſo many particularities. Is it likely that a poor ſcribbler lodged in a garret, who correſponds with no body but a Bookſeller greedy of money, ſhould be ſo well acquainted with all thoſe adventures, if they were true? The late Mr Mezerai, whoſe Hiſtory of France is deſervedly ſo much eſteemed, could not endure theſe ſorts of Hiſtories and Novels; he would have all to be true or falſe (59): a mixture of both appeared monſtrous to him, and even of dangerous conſequence to poſterity; and indeed who knows but that two or three hundred years hence, they who ſhall write the Hiſtory of our times, may take theſe ſatirical books for original and authentic Memoirs written by cotemporary authors, who ought to be credited (60)? Since we cannot extirpate thoſe plagues of Hiſtory, we muſt at leaſt warn thoſe, who ſhall come after us, not to be deceived by them.’

We muſt own there are very good things in this paſſage, and that the author has very good reaſon to ſay that it were to be wiſhed, that care was taken to refute what can be refuted; for what will our poſterity think, when they ſhall read ſo many things made current, without any oppoſition? How will they be able to forbear believing that they are true? Will they not ſay that if they had been falſe, they would have been confuted for the honour of thoſe whom they blemiſh? How many people are there, whom the ſatires of the XVIth century keep ſtill in error? Thoſe of our time will not be leſs active in future ages, and we muſt not imagine, that they will not laſt long, becauſe they diſappear in the Bookſellers ſhops in two or three months time. They will be preſerved in the moſt famous libraries, in which they have been carefully collected. I do not pretend that there is a neceſſity to confute all libels; that would be an endleſs work and oftentimes very needleſs. It were ſufficient to refute thoſe which have ſomething of the character of an Hiſtory, and to give ſome general rules for diſcerning the truth, and ſecuring ones ſelf againſt the boldneſs of ſatirical writers. For example, a man of ability, and well informed, ſhould criticiſe the book, intituled, Annales de la Cour & de Paris pour les années 1697, & 1698 (61). - - Annals of the French Court, and of Paris, for the years 1697 and 1698. If he ſhould demonſtrate the falſity of five or ſix of the moſt remarkable particulars, all the reſt would fall of itſelf; eſpecially if the readers were told that they cannot reaſonably believe what is advanced by ſuch writers, unleſs their relations be attended with certain characters, for want of which one ought to ſuppoſe that all their ſtories are only the diſcourſes of taverns and coffee-houſes. Theſe places are the magazines and ſtore-houſes of falſe news, and may be rightly compared to the Mythology of Natalis Comes. Such a work as the refutation I ſpeak of, would ſerve as a preſervative an hundred years hence, and would be of great uſe to thoſe who ſhould endeavour to find out Hiſtorical Truths.

The author whom I have quoted has forgot a neceſſary reflexion: he ſhould have complained of France as much as of Holland; for it is particularly in France, that the writings of which he complains ſell well. If the French would neither read nor buy them, the Bookſellers would not print them, and thus the greedineſs of the French contributes as much as any thing elſe to the production of libels: the liars and the credulous feed one another mutually; each of them lives upon the purſe of the other.

[H] The

(yy) Buſſy Rabutin's Letters to the Duke of St Aignan, inſerted in the book concerning the Uſe of Adverſity, pag. 265, of the Dutch edition. That Letter is dated the 12*th of November* 1665.

(zz) Ibid. pag. 266.

(58) Diverſitez Curieuſes, Part. x, p. 173, 174, Dutch Edit. 1699.

(59) Compare this with the remark [C], of the article NIDHARD.

(60) Compare with this what has been ſaid in remark [A], of this Diſſertation.

(61) Printed in 1701.

afraid that meer truth would afford but little diverſion, and that their work would be accounted a very indifferent performance, they ſeaſon their relations with a thouſand falſe ſtories; they invent extraordinary adventures, and converſations, and apply to thoſe they ſpeak of whatever they have read that is moſt proper to give a high reliſh. If you examine the ſmarteſt and beſt written ſatires, you will find the ſpirit of the author, his ſtile and character, in all the letters and converſations he aſcribes to lovers. Is not this a proof that he writes a romance? If the Hiſtory of Donna Olympia, and an hundred other pieces of the ſame nature, were written with the ſimplicity which is to be obſerved in Burchardus's Journal (zz*), they would be incomparably more credible. I do not ſay that the readers would be more perſuaded of the truth of them, but only that they ought to be ſo; for I know that the readers proportion their perſuaſion to the probability the writers obſerve, and to the pleaſure they afford by ſatirical ſtrokes in their writings, and by the wonderful events they relate. This is ſo true, that, notwithſtanding the public confeſſion of Count Rabutin, moſt people do ſtill believe, that his relations are truly hiſtorical. Take notice of the words, in which he tells us, that his manuſcript was falſified by a lady to whom he had lent it. ‘ She added to, or left out of that Hiſtory, what ſhe pleaſed, to expoſe me to the hatred of moſt of thoſe I ſpoke of: which is ſo true, that the firſt copies that were ſeen were not falſified; but as ſoon as the others appeared, as every body loves the ſharpeſt ſatires, the true ones were thought inſipid, and ſuppreſſed as falſe (a).’

The journal I have juſt now mentioned was written by a German, Maſter of the Ceremonies at the court of Pope Alexander VI. His nation and the poſt he was in aſſure us of two things, one that he relates things faithfully, the other that he was able to come to the truth of what he relates. So that there is no reaſon to doubt of thoſe infamous ſights, wherewith the Pope and his daughter fed their eyes, I mean that collation which the Duke of Valentinois gave to fifty courtezans, and the combat of four ſtone-horſes let looſe upon two mares. Beſides, as I have already ſaid, the plain and barbarous ſtyle of the writer does not permit to ſuſpect that he wrote for the diverſion of the reader and his own commendation. You may judge of it by this little ſpecimen. ‘ Dominica ultima menſis Octobris in ſero fecerunt cœnam cum Duce Valentinenſi in camera ſua in palatio Apoſtolico quinquaginta meretrices honeſtæ, Cortegianæ nuncupatæ, quæ poſt cœnam chorearunt cum ſervitoribus & aliis ibidem exiſtentibus, primo in veſtibus ſuis, deinde nudæ. Poſt cœnam poſita fuerunt candelabra communia menſæ cum candelis ardentibus & projectæ ante candelabra per terram caſtaneæ, quas meretrices ipſæ ſuper manibus & pedibus nudæ candelabra pertranſeuntes colligebant, Papa, Duce, & Lucretia ſorore ſua præſentibus & aſpicientibus: tandem expoſita dona ultimo, diploides de ſerico, paria caligarum, bireta & alia, pro illis qui plures dictas meretrices carnaliter agnoſcerent, quæ fuerunt ibidem in aula publicè carnaliter tractatæ arbitrio præſentium, & dona diſtributa Victoribus. Feria quinta, undecima menſis Novembris intravit urbem per portam viridarii quidam ruſticus ducens duas equas lignis oneratas, quæ cum eſſent in plateola S. Petri, accurrerunt ſtipendiarii Papæ, inciſiſque pectoralibus & lignis projectis in terram cum baſtis, duxerunt equas ad illam plateolam quæ eſt inter palatium juxta illius portam, tum emiſſi fuerunt quatuor equi curſerii liberi ſuis frœnis & capiſtris ex palatio, qui accurrerunt ad equas, & inter ſe propterea cum magno ſtrepitu & clamore morſibus & calceis contendentes aſcenderunt èquas & coierunt cum eis, & eas graviter piſtarunt & læſerunt, Papa in feneſtra cameræ ſupra portam palatii & Domina Lucretia cum eo exiſtente, cum magno riſu & delectatione præmiſſa videntibus (b). - - - - - - On the evening of the laſt Sunday in the month of October, fifty reputable harlots, called courtezans, ſupped with the Duke of Valentinois, in the chamber he had in the Pope's palace; after ſupper they danced with the ſervants and others who were preſent, firſt in their cloaths, and afterwards ſtark naked: then candleſticks were brought upon the table, with candles burning, and before them were thrown upon the ground a great many cheſnuts, which theſe naked harlots ſcrambled for, creeping upon all four, and paſſing backward and forward before the candleſticks, while the Pope, the Duke, and Lucretia, his ſiſter, were preſent and looking on. At laſt ſeveral ſilk doublets, pairs of breeches, and ſtockings, caps, and other rewards, were offered to thoſe who ſhould lie with the greateſt number of theſe courtezans: whereupon thoſe who were preſent publickly lay with as many of them as they pleaſed, and afterwards the rewards were diſtributed to the victors. On Thurſday the eleventh of November a peaſant entered the city, driving two mares laden with wood; when he came to St Peter's Square, the Pope's ſervants immediately run to the mares, cut their girts, threw off their wood and their pack-ſaddles, and brought them to the little court which is nigh the palace-gate: then they let looſe four ſtone-horſes, without any halters or bridles, who run to the mares, and with great noiſe and clamour, biting and kicking one another, mounted and covered them, and greatly bruiſed and hurt them. The Pope being at the window of a chamber over the palace-gate, and the lady Lucretia with him, beheld all this with great mirth and delight.’

XII.
Laws of Charles V, &c. againſt

Was I further to enlarge upon the ſubject of this Diſſertation, I ſhould hope the reader would excuſe my prolixity, if he conſidered the abundance and importance of the matter, and the care I ſhould take, as I have done hitherto, not to tranſcribe the

---

(zz*) Johannes Burchardus, Argentinenſis, Capellæ Alexandri Sexti Papæ Clericus Ceremoniarum Magiſter. The Excerpta, out of his Diarium, were printed at Hanover in 1696, by the care of Mr Leibniz, with this title, Specimen Hiſtoriæ Arcanæ ſive Anecdotæ de Vita Alexandri IV Papæ.

(a) Buſſy, ubi ſupra, pag. 269.

(b) Specimen Hiſtor. Arcanæ ſeu Anecdotæ de Vita Alexandri VI Papæ, pag. 77, 78.

libels. How Pope Hadrian VI was diſſuaded from overthrowing Paſquin's ſtatue.

Civilians who have written ſo many books upon this queſtion [H]. It is eaſy to be copious upon a ſubject which affords ſo many reflexions, and wherein the public is ſo much concerned, that all legiſlators concur in ſeverely puniſhing the authors of defamatory libels. We have ſeen that the laws of the twelve tables ſentenced them to death, and it is not true that Auguſtus repealed them in this reſpect (c): we have ſeen the contrary above. One of the greateſt Emperors that lived ſince Auguſtus, appointed the puniſhment of Retaliation (d); for he ordered that libellers ſhould undergo the ſame puniſhment with thoſe whom they defame, and who ſhould be convicted: nay he would not have them to go unpuniſhed, tho' they ſhould ſay nothing but truth. 'Per hoc 'autem quod verum ſcripſerit infamans nullam meretur excuſationem, ſiquidem veri'tatem criminis per libellum famoſum pandere non licet, & edens libellum famoſum 'injuriarum tenetur, nec admitti debet edens libellum famoſum & injuriarum conventus 'ad probationem veritatis criminis. Joannes Thilemannus de Benignis, alias Goth. 'Obſ. Practi. 86. Quod etiam confirmatur per conſtitutionem Caroli V. criminal. 'arti. 110. in f. ubi hæc verba habentur: Et licet illata injuria prætenſi facti vera eſſet, 'debet tamen diffamator talis injuriæ ſecundum jus & arbitrium judicis puniri (e). '- - - - But a defamer deſerves no excuſe, though his defamation ſhould prove true: for it 'is not lawful to divulge in a defamatory libel the truth of a crime, and the publiſher of ſuch 'a libel is guilty of an action of treſpaſs, nor ought he, or the publiſher of many accuſations, 'to be admitted to prove theſe accuſations. . . . . This is alſo confirmed by the conſtitution of 'the Emperor Charles V, where theſe words are to be found. And tho' the defamation 'were grounded upon truth, yet the defamer ought to be puniſhed according to the 'power and at the diſcretion of the judge.' In France the famous edict of January condemned them and their abettors to be whipped, and in caſe of relapſe, to be puniſhed with death. Ne quis infames libellos ad quemquam traducendum faciat, divendat, aut divendendos curet. Qui ſecus faxit, primùm fuſtigium, ſecundùm, capitalis pœna indicta eſto (f). I mean here by abettors thoſe who procured the publication, or the ſale of a libel. This was renewed by King Henry III, in the year 1577. The law of the Emperors Valentinian and Valens is very ſevere; for it condemns to a capital puniſhment ſuch as meeting with a libel by chance, divulged it inſtead of tearing or burning it. 'Si quis famoſum libellum, ſive domi ſit, ſive in publico, vel quocunque loco 'etiam ignarus repererit, nec ſtatim corruperit, aut igne conſumpſerit, ſed vim ejus 'manifeſtaverit, quaſi auctor hujuſmodi delicti ſententiæ capitali ſubjiciatur. - - - - - - 'If any perſon ſhall meet with a defamatory libel, either in a private or public place, even if 'he meets with it only by chance, and does not immediatly deſtroy or burn it, but divulges the 'ſame, let him be ſubject to a capital puniſhment, as the author of ſuch a treſpaſs.' See Naudé's Maſcurat, at the 657th page. But ſo many temptations to prolixity will not hinder me from putting an end to this diſſertation, when I have related a thing which I remember I have promiſed, and made three or four other conſiderations.

Pope Hadrian VI hearkened to reaſon, when it was repreſented to him that the remedy he was going to employ againſt Paſquinades, would be uſeleſs. I will uſe Mr Flechier's words: 'An infinite number of libels were then current in Spain, againſt 'the court of Flanders, and againſt Ximenes himſelf. The Flemings *, who were not 'uſed to this ſort of ſmart and ingenious ſatires, complained of them, and the Cardinal 'had orders to ſearch after the authors and Printers, and to puniſh them ſeverely. He 'cauſed, out of form, ſome Bookſellers houſes to be ſearched, but ſo lightly that no 'body was diſturbed at it. He was of opinion that inferiors ſhould have the liberty of 'revenging themſelves for their ſufferings by words or writings, which laſt no longer 'than a man's offended at them, and which loſe their charms and venom when they 'are deſpiſed. Alphonſo Caſtile, governor of Madrid, having met with ſome of theſe 'works reflecting upon Cardinal Hadrian and La-Chaux, Ambaſſadors of Charles, 'ſhewed them to them, and they were very much diſpleaſed at it, eſpecially Hadrian, 'who was for ſome time inconſolable. It is ſaid that being afterwards raiſed to 'St Peter's chair, and not being able to bear the ſtatues of Paſquin and Marforio, 'whom the facetious and ſatirical wits have choſen for the confidents and authors of 'their calumnies, ordered them to be thrown into the Tiber; which had been executed, 'if the Duke of Seſſa, the Spaniſh Ambaſſador, had not very wiſely told him: What 'are you going to do, holy father? It is much better ſtill to pardon thoſe two mutes, than to 'open

(c) Lewis Gilhauſen, p. 222, of his Commentary upon the Pandects, De injuriis & famoſis Libellis, does falſly aſcribe this to that Emperor, and wrongly alledges Horace for it, whoſe authority would do him no ſervice, though he had quoted him better than he has done. Hanc pœnam capitalem, ſays he, Auguſtus ſuſtulit, ut videre eſt ex Horatio, lib. i, epiſtolar. ad Auguſtum.

(d) Charles V, Conſtitutio Caroli V. Cæſaris de Cauſſis capitalibus, Art. cx. Edita in infamantem, pœnam eamdem irrogat quam mereretur diffamatus libello, ſi ejus criminis reus quo accuſatur peractus eſſet. Petrus Gregor. Syntag. juris, lib. xxxviii, cap. vi. See alſo Gilhauſen, ubi ſupra, pag. 225.

(e) Gilhauſen, ubi ſupra, pag. 225, 226.

(f) Commentar. de ſtatu Relig. & Reip. in regno Gall. ad ann. 1561.

* Alvar. Gomez de reb. geſt. Ximen. lib. vii.

[H] The Civilians, who have written ſo many books upon this queſtion, &c.] Mr Furetiere has quoted four or five in one of his Caſes. It is where he would prove that his book againſt ſome Academiſts deſerved not to be called a libel by the ſentence of the Chatelet. I have in vain ſearched after Gabriel Naudé's book, intituled, Marfore, ou Diſcours contre les Libelles. It was printed at Paris by Lewis Boulenger in 8vo. I know not in what year. Leo Allatius mentions it in a book, (62) which he publiſhed in the year 1633. Mr Baillet (63) cites a book which I would fain have read. It is the celeſtial ſhield of John Baptiſt Nocette a Genoeſe, againſt Defamatory Libels. The abbot Michael Juſtiniani (64), ſays, the firſt edition was printed at Paris, in the year 1653, in 4to; and the ſecond, at Lyons 1664, in 12mo. It is written in Italian. Alegambe's Continuator (65) mentions but one edition, viz. that of Paris 1655. See the Margin (66).

(62) Intituled, Apes Urbanæ.

(63) Baillet, Jugem. des Sçavans, ſur les Préjugez des libelles diffamatoires, &c. part ii, ch. viii.

(64) Gli Scrittori Liguri deſcritti, pag. 337, 338.

(65) Nathan. Sotuel, Biblioth. Script. Societ. Jeſu, pag. 415.

(66) The authors quoted by Furetiere, pag. 12, of the third Caſe, are Franciſcus Balduinus, Paris 1562: Fredericus Banvinus: Aurelius de Vergeriis, printed in the year 1564, in 8vo: Joan. Conradus Rokembach, at Straſbourg, in 1660, in 4to: and Henricus Boceerus, at Tubingen 1611, in 8vo. I believe that his Fredericus Banvinus is an imaginary author, whoſe name has by degrees been taken from Franciſcus Balduinus thro' ſome errors of the preſs, and the abbreviations of the ſirname. The book of this Banvinus is mentioned in ſuch a manner by Draudius, pag. m. 782, as perfectly agrees with Balduinus's book.

‘ open the mouths of all the town. If you throw them into the river, the frogs will croak ‘ the railleries which we read as we go by them: and what two dead ſtones ſhall no longer ‘ ſpeak, will be divulged by all perſons living. The Pope followed this advice, and was ‘ afterwards leſs nice upon this ſubject (g).’ That you may ſee more particularly the ſenſibility of this Pope, I will ſet down the words of Paul Jovius, who tells us that the Spaniſh Ambaſſador was forced to renew his advice. ‘ Graviſſime etiam tulerat ſe ‘ famoſis carminibus apud Paſquilli ſtatuam fuiſſe laceratum, ſed id poſtea civili animo ‘ tulit, cum didiciſſet, eam maledicendi licentiam obſcurorum hominum libertati atque ‘ nequitiæ dari, ut cum inſignes viros impunè carpſerint, fortunam ſuam ea vindictæ ‘ voluptate conſolentur. Decreverat Hadrianus uti poëtis non obſcurè ſubiratus, Paſquilli ‘ ſtatuam, quæ erat in Parione, demoliri, atque eam in Tyberim præcipitare: ſed ‘ Ludovicus Sueſſanus urbano ſalſoque ingenio id fieri debere pernegavit, ſubdens, Paſquillum vel in imo vado ranarum more, non eſſe taciturum, ad id verò pontifex, ex‘ uratur ergo, inquit, in calcem, ne ejus veſtigii ulla omnino memoria ſuperſit: Tum ‘ rurſus Sueſſanus, rectè inquit, ſed tam crudeliter concremato poëtæ clientes non ‘ deerunt, qui patroni cineres invidioſis carminibus proſequantur, & ſupplicii locum ‘ quotannis ſtatuto ſolenni die concelebrent. Quibus verborum luſibus pontifex ab ‘ iracundia ad jocos hilaritatemque ſenſus omnes leniſſimè revocavit (h). - - - - - - Pope ‘ Hadrian was alſo highly offended at ſome ſatirical verſes written upon him, and faſtened to ‘ Paſquin's ſtatue; but he afterwards bore this with great calmneſs, when he came to know ‘ that this licentiouſneſs of defaming was to be tolerated in obſcure and invidious men, that ‘ they might comfort themſelves in their hard fortune, by the pleaſure and revenge they took in ‘ being ſuffered to defame eminent men. Hadrian, being highly incenſed againſt the Poets, ‘ had reſolved that Paſquin's ſtatue ſhould be taken down, and even caſt into the Tiber. But ‘ Lewis Duke of Seſſa, a man of wit and humour, repreſented that ſuch a thing ought not to ‘ be done, alledging that if Paſquin was in the bottom of the river, he would not be ſilent, but ‘ would croak like the frogs. To this the Pope anſwered, let him therefore be burnt to ‘ aſhes, ſo that there may not remain the leaſt remembrance of him. Right, ſaid the ‘ Duke, but if Paſquin ſhould be ſo cruelly burnt, he would not be abandoned by the ‘ Poets, his clients, who would attend the aſhes of their patron with many ſatirical ‘ verſes, and would ſet a part a day yearly for celebrating the place of his ſuffering. ‘ Theſe facetious words appeaſed the Pope's anger, and put him in a merry and chearful ‘ humour.’

XIII. Princes who have deſpiſed ſlanders.

Some Princes have been as inſenſible to ſlanders as Cardinal Ximenés. See in Seneca (i) how Antigonus (k) pardoned ſome ſoldiers who had lampooned him. The ſame author alledges (l) the patience of Philip of Macedon, and that of Auguſtus. This Emperor expreſſed an admirable good humour towards a ſatirical Hiſtorian (m), who had abuſed him, his wife and children. Nothing was more likely to exaſperate a potent Prince, who beſides knew that the witiciſms of the Hiſtorian had been taken up and ſpread over all the town. This is cuſtomary. The Chevalier de Meré has wiſely ſaid, That ſlanders are very much to be feared, when they are expreſſed in witty ſayings, becauſe people delight to repeat them, and love always to commend a good thought (n). But Seneca ſays with more reaſon ſtill, that witty ſayings, which expoſe their authors to ſome danger, are more ſtudiouſly obſerved than any others. ‘ Multa & divus Auguſtus digna ‘ memoria fecit, dixitque, ex quibus appareat illi iram non imperaſſe. Timagenes hi‘ ſtoriarum ſcriptor, quædam in ipſum, quædam in uxorem ejus, & in totam domum ‘ dixerat, nec perdiderat dicta: magis enim circumfertur, & in ore hominum eſt, te‘ meraria urbanitas (o). - - - - Many of the actions and ſayings of Auguſtus deſerve to be re- ‘ membred, and manifeſt that he was far from being maſtered by anger. Timagenes, an ‘ Hiſtorian, had paſſed ſome invidious jeſts on the Emperor, his wife, and his whole family; ‘ and theſe jeſts were not diſregarded and forgot; for men love to ſpread and repeat witty ‘ ſayings, when they are indiſcreet, and expoſe the authors of them to danger.’ However it be, the detraction of this Hiſtorian brought but a ſmall diſgrace upon him. Add to this what I have cited above (p). Nothing can be more rational than Mæcenas's arguments about the contempt that this Emperor ought to expreſs for ſlanders (q). He adviſed him not to hearken to the informers againſt ſatiriſts, and to puniſh no body for ſpeaking ill of him. You may ſee in Dion Caſſius the reaſons of this advice. The ſame Hiſtorian will inform you, why Cæſar took no notice of the injurious things that Cicero, and ſome others divulged againſt him (r). He thought they aimed at the glory of equalling themſelves with him they abuſed, and that it was better to deprive them of this advantage, by avoiding to contend with them. The reaſon he went upon was contained in an oration of Quintus Metellus Numidicus, if we judge of it by this diſcourſe of Aulus Gellius; however, I would not have it to be extended ſo far as to Cicero. ‘ Cum inquinatiſſimis hominibus non eſſe convicio decertandum, neque in maledictis ‘ adverſus impudentes & improbos velitandum, quia tantiſper ſimilis & compar eorum ‘ fias, dum paria & conſimilia dicas atque audias, non minus ex oratione Q. Metelli ‘ Numidici ſapientis viri cognoſci poteſt, quàm ex libris & diſciplinis philoſophorum. ‘ Verba hæc ſunt Metelli adverſus Cn. Manlium tribunum plebei, à quo apud populum in concione laceſſitus jactatuſque fuerat dictis petulantibus, Nunc quod ad illum at- ‘ tinet, Quirites, quoniam ſe ampliorem putat eſſe, ſi ſe mihi inimicum dictitaverit, quem ego

(g) Flechier, Hiſtoire du Cardinal Ximenés, livr. vi, p. 814, Dutch Edit.

(h) Paul. Jovius, in Vita Hadriani ſexti, pag. m. 277, 278. See alſo Camerarius's Hiſtorical Meditations. He ſuppoſes that the ſecond anſwer was made by a Cardinal, and not by the Ambaſſador, and that it was a wooden ſtatue,

(i) Seneca, de Ira, lib. iii, cap. xxii.

(k) He was not grandfather to Alexander the Great, as Seneca ſays.

(l) Seneca, ubi ſupra, cap. xxiii.

(m) Called Timagenes.

(n) Chevalier de Meré, Diſcours de la Converſation, p. 81, 82, Dutch Edit.

(o) Seneca, ubi ſupra, cap. xxiii, pag. m. 570.

(p) At the beginning of this Diſſertation, citations (e) and (f).

(q) See Dion Caſſius, lib. lii, pag. m. 556.

(r) Dion, ibid. lib. xxxviii, p. m. 71, 72.

mihi neque amicum recipio, neque inimicum reſpicio, in eum ego non ſum plura dicturus; nam eum indigniſſimum arbitror, cui à viris bonis benedicatur: tum ne idoneum quidem, cui à probis maledicatur: nam ſi in eo tempore hujuſcemodi homunculum nomines, in quo pœnire non poſſis, majore honore quam contumelia afficias (s). - - - That we ought not to contend in defamation and reproaches with baſe and diſhoneſt, or with impudent and wicked men, (for by returning the ſame or the like invectives and abuſe we put ourſelves on a level with ſuch perſons) we may learn not only from the writings and doctrines of the Philoſophers, but likewiſe from the oration of Quintus Metellus Numidicus, who was a very wiſe man. Theſe are the words of Metellus, againſt Cneius Manlius the tribune, who had made an harangue to the people, in which he had treated him in the moſt opprobrious and abuſive manner. Now, Romans, as for this Manlius, becauſe he expects to paſs for a man of greater importance, by often calling himſelf an enemy to me, a man whom I neither admit to my friendſhip, nor regard as my enemy, I will ſay no more of him, for I think he is far from deſerving to be commended by honeſt men, nor even worthy to be cenſured by good men: for the very naming of ſuch a wretch, at a time when he cannot be puniſhed, does him more honour than diſcredit.' But Cæſar not being yet Emperor, his conduct on this occaſion is not of ſo great weight for this part of my work as that of Tiberius mentioned by Tacitus. A lady was charged with having ſpoken ill of Auguſtus, of the Empreſs Livia, and of Tiberius. She was proſecuted upon the law de Majeſtate. Tiberius would have a diſtinction made; I will not, ſaid he, have her proſecuted for what concerns me; but if ſhe be found guilty as to Auguſtus, let her be puniſhed. He anſwered nothing the firſt day about his mother; but the next day he declared, that ſhe deſired no body ſhould be brought into trouble for ſatirical words ſpoken againſt her. ‘Adoleſcebat interea lex majeſtatis; & Apuleiam Variliam ſororis Auguſti neptem, quia probroſis ſermonibus divum Auguſtum, ac Tiberium, & matrem ejus inluſiſſet, Cæſarique connexa adulterio teneretur, majeſtatis delator arceſſebat. De adulterio ſatis caveri lege Julia viſum: majeſtatis crimen diſtingui Cæſar poſtulavit; damnarique ſi qua de Auguſto irreligioſe dixiſſet: in ſe jacta nolle ad cognitionem vocari. Interrogatus à conſule quid de his cenſeret, quæ de matre ejus locuta ſecus argueretur, reticuit: dein proximo ſenatus die, illius quoque nomine oravit, ne cui verba in eam quoquo modo habita crimini forent: liberavitque Apuleium lege majeſtatis (t). - - - The law of violated Majeſty, in the mean time, began to be of more force; and by it an accuſer impleaded Apuleia Varilia, grand-niece to Auguſtus by his ſiſter, for having by opprobrious words reviled the deified Auguſtus, Tiberius, and his mother, and as ſhe was nearly allied to the Emperor, for having ſtained by adultery the Ceſarean blood. Concerning the adultery, ſufficient proviſion was thought already made by the Julian Law: and as to the crimes of ſtate, Tiberius deſired they might be ſeparated: if ſhe had uttered impious ſpeeches of Auguſtus, ſhe muſt be condemned, but for invectives againſt himſelf, he would not have her called to any account. The Conſul asked what would be his ſentiments, if ſhe was convicted of defaming his mother. To this he made no anſwer, but next ſitting of the Senate, he prayed too in her name, that no words ſpoken againſt her might, to any one, be imputed for crimes, and acquitted Apuleia of treaſon.' Suetonius will give you a more particular account of this Emperor's indolence (u), I would not repeat what I have ſaid before of Nero's moderation, and as for Veſpaſian, I refer you to Suetonius (w). But upon this head can any thing be nobler than this edict of the Emperor Theodoſius? ‘Si quis modeſtiæ neſcius & pudoris ignarus improbo petulantique maledicto nomina noſtra crediderit laceſſenda, ac temulentia turbulentus obtrectator temporum noſtrorum fuerit; eum pœnæ nolumus ſubjugari neque durum aliquid nec aſperum volumus ſuſtinere, quoniam ſi id ex levitate proceſſerit contemnendum eſt, ſi ex inſania miſeratione dignum, ſi ab injuria remittendum: unde integris omnibus hoc ad noſtram ſcientiam referatur, ut ex perſonis hominum dicta penſemus, & utrum prætermitti an exquiri debeant cenſeamus. Datum VI. Id. Auguſt. Conſtantinopoli, Theodoſio anno III. & Abundantio Coſſ. - - - If any perſon, void of modeſty and ſhame, ſhall by wicked and ſlanderous detraction, go about to blaſt our reputation, and wantonly traduce and defame our government, it is our pleaſure that he be not ſubjected to puniſhment, nor ſuffer any hardſhip or ſeverity on that account, becauſe, if this proceeded from levity, it ought to be deſpiſed, if from madneſs, it deſerves pity and compaſſion, if from a deſign to do an injury, it ought to be forgiven. We therefore will that no man be puniſhed, or proſecuted, for ſuch ſlanderous ſpeeches, and that they be referred to our cognizance, that we may weigh and conſider the ſayings of men by their characters, and may judge whether they ought to be paſſed by or inquired into.' This conſtitution is in the Code, in the title, Si quis Imperatori male dixerit.

Modern Hiſtory likewiſe affords ſeveral inſtances of this forbearance. You will find ſome in a Latin letter of Balzac (x), but not that of Lewis XII, which I have related in its proper place (y), nor that of Catherine de Medicis. We learn from Brantome (z), that ſhe read even the invectives that were made againſt her, at which ſhe jeſted and laughed, without any emotion, calling them babblers, and authors of idle-ſtories: Being told that the Huguenots in the ſecond troubles had with them a very fine culverin, which they called the Queen-mother, ſhe deſired to know the reaſon of it. Some body being preſſed by her to tell it,

(s) Aulus Gellius, lib. vi, cap. xi.

(t) Tacit. Annal, lib. ii, cap. l.

(u) Sueton. in Tiber. cap. xxxviii.

(w) Idem, in Veſpaſ. cap. xiii.

(x) Ad Phil. Coſpeanum, p. 251, Edit. 1651, in 12*mo.*

(y) In the remark [L], of the article LEWIS XII.

(z) Brantome, in his Elogy upon Catherine de Medicis.

it, anſwered, it is, Madam, becauſe it has a greater and wider bore than any other. She was the firſt that laughed at it (aa). What ſhe told ſome ſoldiers who ſpoke moſt horrible infamies of her, is to be ſeen in Coſtar's letters with ſome flouriſhes. ‘ (bb) Catherine de Medicis, tho' ſhe was of a country where they ſay, God has reſerved vengeance to himſelf, becauſe it is the dainty bit, found nevertheleſs more daintineſs in pardoning than in puniſhing, when ſhe ſaw ſome ſoldiers by her coach, who ſaid of her all the filthy things imaginable, without minding her, or ſo much as lowering their voice; for this Princeſs only looked out of the coach, and fixing her eyes upon thoſe rogues told them: Friends, if you do not go farther off to ſpeak ill of me, I will keep you from roaſting the gooſe (cc), and eating it ſo quietly as you do. The Cardinal of Lorrain would have had them hanged for an example; but ſhe choſe rather to let poſterity know that a perſon, who was at once a woman, a queen, and an Italian, could command her paſſion, and deprive herſelf of the pleaſure ſhe would have found in revenge.’ I am much miſtaken, if this ſtory is not originally in d'Aubigné's Hiſtory. But to ſhew how Coſtar accommodated the circumſtances of facts to his own humour, without conſidering the great abuſes which ariſe from ſuch a liberty, it will not be amiſs to ſet down the words of that Hiſtorian (dd). I have it, ſays he, from the Sieur de Talſi (ee), that the King of Navarre, and the Queen-mother being (ff) at the window of a low room, overheard two black-guards, who were roaſting a gooſe on a wooden ſpit, and ſinging infamies againſt the Queen: one often ſaid that the Cardinal had lain with her, and that ſhe had a pig in her belly, the other ſaid it was a mule-colt; and then they curſed the bitch that did them ſo much miſchief. The King of Navarre was taking his leave of the Queen to go and have them hanged; but ſhe looking out of the window ſaid, Why, what has ſhe done to you? You may thank her that you roaſt the gooſe, and turning to the King of Navarre, and laughing, ſhe told him, Couſin, our anger muſt not deſcend ſo low; that is beneath us. This I mention to ſhew that there was nothing mean in her.

Francis I, is one of the examples alledged by Balzac. But I find one thing in him to be blamed, which is that this King ſuffered his miniſters and courtiers to be abuſed upon the ſtage, at the ſame time that he permitted his own faults to be cenſured. This was imitating a conduct which Antient Greece and Rome found detrimental to them. It was introducing an ill cuſtom: and if it be an act of magnanimity in a Prince to deſpiſe the ſatires that concern his own perſon, and to forgive the authors of them; it is a viſible neglect of his duty to ſuffer his ſubjects to be expoſed to the inſults of a ſatirical pen. He may abate of his own right; but the honour of his ſubjects ought to appear inviolable to him. Note, That Francis I. did not ſuffer the Players to name people. ‘ Accepimus tacitè, libenterque etiam ferre ſolitum, ſe præcipuoſque Regni ſui proceres, quorum ipſe opera conſiliiſque utebatur, in Fabulis & Comœdiis publicis rodi & configi maledictis; tecte id quidem & involute, ſed tamen ut ab omnibus perſpiceretur (gg). - - - We are informed that King Francis I, was wont patiently, and even willingly to ſuffer himſelf and the chief nobles of his kingdom, men whom he employed in the higheſt offices, to be inveighed againſt, and ſatirized in the public Comedies. It is true theſe invectives were concealed and diſguiſed; yet ſo as that every body could perceive them.’

XIV.
The Romans were more jealous of their honour than of that of their gods.

The Romans did not permit the Comic Poets to abuſe the Magiſtrates, but they left them an entire liberty to make ſport with the gods. St Auſtin upbraided them with it ſeverely. ‘ At Romani, ſays he (hh), ſicut in illa de (ii) republica diſputatione gloriatur Scipio, probris & injuriis poëtarum ſubjectam vitam famamque habere noluerunt, capite etiam punire ſancientes tale carmen condere ſi quis auderet. Quod erga ſe quidem ſatis honeſte conſtituerunt, ſed erga Deos ſuos ſuperbe & irreligioſe. Quos cum ſcirent non ſolum patienter, ſed etiam libenter poëtarum probris maledictiſque lacerari, ſe potius quam illos hujuſcemodi injuriis indignos eſſe duxerunt, ſeque ab eis etiam lege munierunt, illorum autem iſta etiam ſacris ſolennitatibus miſcuerunt. Itane tandem Scipio laudas, hanc poetis Romanis negatam eſſe licentiam ut cuiquam opprobrium infligerent Romanorum, cum videas, eos nulli Deorum pepercisse veſtrorum? Itane pluris tibi habenda eſt exiſtimatio veſtræ curiæ, quam Capitolii, imo Romæ unius quam cœli totius: ut linguam maledicam in cives tuos exercere poetæ etiam lege prohiberentur, & in Deos tuos ſecuri, tanta convitia nullo ſenatore, nullo cenſore, nullo principe nullo pontifice prohibente jacularenter? Indignum videlicet fuit, ut Plautus aut Nævius Publio & Cneo Scipioni, aut Cæcilius M. Catoni malediceret: & dignum fuit, ut Terentius veſter flagitio Jovis optimi maximi adoleſcentium nequitiam concitaret. - - - But the Romans, as Scipio boaſts in that diſputation concerning the Republic, would not ſuffer their lives and reputations to be expoſed to the reproach and abuſe of the Poets, having decreed that if any perſon ſhould be guilty of writing a Defamatory Libel, he ſhould be put to death. The decrees they made relating to themſelves were commendable enough, but thoſe which related to their gods were haughty and irreligious. For knowing that though the gods were abuſed and reviled by the Poets, yet they bore it not only with patience, but alſo willingly, the Romans thought that they themſelves deſerved ſuch abuſe, leſs than their gods, and likewiſe made laws to protect themſelves againſt it; but they ſuffered the invectives againſt the gods to be mingled even with their ſacred ſolemnities. Is it ſo Scipio? do you commend this decree which made it unlawful for your Poets to inflict reproach and diſhonour upon any Roman, whilſt you ſee they have ſpared none of your gods? Have you

‘ then

(aa) Id. ibid.

(bb) Coſtar, pag. 729, of the firſt volume of his Letters.

(cc) This is abſurd, being ſeparated from the circumſtances mentioned by d'Aubigné here below.

(dd) D'Aubigné Hiſt. Univerſ. Tom. i, livr. iii, ch. v, pag. 198.

(ee) He is probably the ſame, who was d'Aubigné's father-in-law, and whoſe name was John Salviati. See d'Aubigné's Hiſtory, Tom. ii, livr. v, ch. xviii, p. 1143.

(ff) During the parley for a peace at Talſi, in the year 1562.

(gg) Balzacius, Epiſt. ad Coſpeanum, pag. m. 254.

(hh) Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, lib. ii, cap. xii.

(ii) See chap. ix, of the ſame book, de Civitate Dei.

then more regard for your Senate-houſe, than for the Capitol, for Rome alone, than for the whole Heavens; that the Poets who are by law forbidden to exerciſe their malicious tongues againſt your citizens, ſhould be by no Senator, Cenſor, Prince, or Pontif, forbidden to load your gods with ſo many reproaches? Was it an heinous offence in Plautus or Mevius, to ſlander Publius and Cneius Scipio, or Cecilius to defame Marcus Cato, and was it commendable in Terence to exhort the youth to leudneſs by the wicked and profligate example of almighty Jupiter.’ This thought is older than St Auſtin, for Arnobius had made uſe of it before. ‘Nec à vobis ſaltem iſtum meruerunt honorem (Dii) . . . Carmen malum conſcribere, quo fama alterius coinquinetur & vita, decemviralibus ſcitis evadere noluiſtis impune: ac ne veſtras aures convitio aliquis petulantiore pulſaret, de atrocibus formulas conſtituiſtis injuriis. Soli Dii ſunt apud vos ſuperi inhonorati, contemptibiles, viles: in quos jus eſt vobis datum, quæ quiſque voluerit dicere: turpitudinem jacere, quas libido confinxerit atque excogitaverit formas (k k). - - - - Neither ought you at leaſt to pay this honour to the gods. By the laws of the twelve tables, you have not ſuffered the authors of libels, which defame the life and reputation of any perſon, to eſcape unpuniſhed; and to the end, that no man might grate your ears with abuſive reproaches, you have decreed that defamation ſhould be puniſhed as a capital crime. With you the gods alone are diſhonoured, deſpiſed, and vilified, you are permitted to ſay of the gods whatever you pleaſe, and even to reproach them with thoſe very things, which your luſt prompted you to feign and deviſe.’ A modern author does not mention it upon an occaſion wherein it would have ſerved his purpoſe. It is in a letter wherein he deſigned to attack the Houſe of Auſtria. He enters upon the matter in hand, not citing Arnobius or St Auſtin, but Livy. ‘(ll) The Spaniards, who firſt ſought the ſame alliance (m m) which their partiſans blame at preſent, took no care to preſerve the veneration, due to holy things, or to maintain the immunities and privileges of the prieſthood. Perhaps the reaſon of it was, becauſe thinking themſelves to be the lawful ſucceſſors of the Romans, particularly in their deſign of forming an univerſal monarchy, they fancy they may ſay as well as they, *As for religion, it is more the intereſt of the gods than ours. They may give orders if they pleaſe for hindring ſacred things from being polluted by impure hands. Ad * Deos id magis quàm ad ſe pertinere, ipſos viſuros ne ſacra ſua polluantur.* Is it not very likely that Charles V acted by this principle, when in the year 1552, he diſplaced three Lutheran miniſters in Augſburg for abuſing him, and ſuffered the reſt to vilify God, his mother, and his ſaints; as the Duke of Nevers reproached him in a diſcourſe he made to Pope Sixtus V (nn), upon the preſent ſtate of affairs. Doubtleſs the Emperor Charles remembred this ſaying of Tiberius, and not without putting it in practice. Let us leave to the immortal gods the care of revenging injuries that are done to them. Deorum  injuriæ Diis curæ.’

XV.
The council of Trent aſcribes the power of puniſhing the writers of libels to the tribunal of the Church.

I muſt not forget a thing which very much diſpleaſed the Civilians who were tender of the rights of the ſecular power. They looked upon the authority given to the Biſhops by the council of Trent, as an uſurpation. Let us hear William Ranchin (o o). ‘This council, to the prejudice of the ſecular juriſdiction, aſſigns to the Biſhops † the puniſhment of the authors of Defamatory Libels, and of the Printers of them, &c. . . . . . Our Civil Laws commit the cognizance and puniſhment of them to the judges and magiſtrates, and not to Eccleſiaſtics. Some would except thoſe that concern religion; but this exception is not pertinent; and here is an argument againſt it. The laws of Conſtantine the Great, and of Conſtantius, made againſt ſuch libels, were enacted at ſuch a time as this, that is, at a time when ſeveral writings were publiſhed in matters of religion againſt the honour of both ſides. Dr Balduin ⸸ has very judiciouſly obſerved it. It is a material thing, ſays he, to remember what were the times of Conſtantine and Conſtantius, in which the contentions of religion, not unlike ours, inflamed the paſſions of the parties, who thereupon ſent out horrid calumnies and Defamatory Libels, as is done at preſent. He ſays this, explaining three laws of the Emperor Conſtantine, and two of Conſtantius, made upon this account, which we find at preſent in the Theodoſian Code. Theſe words ‡ of the Emperors Valentinian and Valens are alſo remarkable: If any one is concerned for his religion and the public ſafety, let him declare his name, and ſpeak with his own mouth what he would have ſaid in Defamatory Libels. This very well agrees to libels in point of religion, and was never ſaid in any other ſenſe by thoſe Emperors. Now * all the abovementioned conſtitutions, as alſo ſome others of the ſame Valentinian and Valens, of Arcadius, Honorius, and Theodoſius, inflict penalties on the authors of ſuch libels, and the publiſhers of them, and commit the cognizance and puniſhment of them to their officers and magiſtrates, directing ſuch laws to them, that they may obſerve them in their ſentences. A great many ordinances of our Kings mention in expreſs words Defamatory and Scandalous Libels that concern religion, preſcribe the puniſhment due to them, and the particular penalties to be inflicted on the authors, printers, and publiſhers, and expreſly give this juriſdiction to the royal judges. As that of King Henry II, of the eleventh of December 1547, made at Fontainebleau, and another of the ſame Prince made at Chaſteaubriant in the year 1551. That of King Charles IX, made at Mante on the tenth of September 1563. That of the States of Molins in the article LXXVII, and a great many others. I ſhall only ſet down the (k k) Arnobius, lib. iv, pag. 150, 151.

(ll) Coſtar, Letter cccxciv, of vol. i, pag. 974, 975.

(m m) That of Cromwell.

* Livy, book x.

(n n) See in Mr Arnauld's Apology for the Catholics, Part. i, cap. vi, pag. 78, 79, a long paſſage of this Duke's diſcourſe.

 Tacit. lib. i, Annal.

(o o) Reviſion du Concile de Trente, livr. vi, cap. iii, pag. m. 247.

† Seſſ. 24, cap. 1.

⸸ Franciſcus Balduinus in commentar. ad leges de famoſ. libell. pag. 13.

‡ L. 7 C. Theod. de famoſ. libell. l. unic. C. Juſtin. eod.

* Vide Totum Titul. C. Theodoſ. de famoſis libellis.

‘ words of them, viz. that of King Charles IX, made at Mante on the tenth of ‘ September 1563, which ſpeaks of Defamatory Libels, bills poſted up, books, and ‘ ſuch-like things concerning religion; and as to juriſdiction, it provides thus: Injoining all public magiſtrates, juſtices of the peace, and our other officers to whom it ſhall ‘ belong, to take a due care of them, charging our attorneys and advocates to do their duty ‘ therein, and to lay aſide all other affairs, in order to examine and puniſh the offences they ‘ ſhall find. And it is moreover enjoined, that they ſhall obſerve the ſame ordinance in every ‘ point, and proceed briefly againſt the infractors, by the puniſhments herein ſpecified.’

XVI. Libels complained of as being the cauſes of ſedition.

As there in nothing ſo uſeful, but in ſome reſpects is the cauſe of evil, it fell out that printing, among a thouſand conveniencies it has brought with it, has occaſioned a notable inconvenience, which is, that it has afforded ſatirical and ſeditious men a thouſand opportunities of quickly diſperſing their venom every where. Du Verdier Vau-Privas has inſerted in one of his books (p) a Latin Poem, entituled, Encomion Chalcographiæ, where, after ſeveral praiſes beſtowed upon printing, many complaints are brought in againſt the licentiouſneſs of libels. The author of this Poem being a Roman Catholic, it muſt be obſerved that he ſuits his ſtyle to his prejudices in the following verſes:

Omnia dente petunt, fœdant ſpurcaque ſaliva,
  Digni qui Anticyræ præmia ſana ferant.
A quibus & Nemeſis turpiſſima facta repoſcat,
  Quo meritas pœnas improba turba luat.
Principis ac Princeps lacerat caput, atque tacenda
  Conſilia in chartis vendere quiſque ſolet.
De rebus magnis populi ſuffragia vana
  Captant, quæ ſemper mens animoſa fugit.
Quid non aubebit furioſa licentia vulgi,
  Talia ſi primi dant documenta duces?
Quæ non his oritur funeſta Tragœdia nugis?
  Accendit quas non hæc quoque flamma faces?
Ruſtica ſeditio belli cur cornua ſumpſit?
  Chartæ pellaces hoc docuere nefas.
Has quoque Gorgoneo perſudit ſacra cruore
  Progenies vulgi, quam nova ſecta tenet.
Quæque Numam ſimulat modo religione prophana,
  Et geminos fertur ferre ſub aure polos.
Omnia confundit, vertit ſurſumque, deorſumque,
  Ac gerras præter nil ſua ſylva crepat.
Hæc auſa eſt Aquilæ Romanæ vellere pennas,
  Atque aras magni commaculare Dei.
Non adeò lædunt Bombardæ fulmina dira:
  Nil præter clades ſit licet illa tonent:
Nec tantùm nocuit cuiquam vis ſæva cicutæ,
  Quantùm famoſi ſtigmata nigra libri.
His & mille modis eſſent hæc ſæpe notanda,
  Aſt iter immodicum noſtra Thaleia fugit.

With theſe advantages from printing ſprung,
Swarms of defaming libels alſo come;
Where ſland'rers ſtain and poiſon with their breath,
And madly rage, and tear with furious teeth.
Let vengeance overtake this odious crew,
Bare their moſt hidden crimes to public view
And with diſgrace their blaſted names purſue.
Defamers ſpare not the moſt ſacred things,
Haunt and infeſt the palaces of Kings;
They ſlander Majeſty, and all the great,
Divulge th' important ſecrets of the State,
Greedily catch th' applauſe of th' ign'rant croud,
A vain applauſe ſhunn'd by the wiſe and good.
What limits can the pop'lar fury know,
  While ſuch examples inſtigate to vice?
What fatal tragedies and civil woe,
  What broils and diſcords will there not ariſe?
Libels of tumults firſt the cauſes are,
And then inflame them to a civil-war.
But none ſo bloody libels are, as thoſe
Which Heretics with laviſh hand diffuſe:
This inauſpicious offspring of the croud,
Subverting all things, nought but miſchief brood,

Inſult

(p) At the end of the Supplementum Epitomes Bibliothecæ Geſnerianæ.

Inſult th' Imperial throne, provoke th' avenging ſword,
Dare Heaven, and profane the altars of the Lord.
Not ſlaught'ring guns, whoſe iſſue wrapt in ſmoke,
And wing'd with death, flies hiſſing to the ſtroke;
Nor deadly draught, which mixing, with the blood,
Corrodes the heart and taints the vital flood,
Such woful miſchief and deſtruction bring,
As Printing, whence defaming Libels ſpring.

Eraſmus exclaimed againſt the abuſes of the preſs, and confuted the ridiculous excuſes of the Printers, who alledged that they ſhould want bread if they did not publiſh libels. ‘Dicet hic aliquis: Heus divinator, quid hæc ad Typograhos? Quia nonnullam mali partem invehit horum impunita licentia. Implent mundum libellis, non jam dicam nugalibus, quales ego forſitan ſcribo; ſed ineptis, indoctis, maledicis, famoſis, rabioſis, impiis ac ſeditioſis: & horum turba facit, ut frugiferis etiam libellis ſuus pereat fructus. Provolant quidam abſque titulis, aut titulis, (quod eſt ſceleratius) fictis. Deprehenſi reſpondent: Detur unde alam familiam, deſinam tales libellos excudere. Aliquanto meliore fronte reſpondeat fur, impoſtor aut leno: Da quî vivam & deſinam his artibus uti, niſi forte levius crimen eſt, clam minuere rem alienam, quam palam eripere famam alienam: aut ſine vi ad quæſtum abuti tuo alienove corpore, quam vitam alterius ac famam vita quoque chariorem impetere (q). - - - - Here ſome body may aſk, what is all this to Printers? I anſwer, it does concern them, becauſe the unpuniſhed licentiouſneſs of theſe men, is partly the cauſe of the evil I complain of. They fill the world with writings, which I will not call trifling and inſignificant, ſuch perhaps as are mine, but writings that are impertinent, unlearned, ſcandalous, defamatory, furious, impious and ſeditious libels; and there come forth ſuch multitudes of them, that they prevent the reading of uſeful books, and obſtruct the good effect they might have. Some come forth without any titles, or (which is ſtill more wicked) under fictitious ones. If you diſcover the Printers of theſe libels, they ſay, give me wherewithal to ſupport my family, and I will leave off printing ſuch books. With more modeſty might a thief, a cheat, or a pander ſay, give me wherewithal to live, and I will leave off committing theſe crimes; and perhaps it is not ſo criminal ſecretly to deprive another man of his property, as openly to rob him of his good name, not ſo criminal to proſtitute one's own body, or that of another perſon, for the ſake of gain, without uſing violence, as it is to attempt upon another man's life, and what is much more dear to him, his reputation.’ I think that the author of the abovementioned poem does the ſatirical writers more honour than they deſerve, by accuſing them to be the cauſe of wars and ſeditions. It is certain that very often they aim at ſuch a thing, and are over-joyed to think that their libels have produced ſo great an effect. They flatter themſelves with it, even when they have no reaſon to do it, and are very well pleaſed to have this laid to their charge. Can one build any certain fact upon this ſubject? I do not think any general rule can be grounded upon it. At certain times Defamatory Libels do not ſtir the people, and the Publiſhers are diſappointed in their expectations. But at other times they are real incendiaries, and trumpeters of ſedition. Beſides, the difference of parties and intereſts is to be conſidered; for the effects of libels are in that reſpect very different, and even contrary to one another: They ſometimes unite thoſe whom they would divide, and divide thoſe they would unite. What is certain is, that the tongue and pen of a ſingle man are ſometimes more uſeful to a cauſe, than an army of forty thouſand men. Francis I, confeſſed that the Biſhop of Sion had done him more miſchief by his words than all Swiſſerland by their arms. Maxime vero ei glorioſum fuit Franciſci Regis judicium, quum aſſeveraret, me audiente, aliquanto plus ſibi ſumptus atque periculi Sedunenſis facundiæ indomitam vim, quàm tot legionum ejus gentis cuſpides attuliſſe (r). I will not mention the confeſſion of a King of England (s); for it would be departing from the matter in hand, and miſapplying a thought to the preſent ſubject. The queſtion is not here about the great things a King can do without going out of his cloſet, and by the ſole power of his pen; nay, the queſtion is not in general about the power of the pen in a war. A little book came out upon this ſubject in the year 1679 (t).

XVII.
Whether it be too ſevere a thing to inflict the ſame puniſhment upon the diſperſers of libels as upon the authors of them. Some remarks againſt thoſe who approve libels.

I have called the law of Valentinian and Valens, a ſevere one which condemns to a capital puniſhment thoſe who accidentally meeting with a libel do not deſtroy it, but on the contrary encourage it. Does this ſignify that I blame this law? By no means: For I cannot conceive that a man who in this caſe diſperſes a libel, is leſs deſirous of doing miſchief than the author himſelf, and therefore he deſerves the ſame puniſhment with the author. But what ſhall we ſay of the pleaſure that is taken in the reading of a Defamatory Libel? Is it not a very ſinful thing before God? Here we muſt make a diſtinction. Either this pleaſure is only an agreeable ſenſation, which affects us when we light upon any thought that is ingenious, and well expreſſed; or it is a joy grounded upon the diſhonour of the perſon defamed. I have nothing to ſay upon the firſt caſe; for perhaps ſome would think that my morality departs too much from that of the Rigoriſts, if I ſhould affirm that a man is not maſter of thoſe agreeable ſenſations, any more than of thoſe occaſioned by ſugar or honey when they touch his tongue: but in the ſecond

---

(q) Eraſmus, in Explicatione Proverbii Feſtina lente. It is the firſt of the Iſt century of the ſecond Chiliad. Compare what is ſaid in the article ERASMUS, remark [X].

(r) Paulus Jovius, Elog. Virorum bellica virtute inſign. lib. v. pag. m. 389.

(s) He ſaid this of the ſaid King Charles V. There never was a King in France who made fewer wars than he, who never ſtirs from his cloſet, being always writing letters; and yet no King did ever cut out ſo much work for me. Belleforeſt, Chroniques & Annales de France, fol. m. 357, ad ann. 1364.

(t) Intituled, Arma Anſerina, ſive Armatura Epiſtolaris, à Doctore militari, Tacito, ſubminiſtrata & in Diſſertatione Politica diducta à G. C. W.

cond caſe, every body will own that pleaſure to be a great ſin. The pleaſure in the firſt caſe is of no continuance; it precedes the uſe of our reaſon and our reflexion, and is immediately ſucceeded by the grief of ſeeing our neighbour's honour blaſted. If it does not ceaſe immediately, it is a ſign that the inſolence of the ſatiriſt does not diſpleaſe us, and that we are glad to ſee him defame his enemy by all ſorts of ſtories; and then we juſtly deſerve the puniſhment to which the writer of the libel is liable. I have juſt light upon a modern author, here are his words: St Gregory excommunicating the auhors who had diſhonoured the Deacon Caſtorius, does not except thoſe who read that book; becauſe, ſaid he, if calumnies have always been the delight of the ears, and the happineſs of the people, who have no other advantage over honeſt men, is not he who takes pleaſure in reading them, as guilty as if he gloried in compoſing them (v)? It is a certain maxim, that they who approve an action would willingly do it if they could; that is, if ſome reaſon of ſelf-love did not hinder them. There is no difference, ſaid Cicero (w), betwixt adviſing a crime and approving it when it is committed. To deſire that an action ſhould be done, and to be glad that it is done, are the ſame thing. The Roman law confirmed this maxim, having ſubmitted the approvers and authors of evil to the ſame puniſhment. ‘ Et ſi erat ‘ ſervus omni modo fugiturus, vel furtum facturus, hic vero laudator hujus propoſiti ‘ fuerit, tenetur. Non enim oportet laudando augeri malum (x). - - - - If a ſlave deſigned to run away from his maſter, or to rob him, and if another perſon approved his deſign, ‘ the latter ſhall be liable to the ſame puniſhment with the ſlave: for evil muſt not be encouraged ‘ and increaſed by commendation.’ We may therefore ſay, that thoſe who are pleaſed with reading Defamatory Libels, ſo far as to approve the authors and diſperſers of them, are as guilty as if they had compoſed them; for if they do not write ſuch libels, it is either becauſe they have not the talent of writing, or that they will run no hazzard. See in one of the Provincial Letters (y), the mortal contagion of calumny: St Bernard is cited there, who maintained that calumny kills not only thoſe who publiſh it, but alſo thoſe who do not reject it. The Heathens were not ignorant of this maxim of morality: they ſaid that ſlandering was criminal, both in the ſlanderer, and in him who believed ſlanders. Διαβολὴ γάρ ἐστι δεινότατον· ἐν τῇ δύο μὲν εἰσι οἱ ἀδικέοντές, εἷς δὲ ὁ ἀδικεόμενος· ὁ μὲν γὰρ διαβάλλων, ἀδικέει, οὐ τῶν παρεόντων κατηγορέων· ὁ δὲ ἀδικέει, ἀναπειθόμενος πρὶν ἢ ἀτρεκέως ἐκμάθοι· ὁ δὲ δὴ ἀπεὼν τοῦ λόγου τάδε ἐν αὐτοῖσι ἀδικέεται· Διαβληθεὶς τε ὑπὸ τοῦ ἑτέρου, καὶ νομισθεὶς πρὸς τοῦ ἑτέρου κακὸς εἶναι. Detractio namque importuniſſima res eſt: in qua duo ſunt qui injuriam faciunt, unus cui injuria fit. Qui enim detrahit, injurius eſt, quod non præſentem accuſat; item qui huic credit injurius eſt, quod prius credit quam rem compertam habeat; & illi cui abſenti detrahitur, ob id fit injuria quod ab altero inſimulatur ut malus, ab altero talis putatur (z). - - - - Defamation is a moſt dreadful thing: in it there are two perſons who do an injuſtice, and one who ſuffers it: for he who defames does an injuſtice, becauſe he accuſes another man in his abſence, and he who believes the defamation does alſo an injuſtice, becauſe he believes it before he knows the truth of the matter. On the other hand the perſon defamed ſuffers an injuſtice from both, being accuſed as a bad man by the one, and deemed to be ſuch by the other. See the book intituled, Queſtion ſi Mr Arnaud eſt Heretique (a a)? On the other hand, we ought to believe that the ſame baſeneſs which induces ſome people to fire a muſquet upon their enemy, would induce them to defame him by a ſatire, if they had no other arms but their pen. It is juſt as amongſt beaſts: ſome do not gore with their horns, but bite (b b), it is becauſe they have no horns, and know how to uſe their teeth. Let us alſo ſay, that a ſatiriſt who attempts upon the honour of his enemy with libels, would attempt upon their life with ſword or poiſon, if he had the ſame opportunity. ‘ Maledicum à Malefico niſi occa‘ ſione non differre, non minus verè quàm eleganter ſcripſit Fabius: vix enim eſt ut qui ‘ verbis ultro lædit, re etiam lædere non nolit (c c). - - - - It was a very true and inge- ‘ nious obſervation of Fabius, that a calumniator and a villain differ in nothing but op- ‘ portunity: for the man who, without provocation, wounds with his tongue, would very pro- ‘ bably wound with his hand, if he had a fit opportunity.’ As for the reſt, it is not always a good excuſe to ſay, ſuch a libel has not been anſwered, therefore we ought to believe it: Seneca laughed at this way of reaſoning. ‘ Res falſa & inanis niſi corrigatur ha‘ bet nonnunquam fidem, multique ſunt homines judicii parum firmi qui nihil audiant ‘ legantve quod non credant niſi refutatum ſciant (d d). - - - A falſe and fooliſh aſſertion, ‘ unleſs it is refuted, is ſometimes believed; and there are many men of weak underſtanding, ‘ who believe all they read, and all they hear, unleſs they know that it is refuted.’

(v) Clavigny de ſainte Honorine, Uſage des Livres ſuſpects, pag. 41, 42.

(w) Tu omnium ſtultiſſime, non intelligis, ſi id quod me arguis voluiſſe interfici Cæſarem, crimen ſit, etiam, lætatum eſſe morte Cæſaris, crimen eſſe: quid enim intereſt inter ſuaſorem facti, & probatorem? aut quid refert, utrum voluerim fieri, an gaudeam factum? Cicero, Philipp. II, pag. m. 722.

(x) Ulpianus, in Lege 1. D. de ſervo corrupto. See apud Th. Raynaud. Hoploth. pag. m. 359, 360, how great a ſin it is, according to the Fathers, to praiſe evil actions.

(y) It is the XVIth, towards the end, pag. m. 282.

(z) Herodotus, lib. vii, cap. x, pag. m. 388.

(aa) Page 210, 211.

(bb) See the Penſées ſur les Cometes, pag. 517.

(cc) Menagius, Epiſt. dedicat. Vitæ Mamurræ.

(dd) Seneca.

A
DISSERTATION
CONCERNING THE HIPPOMANES.

I.
Two ſorts of Hippomanes. Servius and Pliny quoted wrong.

THE Hippomanes ſignifies chiefly two things: 1. A certain liquor that flows from the privy-parts of a mare ready to take horſe; 2. An excreſcence of fleſh which the new-foaled colts have upon their foreheads. It is black, round, and of the bigneſs of a dry fig. It is pretended that thoſe two Hippomanes's have a peculiar virtue in philtres, and other ſuch compoſitions deſigned for faſcinations; and that the laſt kind is of ſuch a nature, that a mare has no ſooner dropped her colt, but ſhe eats this piece of fleſh, without which ſhe would not ſuckle it. It is added, that if ſhe gives any perſon time to take away this Hippomanes, the meer ſmell of it makes her mad. Let us prove, but without heaping up many paſſages, that if this be not true, it is found at leaſt in the moſt authentic authors. Let us hear Virgil:

Hinc demum, Hippomanes vero quod nomine dicunt
Paſtores, lentum diſtillat ab inguine virus.
Hippomanes, quod ſæpe malæ legere novercæ,
Miſcueruntque herbas & non innoxia verba (a).

. . . . . From their groins they ſhed
A ſlimy juice . . . . .
The ſhepherd knows it well, and calls by name
Hippomanes to note the mother's flame:
This, gathering in the planetary hour,
With noxious weeds, and ſpell'd with words of pow'r
Dire ſtep-dames in the Magic bowl infuſe,
And mix for deadly draughts the pois'nous juice. DRYDEN.

I do not add to Virgil's authority that of his Commentator Servius, cited on this ſubject by Fungerus in his Philological Lexicon, by Calepinus, Decimator, &c. for I do not find that Servius does any thing more than explain the ſenſe of the Poet: but I will not forget the authority of Ariſtotle. He ſays, that what they call Hippomanes is a certain thing proceeding ex pudendis equæ ſimilis genituræ, ſed multo magis tenuis quàm ſemen maris (b). Now let us hear Pliny, who has this paſſage: ' Equarum virus à coïtu ' in lychnis accenſum Anaxilaus prodidit equinorum capitum viſus repræſentare monſtrificè: ſimiliter ex aſinis. Nam Hippomanes tantas in veneficio vires habet, ut affuſum æris mixturæ in effigiem equæ Olympiæ admotos mares equos ad rabiem coïtus ' agat (c). - - - Anaxilaus relates, that the liquor which flows from mares when ready to take ' horſe, being kindled in lamps, ſhews a frightful apparition of horſes heads. It is the ſame ' with aſſes. For the Hippomanes has ſo much power and efficacy in faſcination, that being ' mixed with the braſs which made the ſtatue of an Olympic mare, it fires all the horſes who ' are brought near to it, with a moſt furious deſire after copulation.' Thus much concerning the firſt ſignification: now for the ſecond. Et ſanè equis amoris innaſci veneficium, Hippomanes appellatum, in fronte, caricæ magnitudine, colore nigro: quod ſtatim edito partu devorat fœta, aut partum ad ubera non admittit. Si quis præreptum habeat olfactu in rabiem id genus agitur (d). Ariſtotle had ſaid the ſame thing (e); Virgil hinted at it, ſpeaking of the enchantments the unfortunate Dido had recourſe to in her deſpair:

Quæritur & naſcentis equi de fronte revulſus
Et matri præreptus amor (f).

I And

(a) Virgil. Georg. lib. iii, ver 280. Tibullus, Eleg. IV, lib. ii, ſpeaks thus: Et quod, ubi indomitis gregibus Venus afflat amores, Hippomanes cupidæ ſtillat ab inguine equæ.

(b) Ἐκρεῖ αὐταῖς ἐκ τοῦ αἰδοίου ὅμοιον γονῇ, λεπτότερον δὲ πολὺ ἢ τὸ τοῦ ἄῤῥενος καὶ καλοῦσι τοῦτο τινὲς ἱππομανές. Humorem emittunt ſuis genitalibus ſimilem genituræ, ſed multo tenuiorem quam mares, quem Hippomanes nonnulli appellant. Ariſt. Hiſt. Anim. lib. vi, cap. xviii, p. m. 668. See, below, num. X.

(c) Plin. lib. xxviii, cap. xi, ſub fin.

(d) Idem, Plin. lib. viii, cap. xlii.

(e) Ariſt. ubi ſupra, cap. xxii.

(f) Virgil. Æneid. lib. iv, ver. 515.

And cuts the forehead of a new born fole
Robbing the mother's love . . . DRYDEN.

It is eaſy to ſee that Calepinus has quoted thoſe two paſſages of Pliny wrong, to prove the Hippomanes to be a little excreſcence of fleſh upon the forehead of a new-born colt; for Pliny ſpeaks of it in this ſenſe, only in the forty-ſecond chapter of the eighth book. Beſides, Calepinus (g) has quoted the eighteenth book inſtead of the twenty-eighth, and put cariæ inſtead of caricæ; and he aſcribes five or ſix words to Servius, which are not to be found in the commentary of that Grammarian, and which ſignify, that the Hippomanes, being eaten by a man, makes him mad; quod in humana viſcera deſcendens hominem in furorem agat. Decimator's Dictionary aſcribes the ſame thought to Servius. Martinius, in his Dictionary, mangles the paſſage of the eighth book of Pliny; he puts equi for equis; fœtus for fœta, (which is nonſenſe); and a comma inſtead of a full-ſtop betwixt admittit and ſi quis. See Father Hardouin upon Pliny (h). It may be ſaid in general, that the writers of Dictionaries take more pains to compile new things, than to mend the faults of their predeceſſors.

II. A plant called Hippomanes by Theocritus.

I had reaſon to ſay that the Hippomanes does chiefly ſignify two things; for there is a third kind not near ſo remarkable as the others, ſince it is found only in a paſſage of Theocritus: beſides, one muſt engage in a controverſy with one of the moſt learned men of the XVIIth century to find it there [A]. This paſſage ſays, that the Hippomanes is a plant in Arcadia, which makes mares and colts run mad (i). Salmaſius will by no means admit of this plant; he maintains that Theocritus did not ſay φυτὸν, but χυτὸν, and that he meant by χυτὸν the brazen mare that was near the temple of Jupiter Olympius, which excited luſt in horſes in like manner as if ſhe had been alive; a quality ſhe had derived from the Hippomanes that had been mixed with the braſs in her caſting. We have already related a paſſage out of Pliny where mention is made of ſuch a thing; but it will be better to conſult Pauſanias, who will give us a larger account of it. And as what he ſays is the key of almoſt all the criticiſms contained in this article, it is neceſſary to inſert his words at large.

III. A brazen horſe which excited luſt.

Hear then how Pauſanias ſpeaks (k): Phormis going out of Menalos, his native country, went into Sicily, where he ſignalized himſelf in ſeveral expeditions under Gelon ſon of Dinomenes, and Hiero brother of Gelon. Having acquired a great fortune, he offered up gifts not only to Jupiter Olympius, but likewiſe to Apollo Delphicus. Thoſe he offered to Jupiter are two horſes with two grooms, for each horſe has a groom: Dionyſius of Argos made one, and Simon of Ægina the other. Upon the ſide of the firſt horſe was engraven an inſcription, the beginning of which is in proſe, and much to this purpoſe, viz. Phormis, the Arcadian of Menalos, but now of Syracuſe, offered it. The people of Elea ſay, that through the artifice of a Magician ſome Hippomanes had been mixed in the caſting of this horſe, to the end it might afford a ſurpriſing ſhow. He is both ſmaller and leſs beautiful than ſeveral other horſes in Altis (l), and has a cut tail, which renders him yet more ugly; nevertheleſs he ſtirs up luſtful deſires in horſes, not only in the ſpring, but all the year round; for they break their halters, or eſcape out of the hands of thoſe who hold them, to ruſh with greater fury (m) on this ſtatue than if they were to leap the fineſt mare that ever was. It is true, their feet ſlip, but they do not give over neighing and renewing their furious encounters till they have been forced from the braſs by mighty whipping and downright ſtrength.

IV. Servius juſtly cenſured by Salmaſius.

Salmaſius (n) has written a long diſcourſe to ſhew that Theocritus ſpoke of this ſtatue, and not of a plant called Hippomanes. Let us examine his reaſons a little; we cannot fail to benefit ourſelves by following the footſteps of ſo great a man. It is true, he ſeems not to love the taineſt and moſt natural paths, but rather chooſes to break a paſſage through the midſt of buſhes; yet one may ſometimes learn more by running after him through wilds, than by taking a direct way to truth under other guides. He very juſtly cenſures Servius for ſaying that Virgil pretended that the plant Hippomanes was [A] The third kind of Hippomanes is only found in a paſſage of Theocritus: beſides, one muſt engage in a controverſy with one of the moſt learned men of the XVIIth century, &c.] I am not ignorant that in Dioſcorides we find an herb called ἀπόκυνος, and κυνοκράμβη, and ἱππομανὲς; and in Theophraſtus an Hippomanes made of the herb called Tithymallum, which was excellent and much cultivated at Tegea, a town of Arcadia (1). But becauſe Salmaſius (2) pretends that none but cavillers, like him who concealed himſelf under the borrowed name of Cercoëtius (it was Father Petau), would make uſe of the authority of Dioſcorides, ſince that would be to give us the ſpurious additions made to that author for his genuine writings, I think we ought to paſs by his teſtimony. As for Theophraſtus, it is not certain whether we ought to read ἱππομανὲς in the paſſage I have quoted; Salmaſius (3) corrects the reading of it, and ſubſtitutes in its place ὁ ὀπὸς μόνος, pretending that the author meant, that juice only was drawn from the Tithymallum. Thus we ſee theſe teſtimonies are only matter of diſpute. We muſt not ſay the ſame of that of Theocritus, ſince beſides the reaſons by which I have overthrown the χυτὸν of Salmaſius, it cannot be denied but that from the time of the Grammarian Servius the word φυτὸν was in the text of that Poet. Nothing can be ſaid poſitively as to the herb of which he has ſpoken. Aloiſius Anguillara, Cratevas, Dodoneus, and Wecker, who take it for the Stramonia (4), called by the Arabians Nux Methel, and by the French Pomme du Perou, do not give us better conjectures concerning it than Rodericus à Caſtro (5), who has taken it for Fern, or Gaſpar à Reies, who took it for the herb Flavia (6).

[B] Concerning

(g) The edition I make uſe of is that of Lyons 1681.

(h) In the ſecond volume, p. 272.

(i) Ἱππομανὲς φυτόν ἐστι παρ' Ἀρκάσι, τῷ δ' ἐπὶ πᾶσαι Καὶ πῶλοι μαίνονται ἀν' ὤρεα καὶ θοαὶ ἵπποι. Hippomanes planta eſt apud Arcades qua concitati omnes & equulei inſaniunt in montibus & celeres equæ. Theocrit. in Pharmaceutria, pag. m. 15.

(k) Pauſan. lib. v, ſub fin.

(l) It was the name of one of the dependencies of the temple of Jupiter. See Pauſan. pag. m. 156, and below, num. VIII.

(m) Πολλῷ δή τι ἐμμανέστερον. Romulus Amaſæus tranſlates it nihil hercle minus furenter, which weakens the ſenſe.

(n) Salmaſ. Exercit. Plinian. pag. 939, & ſeq.

(1) It is thus perhaps that the Greek words of Theophraſtus ought to be rendered, lib. ix, Hiſt. Plant. cap. xv, Καὶ τὸ τιθύμαλλον ἐξ οὗ τὸ ἱππομανὲς, ἄριστον δὲ τὸ περὶ Τεγέαν, καὶ ἐκεῖ μάλιστα σπουδάζεται. Salmaſius, Exercit. Plin. pag. 941, refers ἄριστον, &c. to ἱππομανὲς.

(2) Ib. p. 940.

(3) Ib. p. 941.

(4) As it is obſerved by the Phyſician James Ferrand, in page 226, of his treatiſe Of the Malady of Love. I rank theſe four Phyſicians as he has done, though I know Cratevas is more antient than the others by ſeveral ages.

(5) Medic. Polit. lib. iv, cap. ii.

(6) In Campo Elyſio jucundar. Quæſt. XXIX.

was improperly ſo called (o). Servius's reaſon is, that Virgil, ſpeaking of another Hippomanes, obſerves it was properly ſo called, vero quod nomine dicunt. This reaſon is of no force, for the Poet did not expreſs himſelf after this manner, but becauſe he ſaw in the very name the property of the thing: now if this property agreed with ſeveral other things, with the plant of Theocritus, with the matter that proceeded from a mare, and the like, the ſame name might be given them in the proper ſenſe. Salmaſius imagines with a great deal of probability, that Servius miſtook Heſiod for Theocritus, when he ſaid upon the third book of the Georgics, that Heſiod makes mention of an Herb called Hippomanes, which made horſes mad; for having had occaſion to ſpeak of the ſame thing in his comment on the fourth book of the Æneid, he quotes only Theocritus. Had he known two Poets who had ſpoke of this plant, he would doubtleſs have named them both either in the firſt place or the ſecond; but he has not done it, therefore we muſt believe he had only the authority of Theocritus. He has nevertheleſs been the cauſe that even at this day the Dictionary of Decimator, and the Theſaurus Fabri, have quoted Heſiod and Theocritus for the herb Hippomanes.

V
Servius and Philargyrus, unjuſtly cenſured by Salmaſius.

Servius and Philargyrus ſeem to have had more reaſon when they ſay, the former, that this herb made thoſe horſes mad who eat of it; and the latter, that it excited an exceſſive luſt in mares. Salmaſius pretends that they do not underſtand the matter, and that Theocritus meant only that the horſes were enflamed with a violent deſire of poſſeſſing the Hippomanes; ſo that if this Poet ſpoke of an herb, it muſt be underſtood that the horſes were tranſported with a furious inclination to eat of it. It is thus he explains the Greek phraſe μαίνεσθαι ἐπὶ τινὶ (p). Be it ſo; but it ſeems to me that the explication of thoſe two antient Grammarians is not amiſs. The prepoſition ἐπὶ has ſo many ſignifications, that it would be ſtrange if it had not ſometimes that which we give to the prepoſition upon in theſe phraſes: He was enraged, he was tranſported, he became furious upon it. Theſe are all phraſes where the prepoſition upon does not denote the object of the paſſion, but the cauſe of it.

I do not deny but Philargyrus has made Theocritus ſay, what he does not preciſely ſay, viz. That the herb Hippomanes excites in mares who eat of it an ardent luſt; but it is nevertheleſs very likely Theocritus underſtood it ſo. For proof of this, we need only conſider his wiſh, that the object of his love ſiezed with a deſire like to that of thoſe mares, might come to him; as alſo what the Naturaliſts obſerve as to the exceſſive luſt of theſe animals. Ariſtotle ſays (q) no female creatures equal theſe in luſt; and that to expreſs the luſt of other females exceſſively amorous, they made uſe of the name which denotes that of mares. Ælian obſerves the ſame thing in the eleventh chapter of the fourth book of his Hiſtory of Animals. Others have remarked, that they will go in queſt of the males, even over mountains and through rivers (r).

Scilicet ante omnes furor eſt inſignis equarum.
- - - - -
Illas ducit amor trans Gargara tranſque ſonantem
Aſcanium; ſuperant montes & flumina tranant (s).

But far above the reſt, the furious mare,
Barr'd from the male, is frantic with deſpair.

For love they force through thickets of the wood,
They climb the ſteepy hills, and ſtem the flood. DRYDEN.

Laſtly, Horace foretelling to a miſtreſs who had ſlighted her lovers, while ſhe was in her prime, that the time would come mankind would be even with her, tells her ſhe would then feel the rage that tranſports mares.

Cum tibi flagrans amor & libido,
Quæ ſolet matres furiare equorum,
Sæviet circa jecur ulceroſum (t).

Let us infer from hence by the by, that gallant poetry, was not in the reign of Auguſtus, as now-a-days, an enemy to all groſs ideas; but let us chiefly remember to conclude from the authorities which have been quoted, that Servius and Phylargyrus have well enough underſtood the paſſage of Theocritus, not to deſerve the cenſure Salmaſius paſſed upon them. It was much more natural to underſtand it of an amorous paſſion excited by the herb Hippomanes, than of a deſire of eating that herb: and it ſignifies little, that only Theocritus has ſpoken of this plant (v), ſince he might have grounded his aſſertion on ſome old tradition which might be contradicted by the following ages. In truth, it would not be very ſurprizing that there ſhould be ſuch an herb, as could produce this effect. That which the Italians call Sferra-Cavallo, becauſe it is pretended that horſes no ſooner tread on it, but they are unſhod (w), ſeems to me much more miraculous.

(o) Philargyrus, another old Commentator on Virgil, is alſo involved in this cenſure, ſince he has inſinuated the ſame thing with Servius.

(p) Μαίνεσθαι ἐπὶ τινὶ non dicitur qui alicujus rei guſtu vel hauſtu ad inſaniam adigitur, ſed qui rei ejus cujus cupiens eſt quocunque modo potiundæ ardore inſanit. Salmaſ. ubi ſupra.

(q) Τῶν δὲ θηλειῶν ὁρμητικῶς ἔχουσι πρὸς τὸν συνδιασμὸν μάλιςα μὲν ἵππος. Incenduntur libidine ex fœminis equæ potiſſimum. Ariſt. Hiſt. Anim. lib. vi, cap. xviii.

(r) In furias agitantur equæ, ſpacioque remota Per loca dividuos amne ſequuntur equos. Ovid. lib. ii, ver. 487, de Arte Am.

(s) Virgil. Georg. lib. iii, ver. 266.

(t) Horat. Od. XXV, lib. i.

(v) See the remark [A].

(w) See Matthiolus upon Dioſcorides, lib. iii, cap. 135.

Pliny mentions an herb by means of which the woodpecker makes a wedge thruſt into a tree jump out (x). Yet of this he ſeems to doubt in another book of his (y).

(x) Plin. lib. x, cap. xviii.

(y) Idem, lib. xxv, cap. ii.

VI.
Confutation of the opinion of Salmaſius.

Let us examine more cloſely the opinion of Salmaſius, and we ſhall better ſee that the changing the word φυτὸν into χυτὸν was not happily conjectured. To juſtify that change, we muſt ſuppoſe, 1. That Theocritus believed that the temple of Jupiter Olympius was not in Elis, but in Arcadia; or that knowing it was not in Arcadia, he has nevertheleſs affirmed it, either by reaſon of the nearneſs of thoſe two provinces, or becauſe Phormis who conſecrated this brazen mare was of that countrey. This firſt ſuppoſition is very abſurd; for who can ſuppoſe that the ceremony of the Olympic games could permit a fine wit to doubt in what province of Greece they were celebrated? In this reſpect the Greeks were all good and exact Geographers, inſomuch that it can never enter into the thoughts of any attentive man that Theocritus could err upon this head, or dare to deprive the people of Elis, in favour of thoſe of Arcadia, of the temple of Jupiter Olympius, one of the ſeven wonders of the world; and to deprive them of it for two bad reaſons. But here are other ſuppoſitions not leſs ſtrained than the foregoing. We muſt ſuppoſe in the ſecond place, that ſpeaking only of the luſt of horſes, Theocritus made uſe of the feminine gender πᾶσαι καὶ πῶλοι, and all the mare-colts; καὶ θοαὶ ἵπποι, and all the mares (z). What reaſon for this? A brazen mare is the object deſired; her Hippomanes excites the luſt only of the horſes, as Pauſanias obſerves; and yet Theocritus meant only the luſt of the mare-colts and mares. The reaſon is this: the Doric dialect made uſe of the feminine article to denote a horſe, in like manner as the common dialect employed the maſculine to denote a mare. Be it ſo; but as Pauſanias, even in the paſſage which Salmaſius quotes for proof of the remark concerning the common dialect, makes uſe of the maſculine article for horſes, and the feminine for mares, we muſt believe that thoſe who made uſe of the Doric dialect applyed to each ſex its proper article upon certain occaſions: and it would be eaſy to prove that no Greek author has made a horſe feminine, as the French do the word perdrix; or maſculine, as they do the word lièvre. Now if a like uſage cannot be ſhewn in the Doric dialect, Salmaſius's anſwer will appear to be no better than a chimera. 3. We muſt ſuppoſe that the Hippomanes of the brazen mare extended its virtue a great way, ſince the horſes of which Salmaſius will have Theocritus to ſpeak, ran raging over mountains, and flew to enjoy their beloved object ſuperatis montibus. No ſuch thing is hinted in the relation of Pauſanias, and the quite contrary is to be found in theſe words of Pliny, mares ADMOTOS ad rabiem coitus agit.

(z) I do not tranſlate θοαὶ, which ſignifies ſwift-footed.

Salmaſius finding himſelf perplexed with theſe mountains of Theocritus, changed them into ſomething elſe that might better agree with his notions: he pretends therefore we ought to read ἐν ὥρα, in the ſpring; and not ἀν' ὤρεα, thro' the mountains; but by misfortune nothing agrees worſe than this criticiſm of his with the text of Pauſanias, where it does plainly appear, that without any diſtinction of ſeaſons, the horſes were inflamed with luſt after the ſtatue, whatever time of the year it was (a a). Laſtly, Salmaſius had no reaſon to ſuppoſe that this ſtatue, impregnated with the virtue of the Hippomanes, was a mare. I know very well Pliny has ſaid it before him; but Pauſanias, who made it his principal ſtudy to examine the monuments of Greece, and who is an author incomparably more exact than Pliny, leaves us no reaſon to doubt that this ſtatue was a horſe, ſince he every where makes uſe of the maſculine article when he ſpeaks of it, and employs the feminine in the ſame place to denote a mare (b b).

(a a) Ἀνὰ πᾶσαν ἐπ' αὐτὸν ὀργῶσιν ἡμέραν.

(b b) Ἐπιπηδῶσιν αὐτῷ πολλῷ δή τι ἐμμανέστερον ἢ ἐπὶ τὴν καλλίστην ἵππον ζῶσάν τε καὶ ἠθάδα ἀναβαίνεσθαι. Id. eſt juxta Verſionem Romuli Amaſæi, Illum invadunt nihil hercle minus furenter quàm & viventem pulcherrimam equam gregalem inituri adorirentur.

VII.
A Reflexion upon what Pauſanias relates.

I ſhall not examine what credit is to be given to what Pauſanias relates concerning the virtue of this ſtatue, which was a kind of Taliſmanic virtue; but ſhall however ſay, that the extreme fury of luſt incident to horſes, might well enough be raiſed by a ſtatue without the help of any philtre. Let us ſuppoſe them to have a ſoul; could they not fancy that a ſtatue is the animal it repreſents, or at leaſt that it is a very fine ſtatue? In the firſt caſe, why might not the ſame thing happen to them, mutatis mutandis, as to thoſe birds who pecked upon the picture of a vine? An horſe painted by Apelles made the living horſes neigh (c c). In the ſecond caſe, why ſhould they not be ſubject to the infirmity many men have been guilty of, that is, to the laſcivious loving of a ſtatue (d d). I confeſs it may be objected amongſt other things, that in love the eyes are not the ſole guides of animals (e e), as they are very frequently of men; and that the ſmell is the principal vehicle of this paſſion in the machines of animals; whence it follows, that a ſtatue is deſtitute with reſpect to them of the main ſprings of love. But the queſtion is, whether the ſkill of the ſtatuary might not ſupply this defect by imitating the attitudes of a mare exceſſively luſtful; and whether the ſtory ſo celebrated by the Greek Poets, and by Auſonius after them, concerning Myron's brazen heifer, can be doubted of [B]? Livy, more credible alone than an hundred Poets, relates that at Syracuſe

(c c) Plin. lib. xxxv, cap. x. Valer. Max. lib. viii, cap. xi, ſays it was a mare, quo excuſabilior eſt error equi, qui viſâ picturâ equæ hinnitum edere coactus eſt.

(d d) Several Moderns have made a collection of them, amongſt others Balthaſar Bonifac. Hiſtor. Ludicr. lib. xiv, cap. xiii.

(e e) See the paſſage of Lancelot of Perugia, in remark [B].

[B] Concerning Myron's brazen heifer.] Myron a native of Eleuthera in Bœotia, made an heifer of braſs which furniſhed a fine topic for the Poets. There are in the Anthology (7), near forty epigrams upon this ſubject. Auſonius has made eleven on the ſame theme, which are ingenious enough; this is one of them:

(7) Lib. iv, cap. xii.

Bucula ſum cælo genitoris facta Myronis
Ærea: nec factam me puto, ſed genitam.

racuſe, a bull performed the carnal act upon the ſtatue of an heifer. Vaccam æream Syracuſis ab agreſti Tauro qui pecore aberraſſet, initam ac ſemine aſperſam (ff). As much has been ſaid of ſome other animals. ‘ Myronis æream buculam Taurus inſcenderet, caniculam, columbam, anatem coloribus expreſſas mares congeneres inſilirent (gg). - - - - ‘ A bull leaped Myron's brazen heifer: dogs, doves, and drakes, have leaped the pictures of ‘ their reſpective females.’ It muſt be owned that Livy relates this fact as one of the prodigies of that year, and that in point of prodigies we cannot well depend on him. If, with the Carteſians, we allow beaſts to be meer machines, we may nevertheleſs conceive how a lively imitation of poſtures might have notable effects.

VIII.
Cardan's miſtakes upon the ſame fact.

Cardan (hh) who doubts not of the fact related by Pauſanias, but even aſſigns the beſt natural reaſons he can for it, did not here take the male for the female. He was ſo well ſatisfied that Pauſanias ſpoke of the ſtatue of a horſe, that it is one of the objections he attempts to ſolve: but otherwiſe he does not ſeem to have well examined the paſſage of that Hiſtorian; for he makes him ſay that this brazen horſe was at Heraclea of Elis, a Province of Peloponneſus, in a place called Quialten (ii). A ſtrange complication of blunders. For, 1. Heraclea is the name of a great many cities (kk), but is not the name of any one province (ll). 2. At leaſt it is certain that there was not any province of that name in all Peloponneſus. 3. There was indeed in Elis a city or town of that name (mm), but it was not a place that contained any pieces of the treaſure of Olympia. 4. Laſtly, This Quialten is a monſtrous abſurdity. Heraclea and Quialten, in my opinion, came to be foiſted in thus: Pauſanias having mentioned ſome gifts which the city of Heraclea upon the Euxine-Sea, a colony of the Megarians, had conſecrated, obſerves, that overagainſt them there were others conſecrated by Phormis, &c. and that the two horſes which this Phormis preſented to Jupiter, were in the Altis, that is, in the lucus, or grove that was an appendage to the temple.

IX.
Miſtakes of John Baptiſt Porta, and of Boaiſtuau, and of the Commentary on Du Bartas.

I have ſeen in a French tranſlation of the Natural Magic of John Baptiſt Porta (nn), a pretty long chapter of the Hippomanes, which I have not in my Latin edition (oo). Pauſanias's relation is there faithfully enough reported, excepting two falſhoods; one is, that Arcas an Olympian mingled ſome Hippomanes with the metal of the ſtatue; the other, that he made a mare. He ſays that Ælian relates the ſame ſtory; but it is a miſtake. John Wierus (pp) has only avoided the firſt of theſe three miſtakes: he ſays that Phormis of Arcadia, experimented the Hippomanes at Olympia, novit vim Olympiæ Phormis Arcas. Note, That Baptiſt Porta's Natural Magic, printed in Latin at Francfort 1607, is divided into twenty books; ſome preceding editions, from which the French verſion cited by me was made, have but four. The original Latin of this author

(ff) T. Livius, lib. xli.

(gg) Balth. Boniſac. ubi ſupra. See Athenæus cited in the remark [B].

(hh) De Subtilit. lib. xviii.

(ii) In Heraclea Elidis Peloponneſi Provinciæ equum æneum fuiſſe narrat in loco cui nomen erat Quialten.

(kk) See Salmaſ. in Flor. lib. i, cap xviii.

(ll) I do not deny that there were ſome little iſlands of this name.

(mm) Strabo, Pauſanias, and Stephanus Byzantinus mention it, but not Emmius in his Græcia Antiqua, nor Ortelius, nor Lloyd, nor Hofman, nor Baudrand, in their Dictionaries.

(nn) Printed at Roan, 1626, in 12mo. The chapter upon the Hippomanes, is the 27th of the ſecond book. It is found among Weckher's ſecrets, as written by Baptiſt Porta.

(oo) That of Francfort 1607, in 8*vo.*

(pp) De Lamiis, cap. xxxviii.

Sic me taurus init: ſic proxima bucula mugit,
  Sic vitulus ſitiens ubera noſtra petit.
Miraris, quod fallo gregem? gregis ipſe Magiſter
  Inter paſcentes me numerare ſolet (8).

I am the brazen heifer Myron fram'd.
I think, not art, but nature gave me birth.
Thus thinks the bull, and me he eager leaps.
Thus thinks my ſiſter heifer, when ſhe lows.
Thus thinks the thirſty calf, and ſeeks my milk.
Thus thinks the maſter of the lowing herd,
And me he numbers, with the grazing herd.

Mr Menage has exerciſed his Greek muſe upon this heifer with better ſucceſs in Father Hardouin's opinion than all the reſt. See his Commentary upon the thirty-fourth book of Pliny (9), where he ſays that Tzetzes has mentioned the ſame heifer in the 194th ſtory of the eighth chiliad. See alſo the Anti-Baillet (10), in which a Greek epigram of Andrew Laſcaris is cited. Note, that Dom Lancelotti of Perugia, reckons amongſt the fables whatever the Antients have ſaid of the love of beaſts for pictures. ‘ De gli animali, ſays he (11), porto l'iſteſſa opinione, perche queſti ‘ non ſi riſentono al coito ſolamente per la viſta, ma ‘ per lo moto, per l'odore, e per la voce, niuna delle ‘ quali tre coſe ha la pittura, Farfalloneggi quanto ‘ vuole Plinio, Valerio, e chi chi ſia. - - - As to animals, they are incited to copulation not only by the ſight, ‘ but alſo by motion, by the ſmell, and the voice, neither ‘ of which three things are in a picture; and therefore ‘ I am of opinion that they are not incited to copulation ‘ by a picture, whatever idle ſtories may be vented by Pliny, ‘ Valerius Flaccus, or any other author.’ I have ſaid in the article ZEUXIS, that he is miſtaken about other things of the ſame nature, which he has denied; and why may he not about theſe? However, I will cite Athenæus. Τῇ τε γὰρ περὶ τὴν Πυρήνην χαλκῇ βοῒ βοῦς ἐπανέβη, καὶ γεγραμμένῃ κυνὶ καὶ περιστερᾷ καὶ χηνὶ, τῇ μὲν κύων, τῇ δὲ περιστερά, τῇ δὲ χὴν προσῆλθον καὶ ἐπεπήδησαν. φανέντων δὲ πᾶσι τούτοις ἀδυνάτων ἀπέστησαν. Circa Pyrenæos montes in æneam vaccam bos tanquam initurus conſcendit: pictis verò cani, columbæ, anſeri, fœminis mares ejus generis ſeſe cùm adjunxiſſent & inſiluiſſent, deſtiterunt, quoniam id fieri non poſſe cognoſcerent (12). - - - Near the Pyrenees, a bull leaped a brazen heifer. As to painted dogs, doves, and geeſe, their reſpective males have joined and leaped them, but finding they were inanimate, they deſiſted. Perhaps there is nothing more ſatirical, or ingenious in Lelio Capilupi's Cento Virgilianus againſt the Monks, than the application of one of Virgil's verſes, which I ſhall cite below. Here follows a piece of it:

O fortunatos nimium, ſua ſi bona norint,
Non abſunt illis ſaltus, armentaque læta.
Cælati argenti ſunt, auri multa talenta,
Sacra deum, ſanctique patres, & chara ſororum
Pectora mœrentum tenebris & carcere cæco
Centum ærei claudunt vectes, & ſæpe ſine ullis
Conjugiis vento gravidæ, mirabile dictu,
Religione ſacræ, non hæc ſine numine divum.
Jam nova progenies cælo demittitur alto.
Credo equidem, nec vana fides, genus eſſe Deorum.

O happy, did they know their happy ſtate,
They who abound in groves, and flocks, and gold;
Bleſt venerable men, and lovely dames,
Repentant holy ſiſters, who, ſhut up
In gloomy priſons, fenc'd with braſs, are oft
(O wonderful to tell!) impregnated
By the ſoft wind, without th' approach of man.
Such is the pleaſure of the heav'nly pow'rs.
A ſacred progeny from heav'n deſcends!
A race, whoſe origin is ſure divine.

[C] He

(8) Auſon. Epig. lviii.

(9) Tom. v, pag. 113, and not 213, as is ſaid in the Anti-Baillet, Part. ii, Art. cxviii.

(10) Part. ii, Art. cxxxii.

(11) Secondo Lancelotti da Perugia Abbate Olivetano, Accademico Inſenſato, Affidato, e Humoriſta, l'Hoggidi, overo il Mondo non peggiore ne piu calamitoſo del paſſato, Part. ii, Diſinganno XV, pag. 309.

(12) Athen. lib. xiii, pag. 605.

anthor does not ſay that Arcas the Olympian mingled ſome Hippomanes, &c. but that Phormis the Arcadian diſcovered the virtue of the Hippomanes at Olympia, tantam in eo vim novit Olympiæ Phormis Arcas. I believe Cardan occoſioned the error of one Peter Boaiſtuau, ſirnamed Launai, a native of Bretagne, (for theſe are the titles he loved to diſtinguiſh himſelf by) highly praiſed by la Croix du Maine. Who would not be ſurprized, ſays he (qq), at what Pauſanias the Greek Hiſtorian relates concerning the brazen ſtatue of of an horſe, formed by a certain artiſt in Heraclea, a province of Peloponneſus, having a cut and deformed tail, but perfect in all the other parts of the body, which however the other horſes endeavoured to leap with ſo much heat and tranſport, as to break their hoofs by their frequent rearings upon it, whilſt the ſlipperineſs of the braſs it was compoſed of ſtill caſt them off; and notwithſtanding all the blows that could be given them, they could not be driven away, but neighed after the ſtatue as if they had met with a mare ready to take horſe? Du Bartas hinted at the ſame wonder in theſe verſes (r r).

(qq) Treatiſe concerning the excellence of man, printed at the end of the Theatre du Monde, by ſame anthor.

(r r) Sixth day of the firſt week, ver. 826.

Cette jument d'airain ſur qui les eſtalons
Lançoient eſtant en rut leurs fragiles talons.

That brazen mare, by famous Myron caſt
Which horſes leap'd, and as a mare embrac'd.

But Simon Goulart, his Commentator, has wrongfully imagined that this related to Myron's maſterpiece, who made, ſays he, a mare or heifer of braſs ſo very natural, that the horſes ran to leap her. If he had remembred the paſſage of Pauſanias, or rather that of Pliny, and conſidered that the epigrams he ſpeaks of in the ſame place do not permit us to doubt whether Myron made an heifer or a mare, he would not have fallen into this little error. See, above, the remark [B].

X.
Whether there is a fourth ſort of Hippomanes.

Beſides the three ſorts of Hippomanes I have ſpoken of, there are ſome authors who mention a fourth. They ground themſelves upon Ariſtotle's authority, pretending that he acknowledged two ſorts of Hippomanes in mares, one that flows before the horſes approach, the other after they have allayed their appetite by the firſt congreſs. Salmaſius, who finds this diſtinction in Ariſtotle (s s), put me upon reading attentively the words of this Philoſopher (t t): but I have not found it there, tho' I ſaw the remark concerning the Hippomanes, repeated twice over in a very few lines. That repetition ought not to carry our thoughts to two different things: for tho' Ariſtotle be conciſe, it is nevertheleſs true that he conſiders the ſymptoms of laſcivious mares at two different times; and the reaſon of his doing it is, that he particularly explains the accidents of thoſe mares that took wind, if I may ſo ſpeak, quæ ἐξανεμοῦσθαι, eventari dicebantur. He intimates that this happened not to mares who had an horſe at hand; I ſay, he intimates it in the place where he obſerves that by reaſon of this accident the Cretans left the mares and ſtallions together: and having ſpoken of the courſes which thoſe mares took towards the north or ſouth, to whom this accident happened, he ſpeaks in general of the ſigns by which the mares are known to want the horſe; and as he had ſpoken of the Hippomanes with reſpect to thoſe who do nothing but run, he ſpeaks of it alſo with reſpect to all mares in general [C]. I ſee no ground from hence for multiplying the kinds of Hippomanes: but yet ſuppoſe they were multiplied (v v), Salmaſius would ſtill be miſtaken, in

(s s) Differentiam itaque conſtituit Ariſtoteles inter hoc ἱππομανὲς quod equæ tum ejiciunt ubi ſemel ſalitæ fuerint, eſtque ſimile καπρία, & illud ἱππομανὲς quod illis defluit ab inguine eo tempore quo maris cupiditate ardeſcunt nec dum admiſerunt. Salmaſ. Exercit. Plin. pag. 941.

(t t) Ariſt. Hiſt. Animal. lib. vi, cap. xviii.

(v v) Father Hardoüin in Plin. Tom. ii, pag. 211, acknowledges two kinds of it.

Mares that took wind.

[C] He ſpeaks of it alſo with reſpect to all mares in general.] It is thus I explain that paſſage of Ariſtotle, becauſe otherwiſe there would ſeem to be a contradiction in it as may be ſeen by this abſtract. We ſee there that the luſt of the mares, is called a furious appetite of enjoying the male, ἱππομανεῖν; that it is ſaid alſo that at that time they take wind, ἐξανεμοῦσθαι; that in that condition they depart from other mares and horſes; that they run not towards the eaſt or weſt, but towards the north or ſouth; that they ſuffer nothing to come near them, except they are tired down, or come near the ſea-ſide; that then they caſt out ſomething called Hippomanes; that the mares at the ſeaſon of copulation gather together; that they love company more than before; that they move more frequently their tails; that their neighing changes; that they caſt the Hippomanes. They ſtale alſo, ſays Ariſtotle, more frequently, and ſport with one another when they are ready to take horſe. I am ſorry, I am not clear-ſighted enough to perceive much perſpicuity and exactneſs in theſe words: but however it be, if ἐξανεμοῦσθαι does not differ from ἱππομανεῖν, as the ſpecies differs from the genus, it will follow that Ariſtotle would teach us that mares ready to take horſe, avoid all company, and yet that they aſſociate with greater pleaſure than before. Now, as this would be a ridiculous contradiction, it muſt be concluded that Ariſtotle by ἐξανεμοῦσθαι meant only a kind of heat; or if it be pretended that this contains ſomething common to all mares, we muſt conclude, that it was a ſtate that preceded the maturity of the paſſion, and what Ariſtotle a little after calls ὥραν τῆς ὀχείας, tempus coïtus. But this utterly overthrows Salmaſius's ſyſtem, I mean that explication he is ſo fond of, and repeats more than once in another page, after having juſtly cenſured the great man who thought that Ariſtotle's ἐξανεμοῦσθαι ought to be underſtood of the mares that were impregnated by the operation of the wind. It is certain that Ariſtotle does not ſpeak of this, and there would be no objection againſt Salmaſius, if he had contented himſelf with affirming that this Greek word ſignifies the refreſhing one's ſelf with the wind ſucked in with open mouth: but he is unfortunate in what he adds to this interpretation. 'Ἐξανεμοῦσθαι, ſays he (13), eſt eventilari & vento excepto hiante ore refrigerari, quod equæ faciunt ubi ad ſatietatem initæ non fuerint. Ex eo quidem interdum & concipere autores tradidere, idque in Hiſpania tantum. Non tamen ἐξανεμοῦσθαι ſignificat ex vento concipere. Loquitur Ariſtoteles de iis equabus quæ admiſerint ſed non ſatis, nec meminit eo loco conceptionis ullius quæ ex vento fiat. - - - 'Ἐξανεμοῦσθαι, ſignifies to be eventilated or fanned, and to be cooled by taking in air with open mouth, as the mares do, when their luſt is not fully ſatisfied. Authors indeed have ſaid, that by this they are ſometimes impregnated, and that this happens only in Spain. But ἐξανεμοῦσθαι does not ſignify to be impregnated by the wind.

(13) Salmaſ. Exercitat. Plin. pag. 943.

in pretending that Ariſtotle's diſtinction reſpects the non-enjoyment of ſome mares, and the enjoyment of ſome others far ſhort of ſatiety, and that thoſe mares who took wind, were of the latter ſort. This is by no means Ariſtotle's doctrine; on the contrary, we ſhould infer from his diſcourſe, that they totally abſtained, ſince, beſides the reflexion he makes upon the conduct of the Cretans, he ſays in expreſs words, that they wandered from the herd, and never ſuffered themſelves to be approached till they were tired, or came near the ſea (ww), and that then they caſt the Hippomanes. Ὅταν δὲ τοῦτο πάθωσι, θέουσιν ἐκ τῶν ἄλλων ἵππων . . . ὅταν δὲ ἐμπέσῃ τὸ πάθος οὐδένα ἐῶσι πλησιάζειν, ἕως ἂν ἢ ἀπείπωσι Διὰ τὸν πόνον, ἢ πρὸς θάλασσαν ἔλθωσι· τότε δὲ ἐκβάλλουσί τι. &c. Cùm vero ita affectæ fuerint, currunt relicta ſocietate . . . . nec appropinquare quemquam patiuntur donec vel defatigatæ deſiſtant vel ad mare deveniant; tum aliquid emittunt, &c (xx).

Mr Hofman

' wind. Ariſtotle ſpeaks of thoſe mares who have admitted the male, but have not fully ſatisfied their luſt; ' nor in that place does he mention any conception made by ' the wind.' Note, that Salmaſius is miſtaken when he affirms that this has been ſaid only of Spaniſh mares, ſince the ſame thing has been ſaid of thoſe of Cappadocia (14).

THE pretended fœcundity of thoſe mares.

Let us not leave this ſubject without obſerving that it is very probable Ariſtotle has divided into two parts, what was told him concerning the heat of mares ready to take horſe, rejecting what he thought incredible, and preſerving the reſt. But he would perhaps have done well to have rejected all thoſe rambling courſes from one pole to the other; to have rejected them, I ſay, as well as the conceptions produced purely by the winds (15). Virgil, inveſted with all the privileges of Poetry, would dot depart from the tradition; he has ſuppoſed that the mares ſought the winds, and found them endued with a prolific virtue. Theſe are his words:

Continuoque avidis ubi ſubdita flamma medullis,
Vere magis (quia vere calor redit oſſibus) illæ
Ore omnes verſæ in Zephyrum, ſtant rupibus altis,
Exceptantque leves auras: & ſæpe ſine ullis
Conjugiis, vento gravidæ (mirabile dictu)
Saxa per & ſcopulos & depreſſas convalles
Diffugiunt, non, Eure, tuos, neque ſolis ad ortus,
In Borean, Caurumque, aut unde nigerrimus Auſter
Naſcitur, & pluvio contriſtat frigore cælum (16).

. . . . and when in ſpring the flame
Burns fiercer (for in ſpring the flame returns),
On lofty rocks they ſtand, and in their mouths,
Ope'd to the weſtern breeze, the gentle air
Receive; and oft (prodigious to relate!)
Without connubials, pregnant by the wind,
O'er cliffs, and hills, and lowly vallies fly;
Not tow'rds the eaſt, or to the riſing ſun,
Nor tow'rds the north, or northweſt, or that point,
Whence the black ſouth blows, ſcowling on the world
With fogs, and rain, and ſaddens all the ſky.

TRAPP.

From this deſcription it may be inferred, that it was the weſt wind that impregnated the mares, and that they reſted upon ſome riſing ground to receive it, turning their heads or tails to it, (for that is a point that has not yet been cleared by the critics, there being reaſons on both ſides) after which they ran as if they had been mad, either from north to ſouth, or from ſouth to north. Theſe fictions are pardonable in the Poets; but we cannot tell how to pardon (17) Varro, Pliny, Solinus, Columella, and ſome others, for having affirmed, as a certain fact, that in Portugal the mares bring forth colts without any other ſire than the wind. The Hiſtorian Trogus Pompeius has much ridiculed this (18). Andrew Reſendius, a learned Portugueſe, ſays (19), that there is no inſtance of it in his country. Francis Fernand of Corduba (20), has confuted the ſame ſtory with arguments, authorities, and experience.

This ſhews that St Auguſtin has not well choſen all the examples he has oppoſed to the incredulity which he obſerved among the Heathens, with reſpect to the myſteries of the goſpel: for, amongſt other things which he ſays (21), were not doubted of, but yet were unaccountable, he ſpeaks of the mares impregnated by the wind. It was not a point that all the Heathens generally agreed in. We find it exploded in Juſtin, with the approbation of Leonard Coquæus (22). Euſtathius, Biſhop of Theſſalonica (23), looks upon it as a fable, and every body at preſent laughs at it (24). But after all, a better reaſon might be given for it in the new Hypotheſis, that all animals proceed from an egg, than from the courſes the mares made from one pole to the other. If Ariſtotle, who appears not to doubt of this fact, would have exerciſed his principles of Phyſic upon it, he would have found himſelf more work than Des Cartes did in the direction of the loadſtone. Mr Des Cartes himſelf might here have been put to a ſtand, for want of a channelling, or rebates of the inſenſible parts, ſuch as would be neceſſary to explain the virtue of the ſouthern and northern winds upon mares that had ſucked in the weſtern. However it be, I do not think that the preſent managers of the ſtuds could ſupply Ariſtotle with memoirs to confirm thoſe he has publiſhed. Who would believe, for example, that there was at Opûs (25) a ſtallion which could do his office at forty years old, tho' he wanted aſſiſtance to raiſe his fore-legs (26)? Pliny has well copied this paſſage of Ariſtotle, when he ſays, Opunte & ad quadraginta duraſſe aiunt adjutum modo in attollenda priore parte corporis (27). But Solinus has performed the part of a very bad tranſcriber in theſe words: ' Notatum etiam advertimus Opuntem nomine equum ad gregariam venerem duraſſe ' in annos quadraginta (28). - - - - We find it alſo recorded that a ſtallion named Opus, was able to leap the ' mares when he was forty years old.' This horſe belonged to an inhabitant of Opus, and Solinus has taken the name of the place for that of the horſe. Salmaſius (29) has not forgot to cenſure him for this blunder. The omiſſion of his wanting to be helped up by the fore-feet, which was the principle rarity of the fact, did not leſs deſerve to be cenſured.

What I have ſaid of St Auguſtin is applicable alſo to Origen (30) and to Lactantius, who have endeavoured to perſuade us of the immaculate virginity of the mother of Jeſus Chriſt, by the examples of conceptions without the uſe of a male, ſtoried by the Heathens. ' Quod ſi animalia quædam vento aut aura ' concipere ſolere omnibus notum eſt, cur quiſquam ' mirum putet cum Spiritu Dei cui facile eſt quidquid ' velit, gravatam eſſe Virginem dicimus (31). - - - If ' it is univerſally known, that ſome animals are impregnated by the wind, or air, why ſhould any man ' think it wonderful that the Virgin Mary conceived by ' the Spirit of God, who can eaſily do whatever he ' pleaſes.' The Fathers made any ſhift, & ex omni ligno Mercurium. If they had only alledged this as an argument ad hominem, they could not be blamed; but they affirm it as a certain fact. I do not know whether they cite what Pomponius Mela relates of ſome ſavage Æthiopian women, who became mothers without the concourſe of any man: ' Super eos grandis ' littoris flexus grandem inſulam includit, in qua tantum fœminas eſſe narrant, toto corpore hirſutas, & ' ſine coitu marium ſua ſponte fœcundas: adeo aſperis efferiſque moribus, ut quædam contineri ne reluctentur vix vinculis poſſint. Hoc Hanno retulit, ' & quia detracta occiſis coria pertulerat, fides habita ' eſt (32). - - - Above theſe turnings of the great coaſt, ' there is a very large iſland, which, they ſay, is inhabited by women, whoſe bodies are all over hairy, and ' who conceive of themſelves, without the help of men. ' Their manners are ſo rough and wild, that ſome of them ' can hardly be ſubdued and maſtered, even when they ' are in chains. This is related by Hanno, and as he ' brought over ſome of the ſkins of theſe women who had (ww) The Geneva edition, 1605, and the Paris, 1629, have marem inſtead of mare.

' been

(xx) Ariſt. ubi ſupra.

(14) See St Aug. de Civitate Dei, lib. xxi, cap. v.

(15) Several authors, as Fr. Modius Nov. Antiq. Lect. Epiſt. lxxiv, Dauſqueius in Silium Italicum, lib. iii, pag. m. 134, falſely father upon Ariſtotle theſe conceptions.

(16) Virgil. Georg. lib. iii. ver. 271.

(17) See Jo. à Wower. de Polymath. cap. xi.

(18) Juſtin. lib. xliv, cap. iii.

(19) Antiq. Luſitanicar. lib. i.

(20) Didaſcal. multipl. cap. xlviii.

(21) De Civitat. Dei, lib. xxi, cap. v. See the laſt paragraph of this remark.

(22) In his notes on St Auſtin de Civit. Dei, lib. 21, cap. v.

(23) In Iliad. lib. xx, ver. 225.

(24) Harduin. in Plin. Tom. ii, pag. 212. Note, that ſome believe it, ſuch as Lewis Carrion, Obſervat. lib i, cap. xvii, & lib. ii, cap. iv.

(25) A town of the Epicnemidii Locri.

(26) Ariſt. Hiſt. Anim. lib. vi, cap. xxii.

(27) Plin. lib. viii, cap. xlii.

(28) Solin. cap. xlv.

(29) Exercit. Plin. pag. 936.

(30) In libris adverſus Celſum.

(31) Lactant Divin. Inſtitut. lib. iv, cap. xii, pag. m. 246, 247.

(32) Pomp. Mela, lib. iii, cap. ix.

XI. Remarks upon Hofman and Furetiere.

Mr Hofman (yy) ſpeaks of the Hippomanes according to Salmaſius's ideas, as well upon the paſſage of Theocritus as that of Ariſtotle; and therefore we need only refer him to what has been ſaid above. Only let me be allowed to tell him, that if he well conſults Pauſanias, he will not cite him de Arcad. (zz), nor find there that Phormis dedicated a mare in Olympia; for that author expreſsly ſays at the end of the fifth book, that Phormis conſecrated two horſes and two grooms. As to Mr Furetiere, I have no conſiderable faults to tax him with; I only obſerve, that he has been a little unexact in citing Pliny only for the Hippomanes on the forehead of colts. That naturally leads us to this fallacious thought, that Pliny ſpeaks of no other Hippomanes. I could wiſh alſo he had cited Ariſtotle, whoſe authority is juſtly greater than Pliny's. As to the other ſort of Hippomanes, he ſhould not have cited Servius, but Virgil; Servius being only his interpreter, without ſaying whether the fact be true or falſe. Neither Cæſar de Rochefort's Dictionary, nor Caſtellus's Lexicon Medicum copiouſly enlarged by Bruno, ſay any thing of the Hippomanes.

XII. What is to be believed of the Hippomanes.

I will not conclude this article without obſerving what Ariſtotle has ſo judiciouſly determined concerning the Caruncula on the forehead of the foal. He ſays, that it is ſaid to grow there, but that the dam takes it off by licking, and that the ſtories concerning its virtue are to be reckoned fables invented by women and enchanters. Τὸ δὲ ἱππομανὲς καλούμενον ἐπιφύεται μὲν, ὥσπερ λέγεται, τοῖς πωλοῖς. αἱ δὲ ἵπποι περιλείχουσαι καὶ καθαίρουσαι περιτρώγουσιν αὐτὸ. τὰ δὲ ἐπιμυθευόμενα πέπλασται μᾶλλον ὑπὸ τῶν γυναικῶν καὶ τῶν περὶ τὰς ἐπῳδάς. Quod Hippomanes vocant, hæret quidem fronti naſcentis pulli, ut narratur, ſed equæ perlambentes abſtergenteſque id abrodunt: quæ autem de hoc fabulantur, figmenta muliercularum & profeſſorum carminis incantamentorum eſſe credendum potius eſt (a). Neverthelefs this virtue has been talked of in all ages, and one may eaſily ſee that the perſuaſion which firſt obtained of its being ſerviceable as a philtre, was grounded upon the ſtory, that if the mare did not ſwallow it, ſhe did not ſuckle her young. An antient Poet, cited by Apuleius, enumerating philtres, calls this hinnientium dulcedines; which agrees extremely well with the Matri præreptus amor, which I have cited from Virgil. But as philtres rather produced fury than love, thence the Hippomanes came to be conſidered as a baneful drug. Juvenal ſays that Cæſonia, by employing it upon her huſband Caligula, cauſed that mad rage which made him commit ſo many crimes.

Et furere incipias, ut avunculus ille Neronis
Cui totam tremuli frontem Cæſonia pulli
Infudit.
Ardebant cuncta & fracta compage ruebant,
Non aliter quàm ſi feciſſet Juno maritum Inſanum.
- - - - - - - - - - -
Hæc poſcit ferrum atque ignes, hæc potio torquet,
Hæc lacerat mixtos equitum cum ſanguine patres,
Tanti partus equæ, tanti una venefica conſtat (b).

Some nimbler juice would make him foam and rave,
Like that Ceſonia to her Caius gave,
Who plucking from the forehead of the foal
His mother's love, infus'd it in the bowl;
The boiling blood ran hiſſing in his veins,
Till the mad vapour mounted to his brains.
The thund'rer was not half ſo much on fire,
When Juno's girdle kindled his deſire.
- - - - - - - - - -
But this fierce potion calls for fire and ſword,
Nor ſpares the commons, when it ſtrikes the lord:
So many miſchiefs were in one combin'd,
So much one ſingle pois'ner coſt mankind, DRYDEN.

The world is not yet cured of this ſuperſtition; for we find in a pretty late romance (c), which is a faithful and agreeable copy of the conduct of many perſons; we find there, I ſay, ſome Pariſian ladies paſſing a whole night in watching a mare, to catch I know not what they were made to believe a foal brings into the world on his forehead, and to dreſs it with certain ceremonies, which in their opinion, would become a wonderful and irreſiſtible

(yy) Vol. iii, pag. 162; and Vol. iv, pag. 495.

(zz) The book concerning Arcadia is the eighth, that wherein he ſpeaks of Phormis is the fifth, and the firſt of the two wherein the author treats of Elis.

(a) Ariſt. Hiſt. Anim. lib. viii, cap. xxiv, pag. 699, 700.

(b) Juven. Sat. VI, ver. 614.

(c) Avantures de Henriette Sylvie de Moliere, Part. iii, pag. 50, Dutch Edit. 1674.

' been ſlain, what he ſaid was believed.' You ſee that Lactantius quotes Hanno; but he miſrepreſents him, for Hanno has not ſaid that the women of that iſland were without men: ' Non recte Hannoni adfingit, inſulam hanc habitari à feminis ſolis, & quidem ſua ' ſponte fœcundis, cum Hanno contrarium dicat: utriuſque enim ſexus homines in ea inſula fuiſſe ſcribit, ' quamvis multo plures feminas (33). - - - - He wrongfully aſcribes to Hanno, the having related that this iſland was inhabited by women only, and that theſe women conceive of themſelves: whereas Hanno ſays the contrary; for he writes that there are both men and women in that iſland, though a great many more women than men.'

(33) Iſaacus Voſſius, in Pompon. Melam, ibid. Gaſpar. à Reies quem vide in Elyſ. jucund. Quæſt. Campo, Quæſt. XLI, num. 13, & ſeq. knew not Mela's errror.

philtre. This philtre was to be given cunningly to the ſoldiers, and to the captain himſelf, if there was occaſion for it, and immediately both the captain and ſoldiers were to run through the ſtreets, and offer to do all that ſhould be deſired of them. The towers and gates ſeemed, if I may ſo ſpeak, to be ready to fall of themſelves, to give liberty to whomſoever the ladies pleaſed. If we conſult the journal of the German Naturaliſts (d), we ſhall be fully convinced that the colts are foaled with the Hippomanes on the forehead; for they give us the anatomical figure and deſcription of one of them, which had been brought quite hot to a Phyſician, called Mr Raygerus. He had often deſired to ſee ſome of them freſh, having before ſeen ſome that were dry: he experienced that the mare gave milk to the colt as uſual, tho' that part was taken from it; ſo that if on one hand he lends aſſiſtance to the Antients, he diſcredits them much on the other. His Hippomanes is much larger than Ariſtotle or Pliny repreſent it.

(d) Annus Octavus, impreſſus 1678, pag. 94, & ſeq.

A
DISSERTATION
UPON THE DAY.

I. Reflexions upon the definition of the Natural and Artificial Day.

EVERY body knows that the word Day has ſeveral acceptations, and that there is the Natural Day, the Artificial Day, the Civil Day, the Aſtronomical Day, &c. I could make many obſervations to ſhew that in the definition of theſe ſeveral ſorts of Days there is hardly ever any perfect exactneſs; but as the particularizing theſe punctilio's might carry me too far, I ſhall omit more of them than I ſhall mention.

It is ſomewhat ſtrange that authors are not agreed in the definition of the Natural and of the Artificial Day. Some define the Natural Day, the time betwixt ſun-riſing and ſun-ſetting; and the Artificial Day, the ſpace included in twenty-four hours (a). Others define the Natural Day, the ſpace of time the ſun takes to make a complete revolution about the earth; and the Artificial Day, the time from ſun-riſing to ſun-ſetting (b). I own this difference lies more in the words than in the thing it ſelf, and that we are not obliged to give words the ſame ſenſe that others give them; but it would be very convenient for readers if the ſignification of certain terms was fixed, and was not converted from white to black in paſſing from one book to another. Beſides, they who define the Day, the time from ſun-riſing to ſun-ſetting, chuſe the leaſt common ſignification; ſince, for one Coſmographer who meaſures each Day's extent by it, in treating of the difference of climates, (in which it is certain that the ſun's riſing and ſetting are only regarded) there are millions of people who underſtand by the word Day all the time that the Horizon is enlightned. This appears by theſe common phraſes, At break of Day; It was already Day; It was Day ſtill; whereby the morning twilight and evening twilight are manifeſtly denoted. It is therefore expoſing the books of the Dogmatiſts to the complaints and cenſures of moſt people, to ſay that the revolution of the ſun comprehends the Day and the Night; but by the Day is meant the time from the riſing to the ſetting of the ſun, and by the Night the time from its ſetting to its riſing. It would be better to ſay that the Day is all the time we enjoy the light of the ſun (c), and that the Night is only the time we are deprived of it. Beſides, it is not very reaſonable to call that the Artificial Day, which nature makes by the real or apparent revolution of the firmament about the earth: this title much better agrees to that part of the revolution in which artificers are employed in their labour; and even this ſhews that the Artificial Day ought not to be terminated by the riſing and ſetting of the ſun; it is not by that the workmen can meaſure their labour in the frigid Zones, nor always meaſure it in the temperate ones.

We ſee every where elſe that thoſe things which borrow their names from nature, are much more general than thoſe that take them from art: It is therefore more reaſonable that the Natural Day ſhould be that which is uniform throughout the world, and the Artificial Day that which varies according to places, than to eſtabliſh the contrary. Let us ſay therefore that the word Day in its moſt proper ſignification ought to be taken for the time betwixt the ſun's leaving the Meridian, to its returning to it again; that this is the Natural Day, which comprehends twenty-four hours [A]; that in this ſenſe the

Of the duration and equality of Natural Days.

[A] The Natural-Day, which comprehends twenty-four hours.] What I ſay here of the duration of twenty-four hours, ought not to be rigorouſly underſtood: for, if the Aſtronomers and Coſmographers do not deceive us, when they unanimouſly affirm that the ſpace of an hour correſponds to the aſcenſion of fifteen degrees of the Æquator upon the horizon, the ſun's return to the meridian will require ſomewhat more than twenty-

---

(a) Father Labbe, Abrégé Chronol. Tom. i, and before him Cenſorinus, as to the Natural Day, to which he oppoſes the Civil Day.

(b) Coutel, pag. 13, of the Calcul. Eccleſ. Furetiere, and before them Gaſſendus, Inſtit. Aſtronom. lib. i, cap. xxii.

(c) Take in alſo the light that precedes the ſun-riſing, and ſucceeds the ſun-ſetting.

the Days are not longer nor leſs numerous under the Poles than under the Æquator; that they are equal in all parts of the earth; but that as the moſt excellent parts of a whole have often the privilege of bearing the name of the whole without addition, and by way of pre-eminence, it happens that where the Natural Day is compoſed of two parts, one dark and the other light, this, as the more noble, has been only named the Day; whereupon they thought they might ſay, that in the temperate Zones each Day is longer or ſhorter than the preceding. This was doubtleſs the origin of this ſecond ſignification of the word Day. Order requires, that they who treat theſe ſubjects dogmatically, ſhould characteriſe it by the addition of ſome epithet, of Artificial for inſtance. But in common ſpeech there is no need of any addition, in order to conceive that the Day excludes the Night (d). However, this is not univerſal; there are popular phraſes in which the Day is taken for twenty-four hours; as when we ſay, that a child lived but four days, that a journey or a marriage continued but fifteen days; and thus of ſeveral other ways of ſpeaking, in which it is plain that the Day excludes not the Night.

II. The Gauls and other nations reckoned by nights.

The antient Gauls gave the Night the preference over the Day, calling the time of twenty-four hours, which makes up the Night and Day, a Night. Cæſar informs us of this, and attributes the origin of this cuſtom to an ancient tradition of the Druids, that the Gauls deſcended from Pluto (e). The Germans alſo practiſed the ſame thing of reckoning by Nights (f). Vigenere in his notes upon Julius Cæſar (g), pretends there are ſtill ſome remains of this practice. As for the Germans, ſays he, they ſtill obſerve this way of ſpeaking, and commonly ſay, vor drey nachten, before it be three Nights, inſtead of before it be three Days; and Sant Johans nacht, Sant Martins nacht, Saint John's Night, Saint Martin's Night, for Saint John's Day, Saint Martin's Day. The French alſo in many places of this kingdom uſe the ſame way of ſpeaking, anuict (to Night) meaning to Day (h). Nicolas Bergier, Advocate in the Preſidial of Rheims, adds to theſe remarks of Vigenere, That the French who came from Germany, and ſeized on that part of Gaul which is ſituate betwixt the Rhine and the Maeſe, and were called Ripuarian French, uſed the word Night to ſignify the Natural Day of twenty-four hours, as appears from theſe words in one of their laws: Si infra Ducatum eſt ſuper 14 noctes auctorem ſuum repræſentet. He ſpeaks thus in his poſthumous treatiſe du Point du Jour [B]. The Printers have committed ſome errors in it, as Xipuarian inſtead of Ripuarian, in the foregoing paſſage. Mr du Cange in his Latin Gloſſary has cited many Laws, Capitularies and Formularies, which ſhew that not only the French, but alſo the Northern people, the Saxons, Engliſh, &c. reckoned by nights. Nay he ſhews, that it is a very ancient cuſtom among the Arabians. See Cluverius chap. xxxiii. of the firſt book de Germania Antiqua.

III. Of the Civil and Aſtronomical Days.

Cenſorinus (i), as I have already obſerved, divides the Day into Natural and Civil, and calls the Natural Day the time betwixt the two ſuns, if I may be allowed that vulgar expreſſion. The Civil Day he takes for the ſpace of twenty-four hours, or for an entire revolution of the heavens. Bergier affirms (k) that Pliny and Macrobius hold the ſame diviſion of the Day, calling the Civil Day that of twenty-four hours, and the natural only the time of light, commonly of twelve hours, or a little more or leſs: But I have not found this diviſion in either of theſe two authors, or in Aulus Gellius (l), followed upon this head by Macrobius; but only that they give twenty-four hours to the Civil Day, and relate the different beginnings it had in different countries. At preſent moſt writers

(d) Vulgus omne à luce ad tenebras diem obſervat. Plin. lib. ii, cap. lxxvii.

(e) Galli ſe omnes à Dite, patre prognatos prædicant, idque à Druidibus proditum dicunt. Ob eam cauſam ſpatia omnis temporis non numero dierum, ſed noctium definiunt, & dies natales & menſium & annorum initia ſic obſervant ut noctem dies ſequatur. Cæſar, de Bello Gall. lib. vi.

(f) Nec dierum numerum ut nos, ſed noctium computant Sic conſtituunt, ſic condicunt: nox ducere diem videtur. Tacit. de Germ. cap. xi.

(g) Pag. m. 319.

(h) There are ſome places where anuict, ſignifies the night paſt, others where it ſignifies the night to come.

(i) Cenſor. de Die natali, cap. xxiii.

(k) Preface to the Point du Jour, citing Pliny, lib. ii, cap. lxxvii, and Macrob. lib. i, Saturn. cap. iii.

(l) Aulus Gellius, lib. iii, cap. ii.

---

twenty-four hours. In fact, if the time taken up in the aſcent of fifteen degrees of the Æquator upon the horizon be one hour, this circle will require twenty-four hours for its revolution: but when that is finiſhed, the ſun is not yet returned to the meridian, becauſe it has a peculiar motion, by which it advances near a degree eaſtward, whilſt the Æquator makes one revolution; and therefore the ſun muſt be carried near the ſpace of a degree weſtward, to make it anſwer to the ſame point of the firmament or the ſame meridian it anſwered to the day before. Here is therefore an Aſtronomical Day a little longer than twenty-four hours. But moreover, one Aſtronomical Day is not perfectly equal to another, becauſe, by reaſon of the obliquity and excentricity of the ecliptic, the ſun does not make the ſame progreſs each day towards the eaſt (1). It advances 59 minutes $\frac{1}{6}$ each day, by the mean motion; when it goes ſwifter, it advances near two minutes more; when it goes ſlower, it proceeds near two minutes leſs. Nature loves variety even in the heavens. The Ephemerides which Mr Dalencé printed at Paris ſome years ago (2), ſhew a great deal of variety in the proportions of the increaſe of Days. For example: the fifth of January is longer by two minutes than the fourth; the ſixth is longer by two minutes than the fifth; the ſeventh is longer by two minutes than the ſixth; but the eighth is no longer than the ſeventh. All the other months are full of the like inequalities, both in the increaſe and decreaſe; and even the increaſes of January do not always anſwer the decreaſes of July. It is certain, ſays the author of thoſe Ephemerides (3), that November and December jointly are longer by half an hour and half a quarter, than September and October, tho' there are on both ſides an equal number of days, viz. 61.

Of Bergier, author of the Traité du Point du Jour.

[B] In his poſthumous treatiſe du Point du Jour.] I call this book poſthumous, becauſe the edition of Rheims, 1629, which I uſe, ſhews, that John Bergier, Attorney in the Preſidial of Rheims, printed this work of his father deceaſed. The Epiſtle Dedicatory to Mr du Lys, Advocate-General in the court of Aides of Paris, is written by the ſame John Bergier, and ſhews that this magiſtrate was the author's patron. The Abbot de Marolles ſpeaks of another patron in his alphabetical catalogue of authors who had preſented him with their books. Claude du Buiſſon, ſays he, expreſſed to me the particular eſteem he had as well as I for Nicolas Berger (4) of Rheims, who has written the book of the high-ways of the Roman Empire, and who had gone farther had he not been prevented by death, for he died at Grignon, in the houſe of the Preſident Belliévre, who honoured him with his friendſhip. I wonder that in the edition of 1629, there is no mention of any preceding edition; for in the catalogue of Thuanus's library (5), we find Archemeron, or a treatiſe concerning the beginning of Days, by Nic. Berger, 8vo. Paris

(1) See Gaſſendus. Inſtit. Aſtronom. lib. i, cap. xxii. In the abridgment of Mr Bernier, Tom. iv, pag. 80, there is 56 mintues inſtead of 59.

(2) The title is, La Connoiſſance des Tems, &c. The knowledge of the times, or a Calender and Ephemerides, of the riſing and ſetting of the ſun, &c. They began to be publiſhed in the year 1679.

(3) Pag. 38.

(4) He has committed the ſame error with the authors of the catalogue of Thuanus's library, who thrice put Berger for Bergier. La Mothe le Vayer, in the Hexam. Ruſtic. pag. 25, where he cenſures two of his faults, calls him Berger.

(5) Pag. 67, of the ſecond part.

writers conſider the Natural and Civil Day as different, not in duration, but only as the Natural Day in a general manner ſignifies an entire revolution of the ſun about the earth, and the Civil Day contains in particular the choice that certain nations have made of two points, to denote the beginning and end of this revolution. Some have choſen the riſing or ſetting of the ſun; others rather mid-day or mid-night. Hence the Civil Day of ſome countries has been included betwixt two riſings or ſettings of the ſun, or betwixt two noons, or two mid-nights. The ancient Romans followed this laſt way, which is at preſent almoſt univerſal in Europe. Theſe different ſorts of the Civil Day cannot be perfectly equal, neither to one another, nor to the true Natural Day, becauſe of the continual mobility of the moment of the ſun's riſing or ſetting: but as this inequality is not ſenſible from one day to another, it is not regarded. And therefore the nations whoſe Civil Day reaches from one riſing or ſetting of the ſun to another, no leſs take the Day for the ſpace of twenty-four hours, tho' the ſun every Day advances or retards his riſing and ſetting, and that unequally, according as it is near the Equinoctial or Solſtitial points, than if they comprehended it betwixt two noons. Whence it appears, that I had reaſon to ſay that the true Natural Day in its moſt proper ſignification, is the time betwixt the ſun's quitting the Meridian to his returning to it. It is by this the Aſtronomical Day is meaſured; for the Aſtronomers begin the Day at the inſtant the centre of the ſun touches the Meridian Line, and end it at the inſtant the ſame centre comes to touch it again. This is the leaſt unequal Day which it is poſſible to find, and that according to which all Aſtronomical tables are calculated. An author whom I have cited (m) tells us, that the Aſtronomers begin their Natural Day at the noon of the preceding Day; that for inſtance the ſecond Aſtronomical Day of the month of May begins at noon the firſt day of May, and ends at noon the following Day, which is the ſecond of May, the noon whereof commences the third Aſtronomical Day. For a greater illuſtration he ſhould have added, that tho' all the Aſtronomers begin their Day at noon, yet they are divided; ſome (n), as Ptolomy, and Tycho-Brahe, begin their day where Alphonſo King of Caſtile ends his. They, for example, begin the firſt day of January at the noon of the firſt day of our Civil Year: Alphonſo begins the firſt day of January at the noon of the thirty-firſt of December; ſo that the firſt day of the year to him is the laſt day of the preceding year for the others.

IV.
Bergier's book upon the Point of Day.

Since I have cited this little work of Bergier, it will not be amiſs to explain here the ſubject of it; it will ſerve for a connexion or introduction to the reſt of this article. I ſay then, that this author's deſign was to aſſign a point upon the earth, in which the Civil Day ſhould begin in ſuch a manner, that the ſame day (Monday or Tueſday for inſtance) ſhould be carried ſucceſſively throughout the world, and begin again at the end of twenty-four hours in a place that ſhould immediately touch the point given. By this means there would be two places upon the earth perfectly contiguous, one whereof ſhould have the beginning of Monday, whilſt the other had but the beginning of Sunday; whence it would happen, that each Day would laſt forty-eight hours, not with reſpect to a certain place, but to all the earth; each holy-day, for example, would be kept forty-eight hours together. The point Bergier choſe for the beginning of the Day, was that wherein the 180 and 181 degrees of Longitude touch one another in Mercator's maps: and thus one of the three Subadibe iſlands under the Æquator, cut into two by the 180th degree of Longitude, would firſt receive the Day; Sunday would begin there in the weſtern part, whilſt Saturday's noon would be under the firſt Meridian, and the ſame Sunday would not begin in the eaſtern part till Monday began in the other. It was the Pope's buſineſs, according to this author, to make this new Eſtabliſhment, and to appoint that for the future each holy-day, and each Day of the week ſhould begin when it is midnight upon the confines of the 180 and 181 degrees of Longitude; prohibiting all the Catholics in the world to begin their Day before the midnight which followed that which was under that place. It is plain, that after ſuch an order they who live under the 181ſt degree of Longitude would not be at the end of Lent till twenty-four hours after thoſe under the 180th degree had kept Eaſter-day. This would be very advantageous to them, if their deſire of eating fleſh was very preſſing; for they would have but a little way to go, to be in a country where they might eat it by the laws of the church. I need not tell the reader that this advantage was not put into the account by Bergier; it would rather be an objection againſt him [C]: but this is

Paris 1617. We alſo find there the Hiſtory of the high-ways of the Roman Empire, by the ſame Nic. Bergier, 4to. Paris 1622 (6). It is a very learned work, Father Bacchini, a Benedictine of the congregation of mount Caſſin, one of the authors of the journal of Parma, has tranſlated it into Latin (7), and illuſtrated it with notes. The author deſerved to be cited in a more honourable way than la Mothe le Vayer has cited him, who ſays (8), one Bergier, who after his treatiſe of the high-ways, has written another little diſcourſe concerning the break of day, has bethought himſelf, &c. It appears by Thuanus's catalogue, that this other little book did precede, and not follow the Hiſtory of the high-ways. Mr Henninius (9), has tranſlated this Hiſtory of the high-ways, and publiſhed it with learned notes in the tenth volume of the Theſaurus Antiquitatum Romanarum. Mr Oudinet (10), and the Abbot du Bos ſent him ſome notes, moſt of which were taken from the copy in which the author had written many things. There is a fine encomium on our Bergier in Father Commire's Latin poems.

INCONVENIENCIES of the line of the point of Day.

[C] It would rather be an objection againſt him.] They who cenſure a project, and by their adverſaries anſwer, find themſelves obliged to reply, ſo diligently collect whatever is not favourable to the adverſe cauſe, that we may reaſonably wonder the Sieur Michalor has is the principal advantage he finds in this new eſtabliſhment of the point of Day, viz. that there would be no more diſputes about the celebration of holy-days, when in going round the world, either thro' the eaſt or weſt, people ſhould not reckon the ſame Day of the week with the inhabitants of the countries they would land in.

(m) Bergier, preface to the Point du Jour.

(n) See Father Labbé, Abrégé Chronolog.

(6) Pag. 288, of the firſt part.

(7) I do not believe this verſion has been printed, but I know that the Italian tranſlation made by Father Bacchini has been publiſhed. It is without notes.

(8) Géograph. du Prince, ch. viii, tom. vi, of the Edit. in 12mo.

(9) Profeſſor of Duitſbourg.

(10) Keeper of the King of France's cabinet of medals.

V. They who go round the world, get or loſe a Day.

It is needleſs to explain this, for no body is ignorant that they who went round the world eaſt-ward, found themſelves older by a day at their return than thoſe who ſtaid at home; and that the contrary happened to thoſe who travelled round the world weſtward. They who returned to Seville on board the Victory, which had carried Magellan as far as the Molucca iſlands, after the diſcovery of the Straits to which this great man gave his name, found by their journal that the day of their arrival was the ſixth of September, but at Seville they reckoned the ſeventh (o). If they had gone from Seville to the Molucca iſlands, and then to the Straits of Magellan, they would have found the eighth of September reckoned at Seville, when they counted the ninth. Whence it is eaſy to underſtand, that there may be three calculations at the ſame time in the ſame place. For if two veſſels arrived at Seville which had made the circuit of the globe, one eaſtward, and the other weſtward, it is certain that Saturday the third of September at Seville would be Sunday the fourth according to the computation of the firſt veſſel, and Friday the ſecond according to the journal of the other. Let each continue his own reckoning, and you will quickly find three Chriſtmas-days or three Eaſter-days, &c. in one and the ſame week, and it would be no longer a jeſt to bid people ſtay (as the French ſaying is) till the week when three Thurſdays come together, I add, that a Day is gained or loſt, not only with reſpect to thoſe we find in our return home, but alſo to thoſe we meet in the way. Thus, the Dutch who diſcovered the Strait le Maire in the year 1616, being arrived at the Molucca's on the thirty-firſt of October, found there the firſt of November, and were obliged to ſkip from Monday to Wedneſday, in order to agree with the reckoning of their country-men ſettled in thoſe iſlands (p). It is thus alſo, that according to the relation of Joſ. Acoſta, the Portugueſe and Spaniards who penetrated into the Eaſt-Indies, the latter by the weſt, and the former by the eaſt, eſtabliſhed there a different reckoning of Days; ſo that when it is Sunday at the Iſle of Macao, diſcovered by the Portugueſe, it is but Saturday at Manille in the Philippine iſlands diſcovered by the Spaniards; and yet it is but about 100 miles from the iſland of Luſſonia, in which is the town of Manille, to the iſle Macao. This was the reaſon why Alphonſo Sanctius, being arrived from the Philippines at this iſle on the ſecond of May in his reckoning, and going to read in his Breviary the office of St Athanaſius, found that this was not the Goſpel for the Day in that place, and that the calendar there noted the third of May, which is the Invention of the Holy Croſs (q). His ſurprize was probably greater than his perplexity, for it is no great matter to paſs from one Day of the Breviary to another; and if Cardinal Pellevé, carried unawares from the Day of St Paul's Converſion to that of St Polycarpus, could have remedied this diſappointment by the help of the Breviary, he would have harangued better than he did at the opening of the States of the League. 'Id multum Cardinali Pellævæo incommodavit qui Orationem meditatus fuerat occaſione ex converſione B. Pauli ſumpta, quam tranſlato in ſequentem diem conventu vix ac ridiculè ad B. Polycarpi feſtum accommodare conatus eſt (r). - - - - - This was very inconvenient to Cardinal Pellevé, who had compoſed an Harangue on occaſion of St Paul's Converſion: For the opening of the States being put off till the next Day, he with difficulty and ridiculouſly endeavoured to accommodate his Harangue to the feaſt of St Polycarpus.' Nicolas Bergier had no reaſon to ſay (s), that they who travel round the world enter upon a different calculation of the Day but two ways; one is, when they compare their computation with that of the city in which they finiſh their circuit; the other is, when they compare it with the calculation of thoſe whom they meet upon the Oriental Ocean, and who make the tour of the world another way. It is certain, that this Eoick Sea, as he calls it, has nothing particular in this, abſolutely ſpeaking, ſince in whatever other part of the world two veſſels meet, making the circuit of the earth, one eaſtward and the other weſtward, they would find the difference of

has not objected to Ericius Puteanus, that the circle he propoſed, made way for a thouſand abuſes. In effect, through the whole extent of the hemiſphere, it would be the eaſieſt thing in the world to elude the laws of the Church concerning the days of abſtinence. A man might come off with abſtaining from fleſh for one day a week, if he would recur to the ſophiſtry of the Spaniards Medianoche. Going from home on Friday at midnight, he might find himſelf a moment after in a country where it is Sunday, and where without violating the canons of the holy Mother-Church, he might feaſt upon capons for his ſupper. He might leap over all the vigils by making but a journey of two or three ſteps under another meridian, where it is holy-day; and if he would not celebrate any holy-day, no not Sunday itſelf, (I ſpeak of Holy-days that come not two together) it were only paſſing from one meridian to another, which would coſt but little time: for tho' one degree in the heavens anſwers to the ſpace of ſeveral leagues upon earth, yet it is certain that each degree is contiguous to another; ſo that the degree where the day begins muſt neceſſarily touch another degree were the ſame day begins not till twenty-four hours after. To prevent therefore the paſſing in a ſmall time from the place where it is unlawful to eat fleſh, to another where it is lawful, it ſhould be ordered that the eaſtern part of one of theſe two degrees, and the weſtern part of the other, ſhould remain uncultivated and uninhabited. Who knows not, that any one who would continue the carnaval with impunity to the firſt Sunday in Lent, needs but go to Milan, where there is no obligation to faſt till four days after Aſhwedneſday?

(o) Sir Francis Drake, and Thomas Cavandiſh, Engliſhmen, and Oliver Vander Noort of Utrecht, who made the tour of the world thro' the ſame ſtraits, have experienced ſuch a miſreckoning of a Day.

(p) See William Schouten's journal.

(q) Id quidem. F. Alphonſo Sanctio contigit, qui cum è Philippinis ſolviſſet, venit ſupputatione ſua, in inſulam Macaum poſtridie Kalendas Maji. Recitaturus autem preces horarias in honorem S. Athanaſii, deprehendit loci incolis Inventionem S. Crucis celebrari, quinctum enim Non. Maji faſti inibi exhibebant. Idem illi, alio etiam tempore, ſed contrario calculo huc redeunti evenit. Joſeph. Acoſta, Hiſt. Ind. Occident. lib. iii, cap. xxiii.

(r) Thuanus, lib. cv, ad ann. 1593.

(s) Ubi ſupra, pag. 118, 119.

of a Day betwixt their dates. There is no reaſon therefore on this account to place the point of Day on the Eoick Ocean rather than in another place.

After having repreſented the inconvenience which Bergier would prevent by his line of the point of Day, I think I ought to ſay in a few words, that it might be ſo conveniently remedied without this, that it is no wonder his counſels had no effect. There are three calculations at once in the ſame place; ſome reckon Saturday, others Sunday, and others Monday. Well! Let the whole matter be regulated by the date of the inhabitants, and every feaſt be kept by their calendar, and you remove all this diſorder. This remedy would fail but very rarely; namely, in caſe that thoſe who had taken the eaſtern road, and others who had taken the weſtern, ſhould meet in a country wherein there were no Chriſtians; then they could not conform to the date of the inhabitants, and each would ſtand perhaps upon his own calculation. This diſorder would be a very little one.

VI. Erycius Puteanus has written concerning the point of Day.

I pretend not however to leſſen this author's merit: ſuch propoſitions are ſeldom imagined but by men of a ſtrong and extenſive genius; beſides, there is in the treatiſe I ſpeak of, a ſtock of learning which alone might recommend it. If the author had lived long enough, he would have complained, perhaps, of a profeſſor of Louvain who is celebrated for his numerous writings, and who a long time enjoyed the place of Juſtus Lipſius. To ſpeak freely, Erycius Puteanus does not ſeem to have dealt fairly with Nicolas Bergier. That profeſſor publiſhed a little piece in the year 1632, with the title of Circulus Urbanianus, ſive Linea ἀρχημερινὴ compendio deſcripta, qua dierum civilium principium hieraticum in orbe terrarum hactenus deſideratum conſtituitur. The year following he publiſhed a larger book, to defend the firſt againſt the attacks of one Michalor, a Canon of Urbino. Theſe two pieces in their moſt material points are wholly grounded upon Bergier's thoughts; for it is no conſiderable difference to place the line of the point of Day not in the Meridian oppoſite to that which is the firſt in Mercator's Atlas, as Bergier does, but in the Meridian oppoſite to that of Rome, as Erycius Puteanus does. This, I ſay, would not ſecure a man from the imputation of a tranſcriber and a Plagiary; and yet Puteanus ſays not a ſyllable of the treatiſe of the Point of Day, printed in the years 1617, and 1629, but ſets up for the man who firſt ſpoke of this ſubject. Here we may admire the good fortune which preſides over ſome books. That of Bergier, which was incomparably more an original than the other, and which we may ſay had been at all the charges, lay grovelling in the duſt, whilſt Puteanus's was enriched with the encomiums of many learned men, with the compliments of a Nuncio, of a Cardinal Patron, of another Cardinal, and of the Pope himſelf, and came out with thoſe glittering ornaments. Bergier might have well ſaid, Hos ego verſiculos feci, tulit alter honores.

VII. How two contiguous places may differ 24 hours as to the beginning of the Day.

It may here be aſked me, whether there is any part of the world where the Day takes its riſe; and whether it was poſſible for two contiguous countries to differ twenty-four hours with reſpect to the Point of Day? I anſwer, firſt, that a circle has, abſolutely ſpeaking, neither beginning nor end; and therefore the Day depending upon a circular motion, can neither begin nor end, but with reſpect to certain places; ſo that it is always beginning and ending in different reſpects, and is always in all the parts of its duration, at Mid-night, at Mid-day, at five, at ſix of the clock, &c. with relation to different countries. Secondly, it was hardly poſſible, otherwiſe than by a divine or human inſtitution, for two contiguous countries to differ more than a moment upon the Point of Day; for in whatever point of the ecliptic we ſuppoſe the ſun to have been created, it muſt neceſſarily have illuminated at once ninety degrees round, which is half the globe; and the Day muſt have begun all at once upon that half, naturally ſpeaking. If the queſtion was about the Civil Day, that is, if all men ſhould agree not to begin the Day till a certain hour, or if GOD had commanded them to begin it preciſely in that manner, I confeſs there might be two countries entirely contiguous, one of which would not enter upon Sunday till the other left it. But in this caſe a Day muſt be ſunk, and this ſentence of Excommunication, or rather of annihilation, ſhould be pronounced againſt it:

> Que ce jour ſoit raié des choſes avenües,
> Jupiter le commande aux trois filles chenües,
> Qui tiennent regître des tems (t).

Jupiter commands this Day to be raſed out of the records of time.

But ſtay a little. Chance, without the aſſiſtance of any divine or human order, or the nulling of a Day, may make two contiguous countries differ twenty-four hours as to the beginning of the Civil Day. For which we need only ſuppoſe two ſhips, which in making the circuit of the globe, one eaſtward, and the other weſtward, meet, for inſtance, in the mid-way: ſuppoſe their crews ſhould ſettle, one on the one ſide, and the other on the other ſide of an iſland, and each ſhould preſerve their own computation: Sunday will begin on one ſide, whilſt beyond the line of partition they will only be (t) I have recited theſe verſes above, in remark [B], of the article FONTARABIA.

---

be beginning Saturday. This is what the Portugueſe and Spaniards experienced towards Japan.

VIII. Puteanus has ill expreſſed himſelf in ſaying that thoſe who go round the world eaſtward, loſe a Day.

Now ſince they who ſail round the globe eaſtward think they are at Saturday, whilſt it is only Friday at the place they return to; and ſince thoſe who make the circuit weſtward only reckon Friday, whilſt their countrymen are already at Saturday, it is plain that the former gain a day, and that the latter loſe one. And yet there have been writers who have ſo confounded their ideas upon this ſubject, that they have aſcribed the loſs to the former, and the gain to the latter; this Erycius Puteanus did (u). Michalor, his Critic, did not let this fault paſs uncenſured; the conſequence of which cenſure was, that Puteanus, who might eaſily have come off by confeſſing ingenuouſly that he had uſed improper terms, obſtinately defended his expreſſion. Had it not been better to have frankly owned his fault, ſince the diſpute turned only upon words? But why; muſt a man after ſo many years profeſſorſhip in Juſtus Lipſius's chair, after being the author of ſo many books, confeſs that he has expreſſed himſelf inaccurately? No, God forbid he ſhould do ſo much injury to his rank. He therefore choſe rather to have recourſe to all the cavils his wit and reading could ſuggeſt to him, than to own his fault. He found himſelf the worſe for it; his adverſary returning to the charge, unmercifully ſcanned him even to the leaſt punctilios, and both as to this part of the diſpute, and the pretended neceſſity and uſes of the line of the Point of Day, he perfectly routed him, and remained ſole maſter of the field of battle. His firſt critical book is in Latin, but the reply is in Italian.

I believe Erycius Puteanus forgot but one cavil, which would have been, to maintain that on one hand it is a loſs to bring an additional Day from a long voyage, and on the other hand it is a gain to return to one's country with a Day decreaſed. In point of gallantry, this theſis would paſs for a principle; and there is no loſs more conſiderable than the getting of many years, nor a gain more important than the having lived leſs than another. The generality of people in this point follow the lovers ſtyle, looking upon the ſuperiority they have over their neighbour in number of Days, to be a diſadvantage. But how much ſoever ſuch ſort of cavils might avail in a diſpute, where the buſineſs ſhould be only to jeſt, they would be entirely uſeleſs in a diſpute like that of Michalor and Puteanus: for the queſtion betwixt them was not to know whether thoſe who make the tour of the world eaſtward or weſtward, grow older or younger by twenty-four hours than thoſe who ſtay at home. It is manifeſt that the age of both is preciſely what it would be if they had not ſtirred from their houſes; and that the only reaſon why one counts leſs Days than the other, is, that the Days of thoſe who travel weſtward contain above twenty-four hours each, and the others contain leſs. I own if two men born the ſame day began at fifteen years of age to travel round the earth, one eaſtward and the other weſtward, and made thirty turns each year; the firſt would believe himſelf fifty-four years old, when the latter would think he was only forty-eight. But this difference, which in caſe of marriage, if it was real, might render the latter of theſe travellers the more eligible match, would be a meer chimera in this caſe: they would be mightily deceived who ſhould rely upon that advantage. Weſtern voyages are not that fountain of youth, which removes old age; and, properly ſpeaking, a man neither gets nor loſes a moment whatever way he ſails round the world. However it is true that Erycius Puteanus uſed a moſt improper expreſſion; for in ſhort, it would be a very wrong way of ſpeaking, to ſay that we get years by reckoning as the Chriſtians, and loſe them by counting as the Mahometans. It is juſt the contrary, ſince a thouſand of our years anſwer to a thouſand thirty two Mahometan years, as is manifeſt, ſince the year 1622, was the 1032, of the Hegira (w). This example removes all the difficulty, becauſe the ſame reaſon that leſſens our years with reſpect to thoſe of the Mahometans, leſſens alſo the number of the Days of thoſe who go round the world weſtward. That reaſon is, that the years of the Hegira being lunary, are ſhorter by eleven Days than ours.

IX. Authors who have committed the ſame fault as Puteanus.

Puteanus is not the only perſon who has been miſtaken in this. I ſay nothing againſt Wendelinus (x), whom he calls the Hipparchus of our age, and who uſes a (y) phraſe which ſeems to import that he believes the eaſtward circuit gives a Day leſs, and the weſtern gives a Day more; for he pretends that if the Pope followed Puteanus's counſel, the Rubricks of the Breviary would ſhew the weſtern travellers the Day they ſhould ſink, and the eaſtern travellers that which they ought to intercalate (z). Does it not ſeem that the intercalary Day ought to belong to thoſe who have fewer Days than the others? How then comes this learned man to give it to thoſe who travel eaſtward, who are already at Tueſday, when the others are but at Sunday? I decide nothing upon this point; there will ever be a ſubterfuge by the equivocation of exemptilis and intercalaris. I ſhall therefore only ſay that in one ſenſe Wendelin's expreſſion is not exact. The reader will own it, if he compares the Pope to a father, who would reduce the profit his three ſons had made to an equality, the firſt by ſtaying at home, the ſecond by making the circuit of the world weſtward, and the third eaſtward. Let us ſuppoſe that the capital of the firſt is advanced from 10 to 15, that of the ſecond from 10 to 14, and that of the third from 10 to 16. To make all their gains equal, is it not neceſſary to take from the third and add to the ſecond? And yet, according to Wendelin, the

---

(u) Ab ortu in occaſum navigantibus dies unus uno circuïtu in lucro eſt, ab occaſu in ortum unus interit. And a little after, Demat tranſeuntibus quantum unus in occaſum ambitus addit; addet quantum unus in ortum eripit.

(w) It is thus they call the Mahometan Æra, or Epoch, which begins on our fifteenth of July 622.

(x) Godefridus Wendelinus, much eſteemed by Gaſſendus, who had been his diſciple. See Val. Andr. Bibl. Belg. pag. 294.

(y) In Approbatione circuli Urbaniani.

(z) Ut inter Breviarii Rubricas illa quoque cum primis neceſſaria lex emineat, quæ dierum ſacrorumque navigantibus in Occidentem exemptilium, contendentibus in Orientem intercalarium formulas preſcribat.

Pope muſt do the quite contrary. The inhabitants of Seville who remained at home paſſed from the 10th to the 15th day; the weſtern travellers from the 10th to the 14th; and the eaſtern form the 10th to the 16th. We muſt, ſays Wendelin, take one day from thoſe that have but 14, and give one to thoſe that have 16. Let him rather ſay one is to be taken from the latter, and given to the former; but the way of giving it is to reckon it to their account as if they had furniſhed it: for it is not giving, to quit arrears? Once more let us ſay nothing againſt Wendelin, for his expreſſion is good in a certain ſenſe. Take a Day from the weſtern travellers, and they will leap from Sunday to Tueſday; oblige the eaſtern to intercalate their Tueſday, that is, to count it twice together, and you will take from them a Day, and ſo the weſtern and they will arrive the ſame time at Wedneſday.

X.
Bembus criticiſed.

A man might more eaſily take to taſk Peter Bembus, who ſpeaking of the return of Magellan's companions, ſays, that they found the years of their voyage to be grown longer by a day; but that if they had ſailed eaſtward, they would have doubtleſs found them grown ſhorter by a Day: for, continues he, the farther they had advanced, the farther they would have gone towards the riſing ſun; and therefore, after they had finiſhed their tour about the world, they would have ſeen that luminary riſe a day ſooner than when they ſet out. Semper enim tanto citius Orienti ſoli occurrens quanto plus itineris poſt ſe circumvectus reliquiſſet, emenſo demum totius terræ globo die uno prius ſolem ſibi Orientem, quàm cum viæ ſe dederat, profecto habuiſſet (a a). Is not this a very fine reaſon? This Hiſtorian proves that the year of thoſe who circuit the globe eaſtward is ſhorter by a day, becauſe it contains a ſun-riſing more. But is not this rather a proof that it contains 366 Days, and conſequently that it is longer by a Day? Note, That the year being equal, that is, 365 times 24 hours, &c. both for thoſe who ſtay at home, and thoſe who go round the globe eaſtward or weſtward, is nevertheleſs divided into more or leſs ſun-riſings; into 365 for thoſe who ſtay at home, into 366 for thoſe who return by the weſt, and into 364 for thoſe who return by the eaſt. This is all the myſtery. Michalor has not cenſured Bembus for this bad way of reaſoning, but only for his reverſing the change which a circuit round the world gives to the year. Bembus did not perſiſt all his life-time in his error, but expreſſed himſelf as he ſhould do in the Italian tranſlation he publiſhed of his Latin Hiſtory, and inſtead of theſe words, Uno ſibi annos illos die longiores factos . . . . uno breviores die redeunti ſane fuiſſent, he put, Quelli anni tutti e tre eſſere d'un giorno fatti minori . . . . . d'uno piu lunghi ſtati ſarebbono (b b). Bergier (c c) did not perceive this inverted ſenſe of Bembus; for, far from reproving him, he cites him in Latin to confirm the ſame inverſion he had been making, ſaying, that the time of Magellan's companions was lengthened by a Day, and that if they had returned by the weſt, it would have been ſhortned by a Day (d d).

XI.
Julius Cæſar Scaliger criticiſed.

Theſe confuſions will the leſs ſurprize us, when we find the Great Julius Cæſar Scaliger could not avoid them. When he criticiſes Cardan upon this queſtion, Why the ſtars ſeem to ſailors to follow them, and the ſhoars to remove from them (e e)? He repreſents to him, that ſo common a ſubject as that ought to have been ſeaſoned with ſomething new, as for inſtance, that even when we ſail towards the eaſt, the ſtars ſeem to go before us. Whereupon he relates what the Portugueſe and Spaniards experienced in going round the world, and gives this reaſon for it: The Spaniards, ſays he, go to China, and from thence to the Cape of Good Hope, following the courſe of the ſun; the Portugueſe, on the contrary, ſail againſt its courſe; and therefore the days grow longer to the Spaniards, both becauſe they accompany the ſun, and enjoy the light longer, and alſo becauſe the ſun retrogrades, and comes to meet them: but it leaves the Portugueſe behind it at noon, who on their part turn their backs to it, and in the morning it goes from them when they expect its riſing, for it riſes later (f f). What can be more falſe than to ſay that the ſun goes before thoſe who ſail towards the Cape of Good Hope, in the courſe taken by the Spaniards? What falſer ſtill than to pretend that the days grow longer to thoſe whom the ſun comes to meet. It is the very reverſe, for the ſun brings them a new Day ſo much the ſooner. What can be more falſe in the third place, than to ſay that the ſun goes from the Portugueſe in the morning, and that they ſee it riſe later? How is this poſſible, ſince the readieſt way to meet by a circular motion, is to go to China by the eaſt as the Portugueſe did, and to go thither weſtward as the ſun did, after having left them behind it? In fine, what can be falſer than to pretend that if the ſun riſes later, the Civil Day muſt be ſhorter? Michalor (g g) has only cenſured Scaliger's third fault, except that he has farther obſerved, that there was no need of conſidering whether the Portugueſe had as good a wind as the Spaniards. In effect, ſince Scaliger did not conſider the ſwiftneſs of motion, celeritatem motus nunc non intelligo, what ſignified the winds to him (h h)? Let the Portugueſe finiſh their round in three weeks, and the Spaniards take a thouſand for it, this will neither make the difference of Days, greater nor leſs.

XII.
Several faults of Pliny in a few words.

The Ancients were not abſolutely ignorant, that the Artificial Day muſt be longer to a man travelling weſtward, and that the ſun ſets ſooner with reſpect to the eaſtern parts of the earth than to the weſtern: But if we were to judge of their knowledge by that of Pliny, we ſhould conclude they had no manner of notion of this.

In the firſt place, this Naturaliſt ſays, that it has been often experienced that the beacons kindled on high towers at the ſixth hour of the day, to give notice of the approach of

---

(a a) Bemb. Hiſt. Venet. lib. vi, pag. 131, Edit. Paris, 1551, in 4*to*. Bergier, cites lib. ii, pag. 218, Baſil.

(b b) I have cited this Italian as I find it in Michalor.

(c c) Ubi ſupra, pag. 198, 199.

(d d) Theſe deluſive expreſſions might be rectified, by ſaying that they who return home weſtward find, not their year, but that of their country, a day ſhorter; and thoſe who return by the eaſt, find it in like manner a day longer.

(e e) Cardan examines it, lib. iv, de Subtil. but does not examine either there or in the xiith book, cap. lxii, quoted by Erycius Puteanus (who did not know that the books de Subtilitate, are not divided into chapters) the ſubject which Puteanus aſcribes to him.

(f f) Longiores ita dies fiunt Hiſpalienſibus. Tum quia ſolis comites ſunt, lux eis productior eſt: tum quia retrocedit ſol atque in eorum occurſum abit. Luſitanos autem & relinquit à meridie non ſolum averſus ſed etiam averſos, atque ab eis mane refugit cum ejus exortum expectant, ſerius enim oritur. Jul. Cæſ. Scalig. Exercit. lxxxvi, de Subtilit.

(g g) Antapocriſi, Part. i, pag. 44.

(h h) Non eadem celeritate æquis tamen ventis Luſitani atque Bæthici parem marium tractum metiuntur. Scal. ubi ſupra.

of pirates, have been ſeen even in thoſe places where it was then three hours night (ii). A man needs not above three lectures on the globe, to ſee that this is a ſtory perfectly abſurd. This ſixth hour of the Day with moſt interpreters ſignifies noon. Alciatus will have it to mean ſun-ſetting, and by this means he bates Pliny two thirds of his diſtance; but to little purpoſe, ſince he leaves him ſtill too much: for to make it three hours of night in one place, whilſt the ſun ſets in another, you muſt allow 45 degrees difference of Longitude betwixt theſe two places. Now each degree of Longitude under the Æquator, comprehends twenty-five French leagues, of 2500 Geometrical paces each; the beacons muſt therefore have been perceived at the diſtance, not indeed of 1125 leagues, but at a diſtance differing from it only in proportion to the ſpace which ſeparates the parallel ſpoken of by Pliny from the Æquator; notwithſtanding which abatement, this diſtance would contain ſome hundreds of leagues. Judge what this would be, if Pliny's ſixth hour was mid-day; the diſtance would then be triple, and a beacon would have been ſeen at a greater diſtance than one third of the circumference of a good large parallel. This had been a more wonderful thing than what the ſame author ſpeaks of in the twenty-ſecond chapter of the fifth book, where he ſays that mount Caſius is ſo high as to be enlightened by the ſun three hours before day (kk). And yet Father Hardouïn will not allow of Alciatus's modification, but will have it that theſe beacons were kindled at noon, and pretends to have cleared all the difficulties of this paſſage (ll). He finds no matter for criticiſm in all this chapter. Note, That this paſſage of Pliny, concerning mount Caſius is liable to ſeveral difficulties. Ariſtotle has ſaid as much of Caucaſus; but ſome learned men (mm) maintain that there is no mountain in the world from whence the ſun may be ſeen, if he be more than four degrees below the horizon. According to this aſſertion, the ſun itſelf placed upon the top of a mountain, could not be perceived above an hundred leagues diſtance. How then was it poſſible to ſee Pliny's fires? Father Hardouïn, upon the paſſage where mount Caſius is mentioned, affirms that Cabeus has very well ſhewn that Ariſtotle was right in what he relates of Caucaſus. We ſhall ſhew the contrary under the word CAUCASUS, by examining what three learned and ſubtile Italians, Mazzoni, Blancanus, and Cabeus, have ſaid upon this paſſage of Ariſtotle.

In the ſecond place, Pliny ſays, that Philonides, a courier of Alexander, went in nine hours from Sicyon to Elis (nn); but in returning was forced to travel three hours by night. The diſtance of theſe two cities was 1200 Stadia (oo), and the way of the former to the latter, was an aſcent: and thus this courier employed one while nine hours, and another fifteen, in performing the ſame journey: nine hours going to Elis aſcending, fifteen hours in returning to Sicyon deſcending. If you aſk the reaſon of this prodigious difference betwixt going and coming, Pliny will tell you that this meſſenger, as he went to Elis followed the ſun, but in returning to Sicyon, he travelled contrary to it. But this reaſon is ſo far from compenſating the difference betwixt nine and fifteen hours, that it cannot even compenſate the advantage of the declivity of the road; for to gain an hour in following the ſun, one muſt make a ſtage of fifteen degrees, and conſequently our courier gained but ſomewhat under ten minutes when he travelled ſixty leagues from eaſt to weſt.

Laſtly, Pliny ſays, that the reaſon before given is the cauſe that the Navigators towards the weſt proceed farther in the Day than in the Night, even when the Days are very ſhort (pp). Here are ſeveral falſities. For not to ſay that our Pilots, whoſe obſervations are more certain than thoſe of the Ancients, do not obſerve that ſhips go ſlower by Night than by Day, other things being equal, who ſees not that this pretended ſlowneſs cauſed by the Night, cannot amount to the proportion Pliny aſſigns, nor proceed from the cauſe he alledges? Let us ſuppoſe that a ſhip in full ſail weſtward, makes eighty leagues in nine or ten hours of a winter's day, ſhe gains not a quarter of an hour (qq); and what is a quarter of an hour in compariſon of five or ſix hours, more or leſs, by which the winter-night exceeds the Day in the countries Pliny might have had in view? Add to this, that in ſailing weſtward, we follow the ſun no leſs by Night than by Day; whence it follows, that a ſhip ought to ſail as far in the dark as during the Artificial Day, ſince the time of darkneſs, when we ſail weſtward, lengthens in the ſame proportion with the time of light. The navigations of theſe later times have taught us, that there reigns a conſtant wind from eaſt to weſt in the Torrid Zone: ſo that thoſe who ſail there from eaſt to weſt, have always the wind behind them, and thoſe who ſail from weſt to eaſt, have always the wind againſt them (rr). This is the reaſon why a voyage from Spain to the Weſt-Indies, requires leſs time than a voyage back again. But we muſt not believe, as the Abbot de la Roque did (ss), a ſtory that (tt) was laughed at, viz. That the Spaniards ſometimes ſail to the Weſt-Indies in twenty-four hours, but cannot return in leſs than four months, let them have ever ſo favourable weather. Pliny might eaſily be deceived by ſuch as did not well underſtand what they had heard of the effect of this eaſtern wind. There is no ſea in which the eaſt winds are more favourable than the Pacific; and yet the Spaniſh veſſels which croſs it in their way from America to the Philippine iſlands, ſpend two months and an half, though they ſail 130 leagues a day (uu). I wonder that the Commentary Variorum on Pliny, printed at Leyden, does not examine and determine this matter. There can be nothing more dry

(ii) In queis prænunciativos ignes ſextâ horâ diei accenſos, ſæpe compertum eſt tertiâ noctis à tergo ultimis viſos. Plin. lib. ii, cap. lxxi.

(kk) Cujus excelſa altitudo quartâ vigiliâ orientem per tenebras ſolem aſpicit. Id. lib. v, cap. xxii.

(ll) Nihil opus iſtis ambagibus, ubi ſunt omnia per ſe perſpicua, luciſque pleniſſima, ut vel ex interpretatione noſtra liquet. Harduinus, in Plin. Tom. ii, pag. 227.

(mm) See Iſaac Voſſius, in Melam, pag. 90.

(nn) Ex Sicyone Elin mille & ducenta ſtadia novem diei confecit horis, indeque quamvis declivi itinere tertia noctis hora remenſus. Plin. lib. ii, cap. lxxi.

(oo) That is to ſay 60 leagues, of 2500 geometrical paces each.

(pp) Qua de cauſa ad occaſum navigantes quamvis breviſſimo die vincunt ſpatia nocturna navigationis, ut ſolem ipſum comitantes. Plin. ubi ſupra.

(qq) To lengthen the day an hour by a progreſs weſtward, one muſt travel fifteeen degrees, which under the Æquator make 375 leagues.

(rr) See Varenius's Geography, lib. i, cap. xxi, and Robault's Phyſics, Part. iii, cap. xi, where he aſſigns the reaſon of this Phænomenon, by the motion of the Earth according to Copernicus's ſyſtem: but ſee in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, the Hiſtorical Relation of the Monſoons, or Trade-winds, made by Dr Halley.

(ss) Journal des Sçavans, 1678, pag. 30, Dutch Edit.

(tt) Ibid. p. 57.

(uu) Halley, ubi ſupra, citat. (rr).

dry and wretched than what we find there upon this ſubject. We find nothing in it that inſinuates any diſtruſt, except two or three words, which inform us that Melichius (w w) thought the ſtory incredible concerning the beacons of the towers, and that concerning the courier Philonides. But I much more wonder at the goodneſs of Salmaſius, who has reported (x x) the ſtory of this meſſenger with marks of approbation, and ſo little doubted of his diligence, that he makes his journey longer than Pliny did. Obſerve that Allatius (y y) relates the opinion of Julius Cæſar Scaliger without cenſuring it, and defends Pliny againſt Milichius.

(w w) It ſhould be Milichius, a Profeſſor of the Mathematics at Wittemberg, who publiſhed a Commentary on the ſecond book of Pliny, in the year 1534. See above, remark [E], of the article ZIEGLER.

(x x) Salm. Exercit. Plin. pag. 45, where he computes Pliny's 1200 ſtadia to be 160 miles; they are but 150.

(y y) In Libro de Menſura Temporum, pag. 14.

XIII. Some faults of du Pinet and la Mothe le Vayer.

I would fain know how this chapter of Pliny has been interpreted by Erycius Puteanus, who boaſts of being the firſt that underſtood it (z z). Du Pinet has put in the margin of his tranſlation, That the waves of the ſea incline more to the weſt than to the eaſt, and that this is the reaſon of what Pliny relates concerning veſſels ſailing weſtward. But would not this reaſon be as good for the Night as for the Day? I omit the fault he has committed in tranſlating theſe words, Eundem (Solem) remeans obvium contrario prætervertebat occurſu, thus, He met the ſun, and paſſed it, he went ſo ſwift. I believe that prætervertebat there, ſignifies more than Father Hardouïn thinks, more than offendebat; and that Pliny's meaning is, that the courier going towards the ſun, went beyond it, and left it behind him. This does not ſignify that he went ſwifter than the ſun. La Mothe le Vayer (a) alledges this example of ſwiftneſs without finding any thing falſe in Pliny's paſſage: nay, he obſerves that Philonides almoſt equalled the courſe of the ſun; and yet he had been juſt computing Philonides's ſwiftneſs at the rate of about eight leagues an hour (b).

(z z) Quem locum per Mazzonium ſuppletum, hactenus tamen non intellectum in Theorefibus noſtris explicamus. Putean. Vindic Circuli Urban. Note, That Michalor tells him, that Mazzoni, author of a learned apology for Dante, has only cited this place of Pliny, without adding any thing to the common reading.

(a) Letter xxviii, Vol. x, of the Edit. in 12*mo.* 1681. Pliny is there wrong cited in chap. vii, (it ſhould be lxxi) of book ii.

(b) Reckoning 75 leagues, of 2000 paces each, in nine hours.

A
DISSERTATION

Which was printed before ſome eſſays or Fragments of this work in the year MDCXCII,

Under the title of,

A Project of a Critical Dictionary, in a letter to Mr du Rondel, Profeſſor of the Belles Lettres at Maeſtricht.

It has been reviſed and corrected (in this ſecond edition) but not enlarged, except with ſome citations, and a few notes put at the bottom of the pages. We have alſo placed there ſome of the citations which in the firſt edition were in the margin. They will be here by way of a comment.

SIR,

YOU will doubtleſs be ſurprized at the reſolution I have taken. I have reſolved to make the largeſt compilation I can of the faults which are met with in Dictionaries, and not to confine my ſelf within theſe bounds, however large and extenſive, but to make ſallies upon all ſorts of authors, whenever occaſion offers. What! will you ſay, a man from whom we expected quite another thing, and much rather a work of reaſoning than a compilation, is he going to engage in an enterprize which requires a much greater expence of body than of mind? It is certainly a very wrong ſtep. He undertakes to correct Dictionaries; His moſt malicious enemies could not have preſcribed to him a harder taſk, had they over his deſtiny the ſame power that Euryſtheus had over that of Hercules. It is worſe than going to fight monſters; it is attempting to lop off the Hydra's heads; it is at leaſt attempting to cleanſe Augeas's ſtables (a); in fine, it is, the penance which ought to be enjoined thoſe turbulent men who have abuſed their leiſure and the credulity of the people, to vent under the name and authority of the Revelation all ſorts of Chimera's, juſſit quod ſplendida bilis (b), I pity him. Why did he not leave this employment to thoſe robuſt conſtitutions who can ſtudy ſixteen hours a day without prejudice to their health; who are indefatigable in citations, and all the other functions of a tranſcriber, and much better qualified to acquaint the public with matters of fact than with reaſonings?

I. The reaſons and deſign of this undertaking.

If theſe are your thoughts, Sir, you ought to fear leſt your friendſhip for me ſhould miſlead you, and correct your error by this ſincere confeſſion of mine, that I find my capacity very inconſiderable which ever way I turn my ſelf. I confeſs, that in this undertaking I apply my ſmall forces by their weak ſide, inſtead of chuſing a ſubject that might diſplay them to leſs diſadvantage. But, in truth, there is no difficulty in the choice, when a man is convinced, as I am, that the difference between his ſtrong and his weak ſide is almoſt imperceptible. And beſides, I will tell you freely, that if I had turned my pen on what you believe the moſt advantageous ſide, I ſhould have been involved in the alternative, either of diſpleaſing ſome perſons whom prudence forbids to provoke (c), or of diſpleaſing my ſelf. Now you well know that in writing our genius ought not to be forced (d), and you are ſenſible that the judicious anſwer of an ancient Greek might in ſeveral ſenſes be applied to one's ſelf [A]. And after all what is

(a) It is ſaid that Mr .... deſiring one of his friends to ſet down upon ſome little piece of paper the faults he ſhould obſerve in his Dictionary, was anſwered, that it required quires and reams of paper, and not little pieces.

(b) Horat. Sat. III, lib. ii, ver. 141.

(c) See in Eraſmus's Adagia, the ſaying, Noli irritare crabrones.

(d) Tu nihil invita dices facieſve Minerva. Horat. de Art. Poet. ver. 385.

[A] The judicious anſwer of an antient Greek.] We find it in Stobæus. Θεόκριτος ἐρωτηθεὶς διὰ τί οὐ συγγράφει, ὅτι εἶπεν ὡς μὲν βούλομαι, οὐ δύναμαι, ὡς δὲ δύναμαι οὐ βούλομαι: Theocritus quærenti quare non ſcriberet, dixit, quoniam ut libet non poſſum, ut verò poſſum non libet (1). - - - Theocritus being aſked why he did not write, anſwered, it is becauſe I am not allowed to write as I would, and cannot write as I am allowed.

(1) Stobæus, Serm. xix, fol. m. 81, verſo.

is the diſadvantage of not ſhewing our ſelves on the beſt ſide? It is depriving our ſelves, perhaps, of the praiſes one might have received. I ſay perhaps; for the caprices of men and chance have a ſtrange influence in this. But omit the perhaps; what then would this be, but a privation of praiſe, which is a meer nothing to a man who never acted, and at preſent acts leſs than ever by this principle? I could wiſh that the ancient Poet, who had ſo well begun to ſhew the emptineſs of human affairs, had carried his thought ſo far as to ſay, cornea mihi fibra eſt: you would here ſee the application that might be made of the three verſes he would have left us in this caſe.

> Non ego cum ſcribo, ſi forte quid aptius exit.
> Quando hæc rara avis eſt, ſi quid tamen aptius exit,
> Laudari metuam, neque enim mihi cornea fibra eſt (e).

(e) Perſius, Sat. I, ver. 45.

> . . . . If I, by chance ſucceed
> In what I write, (and that's a chance indeed;)
> Know I am not ſo ſtupid, or ſo hard
> Not to feel praiſe, or fame's deſerv'd reward. DRYDEN.

If on one hand I am not ignorant that my enterprize requires great ſtrength of body, I conſider on the other, that natural patience, joined with the habit of meddling only with books, of going little out of one's ſtudy, and avoiding as the plague the ways of thoſe turbulent men whom I have ſpoken of, who buſily thruſt themſelves into all affairs, even thoſe of ſtate, may ſupply a great many things.

As for thoſe learned men, whoſe erudition in matters of fact is proportioned to the indefatigable application their robuſt conſtitution allows them, I declare to you, Sir, that I do not pretend to intrude upon their province; on the contrary, I only propoſe to furniſh them with an eſſay, or rough-draught, which may determine ſome of them to perfect this plan, and to enlarge this Critical Dictionary with ſeveral volumes. I heartily agree they ſhould ſay of me in this reſpect, what was ſaid to Varro upon matters of Philoſophy, that he had ſaid enough to create a deſire for it, but not to give the knowledge of it (f). I even ſubmit to thoſe who ſhall ſay it would be a greater favour than juſtice in the public to treat me according to the rule that Ariſtotle approves in one of his writings. Οὐ μόνον δὲ χάριν ἔχειν δίκαιον τούτοις ὧν ἄν τις κοινωνήσαι ταῖς δόξαις, ἀλλὰ καὶ τοῖς ἔτι ἐπιπολαιότερον ἀποφηναμένοις· καὶ γὰρ οὗτοι συμβάλλονταί τι. τὴν γὰρ ἕξιν προήσκησαν ἡμῶν· εἰ μὲν γὰρ Τιμόθεος μὴ ἐγένετο πολλὴν ἂν μελοποιΐαν οὐκ εἴχομεν. εἰ δὲ μὴ Φρύνις, Τιμόθεος οὐκ ἂν ἐγένετο. Verùm non ſolùm illis agendæ ſunt gratiæ quorum opinionibus quis acquieſcet, ſed illis qui ſuperficie tenus dixerunt: conferunt enim aliquid etiam iſti, habitum namque noſtrum exercuerunt. Si enim Timotheus non fuiſſet, multum melodiæ nequaquam habuiſſemus: ſi tamen Phrynis non extitiſſet, ne Timotheus quidem (g). - - - We ought to return thanks not only to thoſe whoſe opinions we approve and agree with, but even to thoſe who are meer ſuperficial writers. For the latter contribute ſomething to our good, as they have put us upon thinking. If there had never been a Timotheus, we ſhould have had no excellent Muſic; but had there not been a Phrynis, we ſhould never have had a Timotheus. And I very ſincerely make the ſame declaration as the ingenious author of the Hiſtory of the Royal Society: In anſwer for my ſelf, ſays he (h), I ſhall alledge, that what I have to offer, ſo far from preventing the labours of others who could adorn ſo noble a ſubject, is no otherwiſe deſigned than as thoſe ſtately edifices uſed at firſt to be repreſented by ſome few ſhadows and little models, which are not intended to equal the principal ſtructure, but only to ſhew by way of abridgment, with what materials, how much expence, and how many hands it might be afterwards raiſed. I write with the ſame intention; propoſing only to give the ſketch of a deſign to ſuch as ſhall have the capacity of executing it; and that they may fall to work as ſoon as may be, I will make all the haſte imaginable to publiſh my Eſſay, which will contain but one volume in folio.

(f) Philoſophiam multis locis inchoaſti ad impellendum ſatis, ad edocendum parum. Cicero, Academ. Quæſt. lib. i.

(g) Ariſt. Metaphyſic. lib. ii, cap. i, pag. m. 645.

(h) Dr Thomas Sprat (afterwards Biſhop of Rocheſter) Hiſtory of the Royal Society, pag. 2.

II. That there are many faults in books.

They will not want matter for larger editions: For if this ſubject can furniſh me with materials for a large volume, notwithſtanding the other indiſpenſable occupations which take up all my time, and the ſcarcity of books I am reduced to, what will not men of great learning and great leiſure do, who have great libraries at hand, if they would undertake to make collections of this kind? Theſe will be excurſions from which they will always return laden with booty; and no Prince, whatever care he takes for laying the toils, and diſpoſing all things for a great hunting match, can be more certain of catching a great many wild beaſts, than a learned critic, who goes in chace of errors, can be certain of diſcovering a great many of them. It would be ſomething curious, if this work ſhould have the ſame fate, with that of a learned Swiſs (i), intituled, Theatrum allowed. An antient Rhetorician gave this anſwer for the reaſon of his ſilence: What I know, it is not ſeaſonable to ſpeak; and what would be ſeaſonable, I do not know.

(i) Theod. Zuinger, a Phyſician, Native of Baſil, who died in the year 1588.

---

You will find the words of this antient Rhetorician, with thoſe of Stobæus, in the remark [F], of the article ARISTARCHUS. And ſince that remark will ſuffice for all the comment I might have occaſion for here, I need only refer to it, repetitions being to be avoided as much as poſſible.

Theatrum vitæ humanæ, which has been enlarged ſo often, that it now contains eight great volumes in folio. Doubt not but the faults of authors would ariſe to as maſſy a bulk as this: Now, Sir, would a theatre of theſe faults in as many large volumes, be, in your opinion, leſs diverting or inſtructive than that of human life? You may acquaint me, when you pleaſe, whether the book intituled, The Hunters, which contained the catalogue of Theopompus's thefts, had not its title founded on the compariſon or metaphor of hunting I have uſed? You may acquaint me with it, I ſay, when you pleaſe, no body having diſcovered the moſt hidden particulars of antiquity, ſo well as you have done.

It will eaſily be granted that there are an infinite number of faults in books, if we conſider that the writings of the greateſt men are not exempt from them, and that the meaneſt critic can diſcover a great many. How often do we find in the contents and indexes of the meaneſt performances, Scaliger notatus, hallucinatio Scaligeri, - - - Scaliger cenſured, a blunder of Scaliger, and the like? Mr Morus imagined that this was a ſorry affectation of a proud author, who deſires to be talked of (j). This may be true; but no man of learning can deny that Scaliger may be cenſured juſtly in a great many things; we need no other proof of this than the works of Salmaſius, where at every turn we find Scaliger reprehended (k). It is true, he is not named, but pointed at by the lofty title of vir magnus, vir ſummus: but all theſe great civilities do not leſſen the reality of the fault, when the cenſure is well grounded. Salmaſius, who had not the ſame reaſons for reſpecting other learned men, exaſperated ſome of them, who revenged themſelves with unmerciful criticiſms upon his writings. He made his defence, and attacked them in his turn. The battle was principally fought betwixt him and the Jeſuit Petavius, and was ſo obſtinate, that it hardly ceaſed till their deaths. We may affirm, that they were two champions worthy of each other, and that never gladiators were better matched than they: for it would be unjuſt to determine the matter, by what thoſe have ſaid who were both judges and parties in the quarrel (l). They were the two moſt learned men in France, and they might not only have enlightened their age, but alſo have done it much honour by their long controverſies, if, to the ſhame of learning, they had not tainted them with the exceſſive venom of their ſpleen, which dictated almoſt as many abuſes as words. All the other antagoniſts of Salmaſius were not capable of returning blow for blow, I mean of diſcovering as many faults in his writings as he diſcovered in theirs; but nevertheleſs they made him ſenſible he was often miſtaken. Who can doubt, after this, that there is a vaſt crop of faults of this kind? Where will the harveſt be wanting, when it is ſo plentiful in the productions of the Scaliger's and Salmaſius's; and who would be diſheartened with his errors, upon this conſideration?

A perſon of your judgment needs not be put in mind that I have propoſed the example of theſe two great men, not ſo much to reaſon from the greater to the leſs, as to give ſome ſort of conſolation to authors of a ſecond claſs, and to thoſe who, like my ſelf, are of the loweſt. The conſolation might be more effectual than the reaſoning could be juſt; for it is certain that authors of the firſt rank are thoſe who ſometimes let ſlip the greateſt number of faults: whether becauſe they are too bold in their deciſions, and too much addicted to new ways, or whether they yield ſooner or later to the vanity of diſtinguiſhing themſelves by the multitude of their writings, or for ſeveral other reaſons, which I could eaſily enumerate, if I meant to characterize any one by them; but it is no leſs certain, that theſe examples afford ſome conſolation. In matter of comfort, men are rather touched by popular and plauſible thoughts, than by reaſonings the moſt conformable to the rules of Logic. We may ſay then, that the Scaliger's and Salmaſius's ought to have the ſame effect as to other authors, that Carthage had as to other nations: Poſt Carthaginem vinci neminem puduit (m); No body was aſhamed to be conquered after Carthage was conquered.

I might join Baronius to theſe two famous authors. He was undoubtedly a great man: they who have examined his work in order to write againſt him, are perhaps his greateſt admirers; and yet how many faults are there in his annals? They are not reckoned by hundreds, but by thouſands. ‘Baronii Annales is quem dixi Blondellus mille ‘caſtigavit notis, aliquando prodituris, quibus oram exemplaris ſui prætexuit: quod ‘exemplar ære ſuo redemptum bene proceres Amſtelodamenſes Bibliothecæ publicæ in‘ferri curaverunt. Super hæc vero & ea quæ ab aliis animadverſa ſunt, quæ ſubnota‘vimus etiam nos juſtum fere volumen implerent (n). - - - - - - Blondel, whom I have ‘mentioned, made a thouſand corrections cn the annals of Baronius; theſe corrections may ſome ‘time be publiſhed: he wrote them on the margin of his copy, which the magiſtrates of Amſter‘dam have bought and placed in the public library. But beſides theſe corrections, and ſome ‘made by other authors, thoſe which I have alſo made, would almoſt fill one volume.’ He was miſtaken, not only through a party-intereſt, and a prejudice in favour of the court of Rome, but even in a thouſand things which are of no ſervice to the pretenſions of that court. This has been proved as often as he has been attacked, and very lately the public had an opportunity of being thoroughly convinced of it (o). Baronius ſeems to have taken delight in deceiving himſelf, and purpoſely to have interſperſed his work with lies, ſo thick do they grow every where.

(j) Illos omitto, qui ſatis ad famam nominis adipiſcendam putant ſi præſcribere poſſunt illud: contra Scaligerum, vel Scaligeri error oſtenſus: hec eos præcipuè tango, &c. Alex. Morus, Præfat. Edit. Scalig. in Euſebium, 1658.

(k) I do not ſpeak of the charge that Scioppius, the moſt terrible and furious of all the Critics, brought againſt him (that would be too odious) pretending he had committed 500 falſities in a piece of 120 pages, concerning the antiquity of his family. It is very certain that there are among theſe 500 lies imputed to him, many that are imputed with reaſon: to be convinced of it, we need only read what Scaliger and his friends anſwered, and what was replied to them.

(l) As Father Labbe in his French Chronologer, Tom. v. anno. 1652. Father Denys Petau, ſays he, the moſt learned man in the world, died on the 11*th of November, in the ſeventieth year of his age. Salmaſius, who had tried his ſkill with him in ſome points of Grammar*, impar longe congreſſus Achilli in all the reſt, died . . . on the third of September. See, remark [A], of the article PETAVIUS.

(m) Florus, lib. ii, cap. vii.

(n) Alex. Morus, ubi ſupra. Holſtenius could ſhew 8000 falſhoods in Baronius, and prove them by the manuſcripts of the Vatican. See Patin, Letter CLXIV, pag. 17, Tom. ii, Edit. 1691.

(o) By the Critica Hiſtorico-Chronologica of Father Pagi, printed at Paris in folio, in the year 1689, and by the Exercitationes Sam. Baſnagii Flottemanvillei, printed at Utrecht, in 4*to, in the year* 1692.

III. Yet a good compilation of them cannot be made without much labour.

I am not apprehenſive you ſhould conclude from hence that there is nothing eaſier than to compile faults, and that theſe ſorts of collections require but little time, it being but tranſcribing the cenſures authors have made upon one another; I am not afraid, I ſay, that ſo judicious a man as you, ſhould argue after that manner. You know too well, Sir, that there is no diſpute in which it is more neceſſary to hear both parties, than in thoſe which ariſe among the learned. It would be madneſs to depend upon the obſervations of the aggreſſors; prudence requires we ſhould hear both the anſwers of the defendants and the replies of the aggreſſors. I aſk no more than this; I know that the reader's patience commonly does not go ſo far. But in a deſign like this, it is not too much, with reſpect to many things, to compare together four pieces publiſhed ſucceſſively; two by the aſſailant, and two by the aſſaulted; and I dare even ſay, that in ſome particulars this is not ſufficient. It will be granted me that there are many cenſors who commit more faults than they correct (p); at leaſt it will be owned, that the moſt learned men give occaſion to be cenſured in their turn. This is what Caſaubon has been taxed with in reſpect to his critical work on Baronius. Some have reproached him with this very moderately (q); others in an outrageous manner; tho' we muſt own, that by I know not what fatality this work, which is very good and very learned in other reſpects, did more harm than good to the reputation of the author. But, in ſhort, I deſire only this example to ſhew that after the reading of a critical book, we muſt ſuſpend our judgment till we have ſeen what the criticiſed author or his friends have to ſay. They who think all that is cenſured by the aggreſſor to be faulty, and whatever he does not oppoſe to be good, commonly find themſelves in the end the dupes of that writer; for it may be proved to them, that he has condemned good things, and paſſed by what really deſerved condemnation, and that he himſelf has been guilty of many blunders. An author who in other reſpects cannot endure to be cenſured, will turn Critic upon himſelf, when thereby he can hope to mortify his cenſurers, by ſhewing them they were ignorant that ſuch and ſuch things deſerved to be cenſured. I would give you inſtances of this, was I not ſatisfied they are well known to you, with the reflexion naturally reſulting from it: which is, that a man chuſes rather to hurt himſelf, provided he hurts his enemy at the ſame time, than do himſelf any good that might turn to his enemy's advantage. Now, as the fate of the cenſurer is ſometimes the ſame with that of the Apologiſt, that is, neither of them ſees but part of his adverſary's defects, and both commit faults each in his turn, we ſee the neceſſity of following them through the whole progreſs of their diſpute, when one attempts ſuch a collection as that I undertake; For it ought to conſiſt only of faults averred and certain, ſuch, for inſtance, as are thoſe which the authors animadverted upon, do themſelves acknowledge either expreſly, or by their ſilence, and thoſe which they are diſabled from defending otherwiſe than by notorious abſurdities. Not, Sir, that I deny there are faults which are made evident by the firſt cenſure: ſo that if I reſumed the metaphor of hunting I uſed before, I ought to ſay, that indeed thoſe who purſue the faults of authors, frequently find the beaſt already ſlain, or that he bays; but ſometimes alſo they find one that puts them on a wrong ſcent, or avoids the blow, or ſtill vigorouſly defends himſelf, tho' wounded in an hundred places. The cavils ſuggeſted by vanity and a falſe ſhame, to writers who are cenſured, make the application of the metaphor but too juſt. This however proves that tranſcribing is not ſufficient to ſucceed in this hunting, and that the edifice muſt be very coſtly, notwithſtanding the plenty of materials. Let us go farther, and ſay, that of all Dictionaries there is none more difficult than this. When we write other Dictionaries, we meet with a great many things ready prepared in the preceding ones, which coſt only the taking them; and as many others that want but a little alteration. Whatever we find good in them, is lawful prize. But all this is of no uſe to me: what I find wrong and defective is the only thing that can ſerve me, provided I know how to rectify it.

IV. The uſefulneſs of ſuch a compilation.

You have ſeen a reflexion, ſuggeſted to me by the reading of ſome of thoſe diſputes, which contain anſwers, replies, rejoinders, &c. See here another ariſing from the ſame ſource. After having read a criticiſm on a book, we think ourſelves undeceived in many falſe things, which were taken for true when we read the book. Hence we paſs from the affirmative to the negative. But if we happen to read a good anſwer to this criticiſm, we ſeldom fail, with reſpect to ſome things, to return to our firſt affirmation: whilſt, on the other ſide, we proceed to the negation of ſome things which we had believed upon the credit of the animadverter. We experience a like revolution of thoughts, when we come to read a good reply to the anſwer. Now, is not this capable of making the greateſt part of readers continually diffident? What can eſcape the ſuſpicion of falſhood with reſpect to thoſe who have not the key of the ſources in their hands? If an author advances things without citing the places he takes them from, he leaves room to believe that he only ſpeaks by hearſay; if he cites, it is feared that he unfairly relates the paſſage, or underſtands it ill, ſince we ſeldom fail in reading a critical work to find a great many ſuch faults in the book which is criticiſed. What muſt be done then, Sir, to remove all theſe reaſons of diſtruſt, whilſt there are ſuch a great number of books that were never anſwered, and ſuch a great number of readers who have not the books containing the ſequel of theſe literary diſputes? Were it not to be wiſhed there was extant a Critical Dictionary, to which recourſe might be had, in order to be aſcertained whether what we find in other Dictionaries and in all ſorts of other books be true? This would be the touch-ſtone of other books; and you know a man ſomewhat preciſe in his language, who would not fail to call a work of this nature, The Inſurance-office of the Republic of Letters.

(p) Sæpe in judicando majus eſt peccatum judicii quàm peccati illius de quo fuerat judicatum. Ambroſius, in Pſal. L.

(q) Mr Godeau for inſtance, in the preface of his Hiſtory of the Church: Caſaubon, ſays he, who was a man of learning, ſhould have treated Baronius with more civility, he who never names Scaliger without the title of Divine, and contents himſelf with cenſuring the things he believed him miſtaken in, without attempting to make him paſs at every turn for a man who had no good learning. If he had engaged in a career as long as his, we ſhould have ſeen whether he would not have made falſe ſteps. His Exercitationes have produced other works of the ſame kind. Juſt matter of cenſure has been found in his cenſures, by which it appears that in ſuch ſubjects there is nothing but may be defended and oppoſed with almoſt an equal probability, eſpecially as to the dates.

Thus you have a general idea of my project. My deſign is to compoſe a Dictionary, which, beſides the conſiderable omiſſions of others, ſhall contain a collection of falſhoods concerning each article. And you may eaſily ſee, Sir, that if, for inſtance, I had been able to collect under the word SENECA, all that is falſely attributed to that famous Philoſopher, it would only be neceſſary to conſult this article in order to know whether we ought, or ought not, to believe what we read concerning Seneca in any book whatever. For if it was a falſhood, it would be noted in the collection; and whatever would not be inſerted there as falſe, might be looked upon as true. This ſuffices to ſhew, that if this deſign was well executed, the work would be moſt uſeful and moſt convenient to all ſorts of readers. I am very ſenſible, methinks, what ought to be done for the perfect execution of this enterpriſe; but I am much more ſenſible of my incapacity to execute it: And therefore I give here only a ſpecimen, and leave the continuation of it to perſons of the requiſite abilities, in caſe it be thought that this project, rectified whereever it is deficient, deſerves to employ the pens of the learned.

V.
Why theſe fragments are publiſhed beforehand, and the nature of them.

But as I ſoon foreſaw that my ſpecimen would be extenſive enough to engage me in a moſt laborious taſk; and beſides, as I am very diffident of my ability to execute this project: do you know, Sir, the reſolution I have taken haſtily? I deſign to hazzard ſome fragments of my ſpecimen, and to ſend them abroad as the forlorn-hope to ſcour the country, ſound the fords, and get intelligence of the enemy. If they make an unſucceſsful ſally, and return not with good news, I will take a Stoical reſolution of lying quiet; if the ſucceſs prove otherwiſe, I ſhall proſecute my deſign. Thus you ſee what obliges me to ſet out with this little forerunner. Whatever fate it meets with, it will afford me the opportunity of giving a public teſtimony of my particular eſteem and friendſhip for you; and if any thing be capable of diſturbing me for its ill ſucceſs, it will perhaps be the conſideration that it was unworthy of being inſcribed to you.

In the mean time let me tell you a little ſecret; which is, that in compoſing this prelude, I have been ſo far from chuſing the leaſt exceptionable fragments of the Critical Dictionary, that I have choſen thoſe I moſt ſuſpected. It is not hard to conjecture the reaſon of my conduct, ſince common ſenſe teaches us, that the ſureſt way of prognoſticating the fate of a book, by feeling the pulſe of the public, is to take the pattern we ſhew, from the worſt part of the piece, rather than from the beſt. Beſides, when we deſire to profit by the reader's advice, and to know which is the beſt way of executing a project, we ought chiefly to lay before him thoſe parts which are of the moſt doubtful value. I have therefore choſen thoſe fragments which I moſt ſuſpected, or ſuch as contained each in its kind the moſt obvious irregularities, as you may ſay a long train of remarks, a digreſſion reſembling a diſſertation in form, &c. I praiſe the ſimplicity of a plan; I admire the uniform and neat execution of it; and in this I place the idea of perfection. But when I come from the theory to the practice, I own, I find it difficult to follow this idea of perfection. A mixture of ſeveral forms, a party-coloured variety, and not ſo much uniformity, are much my talent.

I fancy this falſe taſte is an effect of my lazineſs. I would have the ſame book ſatisfy my curioſity on all the things it ſuggeſts to my thoughts, and I do not love to be obliged to paſs from book to book for this ſatisfaction. As it is natural to judge of other people by one's ſelf, methinks an author does a great pleaſure to his reader when he ſpares him the trouble of going out of his place, and ſearching in another book for ſome little explanations he may deſire. You now begin to fear that my book will be ſtuffed with parentheſes all over: but fear it not; for in favour of thoſe who love not interruptions, I will take care to keep the text clear from acceſſory obſervations, and ſhall place them in the margin, and at the end of each article, in favour of thoſe who deſire to know immediately the dependances or relations which connect things together. To refreſh the readers, I will take care to give them now and then ſome gayer touches, without making too much uſe of the privilege allowed to works of this kind, namely of uſing free expreſſions; nothing is more neceſſary than ſuch paſſages in a Dictionary, which is of itſelf a dry and fatiguing book. Would to God theſe were all the bad ſides of it; but there are others more diſcouraging, ſince there is no work that is judged of by ſo bad principles as this. You find a great many readers complaining that they meet with common things in it. What then would they have? Nothing but exquiſite learning, and what they knew not before? But in that caſe, it would not be ſuch a book as it ought to be, that is, a book ſuited to the uſe and capacity of every reader.

I appeal to you, Sir, who are an excellent judge of every thing relating to literature: would it be reaſonable to exclude from this Dictionary the cenſure of a fault, under pretence that this fault cannot miſlead learned men, though it be ſpread in the works of a great many writers? Doubtleſs you will not be of this opinion: every falſhood which is diſperſed in ſeveral books may deceive many people, and that is a ſufficient reaſon for pointing it out in a Critical Dictionary: for this reaſon the faults of the firſt editions may be taken notice of, tho' they have been corrected in the ſecond; for how many people uſe the firſt edition all their lives, without ever conſulting any other.

Have I not reaſon to fear that by thus giving you the character of my work, you ſhould aſk me whether this be the way of diſcharging my obligations to you; and whether I am not aſhamed to dedicate to you a book ſtuffed with the errors and blunders of authors, and a heap of the traſh and filth of the Republic of Letters [B]. I am as fully perſuaded as any man living, that nothing ſhould be dedicated to you but a collection of fine thoughts, and curious erudition, and that the preſent might be worthy of you, it ought perfectly to reſemble the writings you have publiſhed. Am not I then very blameable to deviate ſo much from this model; and without any reaſon, and even in quite different circumſtances to recur to the expedient of Catullus, and put his menace in practice?

> Ad librariorum
> Curram ſcrinia, Cæſios, Aquinos,
> Suffenum, omnia colligam venena,
> Ac te his ſuppliciis remunerabor (r).

(r) Catull. Epig. xiv.

I will run to the Bookſellers ſhops, and collect the Cæſii, Aquini, Suffenus, and other books of that ſtamp, and, to puniſh you, I will preſent you with them.

But, whatever may be ſaid of it, I am certain, upon mature conſideration, that if my collection is not worthy of your patronage, it is not for the reaſon I have aſſigned. I ſhould think it a much more tolerable preſent, if it was compoſed of a far greater number of lies; and I ſhould not deſpair of procuring one day, your intire approbation of it, if I had as good a noſe for the falſities of authors, as a Poet of your acquaintance boaſts he had in other reſpects (s).

(s) Namque ſagacius unus odoror,
Polypus an gravis hirſutis cubet hircus in alis
Quam canis acer, ubi lateat ſus.
Horat. Epod. Od. xii.

I ſhould now conclude this long letter; but I have ſome difficulties to clear up, which will ſtay me ſome time longer.

VI. Anſwer to ſome objections; 1. That this book may create enemies.

Firſt, Sir, the liberty I take to gather into heaps the falſities ſcattered in divers books, may be taken for a notorious raſhneſs: Is not this wantonly creating to one's ſelf a vaſt number of enemies? When we cenſure the Antients, we provoke their numerous partiſans among the Moderns; and when we cenſure the latter, we incur either their own reſentment if they are living, or that of their family if they are dead. Now the reſentment of authors is no ſmall matter. They paſs for a very touchy, choleric, and vindictive race of men; and it looks as if their relations thought themſelves obliged to perpetuate, after their death, the blind love they had for their productions. As for the intereſt which ſeveral Moderns take in the reputation of the Antients, I cannot better repreſent it than by the paſſage I cite, where la Mothe le Vayer is angry with Balzac, who had criticiſed an anſwer of Pompey. In truth, I confeſs to you, that ſo unjuſt a treatment of all antiquity raiſes ſuch an indignation in my ſoul, that I had rather it ſhould be you, or any body except myſelf, who ſhould give this ſort of temerity the name it deſerves. ' Exclamet Melicerta periiſſe Frontem de rebus. - - - Well may we ſay, that ' modeſty is fled from the earth.' A man muſt have loſt all modeſty and judgment to proceed to ſuch a want of reſpect, and to ſo preſumptuous an extravagance, ' ut inſolenter parentis artium antiquitatis reverentiam verberemus (t). - - - As inſolently to ' cenſure

(t) Macrob. 1. Saturn. Hexam. Ruſtic pag. 142, 143.

[B] A book ſtuffed with the errors and blunders of authors, and a heap of the traſh and filth of the Republic of Letters.] As every thing has two faces, perhaps ſome people will pretend that I incur the cenſure we read in a fine treatiſe of Plutarch. But this would not be conſidering the matter by it's fair ſide; this would be viewing it by it's wrong ſide. It ought to be conſidered according to the idea of thoſe collections of Phyſical Obſervations, which only contain the Diſtempers incident to human bodies, but which treat of them only to teach us how we may avoid, or be cured of them. However it be, theſe are Plutarch's thoughts (2): ' If ' any one rummaging the wrtings of the Antients, ' ſhould pick and cull all the worſt things he could ' find, and make a book of them, as the defective ' verſes of Homer, beginning with a ſhort ſyllable, or ' the incongruities met with in Tragedies, or the obſcene and baſe objections Archilochus makes againſt ' the female ſex, diſgracing himſelf by it; would he ' not deſerve this tragical malediction,

(2) Plut. de Curioſitate, pag. 520.

> Pox on your taſte! muſt you, like lice and fleas,
> Be always fed with ſcabs and naſtineſs?

' But ſetting aſide that curſe, ſuch a collection would ' neither bring him honour nor profit, as it rips up ' all the faults of other men; thus we read that Philip ' gathered together the moſt wicked and incorrigible ' men of his time, whom he lodged together in a city ' he built for them, and called it Poneropolis, that is, ' the city of villains: ſo curious people collecting and ' amaſſing from all hands the faults and imperfections, ' not of verſes or poems, but of the lives of men, make ' very diſagreeable archives and regiſters of their memory, which they carry always about them. And ' juſt as at Rome there are perſons who care not to ' buy handſome pictures, or fine ſtatues, or even ' handſome boys and girls of thoſe who expoſe them ' to ſale, but rather affect to buy monſters in nature, ' ſuch as have no legs, or their arms wrong placed, or ' three eyes, or the head of an oſtrich, and delight ' in viewing them, and enquiring

> Where kinds of unlike form oft blended are
> Into one hideous deformity.

' But he who ſhould commonly carry us to ſuch ſhows, ' would trouble and torment us with the ſight of them. ' So thoſe who pry into other mens imperfections, ' the infamies of extractions, and the faults and errors happening in families, ought to call to mind ' as the former, that ſuch obſervations have neither ' conduced to their pleaſure nor profit.

'cenſure and ſtigmatize men for that veneration, which they juſtly pay to antiquity, the parent
'of arts.'

In anſwer to this difficulty, I ſay, Sir, that I do not think my deſign to be dangerous in that reſpect; and therefore this ſentence might reaſonably be applied to me,

> Periculoſæ plenum opus aleæ
> Tractas, & incedis per ignes
> Suppoſitos cineri doloſo (u);
>
> A dangerous work you write, and tread
> O'er flames by treacherous aſhes hid. CREECH.

and yet, properly ſpeaking, I could not be called raſh. I do not repreſent authors under the diſadvantageous idea by which ſlanderers characteriſe them; I think they are too reaſonable to take it amiſs, that for the good of the public I ſhould ſhew they have been ſometimes in the wrong. I declare that in doing this I have no deſign to leſſen the glory they have acquired, and that I ſhall carefully abſtain, wherever civility requires it, from all diſobliging terms, with reſpect either to their perſons, or to the main of their work. The fate of a book depends not on ſome little faults, ſcattered up and down in it; nor will they deprive it of its juſt value, or rob the author of the praiſes due to him. The injuſtice and malice of mankind, great as they are, are not grown to ſuch a pitch that the generality of readers will not commend a good book, becauſe there may be a few faults here and there in it. This fine maxim of a Poet of Auguſtus's time will always be true:

> Ubi plura nitent in carmine, non ego paucis
> Offendar maculis, quos aut incuria fudit,
> Aut humana parum cavit natura (w).
>
> If num'rous graces ſhine in what he writes,
> I'll not condemn tho' ſome few faults appear,
> Which common frailty leaves, or want of care. CREECH.

Eſpecially we forgive the faults, though numerous, of thoſe who are the authors of large Dictionaries; and this maxim is particularly to be urged on their behalf,

> Opere in longo fas eſt obrepere ſomnum (x);
>
> Yet if the work be long, ſleep may ſurprize,
> And a ſhort nod creep o'er the watchful'ſt eyes. CREECH.

and in confidence of this I ſhall be the leſs ſcrupulous to criticiſe them, for I ſhould be very ſorry to leſſen the regard which they deſerve. The public is very much indebted to them for the inſtructions they have given with the ſweat of their brows, and with the moſt oppreſſive toil that can be undergone in the productions of the pen. I refer my reader to Mr Morus's preface already cited, where he ſhews that the faults of Scaliger, Salmaſius, and Baronius, ought not to deprive them of the glory they have obtained. You ſee, Sir, the nature of my excuſes: I do not deſign to injure the merit of authors, nor to depart from the rules of civility towards them; and I have ſo good an opinion of their modeſty, and their zeal for the inſtruction of the public, that I do not believe they will reſent the liberty I ſhall take to ſhew wherein they have been miſtaken. Moſt commonly I ſhall not be the diſcoverer of their faults, but only the relater of what others have ſaid. I ſcrupulouſly take care never to appropriate to my ſelf what I borrow from other hands; ſo that the reader may be aſſured, that when I note a fault without citing any author who obſerved it, I knew not of its being ever made public. After all, I do not think I ought to ſhew a greater indulgence to other authors than to my ſelf, and it will appear that I do not ſpare my own faults. In fine, it ought to be conſidered that the intereſt of the public muſt be regarded before that of private perſons; and that an author deſerves no complaiſance, who is ſo unjuſt as to chuſe rather that his faults ſhould be concealed, than the public undeceived. 'Nimis
'perverſè ſe ipſum amat qui & alios vult errare ut error ſuus lateat: quanto enim me-
'lius & utilius, ut ubi ipſe erravit, alii non errent quorum admontui errore careat:
'quod ſi noluerit, ſaltem comites erroris non habeat (y). - - - - - A man muſt have an
'exceſſive degree of ſelf love, who, in order to conceal his error, deſires that other people
'ſhould err as well as himſelf: Is it not much better, and more uſeful to warn other men not
'to fall into the error which he has committed, and by thus warning them, to remove his
'error? But if he does not incline to take ſuch a courſe, let him at leaſt be contented with
'erring by himſelf.'

I know

(u) Horat. Od. I, lib. ii.

(w) Horat. de Art. Poët. ver. 351.

(x) Id. ibid. ver. 360.

(y) Auguſtin. Epiſt. vii, pag. m. 28.

I know not whether it proceeds from my judging of other men by my ſelf; but methinks thoſe authors whoſe miſtakes I ſhall relate civilly, will not be offended at it. For this reaſon I mention ſome faults which concern perſons for whom I have a very great eſteem, and who honour me with their friendſhip. Thoſe whom I ſhall ſpare will have ſome reaſon to complain, becauſe it will be a ſign that I think them incapable of hearkening to reaſon, or unable to bear the ſmalleſt loſs. This laſt motive is not always abſolutely to be rejected: for if there are any authors whoſe faults ought to be concealed, they are chiefly thoſe poor ones whom we could quickly ſtrip to their ſhirts, ſhould we fall upon them; and if there be others whoſe faults ought to be diſcovered, they are principally the great and famous ones, ſince, beſides that their errors are infinitely more contagious than thoſe of indifferent authors, they have ſuch ample ſunds of reputation and treaſures of fame, that an hundred ſhipwrecks could not hurt them. Theſe words of Juvenal may be applied to them for their comfort:

. . . . Non
Tam tenuis cenſus tibi contigit ut mediocris
Jacturæ te mergat onus (z).

(z) Juv. Sat. XIII, ver. 6.

But more Corvinus; thy eſtate can bear
A greater loſs, and not implore thy care:
Thy ſtock's ſufficient, and thy wealth too great
To feel the damage of a petty cheat. DRYDEN.

For this reaſon there are few who retract with leſs reluctancy (a a), or bear cenſure with a better grace, than thoſe who have moſt juſtly obtained the title of great authors (b b). Prepare, Sir, to ſee your ſelf in this Dictionary, if any miſtake has eſcaped you; but I have no hopes of being able to give you this proof of my good opinion of you. You are too exact and penetrating, not to exclude all ſorts of falſhood from your writings; and beſides, you are ſo deeply ſkilled in the Greek and Roman antiquities, that you have taken nothing from them but what is rare and curious; ſo that a man ought to be I know not how much more learned than I am, in order to diſcover whether you have erred or not. If theſe anſwers are not ſatisfactory, I add on one hand, that the inſtruction of the public well deſerves I ſhould ſacrifice my ſelf to the ill humour of ſome private men; and on the other, that I ſhall give but too much occaſion to the authors I cenſure to revenge themſelves. I heartily conſent to a retaliation either from themſelves or their poſterity. I will take it as a kindneſs done me to correct my writings, and to furniſh me with better light; and I beſeech this favour of all my readers. I will endeavour not to commit faults, but am very certain I ſhall commit but too many. The complaint therefore will not lie againſt me, which is urged againſt thoſe critics who print nothing for fear of repriſals [C].

In

(a a) A ſuturis ſe deceptum eſſe Hippocrates memoriæ tradidit, more ſcilicet magnorum virorum & fiduciam magnarum rerum habentium. Nam levia ingenia quia nihil habent, nihil ſibi detrahunt. Magno ingenio multaque nihilominus habituro convenit etiam ſimplex veri erroris confeſſio. - - - Hippocrates hath related that he was deceived by the ſutures (in the ſcull). This was acting like a great man, whoſe reputation could not be hurt by a few miſtakes. For men of ſuperficial parts have nothing to loſe, as they poſſeſs but little. But it becomes a great genius, who, notwithſtanding his faults, will ſtill have a great ſtock of fame, to make a plain and ingenuous confeſſion of his error. Celſus de Medic. lib. viii, cap. iv. See alſo Quintil. lib. iii, cap. vi.

(b b) Nulli patientius reprehenduntur, quam qui maxime laudari merentur. Plin. Epiſt. xx, lib. vii.

[C] The complaint againſt thoſe Critics who print nothing for fear of repriſals.] Regnier in his ninth ſatire, calls upon his cenſors to publiſh ſomething.

Qu'ils facent un ouvrage,
Riche d'inventions, de ſens, & de langage,
Que nous puiſſions draper comme ils font nos eſcris,
Et voir, comme l'on dict, s'ils ſont ſi bien apris,
Qu'ils monſtrent de leur eau, qu'ils entrent en carriere.

Let our cenſurers publiſh a work of theirs, rich in invention, ſenſe, and language; which we may criticiſe, as they do our writings, and may ſee if they can write ſo well as they criticiſe; let them give a ſpecimen of their performances, and enter the liſts with us.

To which he applies the Italian ſtory.

Qu'une fois un paiſant,
Homme fort entendu, & ſuffiſant de teſte,
Comme on peut ayſement juger par ſa requeſte,
S'en vint trouver le Pape & le voulut prier,
Que les Preſtres du temps ſe puiſſent marier,
Afin, ce diſoit-il, que nous puiſſions nous autres
Leurs femmes careſſer ainſi qu'ils font les noſtres.

Once on a time a Peaſant, who, as you may eaſily judge by his requeſt, was a very knowing man, came to the Pope, and begged his holineſs would ſuffer the prieſts to marry, that we laymen, ſaid he, may careſs their wives, as well as they careſs ours.

Martial had thoughts of this nature before in his xciid epigram of the firſt book.

Cum tua non edas, carpis mea carmina, Læli:
Carpere vel noli noſtra, vel ede tua.

Lelius either ceaſe to criticiſe my poems, or publiſh your own.

And he ſaith in the lxivth epigram of the xiith book,

Corrumpit ſine talione cœlebs:
Cæcus perdere non poteſt quod aufert.

The bachelor, who debauches a married woman, is no more liable to retaliation, than a blind man is liable to loſe his ſight.

See Mr Saldenus, pag. 44 & 419, of the treatiſe de libris varioque eorum uſu & abuſu.

You will find a ſupplement to this in the article ARISTARCHUS (3). I have obſerved in another place, that thoſe readers who never write, are very often more rigid and unjuſt in their cenſures, than thoſe who know by experience the pains of compoſition. I think I may ſay there are two things which hinder the univerſal and unmerciful Critics from ſhewing themſelves in print. One is, the fear that every body ſhould fall upon their works, and make them ſuffer the puniſhment of retaliation without mercy: the other that they themſelves perceive that they come not up to the idea of perfection which was the rule of their cenſures. It is eaſier to imagine an high perfection than to find it; and it is the fate of moſt Critics to be able to find fault, and not be able to do better (4): they do not ſeem to have the faculty

(3) ARISTARCHUS the Grammarian, remark [C].

(4) Compare what is above, in the remark [G], of the article ZEUXIS.

VII.
2. That it will cenſure little faults.

In the ſecond place it will be thought very ſtrange that I amuſe my ſelf with cenſuring little matters, where the want of exactneſs is almoſt imperceptible. I have my reaſons for this, Sir: I well foreſaw what would be ſaid of it, and that the minutiſſimarum rerum minutiſſimus ſciſcitator - - - - - a minute examiner of minute affairs, would be applied to me; nevertheleſs I have conſidered that theſe ralleries were to be deſpiſed, and that even the leaſt faults were to be obſerved; for the more we criticiſe things with reaſon, the more we ſhew how difficult it is to be perfectly exact. Now, by carrying the idea of perfect exactneſs ſo high, we oblige authors to be the more upon their guard, and to examine every thing with the utmoſt circumſpection. Man is but too much accuſtomed to fall ſhort of the rules ſet before him (cc); we muſt therefore ſtrain them to as high a pitch as poſſible, if we would have him come near the point of perfection. And moreover, ſince this book may be ſerviceable to thoſe who will compoſe a correct Hiſtorical Dictionary, a work which is very much wanted, I ought to deſcend into particulars with ſome kind of nicety, nay, if they will, with ſome captiouſneſs. It is not out of inclination, but choice, that I inſiſt upon trifles, and I ought to be thanked for it, ſince it is in ſome manner a ſacrificing one's ſelf to the good of others (dd). It is taking a road which does not lead to praiſe, to bring others to a juſt accuracy; and is not this a conſiderable ſacrifice? There are not many people who would make the like, I appeal to Quintilian. 'Sive contemnentes tanquam 'parva quæ prius diſcimus ſtudia . . . . ſeu, quod proximum vero, nullam ingenii 'ſperantes gratiam circa res etiamſi neceſſarias, procul tamen ab oſtentatione poſitas '(ee). - - - - - - Whether this happens becauſe we look down upon our early ſtudies, as little 'and puerile; or, which is more likely, becauſe we do not hope to be praiſed for our parts, 'when we employ them in ſtudies, which, though neceſſary, yet are far from having a ſplendid 'and ſhowy appearance.'

I ſhall ſay ſomething hereafter, that may ſerve as a ſupplement to the diſcuſſion of this ſecond difficulty.

VIII.
3. That it will contain uſeleſs diſcuſſions.

In the third place, I may be charged with giving my ſelf an uſeleſs trouble: for what is it to us, will they ſay, to know whether one Caſſius Longinus has been miſtaken for another; whether he was capitally puniſhed, or only baniſhed? Truly the public is very much concerned for this! What matters it whether Scaliger was angry or not angry with Eraſmus for calling him a ſoldier? and ſo of the reſt. To this, I have a thouſand things to anſwer; and from the multitude of thoughts which now offer themſelves to my mind, I could make a long diſſertation upon this ſubject, which would perhaps be tolerable: but as it is time to conclude, I reduce my ſelf to a few notes; the reſt may appear at another and more ſeaſonable time, or perhaps is unneceſſary, ſince every one may eaſily find it, either by his own meditation or in books.

I ſay then, Sir, that this objection, which might perhaps be a ſolid one, abſolutely ſpeaking, and without reſpect to time and place, is of no force when referred to the age and the part of the world we live in. If men were perfectly reaſonable, they would employ themſelves wholly in the care of their eternal ſalvation; one thing alone would be neceſſary, as our Saviour told Martha, Porro unum eſt neceſſarium (ff), who knows not alſo the good and wiſe maxim, nature is content with a little? Who can doubt but that if we contained our ſelves within the bounds of natural neceſſity, we muſt aboliſh almoſt all the arts as things ſuperfluous? But man can be no longer treated upon that foot; it has been time out of mind his practice to ſeek the conveniences of life, and all ſorts of pleaſures and delights. Among other unneceſſary things, about which the Europeans have been pleaſed to employ themſelves, they deſired to underſtand the Greek and Latin tongues, or at leaſt to know the matters contained in the books which are extant in thoſe two languages. Nor were they content to know in general what is contained in thoſe books, but they would examine whether every thing in them was certain, and whether they could not clear up thoſe paſſages where one antient author contradicts another: and when they have been able to clear theſe difficulties, and thoſe of all ſorts of Hiſtories, they have found it a very agreeable ſatisfaction, have very much diverted their readers, and procured great encomiums to themſelves, though theſe illuſtrations were of no uſe to bring down the price of proviſions, or to keep off cold or heat, rain or hail. It ought not therefore to be deemed an impertinent raſhneſs in me to expoſe, as wares of great value, things which have been rejected by all mankind as uſeleſs; for in this I only fall in with the taſte which I find has long prevailed, and is fully eſtabliſhed. Whether men be in the right or the wrong to be pleaſed that they are not in an error upon any point of Geography, Chronology, or Hiſtory, is nothing to me: I am in no wiſe anſwerable for that; it is ſufficient for my purpoſe, that the public (gg) deſireth exactly to know all the falſhoods that are current, and values theſe diſcoveries (hh).

Let

(cc) Compare with this what has been ſaid above, in remark [F], of the Diſſertation concerning Defamatory Libels.

(dd) See, above in remark [B], of the article ANTESIGNANUS, what Eraſmus has ſaid of the laborious taſk of compoſing Dictionaries.

(ee) Quint. lib. i, in Proœmio.

(ff) Luke x. 42.

(gg) By this word I do not mean that every body is pleaſed with the ſame confutations, but that ſome are pleaſed with one ſort, and others with another.

(hh) If it is not neceſſary to know them, neither is it neceſſary to be ignorant of them. Scaliger, at the beginning of his notes on Catullus, has this ſaying, Etſi candide lector, hoc epigrammate patienter carere poteras, habet tamen quod te ſcire melius fuit quàm ignorare. - - - Though, candid reader, thou mighteſt well be without this epigram, yet it contains certain things, which it is better thou ſhouldſt know than be ignorant of. See the News from the Republic of Letters, in the advertiſement of Auguſt 1684. Lipſius was curious of truth, even in the leaſt things: Admirabilis Lipſius alicubi ait ſe cupere etiam in minimis vera ſcire. Epiſtola Hoffm. ad Reneſium, p. 100.

---

faculty of ſpeaking or writing, they are ſo dry and barren (5). The author of this judgment obſerves, That Mr Conrart, who had an excellent judgment and delicate taſte, and whoſe criticiſms were juſt, and penetrating into all the folds and corners of a work, had the prudence to publiſh nothing of his own, and that the few things of his which came out are not very conſiderable.

(5) Vigneul Marville, Melanges d'Hiſt. & de Litterature, Tom. iii, pag. 183, Rouën, Edit. 1701.

Let it not be ſaid that our age, being cured of that critical taſte which reigned in the preceding, looks upon the writings of thoſe who correct falſities, concerning either the particular Hiſtory of great men, or the names of cities, or the like, as mere pedantry; for it is certain, when all things are conſidered, that men were never more devoted than they are at this day to ſuch ſorts of illuſtrations. For one experimental Philoſopher, for one Mathematician, you find an hundred men who throughly ſtudy Hiſtory with all its dependencies; and antiquarian ſcience, I mean the ſtudy of medals, inſcriptions, baſſo relievo's, &c. was never cultivated as it is at preſent. To what does it tend? To the better fixing the time when certain particular facts happened; to prevent one town or perſon from being miſtaken for another; to corroborate the conjectures which have been made upon certain rites of the ancients; and to an hundred other curioſities which the public has nothing to do with, according to the ſupercilious maxims upon which this third difficulty is grounded; maxims that have not diſcouraged a great man (ii), as conſummate in the affairs of ſtate as in the ſtudy of the Belles Lettres, from publiſhing a large book upon the excellence and uſefulneſs of medals.

You, Sir, of all men living are moſt convinced of the impertinence of theſe maxims; they tend to nothing leſs than the ruin of all the liberal arts, and almoſt of all the ſciences which chiefly poliſh and exalt the mind of man (jj). According to theſe fine reaſonings, we ſhould have nothing left but the uſe of Mechanical arts, and as much Geometry as is neceſſary to perfect Navigation, Carriages, Agriculture, and the Fortification of Towns. For Profeſſors, we ſhould have ſcarce any, but Engineers to invent only new ways of deſtroying mankind. It muſt be owned the public has a very great intereſt in all theſe things, ſince by theſe means we may commodiouſly ſtore our towns with plenty, and maintain an offenſive or defenſive war. But it muſt be owned on the other hand, with Cicero's leave (kk), that all the beauties of painting, ſculpture, and architecture, ſerve only to pleaſe the eyes, and to give an agreeable admiration to good judges. The coarſe productions of all thoſe arts ſerve to ſatisfy the neceſſities of men; a man may be ſafely and commodiouſly lodged without the help of the Corinthian or the Compoſit order, without frizes, cornices, and architraves. Much leſs is it neceſſary for the conveniences of life, to know all that is ſaid either of the incommenſurability of the Aſymptotes, or of Magical Squares, or the Duplication of the Cube, &c. The Turks in the midſt of their groſs ignorance, are no leſs robuſt, and ſpend no leſs merrily ten thouſand livres a year, when they have them, than the Chriſtians; and that Governour of Neuhauſel, who after the raiſing of the ſiege of Vienna complained of the perfidy of the French, who had given the King of Poland paſſage through their country (ll), enjoyed the authority of his poſt as agreeably as if he had been better ſkilled in Hiſtory and Geography. So that if a man was allowed to deſpiſe a work which treats not de pane lucrando - - - of earning one's bread, or is of no uſe πρὸς τα ἀλφιτα, for getting victuals, as your good friends the ancient Greeks ſaid, or in ſhort when the public may do without it, there are few books but would be contemptible, and deſerve the blunt ſaying you have doubtleſs read in the life of Malherbe. Mr de Meziriac, attended with two or three of his friends, brought him his commentary on Diophantus; thoſe friends greatly praiſed this book, as very uſeful to the public: Malherbe asked them whether it would bring down the price of bread? Another time he approved the giving recompences to thoſe only who ſerved the King in his armies and public affairs; and he ſaid that a good Poet was no more uſeful to the ſtate than a good player at nine-pins.

It muſt therefore be granted me, that there are a great many productions of the mind of man, which are eſteemed, not becauſe they are neceſſary, but becauſe they divert us: and ſince it is ſo, is it not proper to obſerve the falſities of authors, when there are ſo many men who delight to know the truth, even in things wherein their fortune is not in the leaſt concerned?

Is it not certain that a Shoemaker, a Miller, a Gardener, are infinitely more neceſſary to the ſociety, than the ableſt Painters or Statuaries; than a Michael Angelo, or a Cavalier Bernini? Is it not true that the meaneſt Bricklayer is more neceſſary in a town, than the moſt excellent Chronologer or Aſtronomer; than a Joſeph Scaliger, or a Copernicus? And yet the works of theſe great men which the world might well enough diſpenſe with, are infinitely more valued than the abſolutely neceſſary productions of theſe trades. ' Plus interfuit Reipub. Caſtellum capi Ligurum quàm bene defendi ' cauſam M. Curii. Credo, ſed Athenienſium quoque plus interfuit firma tecta in do' miciliis habere, quàm Minervæ ſignum ex ebore pulcherrimum: tamen ego me ' Phidiam eſſe mallem quam vel optimum fabrum lignarium; quare non quantum quiſ' que proſit, ſed quanti quiſque ſit ponderandum eſt: præſertim cum pauci pingere egre' giè poſſint aut fingere, operarii autem aut bajuli deeſſe non poſſint (mm). - - - - - It ' was more beneficial to the commonwealth that the fort of the Ligurians ſhould be taken, ' than the cauſe of M. Curius ſhould be well defended. I believe it, but it was likewiſe more ' beneficial to the Athenians to have well built houſes, than to have the beautiful ivory ſtatue of ' Minerva. But I would rather be Phidias, than the beſt Carpenter in the world: ſo that ' we are to conſider, not how beneficial every man is, but what real merit he has: eſpecially

(ii) The Baron de Spanheim.

(jj) See the News from the Republic of Letters, September 1684, Art. iv.

(kk) He endeavours in book iii, de Oratore, to prove this poſition, In pleriſque rebus incredibiliter hoc natura eſt ipſa fabricata, ut ea quæ maximam utilitatem in ſe continerent eadem haberent plurimum vel dignitatis vel ſæpè etiam venuſtatis. - - - Nature itſelf has wonderfully contrived that moſt of thoſe things, which are of the greateſt uſefulneſs, ſhould likewiſe have in them very much dignity, and alſo frequently, very much comelineſs and beauty.

(ll) Du Vignau, l'Etat préſent de la Puiſſance Ottomane, pag. 177, Hague edition 1688.

(mm) Cicero, in Bruto.

‘ ſince few men are excellent Painters or Statuaries, whereas there are always workmen and ‘ porters abundance.’ So true it is, that there are things whoſe worth and value is determined only with reſpect to an honeſt diverſion, or a mere ornament of the mind.

IX.
The ſame reaſons which prove the uſefulneſs of other ſciences, prove the uſefulneſs of critical learning.

Here, Sir, you will not fail to foreſee that the enemies to the Belles Lettres will invent an hundred exceptions. As they cannot deny that their maxims tend to revive barbariſm in all reſpects, they will expatiate on the uſefulneſs ariſing from certain ſciences. But they will get nothing by it; for as ſoon as they place in the number of things uſeful, ſuch as have an utility either by reſult or emanation (permit me to uſe this old ſchool diſtinction, ſince it ſo well comprehends both thoſe kinds of acceſſory utilities, which may here be alleged (nn),) they will find themſelves obliged to bring in the Belles Lettres and Critical learning. I can retort all their obſervations againſt them. Here is a ſmall ſpecimen of it.

If they tell me that the moſt abſtract theorems of Algebra are very uſeful to life, becauſe they render the mind of man more capable of perfecting certain arts: I may alſo ſay that a ſcrupulous enquiry into all Hiſtorical facts, is capable of producing very great advantages. I dare affirm, that the ridiculous obſtinacy of the firſt Critics, who laviſhed their time upon trifles, for example, upon the queſtion whether we ought to ſay Virgilius or Vergilius, has by accident been of great uſe; they thereby inſpired men with an extreme veneration for Antiquity; they diſpoſed them to a ſedulous enquiry into the conduct of antient Greece and of antient Rome, and thus gave occaſion to their improving by thoſe great examples. And what effect, Sir, do you think, would not a grave and majeſtic ſentence, taken from Livy or Tacitus, and uttered as having heretofore inclined the Roman Senate to one ſide of a queſtion, have upon hearers thus diſpoſed (oo)? I will not ſcruple to ſay that it is capable of ſaving a nation, and perhaps has ſaved more than one. The Preſident of an aſſembly pronounces thoſe Latin words with an emphaſis; he makes an impreſſion upon their minds by the reſpect they have for the Roman name; every one goes home convinced, and infuſes into his neighbours the ſentiments of obedience; and thus you ſee a civil war ſtifled in its birth. Malherbe had no notion of this when he ſaid, that a Poet is no more uſeful to a nation than a good player at nine-pins: for, not to deſcend to all the good things a Poet can effect (pp), do not you think, Sir, that one of the topping men of a pariſh has often by a ſtanza of Pibrac emphatically pronounced, happily deſtroyed all the contrivances of a factious declaimer? And in domeſtic affairs, do you think that thoſe golden ſentences recommended by Moliere (qq) are always ineffectual? I believe they are often ſo, but not always; and I do not think that Horace, in the verſes I here cite, ſpoke only of an imaginary profit.

Os tenerum pueri balbumque poëta figurat:
Torquet ab obſcœnis jam nunc ſermonibus aurem;
Mox etiam pectus præceptis format amicis:
Aſperitatis, & invidiæ corrector & iræ (rr).

They teach our boys to hate all words obſcene,
To follow gen'rous rules, and ſpeak like men,
And then ſlide gently down with virtuous rules
Into the tender breaſt, and form their ſouls;
Reſtrain their envy, and correct their rage,
Tell them what's good, inſtruct their tender age
With fit examples, and their griefs aſſwage. } CREECH.

It will be ſaid, perhaps, that what ſeems the moſt abſtracted and unfruitful in Mathematics, brings at leaſt this advantage, that it leads us to undoubted truths; whereas Hiſtorical diſcuſſions, and enquiries after human actions, leave us always in the dark, and always ſome ſeeds of new diſputes. But how imprudent it is to harp upon this ſtring! I maintain that Hiſtorical truths may be carried to a greater degree of certainty than what Geometrical truths are brought to, provided we conſider theſe two ſorts of truths in the kind of certainty peculiar to them. I explain myſelf. In the diſputes that ariſe betwixt Hiſtorians, to know whether a certain Prince has reigned before or after another; it is ſuppoſed on both ſides that a fact has all the reality and exiſtence of which it is capable out of our underſtanding, provided it be not of the nature of thoſe related by Arioſto and other fabulous authors; and no regard is had to the difficulties alledged by the Sceptics, to make it doubtful whether the things which ſeem to exiſt do really exiſt out of our minds. Thus an Hiſtorical fact is placed in the higheſt degree of certainty that can belong to it, when once we have been able to prove its apparent exiſtence: for no more is required for this ſort of truths; and it were denying the common principle of diſputants, and going from one kind of things to another, to bid us prove not only that it appeared to all Europe that a bloody battle was fought at Senef in the year 1674; but alſo that the objects are ſuch ad extra - - - out of our underſtanding as they appear to us to be. Thus we are delivered from the importunate cavils which the Sceptics (nn) Here I give a greater latitude to this Diſtinction than the ſchools.

---

(oo) Compare with this Seneca's xcivth epiſtle. I have cited above ſome part of it in remark [B], of the article ARISTO.

(pp) Horat. Epiſt. I, lib. ii, reckons them up. See, below, citation (rr).

(qq) Moliere, Comédie du Cocu imaginaire.

(rr) Horat. Epiſt. I, lib. ii, ver. 126.

Sceptics call reaſons for ſuſpending our aſſent; and though Hiſtorical Scepticiſm cannot be rejected in a great many facts, it is certain there are ſeveral others which we can prove with a full certainty; ſo that Hiſtorical enquiries are not fruitleſs in that reſpect. We certainly ſhew the falſity of ſeveral things, the uncertainty of ſeveral others, and the truth of ſeveral others: and thus you have ſome demonſtrations which may be of uſe to many more people than Geometrical ones; for few people have a taſte for theſe, or find occaſion to apply them to the reformation of manners: but it will be confeſſed, Sir, that a great many people may profit, morally ſpeaking, by the reading of a collection of Hiſtorical falſhoods, well proved to be falſhoods, though it were only by growing more circumſpect in judging of other men, and more capable of avoiding the ſnares which ſatire and flattery lay on all ſides for the unwary reader. Now, is it of no uſe to correct the bad inclination we have to make raſh judgments? Is it of no uſe to learn not to believe lightly what we ſee in print? Is it not the very nerve and ſinew of prudence not to believe haſtily? Νῆφε καὶ μέμνασ' ἀπιστεῖν· ἄρθρα ταῦτα τῶν φρενῶν. Sobrius eſto atque illud teneto nervos atque artus eſſe ſapientiæ non temere credere (ss). - - - - Be vigilant, and remember, that not to believe haſtily is the nerve and ſinew of wiſdom.

In vain ſhould we ſeek for theſe moral advantages in the moſt refined books of Algebra. Beſides, by the leave of the Mathematicians, it is not ſo eaſy for them to arrive at that certainty which is neceſſary in the Mathematics, as it is for Hiſtorians to arrive at that certainty which is ſufficient in Hiſtory. No ſolid objection will ever be made againſt this truth of fact, that Cæſar vanquiſhed Pompey; and whatever principles we diſpute upon, nothing will ſtand more immovably than this propoſition, Cæſar and Pompey have exiſted, and were not a mere modification of the minds of thoſe who wrote their lives. But as for the object of Mathematics, it is not only very hard to prove that it exiſts out of our mind, but it is very eaſy to prove that it can be nothing but an idea of our mind (tt). And indeed the exiſtence of a ſquare circle without us, ſeems not much more impoſſible, than the exiſtence of the circle of which Geometry gives us ſo many fine demonſtrations; I mean, of a circle from the circumference of which, to its centre, as many ſtrait lines may be drawn as there are points in that circumference. It is manifeſt, that the centre, which is but one point, cannot be the common ſubject where there terminate as many different lines as there are points in the circumference. In a word, the object of Mathematics being points abſolutely indiviſible, lines without breadth or depth, and ſurfaces without depth; it is evident that this object cannot exiſt out of our imagination. Thus it is metaphyſically more certain that Cicero has had a being out of the underſtanding of any other man, than it is certain that the object of Mathematics exiſts out of our underſtanding. I omit what the learned Huetius (uu) has repreſented to theſe gentlemen, to teach them not ſo much to undervalue Hiſtorical truths.

The abſtracted depths of Mathematics, it may be ſaid, give us ſublime ideas of the infinity of God. Be it ſo: But do you think that a great moral good may not reſult from a Critical Dictionary? The infallible Oracle affirms, that ſcience puffeth up; and therefore there is no caſe wherein it is more important to humble the pride of man than in this. He who mentions pride mentions the fault which is the moſt remote from true virtue, and the moſt diametrically oppoſite to the ſpirit of the goſpel. Now what could be imagined more proper to give man a true notion of the emptineſs and vanity of the ſciences, and of the weakneſs of his underſtanding, than to ſhew him the numberleſs falſe facts with which books abound. A great many men of letters, the moſt penetrating and ſublime wits, have made it their buſineſs for many years to illuſtrate Antiquity. That taſk of the Critics having the actions of men for its object, ſhould be more eaſy than that of the Philoſophers, which has the actions of God for its object, and yet the Critics have given ſo many proofs of human infirmity, that one may compoſe large volumes of their falſhoods. Theſe volumes may therefore mortify man with reſpect to his greateſt vanity, I mean his knowledge or ſcience. Theſe are ſo many trophies or triumphal arches erected to human ignorance and infirmity.

Hence you ſee, Sir, that the ſmalleſt falſities will here have their uſe, ſince by the very collection of numerous lies upon every ſubject, man will be the better taught to know his weakneſs, and ſee the prodigious variety his errors are capable of. This will make him more ſenſible that he is the ſport of malice and ignorance; that one ſeizes him when the other leaves him; that if he be intelligent enough to know a lie, he is wicked enough to vent it againſt his conſcience; or if he is not wicked to this pitch of propagating falſhood, he is blind enough not to diſcern the truth. For my own part, when I think that perhaps I ſhall make it my ſerious employment for all my life to gather materials for this kind of triumphal arches, I find my ſelf thoroughly penetrated with the conviction of my nothingneſs. This will be a continual leſſon to me of ſelf-contempt. No ſermon, no not of the Eccleſiaſtes, or Preacher, by way of excellency, could more firmly rivet in me this grand maxim (ww), I have ſeen all the works that are done under the ſun, AND BEHOLD ALL IS VANITY AND VEXATION OF SPIRIT (xx). You ſee how conceited I am of my own work: I ſhall think worſe

of

(ss) Epicharmus, apud Ciceronem, Polybium, Lucianum, &c.

(tt) See, above, the article of ZENO, the Epicurean Philoſopher, remark [D], towards the end.

(uu) Præfat. Demonſtrat. Evangel.

(ww) Eccleſiaſt. i. 14.

(xx) Compare with this what is ſaid by Vigneul Marville, Melang. Tom. iii, pag. 206, & ſeq. and pag. ult. edition of Roüen, 1701.

of it than any body elſe, and I eſteem that circumſtance more than all the reſt.

I was going to finiſh with this moral reflexion, when I remembered I had not intimated that I ſhall uſe the ſame liberty and civility towards all authors, of whatever nation or religions they may be; I therefore declare it here. Nothing is more ridiculous than a Dictionary where the author turns Controverſiſt. This is one of the greateſt faults of Moreri's Dictionary: we find in it an hundred places that ſeem to be taken from a true cruſade ſermon. For my part, I ſhall not ſay with Hannibal, Hoſtem qui feriet mihi erit Carthaginienſis, quiſquis erit (yy) Civis (zz): - - - I ſhall look upon him, whoever he be, who ſlays an enemy, as a citizen of Carthage: but rather that all thoſe who depart from truth ſhall be equally ſtrangers to me. You know ſome people who will complain of this, but who will rejoice at it in the bottom of their ſoul, becauſe it will furniſh them with pretexts for ſlander, and for playing the zealots, two things which in theſe perſons always go together. But though there are not many civilities that paſs between us, I ſhall go on my uſual way, let them ſay what they will, and ſhall not envy them the bones they may find to pick in it. Here is the reaſon of my proceeding after this manner.

As this Dictionary does not concern errors in reaſoning, partiality in it would be incomparably more inexcuſable than in Hiſtorical Dictionaries; for a man is obliged in theſe to relate a thouſand things which are true in the judgment of ſome, and falſe in that of others: he ought therefore to ſuppoſe a great difference of principles in readers, and to imagine that in the hands of ſome he will be in an enemy's country, and in the hands of others among friends; and for that reaſon it is juſt he ſhould proportion his ſtile and way of deciding accordingly. But when a man only propoſes to collect errors of fact, he reaſonably ſuppoſes that all his readers have the ſame principles, and that there is no man but will admit as falſe what he ſhews to be ſo: for the proofs of a falſity in fact are not the prejudices of a particular nation or particular religion, but maxims common to all men. You hereby ſee, Sir, that Philoſophical or Theological falſities enter not into the plan of my work: however it is true that books wherein they are diſcuſſed might furniſh out a kind of falſities in fact, which would not perhaps be the leſs uſeful to the reader.

It moſt commonly happens that diſputes in writing upon any point of doctrine degenerate into perſonal altercations, and for the moſt part turn only upon the queſtion, whether an adverſary's paſſage has been well or ill cited, well or ill interpreted. Here the public abandons the diſputants, and, as was not long ſince ſaid by a man of wit, the antagoniſts are obliged to part for want of readers or Bookſellers. If any body had patience enough to make an analyſis of theſe perſonal quarrels, he would have a great many faults within the province of this Dictionary, many falſe citations, or falſe interpretations. Now theſe are errors in fact. You will own, Sir, there could be no Logic comparable to this, to teach the juſtneſs of reaſoning; beſides this great moral advantage, that we ſhould at the ſame time diſcover a great many frauds, or at leaſt the imperfections of our ſouls; for what proceeds not from inſincerity, muſt ariſe from dimneſs or weakneſs of mind.

It is a misfortune that frauds of this kind ſhould go unpuniſhed ſo much as they do, by the little care that readers take to compare the anſwers and replies together. But if any one took the pains to deſcribe in a few words the progreſs of a diſpute, he would bring to light all the windings and turnings of the caviller, and make them deteſted.

Pardon me, Sir, ſo long an Epiſtle Dedicatory, and make haſte to enrich the Republic of Letters with the learned works they expect from you. Your modeſty and our friendſhip forbid me to praiſe them: but I could gladly wiſh the public might ſoon give you the praiſes you will receive when they ſhall appear. I am with the greateſt attachment

SIR,

Your moſt humble and moſt obedient ſervant,

May 5, 1692. * * * * * *

Note, that in the compoſing of this Dictionary I have not followed all the ideas of this Plan. The deference I had to the advices I received from ſome intelligent readers made me follow another method in certain matters.

(yy) Thus Cicero, Orat. pro Corn. Balbo, pag. m. 979, relates the words of Ennius; but to make it a verſe it ſhould be ferit, and not feriet.

(zz) Some Critics would have it read cujati' ſiet.

REMARKS

ON

A PAMPHLET

INTITULED,

The judgment of the public, and particularly of the Abbot Renaudot, on Mr Bayle's Critical Dictionary.

MY principal deſign in this piece is to acquaint the public, that I am preparing a defence, which to every unprejudiced reader will demonſtrate the injuſtice of my cenſurers. But that Apology not deſerving the fate of looſe ſheets, which commonly do not outlive the week in which they firſt appear, I keep it to be placed at the beginning or end of a book in folio (1). For the ſame reaſon I refer to it almoſt every thing conſiderable that may be ſaid againſt the pamphlet which is juſt publiſhed. Here I confine myſelf to a few obſervations made in haſte and negligently. It would be prodigal in a writer to beſtow ornament and ſtile on a piece, like this, of ſeven or eight pages.

I. That libel has a very improper title: it ought to be intituled, The judgment of the Abbot Renaudot commented upon by the publiſher; for all the other judges are leſs than phantoms: they are inviſible beings, no body knows whether they are black or white. Therefore their evidence and a cypher are of the ſame value. I except the agents of the States of Holland; but upon this point, I beg the reader to take notice of what I ſhall mention hereafter of Tertullian.

II. What manner of proceeding is this! to make the judgment of the public conſiſt in ſuch pieces. I could produce a great many much ſtronger in my favour, if modeſty would permit. And beſides, how many letters could I produce, wherein my adverſary is repreſented both as a bad writer, and a bad man. But God forbid that I ſhould imitate him in the uſe he makes of what people write one to another in confidence. This is a conduct deteſted by the Heathens themſelves. What kind of people have we here? One writes what he pretends to have heard a Biſhop ſay, and the other publiſhes it to the world. Neither aſks his permiſſion. They name him without it. Can any thing be more audacious? And is not this tyrannizing over converſation, more than ever Phalaris did over the people?

III. The author of this pretended Judgment of the Public has not been very wiſe in the choice he has made. He conceals the names of all his witneſſes, except one whom he ought chiefly to have concealed, a name odious and deſpiſed in all the countries which are at war with France. I will not take advantage of the prepoſſeſſion of the public: I will not conſider him with regard to his Gazette, which every where diſcredits him, as a man who has got a habit of giving a malicious turn to lies. I will conſider him on his fair ſide. The Abbot Renaudot has the character of a very learned man, and of having a taſte ſo delicate, that nothing can pleaſe him. We can therefore conclude nothing from his contempt of any thing: It is an equivocal proof. I have been told likewiſe that he is exceedingly devout. We muſt not therefore be ſurprized that he finds ſome things too free, which at bottom do not go beyond the liberties an honeſt man may allow himſelf, after the examples of ſo many great authors. Can a ſevere Moraliſt, Tertullian for inſtance, find in the houſe of a gentleman, any thing remote enough from luxury? It is no matter though the public be charmed with the good order obſerved in it. Let the miſtreſs of the houſe go to plays and balls but now and then: let her engage in gaming only upon certain occaſions. Let the world applaud the modeſty of her dreſs and converſation. Tertullian, notwithſtanding, exclaims that ſhe is immodeſt; ſhe ſhows too much her breaſt and her arms; ſhe wears ribbons, and dances, and rallies ſometimes. And this is enough to damn her. It is not by the taſte of ſuch a cenſurer that we are to judge whether the commentary of a layman on the Hiſtory of particular perſons be not ſometimes in too worldly a dreſs; for by following ſuch a taſte, though conformable to the rigorous laws of the goſpel, we muſt baniſh all romances, and a great many other books which the civil laws authorize, and muſt compoſe works of piety only. It may be ſaid that ſome perſons, who are not Rigoriſts, find in my Dictionary a few gayeties ſomewhat too ſtrong. But the Apology I am preparing, will, I hope, give full ſatisfaction on that head. I ſhould make another Apology for what Abbot Renaudot calls Impieties; but as I know not upon what the accuſation is grounded, I ſhall defer it till I am better informed. I have declared on all occaſions, and I do here publickly declare, that if there are any heterodox opinions in my work, I am the firſt who will deteſt them, and that I will throw them out in my ſecond edition. I only want to have them pointed out to me. As to the article of DAVID, the Abbé is much in the wrong to ſay that I have there ſhewn no reſpect for the Scripture: ſince the explanation I have joined to it, is full of a moſt reſpectful ſubmiſſion to that divine book. For this I appeal to all my readers. I add that in the way I propoſe to reviſe that article, it will furniſh my cenſurers with no further pretence of declamation. After all, will any of them be ſo bold as to ſay that my Dictionary comes near the licentiouſneſs of Montagne's Eſſays, either with regard to Scepticiſm, or obſcenities? But did not Montagne publiſh ſeveral editions of his book, without being called to an account for it? Has it not been printed a hundred times over? Was it not dedicated to the great Cardinal de Richelieu? Has it not a place in every library? What a hardſhip and injuſtice would it be; if I was denied that liberty in Holland, which Montagne enjoyed in France?

---

(1) That Apology was placed at the end of the ſecond edition of the Critical Dictionary, and contains the IV Explanations which follow theſe Remarks.

IV. If ever I anſwer Abbot Renaudot's judgment, it will only be after being aſſured that he owns it to be his, ſuch as it is printed: for it is ſo full of blunders, falſhoods, and impertinences, that I imagine it not to be agreeable to the original: ſome ſpurious things have perhaps been foiſted into it in copying. He had prejudiced a great many people: but ſome judicious men having read my Dictionary, quickly put an end to that prejudice. The Abbot himſelf is not ignorant of this: for he ſays in one of his letters that I ought to be ſatisfied with the approbation of ſo many people. And ſo I am. People were ſurprized to find ſo many idle things in his report. The only queſtion was whether my book contained any thing which could offend the Church of Rome, or France. They did not aſk him whether I had read the beſt authors, or whether I equal the Moderns with the Antients. If ſeveral of my readers have contradicted him with reſpect to my ignorance, I diſown them. He has not ſaid enough on that head; I know a great deal more of it, and if he has a mind to draw my picture in that light, I will furniſh him with a good many memoirs. But I beg leave to tell him that he has not well choſen his proofs of my incapacity; for example, when he would prove it by my tranſlating Librarii, Bookſellers, he cenſures me moſt unjuſtly, ſince in a marginal note I have apprized the reader that by Librarii, muſt be underſtood the Tranſcribers and Bookbinders, according to the cuſtom of fitting up books at that time (2). I did therefore underſtand the thing as it ought to be underſtood. I do not impute to him the impertinence of the marginal note which is made on this paſſage of his report, publiſhed in this town. That muſt be laid to the charge of the publiſher *.

V. He has publiſhed the Abbot's paper with little judgment, for it fully proves the untruth of thoſe accuſations, which he has ſo often trumpeted out againſt me, of my holding a correſpondence with the court of France. A chimera which no man but himſelf could have deviſed: and for this he would have made reparation to the public at the end of this piece, which he has printed, and which ſo fully juſtifies my innocence, if it was poſſible for him to act the part of an honeſt man. But on this head he is profoundly ſilent, and has only laboured to throw a rank poiſon upon what I advanced in favour of the Proteſtants, and againſt the Church of Rome. Sure he muſt be an enemy to the edification of his neighbours, ſince he deprives the Proteſtants of that which Abbé Renaudot's judgment affords them; and in order to do ſo, copies himſelf twenty times over, repeating calumnies frequently detected, and which he never ſupported but by heaping falſhoods upon falſhoods, as it appears by the long catalogues of them, which were publickly pointed out to him.

VI. I ſhall take a little notice of his reflexions. In theſe he only gives a looſe to ſpleen and paſſion: they are either rambling judgments, the fallacies of which an intelligent reader will perceive of himſelf, or calumnies refuted a hundred times, or new lies which do not deſerve to be refuted, or which ſhall be ſo on a proper occaſion. Upon the whole, after having declaimed ſo long, it will appear that he himſelf is confounded by the three examples he produces. He alledges a compariſon on the fall of Eve, a paſſage of St Paul applied to the Abelians, and a phraſe on the deſign of Abelard. The firſt example is an objection which I propoſed to the Socinians, and expreſſed with that caution which the ſubject required, or an objection which I ſuppoſe the Manichees make to the Jeſuits. There is not the leaſt profanation in the ſecond, nor any obſcenity in the third. This I ſubmit to the judgment of any impartial and intelligent reader, and am willing that he decide it without hearing me. Such is the common fate of declaimers. While they only make general complaints, they gain people over to their ſide by ſurprize; but bid them point to a particular paſſage, and it then appears that they miſapprehended the matter, that they miſtook for my opinions the conſequences

(2) See citation (38), in the article ATTICUS.

* Mr Jurieu's marginal note ran thus. This word (Librarii) ſignifies what weighs a pound; Libraria fruſtra; pieces weighing a pound. REM. CRIT.

ſequences reſulting from thoſe Hereſies which I attack, and made mountains of mole-hills. This obliges me to give them a charitable word of advice. Gentlemen, I tell you as a friend, never ſpeak of my Dictionary but before people who have it not; for if it is produced, and you are obliged to prove your aſſertions, you will be catched. This happens to ſome of you every day. You have not been artful enough; paſſion has blinded you, your hyperboles made people expect to find in every page, ſome abominable things, like thoſe in the Parnaſſe Satirique, whereas nothing was found in it, but ſuch trifles as are ſaid every day in good company, and ſuch as you yourſelves might very well ſay, either when you take a walk, or are at table with your friends. Give over exaggerating; ſay rather too little, than too much. Such a way of hurting will not recoil on you.

VII. We may add to the three examples he quotes what he alledges againſt the article wherein I recite ſome paſſages of a book of Tagereau (3). He could not chuſe a worſe ſubject for the ground of his objections; for I ſhall make it appear on a proper occaſion that I was fully authorized to inſert in my work, what I have ſaid concerning the congreſs. As an Hiſtorian I might ſay, that Quellenec was accuſed of impotence, and that it was his mother-in-law, and not his wife, who commenced that law-ſuit. Indeed I owed this remark to the memory of an heroine of our party. It became me, as a faithful Hiſtorian, to cenſure thoſe who ſully the glory of that lady, by ſuppoſing that at ſo early an age ſhe raiſed ſuch a law-ſuit. This is declaring that I do not at all think it reputable in a woman to engage in ſuch proceedings. Every author has a right to declare the reaſons of his ſentiments. Thus, as a Commentator on my own text, I might and ought to offer the proofs of the opinion which I advanced, and by conſequence relate what Tagereau publiſhed againſt the practice of that time. We would appear wiſer than our fathers, and we are not ſo wiſe as they were. That Advocate of the Parliament of Paris readily obtained a privilege for publiſhing a book wherein he deſcribed all the filthineſs of the congreſs; and ſhall a clamour be raiſed in Holland againſt an author who copies a few paſſages of that book? Is not this a reſpect of perſons, proceeding either from a very fantaſtical mind, or a bad heart?

VIII. But it may be ſaid, that author publiſhed thoſe particulars only with a view of obliging the judges to put a ſtop to a cuſtom inconſiſtent with modeſty and liable to iniquitous practices. And do not I declare, even with the greateſt indignation, that the cuſtom was infamous, becauſe it weakened the principles of modeſty, the moſt precious ſource of chaſtity? Is it poſſible for a man to take the honeſt ſide with greater warmth than I have done in that article.

Beſides, had I not, as an Hiſtorian, the right to relate a practice which continued long in the juriſdiction of the Parliament of Paris, and which is not yet aboliſhed in any other place. The manner of proceeding in all civil and criminal cauſes belongs unqueſtionably to Hiſtorical facts, and if there is any thing ſingular in it, many travellers and many writers of relations are curious to be informed of it. What pleaſure would it have been to a Pietro della Valle to find a book in Perſia, which would have informed him of an extravagant cuſtom, ſo well as Tagereau's book might inform him of the ceremonial of the congreſs. I aſk whether the verbal proceſſes of Juries and Matrons, in ſome caſes, are pieces to be rejected by thoſe who would make complete collections of all the uſes and cuſtoms of a country? Furetiere, who did not write an Hiſtorical Dictionary, with comments on it, but only a Grammatical one, made uſe of theſe verbal proceſſes. And did any body complain of it?

IX. Let me not diſmiſs this ſubject without acquainting our bawlers, copiers, and diſtributers of extracts of letters, that Dr Menjot, with whom perhaps they were particularly acquainted, and who was a very honeſt man, has inſerted many leud things in his Diſſertation on the Furor Uterinus, and barrenneſs. It would be ridiculous to cenſure him for it, becauſe, as a Phyſician, he had a right to do ſo: his ſubject required, or allowed it. Now I muſt inform them that a compiler who relates and comments, has all the rights of a Phyſician, and of an Advocate, &c. as occaſion requires, and may uſe their verbal proceſſes, and their terms of art. If he gives an account of the divorce of Lotharius and Tetberga, he may publiſh extracts from Hincmar, Archbiſhop of Rheims, who wrote the impurities which were averred in that trial. We ought never to cenſure an Hiſtorian Commentator, 'till after being inſtructed in the laws of Hiſtory, and the privileges of a commentary. Had theſe gentlemen read Andrew Tiraquellus's commentary on the laws of matrimony, they would have found in it obſcenities in much greater number. Yet he was a Counſellor of the Parliament of Paris, and one of the moſt illuſtrious men of the laſt century, both on account of his knowledge and his virtue.

X. Obſerve that it becomes no man leſs than my adverſary to declaim againſt me: he, who in a ſermon, which laſted almoſt two hours, criticized the conduct of the patriarch Jacob; he, whom a Synod cenſured for having been too free with the dignity of prophecies; he, from whoſe books a liſt of profane propoſitions was extracted, and ſent to a Synod: he, who had inſerted ſo many impurities in his anſwer to Maimbourg, that he was forced to ſuppreſs a part of them upon the remonſtrances of two magiſtrates; he, who in a ſevere criticiſm on a book of Abbot Dangeau uſed ſeveral licentious expreſſions; he, who revived and bought out of a regiſtry-office, the moſt monſtrous obſcenities that can be read, and filled a caſe with them; he, whoſe myſtical Theology would pollute the moſt obdurate imagination; he, in ſhort, who, rejecting the way of authority, avows that the way of inquiry and examination is impracticable. He therefore accuſes his own doctrine of Atheiſm in another perſon.

(3) In the article QUELLENEC.

XI. Never was romance more fabulous than what he ſays of the pretended hopes which I founded on my Dictionary. It is falſe that my friends did before-hand extol it with the triumphant airs he imputes to them. They are too judicious to fall into ſuch a miſtake. And for myſelf, ſo far was I from expecting any advantage by it, that I ſaid and wrote on a hundred occaſions to thoſe who ſpoke to me of it, that it was only a rhapſody, that there would be a good deal of traſh in it; and that the public would be very much diſappointed if they looked for any thing better than an irregular compilation; that I was but little able to confine myſelf, and having the greateſt indifference for praiſe, the fear of being criticized did not hinder me from running full career wherever my fancy guided; that being an author of no conſequence, pretending to nothing leſs than to dogmatize, I gave a looſe to my thoughts, ſuch as they were, ſometimes one way, ſometimes another, being perſuaded that no body would read them but by way of amuſement, that is, that they would only ſerve to unbend the mind, tired with the reading of many other things ſerious, curious, and uſeful, which I have collected with great patience, but without hoping that the world would mind in my favour that candid maxim, Ubi plura nitent in carmine, non ego paucis Offendar maculis, &c. The ſucceſs was beyond my hopes. A great many critical readers followed that rule. I only began to think the work not ſo deſpicable as I had imagined, when I obſerved how eagerly and how buſily ſome people went about to diſcredit it, and with what exceſſive pains the partiſans of a cabal, as formidable by its extent as by its credit, wrote one to another letters on that ſubject, and copied extracts of letters handed about among the whole fraternity, and every where elſe.

XII. As to the employments which he affirms I expected in the Republic of Letters by means of my Dictionary, I anſwer that he is as much miſtaken in this, as he was in ſaying that Mr Arnauld had done certain things, in order to recover his benefices. He then received a mortification which ought to have made him more cautious. Had he peruſed my preface, he would have known my diſpoſition with regard to employments. He may make himſelf very eaſy on that head. I never would take any employment, and will have none. My inclinations have been ſounded many ways, and from different places, during the printing of my work, and they always found that I would not depend on any body, nor part with the full liberty which I enjoyed of diſpoſing of all my time. It is only by his extracts that I am informed of a report which went that a Miniſter had made an attempt of this kind at Amſterdam. I believe it to be falſe: but let that be as it will, it was a thing which never entered into my thoughts, and which I would have refuſed.

XIII. Let us come to the main article, to the favourite, the darling, paſſage of our cenſurer, that which chiefly induced him to draw his pen: This was ſurely his real motive; in ſhort, it is that paſſage, where, with triumphant airs, he glories in having reduced me to live on the penſion of a Bookſeller. There cannot be a better picture of his pride: his ambition is ſo refined and ſo conſpicuous, that it incites him to wiſh above all things for the latter part of Sylla's epitaph. Soon after he ſhews a great deal of joy in imagining that I am completing my own ruin. This is very ingenuous: It would be very wrong to accuſe him of counterfeiting the honeſt man and the good paſtor, never was any man leſs dextrous in hiding his foible. But what is become of my penſions from the court of France? Have they been ſtopped? and even if it was ſo, could a Philoſophical life like mine have ſunk all that fund? How; no reſerve for futurity: nothing remaining but the penſion of a Bookſeller! Very hard indeed. I knew not that my income was ſo well or ſo ill computed. A thouſand diverting things might be ſaid of him, with regard to his Bookſellers: But it would be a pity to place them in this piece, which will as well as his, be thrown aſide among the rubbiſh of libraries in a day or two: Such is the fate of looſe ſheets.

XIV. He boaſts of having done me more harm than any man living, by diſcovering me to the world. He is ſurely a very fit perſon to hurt a man by his accuſations. I refer him to the Synodal aſſembly of the Brill, which declared the ſame Mr Saurin orthodox, againſt whom he had written two volumes full of defamation, almoſt as black as that which he has publiſhed againſt me. He was confident that he ſhould get Mr Saurin depoſed, and had long caballed about it. But he had the confuſion to ſee him acquitted. After ſuch a diſgrace, any man but my detractor would have hid himſelf in an hermitage, during the reſt of his life. But as for him he has publickly declared that he perſiſted in his ſentiment, notwithſtanding the decree of the Synod, and now boaſts to have been the accuſer. What value ought we to have for his judgment? Would not the man be very ſimple, who ſhould mind his calumnies?

XV. The pleaſure of boaſting that he had done me a prejudice, was the more agreeable to him, as he expected to make a great advantage of his boaſts: for he fancied that what I had written againſt him in my Dictionary would do him no prejudice, provided the public knew that I was prompted to it by a ſpirit of revenge. I make two Remarks againſt his cunning. He is miſtaken both in his ſuppoſition, and his inference.

I have always believed, and am ſtill perſuaded, that he had no ſhare in the ſuppreſſion of my employment, but as a remote cauſe. Indeed he was very buſy, for two or three years, to bring it about, but had not ſome perſons of his cloth, and of another language, whoſe enmity he had formerly diſcovered to me, been active in it, his labour would have been in vain. Be it as it will, that ſuppreſſion gave me ſo little uneaſineſs, that I never harboured the leaſt reſentment againſt any body concerned in it. I bleſs the day and the hour when it happened, and ſhall all my life lament my loſs of the time which was ſpent in ſuch employments. He will hardly believe me, becauſe he knows very well that he would mortally hate thoſe who ſhould leſſen his ſalary, notwithſtanding that the greateſt part of it was continued; notwithſtanding, for inſtance, that the ſalary of a preacher was left him, and that he was only ſtripped of the wages of a Profeſſor, which he has enjoyed almoſt ſixteen years, without having given above twenty leſſons in Latin, and a few more in French. Examining his own temper, he cannot think it poſſible for a man chearfully to ſupport the total loſs of his ſalary. But I beg he would not judge of me by himſelf. I am an old faſhioned man, Vir antiqui moris, and not like him of a modiſh turn. I value not the loſs of that ſalary a ruſh. He would therefore do me juſtice, if he believed that I wrote not againſt him from any reſentment. If he refuſes to give credit to my words, let him at leaſt give credit to my actions. Have I not ſpared his name on a thouſand occaſions, and if his friends pretend that I pointed at him, when I ſpoke of certain diſorders, and gave the picture of ſome inquiſitors, ſuch as my reading had furniſhed me with, ought he not to impute it to the misfortune he has of reſembling them, and to the penetration of his friends in diſcovering his reſemblance? Nay, have I not avoided pointing at him on a hundred occaſions which naturally admitted it, as my intelligent readers may eaſily perceive? Have I not commended his Apology of Theodore Beza? Was it known to how many of his falſe quotations and ſophiſms I have given quarter, my moderation would be admired. Did I not vindicate him whenever I thought him wronged? This indeed happened rarely: but it is not my fault. Why, is he not ſuch a perſon that it would be an injuſtice to ſpeak ill of him? He has been againſt all the world, and all the world againſt him: He has undergone all manner of abuſe, complaints, and reproaches: and yet I have ſcarce found any occaſion to criticize his cenſurers. I have ſomewhere applied to him the ſaying of an Emperor, taurum toties non ferire difficile eſt. But now we muſt turn the tables, and ſay, taurum toties ferire difficile eſt. It is very ſtrange that ſo many authors, having pointed their arrows, and exhauſted their quivers againſt his perſon, ſcarce one aim has miſcarried. I ſhould have been glad to diſcover any falſities in his cenſurers; for I would have mentioned them, not only as they were things which came within my province, or agreed with the Plan of my Work, but likewiſe with a view of doing an honour to myſelf. The moſt eminent glory of an Hiſtorian is to do juſtice to his greateſt enemies. This is true heroiſm. By this Thucydides has immortalized his name, more than by all the reſt of his Hiſtory. Therefore, though reaſon and the precepts of the goſpel, had not determined me to take that courſe, it ſhould at leaſt be believed that ſelf-love alone would have induced me to it. Let my adverſary's friends put me to the trial. Let them furniſh me with convincing proofs that his adverſaries have accuſed him falſly, and I promiſe to employ their memoirs to the beſt advantage. But after all, will they ſay, you bring him too often into your Dictionary: not more frequently than Varillas, will I anſwer, nor near ſo frequently as Moreri, two authors with whom I never had any difference. If I ſpeak of him oftener than of many other authors, it is becauſe I am more intimate with his writings. He thinks himſelf happy that I have placed him in my Dictionary; and I am very glad that he is pleaſed with it. Can there be a greater inſtance of my good nature? This is enough againſt his ſuppoſition; I now proceed to the conſequence he draws from it.

XVI. I deny it: for granting that the Remarks which relate to him, proceeded from my deſign to be revenged, the conceſſion would be of no ſervice to him, ſince theſe Remarks are always ſupported by proofs. It is certain that neither of us can be admitted as evidence againſt the other, in any affair whatever. We are not allowed either to judge or to vote. We do not deſerve to be believed when we ſpeak, either againſt the other, but ſo far as we ſolidly prove what we advance. But let our motive to ſeek and employ proofs be what it will, theſe proofs are ſtill of the ſame intrinſic force. This is moſt evident. The reader ought to take particular notice of it.

XVII. This is a full confutation of his laſt writing: There he rails at me in the moſt violent manner, and yet alledges no evidence but his own, if we except the judgment of Abbé Renaudot: and the agent's letter. He produces anonymous letters: the amount of all this is his whole authority. As if he had ſaid to the public, you ought to to believe all this, becauſe I affirm it. And does he know that his evidence is of no manner of authority in my affairs? How dares he then abuſe the patience of the public? Was he to ſay a thouſand times over that he has read my Dictionary, and found impieties and obſcenities in it, his words would be to no purpoſe: for, once more, he can be no evidence againſt me. He is naturally and peremptorily exceptionable. He can only be admitted to copy paſſages, and to prove that they ought to be condemned. If he cannot prove it, he muſt be ſilent. By how much more reaſon ought we not to give a hearing to his reflexions, ſince he owns that he has neither read nor ſeen the Critical Dictionary, and does not let us know the perſons who write to him concerning it. I make no queſtion but that as he is the firſt who ever impoſed, with ſo much aſſurance, upon the public, ſo he will be the laſt; for there is no probability that ſuch monſtrous things will ever be imitated.

XVIII. We have no reaſon to believe that his news-mongers are exact, ſince they tell him that I have abridged Rabelais. I am greatly miſtaken if I have cited him more than once, and had I done it on ſeveral occaſions, I ſhould have only followed the examples of eminent authors. His book does not pleaſe me much; but I know, and my adverſary knows likewiſe, that many perſons of probity and honour have read it over and over, know all the fine paſſages of it, and take a pleaſure in repeating them, when they converſe agreeably with their friends. If ſuch people were to make large compilations, there is no doubt but Rabelais would frequently appear in them.

XIX. The extracts of the News from the Republic of Letters, which are here objected to me, might be the ſubject of a curious Diſſertation. I may perhaps write it one time or other. It would give me an opportunity of clearing myſelf to thoſe who blame me for having beſtowed too great encomiums on the writers whom I mentioned in that journal. One might make a large catalogue of authors who have ſaid many injurious things of thoſe perſons whom they had formerly extolled. He who attacks me on this quarter, would be of the number. He very much praiſed, and afterwards abuſed Mr Simon. He has ſometimes been pleaſed to extol me, and even a little before our quarrel, in one of his caſes againſt Mr de la Conſeillere. But I have ſomething ſtronger than examples to plead: for about twelve years ago, I publickly owned myſelf guilty of a failing, which I have not yet wholly mended. I ſhall by that confeſſion avoid the dilemma he would put me to. It is not a mere invention to ſerve a turn: I take it from a work which I publiſhed at a time when I did not foreſee that I ſhould ever have occaſion for it.

I have ſaid, in the 575th page of the New Letters againſt Maimbourg, that ſeveral books, deſpiſed by men of parts, appeared to me to be good. This want of diſcernment was excuſable: if I was not very young in the world, I was ſo at leaſt in the Republic of Letters. I had begun very late to ſtudy, almoſt never had any maſters, never followed any method, never conſulted on that ſubject either the living or the dead. All this, joined with other obſtacles, rendered me a very young man with regard to learning, and however, I eaſily ſuffered myſelf to be duped by authors. I may even at this time make the ſame acknowledgment that Mr Arnauld made, which I have related in the 577th page of the ſame Letters. There is hardly any book which I do not think a good one, when I read it only for the ſake of reading; to find it's faults, I muſt read it attentively on purpoſe to diſcover them. I never did ſo, while I was writing the News from the Republic of Letters. I was not then acting the part of a Critic, and had put myſelf on the foot of civility. Thus I only obſerved in books what made them valuable. Their defects eſcaped me. If I therefore ſpoke civilly of them, it was not againſt my conſcience; and ſurely at the worſt the rules of civility cleared me from any imputation of blameable flattery. To flatter authors with the views of a paraſite, or from other motives of intereſt, is infamous. But when a man is ſo fully diſintereſted as I was, it is only at the moſt, a little too much civility and complaiſance. And will this be deemed a crime?

In ſuch a diſpoſition of mind it was impoſſible for me to avoid being duped by my adverſary's books. His deciſive manner, his lively ſtile, his chearful, brilliant, fertile imagination unwarily dazzled me. The dangerous illuſions of friendſhip ſtrengthened the charm. Thus his books appeared admirable to me: I thought therefore that in order to do them juſtice, I ought to employ ſtrong expreſſions: for common epithets of praiſe, when they come from an author who has put himſelf on the foot of courteſy and compliment, would only be an ordinary commendation, which is more offenſive to proud authors than being wholly ſilent about them. My readers were not miſtaken in this. They only took for an encomium in my journal that which was expreſſed in the moſt ſuperlative terms. But the charm began to vaniſh, when, being no longer concerned in that journal, I ſeriouſly compared his books with thoſe in which he was refuted. Then I read them critically; I obſerved the weak paſſages of them, and by degrees found many defects. Some time after I was obliged to peruſe them in order to refute ſome of his works. This gave me a complete notion of them, and had a retroſpective effect on his other productions. The ſame thing has happened to me with regard to him, as with regard to Moreri and Varillas, two authors of whom I have been ſucceſſively ceſſively the Admirer and the Critic, according as I read them either by way of amuſement, or with the deſign of equiring into the truth of their writings.

XX. Let us make one remark more. It will not be found that what I blame in his Prophecies, and his Eſprit d'Arnauld, is the ſame with what I formerly commended in theſe pieces. I praiſed the invention, the wit, the turn, the ſtile, the fluency of thoughts, and I now blame the opinions, the ſlanders, &c. which they contain. He has not therefore caught me between the extremes of a baſe flatterer, and an infamous calumniator, as he imagined, according to his inveterate habit of departing from the accuracy of Logic. There is a very wide medium, between theſe two terms. The oppoſition had been more juſt between a Panegyriſt and a rigid Cenſurer. But ſetting Logic aſide, I anſwer to his queſtion, that I formerly commended him very ſincerely; and that I now cenſure him with reaſon, being better informed. Let me give an inſtance of my ſincerity. His book of Prejudices having appeared to me to be inferior to the reſt, I ſpoke more ſparingly of it (which I know he complained of); and as I thought that his Criticiſm on the Abbé Dangeau was defective in ſome paſſages, I cenſured it very frankly.

I can therefore only be blamed for having followed the dictates of an erroneous conſcience: but as theſe are faults which the tribunals of the Republic of Letters doth not pardon, the ſhorteſt courſe I can take is to lament that time of darkneſs, and to confeſs that theſe are productions which ought to be diſowned. I do accordingly diſown them; and this is the beſt reparation I can make.

I need not obſerve that in order to know a man well, we muſt rather view him in thoſe writings, where he is always criticiſed upon good proofs, than in ſuch as praiſe him without aſſigning the proofs of his merit.

September 12, 1697.

Continuation of the REMARKS

ON THE PRETENDED

JUDGMENT OF THE PUBLIC.

THIS is all I thought neceſſary to ſay on that pretended Judgment of the Public, but having peruſed it again, before the preceding Remarks were publiſhed, I have thought it proper to add a few more.

XXI. Let us diſpatch in a few words what the cenſurer objects to me concerning Solomon. I ſaid that a policy in ſome reſpects of the ſame nature with that of the Ottomans occaſioned Adonija*'s death*. This means nothing more but that Solomon put him to death, to the end that he might not be expoſed to the civil-wars, which he had reaſon to apprehend. No body is ignorant that this is likewiſe the reaſon of the Ottomans. Where is the harm of comparing in that reſpect a Jewiſh Prince with Infidel Monarchs, the Sectaries of Mahomet; a Prince, I ſay, who had not yet that wiſdom which God gave him afterwards? Would the author make any ſcruple to ſay that Solomon took ſeveral wives, from an oſtentation like that of Pagan kings, and of Sultans. Obſerve his artifice. He knew that the term Ottomans would not ſtrike the populace, but that the word Turk would alarm them. For this reaſon, inſtead of repeating my words, he has metamorphoſed them into theſe, a Turkiſh policy, which he has quoted in Italics. This is his habitual ſin; every artifice pleaſes him, let it but ſerve to deceive the ignorant. But what will he ſay againſt ſo many authors who maintain that Solomon was perſonally an Idolater, and doubt of his ſalvation. This is much worſe than comparing for once his policy with that of the Turks.

XXII. He accuſes me of having abuſed Cameron and Mr Daillé. Would he have dared to ſay ſo, had he caſt his eye on my Dictionary? Would he not have ſeen there that that Du Moulin his grand-father, and the works of Rivetus, brother-in-law to Du Moulin, furniſhed me with what I ſaid to Cameron's diſadvantage? Would he not have ſeen there that for what concerns Mr Daillé, I quote Mareſius, Paſtor and Profeſſor of Divinity at Groningen, and plainly declare, that I decide nothing on that point? Many people do not yet know the difference between an Hiſtorian and an Encomiaſt. Let us take a ſhort review of the pamphlet, in order to mark ſome of the falſities in fact, which may be found in it; for as to the fallacies in reaſoning, it would be in vain to ſhew them. They are general reproaches: my adverſaries affirm, I deny, and we are juſt where we ſet out: we cannot paſs from this equilibrium, till every propoſition with which they are diſpleaſed, is particularly examined. They ſhall always find me ready to ſatisfy them. I ſhall even give a little ſpecimen of their fallacious reaſonings in the XXVIIIth and XXXIId Remarks.

XXIII. There are ſome falſities in fact in Abbé Renaudot's judgment: I do not point them out; for I know not whether they proceed from him, or from the tranſcribers. Beſides that every reader may eaſily convince himſelf how falſe it is that I beſtow greater encomiums on Mr Abelli, than on Meſſieurs de St Cyran and Arnauld; that I commend Father Maimbourg's Controverſial Treatiſes, more than thoſe of Mr Nicolle, that I blacken the latter, as having publiſhed certain Doctrines which he did not believe. How could I blacken him on that account, ſince I expreſsly ſay that if his ſilence might be aſcribed to ſuch a principle, it might alſo conſiſt with his perſuaſion? I leave to the reader's judgment ſome other falſities of the ſame nature.

XXIV. The Commentary on the judgment of that Abbot, among other falſities, contains this, that it was owing to the war that my Printer obtained by ſurprize his privilege. This lie has more heads than Cerberus; for he ſuppoſes that the States of Holland would have given my book to be examined, had they not been too much employed. A chimerical fancy! As if an order given in two words to ſome Profeſſors at Leyden could have interrupted the application to public affairs. Beſides this, our Commentator ſuppoſes that in times of peace privileges are granted only to ſuch books as have been examined and approved. Another chimera! The States grant them only for the ſecurity of the Printer, and not in the leaſt as a mark of their approbation of thoſe books: for they do not pretend to authorize the contents of them. In fine, never was any privilege obtained leſs by ſurprize than this; for it was not granted till after a long examination of the oppoſition which was made to it by the Printers of Moreri.

XXV. In the firſt extract it is affirmed that I ſuppoſe there was no Hiſtorian of the Moors. But it is manifeſt that I only ſuppoſe we have no particular Hiſtory of Abderamus. In the ſecond extract it is ſaid that I have compoſed my Dictionary by the help of memoirs, which were ſent me from France. I have always given notice from what place I received any materials. If thoſe which I have received from that country were put together, they would not fill ten pages.

XXVI. There is in the ninth extract a particular which I ſhall always look upon as a horrible lie, unleſs I ſee a certificate of it from the Biſhop of Saliſbury. Such a diſcourſe is ſo little conſiſtent with the idea I have of the ſenſe and learning of that prelate, that I cannot believe him capable of holding it. Would a man of his parts find Atheiſtical opinions in a work wherein it is aſſerted on a hundred occaſions that reaſon ought to be ſilent when the word of God ſpeaks? Is not this the ſevereſt principle of Orthodoxy in both communions? I have another reaſon for believing that there are ſeveral lies in this extract. The public has nothing to do with their perſonal differences, ſaid that Prelate with indignation, if we rely on the extract. Is it likely that he ſpoke in that manner, ſince it is notorious that I make no mention of theſe differences? I cenſure my adverſary for the faults which I ſhew in his books, or by general reflexions, which may be applied to him, but I take no notice of our quarrels. In a word, all that I have done, came within the province of an author who writes a Hiſtory accompanied with a Critical Commentary. This muſt be granted me by all thoſe who are thoroughly acquainted with the matter. I have, for example, a full right to alledge, as facts, all the blunders and errors, with which my adverſary has been taxed in Mr Saurin's four volumes. I uſe this example, to ſhew, by the way, how ridiculous his hopes are. He may be made to live in a critical book, not as the mortal enemy of Libertines, but as arraigned and convicted of a thouſand ſhameful blunders, by a famous miniſter, whom a ſynod has declared Orthodox.

XXVII. In the ſecond extract it is affirmed that Abbot Renaudot taxes me with many miſtakes in Hiſtory, Geography, Chronology, and other ſciences. This is not true. He only ſays, 1. That there are many falſities in my work: 2. That in the articles of curious erudition, I commit more miſtakes than Moreri. The falſities he means concern what I ſay either againſt the Popes, &c. or to the glory of the Reformers, &c. By virtue of his prejudices, he preſuppoſes that in thoſe articles there muſt be ſeveral lies. But however they will not be ſuch with reſpect to me, ſince I take them from works which I quote, and declare in my preface, that I only warrant the faithfulneſs of the quotations. He places among thoſe falſities the project of re-union, propoſed to Amyraldus, by the Jeſuit Godebert, in the name of Cardinal Mazarine. It ſhould have been Audebert in the name of Cardinal Richelieu. In this I have only followed the memoir of Amyraldus the ſon, and I have cited it. It is his buſineſs to warrant it. As to the faults in erudition, the Abbot does not ſay, wherein they conſiſt, and conſequently the Publiſher of the extracts proves the raſhneſs of his own witneſſes. He teaches us how to convict them of their having taken upon themſelves to write what they were ill informed of. One of them ſays that I praiſe too much in the opinion of ſeveral people, The Publiſher, on the contrary, maintains that I have abuſed all the world. Behold the perſons, whom he produces to aſſure us of the general opinion.

XXVIII. In the thirteenth extract, it is ſaid, that in the article PYRRHO, and ſeveral others, Libertiniſm is taught in a very dangerous manner, and that I have taken from Meziriac all the obſervations, being ſometimes of a tedious length, which I make on the Heathen gods, and heroes, and the Heathen Mythology. The firſt point cannot be diſcuſſed in a looſe ſheet. It is ſufficient for me to obſerve in this place, that my pretended Libertiniſm is a very ſolid juſtification of our moſt Orthodox Divines. They continually object to the Sectaries that the Socinian principles, tend to Pyrrhoniſm, Deiſm, and Atheiſm. Whereupon I ſay, either you are defamers, or it is moſt true that without captivating our underſtanding to the obedience of faith, we are led by the principles of Philoſophy to doubt of every thing. But you are not defamers, therefore it is true, &c. You complain that I make it appear by evident examples, that you do not calumniate the Socinians. Ought you not rather to thank me for this? Do not you know that in Italy, under the yoke of the Inquiſition, books are printed with impunity, in which it is aſſerted, that, ſetting Revelation aſide, we know not with certainty that there are bodies? And would you impoſe on this country a yoke more galling than that of the Pope. I can prove that at Bologna, at Padua, &c. Profeſſors of Philoſophy have maintained publickly and with impunity, that the immortality of the ſoul can only be proved by Scripture. I ſhall make it appear in the Supplement of this Dictionary, in the article POMPONATIUS, which is already compoſed, that there was never any perſecution worſe founded than that which Pomponatius ſuffered on this account.

With regard to Meziriac, if it is pretended that I have taken any obſervations from him, without quoting him, I am calumniated. Neither he nor any other writer has furniſhed me with any thing which I have not acknowledged, by quoting them, and almoſt always uſing their own words. As the author of the letter does not ſay whether I quoted Meziriac, or not, I cannot accuſe him of giving me the title of a Plagiary: but I impute that lie moſt juſtly to the Publiſher of that extract: for he makes this reflexion on it: One of our extracts ſays, that he has taken from Meziriac on Ovid's epiſtles, all that he ſays of the Heathen gods: and that Meziriac's book is pretty ſcarce. This is his great art: he underſtands books very well: he knows which are ſcarce and which are common: and boldly pillages the former, being ſure that few people will perceive the theft. Here we have an example of the danger which any man runs, when he takes upon him to ſpeak of a book which he has never read. Had the Publiſher of that extract peruſed my Dictionary, I doubt whether he would have preſumed to ſay, that I have pillaged Meziriac. He would have ſeen that I always quote him. In the ſame manner, I have quoted all thoſe who have ſupplied me either with facts or reflexions.

XXIX. I eaſily believe that the Mythological obſervations have appeared pretty tedious: ſome of my acquaintance wrote me the ſame thing, with regard to the Chronological diſcuſſions, and in general to all that may be called erudition. I had foreſeen this, and therefore on a thouſand occaſions I conſidered thoſe things as the cards thrown out of a hand at piquet. I diſcarded them and took in other cards, weaker indeed, but abler to win the game: for we live in an age where they read rather for amuſement than in order to grow learned. If I had written my Dictionary according to the taſte of Abbot Renaudot, no body would have printed it, and had any body run the hazzard of putting it to the preſs, he would not have ſold a hundred copies. If I had ſtruck out all the literature, the firſt edition would have been ſold off in three months. If he imagines that I took all the things I uſed in it, for matters of importance, he wrongs me. I have taken them for what they are, and employed them only to ſuit the malady of the times. Thus we muſt do, when we cannot cure it. If I had written in Latin, I ſhould have taken another method; and had the taſte of the former age prevailed, I ſhould have given a place in my book to nothing but literature. But the times are altered. Good things alone do not take, but diſguſt. We muſt mingle them with others, if we would have the reader take the patience to peruſe them. Veluti pueris abſinthia tetra medentes, Cum dare conantur prius oras pocula circum &c.

XXX. Here I muſt anſwer the laſt lines of page 29. Thoſe of the beſt taſte among his own friends acknowledge that the half of his work at leaſt, might be cut off, without hurting it. Theſe perſons ſay not ſo much as I do. I give up two thirds, and even three fourths and more: and if I was required to abridge my Dictionary, ſo that in the judgment of Henry Valeſius, it might contain nothing but what was good, I ſhould reduce it to a pocket-ſize. Valeſius and the learned men of his rank deem that to be ſuperfluous in a book which they know already, or do not hope to turn ſome day to their advantage. But they ought to ſympathize with the neceſſities of the half-learned, and the vulgar of the Republic of Letters. They ought to know that it is divided into many more claſſes claſſes than the Roman Republic ever was. Each claſs has it's wants, and it is the part of compilations to ſerve them all, ſome one way, and ſome another. They are therefore miſtaken notwithſtanding their great knowledge, when they ſay abſolutely, this thing is uſeful and neceſſary, that is ſuperfluous. Are not theſe terms relative? Say rather, this is uſeful or uſeleſs to me, and to thoſe that are like me, uſeful or uſeleſs however to a hundred other men of letters. It is not a juſt way of reaſoning to ſay, ſuch a book would better deſerve the approbation of the moſt learned men in Europe, if it was ſhorter, therefore it ought to have been ſhorter. Softly, gentlemen; there is nothing uſeleſs in theſe volumes which you mention; for what may not ſerve you, may ſerve ſeveral others: and I am very ſure that if all the citizens of the Republic of Letters were brought together, that each might give his opinion upon what ſhould be taken away, and what ſhould be left, in a vaſt compilation, it would appear that the paſſages which ſome would throw out, would be preciſely thoſe which others would retain. A hundred reflexions might be made not only on the true properties of works of this kind, but likewiſe on the inſeparable union of criticiſm and trifles. Many might alſo be made on the difference which lies between a good book and an uſeful one: between an author who only propoſes to himſelf the approbation of a few ſcientifics, and an author who prefers the general benefit to the glory of meriting that approbation, which is not leſs hard to attain than a crown. But we ſhall find ſome fitter occaſions of ſpeaking on this ſubject.

Before we proceed any further, let us take notice of a growing lie in the thirteenth extract. The anonymous writer from London, who dates his letter the 28th of May 1697 affirms that the Bookſeller Cailloüé had not ſold forty copies. Now it can be proved from a letter which Cailloüé wrote on the 22d of March 1697, that he had ſold fifty-two: and obſerve this circumſtance; the Printer of the Dictionary had written to him that he had been informed that he (Cailloüé) had ſold ſixty copies of it before the end of February: to this Cailloüé anſwered, that he had only delivered fifty-two. In this he does not deny that he had ſold ſixty. Obſerve that he had only received his copies in December. From hence, I conclude, that the anonymous authors who are produced, are ill-informed, and that we cannot depend upon their intelligence.

XXXI. It is ſaid in the fourteenth extract, that what I mentioned of Lewis XIII, particularly obliged the Chancellor to burn my Dictionary, and to prohibit it. If this means that the Chancellor burnt in his own houſe the copy which was ſent him, I am perſuaded it is a miſtake. If it means that he cauſed my Dictionary to be publickly burnt by the hand of the hangman, I make no queſtion but that it is a notorious falſhood. The Commentator on the extracts has taken that expreſſion in the latter ſenſe.

XXXII. Let us make a ſerious reflexion on the laſt extract: it is that which is fraught with the greateſt fury. The anonymous writer, who is ſo ſtrangely tranſported with paſſion, needs only read my additions to the Thoughts on the Comets: If he does not ſee that I had reaſon to proclaim to the whole world as Calumniators, thoſe who have accuſed me of Deiſm or Atheiſm, he muſt be very ſtupid, and muſt be ſtill more ſtupid, if he imagines that my Dictionary may excuſe my ſlanderers. For the reſt, I would have him know that of whatever profeſſion he be, it will always be greatly to his honour, to ſay, that his conduct is as regular as mine has always been and is ſtill. I make this reflexion, in order, that he and others may learn to weigh their words, when they ſpeak of conduct. He acquaints me, that my article of ADAM, is one of thoſe which juſtly raiſe the indignation of good men. I am glad to know it; for I ſhould never have believed that this was the ground of ſuch an accuſation, and nothing can be more proper than this, to demonſtrate to intelligent readers that offence is taken without reaſon. He affirms that he does not ſee how I can eſcape excommunication: this is talking like a new convert from Paganiſm. He muſt therefore be informed that we have no ſuch cuſtom, neither have the Churches of God. We excommunicate people only in theſe two caſes; one, when a perſon by his crimes, as inceſt, proſtitution, adultery, fornication, murder, &c. gives ſcandal to the public: the other, when he dogmatically maintains heretical opinions, and is obſtinate in defending them, in oppoſition to the judgment of the Church. Thus the Remonſtrant Miniſters were excommunicated; for after having maintained their opinions with great warmth, during more than ſeven or eight years, they declared that, notwithſtanding the canons of the Synod of Dort, they would live and die in their ſentiments. But it was never known that a Church proceeded by eccleſiaſtical cenſures againſt an author who ſpoke Hiſtorically of the impurities of human life, or who having declared, that he firmly adheres to the faith of that Church, relates only for arguing ſake, what reaſon may ſuggeſt on this or that point. I ſay, it was never known, that ſuch an author was excommunicated, when he declares, as I do, that all theſe vain ſubtilties of Philoſophy can only ſerve to make us take Revelation for our guide, as the ſole and true remedy againſt the darkneſs with which ſin covers the faculties of our mind, and that he is ready to throw out all thoſe wild arguments, if it was thought proper. Obſerve that my adverſary's Newſmongers have had honeſty enough to tell him, That I every where provide a ſcreen, behind which I ſave a retreat for myſelf, in caſe of neceſſity; to wit, that we muſt adhere to Revelation, and ſubmit reaſon to faith. Could I chuſe a better retreat? The man who has ſought his felicity in worldly advantages, and who, having been able to find it no where, betakes himſelf to God as the only ſoveraign good, does he not make the beſt uſe which is poſſible of his reaſon? Muſt we not ſay the ſame thing of a Philoſopher, who having inquired in vain after certainty by the light of reaſon, concludes that he muſt have recourſe to ſupernatural light, and adhere to that alone? Would not this be the advice which David and all the other Prophets and the Apoſtles would give to the wiſe men of this world? And ſhould not I be ſheltered from the thunderbolts of excommunication in an azyle ſo ſacred, and ſo inviolable? Would Divines themſelves be the firſt to invade it? I cannot believe this? and thus our anonymous writer judges raſhly.

I cannot believe that the informers have always been ſincere; for they have made my cenſurer believe that I only ſpeak of ſubmiſſion to Scripture, by ſaying, and after having ſaid every thing imaginable in order to weaken the authority of Revelation and of the ſacred writers. This is very falſe, and I defy them to give the leaſt proof of it. It does not appear that they have alledged any other reaſons but thoſe which I have refuted above in Numb. VI, and Numb. XXI, and that which they have grounded on the article David. I know not whether they mentioned my explanation to him, or not; if they took no notice of it, they are very much to blame: and if they give him a faithful account of it, he cannot clear himſelf from being guilty of an artifice, which is very unbecoming a man of Honour: for the laws of diſputation do not allow a man to ſuppreſs any thing which may juſtify his adverſary. This is his eternal cuſtom; he only betakes himſelf to that which may ſerve his turn, and wreſts it in the moſt odious manner by violent hyperboles. All that I ſaid of ſome of David's actions amounts to this, that they may be accounted conformable to the art of government and human prudence, but not to the rigorous laws of piety. To conclude from thence that I have repreſented him as a villain, is trampling under foot all the laws of reaſoning, by a furious paſſion. I only demand impartial judges. Such will never find that a man by remarking the faults of the perſons inſpired, attacks the authority of inſpiration, we all agree that adultery and murder, did not hinder David from being a great Prophet. St Paul was not afraid that by giving a ſtrong idea of the infirmities of the old man, which made him groan, and required a moſt violent remedy, he ſhould weaken the efficacy of his writings. But this ſubject cannot be handled in a few words. Let us return to the anonymous author, and his menaces of excommunication.

XXXIII. Did ever the eccleſiaſtical tribunals proceed againſt the tranſlators of Boccace's Novels, againſt the tales of Ouville, or la Fontaine? I alledge theſe examples as an argument à fortiori; for no man dares ſay that I come near the licentiouſneſs of theſe writers. The horrible impurities of their books, which cauſed the Tales of la Fontaine to be condemned to the flames by a ſentence of a magiſtrate of Paris (4), are in ſome manner their own inventions; whereas I have only copied what is found in Hiſtorical books, known to all the world, and with theſe citations have almoſt always joined a mark of my diſapprobation: I have only ſpoken of them as things which diſcover the exceeding depravity of mankind, and gives us reaſon to lament our corruption. There is hardly any Commentator whoſe gravity would hold out againſt ſome of Abelard's Pieces, or againſt the ſimplicity imputed to honeſt Robert d'Arbriſſelles. A great ſubject of clamour truly, if I have been merry upon ſuch things, that is, if I have cenſured them by turning them into ridicule. But you will ſay I only alledge examples of the indulgence of the Romiſh communion; and may not I anſwer that this is an argument à fortiori? Have you not exclaimed a thouſand times againſt the tyrannical government of that Church? If this cannot ſatiſfy you, let us view the affair in another light.

(4) See, below, citat. (10), of the Explanation concerning Obſcenities.

XXXIV. Did our fathers cenſure Ambroiſe Paré, whoſe French books on Anatomy, are full of obſcenities? Did they cenſure thoſe writers who publiſhed in ſhocking praiſes the leud practices of the Court of Charles IX, and Henry III? Did they cenſure d'Aubigné, who had not only a moſt ſatirical pen, but likewiſe a moſt ſmutty one? Did they cenſure Henry Stephens for having publiſhed ſo many fooliſh, bawdy, burleſque ſtories in his Apology for Herodotus? In this country, did not St Aldegonde, in a book of Controverſy, uſe all kinds of jokes, and many ſmutty expreſſions? And was this cenſured? Did the Commentaries of Scaliger on the Priapeia, thoſe of Douza on Petronius, full of filthy and laſcivious matters, create any trouble to the authors of them, one a Profeſſor and the other a Curator in the univerſity of Leyden? Can any thing be more obſcene than Baudii Amores, a book publiſhed at Leyden by Profeſſor Scriverius? Does not the collection of the poems of Daniel Heinſius, a Profeſſor likewiſe at Leyden, contain ſeveral laſcivious pieces? Have not all theſe writings and ſeveral others been tolerated? Have the conſiſtories and ſynods proceeded either againſt the authors, or againſt the books? I ſay nothing of the Commentary of a Profeſſor of Franeker on the paſtoral of Longus, having ſpoken of it in my Dictionary. I only wiſh the reader would obſerve that a Commentator, who cites impurities, is a thouſand times more excuſable than the Poet who compoſes them. When I am let into the ſecret of collecting in a compilation all that the Antients have ſaid concerning the courtezan Laïs, without mentioning leud actions, I ſhall own myſelf guilty. It muſt at leaſt be proved againſt me, that that a Commentator has not the privilege of collecting whatever hath been ſaid of Helen; but how can it be proved? Where is the legiſlator who hath ſaid to compilers, So far you may go, but you muſt advance no further. You muſt not quote Athenæus, nor ſuch a Scholiaſt, nor ſuch a Philoſopher. Has it not been their conſtant practice to make their writings as full and extenſive as their reading? But here is a better way of ſatisfying our Critics. I will correct in a ſecond edition, the defects that are in the firſt. I am employing myſelf in this with all poſſible application. I ſhall not content myſelf with rectifying whatever is faulty with regard to Hiſtory, or Chronology, &c. But I ſhall throw out the expreſſions, and turns which are too free, &c. and I beſeech all my readers, but chiefly thoſe who are members of the Dutch, French, &c. Conſiſtories in this country, to aſſiſt me, by their remarks, in order to improve my Dictionary for a new edition. Works of this nature, and eſpecially when they are compoſed in haſte and with few helps, are at firſt only a looſe ſketch. They are improved by degrees. Every body knows examples of this kind.

XXXV. The laſt lie which I ſhall point out may be found in the laſt page of the pamphlet. There we find, 1. That I am preparing a new Dictionary, which will contain nothing but what is ſerious, ſober, chaſte, and judicious: 2. That they have it from very good hands that I am inquiring for ſome great name, diſtinguiſhed not only by birth, but by merit and piety, to be placed at the head of my Dictionary. I have nothing to ſay to the firſt point: for ſince my adverſary acquaints me, that my Dictionary ſuffered much by the great encomiums which were beſtowed on it beforehand, I ought to make a good uſe of ſo kind a hint. For how ſtrange would it be, if I myſelf praiſed a book which I have not yet written? His malice to the Bookſellers appears in this place: he would prepare the public to ſlight my Supplement. As to the ſecond point I declare to him, that he has been very ill-ſerved by his Newſmongers. By what I can perceive, they play with his credulity, as they did about ſix or ſeven years ago. I was never more ſurprized, than to ſee in his libel that deſign of a dedication to be prefixed to my Dictionary, of which I have no thoughts, nor ever had, any more than of diſcovering Terra incognita.

XXXVI. I obſerved that he lays the affair of Bellarmine much to heart: this is not ſurprizing: but it had been a more prudent part in him not to have made this the ſubject of a Poſtſcript to his pamphlet. The beſt courſe he could take, was to be entirely ſilent upon that head. In certain circumſtances, the leſs a man ſtirs, the leſs is he entangled. What I ſaid on the ſubject of Bellarmine is not an example of trifles and malice. I ſhould not have otherwiſe diſcharged the duty of an Hiſtorian, ſince the original deſign of my work was to obſerve the falſe accuſations which had been imputed to the perſons of whom I was to ſpeak. Had I omitted that accuſation in the article of BELLARMINE, might I not have been called partial very juſtly, and charged with forgetting matters of which I could not pretend to be ignorant? I have not taken it from any ſatirical book, as he ſays falſly, but from a book of Controverſy, and from the Journal des Sçavans. I do not examine the art he uſes to hide his fault. I only beg the reader to look into my Dictionary, and compare with his remark, the authorities I have alledged. Such a parallel will ſhew what agonies he is in, when he is obliged to make any humble and ingenuous confeſſion. I am not ſurprized at this, for a bow which has always been bent to one ſide, can hardly be bent to the other at the firſt attempt. And it is thus with the fibres of our brain.

XXXVII. I conclude with a ſhort remark on my adverſary's long ſilence. I had expected that as ſoon as my two volumes were publiſhed, there would appear a little pamphlet of his, wherein he would proclaim to the whole world, (often repeating the burden of his ſongs, about the Advice to the Refugees, &c. which have been ſo often exploded) that my Dictionary was the moſt abominable, the moſt frightful, the moſt deteſtable book, that ever came into the world, a heap of enormous impieties, and monſtrous obſcenities, with ſuch a wretched collection of literary trifles, as would diſgrace a ſchool-boy. I was aſſured that he would not engage in refuting my criticiſms, in order to juſtify himſelf; I only expected a ſudden volley of looſe and general invectives. But in this I was miſtaken. He was not delivered, before the time, of the pamphlet he was big with. He only brought it forth in the tenth month. Matri longa decem tulerunt faſtidia menſes. If I had leſs averſion to quibbling, I might add that his child is notwithſtanding an abortive. I am ſurprized that Abbot Renaudot's two pieces, together with all the other extracts were not ſent to the preſs on the ſame day that the poſt brought them. That he ſhould content himſelf with making copies of them fly about for ſeveral months ſucceſſively, is what I do not comprehend. For we muſt not ſay the pangs of labour, but the pleaſures: the perſon I ſpeak of is never more in his element than when he publiſhes invectives. I am likewiſe ſurprized that a greater number of extracts has not been produced; for during the ſhort ſway of Abbot Renaudot's judgment, the literary Newſmongers no doubt wrote to their friends in the country and abroad, what was ſaid to the prejudice of my work. Twenty men of Letters having heard it ſaid in an aſſembly that a new book is not eſteemed, communicate that piece of news to all the curious whom they meet that day, and in the evening they write it to their correſpondents. Great books advance but ſlowly, and muſt long be expected; upon that account, when they firſt launch forth, they have a thouſand ſtorms to encounter. The Dictionary of the French Academy compoſed, reviſed, and poliſhed, through the courſe of fifty years, by the fineſt genius's in France, no ſooner appeared but it was battered by ſtorms on every ſide: ballads, epigrams, libels, private letters, converſations; all poured upon that work. It is full, ſaid they, of ſmut, Billinſgate, and quibbles. Yet it bore off, and now ſteers on with full ſail towards immortality.

upon

I beg leave to place here a thought of Mr la Bruyere. What ſay you of Hermodorus*'s book? That it is a bad one, anſwers* Anthimus. That it is ſo bad, that it hardly deſerves the name of a book, or at leaſt that the world ſhould take any notice of it. But have you read it? No, ſays Anthimus. Why does he not add that Fulvia and Melania have condemned it without reading it, and that he is Fulvia's and Melania's friend? This reflexion ſeems to have been made on purpoſe for me.

If I have been more prolix than I at firſt intended to be, it is becauſe I thought it neceſſary to enlarge on certain matters, in order that I might not for the future be taken off from my labours, ſhould my enemies publiſh any more libels. I ſhall let them ſay whatever they pleaſe, and go forward with my undertaking. Let them clamour as much as they will; I promiſe to read their ſatires, and will improve by them if poſſible; but I ſhall loſe no time, as I have already done, in anſwering them.

September 17, 1697.

EXPLANATIONS

Concerning certain things diſperſed in this Dictionary, which may be reduced to four general heads:

I. The praiſes beſtowed on perſons who denied either the providence or the exiſtence of GOD. II. The objections of the Manichees. III. The objections of the Sceptics. IV. Obſcenities.

A general and preliminary obſervation.

WHILE I was compoſing this work, I eaſily perceived that certain reflexions crept in, which were ſomewhat free, and little agreeable to ordinary readers; but I did not foreſee that they could give any offence. I imagined that the perſons whoſe judgment ſerves for a rule, and corrective to that of others, would take notice of many things which might furniſh me with an apology.

I. I hoped in the firſt place, that the reader would conſider the nature of this Dictionary. It is a vaſt compilation, neceſſarily loaded with ſeveral minute criticiſms, which will diſguſt and tire to the laſt degree thoſe who are not verſed in theſe matters; and I was obliged in this immenſe variety to bear two characters, that of Hiſtorian, and that of Commentator. It was not poſſible to reſcue it from the contempt of a great many readers, otherwiſe than by introducing ſome uncommon things into it. They who neither value Grammatical diſputations, nor the adventures of an inconſiderable private perſon, are a numerous party, and deſerve that we ſhould have ſome regard for their taſte. It is therefore allowable for an author to ſeaſon his book with ſomething that will recommend it to their palate; and if he writes as an Hiſtorian, he ought not only to relate what Heretics have done, but alſo to ſhew wherein the ſtrength and weakneſs of their opinions conſiſt. This muſt eſpecially be done by him, if he be himſelf the Commentator of his narratives; for in his commentary he muſt diſcuſs things, and compare together the arguments pro and con, with all the impartiality of a faithful relator.

II. I hoped in the ſecond place, that it would be conſidered in what manner, and with what an air I mention ſome opinions; it being neither in the ſtrain of a Dogmatiſt, nor with the fondneſs of one who ſeeks to make converts. They are thoughts thrown out at random, and I am willing the reader ſhould take them for nothing more than flights of wit, and reject them as he thinks proper; and that with a greater liberty than I have taken to advance them. It is eaſy to perceive that an author who deals thus has no ſiniſter intentions, and is not laying ſnares; and if any reflexions ſhould eſcape him, which, being under another form, might be dangerous, no great offence is to be taken at it.

III. I hoped in the third place, that the readers would conſider the circumſtances which either make an error dangerous or harmleſs. The conſequences of it are to be feared when it is taught by thoſe who ſtand in ſuch a relation to the people as furniſhes them with great authority, and with opportunities of forming a party. An error ought to be followed cloſe, to be obſerved, and carefully reſtrained, when a man of a venerable character, a Paſtor, a Profeſſor of Divinity, ſows it in his ſermons, in his lectures, in little ſyſtematical tracts, or by way of catechiſm, and by emiſſaries who go from houſe to houſe to recommend the reading of his books, and invite people to the conventicles where the author explains his reaſons and his method more particularly (1). But if a layman, who bears no public office, as myſelf, ſhould drop amongſt vaſt collections of Hiſtory and Learning, ſome error in Religion or Morality, I do not ſee any reaſon why any body ſhould be concerned at it. It is not in ſuch works as theſe that the reader ſeeks for the reformation of his faith. No man takes for his guide in this matter, an author who only ſpeaks by the by, and occaſionally; and who by his very throwing his ſentiments, as pins into a meadow, ſufficiently ſhews that he cares not to be followed. The errors of ſuch a writer are of no conſequence, nor deſerve that the world ſhould be diſturbed about them. Thus the Faculties of Divinity in France dealt with Michael de Montagne's book. They left untouched all this author's maxims, who, without following any ſyſtem, method, or order, heaped up and tacked together whatever his memory preſented to him: but when Peter Charron, a Prieſt, and a Doctor of Divinity, came to vent ſome of Montagne's ſentiments in a methodical and ſyſtematical treatiſe of Morality (2), the Divines were no longer ſilent (3).

(1) Note, That I join all theſe things together, without pretending that we ought only to guard againſt thoſe who are guilty of them all. A part is a ſufficient motive for it.

(2) Compare with this, remark [O], of the article MONTAGNE.

(3) See the remark [F], of the article MONTAGNE.

IV. I hoped in the fourth place, and this was the main foundation of my hope, that theſe two points would eaſily be diſtinguiſhed: 1. That I never advance, as my own opinion, any doctrine, which is repugnant to the articles of the Confeſſion of Faith of the Reformed Church in which I was born, and of which I make profeſſion. 2. That when I relate as an Hiſtorian what may be objected and replied to the Orthodox, and when I own that by natural light we cannot ſolve all the difficulties of the unbelievers, I always make a digreſſion, to draw from thence a conſequence in favour of the principle which the Reformed continually oppoſe to the Socinians; viz. That our reaſon being ſo weak as it is, ought not to be the rule or meaſure of our faith.

Theſe are the reaſons which made me believe, that if I ſometimes uſed, what they call the liberty of philoſophiſing, it would not be taken amiſs. I ſhould not have uſed it, had I foreſeen that the foregoing conſiderations would not be regarded.

But the event has diſappointed my hopes. Complaints have been made, and clamours have been raiſed, againſt thoſe paſſages in my Dictionary. I could never believe theſe complaints were juſt; yet I am ſorry I ſaid any thing that was diſliked, and have always been diſpoſed to remove any objections in a ſecond edition. Having been informed wherein the grievances conſiſted, I thought it was no hard matter to redreſs them, by leaving out ſome pages, altering ſome expreſſions, or by explanations that might ſet things in a due light. I have engaged in this without any reluctancy, as all authors ought to do who are not bigotted to their opinions, but are ready to ſacrifice them to the edification of the reader. I wiſh the public may be ſatisfied with my conduct, both as to what has been ſuppreſſed, and to thoſe things I am going to explain; and methinks I have reaſon to promiſe myſelf that they will. This has been my deſign, and I have uſed great application to effect it.

EXPLANATION I.

The obſervation which has been made on the good morals of ſome perſons who had no religion, cannot any ways prejudice the true Chriſtian Faith.

THEY who were offended at my ſaying, that ſome Atheiſts and Epicureans have, with reſpect to Morality, outdone moſt idolaters, are intreated to attend to the following conſiderations; which if they pleaſe to do, the offence they have taken will entirely be removed.

I. The fear and love of God are not the only ſpring of human actions. There are other principles that actuate a man; The love of praiſe, the fear of diſgrace, the natural temper, puniſhments and rewards in the magiſtrates hands, have a very great influence upon men. He who doubts of it, muſt be ignorant of what paſſes in his own breaſt, and what the common courſe of the world may demonſtrate to him every moment. But it is not probable that any man ſhould be ſo ſtupid as to be ignorant of ſuch a truth. What therefore I have aſſerted concerning theſe other ſprings of human actions, may be placed in the number of truths which are beyond diſpute.

II. The fear and love of God are not always a more powerful principle than the others: The love of glory, the fear of infamy, death, or torments, the hopes of preferment, act with greater force upon ſome men, than the deſire of pleaſing God, and the fear of breaking his commandments. If any one doubts of it, he is ignorant of ſome of his own actions, and knows nothing of what is doing daily under the ſun. The world abounds with people who chooſe rather to commit a ſin, than diſpleaſe a Prince who can either make or ruin their fortune. Men daily ſubſcribe formularies of faith againſt their conſcience, in order to ſave their eſtates, or to avoid impriſonment, exile, death, &c. An officer who has quitted all for his religion, finding himſelf under the alternative either of offending God if he revenges himſelf for having received a box on the ear, or of being accounted a coward if he does not, never reſts till he has ſatiſfaction for this affront, though at the peril of killing or being killed in a ſtate that muſt be followed with eternal damnation. It is not likely that any man ſhould be ſo ſtupid as to be ignorant of ſuch things. Therefore let this moral aphoriſm be placed among indiſputable truths, That the fear and love of God are not always the moſt active principle of human actions.

III. This being ſo, it ought not to be reckoned a ſcandalous paradox, but rather a very poſſible thing, that ſome men, without religion, ſhould be more ſtrongly excited to a good moral life by their conſtitution, in conjunction with the love of praiſe and fear of diſgrace, than ſome others by the inſtinct of conſcience.

IV. The ſcandal ought to be much greater, when we ſee ſo many people convinced of the truths of religion, and at the ſame time plunged in all manner of vice.

V. Nay, it is more ſtrange that Heathen idolaters ſhould do good actions, than that Atheiſtical Philoſophers ſhould live like virtuous men; for the former muſt have been been excited to crimes by their very religion; they muſt have believed, that, in order to become imitators of God, which is the end and ſubſtance of religion, they ought to be cheats, envious, fornicators, adulterers, pederaſts, &c.

VI. Whence we may conclude, that the idolaters who lived virtuouſly, were only guided by the ideas of reaſon and virtue, or by the deſire of praiſe, or by their natural temper, or ſuch other principles as may all be found in Atheiſts: Why then ſhould we expect to find more virtue amongſt the idolatrous Heathens, than amongſt men who have no religion?

VII. I deſire it may be obſerved, that ſpeaking of the good morals of ſome Atheiſts, I have not aſcribed any true virtues to them. Their ſobriety, chaſtity, probity, contempt of riches, zeal for the public good, good offices to their neighbour, neither proceeded from the love of God, nor tended to honour and glorify him. They themſelves were the principle and end of all this: ſelf-love was the only ground and cauſe of it. They were only ſhining ſins, ſplendida peccata, as St Auguſtin ſays of all the good actions of the Heathens. I have therefore done no prejudice to the true religion, by what I have ſaid of ſome Atheiſts. It will ſtill remain true, that good actions cannot be effected without it: and what is it to the true religion if the worſhippers of the falſe gods are not better in their actions than thoſe who have no religion? What advantage would accrue to it, if the adorers of Jupiter and Saturn were not equally plunged in the gulph of perdition with the Atheiſts?

VIII. If they who were offended thought that one cannot praiſe the good morals of Epicurus, without ſuppoſing it the ſame thing with reſpect to a good life, to have no religion, or to profeſs any religion whatever, they are ignorant in the art of drawing conſequences, and perfect ſtrangers to the queſtion. I never compared Atheiſm but with Heatheniſm; and therefore the true religion is no way concerned in it; the queſtion is only about religions introduced and kept up by the Devil; the queſtion is whether they who have profeſſed a worſhip ſo infamous in its origin and progreſs as this, have been more regular in the practice of Morality than the Atheiſts. I ſuppoſe this as a point undoubted and fully determined, viz. That in the true religion there is not only more virtue than elſewhere, but that out of it there is no true virtue at all, nor any fruits of righteouſneſs. To what purpoſe then do they pretend to fear that I injure true religion? Is it concerned in the cenſure that may be paſſed on the falſe one? And is it not to be feared that their zeal will ſhock men of ſenſe, who ſee that this is ſhewing a particular tenderneſs for a worſhip deteſted by God, and ſet up by the Devil, as is owned by all our Divines.

IX. I could not juſtly find fault with theſe complaints, if I had written a romance in which the perſons were both virtuous and Atheiſtical: For, as I had been maſter of their words and actions, I was at liberty to deſcribe them in a manner ſuited to the taſte of the moſt ſcrupulous readers. But my Dictionary, being an Hiſtorical work, I ought not to repreſent people as they ſhould have been, but as they actually were. I can neither ſuppreſs their vices, nor their virtues. Therefore, ſince I advance nothing concerning the morals of ſome Atheiſts, but what the authors I cite relate of them, no body has reaſon to be offended with me. To make my cenſurers ſenſible of the truth of what I ſay, I need only aſk them, whether they believe the ſuppreſſion of true facts to be the duty of an Hiſtorian? I am ſure they will never ſubſcribe to ſuch a propoſition.

X. Not but I believe there are ſome perſons who will frankly maintain, that a matter of fact ought to be ſuppreſſed by an Hiſtorian, when it is likely to leſſen the abhorrence of Atheiſm, or the veneration of religion in general. But I moſt humbly intreat them, not to take it amiſs that I continue to believe, that God has no need of theſe Rhetorical artifices; and if this may be allowed in a Poem, or a piece of Eloquence, it does not follow that I ought to admit it in an Hiſtorical Dictionary. They muſt give me leave to tell them, that it is enough for me to promote the intereſt of true religion; for all that ſhould be done for religion in general, would ſerve as well for Paganiſm, as Chriſtianity.

XI. I had been ſo much the more blamable for ſuppreſſing the truths complained of, becauſe, beſides the acting againſt the fundamental laws of Hiſtory, I ſhould have omitted things, which, at the bottom, are moſt advantageous to the true ſyſtem of grace. I have ſhewn in another place (1), that nothing can be more proper to prove the corruption of men, which is naturally invincible, and can only be overcome by the Holy Ghoſt, than to ſhew, that thoſe who have no ſupernatural aſſiſtances, are as bad under the practice of a religion, as thoſe who live in Atheiſm. I add here, that nothing can be more acceptable to the Pelagians, than to ſay, that the fear of the falſe gods was able to induce the Heathens to renounce ſome vices; for if through the fear of incurring the malediction of heaven, they could abſtain from evil, they might alſo riſe up to virtue by the deſire of ſpiritual rewards, and to procure to themſelves the love of God; that is, they might not only have been able to fear, but alſo to love God, and act upon this good principle. The two handles by which man is moved, are the fear of puniſhment, and the deſire of reward. If he can be moved by the former, he may alſo by the latter; for one cannot well be admitted without the other.

(1) See the Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes, pag. 437, 490, 599: and the Additions to that book, pag. 58, 110.

XII. If ſome perſons, more equitable and intelligent than ordinary, ſhould alledge, as the only reaſon of their ſcandal, the affectation wherewith they think I have acquainted my readers with the good lives of ſome Atheiſts; I would deſire them to conſider, that in the preſent caſe, affectation is very excuſable, and may even be looked upon as a ſubject of edification. To underſtand this, one needs only call to mind an epiſode of my treatiſe concerning comets. The true deſign of that book was to confute, by a Theological argument, what is commonly ſaid concerning the preſages of comets (2). The neceſſity of inforcing this argument, put me upon drawing a parallel between Atheiſm and Paganiſm, without which my proof had lain open to an objection which would have made it unfit to evince what was neceſſary for me to demonſtrate. Therefore there was a neceſſity for me either to leave that objection unanſwered, or to confute the arguments of thoſe who ſay, that the Pagan idolatry was not ſo great an evil as Atheiſm. All the ſucceſs of the combat depended very much upon the ſucceſs of this attack, and therefore according to the rules of diſputation, and by virtue of the rights belonging to an author, I was obliged to take advantage of whatever Logic and Hiſtory could afford me, to anſwer the objection. It was not therefore deſignedly, or through any audaciouſneſs, that I alledged ſome matters of fact tending to prove, that Atheiſts are not neceſſarily more diſorderly in their lives, than idolaters. The laws of diſputation, and the right every one has to anſwer the objections to which his aſſertion is expoſed, laid me under a neceſſity of taking ſuch a courſe. Great complaints have been made againſt this part of my book, and ſome endeavours have been uſed to make it appear dangerous. I was therefore obliged to juſtify it, as far as reaſon and truth would permit; and conſequently, no body ought to be offended, if I acquaint my readers, when occaſion offers, that Hiſtory informs us, that ſuch and ſuch perſons, who denied either the exiſtence or the providence of God, or the immortality of the ſoul, did nevertheleſs live like virtuous men. This affectation, which would perhaps be a juſt ſubject of ſcandal in another book, is none at all in mine: on the contrary, it may ſerve to edify my readers, ſince it ſhews I have not advanced a paradox out of vanity, but made an obſervation, which, at the bottom, is moſt certain, and ſeems falſe to none, but ſuch as have not examined it. No man renders himſelf more odious than he, who, in order to diſtinguiſh himſelf, raſhly leaves the common road: and if there are any writers, who have been ſuſpected on that account, not through their own fault, but becauſe the readers were not throughly acquainted with the matter, nothing can be more edifying than to ſee ſuch authors juſtify themſelves.

XIII. In order to remove all ſuſpicions of a vicious affectation, I have taken care to mention, as often as poſſible, the bad morals of Atheiſts (3). If I have not done it oftner, it was becauſe I wanted materials. The public knows, that I called for information (4): no body has been pleaſed to give me any, and I have not as yet been able to make any farther diſcovery by my own inquiries. I do not pretend to deny, that there have been in all countries, and at all times, men, who, by their debaucheries, and long criminal habits, have ſtifled the explicit belief of the exiſtence of a God; but Hiſtory having not preſerved their names, it is impoſſible to ſpeak of them. It is probable, that among thoſe banditti, and hired aſſaſſins, who commit ſo many crimes, there are ſome who have no religion; but the contrary is ſtill more probable, ſince, among ſo many malefactors who paſs through the hangman's-hands, there are none found to be Atheiſts (5). The ordinaries, who prepare them for death, find them always ſufficiently diſpoſed to deſire the joys of heaven. As for thoſe profane Epicures, who, in the judgment of Father Garaſſe, and many other writers, are downright Atheiſts, I could not bring them into the liſt; the queſtion not being concerning thoſe we call practical Atheiſts, people that live without any fear of God, though they are perſuaded of his exiſtence; but concerning theoretical Atheiſts, ſuch as Diagoras, Vanini, Spinoza, &c. whoſe Atheiſm is atteſted, either by Hiſtorians, or by their own writings. The queſtion only turns upon the morals of this claſs of Atheiſts, examples of whoſe bad lives, I deſired might be ſhewn me. If I had found any, I had made an exact mention of them. There is nothing eaſier to be found in Hiſtory than ſome wretches, whoſe abominable actions make the readers tremble; but their very impieties, and blaſphemies, are a proof that they believed a Deity. This is a natural conſequence of the conſtant doctrine of Divines, that the Devil, the moſt wicked of creatures, but incapable of Atheiſm, is the promoter of all the ſins of mankind; whence the greateſt wickedneſs of man, muſt have the character of that of the Devil; that is, to be joined with the perſuaſion of the being of a God. A maxim of the Philoſophers confirms this reaſoning (6).

XIV. If what I have been ſaying, is capable of edifying people of a tender conſcience, ſince they will ſee that the aſſertion which frighted them, agrees with the moſt Orthodox principles, they will find no leſs a ſubject of edification in what I am going to propoſe. That the moſt wicked men are not Atheiſts, and that the greateſt part of Atheiſts, whoſe names are come down to us, were virtuous men, as the world goes, is a character of the infinite wiſdom of God, and ought to make us admire his providence. It has ſet bounds to man's corruption, that there might be ſocieties upon earth; and

---

(2) See the preface of the third edition.

(3) As in the articles of Bion the Boryſthenite, and Critias.

(4) See the additions to the Penſées ſur les Cometes, pag. 86, See alſo, pag. 75.

(5) I ſpeak thus, becauſe I do not remember I have ever read, or heard of any relations concerning the final Atheiſm of theſe people.

(6) Ἀεὶ δι᾽ ὃ ὑπάρχει ἕκαστον, ἐκεῖνο μᾶλλον ὑπάρχει. Propter quod unumquodque eſt tale, illud ſemper eſt magis tale. Ariſtot. Analyt. poſter. lib. i, cap. ii, pag. m. 105. etiam Metaphyſ. lib. ii, cap. i, pag. 645, F.

and if it has favoured but a few with a ſanctifying grace, it has diſperſed a general Repreſſing grace (7), which like a ſtrong bank reſtrains the floods of ſin, as much as is neceſſary to prevent an univerſal inundation, which would deſtroy all monarchical, ariſtocratic, and democratic governments. It is commonly ſaid, that the means God has made uſe of to arrive at this end, have been, to preſerve in the ſouls of all men the ideas of virtue and vice, and a ſenſe of a providence which ſuperintends all, puniſhes vice, and rewards virtue. You will find this notion in the bodies of Divinity, and in a great many other Orthodox books. What is the natural conſequence of this propoſition? Is it not this; that if there are ſome perſons whom God does not forſake ſo far as to ſuffer them to fall into Epicurus's ſyſtem, or that of the Atheiſts, they are chiefly thoſe brutiſh ſouls, whoſe cruelty, audaciouſneſs, avarice, fury, and ambition are capable of bringing a large flouriſhing country to ſpeedy ruin. Is it not this. That if he forſakes ſome people, ſo far as to permit they ſhould deny either his exiſtence, or providence, they are chiefly perſons, whoſe temper, education, lively ideas of virtue, love of fame, or ſenſe of diſhonour, ſerve as a ſtrong curb to keep them to their duty? Theſe are two conſequences that naturally flow from the above-mentioned Theological principle. Now, as by informing my readers in ſome places of this Dictionary, that the moſt profligate wretches had ſome religion; and that thoſe who had none, have lived according to the rules of virtue, I ſaid nothing but what agrees with theſe two conſequences; there is no longer any ground for a juſt offence.

XV. It will be much better to conſider in this the finger of GOD, and the admirable conduct of his providence; he arrives at the ſame end by different ways: the repreſſing principle, ſo neceſſary for the preſervation of ſocieties, as Divines teach us, exerts its power by the curb of idolatry, in ſome countries, and in certain perſons, and by the natural temper, or the vivacity of ideas, and a liking to moral virtue in ſome others. The Greeks, ingenious and voluptuous, and thereby obnoxious to a horrid train of crimes, had need of a religion that ſhould burden them with infinite obſervances. They would have had too much time to run into vice, if the multitude of ceremonies, ſacrifices and oracles, had not given them many avocations, and ſuperſtitious terrors had not alarmed them. The Scythians, a ſtupid people, who were neither luxurious in cloaths or diet, needed only to deſpiſe pleaſures, or not to know them. ‘ Aurum & argentum perinde aſpernantur, ac reliqui mortales appetunt..... Hæc continentia illis morum quoque juſtitiam edidit, nihil alienum concupiſcentibus: QUIPPE ibidem divitiarum cupido eſt, ubi & uſus. Atque utinam reliquis mortalibus ſimilis moderatio & abſtinentia alieni foret...... Prorſus ut admirabile videatur, hoc illis naturam dare, quod Græci longa ſapientium doctrina, præceptiſque philoſophorum conſequi nequeunt (8). - - - - - Gold and Silver are as much neglected and deſpiſed among the Scythians, as ſought after and coveted by all other nations...... This abſtinence has produced another virtue among that people, namely juſtice in the behaviour of every private man, for they covet not what is the property of others. And indeed wherever the uſe of riches prevails, there a covetous deſire of them is inſeparably annexed. Would to GOD other nations were endowed with the like moderation and contentment with their own...... It ſeems very wonderful and admirable that nature ſhould have beſtowed on the Scythians what the Greeks have not been able to attain by the repeated doctrines of their wiſe men, and all the precepts of their Philoſophers.’ This alone maintained their republic, and hindred them from injuring one another. They were ſo framed, as to be all content with what they had at home. Such a nation has neither occaſion for a Code, nor a Digeſt (9).

Theſe fifteen conſiderations ſeem ſufficient to remove the ſtumbling-block, which was thought to be laid in ſome places of my Dictionary. They might afford matter for a large book: I have only curſorily propoſed them; for I have ſomewhat more largely treated of them in another place (10), and I ſhall treat of them more amply in a work that I have promiſed (11).

EXPLANATION

(7) I have been told by a Divine, that this is the expreſſion they uſe, when they ſpeak of the Providence of God, in as much as it has not permitted ſuch an inundation of crimes as would deſtroy ſocieties.

(8) Juſtin. lib. ii, cap. ii.

(9) Juſtitia gentis ingeniis culta, non legibus. - - - Juſtice is maintained among the Scythians, not by the laws of the country, ſo much as by the genius and diſpoſition of the nation. Id. ibid.

(10) See the Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes.

(11) See the preface of the third edition of the ſaid Penſées.

EXPLANATION II.

How what I have ſaid concerning the objections of the Manichees, ought to be conſidered.

THEY who are offended at ſome things which I have obſerved in the articles wherein I treated of Manicheiſm, would be wholly inexcuſable if they went only upon my ſaying, that the Queſtion about the origin of evil is very difficult. For the Ancient Fathers ingenuouſly confeſs it (1), as does every Orthodox Divine at this day. I do not think therefore that the ſtumbling-block lies in this; but rather, in my ſuppoſing the objections of the Manichees unanſwerable, whilſt only diſcuſſed at the bar of reaſon.

This muſt needs ſcandalize thoſe, whoſe great zeal for the truths of the goſpel perſuades them, that it triumphs over error in all kinds of combat, and whatever arms it oppoſes. They find ſo much pleaſure in the reading a book, wherein Tranſubſtantiation is routed, whether it be attacked by the teſtimony of the ſenſes, and the principles of Philoſophy, or whether impugned by the Scripture, and the tradition of the firſt ages; they find, I ſay, ſo much ſatisfaction in ſo complete a victory, that they eaſily fancy all other diſputes of orthodoxy have the ſame fate. Flattered with ſo agreeable a perſuaſion, they fret and fume if any one maintains, that all the articles of the Chriſtian Faith, defended and attacked by the arms of Philoſophy alone, do not come off honourably; that ſome of them give ground, and are forced to retire into the fortreſſes of Scripture, and to aſk leave for the future to arm themſelves in another way, or otherwiſe they will refuſe to enter the liſts.

They, who are vexed to ſee themſelves thus diſturbed in the poſſeſſion of an imaginary complete triumph, fear moreover that by the confeſſion of a ſort of inferiority, religion will be expoſed to a total defeat, or at leaſt its certainty notably weakened, and the intereſt of the enemies of the Goſpel advanced.

An offence grounded on theſe notions, has two favourable circumſtances; one, that it proceeds from a good principle; the other that it may be eaſily removed. It is produced by the love of truth, and if we do but riſe up to the conſideration of the character of Evangelical truths, we ſhall be delivered from this diſturbance. For we ſhall ſee, that far from being the property of thoſe truths to be reconciled with Philoſophy, it is on the contrary eſſential to them, not to be ſquared by its rules (2).

THAT the myſteries of the Goſpel being above reaſon, it follows, that the objections of the unbelievers cannot be anſwered by reaſon.

The Roman Catholics and Proteſtants diſpute concerning ſeveral articles of religion, but they perfectly agree in this point. That the myſteries of the Goſpel are above reaſon. There are even ſome Divines who own that the myſteries denied by the Socinians, are againſt reaſon. I will not take advantage of that conceſſion; it ſuffices me, that they are unanimouſly acknowledged to be above reaſon; for from thence it neceſſarily follows, that it is impoſſible to ſolve the difficulties of the Philoſophers; and conſequently, that a diſpute, wherein natural light only is employed, will always terminate to the diſadvantage of the Divines, who will be forced to give ground and to retire under the cannon of ſupernatural light.

It is evident, that reaſon can never reach what is above itſelf; but if it could afford anſwers to the objections which attack the Doctrine of the Trinity, and that of the Hypoſtatic Union, it would reach to theſe two myſteries, it would get the maſtery of them, manage and ply them, even to the comparing them with its firſt principles, or with aphoriſms deduced from common notions, till at laſt, it had concluded, that they agree with natural light. It would therefore exert it ſelf beyond its ſtrength, and exceed its own limits, which is a dowright contradiction. We muſt therefore ſay, that it cannot furniſh anſwers to its own objections; and conſequently they remain victorious, till recourſe is had to the Divine authority, and the neceſſity of captivating the underſtanding to the obedience of faith.

Let us endeavour to put this in a clearer light. If ſome doctrines are above reaſon, they are out of its reach; if they are out of its reach, it cannot attain to them; if it cannot attain to them, it cannot comprehend them; if it cannot comprehend them, it cannot find any idea or principle that can afford ſolutions; and conſequently, its objections will remain unanſwered; or, which is the ſame thing, will be anſwered by ſome diſtinction as obſcure as the poſition itſelf which is attacked. Now it is certain, that an objection founded upon diſtinct notions remains equally victorious, whether no anſwer is made to it, or ſuch an anſwer is made as no body can underſtand. Can the match be equal betwixt you and another perſon, if that perſon makes objections which each of you clearly comprehends, and you make no anſwers but ſuch as neither of you comprehends?

(1) See the article PAULICIANS, citat. (108).

(2) This is only to be underſtood of Evangelical truths, which contain myſteries; for it muſt be confeſſed, that the moral precepts of Jeſus Chriſt, are eaſily reconciled with natural light.

THE end of a philoſophical diſpute, and that it cannot be attained when the diſpute turns upon myſteries.

Every Philoſophical diſpute ſuppoſes the contending parties to be agreed upon certain definitions, and to admit the rules of ſyllogiſms, and the characteriſtics of falſe reaſoning. After this, the whole buſineſs conſiſts in examining, whether a poſition be mediately or immediately conſiſtent with the principles agreed upon; whether the premiſſes of an argument are true; whether the conſequence is well drawn: whether the ſyllogiſm uſed has four terms; whether no maxim contained in the chapter de Oppoſitis, or de Sophiſticis Elenchis, &c. be contradicted. The victory is obtained either by ſhewing that the ſubject of the diſpute has no connexion with the principles agreed upon, or by reducing the reſpondent to an abſurdity. And this may be done, either by ſhewing that the conſequences of his poſition are contradictory, or by driving him to ſuch anſwers as are wholly unintelligible. The end of theſe ſorts of diſputes is to clear up obſcurities, and make evidence ſhine forth. Hence we judge, that during the courſe of a diſputation, victory declares more or leſs for the opponent or reſpondent, according to the greater or leſſer perſpicuity in the propoſitions of the reſpective diſputants; and at laſt we determine that it wholly declares againſt him whoſe anſwers are ſuch as are to us unintelligible, and who acknowledges they are incomprehenſible. Hereupon we condemn him by the rules of adjudging the victory to a party; and even when he cannot be purſued into the miſt he has covered himſelf with, which forms a ſort of abyſs betwixt him and his antagoniſts, we conclude him utterly defeated, and compare him to an army, which having loſt the battle, eſcapes the conquerours purſuit only by the favour of the night.

The concluſion we ought to draw from this is, that the myſteries of the goſpel being of a ſupernatural order, neither can nor ought to be ſubjected to the rules of natural reaſon: they are not ſuited to the teſt of Philoſophical diſputes; their greatneſs and ſublimity hinders them from ſtooping to them. It would be againſt the nature of things, for them to come off victorious from ſuch a combat, their eſſential character is to be the objects of faith, and not of ſcience: they would be no longer myſteries, if reaſon could ſolve all the difficulties of them; and therefore, inſtead of thinking it ſtrange that any one ſhould ſay that Philoſophy may attack them, but not repulſe the attack, it ſhould be a ſubject of ſcandal to hear the contrary (3).

If they, whoſe ſcruples I would remove, yield not to theſe conſiderations, in which they will find, perhaps, ſomething too abſtracted, I intreat them to have recourſe to reflexions that are more adapted to every one's capacity: I beſeech them to conſider a little the genius that reigns in the New Teſtament, and in the miſſion of the Apoſtles.

SOME conſiderations upon the method that Jeſus Chriſt and the Apoſtles and antient Fathers have obſerved in teaching.

The humour of diſputing is what ſeems the leaſt approved in the œconomy of the Goſpel. The firſt thing JESUS CHRIST requires is faith and ſubmiſſion. This is commonly his firſt precept, and alſo of his apoſtles, Follow me, (4) Believe, and thou ſhalt be ſaved (5). Now, that faith which he required was not obtained by a train of Philoſophical diſcuſſions and long reaſonings; but was the gift of GOD, a pure grace of the Holy Ghoſt, which commonly fell on ignorant perſons (6). It was not even produced in the apoſtles by their reflecting on the holineſs of the life of JESUS CHRIST, and the excellency of his doctrine and miracles. They ſtood in need of a Revelation from GOD himſelf, to know that he whoſe diſciples they were, was his eternal Son (7). If JESUS CHRIST and his apoſtles ſometimes happen to reaſon, they did not take their proofs from natural light, but from the books of the Prophets, and from miracles; and if ſometimes St Paul made uſe of ſome arguments ad hominem againſt the Gentiles, he did not much inſiſt upon them. His method was entirely different from that of Philoſophers: theſe boaſt of ſuch evident principles, and a ſyſtem ſo conſiſtent, as to fear no other obſtacles to perſuaſion but the ſtupidity of the auditors, or the malicious artifice of their competitors; and they offer to give an account of their doctrine to all the world, and to defend it againſt all gainſayers. St Paul, on the contrary, owns his doctrine to be obſcure, that he knows it but imperfectly (8), and that nothing of it can be underſtood, unleſs GOD communicates a ſpiritual diſcernment, without which it muſt be reckoned fooliſhneſs (9). He confeſſes (10) that the greateſt number of thoſe converted by the apoſtles were ignorant and of mean condition. He does not challenge the Philoſophers to diſputation, but exhorts the believers to ſtand well upon their guard againſt Philoſophy (11), and to avoid the conteſtations of that ſcience, which had ruined the faith of ſome perſons (12).

The antient Fathers governed themſelves by the ſame ſpirit; they required a ready ſubmiſſion to the authority of GOD, and looked upon the diſputes of Philoſophers as one of the greateſt obſtacles the true faith could meet in its way (13). Celſus the Philoſopher laughed at the conduct of the Chriſtians, Who, ſaid he (14), will neither hear your reaſons, nor give you any for what they believe, contenting themſelves with ſaying, Examine not, only believe; or Your faith will ſave you; and it is a maxim with them, that the wiſdom of the world is an evil . . . . If, as uſually, they confine themſelves to their examine not, only believe, they muſt at leaſt tell me what things thoſe are they would have me believe (15). But obſerve how he is anſwered (16). 'If it were poſſible for all men, 'neglecting the affairs of this life, to apply themſelves to ſtudy and meditation, we 'need ſeek no other way to make them embrace the Chriſtian religion: for, not to

---

(3) Note, that we mean not to condemn thoſe who labour to reconcile theſe myſteries with Philoſophy; their motives may be good, and their labour, by the bleſſing of God, may ſometimes be uſeful.

(4) Luke v. 27, and ix. 59.

(5) Acts xvi. 31.

(6) Matt. xi, 25.

(7) Ibid. xvi. 17.

(8) 1 Cor. xiii. 12.

(9) Ibid. ii, 14.

(10) Ibid. i, 26.

(11) Coloſ. ii. 8.

(12) 1 Tim. vi. 20, 21.

(13) See the paſſages of the Fathers which Mr de Launoi has compiled, ch. ii, of his book, de varia Ariſtotelis fortuna.

(14) Origen againſt Celſus, book i, cap. ii, pag. m. 5.

(15) Id. ibid. pag. 7.

(16) Id. ibid. pag. 5.

‘ſay any thing offenſive to others, no leſs exactneſs will appear in it than elſewhere, whether in the diſcuſſion of its doctrines (17), or in the illuſtration of the enigmatical expreſſions of its prophets, or in the ſignification of its Goſpel parables, and abundance of other things which happened, or were ſymbolically ordained. But, ſince neither the neceſſities of this life, nor the infirmities of men, will permit many perſons to apply themſelves to ſtudy, what more profitable method could be found for all the reſt of the world, than that which Jeſus Chriſt was pleaſed to uſe for the converſion of the people? And I would fain be told, with reſpect to the great number of thoſe who believe, and thereby have eſcaped the deluge of corruption in which they were plunged, which is better for them, to have thus changed their morals, and mended their lives, by believing without examination, that there are puniſhments for ſins, and rewards for good actions; or to have put off their converſion till they not only believed, but had carefully examined the foundations of thoſe doctrines? It is certain, that in following this method few people would have arrived ſo far as their plain and naked faith has conducted them; but moſt of them would have remained in their corruption . . . But ſince they make ſo much noiſe about believing without examining, we muſt further tell them, that as for us who obſerve the profit which hence redounds to the greateſt number, we frankly confeſs, that we recommend it to thoſe who are not in a capacity of forſaking all things to apply themſelves wholly to the ſearch of truth (18).’

This paſſage of St Paul, We walk by faith, and not by ſight (19), would alone ſuffice to convince us, that in a diſpute between two Philoſophers there is nothing to be gained by him who attempts either to prove the myſteries of the Chriſtian Religion, or to ſtand upon the defenſive. For herein lies the difference betwixt the faith of a Chriſtian and the ſcience of a Philoſopher; this faith produces a complete certainty, but its object ſtill remains inevident; ſcience, on the contrary, at once produces the evidence of the object, and a complete certainty of perſuaſion. A Chriſtian therefore attempting to maintain the myſtery of the Trinity againſt a Philoſopher, would oppoſe an inevident object againſt evident objections. Would not this be fighting blind-fold and with hands tied, againſt an adverſary who has the uſe of all the faculties of his body and mind? But if the Chriſtian could ſolve all the Philoſopher's objections, only by the principles of natural reaſon, the aſſertion of St Paul would not be true, that we walk by faith, and not by ſight: for ſcience, and not Divine faith, would be the portion of a Chriſtian.

Now can any man take offence at my acknowledging a truth which naturally reſults from the ſpirit of the goſpel, and the doctrine of St Paul?

MAXIMS common to Romiſh and Proteſtant Divines.

If theſe reflexions upon the conduct of the firſt ages have not ſufficient force; if, I ſay, ſuch objects conſidered at a diſtance, make not an impreſſion deep enough, let me intreat you to examine the maxims of the modern Divines. Both Papiſts and Proteſtants agree in this poſition, that reaſon is to be rejected in the judging of a controverſy about our myſteries; which amounts to this, that this conceſſion ſhall never be made, viz. That, if the literal ſenſe of a paſſage of Scripture includes inconceivable doctrines impugned by the moſt evident maxims of the Logicians and Metaphyſicians, it ſhall be declared falſe; and Reaſon, Philoſophy and Natural Light ſhall be the rule to be followed in the choice of a certain interpretation of Scripture preferably to all others. They not only ſay, that all thoſe are to be rejected who make ſuch a preliminary demand in the diſpute, but alſo maintain that they are ingaged in a way that can lead only to Scepticiſm, or Deiſm, or Atheiſm: ſo that the moſt neceſſary Barrier to preſerve the Chriſtian religion, is the obligation to ſubmit to the authority of God, and humbly to believe the myſteries he has been pleaſed to reveal, however inconceivable they be and impoſſible they appear to our reaſon.

It ſeems that the Papiſts and Lutherans ought more ſtrongly to inſiſt upon this principle than the Calviniſts; for the doctrine of the Real Preſence has a more particular need of it; and yet the Calviniſts are as jealous of this poſition as the others, and urge it with great zeal againſt the Socinians; and whenever they ſee ſome of their Divines go out of this common road, to make more room for reaſon, they write ſeverely againſt them, and make them ſuſpected of the Socinian Hereſy.

It would be eaſy to gather up the proofs of all I have ſaid, but this would be to very little purpoſe; for whoever is acquainted with books of controverſy, muſt know that the Roman Catholics continually recommend the ſacrificing our reaſon, and captivating the underſtanding, and that the Proteſtant Miniſters impute the Socinian impieties to the refuſal of this ſacrifice. The diſputes of the univerſity of Franeker, ſilenced by authority (20), and thoſe of the two French Miniſters (21) terminated (22) by the Walloon Synod, have made too much noiſe, and are of ſo late a date, that there is no need of proving it by any citations. I only ſay, that one of thoſe two miniſters maintained as the univerſal doctrine of the Church, and particularly of Calvin and his followers, that the foundation of faith is neither the evidence of the objects, nor the evidence of revelation; and that the Holy Ghoſt perſuades us of the myſteries of the Goſpel, without evidently ſhewing us what we believe, or the Divinity of the Scripture, or the truth

(17) This muſt be underſtood not with reſpect to the principles of Logic and Metaphyſics mentioned in this explanation (for it is certain the Fathers did not diſcuſs the doctrines of the Trinity, and Incarnation by thoſe rules) but with reſpect to principles taken from the word of God, when the queſtion is about a myſtery of the goſpel.

(18) Origen. ubi ſupra, pag. 6.

(19) 2 Cor. v. 7.

(20) In 1687. There are in the the Bibliotheque Univerſelle, Extracts of many books publiſhed pro and con upon this controverſy.

(21) Mr Jurieu, and Mr Saurin.

(22) In Sept. 1696.

truth of the ſenſe of ſuch and ſuch paſſages. He was acknowledged to be orthodox; his adverſary obtained a like teſtimony of his orthodoxy; but this proves nothing againſt me, for he owned that faith is inevident as to the object, and that the evidence accompanying it as to revelation is an effect of grace. He is therefore one of thoſe who ſay that myſteries are not under the juriſdiction of reaſon, and that reaſon or philoſophical light is not the rule we are to conſult when we diſpute on that matter.

Now, if all the Divines who are orthodox, with regard to the myſteries of the Trinity, and hypoſtatic Union, both Roman Catholics and Proteſtants unanimouſly reject the arbitration of reaſon, it is a manifeſt ſign they find it incapable of giving proofs or ſolutions in the controverſies concerning thoſe myſteries; for when the queſtion is about the exiſtence of God, they deſire nothing better than to diſpute by the light of reaſon, becauſe it furniſhes arms both to attack and repulſe the enemy, and to gain an entire victory. The reaſon therefore why they act quite otherwiſe, with reſpect to the Trinity and Incarnation, &c. is their knowing that Philoſophical principles are unable, inſufficient, to do good, but capable of doing much harm. If juſtice and prudence allow the excepting againſt a judge, it is only in caſe of incompetence and partiality. The more zeal a man has for his cauſe, the leſs he neglects his advantages; and if he has alſo a true ſenſe of his intereſt, he never excepts againſt well-affected perſons.

From all this I conclude, that there is nothing eaſier than to ſatisfy thoſe who have been offended with my conceſſion; for I need only deſire them to obſerve, that if they will be ſcandalized at it, they muſt complain that all the orthodox Divines are a ſcandal to them. There is no medium in this caſe: they muſt either approve what I have ſaid, or diſapprove what is ſaid by thoſe Divines who are moſt averſe to the Socinian Hereſies.

An anſwer to ſome objections: the firſt is, that we give too great advantage to Heretics and Infidels, by owning that their philoſophical objections againſt the myſteries of the New Teſtament cannot be anſwered.

If it is objected, that offence was juſtly taken at my conceſſion, ſince it is giving too great an advantage to the unbelievers, to allow that their objections againſt our myſteries cannot be anſwered philoſophically: I reply two things. Firſt, that they muſt then be offended not only at what I have ſaid on this ſubject, but alſo at what the moſt orthodox Divines have publiſhed concerning it. I ſay ſecondly, that this is not giving to the unbelievers any advantage they can juſtly boaſt of, as they might do if our preachers imitated thoſe Philoſophers, who give public notice that they are ready to defend ſuch and ſuch propoſitions againſt all oppoſers, and that at ſuch a day, and at ſuch an hour and place they will make them appear as clear as noon-day. If the Apoſtles, St Paul for example, when among the Athenians, had petitioned the Areopagus to permit him to enter the liſts with all the Philoſophers; if he had offered to maintain a diſputation upon the three perſons which are but one God, and upon the unity of the hypoſtaſis of the Divine and human nature in Jeſus Chriſt; and if before he began the diſpute he had acknowledged the truth of the rules eſtabliſhed by Ariſtotle in his Logic, either concerning the terms of oppoſition, or the requiſites of the premiſſes of a demonſtrative ſyllogiſm, &c. In fine, if theſe preliminaries being adjuſted, he had anſwered that our reaſon is too weak to comprehend the myſteries againſt which they propoſed their objections, he had been expoſed to all the ſhame that a nonpluſſed reſpondent can ever ſuffer. The victory of the Athenian Philoſophers had been complete; for he would have been judged and condemned by the very maxims which he had already owned to be certain. But if theſe Philoſophers had attacked him by the ſame maxims, after he declared to them the foundation of his faith, he might have oppoſed this barrier to them, viz. That his doctrines were unknown to reaſon, that they were revealed by God, and that we ought to believe them, though we do not comprehend them. The diſpute, to be regular, muſt not have turned upon the queſtion, Whether theſe doctrines were contrary to the maxims of Logic and Metaphyſics; but upon the queſtion, Whether God had revealed them. St Paul could not have the worſt of it, except it had been proved to him that God did not require the belief of thoſe things.

You ſee by this how imaginary is the pretended triumph of the unbelievers; for our Divines do not pretend to prove the Trinity and Incarnation by Philoſophical arguments; they admit only the word of God for the foundation and ſource of their proofs and ſolutions. This is their fortreſs, their place of arms, it is enough for them to defend it, and ward off all the blows levelled at it by an Heretic, who bottoms upon the ſame principle with them, viz. the Divine authority of the Scripture. It is no great matter if the enemy ſeize the reſt, being a country which they have voluntarily abandoned. It is no great victory to ſeize on a place which no body deſigned to keep. Facile erat vincere non repugnantes (23). - - - It was an eaſy matter to vanquiſh thoſe who made no reſiſtance.

To the end that thoſe who read this, and have no other book on this ſubject, may be fully aſſured that I do not advance a thing at random. I will fully convince them of what I have advanced. I will cite the teſtimony of two famous writers (24), one a Prieſt, and the other a Miniſter, and both very orthodox upon the Trinity, Incarnation, ſatisfaction of Jeſus Chriſt, and ſome other myſteries. ‘ This proceeding (25) is ‘ unreaſonable,

(23) Cicero, Tuſcul. Quæſt. lib. i, init. fol. m. 245, C.

(24) Mr Nicolle and Mr Claude.

(25) That is, to make a collection of reaſons which have ſomething ſurprizing againſt the Trinity, &c.

‘ unreaſonable, as being contrary to the firſt principles, and the very foundations of the Chriſtian religion. If this religion told men, that it propoſes to them a faith free from all difficulties; that nothing can be alledged againſt its myſteries with any ſort of probability; and that the proofs on which it eſtabliſhes the truths it teaches, are ſo clear as to overcome the incredulity and reluctance of all ſorts of perſons, however prepoſſeſſed; this would be a juſt ground for pretending to overthrow its doctrines, by thus heaping up probable objections againſt what it would make us believe. But it is very far from ſpeaking thus: it not only does not tell them that the truths it teaches cannot be attacked by any probable reaſons, but tells them it is neceſſary they ſhould be ſo, and that it is an infallible conſequence of the deſign God had in diſcovering himſelf to mankind by the true religion (26).’ Mr Claude having objected nothing to this paſſage of Mr Nicolle, muſt be deemed the approver of it; for if he had found any matter for cenſure in it, he was indiſpenſibly obliged to cenſure it in refuting, as he did, the book concerning the Perpetuity of Faith.

The ſecond objection is, that anſwers have been found to theſe philoſophical objections.

Let us ſee whether any juſt offence could be taken, under pretence that the Philoſophical objections againſt the doctrine of the Trinity, &c. ſilence not the Profeſſors of Divinity, and that in their public diſputations on theſe points, they ſolve all the difficulties that can be propoſed to them. I deſire ſuch as ſhall urge this to conſider two things: one is, that their objection cannot be good againſt me, without being ſo againſt all the Divines who acknowledge that the great myſteries of the goſpel are inexplicable by natural reaſon: the other is, that the Proteſtants cannot make uſe of this objection; for it proves too much; namely, that the doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation is not liable to invincible attacks, philoſophically ſpeaking. It is the general doctrine of the Roman Catholics, that a body may be in ſeveral places at the ſame time. The Thomiſts, contenting themſelves with what is neceſſary, have not dared to affirm it can be ſo circumſcriptively, but at moſt as Jeſus Chriſt is under the ſacramental ſpecies. The other ſchoolmen, eſpecially the Jeſuits, have been much bolder; they have maintained the circumſcriptive replication (27), and in this have reaſoned more conſequentially than the Thomiſts; for if the reaſons alledged againſt this replication were good, the definitive replication (28) would not be maintainable. The replication is not only taught by the Divines, but alſo in all the bodies of Philoſophy, and it is always one of the theſes ordered to be publickly maintained by the ſtudents in Natural Philoſophy. All imaginable objections are diſcuſſed in the books of ſcholaſtic Divines, which treat of the ſacrament of the Euchariſt, and in the bodies of Philoſophy, in the place where the queſtions de loco are explained: not one of thoſe objections remains unanſwered: Does this hinder the Proteſtants from perſiſting to maintain that this poſition, viz. a body is in ſeveral places at the ſame time, is liable to a thouſand contradictions, and abſolutely impoſſible? Nothing therefore can be inferred in favour of an opinion, from the poſſibility of oppoſing ſome diſtinction or ſchool-term againſt whatever the moſt ſubtle adverſaries can object (29). All does not conſiſt in making an anſwer, but in giving a ſolution which raiſes ſome idea, and is exempt from the petitio principii, and which ſhews the objection to be grounded upon foundations that have no connexion with common notions. Here you ſee three requiſites which are wanting in the ſchoolmens anſwers to the objections againſt Tranſubſtantiation: therefore their laſt and principal refuge is to ſay, that the omnipotence of God ſupplies what reaſon cannot comprehend, and that it is our duty to captivate our underſtanding, and ſacrifice our reaſon to the authority of the Church.

They have been no leſs ſubtile and fertile in inventing either difficulties, or anſwers, with reſpect to the Trinity, than with reſpect to Tranſubſtantiation. But the Socinians are as ill ſatisfied with theſe two kinds of anſwers, as the Proteſtants are with thoſe relating to Tranſubſtantiation: Both, ſay the Socinians, want the three requiſites abovementioned: they take for granted what is in queſtion; they are as obſcure, or even obſcurer than the doctrine itſelf, which is the ſubject of controverſy; they are too inconceivable to be confuted; it is a diſpute wherein night parts the combatants; for if the reſpondent wraps himſelf in a diſtinction wholly incomprehenſible, the opponent muſt neceſſarily retire; or if he ſtays, he does not ſee where he can ſtrike a blow. No man will ſhoot where there is not the leaſt glimpſe whereby to diſcover or gueſs at the mark; and as the higheſt degree of evidence has this property, that it cannot be proved, the loweſt degree of inevidence has this deſtiny, that it cannot be attacked. So that no conſequence can be drawn in favour of a doctrine from this, that its opponents, though never ſo well provided with Philoſophical weapons, at laſt meet with an intrenchment of diſtinctions, involved in ſo impenetrable a cloud, that they are forced to proceed no farther.

There are both in the Proteſtant and Romiſh communion a great many perſons who are diſſatiſfied with the explications of the ſchoolmen, and think that theſe people have more confounded than explained the myſteries of religion. Some Proteſtant Divines could wiſh that the ſcripture-terms had only been made uſe of, that the whole doctrine of the Trinity had been expreſſed in five or ſix lines, and that, inſtead of following the diſputants from one objection to another, they had been told, We do not propoſe

(26) Nicolle, Perpetuité de la Foi, pag. m. 92, 93.

(27) It is thus the Schoolmen call the poſition of the ſame body in ſeveral places, without a penetration of dimenſions.

(28) Thus they call the poſition of the ſame body in many places at once, with penetration of dimenſions.

(29) Compare with this what I have ſaid in the article ZENO of Elea, concerning the objections relating to the diviſibility of matter.

this to you as a thing you are to comprehend, but as a thing you are to believe: if you cannot believe it, beg the grace of God that you may; if you obtain nothing by your prayers, your diſtemper is incurable: our diſtinctions and ſubtilties will ſerve only to harden you; you will never leave off complaining that we explain to you one obſcure doctrine by another more obſcure, obſcurum per obſcurius. It is very probable that this myſtery propoſed in a few words, according to the ſimplicity of the ſcripture, would much leſs ſtartle and fright reaſon, than it does by that great train of explications which accompanies it in Thomas Aquinas's Commentators. Many Roman Catholics would heartily ſay, if they durſt, againſt the ſubtilties of the ſchoolmen, what the Abbot Faydit has publiſhed of them: but though they had not the ſame courage he had to publiſh a ſtrong invective on this ſubject, they nevertheleſs think as he does. See the margin (30).

Mr Balzac has ſaid excellent things in the fifth diſcourſe of his Socrate Chrêtien (31). I ſhall give ſome part of it. ‘They who have tranſlated from one language into another with the greateſt reputation, have miſtaken rivers for mountains, and men for cities. The miſtakes of your Divines are not leſs than thoſe. Human reaſon falls into more ſtrange miſtakes when it treats of divine things: being weak and defective it ought to be cautious, and conſider its own ſtrength; it ought to be more diſcreet and reſerved: there may be an exceſs in the deſire of learning and enquiring: it is a vice to know too much news; ancient morality has condemned it: Theophraſtus's characters do not forget it. And if that be true which was heretofore ſaid, THAT WE OUGHT NOT TO BE CURIOUS IN A FOREIGN REPUBLIC; what audaciousneſs is it, I pray, what ſacrilege, for a citizen of the lower world, an inhabitant of the earth, to meddle ſo much with the things above, and the affairs of heaven? In what country is he more a ſtranger than in that? Is there any Republic more unknown to him? Is there any foreign place he is more remote from, or has leſs ſociety and correſpondence with? The profound reſpect we owe to that majeſty which conceals himſelf, forbids our prying into it with ſo much diligence and forwardneſs. Let us ſtop at his outworks and ramparts, without purſuing him into his fort and intrenchments; let us adore the veils and clouds he has placed betwixt us and him. Since he inhabits a light inacceſſible, let us leave off attempting the place of his abode: let us not endeavour to ſurprize him by the ſubtilty of our queſtions, to force him with the violence of our arguments. If the preſervation of our eyes be valuable, if our life be dear to us, let us ſhun that formidable preſence, that fatal light, that light which dazzles angels and kills men (32). . . . At the unmeaſurable diſtance we are from him, confined to the loweſt ſtation of the world he has built, we would aſcend his throne, and touch his crown. We aſpire to his ſtricteſt confidence and familiarity; at leaſt, we pretend to ſee him with the eyes of fleſh, to comprehend him with a mind drowned in blood, and buried in matter. We undertake to diſcourſe of his nature and his eſſence, to give an account of his conduct and deſigns, with the jargon of Ariſtotle's Philoſophy (33).’

Balzac, in this diſcourſe, had the Spaniſh ſchoolmen in view; but there is no ſubject in which they better deſerve this cenſure, than their explications of the myſtery of the Trinity: ſo little reaſon is there to conclude they have ſucceeded well, under the pretence of their inventing anſwers to objections.

But to be impartial to every body, we muſt ſay, that thoſe who engage in diſputes with the Socinians, and take new roads, ſeldom fail to loſe their way. This has been ſeen in England five or ſix years ago (34): a famous Divine, thinking he could not confute ſome Socinian tracts by the hypotheſis of the ſchools, imagined another; but it was pretended that he eſtabliſhed Tritheiſm, and his hypotheſis was not ſuffered to take footing. From whence we may infer how impoſſible it is to confute the Philoſophical objections of the Socinians; and ſince they acknowledge the ſcripture, they ought immediately to be attacked by it. This is the weak ſide of their defence; the other is the ſtrong ſide.

As deſirous as I am to be ſhort, I muſt obſerve the method taken by an able Divine, who has ſince been many years Biſhop of Saliſbury, to refute the objections of a famous Atheiſt (35) whom he converted. He has given us an account of the conferences he had with him, where we find, amongſt other things, that in anſwering the difficulties upon the myſteries of the goſpel, he had only recourſe to this, that the incomprehenſibility of a doctrine is not a ſufficient reaſon to reject it, ſince there are a great many moſt certain things in nature which it is impoſſible to comprehend. He mentioned ſome of them, and particularly the union of the ſoul and body. It had been objected to Dr Burnet, that it is not in the power of man to believe what he does not conceive; and that it is opening a door to all the cheats and impoſitions of prieſts, to give credit to myſterious doctrines. He excepted to the belief of myſteries in the Chriſtian Religion; which he thought no man could do, ſince it is not in a man's power to believe that which he cannot comprehend: and of which he can have no notion. The believing myſteries, he ſaid, made way for all the jugglings of prieſts, for they getting the people under them in that point, ſet out to them what they pleaſed; and giving it a hard name, and calling it a Myſtery, the

---

(30) To know to what a ſtrange perplexity the Abbot Faydit has reduced the Schoolmen, we need only conſult the author who has attempted to anſwer him, or the excellent extract Mr de Beauval has given of his anſwer, in the Hiſt. des Ouvr. des Savans, May 1699, pag. 214, & ſeq.

(31) Intituled, Concerning the too great ſubtilty in matters of religion,

(32) Balzac, Socrate Chrêtien, pag. m. 57, & ſeq.

(33) Id. ibid. 62, 63.

(34) I write this in November, 1701.

(35) John Wilmot E. of Rocheſter, born April 1638, who died penitent in 1680. A man who diſtinguiſhed himſelf both by his wit, and his writings which are full of ingenious and ſatirical ſtrokes; and one of thoſe Atheiſts who live according to their principles; for he plunged himſelf into the greateſt exceſs of drunkenneſs and lewdneſs. See the Hiſtory of his converſion by Dr Gilbert Burnet.

people were tamed, and eaſily believed it (36). The Doctor anſwered (37), that we muſt not wonder that the eſſence of God is incomprehenſible, ſince there is in every being ſomething we cannot account for (38), and the poſſibility of ſeveral facts acknowledged to be true by all the world, may yet be attacked by ſpecious arguments (39); and therefore the revelation of the myſtery of the Trinity and Incarnation, and ſome others, being certain we ought to ſubject our reaſon to them; for the ſole argument that can be oppoſed to them is, that they are above our reaſon; but is not the ſame difficulty to be found in ſeveral things which we admit to be true (40). He was ſo far from reckoning the ſchoolmens anſwers any thing, that on the contrary he confeſſed they only ſerved to render the difficulties more obſcure. There have been too many niceties brought in indeed, rather to darken than explain theſe: They have been defended by weak arguments, and illuſtrated by ſimilies not always ſo very apt and pertinent. And new ſubtilties have been added, which have rather perplexed than cleared them. All this cannot be denied; the oppoſition of Heretics antiently, occaſioned too much curioſity among the Fathers: which the Schoolmen have wonderfully advanced of late times. But if myſteries were received, rather in the ſimplicity in which they are delivered in the ſcriptures, than according to the deſcantings of fanciful men upon them, they would not appear much more incredible, than ſome of the common objects of ſenſe and perception (41).

Let us not forget this obſervation. Luther, and ſeveral other Proteſtant Divines had never maintained that there are things falſe in Philoſophy which are true in Divinity (42), if they had believed that the anſwers made to the objections of the Philoſophers againſt our myſteries were ſatisfactory to reaſon; for they maintained this only on account of thoſe myſteries (43).

I do not ſee therefore that hitherto the objections I had to ſolve in this explanation have been able to put me to any difficulty. Let us try in ſome others.

The third objection, is, that I ought not to have applied to the arguments of the Manichees, what might be acknowledged with reſpect to the arguments againſt the myſteries of the Goſpel.

If it be objected, that my conceſſion is ſcandalous, becauſe it relates not to the Philoſophical reaſons which may impugn the Trinity, Incarnation, and ſome other myſteries, but to the diſputes about the origin of evil; that objection will be very faulty: For, firſt, the objector will be ignorant that the decrees of God concerning the fall of man, and the conſequences of this fall, are one of the moſt incomprehenſible myſteries of religion; ſecondly, That our moſt orthodox Divines acknowledge it.

The writings of St Paul teach us, that this great Apoſtle, propoſing to himſelf the difficulties concerning Predeſtination, could get out of them no otherwiſe than by aſſerting the abſolute power of God over his creatures (44), with an exclamation upon the incomprehenſibility of his ways. Could he more clearly ſignify, than by ſuch a ſolution, that the doctrine of the decrees of God concerning the deſtiny of the Elect and Reprobate is inexplicable? Is not this telling us in plain terms, that Predeſtination is one of the myſteries which moſt overwhelm human reaſon, and moſt unavoidably require it to humble itſelf under the authority of God, and ſacrifice itſelf to the ſcripture? The objections it ſuggeſts againſt the myſteries of the Trinity and Incarnation, are for the moſt part ſenſible only to thoſe who have ſome tincture of Logic and Metaphyſics; and belonging to the ſpeculative ſciences, they have leſs force upon the generality of men: but thoſe it ſuggeſts againſt Adam's ſin, and Original Sin, and the eternal damnation of an infinite number of people, who cannot be ſaved without an efficacious grace, which God grants only to his Elect, are founded upon principles of Morality, which are known to every body, and which conſtantly ſerve for a rule both to the learned and ignorant to judge whether an action be unjuſt or not. Theſe principles are the moſt evident, and work upon the mind and heart; ſo that all the faculties of man revolt, when we muſt impute to God a conduct which is not conform to this rule. Nay, the ſolution which is drawn from God's infinity, and is employed as a powerful motive to captivate the underſtanding, is not exempt from a new difficulty; for if that infinite diſtance which raiſes God above all things, ought to perſuade us that he is not ſubject to the laws of human virtues, we cannot be certain that his juſtice engages him to puniſh evil, and we could not confute thoſe who ſhould maintain that he is the author of ſin, and yet puniſhes it very juſtly, and in all this does nothing but what is conſiſtent with the infinite perfections of a ſupreme being; becauſe thoſe perfections are not to be adjuſted to our ideas of virtue.

It is plain therefore, that the doctrine concerning Adam's ſin, with its dependences; is, of all the myſteries unconceivable to reaſon and inexplicable by its maxims, that which moſt neceſſarily obliges us to ſubmit to revealed truth, notwithſtanding all the oppoſitions of Philoſophical truth.

It were to be wiſhed that this point had been always remembered; for the unhappy diſputes about grace, which have cauſed ſo many troubles, were only derived from the treating of this myſtery as a thing reconcileable with our weak reaſon. The Roman Catholics here have acted inconſiſtently; they have inſulted Calvin with the utmoſt fury, for literally following St Paul's doctrine, whilſt they would explain it in a milder ſenſe, that human reaſon might be ſatisfied with it. They had not the ſame regard for reaſon in the explication of the paſſages relating to the Trinity, and the Sacrament of the Euchariſt. Balzac's ſtrokes againſt the Proteſtant Divines would do well againſt the (36) Some paſſages of the life and death of John, Earl of Rocheſter, &c. pag. 100, of the Edit. 1680.

---

(37) Ibid. pag. 101, & ſeq.

(38) For myſteries it is plain there is in every thing, ſomewhat, that is unaccountable. Ibid. pag. 101.

(39) Ibid. pag. 103, 104.

(40) Note, That the author who publiſhed a treatiſe of religion againſt the Atheiſts, Deiſts, and new Pyrrhoniſts, at Paris, in 1677, ſtrongly preſſed the argument, That unbelievers cannot avoid in their principles believing things incomprehenſible. See chap. iii, iv, and v, of the ſecond part.

(41) Some paſſages, &c. Ibid. pag. 106, 107.

(42) See, remark [C], of the article Hoffman (Daniel), and remark [KK], of the article Luther.

(43) See remark [KK], of the article Luther.

(44) See remark [E], of the article Arminius.

the Papiſts. The Miniſters, ſays he (45), ought to be laughed at as fools, ‘ after the advances they have made, and the reſerves they would keep to themſelves. When they ‘ have granted us the more, can they refuſe us the leſs? Having given us the myſteries ‘ of the Trinity and Incarnation, they have reſerved themſelves nothing afterwards. ‘ By granting theſe two great ſtrange and aſtoniſhing truths, they have given up the ‘ liberty of their mind; which liberty muſt either lie loſt or preſerved full and entire. ‘ The ſame authority which aſſures them of the certainty of the Apoſtles Creed, aſſures ‘ them of the validity of all the other parts of religion; and they have no better ‘ grounds for conteſting the latter, than the former. The authority being infallible, it ‘ is univerſally infallible; it is equally infallible. The Chriſtian being a captive to ‘ faith, and not a judge of doctrines, ought to obey the voice which ſpeaks, without ‘ deliberating about the words, becauſe the words would not perſuade him, if the voice ‘ had not already done it. A man has no longer a right to his firſt freedom, after he ‘ has taken upon him the yoke of the commanding and victorious God. It is too late ‘ to make uſe of our reaſon, after we have ſubmitted it to the obedience of faith. How ‘ ridiculous, I pray, would it be, one while to quit reaſon, and another to reſume it; ‘ to make choice of ſome pleaſing parts of Chriſtianity, and to reject the diſpleaſing ‘ ones; to be half Infidel, and half Believer! This would be making terms with Jeſus ‘ Chriſt, and entring upon articles with the Church. It would be doing ſomething ‘ worſe, paſſing from complaiſance to giving the lie, admitting part of what ſhe pro‘ poſes to our belief, and maintaining the reſt to be falſe.’ Calvin might thus have defended himſelf againſt thoſe who diſliked his hypotheſis of Predeſtination; he might have told them, You are prepoſterouſly ſqueamiſh, after having digeſted the difficulties of one God in three perſons, and thoſe of Tranſubſtantiation. You will not hearken to Philoſophical arguments on that head; you talk of nothing but the omnipotent power of God; you complain of our denying it, when we deny the preſervation of accidents without a ſubject, and the preſence of a body in different places: Why then do ye attack the myſtery of Predeſtination by human arguments? Why do not ye believe that the power of God extends even to the reconciling the liberty of creatures with the neceſſity of his decrees, and his juſtice with the puniſhment of a ſin neceſſarily committed?

Be it how it will, it cannot be denied that the introduction of moral evil, with the doctrines annexed to it, is one of the moſt impenetrable myſteries which God has revealed to men. I will cite ſome authors upon it.

I repeat not what may be read in another place of this work (46), viz. that a Proteſtant Divine publickly confeſſes that the hypotheſis of St Auſtin and Calvin is to him an inſupportable burden, and that he embraces it only becauſe none of the other hypotheſis are able to eaſe him. Calvin's words which I have cited (47) deſerve a place here. ‘ Throughout his writings he conſtantly declares that wherever the queſtion is about ‘ ſin, the name of God ought not to be engaged in it, ſince nothing belongs to the nature ‘ of God but perfect juſtice and equity. It is therefore a baſe and horrible calumny to ‘ involve in this crime a man who has ſerved the Church of God ſo well, as if he made ‘ God the author of ſin. It is true he every where affirms, that nothing is done but ‘ by the will of God; and yet he maintains, that the wicked actions of men are ſo ‘ directed and governed by the ſecret judgment of God, that he has no communication ‘ with their vices. The ſum of his doctrine is, that God directs all things, by ‘ means wonderful and unknown to us, to what end he pleaſes, ſo that his eternal will ‘ is the firſt cauſe of all things. And he confeſſes it to be an incomprehenſible myſtery, ‘ that God ſhould will what to us appears unreaſonable; and neverthelеſs he affirms, ‘ that we are not to enquire too curiouſly or audaciouſly into his conduct, ſince the ‘ judgments of God are a profound abyſs, and that it is better to adore with all re‘ verence the myſteries and ſecrets which exceed our capacity, than to ſcan them, or ‘ intrude too far into them (48).’ You ſee how he adiviſes us not to approach this abyſs, but with a ſpirit of ſubmiſſion and reverence for this great and incomprehenſible myſtery. Mr Morus being Miniſter and Profeſſor of Divinity in the ſame city of Geneva as Calvin had been, vehemently declaimed againſt the reformed Divines who diſputed about the univerſality of Grace. He had an eye to Amyraldus and Spanhemius. He gave them the ſame reprimand as is uſed to audacious writers, who have the boldneſs to dive into the moſt hidden ſecrets of the Creator. He puts them in mind of the weightieſt maxims that are employed to recommend to us the ſacrificing of our reaſon, and the captivating our underſtanding to the authority of God with reſpect to the moſt incomprehenſible myſteries. His words have ſo much emphaſis, that they cannot be tranſlated without loſing a great deal of their energy. I will therefore give the original. ‘ Quis non videat quæ de Trinitate, quam ſibi ſoli notam vetus ait ſcriptor, ‘ deque decretis Dei, quorum non aliter conſtat ratio, quam ſi nemini reddatur, deque ‘ aliis ejuſmodi, quæ nec licet ſcire, nec prodeſt, anxie diſputantur, non tuto, ſed fru‘ ſtra, diſputari? Nemo cœleſte myſterium diſcutiat ratione terrena, divina verba modis ‘ non penſemus humanis, inquit Chryſologus. Credere, quod juſſum eſt, non eſt diſ‘ cutere permiſſum, ait Ambroſius. Lauda, venerare, tuum eſt neſcire, quod agitur, ‘ inquit Author de vocatione Gentium. Quæ Deus occulta eſſe voluit, non ſunt ſcru-

(45) Balzac, Socrate Chreſtien, Diſcourſe xii, pag. m. 320, & ſeq.

(46) See, above, the article PAULICIANS, citations (44), (45).

(47) See citat. (16), of the article SYNERGISTS.

(48) Calvin's brief anſwer to the calumnies of a certain pragmatic, attemping to defame the Doctrine of God's eternal predeſtination, pag. 2037, of his Tracts, Geneva 1611.

tanda; quæ manifeſta fecit, non ſunt negligenda, ne & in illis illicite curioſi, & in his damnabiliter inveniamur ingrati. Nos autem faſtidimus aperta in ſcripturis, clauſa, & obſignata, in cœlis quærimus, nunquam viſa perambulare, oculis quoque ſubducta calcare pedibus, ἐμβατεύειν, Pauli vox agnoſcitur, ſatagimus ardeliones. Quare hi ſic, illi aliter, abſit ut dicamus judicium eſſe luti, non figuli, quæ ſunt Auguſtini verba, compeſcat ſe humana temeritas, & quod non eſt, non quærat, ne id, quod eſt, non inveniat: Ὅτι ἀκατάληπτον τὸ Θεῖον Damaſcenus aliique præſcribunt. Quid æternis minorem conſiliis animum fatigas? Audi Tertullianum: Præſtat, inquit, per Deum neſcire, quia ipſe non revelaverit, quam per hominem ſcire, quia ipſe præſumſerit; cedat curioſitas fidei, cedat gloria ſaluti. Audi Scripturam: ARCANA DEO, revelata nobis, & filiis noſtris. Moſes Dei Vocem audivit; faciem non vidit; quia fide, non viſu, ambulamus, & cujus ferre Majeſtatem non poſſumus, à poſteriori, ut loquuntur, opera cum Moſe luſtramus. Deus abſconditus habitat in caligine, inquit Rex Pacificus; in luce, ſed inacceſſa, inquit cœleſtis Apoſtolus. Hic ſubvectus in tertium cœlum quæ viſere potuit, non potuit enarrare: nos humi ſerpentes adhuc enarramus velut conſcii, quæ nunquam, ne per nebulam quidem, vidimus. Non conſtat ſine arcano Majeſtas, nubes Dei gloriam obumbrat, Arca oppanſo velo tegitur: nos in horribile Dei Sacrarium emiſſitios oculos evibramus, & nondum bene initiati Epoptas agimus. Ut ad ignem, Solemque, ſic ad Deum accedamus, hactenus ut calore foveamur, non voraci flamma, non radiis æſtuantibus hauriamur (49). - - - - - - As for thoſe diſputes relating either to the Trinity, which an ancient author ſays that no body knew except himſelf, or to the decrees of God, for which no man can preſume to render a reaſon, or other points of the like nature, which we are neither permitted nor concerned to know, is it not obvious that theſe controverſies are not only bold and dangerous, but alſo vain and unprofitable. Let no man, ſays Chryſologus, examine a heavenly myſtery by earthly reaſon; neither let us weigh the word of God in the ſcale of human judgment. What we are commanded to believe, let us believe, ſays Ambroſius, but we are not permitted to ſift and canvaſs matters of faith. Praiſe and adore the diſpenſations of providence, it becomes you to be ignorant of the reaſons of them, ſays the author of the book on the calling of the Gentiles. We muſt neither pry into what God hath thought fit to conceal from us, nor refuſe our aſſent to the truths he hath been pleaſed to manifeſt and reveal, leſt in the former caſe we ſhould be found ſinfully curious, and in the latter, ungrateful, even to our condemnation. Nevertheleſs, while we deſpiſe the truths revealed to us in Scripture, we pry into the ſecrets of heaven, and would there diſcover what God hath concealed, tread in paths unſeen and unknown, intrude upon, and are buſy after things the moſt remote from our knowlege and diſcernment. From hence ariſes the great diverſity of our opinions, even in matters of the higheſt importance. Let us therefore check our raſhneſs, let us not ſeek after what is hidden, leſt we ſhould miſs of what is revealed. Divine things are to us incomprehenſible, as Damaſcenus and others have written. Why ſhouldſt thou rack thy thoughts, and buſy thyſelf about the eternal purpoſes of God, ſince they are beyond thy reach? Hear the words of Tertullian. It is better for us not to know what God hath concealed, becauſe he has not revealed theſe things, than to know what man hath diſcovered, becauſe he is preſumptuous; let our curioſity give place to our faith, and our vanity to our ſalvation. Hear the words of the Scripture. THE MYSTERIES OF GOD belong unto GOD, but the things which are revealed, to us and to our children. Moſes heard the voice of God, but did not ſee his face, becauſe we walk by faith, and not by ſight, and of that God the glory of whoſe majeſty we are not able to bear, we behold, with Moſes, the works, only as it were in their back parts. God being hidden dwelleth in darkneſs, ſays Solomon; in light, but inacceſſible, ſays St Paul. That Holy Apoſtle was carried up to the third heavens, but what he beheld, he was not able to relate; whereas we who are reptiles on this earth, pretend to relate what we never ſaw, no not through a cloud, as if we were thoroughly acquainted with theſe ſecrets. Majeſty never appears open or expoſed to our view, a cloud overſhadows the divine glory, the ark is covered over with a large vail. Yet we pierce with prying eyes into the tremendous myſteries of God, and before we are well initiated, pretend to a thorough knowledge of them. Let us approach the divine majeſty, as we would the fire, or the ſun, that we may be nouriſhed by the heat, but not deſtroyed by the devouring flames, and ſcorching beams of his glory.’ Very lately one of thoſe who ſucceeded Calvin in his chair, has in a moſt diſtinct manner acknowledged the incomprehenſibility of Predeſtination. I have not as yet had the pleaſure of ſeeing his new ſyſtem of Divinity; but we find this account of it in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres: ‘He begins with a queſtion extremely difficult, and which is a ſtumbling-block to the profane and the weak; namely, why God has permitted ſin, which is the cauſe of ſuch a number of evils, and which he might eaſily prevent? Mr Pictet does not conceal the ſtrength of the difficulty, but propoſes it in its full force. They who ventured to affirm that God knows not futurity, when it depends on the freewill of intelligent creatures, eaſily diſengage themſelves from this difficulty, by ſaying God has not prevented what he has not foreſeen: But this is leaping into an abyſs to avoid a precipice; and it is ſtill more difficult to conceive that God ſhould not know futurity, than it is to conceive he has not hindered ſin, though he foreſaw it. The opinion of thoſe who ſay God has permitted it to manifeſt his wiſdom, or to exerciſe his (49) Alexander Morus, Oratione de Pace, pag. 53, & ſeq. Edit. Amſterd. 1648, in 12mo.

‘ his juſtice and mercy, ſeems more reaſonable. And yet all this is not ſatisfactory; for, beſides that it was not perhaps impoſſible for God to manifeſt his attributes otherwiſe, is it, for inſtance, a great ſign of mercy, to permit a great evil which might be prevented, in order to have an occaſion of remedying it? Mr Pictet ſincerely confeſſes, that as the Scripture gives us no reaſon of God's conduct on this occaſion, and ſufficiently intimates that there are here depths impoſſible for us to ſound, we ought not to attempt it (50).’

Any man who can be reaſonably offended at what I have ſaid in the articles concerning Manicheiſm, may likewiſe be juſtly offended with this Profeſſor of Geneva's doctrine, as orthodox as it is.

Let us add alſo the teſtimony of a Roman Catholic, that nothing may here be wanting. ‘ There are ſome ſhallow wits, who had rather condemn boldly what they do not underſtand in the holy Fathers of the Church, than humble themſelves, as They did, under the weight of the difficulties that are found in the explication of the myſteries of our faith. For the juſtification of a ſinner, and the ſanctification of a Chriſtian, is a myſtery, and a great one. And becauſe men do not look upon it as a myſtery, they boldly attempt to remove all its difficulties, they frame ſyſtems which bring every thing to evidence and demonſtration, if we believe the authors of them; and they imagine a Scientia media in God, invented at firſt by the Semi-Pelagians, and whereof Pope Clement VIII, who well underſtood this ſubject, was wont to ſay, as Lemos * relates, that it was an human invention to accommodate all things in appearance. Away with thoſe human inventions, which explain not the myſteries but by deſtroying them, and give not the mind ſatisfaction but by ſeducing it with the fallacious appearances of light and evidence. Let us receive with humility what the Scripture and tradition diſcover of them. Let us willingly be ignorant of what God will conceal from us. Let us ſtop where the Apoſtles and Doctors of the Church have ſtopped; and when we read St Auſtin, ſo far from inſulting him as a writer who goes aſtray and leads his followers to the precipice of error, let us acknowledge it is not from his expreſſions the difficulties proceed, but from the ſubject itſelf, as he anſwers Julian (51).’

THE fourth objection is, that I have uſed a moſt ſhocking compariſon.

Let us ſee whether they could be juſtly ſhocked at a certain compariſon which I have mentioned (52). I know ſeveral people have complained of it, ſome becauſe they were not uſed to controverſial books, and others becauſe they had not freſh ideas of what they had formerly read in ſuch books. Whatever be the ground of the offence they have taken, it may be eaſily removed. We need only repreſent to them that the moſt uſual method of the controverſiſts is what they call reductio ad abſurdum, reducing their adverſaries to an abſurdity. They chiefly endeavour to make it appear that the neceſſary conſequence of the opinion they refute, is that the conduct of God would be execrable, and they make no ſcruple of ſpeaking very ill of the God of their adverſaries, that is of God conſidered ſuch as he would be in caſe the opinion in queſtion was received. They boldly employ the moſt ſhocking compariſons. The Roman Catholics maintain that Calvin introduced a God who is deceitful, cruel, and inhumane, a God void of juſtice, reaſon, and goodneſs (53), leſs innocent and leſs a God, than the God of Epicurus (54). A God who hath two wills, one public, by which he declares that he is willing to ſave all mankind, and the other ſecret, by which he drives into impiety, all thoſe whom he loves not, in order to find a pretext for puniſhing them (55); ..... an inhumane maſter, who commands his ſervants to do things impoſſible, and inflicts on them an eternal puniſhment, becauſe they did not perform them, as the tyrant Caligula did (56). In fine, a God who like Caligula commands his laws to be written in ſo ſmall a character that no body can read them (57). The Arminian Bertius, diſputing with Piſcator, charged him with making God hold ſuch a conduct towards man, as was perfectly like that which Tiberius held towards Sejanus's daughters. He ſhewed this parallel (58) in two columns in one of which he ſet down what that Emperor did in order that Sejanus's daughters might not be ſtrangled againſt the laws. He ſet down in the other what Piſcator makes God do, in order that the Reprobate may not be puniſhed againſt the uſual forms. A reformed Divine makes uſe of a like battery againſt the Socinians. He maintains againſt them that their God is the greateſt of all the monſters that ever entered the imagination (59); that Plato and Zeno would have diſliked him (60); that he is a very ignorant and powerleſs God (61), full of imperfections (62), a fantome of a God defeated every moment by unforſeen events (63); a ſtrange God little better than the God of Epicurus (64), and lives from hand to mouth (65).

Such being the cuſtom of the controverſiſts, I had been a very bad Hiſtorian of the diſpute concerning the origin of evil, and an unfaithful relater of the reaſons on each ſide of the queſtion; if I had not mentioned the compariſon which has diſpleaſed certain perſons. It is that of God with a mother who forſeeing that her daughter &c; and obſerve that I have ſhewn that this compariſon may be retorted againſt the Socinians.

THE fifth objection is, that we ought not to own diſadvantageous truths.

If there are any who are offended at my departing from the maxim, that we ought never to own to our adverſaries that we cannot anſwer their objections; I ſhall not want a long apology, having but this ſhort queſtion to aſk them: is it not a commendable

---

(50) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, November 1701, pag. 493, 494, in the extract of the Chriſtian Theology of Mr Pictet, Miniſter and Profeſſor of Divinity at Geneva.

* Inventum humanum ad accommodandum in apparentia omnia. Lemos, Tom. i, pag. 2, Tract. 5. cap. xxxv, pag. 289.

(51) St Auguſtin juſtifie de Calviniſme, pag. 179, 180. It is a piece printed in 1689, with the letters of the Prince of Conti to Father de Champs.

(52) See, above, citat. (50), of the article PAULICIANS.

(53) See Mr Daillé, Replique à Adam & à Cottibi, Part. ii, chap. i, pag. 2.

(54) Ibid. pag. 3.

(55) Ibid.

(56) Ibid. p. 4.

(57) Ibid. pag. 12.

(58) Mr Andrew Carolus, a Lutheran Divine has inſerted this parallel, in his Memorabilia Eccleſiaſtica Sæculi XVII, lib. ii, pag. 385, 386.

(59) See the Jugement ſur les Méthodes d'expliquer la Grace, pag. 10.

(60) See the Tableau du Socinianiſme, Lettre i, p. 20.

(61) Ibid. pag. 23.

(62) Ibid. pag. 25.

(63) Ibid.

(64) Ibid. pag. 27.

(65) Ibid. pag. 34.

able thing to act ſincerely? If we are not obliged, are we not at leaſt permitted to act thus? The anſwer muſt be in the affirmative. I may therefore, ſhall I reply, make uſe of this laudable liberty, eſpecially when there is no decree of a ſynod or conſiſtory to tie a man's hands in that reſpect. If any one can produce a doctrinal determination ſigned by four Profeſſors of Divinity, and ſealed with the ſeal of ſome univerſity, which is no great demand; if any one, I ſay, can ſhew me ſuch an act, importing that no orthodox man ought to own, not even when it is moſt true, that certain objections of the heterodox are unanſwerable otherwiſe than by Scripture, I will engage to do every thing they will have me; for I am certain I ſhall never ſee ſuch an act.

But for a more ample ſatisfaction of the moſt ſcrupulous readers, I am willing to declare here, that wherever it is ſaid in my Dictionary that ſuch and ſuch arguments are unaſwerable, I do not deſire my readers ſhould believe they are actually ſo; I mean no more than that they ſeem to me unanſwerable. This has no ill conſequence; every one may imagine, if he pleaſes, that I am of this opinion for want of due penetration. I wiſh they would add, that in conforming my ſelf to the rules of ſincerity rather than to the public maxims of the ſpirit of a party, I nevertheleſs conſider that neither Hereſy nor Heatheniſm can draw any advantage from the unanſwerableneſs of their objections againſt myſteries (66).

The fixth objection is, that I have not confuted the Manichees.

The remaining difficulty will require a little longer examination. It is founded on my relating at large the objections of the Manichees, and not taking the trouble to produce the arguments which confute them. What follows will give ſatisfaction to all reaſonable readers. Four reaſons hindered me from inſiſting on the confutation of Manicheiſm.

The firſt is, that conſidering the preſent diſpoſition of men, there is no Hereſy leſs to be feared than this. People cannot but abhor an hypotheſis which admits an eternal and increated Being diſtinct from God, an enemy to God, and eſſentially wicked. And as for Free-thinkers, or in general all thoſe who have cultivated the ſtudy of Metaphyſics, and have any inclination to make a wrong uſe of it, they diſlike nothing more than a multiplicity of principles. The depravity of their taſte inclines them rather to be perfect Unitarians (67), than to declare for the Dualiſts (68).

In the ſecond place, all Chriſtians, however ignorant they be, ſo clearly include omnipotence and infinity in the idea of the Divine Nature, that they have no need of borrowed arms to fight the Manichees. This idea alone renders them ſtrong enough in an offenſive war; it affords them a ſolid confutation of that hypotheſis: I therefore did not think it neceſſary to ſhew any of my readers how it was to be attacked.

Thirdly, the obſervation I made, and ſufficiently enlarged upon in the remark [D] of the article Manichees, contains all that is neceſſary to make judicious perſons averſe to the doctrine of two principles. I ſaid the reaſonableneſs of a ſyſtem conſiſts in including nothing repugnant to evident ideas, and accounting for the phænomena. I added, that the ſyſtem of the Manichees has at beſt but the advantage of explaining ſeveral phænomena, which ſtrangely perplex the followers of the unity of a principle, but otherwiſe it ſtands on a ſuppoſition repugnant to our cleareſt ideas; whereas the other ſyſtem is built upon thoſe very notions. By this reflexion alone I give the ſuperiority to the Unitarians, and I take it from the Dualiſts. For all rational perſons will grant that a ſyſtem is much more imperfect, when it wants the firſt of the two qualities I have mentioned, than when it wants only the ſecond. If it be grounded upon an abſurd, confuſed, improbable ſuppoſition, this imperfection is not made up by a lucky explication of the phænomena; but if it does not explain them all ſucceſsfully, this is made up by the clearneſs, probability, and conformity, that is found in it with the laws and ideas of order; and they who have embraced it for this perfection, do not uſe to be diſcouraged under pretence that they cannot account for all matters of experience. They impute this defect to the narrowneſs of their minds, and imagine that in time, they ſhall be able to diſcover the true means of reſolving the difficulties (69). A Carteſian Philoſopher finding himſelf preſſed with an objection concerning the reaſon given by Des Cartes of the ebbing and flowing of the ſea, anſwered among other things, that an opinion ought not to be lightly abandoned, eſpecially when it is well grounded in other reſpects. It was objected to Copernicus, when he propoſed his ſyſtem, that Mars and Venus ſhould appear much greater at a certain time, becauſe they came nearer the earth by ſeveral diameters. The conſequence was neceſſary; and yet nothing of this appeared. Though he knew not what to anſwer, he did not think himſelf obliged to forſake it, but only ſaid that time would diſcover it, and that perhaps it was by reaſon of the great diſtance. This anſwer was taken for an evaſion, aud there ſeemed to be ſome reaſon for it: But the teleſcopes having been ſince invented, it appeared that what was oppoſed to him as a great objection, is the confirmation of his ſyſtem, and the overthrow of Ptolomy's (70).

Obſerve here by the by, a remarkable example of what I have ſaid concerning the perfection of a ſyſtem: that of Copernicus is ſo diſentangled, ſo ſimple, and ſo mechanical, that it ſhould be preferred before Ptolomy's, though it could not ſo well reſolve ſome phænomena.

---

(66) See what I anſwer to the firſt objection.

(67) Thus for brevity ſake we may call thoſe who with the Spinoziſts acknowledge but one ſubſtance in the univerſe: but note, that below I give that name to thoſe who acknowledge but one firſt cauſe of all things.

(68) Thus the Perſians call the followers of two principles. See citat. (77), of the article Zoroaster.

(69) Compare the article Zeno (of Elea) citat. (61).

(70) Gadroys, Lettre à Mr de la Grange-Trianon, pour ſervir de Reſponſe à celle que Mr Caſtelet à écrite, pag. 13, 14. That letter was publiſhed at Paris in 1677.

Laſtly, my fourth reaſon is, that I pointed out ſo good and ſo certain a remedy, that it would have been needleſs to uſe any other expedient to compenſate the diſadvantage. The ſyſtem of the Dualiſts accounts much better for ſeveral matters of fact than that of the Unitarians; but, on the other hand, it contains monſtrous abſurdities directly repugnant to the ideas of order. The Unitarian ſyſtem has the perfection oppoſite to this defect, and therefore, all things duly conſidered, is preferable to the other. This might in ſome meaſure have been ſufficient, but I further obſerved that the Unitarian ſyſtem was conſonant to ſcripture, and that of the Dualiſts invincibly confuted by the word of God. Can any one deſire a ſtronger and more demonſtrative proof, that the former ſyſtem is true, and the latter falſe? Muſt I after this, in order to remove all ſcruples, philoſophically confute Manicheiſm! Would not he have little faith, who ſhould want ſuch a diſcuſſion? God ſpeaks, and does not this fully convince you? Would you have other ſecurities? Would you have his teſtimony ratified by human reaſon (71)? Is not this unworthy of a man of common ſenſe? Do you fear the objections of the Manichees, when you have the authority of Revelation againſt them?

Why do you not ſay with the Scripture, If God is with us, who ſhall be againſt us (72)? If your reaſon cannot anſwer the difficulties which they raiſe againſt you concerning the origin of evil, and the decrees of Reprobation, anſwer them as the leſſer Catechiſm of the Reformed Churches anſwers this queſtion concerning the Trinity, How is this poſſible? It is a myſtery above our reaſon, and nevertheleſs very certain; FOR GOD HATH DECLARED IT TO US IN HIS WORD (73). Every Philoſophic ſubtilty, that tends to deprive us of a divine truth, ought to paſs with you for one of thoſe attacks which St Paul would have us repel by taking the buckler of faith (74). Take it therefore, and you will be pretty well armed; remember likewiſe that by fearing leſt this ſhould prove but a weak defence you expoſe yourſelf to the raillery which fell upon a Cardinal who pitied the Popes, when they had no other aſſiſtance but that of the Holy Ghoſt (75). ‘Non ho potuto d'hora in hora non compaſſionare i Pontefici con venti fra loro contrarii e tutti infeſti al corſo di lei eccetta l'aura dello Spirito Sancto (76). - - - I could not help frequently pitying the ſad caſe the Popes were in, when the courſe they ſteered was oppoſed by every wind except that of the Holy Ghoſt.’

But let us have ſome regard to the men of little faith, and propoſe in this place ſome arguments againſt Manicheiſm.

SOME arguments againſt Manicheiſm.

I will not attack it on its weak ſide; that is, I will not take advantage of the palpable abſurdities the Manichees ran into when they came to particular explications of their doctrine. They are ſo wretched, that it would be a ſufficient confutation of them, barely to relate them. We have ſeen a ſpecimen of it above (77). Let us ſpare them as to the ridiculous part of their ſyſtem, and only conſider it in the greateſt ſimplicity it can be reduced to.

I will not make uſe of this objection of Simplicius (78): the principle of good and the principle of evil would be contrary; but they could not be contrary without being under the ſame genus; therefore there would be ſomething above them, and that thing would be but one, and have all the eſſence of a principle: that thing therefore would be properly a principle, and conſequently there would not be two firſt principles; and thus the ſuppoſition of two contrary principles implies a contradiction. This is more ſubtle than ſolid; for genus's and ſpecies exiſt only in our underſtanding; and therefore the genus including the two contrary principles, would be at moſt but an idea of our mind, as the general idea of Being, which, according to ſome Chriſtian Philoſophers, is univocal to God and the creatures (79).

Simplicius's other arguments are much more ſolid (80). He ſhews to thoſe who admit two principles, one good, and the other evil, that their opinion is highly injurious to the God whom they call good; that it takes from him at leaſt half his power, and makes him timorous, unjuſt, imprudent, and ignorant. The fear, ſaid they, he was under of an irruption from his enemy, obliged him to forſake part of the ſouls, in order to ſave the reſt. Theſe ſouls were portions and members of his ſubſtance, and had committed no ſin. Simplicius concludes from thence, that ſuch a treatment was unjuſt, eſpecially ſince they were to be tormented, and in caſe they contracted any guilt, they were to remain eternally in the power of evil. So that the good principle not knowing how to manage his intereſt, expoſed himſelf to an eternal and irreparable mutilation. Add to this, that his fears were ill-grounded; for ſince the dominions of evil were from all eternity, and by their own nature, ſeparate from the dominions of good, there was no reaſon to fear that evil ſhould make an inroad upon the territories of its enemy. Simplicius taxes his adverſaries with giving leſs foreſight and power to the good principle than to the evil. The good principle did not foreſee the misfortune of the detachments he expoſed to the enemy's aſſaults (81), but the evil principle had very well known what detachments would be made againſt him, and had prepared the neceſſary engines to defeat them. The good principle was ſimple enough to ſuffer a mutilation, rather than receive into his diſtricts the detachments of the enemy, who by that means would have loſt part of his members. The evil principle had always been ſuperior (82);

had

---

(71) See remark [L], of the article PERROT (Nicolas).

(72) Romans viii, 31.

(73) Petit Catechiſme, §. ii.

(74) Epheſ. vi, 16.

(75) If the Popes, who have none but God with them, are pitied by Cardinal Palavicini a Jeſuit, and appear to be in the ſame pitiful condition to other men, how could they convert the Mohametans? They muſt therefore have ſome other aſſiſtance, beſides that of the Holy Ghoſt, in order to bring about ſuch converſions, and truly a Pope, who had no other aſſiſtance, would be in a very pitiful caſe. Evang. nouveau du Cardinal Palavicin, ch. iv, Art. i, pag. 142, Dutch Edit.

(76) Pallav. Iſtor. del Concilio di Trento, lib. v, cap. xiii, I tranſcribe theſe words as I find them in the Evangile nouveau, chap. iv, Art. i, pag. 142.

(77) In the remark [B], of the article MANICHEES, and in the remark [F], of the article ZOROASTER. See alſo the remark [E], of this laſt article.

(78) Simplic. in Epicteti Enchir. cap. xxxiv, pag. 163. Edit. Lugd. Bat. 1640.

(79) See the article ARNAULD (Anthony) Dr of the Sorbonne, remark [B].

(80) Id. ibid. pag. 165.

(81) Id. ibid. pag. 166.

(82) Note, that it appears from this that they acknowledged that evil exceeds good in this world.

had loſt nothing, and preſerved the conqueſts which he had made; but the good principle voluntarily had given up many things out of fear, injuſtice, and imprudence. The author concludes, that by refuſing to acknowledge that God is the author of evil, they make him evil all manner of ways. Τὸ δὲ ἀγαθὸν, ὡς οὗτοι φασὶν, ἑκουσίως ἑαυτὸ τῷ κακῷ συνέμιξε, καὶ δειλῶς καὶ ἀδίκως καὶ ἀνοήτως κατ' αὐτοὺς, μέχρι νῦν διεγένετο. ὥστε φεύγοντες αἴτιον αὐτὸν τοῦ κακοῦ εἰπεῖν, πάγκακον ὑπογράφουσι· καὶ κατὰ τὴν παροιμίαν φεύγοντες τὸν καπνὸν, εἰς πῦρ ἐμπεπτώκασι. Cum BONUM ultro ſeſe cum MALO commiſcuerit, ſeque & timidè, & injuſtè, & amenter (ſi illis credimus) geſſerit. Itaque dum mali cauſam dicere Deum recuſant, ab omni parte malum deſcribunt: & ut proverbio dicitur, fumum fugientes in ignem inciderunt (83).

I omit ſeveral other obſervations of Simplicius, againſt the hypotheſis of two principles, becauſe they attack thoſe parts of it, which were weak only through the particular defects in the arbitrary explications of thoſe who defended it. There is ſomething of this in his objections which I have abridged; but I will produce one that ſtrikes home the doctrine of two principles, though it be conſidered with the greateſt ſimplicity.

He ſays (84), it entirely deſtroys the liberty of our ſouls, and neceſſitates them to ſin, and conſequently implies a contradiction; for ſince the principle of evil is eternal and incorruptible, and ſo potent that God himſelf cannot conquer it, it follows that the ſoul of man cannot reſiſt the impulſe with which that principle moves it to ſin. But if a man be invincibly driven to it, he commits no murder, no adultery, &c. by his fault, but by a ſuperior external force, and in that caſe he is neither guilty nor puniſhable. Therefore there is no ſuch thing as ſin, and conſequently this hypotheſis deſtroys itſelf, ſince, if there be a principle of evil, there is no longer any evil in the world: but if there be no evil in the world, it is evident there is no principle of evil; whence we may infer, that they who ſuppoſe ſuch a principle, deſtroy, by a neceſſary conſequence, both evil and the principle of evil. Εἰ οὖν τούτων ὡς κακῶν ὄντων τὴν αἰτίαν ζητοῦντες, ἀρχὴν ὑπέθεντο κακοῦ· ἐκείνης δὲ ὑποστεθείσης καὶ βιαζομένης οὐκ ἔστιν οὐδὲν ἔτι κακόν· χαριέντως αὐτοῖς ὁ λόγος περιτέτραπται. συνάγεται γὰρ, ὅτι εἰ ἔστιν ἀρχὴ τοῦ κακοῦ, οὐκ ἔστι κακὸν ὅλως· εἰ δὲ μὴ ἔστι κακὸν, οὐδὲ ἀρχὴ ἂν εἴη τοῦ κακοῦ, ὥστε εἰ ἔστιν ἀρχὴ τοῦ κακοῦ, ὥς φασιν, οὔτε κακὸν ἔσται, οὔτε ἀρχὴ τοῦ κακοῦ. Quod ſi talium facinorum ut malorum cauſam inquirentes, MALI principium ſtatuerunt; eoque ſtatuto, & quidem vim inferente, malum nullum relinquitur: feſtivè ſuo ipſi (quod ajunt) gladio jugulantur. Nam inde colligitur: ſi MALI principium ſit, nullum omnino eſſe malum. Si vero malum non eſt, ne principium quidem MALI eſſe. Itaque ſi eſt principium mali ut ajunt, nec malum erit nec mali principium (85).

This objection is no leſs ſolid than ſubtle. It may be ſtrengthened by that which I have propoſed in another place (86), viz. That the doctrine of the Manichees is deſtructive of all religions, ſince if they argue conſequentially, they can hope for nothing from their prayers, nor fear any thing from their impiety. They muſt be perſuaded, that whatever they do, the good principle will be always propitious to them, and the evil one always adverſe: one of them can do nothing but good, and the other can do nothing but evil. They are determined to this by their nature, and they purſue this bent to the utmoſt extent of their power.

The argument I am going to make ſeems to me very ſtrong. The beſt way we can take in Philoſophical diſcuſſions, is to conſult the ideas of order. If we conſult them in the preſent diſpute, we ſhall plainly ſee that unity, and infinite power, and happineſs, belong to the maker of the world. The neceſſity of nature required that there ſhould be cauſes of all effects; and therefore a power ſufficient for the production of the world muſt have neceſſarily exiſted. Now it is much more conſonant to order, that this power ſhould be united in one ſubject, than divided into two or three, or an hundred thouſand. Let us therefore conclude, that it has not been divided, and that it reſides entire in one ſole nature, and that therefore there are not two firſt principles, but one only. There would be as much reaſon to admit an infinity of them, as the Atomiſts did, as to admit only two.

If it be contrary to order, that the power of nature ſhould be divided into two ſubjects, generally ſpeaking; it would be much more ſtrange, if thoſe two ſubjects were enemies, and diametrically oppoſite: Nothing but all manner of confuſion would ariſe from it: What one would do, the other would undo; and ſo either nothing would be done, or if any thing was done, it would be an odd and diſorderly work, and very far from the regularity of this univerſe. Thus you ſee Manicheiſm refuted by a very ſtrong argument. If the Manichees had admitted two principles acting in concert in all things, they had been expoſed to leſſer difficulties.

Such a ſyſtem would have neverthelеſs been contrary to the idea of order, with reſpect to the maxim, that beings ought not to be multiplied without neceſſity (87); for if there are two firſt principles, either they have each all the power neceſſary to the production of the univerſe, or they have it not. If they have, one of them is ſuperfluous: If they have not, that power was vainly divided, and it had been better to unite it in one ſubject; it would have been more active, virtus unita fortius agit ſay they in the Peripatetic ſchools. Beſides, it is not eaſy to conceive how a cauſe that is ſelf-exiſting, can have but a portion of power. Who could have confined that

---

(83) Id. ibid. pag. 168.

(84) Id. ibid. pag. 169.

(85) Id. ibid.

(86) In the remark [G], of the article PAULICIANS, at the end.

(87) Non ſunt multiplicanda entia ſine neceſſitate.

that to ſuch or ſuch a portion? It depends upon nothing, but ſtands upon its own bottom.

Rabbi Maimonides ſeems to me too nice, when he rejects the five proofs of the unity of God, made uſe of by the Philoſophers of the ſect of the Speakers, and when he praiſes one of theſe Philoſophers, who finding himſelf perplexed by the weakneſs of thoſe proofs, ſaid, that the unity of God was not known or could not be proved, but by Revelation ſupported by Tradition. ‘Hæc argumentorum iſtorum debilitas ſic defatigavit & exercuit nonnullos, ut quidam illorum dixerit, Unitatem Dei haberi ex lege per Cabbalam; ſed à reliquis ludibrio tantùm fuit habitus & non niſi ſannis exceptus. Mihi autem videtur, Virum illum fuiſſe ſani admodùm ingenii ac judicii. Nam cum nihil ſolidum & demonſtrativum in ipſorum rationibus vidiſſet, in quo animus ipſius acquieſcere potuiſſet, dixit, per Cabbalam ſive Traditionem hoc haberi ex lege (88). - - - - - - - The weakneſs of theſe arguments in proof of the unity of God, ſo much perplexed certain Philoſophers, that one of them ſaid that it could only be proved by Revelation ſupported by Tradition. But this Philoſopher was laughed at, and his opinion deſpiſed by the others. Nevertheleſs he ſeems to me to be a man of good underſtanding and ſound judgment. For he found nothing ſolid and demonſtrative in their arguments, nothing wherein his mind could acquieſce, and therefore aſſerted that the unity of God was known no otherwiſe than by Revelation ſupported by Tradition.’ The fourth of thoſe five arguments was this: either one God was ſufficient for the production of the world, or was not. If one ſufficed, another God would have been needleſs; and if he wanted the aſſiſtance of another God, each of them wanted the neceſſary power; but there can lie no imperfection in the Deity. Maimonides anſwers, that though one God alone had not been able to frame the ſtructure of this world, there would be no juſt reaſon to call him impotent, or inſufficient, ſince none ought to be called ſo becauſe he cannot do what exceeds his nature. It is no impotency in God not to be able give himſelf a body, or to make a ſquare whoſe ſide ſhould be equal to the diagonal line. This hinders not God from being omnipotent; the natural impoſſibility of ſome things does no prejudice to the omnipotence of God. If therefore it be aſſerted that it is naturally impoſſible for one only God to create the world, the want of two Deities to create it will be no ſign of imperfection or defect in either of them. Sicut non eſt attribuenda Deo Impotentia, quia non poteſt ſeipſum corporeum facere, vel alium ſibi ſimilem creare, aut quia nequit creare quadratum, cujus latus æquale ſit diametro: ſic illi, qui duos Deos ſtatuunt, poſſunt dicere, non eſſe illis Omnipotentiam derogandam ideò, quia nullus illorum ſolus creat; eò quòd neceſſitas exiſtentiæ ipſorum requirat, ut ſint duo. Hoc verò non eſſe ex indigentia, quaſi unus alterius ope indigeret, ſed ex neceſſitate, contrariumque eſſe impoſſibile. Et ſicut non ideò dici poteſt, Deum non eſſe omnipotentem, nulloque modo Indigentiæ, Impotentiæ, vel Inſufficientiæ titulo appellandum, quòd non poſſit exiſtere facere corpus aliquod, niſi creet Subſtantias individuas, illaſque per Accidentia, quæ itidem creat, conjungat, ut illi Loquentes aſſerunt; quia ſcilicet, ut aliter fiat, eſt impoſſibile. Sic, qui duos Deos ſtatuit, dicere poteſt, impoſſibile eſſe, ut unus ſolus faciat omnia, nec tamen Imperfectioni ipſius hoc adſcribendum eſſe, quia illa talis ſit, ut duo ſimul & unà ſint & operentur (89).

It might be ſhewn that theſe are meer cavils; but to avoid too long diſcuſſions, I am contented to ſay that the Manichees cannot uſe this ſubterfuge; for if any power ought to be eſſentially contained in the nature of God, it is that of doing what he moſt earneſtly deſires. The idea of God includes no attribute more clearly and evidently than that of happineſs (90). If therefore any want of power is capable of making God unhappy, we muſt ſay that it is eſſential to the nature of God to be without this want; but he muſt neceſſarily be ſubject to it, if the opinion of the Manichees was true: therefore their ſyſtem is utterly falſe.

Such is the nature, ſay they, of the good principle, that he can produce nothing but good, and with his whole might he oppoſes the introduction of evil. He wills therefore, and moſt ardently deſires, that there be no evil: It is therefore a great ſorrow to him that there is evil in the univerſe. He has done all that he could to prevent this diſorder; if therefore he wanted a neceſſary power to prevent it, his moſt earneſt deſires have been in vain, and conſequently he is deſtitute of the power which was the moſt neceſſary to his happineſs; therefore he has not the power which is the moſt neceſſary to the nature of his being. But can any thing be more abſurd than this? Is not this an hypotheſis which implies a contradiction?

The two principles of the Manichees would be the moſt unhappy of all beings; for the good principle could not caſt his eyes upon the world, but he would ſee a dreadful multitude of all kinds of evils: nor could the evil principle view it without ſeeing a great deal of good. The ſight of evil would afflict the one, and the ſight of good the other. This would not be a ſight interrupted ſometimes, but continual, and without the leaſt intermiſſion. The moſt unfortunate men have not ſo ſevere a fate; they ſucceſſively paſs from ſorrow to joy, and at laſt death ſecures them from the miſeries of this life. But the two principles of the Manichees are eternal, they can ſee no end or interruption of thoſe unpleaſant objects, which diſturb them to the higheſt degree.

---

(88) Maimonides, in More Nevochim, Part. i, cap. lxxv, pag. m. 175.

(89) Id. ibid.

(90) See the article SPINOZA, remark [N], numb. v.

All that the Manichees could ſuppoſe, concerning the firſt introduction of evil, and its firſt combination with good in the heart of man, was liable to a thouſand difficulties. Their own weapons turned againſt them: they could not bear the Hypotheſis, that evil proceeded from the ill uſe of free-will. God, ſaid they, who is infinitely good, would not have ſuffered his creatures to degenerate from their original goodneſs; and yet they did not own them to be incorruptible in a moral ſenſe. We have ſeen that Simplicius objected to them, that the ſouls the ill principle had ſeized on, and which were portions of the good principle, became evil, and lived eternally in corruption and miſery, under the empire of the conqueror. But here follows ſomething worſe. We know by experience, that the ſame numerical ſoul ſins and does good actions. When a man repents and implores the mercy of God, and makes amends for his ill life by alms, &c. this is not done by two ſubſtances, but by one and the ſame ſubject; we know it by our inward conſciouſneſs (91), and reaſon will have it ſo: for why ſhould a man afflict himſelf for, and repent of, a fault which he had not committed? I aſk the Manichees, whether the ſoul which does a good action, was created by the good principle or by the evil? If it was created by the evil principle, it follows that good may ariſe from the fountain of all evil: If it was created by the good principle, it follows that evil may ariſe from the fountain of all good (92), becauſe the ſame ſoul, on other occaſions, commits crimes. Thus you ſee yourſelves reduced to overthrow your own reaſonings, or to maintain againſt the internal and evident ſenſe of every man, that the ſoul which does a good action, is not the ſame which does a bad one.

To extricate themſelves from this difficulty it would be neceſſary for them to ſuppoſe three firſt principles; one eſſentially good, and the cauſe of all good; another eſſentially evil, and the cauſe of all evil; and a third eſſentially ſuſceptible of good and evil, and merely paſſive. Then they ſhould ſay; that the human ſoul is made up of this third principle, and does ſometimes a good action and ſometimes a bad one, according to the influence it receives from the good and evil principle.

The concluſion of this explanation.

They who will attentively conſider what I have alledged in this explanation, will, I preſume, be no longer offended with what I ſaid in the article PAULICIANS, &c; they will ſee that this article and thoſe wherein the ſame matter is treated, may be read without ſcandal, and even with edification, provided they well remember,

I. That it is the property of the myſteries of the goſpel, to be liable to objections which cannot be cleared by natural light.

II. That the unbelievers cannot juſtly draw any advantage from this, viz. That the maxims of Philoſophy do not afford ſolutions to the difficulties which they raiſe againſt the myſteries of the goſpel.

III. That the objections of the Manichees, concerning the origin of evil and Predeſtination, ought not to be conſidered in general as impugning Predeſtination, but with this particular regard, that the origin of evil, the decrees of God concerning it, and the reſt, are one of the moſt inconceivable myſteries of Chriſtianity.

IV. That it ought to ſatisfy every good Chriſtian, that his faith is founded on the teſtimony of the word of God.

V. That the ſyſtem of the Manichees conſidered in it ſelf is abſurd and indefenſible, and contrary to the ideas of order; that it is liable to retortions, and cannot remove difficulties.

VI. That in all events no body can be offended at my conceſſions, unleſs he looks upon the doctrine of the moſt orthodox Divines as ſcandalous, ſince all that I have ſaid is a natural and unavoidable conſequence of their doctrine; and I have only related more at large what they teach more compendiouſly.

Some perhaps will think my confutation of Manicheiſm imperfect, becauſe I anſwer not the objections I have ſet forth, as coming from the Manichees. I deſire thoſe who may ſtart this objection to remember, that as for evident anſwers drawn from natural light, I know none; and as for the anſwers which the Scripture affords, they may be found in a great many controverſial books.

They who aſk of what uſe are the diſcuſſions that have offended them, will ſee my anſwer in the third explanation.

(91) See the article RORARIUS, remark [K], towards the beginning.

(92) That is, by the ill uſe of free-will beſtowed upon men by the good principle.

EXPLANATION III.

That what has been ſaid of Scepticiſm in this Dictionary, cannot prejudice religion.

I. FIRST I lay down, as the baſis of this third explanation, this certain and undoubted maxim: That Chriſtianity is of a ſupernatural order, and centres in the ſupreme authority of God propoſing myſteries to us, not that we may comprehend them, but that we may believe them with all the humility that is due to the infinite being, who can neither deceive nor be deceived. This is the teſt, the polar ſtar, of all the diſcuſſions and diſputes concerning the articles of the religion, which God has revealed by Jeſus Chriſt.

Hence neceſſarily reſults the incompetency of the tribunal of Philoſophy to judge of controverſies among the Chriſtians, ſince they ought only to be carried to the tribunal of Revelation.

Any diſpute concerning the matter of right, or the reaſonableneſs of the thing, ought immediately to be rejected. No man ought to be admitted to examine, whether we ought to believe what God commands to be believed. It ought to be reckoned a firſt principle in point of religion. It is the part of the Metaphyſicians to examine, whether there be a God, and whether he be infallible (1); but Chriſtians, as Chriſtians, ought to ſuppoſe it as a thing already determined.

The queſtion then is only about a matter of fact; viz. Whether God requires our belief of this or that thing? Two ſorts of people may doubt of it; they who do not believe the ſcripture to be of divine inſpiration, and they who do not think the ſenſe of the Revelation to be ſuch as is put upon it by this or that ſect.

The only diſpute therefore that Chriſtians can enter upon with Philoſophers, is on this matter of fact; Whether the Scripture was written by inſpired authors? If the arguments the Chriſtians alledge on this ſubject, do not convince the Philoſophers, they ought to break off the diſpute; for it would be to no purpoſe to enter into the particular diſcuſſion of the Trinity, &c. with people who diſown the divine inſpiration of the Scriptures, the ſole and only way to judge who is in the right, or wrong in ſuch controverſies. Revealed authority ought to be the common principle of diſputants hereupon, and therefore there is no diſputing when one denies this principle, and the other admits of it. Adverſus negantem principia non eſt diſputandum.

If they who deny it, perſiſt to clamour and diſpute, they ought to be coldly anſwered, you depart from the queſtion, Non feritis theſim, non probatis negatum; and if they laugh at this anſwer, their laughing ought to be deſpiſed and pitied.

The character of the Sceptics.

II. But of all the Philoſophers who ought not to be allowed to diſpute concerning the myſteries of Chriſtianity, before they have admitted Revelation for a rule, there are none ſo unworthy of being heard as the followers of Pyrrho; for they make profeſſion of admitting no certain marks of diſtinction between truth and falſhood; ſo that if truth, by chance, appeared to them, they could never be ſure that it was truth. They not only attack the teſtimony of the ſenſes, the maxims of Morality, the rules of Logic, the axioms of Metaphyſics, but endeavour to overthrow the demonſtrations of Geometry, and the moſt evident principles of the Mathematicians. If they went no farther than the ten reaſons for ſuſpending our aſſent, and only uſed them againſt Natural Philoſophy, we might ſtill treat with them; but they will go much farther: they have a ſort of arms they call the diallel (2), which they lay hold of on the firſt occaſion; and afterwards there is no withſtanding them in any ſubject whatever. It is a labyrinth, from which no clue of Ariadne can wind one out. They loſe themſelves in their own ſubtilties, and are wonderfully pleaſed with it, ſince this ſerves to ſhew more clearly the univerſality of their hypotheſis, that every thing is uncertain, from which they except not even the arguments againſt uncertainty. They proceed ſo far in their method, that they who have well conſidered the conſequences of it, are forced to ſay, that they know not whether any thing exiſts (3).

Divines ought not to be aſhamed to confeſs, that they cannot enter the liſts with ſuch diſputants, and that they will not expoſe the goſpel-truths to ſuch an encounter. The veſſel of JESUS CHRIST is not made to float upon that tempeſtuous ſea, but to ride ſecure from this tempeſt in the haven of faith. It has pleaſed the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt, muſt Chriſtians ſay, to lead us by the way of faith, and not of ſcience, or diſputation. They are our inſtructors and directors, we cannot err having ſuch guides, and reaſon itſelf commands us to prefer them before its own direction.

But is it not a ſcandalous thing, will ſome ſay, that I have related the converſation of an Abbot, who owns that Scepticiſm finds ſeveral arguments in the doctrines of Chriſtianity, which render it more formidable than it was? I anſwer, that this can offend none but ſuch as have not examined the character of Chriſtianity. It would be a falſe notion notion to imagine, that JESUS CHRIST had any deſign to countenance, either directly or indirectly, ſome of the ſects of Philoſophers in the diſputes they had againſt the reſt. His deſign was rather to confound all Philoſophy, and to ſhew the vanity of it. He was willing that his goſpel ſhould claſh not only with the religion of the Heathens, but with the aphoriſms of their wiſdom; and that notwithſtanding this oppoſition betwixt his principles and thoſe of the world, his doctrine ſhould triumph over the Gentiles, by the miniſtry of a few illiterate men, who had neither Eloquence nor Logic, nor any of the inſtruments neceſſary to all other revolutions. He would have his diſciples, and the wiſe men of this world, to be ſo diametrically oppoſite, that they ſhould mutually call one another fools: he deſigned, that as his goſpel appeared folly to the Philoſophers, their ſcience ſhould in its turn appear folly to the Chriſtians. Conſider well theſe words of St Paul: ‘ For Chriſt ſent me not to baptize, but to preach * the goſpel: not with wiſdom of words, leſt the croſs of Chriſt ſhould be made of none ‘ effect. For the preaching of the croſs is to them that periſh, fooliſhneſs: but unto us ‘ which are ſaved, it is the power † of God. For it is written +, I will deſtroy the ‘ wiſdom of the wiſe, and will bring to nothing the underſtanding of the prudent ‡. ‘ Where is the wiſe? Where is the ſcribe? Where is the diſputer of this world? Hath ‘ not God made fooliſh the wiſdom of this world? For after that, in the wiſdom of ‘ God, the world by wiſdom knew not God, it pleaſed God by the fooliſhneſs of ‘ preaching to ſave them that believe. For the Jews require a ſign, and the Greeks ‘ ſeek after wiſdom: but we preach Chriſt crucified, unto the Jews a ſtumbling-block, ‘ and unto the Greeks, fooliſhneſs; but unto them which are called, both Jews and ‘ Greeks, Chriſt, the power of God, and the wiſdom of God. Becauſe the fooliſhneſs ‘ of God is wiſer than men; and the weakneſs of God is ſtronger than men. For ye ſee ‘ your calling, brethren, how that not many wiſe men after the fleſh, not many mighty, ‘ not many noble are called. But God hath choſen the fooliſh things of the world, to ‘ confound the wiſe; and God hath choſen the weak things of the world, to confound ‘ the things which are mighty; and baſe things of the world, and things which are ‘ deſpiſed, hath God choſen, yea, and things which are not, to bring to nought things ‘ that are: that no fleſh ſhould glory in his preſence. But of him are ye in Chriſt Jeſus, ‘ who of God is made unto us  wiſdom, and righteouſneſs, and ſanctification, and ‘ redemption: that, according as it is written ††, He that glorieth, let him glory in ‘ the Lord (4). And I, brethren, when I came to you, came not with excellency of ‘ ſpeech, or of wiſdom, declaring unto you the teſtimony of God ++. For I determined not to know any thing among you, ſave Jeſus Chriſt, and him crucified. ‘ And I was with you ‡‡ in weakneſs, and in fear, and in much trembling. And my ‘ ſpeech, and my preaching was not with enticing words of mans wiſdom, but in demonſtration of the Spirit *, and of power: that your faith ſhould not ſtand in the ‘ wiſdom of men, but in the power of God. Howbeit we ſpeak wiſdom among them ‘ that are perfect: yet not the wiſdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world, ‘ that come to nought. But we ſpeak the wiſdom of God in a myſtery, even the hidden ‘ wiſdom which God ordained before the world unto our glory. Which none of the ‘ princes of this world knew: for had they known it, they would not have crucified ‘ the Lord of glory. But as it is written †; Eye hath not ſeen, nor ear heard, ‘ neither have entred into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for ‘ them that love him. But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit: for the ‘ Spirit ſearcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God. For what man knoweth the ‘ things of man, ſave the Spirit of man which is in him? Even ſo the things of God ‘ knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God. Now we have received, not the Spirit of ‘ the world, but the Spirit which is of God? that we might know the things that are ‘ freely given to us of God. Which things alſo we ſpeak, not in the words which ‘ mans wiſdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghoſt teacheth +; comparing ſpiritual ‘ things with ſpiritual. But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of ‘ God: for they are fooliſhneſs unto him; neither can he know them, becauſe they are ‘ ſpiritually diſcerned (5).’

(1) See remark [L], of the ſecond article MALDONAT.

(2) See Sextus Empiricus, Pyrrhon. Hypotyp. lib. i, cap. xv; & lib. ii, cap. iv.

(3) See what Sextus Empiricus, adv. Math. lib. vii, relates of Gorgias Leontinus, and remark [E], of the article ZENO of Elea.

III. Do you think, that if the Apoſtles had been told that their doctrine expoſed the dogmatizing Philoſophers to new attacks from the Sceptics, they would have been concerned at it? They would have ſaid, Let us not trouble our ſelves with their diſputes; Let the dead bury the dead; the more they contend and diſable one another, the more they will diſcover the vanity of their pretended ſcience. Neither the Dogmatiſts nor the Sceptics will ever be able to enter into the kingdom of God, unleſs they become little children, unleſs they change their maxims, renounce their wiſdom, and make a burnt-offering of their vain ſyſtems at the foot of the croſs to the pretended folly of our preaching. This is the old man they muſt chiefly put off, before they can be qualified to receive the heavenly gift, and to enter into the way of faith appointed by God for eternal Salvation. If the Sceptics make an ill uſe of our myſteries to root themſelves deeper in uncertainty, and if they object againſt us arguments ad hominem, ſo much the worſe for them, unleſs God make uſe of their errors to make them ſee the neceſſity of ſubmitting to his word. This is what St Paul and his fellow Apoſtles would have anſwered to ſuch objections. We ought to be fully perſuaded, that if there had

2 been

* 2 Pet. i. 16. infr. ii. 1, 4, 13.

† Rom. i, 16.

+ Iſa. xxix. 14.

‡ Iſa. xxxiii. 18.

 Jer. xxiii, 5.

†† Jer. ix, 23, 24. 2 Cor. x. 17.

(4) 1 Cor. i. 17, & ſeq.

++ Sap. 1. 17.

‡‡ Act. xviii. 1.

* 2 Pet. i. 16.

† Iſa. lxiv. 4.

+ Sap. 1. 17. 2. 1. 4. 2 Pet. i, 16.

(5) 1 Cor. ii. 1, & ſeq.

been occaſion to give their deciſion upon the nature of the Heathen Philoſophy with reſpect to the difficulty or readineſs of embracing the goſpel; they would have poſitively determined, that the method, principles, practices, and diſputes of the Peripatetics, Academics, &c. were ſo great an obſtacle to faith, that the moſt neceſſary preliminaries to enter into the kingdom of God, were to forget or lay aſide all this train of a falſe ſcience (6). I believe they would have made ſuch a determination both for the preſent and the time to come.

I have cited an author who ſeems to believe that the ſubtilties of the ſchools of Philoſophy, may upon favourable occaſions ſerve to propagate the true faith. It may be, ſays he (7), that theſe ſubtile doctors were neceſſary to the world; I mean the curious, diſputing, and contradicting world. Perhaps they entred into the deſign of the providence of God, for the accompliſhment of his Son's kingdom; for the laſt perfection of the œconomy of his Church. You know that the Son of God ſent ſeveral Apoſtles to ſeveral nations; you know that all the miſſions he ordained, were not made at the ſame time, and by the twelve firſt Apoſtles. He never wanted, and will never want ſuch Ambaſſadors. He has always meſſengers ready to receive his orders, to execute his commands, to ſet out for his ſervice. We ought not to doubt that he has more than one St Peter, and St Paul. He has alſo more than one St Thomas. How do we know but that he has ſent the St Thomas of the latter times to the ſucceſſors of Ariſtotle, to treat them according to their own humour, and to convert them in their way, in order to gain them by their own ſyllogiſms and Logic? How do we know but St Thomas of the ſchools has been choſen to be the Apoſtle of the Peripatetic nation, which was not yet well conquered and ſubdued? a preſumptuous and mutinous nation, which has ſo little regard to authority, which goes always upon reaſon, which continually demands why things are ſo and ſo, which is ſo reſtleſs, ſuch an enemy to peace, and ſo fond of innovations? Methinks this laſt miſſion has not been uſeleſs, and there is ſome probability in what I ſay. If there is no irony in this diſcourſe; if it be all in a ſerious ſtrain, it is

A ſplendid nothing dreſs'd in lofty words.

All men in all ages have required and will require, that the knowledge of revealed truths ſhould be ſearched after by other methods than thoſe of Philoſophy. Philoſophy does not cure a floating mind, which muſt be cured, if we deſire to obtain true wiſdom by our prayers. Let us here give the authority of an Apoſtle. If any of you lack wiſdom, let him aſk of God that gives to all men liberally and upbraideth not, and it ſhall be given him. But let him aſk in faith nothing wavering, for he that wavereth, is like a wave of the ſea, driven with the wind and toſſed; for let not that man think that he ſhall receive any thing of the Lord (8). Judge whether the Sceptics, who are always ſo much the more pleaſed, as the efforts they make to invent reaſons for doubting of every thing, have furniſhed them with ſpecious objections againſt certainty, are capable of receiving the grace of God by the way of diſputation. The modern miſſionaries of the Goſpel, ought to treat them as the firſt would have done; they ought to adviſe them to lay aſide all diſputes and contentions, and to believe God upon his word; and if they prove untractable, they ought particularly to remember this precept of St Paul; and apply it to thoſe men, Avoid fooliſh queſtions and genealogies, and contentions, and ſtrivings about the law, for they are unprofitable and vain. A man that is an Heretic after the firſt and ſecond admonition, reject (9). It would be fine work to ſee our Thomiſts and Scotiſts undertake the converſion of the new world by public diſputations as in Europe: they would be ſorry converters at that rate. Balzac did not conſider it, or elſe gravely ridiculed the Schoolmen; their public diſputes convert no body; every body goes away with the ſame opinions he brought with him. If we propoſed to the Chineſe Philoſophers the Thomiſtical explications of our myſteries, and if they aſked, how can we believe this, ſince we have no idea of it, we ſhould do well to refer them, not to a diſputation, but to an anſwer pretty like that which the angel Gabriel made to the Virgin Mary (10).

We may affirm at this day, juſt as in Lactantius's time, that true religion ought to be enquired after by applying to the pretended and ſeeming fooliſhneſs under which God has been pleaſed to hide the treaſures of his wiſdom (11). 'Quid putemus fuiſſe 'cauſæ, cur tot ingeniis, totque temporibus ſummo ſtudio, & labore quæſita (ſapientia) 'non reperirietur; niſi quod eam philoſophi extra fines ſuos quæſierunt? Qui quoniam 'peragratis, & exploratis omnibus, nuſquam nullam ſapientiam comprehenderunt; & 'alicubi eſſe illam neceſſe eſt: apparet, illic potiſſimum eſſe quærendam, ubi STULTITIÆ titulus apparet; cujus velamento Deus, ne arcanum ſummi ſui divini operis in 'propatulo eſſet, theſaurum ſapientiæ, ac veritatis abſcondit (12). - - - - What is the 'reaſon why wiſdom, which has been ſo frequently ſought after by ſo many men of parts, 'with the greateſt application and labour, has never been found; unleſs that the Philoſo'phers have ſought after wiſdom where ſhe is not. Now ſince theſe Philoſophers who have 'examined and explored all things, have found wiſdom no where, and ſince ſhe muſt neceſ'ſarily be ſomewhere, it is evident that ſhe muſt be ſought after chiefly where there appear 'the characters of FOOLISHNESS, under the cover of which, God, leſt the myſteries of his

(6) Theſe words in St John's Goſpel, chap. iii, ver. 3. Except a man be born again, he cannot ſee the kingdom of God, are chiefly true with reſpect to Philoſophers: they want to be born again more than other men: they want one regeneration as men, and another as Philoſophers.

(7) Balzac, Socrate Chreſtien, Diſcours v, pag. m. 71, & ſeq.

(8) Jam. i. 5, & ſeq.

(9) Tit. iii, 9, 10.

(10) How ſhall this be, ſeeing I know not a man. And the angel anſwered, and ſaid unto her, the Holy Ghoſt ſhall come upon thee, and the power of the Higheſt ſhall overſhadow thee. Luke i, 34, 35.

(11) This ought to be underſtood with reſpect to the Infidels.

(12) Lactant. lib. iv, cap. ii, pag. m. 226.

‘ Divine works ſhould be divulged, hath hid the treaſures of wiſdom and truth.’ The ſame Lactantius has judiciouſly obſerved in another place, that it becomes the ſupreme majeſty of God to ſpeak with authority, and to ſay in a few words, this is true, and not to argue and add proofs to his deciſions. ‘ Quæ (divina) quidem tradita ſunt breviter, ‘ ac nude ; nec enim decebat aliter : ut cum Deus ad hominem loqueretur, argumentis ‘ aſſereret ſuas voces, tanquam fides ei non haberetur : ſed, ut oportuit, eſt locutus, ‘ quaſi rerum omnium maximus judex ; cujus eſt non argumentari, ſed pronuntiare verum (13). - - - - Divine truths are declared in a few words, and without being ſupported ‘ by reaſonings. Nor was it fit that God, when he ſpeaks to men ſhould ſupport his words ‘ by arguments, as if he ought not to be believed without proofs : but God hath ſpoken, as it ‘ became him, like the ſoveraign judge of all things, who is not to argue, but to pronounce ‘ the truth.’ If Seneca ſaid that there is nothing more inſipid than a law with a preamble, and that a law ſhould not diſpute, but command ; if he ſaid this of human laws, much more ought it to be ſaid of the law of God ? ‘ Non probo, quod Platonis legibus ‘ adjecta principia ſunt. Legem enim brevem eſſe oportet, quò facilius, ab imperitis ‘ teneatur, velut emiſſa divinitus vox ſit. Jubeat, non diſputet. Nihil videtur mihi ‘ frigidius, nihil ineptius, quàm lex cum prologo. Mone, dic quid me velis feciſſe : ‘ non diſco, ſed pareo (14). - - - - That reaſons are annexed to the laws of Plato, is ‘ what I do not approve ; for a law ought to be comprized in a very few words, that men of ‘ the meaneſt capacity may the better comprehend it, and conſider it as a voice from heaven. ‘ Let it command, and not diſpute. Nothing ſeems to me more inſipid, nor more fooliſh, than ‘ a law with a preamble. Warn me, tell me what you command me to do, and I do not learn ‘ of you, but obey.’

From all that has been ſaid, it is eaſy to conclude, that we cannot be alarmed with the objections of the Sceptics, without diſcovering the weakneſs of our faith, and taking things in a wrong ſenſe, which ought to be taken in a right one.

IV. A true Believer, a Chriſtian who well underſtands the ſpirit of his religion, does not expect to ſee it agree with the aphoriſms of the Lyceum, nor to find it able by the mere ſtrength of reaſon, to confute the difficulties of reaſon. He well knows that natural things have no proportion to the ſupernatural ; and that if a Philoſopher was deſired to level and adjuſt the myſteries of the Goſpel with the Ariſtotelian axioms, it would be requiring of him what is inconſiſtent with the nature of things. You muſt neceſſarily make an option betwixt Philoſophy and the Goſpel : if you will believe nothing but what is evident and agreeable to common notions, chooſe Philoſophy, and leave Chriſtianity : if you will believe the incomprehenſible myſteries of religion, take Chriſtianity and leave Philoſophy ; for to enjoy at the ſame time evidence and incomprehenſibility, is a thing impoſſible ; the conjunction of theſe two things is no leſs impoſſible than the conjunction of the properties of a ſquare, and of a circle. You muſt neceſſarily make an option between them : if the conveniences of a round table do not ſatisfy you, make a ſquare one, and do not pretend that the ſame table ſhould furniſh you with the conveniences both of a round and of a ſquare table. Once more, a true Chriſtian well inſtructed in the character of ſupernatural truths, and well grounded in the principles peculiar to the Goſpel, will laugh at the ſubtilties of Philoſophers, and eſpecially of the Sceptics. Faith will place him above the regions, wherein the ſtorms of diſputation rage. He will find himſelf in a poſt, from whence, being calm and undiſturbed, he can hear the thunder of argumentations and diſtinctions roar below him. A poſt, that will prove the true Olympus of the Poets (15) ; and the true temple of the ſages (16), from whence he will ſee in a perfect tranquillity the weakneſs of reaſon, and the errors of men who have no other guide. Every Chriſtian who ſuffers himſelf to be ſtartled and offended with the objections of unbelievers, is in the ſame lamentable condition as they are.

An anſwer to thoſe who aſk what need was there to recite the objections, which the myſteries of the Goſpel may afford the Sceptics.

V. What I am going to ſay, may teach us how important it is to know the true uſe of things. Several people have aſked, to what purpoſe I have ſet forth many Sceptical and Manichean objections ? They might have found the anſwer to this queſtion, if they had looked for it in my Dictionary, where it is to be ſeen in an hundred places, and particularly in the remark [C], of the article PYRRHO (17). But ſince they would not, or did not attend to it, let us here examine their objection more at large. I think they could not much complain, if I ſhould only aſk them, to what purpoſe are ſo many particulars we find in Hiſtorians ? Is it not certain that Hiſtorians relate ſeveral things, whoſe only uſe conſiſts in pleaſing the readers, and which may be hurtful in the hands of thoſe who abuſe the beſt things ? Does this free an Hiſtorian from the obligation he is under, of relating the truth with all poſſible exactneſs ? Muſt not therefore an Hiſtorian of opinions exactly and fully ſhew the ſtrong and weak ſides of them, tho’ it ſhould accidentally occaſion ſome diſturbance, and tho’ no other good ſhould proceed from it, but the amuſement of the reader, and an example of the regard that is due to the laws of Hiſtory ? But this is neither the ſole nor the principal anſwer I am to give.

Nothing is more neceſſary than faith, and nothing more important than to know well the worth of this Theological virtue. But is any thing more proper to acquaint us

---

(13) Id. lib. iii, cap. i, pag. 149.

(14) Seneca, Epiſt. xciv, pag. m. 388.

(15) Ut altus Olympi
Vertex, qui ſpatio ventos hiemeſque relinquit,
Perpetuum nulla temeratus nube ſerenum,
Celſior exſurgit pluviis auditque ruentes
Sub pedibus nimbos, & rauca tonitrua calcat.
Claudian, de Mall. Theod. Conſul. ver. 206, pag. m. 6.

(16) Nil dulcius eſt, benè quàm munita tenere
Edita doctrina Sapientum templa ſerena ;
Deſpicere unde queas alios, paſſimque videre
Errare, atque viam palanteis quærere vitæ.
Lucret. lib. ii, ver. 7.
But above all, ’tis pleaſanteſt to get
The top of high Philoſophy, and ſit
On the calm, peaceful, flouriſhing head of it ;
Whence we may view deep, wondrous deep below,
How poor miſtaken mortals wandring go,
Seeking the path to happineſs.
CREECH.

(17) See alſo the remark [G], in the article of ZENO of Elea, at the end.

us with it, than meditating on the attribute which diſtinguiſhes it from the other acts of the underſtanding? Its eſſence conſiſts in imprinting in us a ſtrong perſuaſion of revealed truths, by the ſole motive of God's authority. They who by philoſophical reaſons believe the immortality of the ſoul, are Orthodox, but while they go no farther they do not partake of the faith we ſpeak of. They partake of it only as they believe this truth, becauſe God has revealed it, and humbly ſubmit to the voice of God the moſt plauſible arguments Philoſophy offers to perſuade them of the ſoul's mortality. Thus the merit of faith is enlarged, in proportion, as revealed truth, which is the object of it, exceeds all the powers of our underſtanding: for the more the incomprehenſibility of this object increaſes by the numerous maxims of natural light which oppoſe it, the more we muſt ſacrifice to God's authority a ſtronger repugnance of reaſon, and conſequently we ſhew ourſelves more obedient to God, and give him a greater proof of our reſpect, than if the thing was moderately difficult to believe. Whence was it that the Father of the Faithful, had ſo eminent and illuſtrious a faith? Was it not becauſe he believed in hope againſt hope (18)? There had been no great merit in hoping upon the promiſe of God for a thing, naturally very probable; the merit therefore conſiſted in this, that the hope grounded on this promiſe was contrary to all appearances. Let us ſay likewiſe, that the moſt precious faith is that which upon the Divine teſtimony embraces ſuch truths as are the moſt repugnant to reaſon.

This thought has been expreſſed in a ludicrous way by a maſterly hand. The Devil take me if I believed a ſyllable then, said the Mareſchal d'Hocquincourt; but ever ſince I could endure to be crucified for religion. Not that I ſee more reaſon in it now; but on the contrary, leſs than ever: but for all that I could ſuffer myſelf to be crucified, without knowing why, or wherefore. So much the better, my Lord, replied the Father, twanging it devoutly through the noſe, ſo much the better; theſe are not human motions; they proceed from God. No reaſon! That is the true religion: No reaſon. What an extraordinary grace, my Lord, has heaven beſtowed upon you! Eſtote ſicut infantes, be ye as children: children have ſtill their innocence, and why? Becauſe they have no reaſon. Beati pauperes ſpiritu, Bleſſed are the poor in ſpirit; they ſin not; the reaſon is becauſe they have no reaſon. No reaſon; without knowing why or wherefore: Oh excellent words! They ought to be written in golden letters. Not that I ſee more reaſon in it now; but, on the contrary, leſs than ever. In truth this is Divine for them that have any taſte of heavenly things: No reaſon. What an extraordinary grace, my Lord, has God beſtowed upon you (19)! Give this thought a more ſerious and modeſt turn, and it will become reaſonable. Here is the proof of it. I take it from a book wherein ſome thoughts of Mr de St Evremond are examined; and this amongſt others, that our underſtanding is not ſufficiently convinced of the truth of religion.

'To anſwer clearly to this, we muſt remember a maxim commonly received among Divines: viz. That the mind is induced to believe myſteries in a quite different way from that which gives it an evident knowledge of natural things. It knows the latter by demonſtration, and it believes myſteries upon motives of credibility, ſuch as are the miracles wrought by Jeſus Chriſt, and his Apoſtles, the unanimous belief of all the faithful for ſeventeen centuries, &c. All which motives ought to induce us to believe prudently the faith which the church propoſes to us: and this very well explains theſe words of St Paul, That in this preſent life we ſee the myſteries as riddles, waiting to ſee them evidently in heaven. But Mr de St Evremond requires demonſtrations. He therefore admits no faith. St Thomas * ſays expreſly in ſome places of his Summa, that no body ought to go about to demonſtrate the myſteries of religion; and he adds in other chapters, that when the Fathers proved the faith, they did not pretend their arguments were demonſtrative, but only ſolid motives to induce us to believe the doctrines propounded to us. Why, ſays Mr de St Evremond, is not our reaſon enlightned? Becauſe, as St Thomas ſays, reaſon muſt ſubmit to faith. Upon which I call to mind ſome words of Petrus Bleſenſis in his 140th epiſtle written to Petrus Diaconus, who was with the King of England. After he had ſpoke of the myſtery of Tranſubſtantiation, reaſon, purſues he, does not go ſo far, but we are carried thither by faith; a faith that is ſo much the ſtronger as it is not ſupported by natural reaſon. Reaſon grows weak where faith grows ſtrong: reaſon is overcome that faith may be more meritorious: however, do not think, adds this Father, that reaſon envies the ſuperiority of faith; on the contrary, it voluntarily and humbly ſubmits to it. It will reſume its light in heaven, where faith will not be, and then reaſon will reap what faith ſows in the preſent life; and it is juſt it ſhould reap the fruits of faith, ſince at preſent it debaſes it ſelf, that faith may reign in its full power (20).'

VI. This is the doctrine of the Roman Catholics: take from it Tranſubſtantiation, and put the Trinity, for inſtance, in its room, and the moſt Orthodox Proteſtant Divines will ſubſcribe to it. I ſhall quote two Proteſtants, whoſe teſtimony will have the more weight, becauſe they are of ſuch profeſſions, as are not thought to inſiſt much upon the humbling of reaſon, and the exaltation of faith: one is a Phyſician, the other a Mathematician; the former declares, that when he meditates on myſteries, he always ſtops when reaſon is arrived to this point, O the depth (21). He proteſts, that if rebellious reaſon, or the Devil, endeavour to perplex him, he diſengages himſelf from (18) Rom. iv, 18.

(19) Mr de St Evremond, in his Converſation between Mareſchal d'Hocquincourt, and Father Canaye, Tom. i, p. 181, of the Engliſh tranſlation, London 1728.

* Part. i. qu. 1. a. 8. ad. 2.

(20) Diſſertation ſur les Oeuvres de Mr de St Evremond, pag. 249, & ſeq. Paris 1698.

(21) I love to loſe myſelf in a myſtery, to purſue my reaſon to an O Altitudo! Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, Part. i, §. viii, pag. m. 46.

all their ſnares, by this one paradox of Tertullian, this is certain, becauſe it is impoſſible. It is my ſolitary recreation to poſe my apprehenſion with thoſe involved ænigma's and riddles of the Trinity, with the Incarnation and Reſurrection. I can anſwer all the objections of Satan and my rebellious reaſon, with that odd reſolution I learned of Tertullian, It is true, becauſe it is impoſſible (22). There are ſome, continues he, who believe more eaſily becauſe they have ſeen the ſepulchre of Jeſus Chriſt, and the Red-ſea; but, for my part, I congratulate my ſelf for not having ſeen Jeſus Chriſt and his Apoſtles, nor having lived in the age of miracles; my faith would then have been involuntary, and I ſhould have no ſhare in this bleſſing, Bleſſed are they that have not ſeen and yet believed. He highly values the faith of thoſe who lived before Jeſus Chriſt; for though they had nothing but ſhadows and types, and ſome obſcure oracles, they waited for things that ſeemed impoſſible. Some believe the better for ſeeing Chriſt's ſepulchre; and when they have ſeen the Red-ſea, doubt not of the miracle. Now contrarily, I bleſs myſelf, and am thankful that I lived not in the days of miracles, that I never ſaw Chriſt nor his diſciples; I would not have been one of thoſe Iſraelites that paſſed the Red-ſea, nor one of Chriſt's patients on whom he wrought his wonders; then had my faith been thruſt upon me; nor ſhould I enjoy that greater bleſſing pronounced to all that believe and ſaw not. It is an eaſy and neceſſary belief, to credit what our eye and ſenſe hath examined: I believe he was dead and buried, and roſe again; and deſire to ſee him in his glory, rather than to contemplate him in his cenotaphe, or ſepulchre. Nor is this much to believe; as we have reaſon, we owe this faith unto Hiſtory: they only had the advantage of a bold and noble faith, who lived before his coming, who upon obſcure prophecies and myſtical types could raiſe a belief, and expect apparent impoſſibilities (23). He ſays, that faith may not improperly be called a ſword which cuts all the knots we meet with in the myſteries of religion; but however, he uſes it rather as a ſhield, finding that a man becomes invulnerable in theſe ſorts of combats, who arms himſelf with it (24). He mentions the objections which reaſon and experience ſuggeſted to him on ſome points; and adds, that notwithſtanding this his faith is very ſteady, and that faith, in order to be perfect, muſt make us believe things not only above reaſon, but that ſeem repugnant to reaſon, and to the teſtimony of the ſenſes. Yet do I believe that all this is true, which indeed my reaſon would perſwade me to be falſe; and this I think is no vulgar part of faith, to believe a thing not only above, but contrary to reaſon, and againſt the arguments of our proper ſenſes (25).

Note, That this writer ſpeak thus in a book intituled, Religio Medici, the Phyſician's Religion, and which, as ſome ſay, might be called, The Phyſician of Religion; a book, in ſhort, that made ſome people believe, that the author was ſomewhat remote from the kingdom of heaven (26). Therefore theſe words of the goſpel might be applied to him, I have not found ſo great faith, no not in Iſrael (27).

VII. The Mathematician I am to quote, publiſhed at London, in 1699, a tract, of 36 pages in 4to, intituled, Theologiæ Chriſtianæ principia Mathematica. He pretends, that the principles of the Chriſtian Religion are only probable, and reduces the degrees of their probability, and of the decreaſe of it, to Geometrical calculations. He finds that it may ſtill laſt 1454 years, from whence he concludes, that Jeſus Chriſt will return before that time. He dedicates this book to the Biſhop of Saliſbury, and ſhews, in his Epiſtle Dedicatory, that they who ſhall blame him for calling the principles of Chriſtianity only probable, are ſuch as have not well examined the grounds of their religion, and do not well underſtand the nature of faith. Whence, ſays he, has this virtue ſo many encomiums given it in the Scripture, and ſo many rewards promiſed it? Is it not becauſe it makes men walk in the right way, notwithſtanding all the ſtumbling-blocks they meet with, and the fetters that are put upon them? I ſhall ſet down his words: ‘Quoſdam fore non dubito, majori ductos zelo quam judicio qui meos prorſus con‘demnabunt labores, meque Religionem potius evertere quam aſtruere temere nimis ‘concludent. Illi utique omnia Religionis dogmata tanquam certiſſima amplectentes ‘rem Chriſtianiſmo indignam me præſtitiſſe putabunt, qui ejus probabilitatem tantum ‘evincere conatus fuerim. Illis vero ego nihil jam habeo quod dicam, niſi quod præ‘judiciis ſuis præoccupati, Religionis quam profitentur, fundamenta non accuratè ſatis ‘hactenus examinaverint, nec fidei, quæ tantopere in ſacris literis laudatur, naturam ‘ritè intellexerint. Quid enim eſt fides? niſi illa mentis perſuaſio qua propter media ex ‘probabilitate deducta, quaſdam propoſitiones veras eſſe credimus. Si perſuaſio ex cer‘titudine oriatur, tum non fides ſed ſcientia in mente producitur. Sicut enim proba‘bilitas fidem generat, ita enim ſcientiam evertit & è contra: Certitudo ſcientiam ſimul ‘generat & fidem deſtruit. Unde ſcientia omnem dubitandi anſam aufert, dum fides ‘aliquam ſemper hæſitationem in mente relinquit: & propterea fides tantis inſignitur ‘laudibus, tantaque ſibi annexa præmia habet, quod homines non obſtantibus omnibus ‘illis quibus premuntur ſcrupulis in recto virtutis & pietatis tramite progrediantur, ‘quæque Creatori ſuo omnipotenti grata futura credunt ſumma ope præſtare conentur: ‘Se tam paratos eſſe juſſis quibuſcunque divinis obſequi oſtendunt, ut ne ea quidem quæ ‘probabiliter tantum ab ipſo proveniant, rejicere velint (28). - - - I doubt not but cer‘tain perſons, more zealous than judicious, will abſolutely condemn my work, and raſhly con‘clude that I rather ſubvert and overthrow religion, than ſupport and defend it. For they, ‘embracing all the doctrines of the Chriſtian Religion as moſt certain, will think that I have ‘ written

(22) Id. ib.

(23) Id. ibid. pag. 21, 22.

(24) With an eaſy metaphor we may ſay the ſword of faith; but in theſe obſcurities I rather uſe it in the adjunct the Apoſtle gives it, a Buckler; under which I conceive a wary combatant may lie invulnerable. Id. ibid. §. ix, pag. 22, 23.

(25) Id. ibid. pag. 26.

(26) See Patin, Letter iii, pag. 13, of the firſt volume.

(27) Matt. viii. 10.

(28) Johannes Craig, Epiſt. Dedicat.

‘ written a book unbecoming and unworthy of a Chriſtian, ſince I there have endeavoured to ſhew only the probability of that religion. To theſe perſons I have at preſent nothing more to ſay but this, that being prepoſſeſſed with prejudices, they have not yet ſufficiently examined the foundation of that Religion which they profeſs, nor well underſtood the nature of that Faith, which is ſo much praiſed in the ſacred writings. For what is Faith, but that perſuaſion of the mind, whereby we believe certain propoſitions to be true, for reaſons drawn from probability? If the perſuaſion ariſes from Certainty, it is not Faith, but Science that is produced in the mind. For as probability begets Faith, ſo it deſtroys Science; and ſo vice versâ Certainty begets Science and deſtroys Faith. Thus Science removes all manner of doubt, whereas Faith always leaves in the mind ſome heſitation: and it is for this reaſon that Faith is ſo highly commended, and ſo many rewards are annexed to it, namely, becauſe men, notwithſtanding all thoſe ſcruples wherewith their minds are oppreſſed, walk in the ſtrait road of virtue and piety, and with all their might endeavour to perform thoſe duties which they believe will be acceptable to their omnipotent Creator. They ſhew themſelves ſo ready to obey all divine commands, that they will not reject even thoſe, which only appear probably to be ſuch.’

THAT it is proper to enumerate largely the arguments which reſpect the difficulties of the Chriſtian Faith.

VIII. Moſt men ſo little examine the nature of divine Faith, and reflect ſo ſeldom upon this act of their mind, that they want to be rouſed from their negligence, by a long enumeration of the difficulties that encompaſs the doctrines of the Chriſtian Religion. It is by a lively ſenſe of thoſe difficulties we learn the excellency of Faith, and of this gift of God. Hereby we learn alſo to miſtruſt reaſon, and have recourſe to grace. They who know nothing of the great conteſt between reaſon and faith, and are ignorant of the force of Philoſophical objections, have but an imperfect ſenſe of God's goodneſs to them, and of the manner of triumphing over all the temptations of incredulous and preſumptuous reaſon.

The true way of humbling it is to know, that if it be capable of inventing objections, it is incapable of reſolving them, and, in a word, that it is not by reaſon that the goſpel was eſtabliſhed. ‘ It is Faith alone that can teach that Divine Philoſophy, which none of the princes of this world had known *. Whoever opens his eyes to ſo pure a light is truly enlightened. It was not by ſtrength of ſyllogiſms and argumentations that this Philoſophy recommended itſelf to men; but by its ſimplicity and the ignorance of thoſe who preached it to the world . . . . Faith having diſcovered to men the falſe glimpſes that ſhone in the Heathen Philoſophy, accuſtomed them not to reaſon any longer upon things which God would not ſubmit to reaſoning, and taught them, that it is better to be ignorant of what God has been pleaſed to conceal, and with a reſpectful ignorance to adore the ſecrets he has not revealed, than to attempt to fathom this abyſs of light, by the raſhneſs of our conjectures, and the faint views of our reaſon. It was to this Divine ray of Faith, that the Chriſtian took pleaſure to ſacrifice that inſolent curioſity, which made him too raſhly examine the works of God, by examining the effects of nature, and ſtifle all the views of that proud reaſon, which fixes him to the creatures, and makes him a rebel againſt the Creator. It was by the rays of this celeſtial light, that the Chriſtian perceived it was better to yield than to argue in point of religion; that narrowneſs of wit is more advantageous to a Chriſtian, than all the force and penetration of the mind, and that the ſimplicity of Faith is preferable to all the pomp of ſcience. Since, after all, the works of God, which bear the moſt the ſtamp of his omnipotence, and his character, are thoſe we the leaſt comprehend, therefore nothing is more juſt than to humble our reaſon, and ſubmit it to the light of eternal reaſon, which is the rule of all reaſons: and indeed there is no ſcience but requires ſubmiſſion for the eſtabliſhment of its principles (29).’ I conclude with two very fine thoughts of Mr de St Evremond. ‘ In things purely natural, it is the mind's part to conceive, and its knowledge goes before the affection for the objects: in things ſupernatural, the ſoul is taken, it is affected, it adheres and unites itſelf without ever comprehending them. Heaven has better prepared our hearts for the impreſſion of God's grace, than our underſtandings for illumination. His immenſity confounds our narrow intellects: his bounty agrees better with our love. There is I know not what within us, that ſecretly pleads for a God, whom we cannot comprehend . . . To conſider well the Chriſtian Religion would make one think, that God had deprived it of the light of our minds, that it might turn more upon the motions of our heart (30).’ . . . Provided a man has reduced his reaſon ſo far, as not to argue upon things which God would not ſubject to reaſoning, it is all we can deſire. I not only believe with Solomon, that a wiſe man's ſilence is better in this caſe than the diſcourſe of a Philoſopher, but I have a greater eſteem for the faith of the moſt ſtupid peaſant, than for all the leſſons of Socrates (31).

This, I think, is more than ſufficient to remove the ſcruples which the pretended triumph of the Sceptics had raiſed in the minds of ſome of my readers.

* Veritas per Chriſtum: Joann. cap. 1. Loquimur ſapientiam quam nemo principum hujus ſæculi novit. Paul. 2. Cor. c. 6.

(29) Rapin, Réflexions ſur la Philoſophie, pag. m. 447.

(30) St Evremond's Works, Vol. ii, pag. 88, 89. of the Engliſh tranſlation, London 1728.

(31) Oeuvres meſlées, Tom. ii, pag. m. 24.

EXPLANATION IV.

CONCERNING OBSCENITIES.

That if there are ſome Obſcenities in this book, they are ſuch as cannot be juſtly cenſured.

I. WHEN people ſay that there are Obſcenities in any book, they may underſtand,

I. Either that the author gives the deſcription of his debaucheries in leud terms, applauds and congratulates himſelf for them, exhorts his readers to plunge themſelves into all manner of leudneſs, recommends it to them as the moſt effectual means of leading a ſweet and happy life, and pretends, that the cenſures of the public are to be laughed at, and that the maxims of virtuous men ought to be ſlighted as old womens tales.

II. Or, that the author relates, in a free and gay ſtile, ſome love-adventures, feigned as to the ſubſtance, or at leaſt as to their circumſtances, and embelliſhments; and introduces into his narrative ſeveral immodeſt incidents, which he dreſſes in all the charms imaginable, in order to make them diverting, and fitter to raiſe the deſire of love-intrigues than any thing elſe.

III. Or, that the author, in order to revenge himſelf on an unfaithful miſtreſs, or to excuſe the tranſports of his paſſion, or make invectives againſt an old courtezan, or celebrate his friend's marriage, or divert himſelf with merry thoughts, gives a free ſcope to his Muſe, and writes Epigrams, Epithalamiums, &c. full of impure and ſmutty expreſſions.

IV. Or, that the author, inveighing againſt leudneſs, deſcribes it in too lively, naked, and groſs colours.

V. Or, that the author in a tract of Phyſic, Natural Philoſophy, or Civil-Law, expreſſes himſelf filthily on the ſubject of generation, or, the cauſes and remedies of barrenneſs, or the motives of divorce, &c.

VI. Or, that the author, commenting upon Catullus, Petronius, or Martial, has inſerted in his commentary ſeveral leud diſcourſes or expreſſions.

VII. Or, that the author, giving the Hiſtory of a ſect, or perſon, whoſe actions were infamous, has related, in too open a manner, a great many things offenſive to chaſte ears.

VIII. Or, that the author, treating of caſes of conſcience, and enumerating the different ſpecies of carnal ſins, has ſaid many things which modeſty cannot eaſily digeſt.

IX. Or, laſtly, that the author relates Hiſtorical facts mentioned by other authors whom he carefully cites, which facts are filthy and immodeſt, and adds a commentary on his Hiſtorical narrations to illuſtrate them by teſtimonies, by reflexions, and by proofs, &c. in which he ſometimes alledges the words of certain authors who have wrote freely, ſome of them, as Phyſicians, or Lawyers; others, as Gallants, or Poets; but he never ſays any thing containing either explicitly, or even implicitly, the approbation of impurity; that, on the contrary, he endeavours, upon many occaſions, to expoſe it to our abhorrence, and to confute looſe Morality.

Theſe, I think, are the chief caſes wherein a writer can be charged with venting obſcenities.

In the firſt caſe, he deſerves not only all the ſevereſt puniſhments of the Canon-Law, but ought alſo to be proſecuted by the Magiſtrate as a diſturber of the public modeſty, and a profeſſed enemy to virtue.

As to thoſe of the ſecond, third, fourth, fifth, ſixth, ſeventh, and eighth claſſes, let every one judge of them as he pleaſes: I am not concerned in them, mine being only the ninth caſe; and it is ſufficient for me to examine what concerns that ninth kind of obſcenity. However, I will make two or three general reflexions upon the reſt.

THREE general obſervations upon ſome ſorts of obſcenities that are to be found in ſeveral authors.

II. I ſay in the firſt place, that there are ſeveral degrees in the ſeven claſſes of writers, whom I leave to the reader's judgment (1). A man may keep himſelf within certain bounds, or may exceed them: this prodigiouſly varies the differences and proportions; and it would be very unjuſt to pronounce the ſame ſentence againſt all the writers of the ſecond claſs. The hundred Nouvelles nouvelles (2), thoſe of the Queen of Navarre, Boccace's Decameron, la Fontaine's Tales do not deſerve the ſame rigour as Aretin's Raggionamenti, and the Aloiſia Sigæa Toletana. The authors of theſe two laſt works deſerve, as well as Ovid, to be placed in the firſt claſs of obſcene authors.

Secondly I obſerve, that in all times a great number of men have agreed in condemning obſcenities; and yet this never ſeemed to be a deciſion of equal force with the Civil Laws, a deciſion to which the Poets, Commentators, &c. were obliged to conform

(1) Note, that I nevertheleſs approve of thoſe obſervations which I have made in ſeveral places, as in the article of the Poet LUCRETIUS, the article QUILLET, &c.

(2) They have been reprinted at Amſterdam in 1701, in two volumes in 12mo.

form on the penalty of being excluded the rank of honeſt men. The cenſurers of obſcenities ſeem to be ſo much the more capable of terminating the queſtion by a deciſive and executive ſentence, in the whole Republic of Letters, becauſe they might make up a Senate out of all ſorts of men. There would be in it not only perſons venerable for the auſterity of their lives, and ſacred character, but alſo military men, and profeſſed gallants, and, in a word, many who give offence by their voluptuous life. This is an authority of great weight; for the liberty of leud verſes muſt needs be an ill thing, ſince it is diſliked by thoſe very perſons who live in debauchery. But in vain have obſcene writings been exclaimed againſt, it has had no effect to diſtinguiſh between honeſt and diſhoneſt men. There has always been in the Republic of Letters, a right or liberty of publiſhing writings of this nature. This right has never been liable to preſcription; ſeveral perſons of a diſtinguiſhed merit have prevented it by the freedom they have allowed themſelves in ſuch ſort of works; and this has brought no diſgrace upon them, nor any ways incapacitated them for the enjoyment of all the honours and privileges belonging to their condition, nor prevented the preferments they might hope for from their fortune (3).

He would be laughed at who ſhould go about to prove that Boccace was not a man of probity, becauſe he wrote the Decameron; or conclude, that the Queen of Navarre, ſiſter to Francis I, was not a Princeſs of admirable virtue, whoſe praiſes reſounded every where, becauſe ſhe wrote ſome Novels of Gallantry. Antony Panormita loſt nothing, either of his fortune or good reputation, by his ſmutty poem of the Hermaphrodite (4). The ſame may be ſaid of Benedict le Court, and the famous Tiraquellus: the former gave himſelf great liberty in writing a commentary on Martial d'Auvergne's Decrees of Love: Nonnunquam etiam, ſays he in his Epiſtle Dedicatory to a Counſellor of the Parliament of Paris, quod in amore jocatus ſim laſciviente calamo: and every body knows how many obſcene collections Tiraquellus inſerted in his commentaries upon matrimonial laws (5). Did Scipio du Pleix uſe any periphraſes or reſerves in his book called, La curioſite naturelle redigée en queſtions ſelon l'ordre alphabetique? Did he not explain things in the moſt natural terms imaginable? What did he loſe by that book? Nothing at all. I ſhould never have done, ſhould I undertake to give a liſt of all the Civilians, who, in trials of adultery, or impotency, have alledged many obſcenities, without any prejudice to their reputation. I have named three or four, Antony Hotman, Sebaſtian Roulliard, Vincent Tagereau, and Annæus Robert (6). This is enough: let us name ſome perſons of another rank.

The Dutch could not endure that any body ſhould defame Secundus as a wicked and profligate man, or ſo much as deny that he was an honeſt man, under pretence that he wrote very laſcivious verſes (7). Ramirez de Prado, who wrote notes upon Martial, printed at Paris with the King's licence in the year 1607, and full of leud explications, loſt nothing by this of his reputation or fortune, no more than Gonzales de Salas for his commentary of the ſame kind upon an obſcene author (8). Joubertus, Chancellor of the univerſity of Montpellier, and Phyſician to the King of France, and to the King of Navarre, loſt neither his penſions, nor his honourable poſts, for inſerting ſeveral obſcenities in his book of Vulgar Errors. Nor is he on that account eſteemed a leſs illuſtrious and honeſt man. Did Quillet's Callipædia hinder him from being recompenſed with an abbey by Cardinal Mazarin (9)? Feramus, Advocate in the Parliament of Paris, did not find that his merit was leſs extolled, or acknowledged after he had wrote verſes againſt Montmaur, wherein he ſported with very obſcene fictions. And to come nearer our own time, was Mr de la Fontaine, who publiſhed ſo many leud tales leſs careſſed by every body at court and city? Lords and Princes, the ladies of the higheſt rank, the moſt illuſtrious perſons of the long robe, have all courted and admired him. Was he not admitted into the French Academy? And is not that honour for a man of his character, equivalent to a mareſchal's ſtaff for a military man? I doubt not but Mr de la Reinie would have gladly entertained him at his table the very day that he condemned his new tales (10); for in ſuch books wiſe men know how to diſtinguiſh between the perſon of the author, and his writings.

III. Let us ſee whether the Proteſtants have been more rigid. I do not think that the Conſiſtories ever thought of cenſuring Ambroſe Paré, whoſe Anatomical books written in the vulgar tongue, were full of filthy things. There are many obſcenities in Joſeph Scaliger's commentaries upon the Priapeia, and upon Catullus. There are more ſtill in Janus Douza's commentary upon Petronius. One of thoſe two writers was Profeſſor at Leyden, and the other was one of the Curators of that univerſity. They did not loſe upon that account their credit, and the great eſteem they were in; and though Beza mightily exclaimed againſt them in an Epiſtle Dedicatory to the States-General (11), his out-cries were not minded. Daniel Heinſius, Profeſſor in the ſame univerſity, enjoyed all the honours he could pretend to; he was one of the Secretaries of the Synod of Dort, and received, on a thouſand occaſions, ſeveral proofs of the eſteem they had for his perſon; and yet he publiſhed ſome poems that are far from being modeſt. What he and Scriverius called Baudii amores, is a very wanton collection; and it is to be obſerved, that Scriverius was a man of merit, and of great note among the learned in Holland. Notwithſtanding Beza's exhortation, Theodore de Juges (12) put out an edition

---

(3) I do not pretend to extend this to particular caſes, exceeding certain bounds, nor to perſons who are otherwiſe infamous for their actions.

(4) See remark [I], of the article PANORMITA.

(5) See the article SANCHEZ (Thomas) citation (14).

(6) See the articles QUELLENEC, and ROBERT.

(7) See, concerning Grotius, who wrote laſcivious verſes, Rivet. Oper. Tom. iii, pag. 1112, 1224. Grot. in Diſcuſſ. Rivet. Apolog. pag. 237.

(8) Petronius.

(9) See remarks [C], [D], of the article QUILLET.

(10) It was on the fifth of April 1675. The ſentence may be ſeen at the end of the third caſe of Furetiere, whereby the ſale of the book is prohibited, and it is ordered that an information ſhall be made about the impreſſion and ſale of it. What has been ſaid in my Remarks on the Judgment of the Public, &c. numb. xxxiii. viz. That the Tales of la Fontaine were condemned to the flames by the ſentence of a Magiſtrate of Paris, was affirmed to me by a perſon who came from France. I am perſuaded he was miſtaken, and that there was no other ſentence, but that of Mr la Reinie. I ſhould have been more cautious, had I deſigned to inſert that particular in my Dictionary. But the piece I then wrote being only a looſe ſheet, I was not ſo careful as I ought to have been.

(11) That of his ſermons on Chriſt's reſurrection.

(12) Mr Mentel under the feigned name of Johannes Caius Tilebomenus calls him Thomas de Judicibus, in the preface to the Judicium de Fragmento Traguri enſi Petronii. His miſtake about the Chriſtian name is more excuſable than that of Mr de Clavigny de ſainte Honorine, who, page 25, of his treatiſe, Concerning Suſpicious Books, pretends that Theodore de Juges was called Golſtadius. He meant that Goldaſtus and Theodore de Juges were the ſame author.

edition of Petronius with his Prolegomena, wherein he endeavoured to juſtify thoſe who explain the obſcenities of that Roman author. It does not appear that Theodore de Juges did ſuffer in his reputation or fortune upon that account. He was a Proteſtant, and ſome perſons of his family were Counſellors in the court of Caſtres, whoſe members were one half Proteſtants and the other Roman Catholics; and he ſpent a conſiderable part of his life at Geneva. Goldaſtus had enjoyed the ſame impunity after his edition of Petronius, which he publiſhed with his Prolegomena, wherein he undertook to juſtify the reading of ſuch an author, and made a particular anſwer to Beza's reflexions. Shall I ſay that the famous d'Aubigné was very much reſpected at Geneva, though the cynical liberty of his pen was a notorious thing? Shall I obſerve that the conſiſtory of Charenton never had any thoughts of complaining of Dr Menjot, though his writings concerning Phyſic are intermixed with many obſcene things? Shall I add, that Iſaac Voſſius being a Canon of Windſor, when he publiſhed a book full of filthy things, the Dean and the Chapter did not meet to inflict upon him even the ſlighteſt puniſhment, viz. that of being reprimanded?

It is therefore no wonder if the faction contrary to thoſe who condemn obſcenities, did always maintain itſelf in the Republic of Letters: for beſides their alledging ſeveral reaſons for their opinion, they ſhelter themſelves under the authority of ſeveral examples. You may ſee theſe reaſons and theſe examples in the Prolegomena of Goldaſtus upon Petronius. All thoſe who have apologized for the authors who as Phyſicians, or as Caſuiſts, advance obſcene things (13), alledge reaſons againſt reaſons, and authorities againſt authorities. They want neither great names nor grave authorities, magno ſe judice quiſque tuetur (14). But do not think that I ſuppoſe that their reaſons and thoſe of their adverſaries, have an equal force. I have declared in ſeveral places, that I abſolutely condemn Catullus's obſcenities, and thoſe of his imitators, and the exceſſive freedom of the Caſuiſts; and I add now, that the arguments alledged by thoſe who plead for the liberty of inſerting obſcenities in an epigram, ſeem to me very weak, if compared with the contrary arguments (15). I further add, that an obſcenity ſoftened, and only meant as a jeſt, ſeems to me to be more blamable than a very obſcene invective deſigned to create an abhorrence for impurity. And as for the obſcenities of the ſtage, I am of opinion, that they ought to be ſeverely puniſhed by the magiſtrate. They are a ſchool of debauchery, and belong rather to the firſt claſs than to the ſeven claſſes that follow it, and are the ſubject of theſe preliminary remarks. I have ſtill one more to offer.

An anſwer to thoſe who blame a thing for this reaſon, that a better one might be done.

IV. For I ſay in the third place, that if any one ſhould alledge that it were better for the writers of theſe ſeven claſſes, to apply themſelves only to ſerious matters, and to treat them with all the modeſty required by the goſpel, he would depart from the ſtate of the queſtion. This advice, though very good in it ſelf, is not pertinent on this occaſion, ſince they might anſwer, that the queſtion is not, whether they have choſen the good part, and whether they have made the beſt uſe they could make of their leiſure and pen, but only whether they have taken a liberty condemned, upon pain of ignominy, by the ſtatutes of the Republic of Letters, the regulations of civil policy, and the laws of the ſtate? They would readily acknowledge, that they could not avoid being condemned, if they were judged by the laws of the goſpel; but they would maintain that all writers are in the ſame caſe ſome more, ſome leſs, there being none but may be told, that he might have employed himſelf in a more Chriſtian-like manner than he has done: for to give an inſtance of it, a Divine who has ſpent all his time in writing commentaries upon the Scripture, might have made a more pious uſe of it. Had it not been better for him to divide the day between mental prayer and works of charity? Why did he not ſpend part of the day in meditating upon the greatneſs of God, and the four laſt things? Why did he not ſpend the other in going from one Hoſpital to another to relieve the poor, and from houſe to houſe, to comfort afflicted perſons and inſtruct little children? ſince therefore no man, will they ſay, can give a good account of his time at the ſevere tribunal of the Divine juſtice, and every body ſtands in need of mercy on account of many uſeleſs things, and for having erroneouſly choſen what was not the moſt neceſſary part; we appeal to another juriſdiction, and deſire it may be enquired whether we have done any thing for which in the Judgment of the Public, and before the tribunal of the magiſtrates, we deſerve to loſe the title of good men, and to be deprived of the rank and privileges of men of honour. We deſire a thing, would they ſay, which cannot be refuſed to ſeveral virtuous women who go to plays and to balls, who love gaming and fine cloaths, and who have ſuch regard for their beauty, that they carefully ſtudy what ornaments will ſet it off to the beſt advantage. They know very well that their conduct is not agreeable to the precepts of the goſpel; but whilſt they do nothing elſe, they may lawfully [illegible] the quality, rank, and privileges of virtuous women. They deſerve to be [illegible] and the Chriſtian Moraliſts, I grant it: but till the public, or the [illegible] a note of infamy upon ſuch a courſe of life, they cannot be [illegible] whoever ſhould call them ſo, would be obliged to make [illegible]. They may alledge the practice of all ages, ſince there have [illegible] many virtuous women, who loved gaming, plays, balls, and jewels; [illegible] all, they do not

---

(13) See remark [D], of the article ALBERTUS Magnus; and remark [C], of the article SANCHEZ (Thomas).

(14) Lucan. Pharſ. lib. i, ver. 127.

(15) The reaſons pro and con may be compared together, by reading Father Vavaſſeur's book de Epigrammate, ch. ii, intituled de Obſcenitate in Epigrammate vitanda.

not offend againſt the Civil Laws, nor againſt the rules of human honour, and are not guilty of that kind of diſorder, which is the peculiar character of gallant women. The Poets, who in an Epithalamium make too naked a deſcription of a wedding-night, may alledge the ſame reaſons: they will own that their Muſe might have pitched upon a more laudable ſubject, and that the compoſition of a Chriſtian ſonnet was preferable to that; but this very compoſure would not have been the beſt thing they could have done. It had been better for them to ſpend their time in praying, and ſerving the poor in Hoſpitals, &c. There is hardly any buſineſs but what may be blamed for this reaſon, that a better one might have been pitched upon; and of all the occupations of this life, there is hardly any that is more blamable, if we judge of it by the rules of religion, than that which is moſt common; I mean the occupation of thoſe who endeavour to get money either by trading or other fair means. Humanly ſpeaking, the moſt lawful means of growing rich are contrary, not only to the Spirit of the Goſpel, but alſo to the literal prohibitions of Jeſus Chriſt and his Apoſtles. And therefore it highly concerns all men, that God ſhould be merciful to them for not making the beſt uſe of their time. The Poets I ſpeak of, having laid down this principle, add, that they only tread in the ſteps of many perſons illuſtrious for their virtue and wiſdom; that the liberty they take, always prevailed among honeſt men; that if it had been laid aſide for ſome ages as the peculiar character of debauchery, they could not be excuſed; but that it will appear they may claim the right of poſſeſſion, and that a thing which has been practiſed by ſo many honeſt men, cannot be accounted diſhoneſt (16). This is a maxim of Pliny on the preſent queſtion. He was one of the greateſt wits, and one of the moſt honeſt men of his time; he made ſome verſes that were thought to be ſomewhat impudent (17), and was blamed for it: he alledged many great examples in his vindication, and would not inſtance in the Emperor Nero, though, ſaid he, I am not ignorant that things do not grow worſe, becauſe they are ſometimes practiſed by wicked men, but that they continue to be honeſt, when they are often practiſed by honeſt men (18).

Thus much for the Poets. Now I muſt obſerve in a few words that the authors belonging to the other claſſes abovementioned, may alledge the ſame reaſons. Nay, ſome of them may ſay ſomething more ſpecious: A natural Philoſopher, for inſtance, and a Phyſician, may maintain, that their profeſſion requires they ſhould explain what concerns generation, barrenneſs, the green-ſickneſs, a woman's delivery, and the furor uterinus, as well as fermentation, and what concerns the Spleen, the Gout, &c. A Caſuiſt will ſay, that it is no leſs neceſſary that confeſſors and penitents ſhould be informed of the ſeveral ways of offending againſt chaſtity, than of the ſeveral frauds that are committed in purchaſes.

At leaſt we ought to do thoſe authors the juſtice they claim, viz. not to judge of their morals by their writings (19). No neceſſary conſequence can be drawn from either of thoſe two things to the other. Some Poets are chaſte in their verſes, and in their morals; ſome are neither chaſte in their verſes nor in their morals; ſome are only chaſte in their verſes; and ſome are not chaſte in their verſes, but they are ſo in their morals, and all their fire lies in their heads (20). All the wanton ſtrokes of their epigrams, are only witty conceits; their Candida's and their Leſbia's are fictitious miſtreſſes. The Proteſtants cannot deny it of Beza, ſince he declares that he lived a regular life when he wrote the Poems, intituled, Juvenilia, of which he did ſo much repent (21).

Particular remarks concerning the obſcenities pretended to be in this Dictionary, three precautions which I have taken.

V. After theſe general obſervations, I ſhall proceed to the examination of what concerns this Dictionary; and the firſt thing I ſhall obſerve upon this head is, that if thoſe obſervations are not looked upon as a ſolid juſtification, I ſhall not be prejudiced by it; but if they are approved as ſuch, they will be of great uſe to me. I am in far better circumſtances than all the authors I have mentioned (22); for though Catullus, Lucretius, Juvenal, and Suetonius, be never ſo much condemned, a writer who cites them, cannot be blamed for it. Thoſe authors are to be had in all the Bookſellers ſhops; the paſſages quoted out of them, cannot be more dangerous than they are in thoſe authors themſelves; and there is a vaſt difference between the firſt authors of an obſcenity, and thoſe who mention it only as the proof of a fact, or of an argument which the ſubject in hand obliges them to alledge. Granting that Joubertus expreſſed himſelf too immodeſtly, does it follow from thence that I could not alledge his authority, when I was to criticize a very weak argument alledged againſt thoſe who accuſed the Phyſician Herlicius of lewdneſs? However it be, if the excuſes alledged in favour of Suetonius, Joubertus, &c. are good and ſolid, ſo much the better for me; if they are not good, it can do me no prejudice; my caſe is different from theirs, and much better. By the argument à fortiori what they may ſay in their vindication, may be alledged by me with greater reaſon; and what is a weak argument for them, may be a very ſtrong one for me. You need only compare together the nine claſſes I have mentioned, and you will find that the laſt, which ſuits my work, is leſs liable to a juſt cenſure.

This will more clearly appear, if to what I have ſaid above (23), concerning the nature of my caſe, I add this conſideration, viz. That I have avoided three things that might have occaſioned juſt complaints.

(16) I ſay nothing of the liberty Mr de Voiture takes in his poems. It is no new thing for the Poets to take this vicious liberty. They have long-ago proſtituted the chaſtity of the Muſes. They alledge their multitude in their vindication. There is no conteſting with them concerning a poſſeſſion, which they have enjoyed for ſo many ages by the conſent of all nations. Girac. Reſponſe à la Défenſe de Voiture, pag. 74.

(17) See the fourteenth Letter of the fourth book of Pliny, and the third of the fifth book.

(18) Neronem tranſeo, quamvis ſciam non corrumpi in deterius, quæ aliquando etiam à malis, ſed honeſta manere quæ ſæpius à bonis fiunt. Plin. Epiſt. iii, lib. v, pag. m. 289.

(19) See remark [D], of the article Vayer.

(20) Compare with this what Count Buſſi Rabutin mentions concerning Madam .... The paſſion of jeſting is predominant with her, and when ſhe is in that humour, ſhe joyfully liſtens to the freeſt diſcourſes, provided they are diſguiſed. Nay ſhe anſwers with improvements, believing that her wit might be called in queſtion, if ſhe did not improve upon what was ſaid to her ... She is of a cold conſtitution; at leaſt if we may rely on her huſband: to this he partly owed her virtue, as he ſaid, all her fire lies in her mind: indeed ſhe makes ample amends for the coldneſs of her conſtitution. Hiſt. Amoureuſe des Gaules, pag. m. 174, & ſeq.

(21) See the article Beza, remarks [V], & [X].

(22) That is the eight claſſes of authors, abovementioned.

(23) See, above, number ix.

In the firſt place, whenever I have ſaid any thing as my own, I have avoided all words and expreſſions that are contrary to common civility and decency. This is ſufficient in a work of this nature, intermixed with Hiſtorical narratives, and all ſorts of diſcuſſions; for to pretend that a compilation which is to contain matters of Literature, Law, or Natural Philoſophy, according to the various ſubjects treated on, ought to be written according to the moſt ſtrict rules of decency obſerved in a ſermon, or in a book of devotion, or a novel, would be confounding things, and ſetting up a kind of tyranny over mens minds. A word that would be thought unbecoming in the mouth of a preacher, and in a ſmall romance deſigned for the entertainment of the ladies, would not appear ſo in a caſe written by a lawyer, nor in the verbal proceſs of a Phyſician, nor in a book of Natural Philoſophy, nor even in a piece of Literature, or in the faithful tranſlation of a Latin book, ſuch as for inſtance, the relation of Abelard's miſfortune. It is therefore certain, that there are ſeveral degrees of decency, with reſpect to the ſtyle: the higheſt degrees belong to ſome writers, and not to all. If an ingenious man was deſired by ſome ladies to write a romantic Hiſtory of Jupiter's or Hercules's adventures, he would do well never to uſe the words, to geld, to deflower, to get with child, to lie with a nymph, to raviſh her; he ſhould either lay aſide the particulars that might excite thoſe ideas, or keep them at a diſtance by general and enigmatical expreſſions. But if the writers of an Hiſtorical Dictionary, wherein the reader expects to find an exact tranſlation of what is to be found in the ancient Mythology concerning Jupiter's adventures, uſed long circuits, and far fetched expreſſions, whereby the fate of ſome nymphs might be gueſſed at, they would be accounted finical and ridiculous. They do not offend againſt decency, provided they keep within the bounds of common civility, that is, provided they abſtain from ſuch words as are uſed by the rabble, and which even a debauchee carefully avoids in a ſerious converſation. They may boldy uſe all the words that are to be found in the Dictionary of the French Academy, and in that of Furetiere, unleſs the authors of theſe Dictionaries give notice, that thoſe words are odious and obſcene. This is the firſt thing I have obſerved; viz. that I keep to the rules of common decency, when I ſay any thing as my own. I now proceed to give an account of the courſe I have taken as to paſſages quoted by me out of other authors.

I have avoided, in the ſecond place, to expreſs in our language the meaning of a quotation, which contained ſome immodeſt thing, and have only ſet it down in Latin. The paſſages I cite out of Brantome and Montagne are not the moſt offenſive which may be found in thoſe authors; and I may ſay the ſame with reſpect to D'Aubigné, and other French writers ſomewhat too free, whom I have ſometimes quoted to prove what I ſaid.

In the third place, I have avoided mentioning, in any language whatſoever, ſuch things as had a character of extravagancy and enormity unknown to the vulgar; and I have quoted nothing out of certain books that are little known, and which I had rather leave in darkneſs than excite the deſire of buying them, in thoſe who ſhould find them cited in this work. I never cited on this ſubject any authors but ſuch as may be had every where, and are reprinted almoſt every year. I could name a very honeſt man, who never was a debauchee, who wrote from London to one of his friends, that he expected to find quite other things in my Dictionary, from the clamours of certain people. I imagined, ſaid he, that it contained unknown obſcenities, but I could find nothing in it, but what myſelf and my companions knew before we were eighteen years old.

After what has been ſaid, it will be no difficult matter to know whether I have been juſtly or wrongfully blamed. The whole affair may be reduced to theſe two points, 1. Whether I am liable to cenſure, becauſe I have not ſufficiently wrapped up in ambiguous periphraſes the obſcene facts which have been found in Hiſtory. 2. Whether I am to blame, becauſe I have not wholly ſuppreſſed thoſe facts.

The firſt of the two queſtions to which the preſent diſpute may be reduced, runs upon words or expreſſions. An anſwer to that charge.

VI. The firſt of theſe two queſtions, properly ſpeaking, belongs only to the Grammarians: Morality is not concerned in the matter; the civil Magiſtrates have nothing to do with it, Nihil hæc ad edictum prætoris; neither are the Moraliſts or the Caſuiſts concerned in it. If an action was to be brought againſt me, it could only relate to the unpoliteneſs of my ſtile; whereupon I would appeal to the French Academy, as the proper and competent judge of ſuch cauſes. I am ſure thoſe gentlemen would not condemn me; otherwiſe they would condemn themſelves, ſince all the words I make uſe of, are to be found in their Dictionary, without any note of diſhonour. When they do not declare that a word is obſcene, all writers are thereby authorized to uſe it; I mean ſuch words as they have defined. But further, I ſhould readily conſent to be condemned by them; for I do not pretend to politeneſs of ſtile, I have declared in my preface that my ſtile is very incorrect, and not free from expreſſions either improper, or which begin to be obſolete, or even from barbariſms, and that in theſe reſpects I am not very ſcrupulous. Why ſhould I pretend to it, ſince ſeveral famous authors, who lived at Paris (24), and were members of the French Academy, did not care for it? Why ſhould a man hamper himſelf in a book deſigned for things, and not for words, and which containing all ſorts of matters ſome ſerious, and others ludicrous, neceſſarily requires one ſhould uſe various ſorts of expreſſions? The author of ſuch a work needs not to be ſo cautious as a preacher; and though the latter ought, in the pulpit, to avoid this phraſe, They who get a maid with child, ought either to marry her, or give her a portion, yet he may uſe it without any indecency in a book concerning caſes of conſcience. So true it is, that an author may expreſs himſelf differently, according to the nature of his books.

(24) Mr le Laboureur, for inſtance, (See the preface to his Additions to Caſtelnau's Memoirs*) and Mr de Mezerai, Secretary to the French Academy.*

But if any thing can excuſe the writers, who have no regard to I know not what refined delicacy which increaſes every day, it is this, that there will be no end of it; for, in order to act conſiſtently, a vaſt number of words which the French tongue cannot be without, muſt be accounted obſcene; and the writers who pretend to be ſo nice, may eaſily be convicted of abſurdity. It may be proved to them, that according to their principles there are no preciſe or foppiſh women, and that thoſe whom we call ſo, are very reaſonable, and argue conſequentially. I deſire them to tell me, why the verb to geld appears obſcene to them. Is it not becauſe it offers an obſcene object to our imagination? But for the ſame reaſon the word adultery cannot be pronounced without a greater obſcenity. Thus this word muſt be baniſhed. There will be a neceſſity to baniſh likewiſe the words marriage, wedding-day, bride's-bed, and a vaſt number of ſuch expreſſions, which excite very obſcene ideas, and incomparably more offenſive than that, at which the preciſe lady in one of Moliere's plays was ſo much offended. For my part, uncle, ſays ſhe, all that I can ſay is, that marriage ſeems to me to be a very ſhocking thing. How can a woman endure the thought of lying by a naked man (25)? According to the principles of our Puriſts nothing could be more reaſonable than ſuch a diſcourſe, and every virtuous maid ſhould turn out of her chamber all perſons who ſhould come and tell her of a deſign to marry her. She might juſtly complain, that they have ſo little regard for her modeſty, as to offer to her a frightful obſcenity without any veil or diſguiſe. To aſk a married woman, whether ſhe has had any children, would be a monſtrous obſcenity; politeneſs would require that we ſhould uſe figurative expreſſions, and imitate, for inſtance, the finical lady, who ſaid, 'That her companion 'had given into lawful love (which was marriage), and that ſhe knew not how ſhe 'could reſolve to taſte brutiſh pleaſures with a man; That ſhe had done it to leave be'hind her ſome traces of herſelf, that is, ſome children (26).'

According to the notions of the Puriſts, it would be a very reaſonable thing to exclaim againſt Moliere's School of Women, with all the fury he has ſo handſomely ridiculed, and which is, at the bottom, a downright extravagance. Every virtuous perſon ſhould ſay that expreſſion, Children coming out through the ear, is abominable . . . Can any one that has any virtue, be pleaſed with a piece that keeps modeſty in a conſtant alarm, and continually defiles the imagination? . . . . I poſitively affirm, that an honeſt woman cannot ſee that play, without being put to ſhame, I have diſcovered ſo many leud and filthy things in it (27). . . . . Thoſe obſcenities, God be thanked, appear bare-faced, they have not the leaſt covering: The boldeſt eyes are frighted at their nakedneſs . . . . That paſſage of the ſcene, wherein Agnes mentions what was got from her, is more than ſufficient to prove what I ſay. . . . . Fy . . . . (28). I repeat it again, the filthy things of that piece fly into one's face. . . . . Is not modeſty viſibly offended by what Agnes ſays in the place we ſpeak of (29)? If ſome Urania ventured to anſwer, 'Not at all. Agnes does not ſay a word but what is 'very modeſt; and if you will have it, that ſhe means ſomething elſe, the obſcenity 'proceeds from you, and not from her, for ſhe ſpeaks only of a ribbon that one got 'from her (30):' the following anſwer would be a wiſe one: '(31) Ah! you may 'talk of a ribbon as much as you pleaſe; but that my where ſhe ſtops, was not put 'there for nothing: it occaſions ſtrange thoughts; that my is furiouſly ſcandalous: and 'ſay what you will you can never juſtify the inſolence of that my . . . . There is an in'tolerable obſcenity in it (32).' That diſcourſe, though never ſo impertinent, would be proper and honeſt, according to this principle, All words which defile the imagination, that is to ſay, which denote an obſcene object, ought to be laid aſide. According to this principle, all thoſe who have ſome modeſty, would be like the Marquiſe Araminta, whoſe character is as follows: 'She ſays every where it is a horrid piece (33), and 'that ſhe could never endure the obſcenities it is ſtuffed with . . . . She follows the ill 'example of thoſe women, who being in the decline of their age, have a mind to 'ſupply what they ſee they are loſing, by ſomething elſe; and would have the gri'maces of a ſcrupulous prudery ſerve them inſtead of youth and beauty. This lady 'carries the thing farther than any body, and is ſo nicely ſcrupulous, that ſhe finds ob'ſcenities where no body elſe had diſcovered any. It is ſaid her ſcruples are ſuch as 'will disfigure our language, and that there is hardly any words but what ſhe would 'curtail, either at the beginning or end, by reaſon of the immodeſt ſyllables ſhe finds 'out in them (34).'

I think I have read ſomewhere, that preciſeneſs has been carried ſo far that ladies would not ſay J'ai mangé des confitures, but des fitures. At this rate, above one half of the words of the Dictionary of the French Academy ſhould be ſtruck out, and then the reſt would be inſignificant, for they would want a connexion; and thus we ſhould be obliged to explain ourſelves by ſigns only, which would occaſion more ſcandalous and more dangerous obſcenities than thoſe that come into one's ears (35). Here follows a (25) Moliere, Précieuſes ridicules, Scene iv, pag. m. 17.

(26) Sorel, de la Connoiſſance des bons Livres, pag. 470, Dutch Edit.

(27) Moliere Critique de l'Eſcole des Femmes, Scene iii, pag. m. 13.

(28) Id. ibid. pag. 14.

(29) Ibid. pag. 16.

(30) Ibid.

(31) Ibid.

(32) Note, That in this paſſage of Moliere, every body expects to hear Agnes ſay, that ſome body has got her maidenhead; which excites a very obſcene idea.

(33) That is, the play intituled, The School of Women.

(24) Moliere, ubi ſupra, Scene v.

(35) Segnius irritant animos demiſſa per aurem,
Quàm quæ ſunt oculis ſubjecta fidelibus, & quæ
Ipſe ſibi tradit ſpectator.
Horat. de Arte Poet. ver. 180.
But what we hear moves leſs than what we ſee.
ROSCOMMON.

paſſage of the Chevræana, whereby my aſſertion will be extremely well confirmed. ‘ A lady who has a great deal of wit, but is too finical, told me one day ſhe never uſed any words which might excite an obſcene idea, and that when ſhe was in company with polite people ſhe ſaid, Un fond d'Artichaut; un fond de Chapeau; une rue qui n'a point de ſortie, for what we call un Cul de ſac. I told her ſhe did very well, and that I would not fail to do the ſame. However, I added, that on ſome occaſions we were obliged to ſpeak like others. She very civilly defied me to give her any inſtance of it; and I aſked her how ſhe called in common converſation a piece that is worth ſixty pence? Sixty pence, replied ſhe. But, Madam, how do you call that letter of the alphabet that comes next to P? She bluſhed, and at the ſame time replied, Truly, Sir, I did not think you would brink me back to my a, b, c (36).’ You ſee Mr Chevreau approves that we ſhould never uſe any words, which may excite an obſcene idea; and by virtue of that principle, he is of opinion, that we ſhould never ſay, un Cul de ſac. He muſt therefore ſtrike out not only above two pages of Furetiere's Dictionary (37), corrected by one of the politeſt writers of our days (38), but alſo a vaſt number of words, whoſe firſt ſyllable excites more immodeſt ideas than the ſyllable Cul. He muſt alſo baniſh the words adultery, fornication, incontinence, and a thouſand more: but as rigid as he is with reſpect to obſcene words, he was not willing to grant upon one ſingle point what that preciſe lady required; therefore he was not conſiſtent with himſelf [A]. But let us forgive him that inconſiſtency; for the conſequences of his aſſertion are ſo abſurd, and ſo impracticable, that he is not to blame for not keeping to them

(36) Chevræana, Part. ii, pag. 101, 102, Dutch Edit.

(37) At the beginning of the ſyllable Cul.

(38) Mr Baſnage de Bauval.

[A] As rigid as Mr Chevreau is with reſpect to obſcene words . . . he was not conſiſtent with himſelf.] Immediately after having ſaid with Marſhal de Baſſompierre, that all men carry about them the key of the treaſure (a), that is, of the ladies virginity; he affirms, that Faire des Enfans, is an obſcene expreſſion (b), and that it ought never to be uſed before ladies, who have nice ears. Thoſe two obſervations were not fit to appear cloſe together. Here is another that is a falſity. *The Latins (Mr Chevreau goes on) had the ſame niceneſs as to* liberis dare operam; which has been obſerved in the ſixteenth letter of the ninth book of Cicero to Papirius Petus, where we may further ſee, why they rather choſe to ſay nobiſcum than cum nobis. Inſtead of the ſixteenth letter, Mr Chevreau ſhould have quoted the twenty-ſecond; but this would have only prevented the leaſt fault, ſince it is not true that Cicero ſays what he aſcribes to him. He ſays nothing of nobiſcum, nor of cum nobis (c), and affirms, that liberis dare operam is a modeſt expreſſion (d). Mr Chevreau has found ſome obſcenities in Malherbe's poems, by reaſon of ſome words that have a double meaning (e), but which were only uſed by Malherbe in a modeſt ſenſe. Mr Menage ſaid upon this, and upon St Amant's taking this hemiſtich of the ſame Poet, qu'on ſurvit à ſa mort, to be obſcene, ‘ That a man muſt have his imagination ſtrangely corrupted, to find ſuch obſcenities in authors. Quod ſi recipias, nihil loqui tutum eſt, ſays Quintilian, ſpeaking of a man, who found an obſcenity in theſe words of Virgil, Incipiunt agitata tumeſcere (f). But, to return to Malherbe's verſe, Je veux bander, &c. They who find an obſcenity in it, have more reaſon than thoſe who found ſomething obſcene in Terence and Salluſt; the words aures and animos removing all ambiguity (g).’ Mr Chevreau anſwered, (h), That a man muſt be blind not to ſee ſuch things, and that when he does not perceive thoſe obſcenities, it is a ſign he is very much uſed to them . . . The reader does not expect to find thoſe obſcenities in books, and bluſhes when he meets with them. What would Mr Menage have ſaid, if after he had approved my obſervation, he had read in a ſmall book I have juſt now read, Je ſuis convaincu qu'on examine aujourd'huy les choſes, &c. and in another, On vit dans le Conſiſtoire tout autrement? If it be a ſhameful thing to ſhew thoſe obſcenities, it is more ſhameful ſtill to write them; and there is a neceſſity to diſcover them, that others may avoid them. A little after he blames this expreſſion of Malherbe, elle étoit paroiſſante juſques au Nombril, - - - She was to be ſeen down to the navel, he pretends (i), that this laſt word is one of thoſe that cannot be now modeſtly written. . . . That word, in its proper ſenſe, belongs only to Phyſicians and Midwives, who call every thing by its name; and herein decency and modeſty do not permit us to imitate them (k). One would think he had a mind to revive the old cuſtom, when the words ſhoe, foot, bed, breeches, were not ſpoken without adding under correction, with reverence, &c. This was one of the moſt material points of civility, whereby one might know well-bred children; at preſent all this paſſes for country breeding. But to proceed, ‘ One cannot too carefully avoid ſuch obſcenities as leave filthy ideas in the mind, and offend ears that are not over nice. C. Servilius Glaucia Quæſtor in the year of Rome 641, was looked upon as the filth of the ſtreets, by reaſon of the meanneſs of his ſoul; and yet the moſt eloquent man among the Romans, could not bear that he ſhould be called Curiæ ſtercus *, nor that the great loſs the commonwealth ſuſtained by the death of Scipio, ſhould have been expreſſed in theſe words, Reſpublica morte P. Scipionis Africani caſtrata. Mr de Balzac did not obſerve decency, nor the precepts of the antient Rhetoricians, whom he often called his maſters, when he wrote to a friend concerning a certain perſon, Qu'il étoit tout composé de parties honteuſes. Our language has been ſo modeſt for theſe ſixty years, that we ſeldom uſe the words whore and bawdy-houſe, which the preachers formerly uſed without any ſcruple in their beſt ſermons (l).’

From all theſe paſſages, it appears, that Mr Chevreau was very ſevere in his theory; but his practice was not anſwerable to it: for ſhould one ſtrike out of his works every thing that defiles the imagination, there would be abundance of gaps in them. To ſpeak only of the Chevræana, wherein he appears ſo rigid a Moraliſt; how many things are there in it that excite very obſcene idea's? Some of thoſe paſſages are quotations, and others are his own compoſures. Why ſhould a man preſcribe any rules which cannot be obſerved either in a general Hiſtory, or in a collection of obſervations of all kinds?

It will not be improper to give here an inſtance of what he ſays concerning the preachers of former times; and therefore I ſhall ſet down ſome paſſages out of a ſermon of John de Monluc, Biſhop of Valence, and one of the moſt eminent preachers of the XVIth century. ‘ He who deflowers and corrupts a virgin, is guilty of fornication, a crime mentioned in Deuteronomy xxii, and yet in our days no account is made of acts of Fornication, which are daily committed: many poor maids are enticed, ſeduced, and brought to perdition; and thoſe who have debauched them, glory in it, and think it much to their honour that they have been able to conquer thoſe women, who had for ſome time reſiſted the temptations of the fleſh. But if they are not puniſhed in this world, the moſt high God, who ſees every thing, will in time call them to an account: they ſhall give an account of the time they have loſt, of the money they have ſpent upon pimps and bawds, they ſhall be anſwerable for the ſins committed by the maid after ſhe has been ſeduced, and for her being forſaken and finding no body to marry her. Then they will know whether they had any reaſon to boaſt of ſuch an execrable action (m). . . . . They likewiſe infringe this commandment who contrary to the order of nature, commit that enormous and deteſtible crime called Sodomy: ſuch perſo [illegible] mned to death by the law of God, as [illegible] iticus xx. (n). That command is alſo [illegible] oſe, who [illegible] monly

---

(a) Chevræana, Part. i, pag. 350.

(b) See what Mr Arnauld ſays in his Défenſe de la Traduction de Mons, livr. iv, ch. ii, pag. 334.

(c) Note, That Quintilian, lib. viii, cap. iii, obſerves, that inſtead of cum notis hominibus, it ſhould be ſaid cum hominibus notis.

(d) Liberis dare operam quam honeſte dicitur? Cicero, Epiſt. xxii, lib. ix ad famil. pag. 58. Edit. Græv.

(e) Chevræana, Part. ii, pag. 122.

(f) Menage, Obſerv. upon Malherbe, pag. 388.

(g) Id. ibid. pag. 581.

(h) Chevræana, Part. ii, pag. 123.

(i) Ibid. p. 124. Note, That Girac, in his Reply to Coſtar, §. viii, pag. m. 74, pretends this expreſſion of Coſtar is too obſcene, viz. the thigh of a boy ſo white and ſo well ſhaped.

(k) Ibid. pag. 125.

* Quintilianus Inſtitut. Orat. lib. viii, cap, vi, De Tropis.

(l) Chevræana, ibid. pag. 275, 276.

(m) Monluc, Biſhop of Valence, Sermons ſur les dix Commandemens de Dieu, pag. 504, Edit. of Vaſcoſan 1558, in 8*vo.*

(n) Id. ibid. pag. 506.

them. His only fault lies in not perceiving the falſity of a principle, whereof the moſt neceſſary conſequences are abſurd, and plainly tend to the deſtruction of the uſe of ſpeech. It is to be obſerved, that there are ſome ladies as virtuous as that preciſe woman, who do not ſcruple to ſay, Cul d'Artichaut, and Cul de ſac. This you may ſee in a paſſage of Coſtar; which has a great affinity with the ſubject in hand [B].

I have already obſerved that it is impoſſible to ſatisfy the Puriſts, againſt whom I am writing. The ground they go upon will make them lay aſide, whenever they pleaſe, abundance of words not yet condemned by them, which, according to their maxims, do not leſs deſerve to be rejected than thoſe which they have actually laid aſide. There is no avoiding their cenſure. Though you relate things in modeſt words, as has been done in the ſecond volume of the Menagiana, they will ſay, That there are ſome paſſages in it plainly contrary to modeſty, which cannot be read without horror, by virtuous perſons (39). Could Father Bouhours avoid being criticiſed, though in his French tranſlation of the Goſpels he took all poſſible care to lay aſide every word that might appear never ſo little unbecoming (40)? Was not Mr Boileau, whom the illuſtrious Preſident de la Moignon often commended, for having purged ſatirical poetry from the obſcenity, which till then had been, as it were, peculiar to it (41), charged with ſmuttineſs, for having uſed (42) the words Embryon, voix luxurieuſe, morale lubrique? If ſuch words cannot be admitted, there will be no end of cenſuring.

I know ſeveral perſons who blame Mezerai for ſaying that ſome ſparks, who had committed adultery, were mutilated in the parts wherewith they had offended (43). Their cenſure is grounded upon theſe two reaſons: one is, that there was no need to mention a circumſtance which offers ſuch an obſcene object: the other is, that he ſhould at leaſt have omitted all the words after mutilated, that word being ſufficient to expreſs the thing. I deſire thoſe Critics not to take it ill of me, if I believe that the circumſtance which they ſay ſhould have been omitted, is one of thoſe which an Hiſtorian ought never to forget; for if there is any thing extraordinary in the puniſhment inflicted upon a malefactor, it ought to be particularly mentioned. The ſecond Remark does not appear to me better. A ſentence of death may import that a malefactor's hands, noſe, or ears ſhall be cut off, before he be put to death; and therefore the word mutilated would not ſufficiently expreſs the circumſtance which Mezerai was to inform us of. But ſuppoſing that this word is ſufficient, does it follow from thence, that the addition of the reſt is a fault? Do not we commonly ſay, I have ſeen it with my own eyes, &c. There are ſeveral needleſs words in ſuch phraſes, and yet no body finds fault with them. Laſtly, I ſay that thoſe Critics contradict themſelves: they only blame this addition as being unneceſſary; the thing, ſay they, had been well enough underſtood without it. They are not therefore againſt offering an obſcene image to the mind, they would only have two or three needleſs ſounds omitted. Their zeal for purity would have been edifying, had they been altogether againſt the uſe of any thing in Hiſtory that may excite an obſcene idea; but they allow of it, provided it be done without any needleſs words. Thus they deſtroy in this laſt Remark what might have been edifying in the firſt. Such is the nice taſte of our Puriſts: they blame one expreſſion, and 'commonly live in delights and pleaſure, who ſpend 'their time in feaſting and banquetting, and pamper 'their body to make it a veſſel of luxury and whoredom. St Peter gives a lively deſcription of them in 'the ſecond chapter of his ſecond epiſtle (o) ... Sporting themſelves with their own deceivings, whilſt they 'feaſt with you; having their eyes full of adultery, and 'cannot ceaſe from ſin, beguiling unſtable ſouls. That is, 'their only end and intention is to deceive poor ſouls, 'and by their banquets and feaſts, to allure them to 'adultery and all manner of filthineſs. So that their 'habitations are bawdy-houſes, where aſſemblies are 'held, matches are made, and women are ſeduced: 'in a word, they are the plague of a country; and 'yet ſuch people are moſt eſteemed and honoured, 'eſpecially thoſe who are the ring-leaders, and as it 'were, the cocks of their pariſh (p).'

The uſe we may make of the paſſages extracted from that ſermon, is to know that the liberty of expreſſing one's ſelf in ſuch a plain manner, is not ſinful in itſelf, for then it would not have been lawful in Henry the ſecond's time. Now if it was lawful then, ſhould a preacher uſe it in our days, his only fault would conſiſt in not conforming to the mode. But if any one ventured at this preſent time to wear a ruff, would he not offend againſt the mode? And yet it would be no ſinful action.

[B] A paſſage of Coſtar, which has a great affinity with the ſubject in hand.] The polite Voiture (who would believe it?) was charged with uſing obſcene expreſſions (q), tho' he [illegible] acquainted with the genteel part [illegible] company with perſons of [illegible] what his apologiſt anſwered: 'There is hardly any lady who ſcruples to 'repeat and ſing the verſes which Mr de Voiture 'made upon a lady's back-ſide, and I do not know 'one who makes any difficulty to ſay, un cul d'artichaud, and un cul de ſac (r).' The apologiſt alledges afterwards the paſſage I have recited in another place (s), and adds theſe remarkable words: Let us hear our peeviſh Critic †. It was feared there was not enough of this ſort of wit in Mr de Voiture's letters, and that in this reſpect he would not come up to Plautus and Ariſtophanes; and therefore it was thought neceſſary to add theſe words in the laſt edition, which were wanting in the 178th letter. I conſent to the caſtrating of Ulpian, ſince you will have it ſo, and even of Papinian; for they beget nothing but law-ſuits. This thought is very ingenious. Hitherto I have always heard people ſay, without any ſcruple, that a book was caſtrated, to denote a book which is not entire, but curtailed. If our adverſary had any intereſt in the academy, he would get this licentious expreſſion aboliſhed, and this modeſt phraſe ſubſtituted in its room, to injure books and make them eunuchs. The paſſages of Quintilian ‡ quoted by him, are wrongly quoted, and that author maintains, that if ſome expreſſions of Salluſt were accounted obſcene, it was not the writer's but the reader's fault. As for Celſus, who pretended to find an obſcenity in a hemiſtich of Virgil, the ſame Quintilian blames him for it, and ſays, that if ſuch a niceneſs was allowable, no man could be ſure he ſpeaks well, and every body ſhould be ſilent (t). It is to be obſerved, that Coſtar, who affords me this paſſage, was none of thoſe learned men who are unacquainted with the genteel part of the world. He was acquainted and kept company with people of faſhion.

(39) Journal des Sçavans, for February 21, 1695, pag. 145, Dutch edition.

(40) See the third letter of a learned lady to another lady her friend, pag. 8.

(41) See the preface to Boileau's Works.

(42) In the tenth ſatire.

(43) This is in the ſecond volume of his Chronological Abridgment, ad ann. 1313, where he ſpeaks of ſome ſparks who courted the daughters-in-law of Philip the Fair.

(o) Id. ibid. pag. 507.

(p) Ibid. pag. 501.

(q) See the eleventh ſection, of Girac's anſwer to the apology for Voiture.

(r) Coſtar, Suite de la Defenſe de Voiture, pag. 189.

(s) In the article HOSPITAL (Michael de l') citat. (113).

† Pag. 72, 73.

‡ Page 73. Ductare exercitus, & patrare bellum apud Salluſtium dicta ſanctè & antiquè ridentur à nobis, ſi Diis placet: quam culpam non ſcribentium quidem judico, ſed legentium. Quintil. lib. 8, cap. 3. Si quidem Celſus cacophaton apud Virgilium putat Incipiunt agitata tumeſcere: quod ſi recipias, nihil loqui tutum eſt. Ibid.

(t) Coſtar, ibid. pag. 191, 192.

and approve another, though they equally offer the ſame obſcenity to the mind. The Obſervations printed at Paris in the year 1700, againſt Mezerai, will be very acceptable to thoſe Critics. See the margin (44). He is blamed in that book (45) for commonly uſing the words concubine, baſtard, and adultery, which are inconſiſtent with the niceneſs of our age. I am ſure they would not condemn the words favourite, natural ſon, and conjugal infidelity, which have the ſame ſignification. How inconſiſtently do they argue!

IX. The new whims of thoſe, who, as I am told, begin to reckon the words gliſter (46) and phyſic among obſcene terms, and uſe the general word remedy in their room, would be leſs unreaſonable. The word cliſtere (gliſter) was laid aſide, as including too many circumſtances of the operation, and the word lavement took its place as having a more general ſignification. But becauſe the idea of the word lavement is become ſpecific, and takes in too many circumſtances, it will be quickly laid aſide for fear of ſullying the imagination, and none but general phraſes will be uſed, ſuch as J'étois dans les remedes, un remede lui fut ordonné, &c. which do not more particularly denote a gliſter or a purge, than a bag of herbs hung about the neck. Theſe are certainly very ſtrange whims, and were they approved and followed in all their conſequences, they would deſtroy a great many expreſſions, to which every body is uſed, and which are very neceſſary to thoſe who recover from a ſickneſs, and to their viſitants; otherwiſe it would be no eaſy matter to keep up a converſation in their chambers, and there would be a neceſſity to uſe the whole jargon of the preciſe ladies: But after all, thoſe whims are better grounded than thoſe of the Puriſts, who are willing that an obſcene image ſhould be imprinted in the mind, provided it be with ſuch and ſuch words, and not with others.

To ſum up what I have ſaid upon this head, I obſerve,

I. That the queſtion is not about a point of Morality, but is a mere Grammatical diſpute, which ought to be decided by thoſe who are judges of the politeneſs of ſtile.

II. That I ſhall ingenuouſly confeſs, I did not aim at the honour that may be acquired by ſuch politeneſs.

III. That I do not think all authors are obliged to ſubmit to the new notion of politeneſs of ſtile; for were it exactly followed, there would be no need at laſt of any Dictionary but that of the preciſe ladies.

IV. That the title of this new politeneſs is not ſo well eſtabliſhed as to obtain the force of a law in the Republic of Letters. The antient title remains ſtill (47), and may be uſed till a preſcription begins.

V. That in ſuch a book as this, it is enough not to act againſt the common practice; but any one who keeps within thoſe bounds as carefully as I have done (48); may uſe ſeveral expreſſions which would be improper in a ſermon, or a book written by a finical author. It is enough for him that they are uſed in Anatomical books, in caſes drawn up by Lawyers, and in the converſations of learned men (49).

AN examination of what ſome alledge, viz. that certain things offend modeſty.

X. But that it may the better appear that Morality is not concerned in the preſent queſtion, I muſt obviate another objection of my cenſurers. Let us ſee whether they can alledge this pretence, that every phraſe which offends modeſty, is an attempt upon Morality, ſince it is prejudicial to chaſtity.

Whereupon I obſerve in the firſt place, that they who ſay that certain things offend modeſty, muſt needs mean either that they weaken chaſtity, or exaſperate the perſons who are chaſte. In the firſt ſenſe their poſition cannot be admitted; and if women are to decide the caſe, the cenſurers will be infallibly caſt. But doubtleſs women are the moſt competent judges of ſuch a thing, ſince ſhame and modeſty are allotted to them in a much greater degree than to men. Let them therefore be pleaſed to tell us what paſſes in their ſoul, when they hear or read a diſcourſe which offends modeſty. They will not ſay, I am ſure, that it not only fills their minds with obſcene thoughts, but alſo that it excites in their hearts a laſcivious deſire which they cannot reſtrain without great difficulty; and, in a word, that they feel themſelves expoſed to temptations which ſtagger their virtue, and carry it to the brink of ruin. We may be ſure, that inſtead of ſuch an anſwer, they will ſay, that the idea which riſes againſt their will in their imagination, fills their mind at once with the higheſt degree of ſhame, indignation, and anger. Now it is certain that nothing can be more effectual than this, to corroborate chaſtity, and remove the contagious influence of an obſcene object imprinted on the imagination; ſo that inſtead of ſaying, according to the firſt ſenſe, That what offends modeſty, endangers chaſtity, it ought to be ſaid on the contrary, that it is a fence, a preſervative, a bulwark for that virtue; and conſequently, if we underſtand this phraſe, Such a thing offends modeſty, in the ſecond ſenſe, we ought to believe, that inſtead of weakening chaſtity, it revives and corroborates it.

Therefore it will ſtill be true that the cenſuring of an author for not following the moſt refined politeneſs of ſtile, is a mere Grammatical controverſy, in which Morality is not in the leaſt concerned.

AN obſervation concerning the vexation of readers. Groſs obſcenities are leaſt dangerous.

XI. If it be replied, that Morality is concerned in it, ſince the author has expreſſed himſelf in ſuch a manner as angers the readers: I anſwer, that this argument is grounded

---

(44) Mezerai having ſaid, that a prieſt was depoſed for being ſurprized with a woman, and mutilated in thoſe parts that are uſeleſs to an honeſt prieſt, the author of the Obſervations, pag. 64, aſks this queſtion: 'Had 'he not ſpoke 'with more decency, if he 'had ſaid only 'that he was 'mutilated? 'Had not the 'thing been ſufficiently underſtood? 'However he 'might have 'pitched upon 'an expreſſion 'leſs ſcandalous.

(45) Pag. 18, 19.

(46) See Garaſſe's Apology, pag. 107.

(47) Mr Menage's friends were, in the year 1695, charged with publiſhing obſcene things in a book printed with the King's licence.

(48) Nay, I have obſerved Quintilian's precept in relation to ſome words that are grown obſcene by the depravation of the readers. Vel hoc vitium ſit quod κακὸφατον vocatur: ſive mala conſuetudine in obſcœnum intellectum ſermo detortus eſt, ut Ductare exercitus, & Patrare bellum, apud Salluſtium dicta ſanctè & antiquè, ridentur à nobis, ſi diis placet; quam culpam non ſcribentium quidem judico ſed legentium, tamen vitanda quatenus verba honeſta moribus perdidimus, & evincentibus etiam vitiis cedendum eſt, ſive junctura deformiter ſonat. Quintil. lib. viii cap. iii, pag. m 367.

(49) As thoſe that were held in Mr Menage's's houſe.

upon a falſe hypotheſis; for no writer can prevent the ſpite, vexation, and anger of the readers, on a thouſand occaſions. Every Controverſiſt, who defends his cauſe with great art and ſubtilty, continually vexes the zealous readers of the contrary party. Whoever in an account of a journey, or in the Hiſtory of a nation, relates things that are glorious to his own country and religion, and ſhameful to foreigners and other religions, cruelly vexes the readers, who are not prepoſſeſſed as he is. The perfection of an Hiſtory conſiſts in being unacceptable to all ſects and nations; for it is a ſign the writer neither flatters, nor ſpares any of them. Many readers fall into ſuch a rage when they meet with certain things in a book, that they tear the leaf, or write in the margin, Thou lieſt, rogue, and deſerveſt to be baſtinadoed (50). None of theſe things (51) can be alledged as a reaſon why authors ſhould be tried at the bar of Morality: the Critics are their only judges.

(50) I have ſeen ſuch things written in the margin of ſome books.

(51) I except hereſies, the reading of which may have vexed the orthodox Chriſtians.

The only thing therefore that may be further objected, is, that Morality is concerned in the repreſentation of obſcene objects, becauſe it is apt to excite unlawful deſires and leud thoughts. But this objection is not ſo ſtrong againſt me as againſt thoſe, who uſe the covers, reſerves, and nice ways of wrapping up things, which ſome complain I have neglected; for they do not hinder the impreſſion of the object upon the imagination, but imprint it without exciting any ſhame and indignation. They who uſe ſuch covers, do not intend to make themſelves unintelligible; they know every body will underſtand what they ſay, and it is certain they are perfectly underſtood. The delicacy of their touches has only this effect, that people look upon their pictures the more boldly, becauſe they are not afraid of meeting with nudities. Modeſty would not ſuffer them to caſt their eyes upon them, if they were naked obſcenities; but when they are dreſſed up in a tranſparent cloth, they do not ſcruple to take a full view of them, without any manner of ſhame, or indignation againſt the Painter: and thus the object inſinuates itſelf more eaſily into the imagination, and is more at liberty to pour its malignant influence into the heart, than if the ſoul was ſtruck with ſhame and anger; for thoſe two paſſions exhauſt almoſt the whole activity of the ſoul, and put it into ſuch a trouble that it can hardly have any other ſentiment. At leaſt it is certain, that obſcenity cannot act ſo ſtrongly upon a ſoul overwhelmed with ſhame and anger, as upon one that is free from confuſion and vexation. Pluribus intentus minor eſt ad ſingula ſenſus. When the ſoul is affected with one paſſion, it is leſs ſuſceptible of another.

Add to this, that when an obſcenity is expreſſed only by halves, but in ſuch a manner that one may eaſily ſupply what is wanting, they who ſee it finiſh themſelves the picture which ſullies the imagination; and therefore they have a greater ſhare in the production of that image, than if the thing had been fully explained. In this laſt caſe they had been only paſſive, and conſequently the admiſſion of the obſcene image would have been very innocent; but in the other caſe they are an active principle, and conſequently, are not ſo innocent, and have more reaſon to fear the contagious effects of that object, which is partly their work. Thus this pretended regard to modeſty, is really a more dangerous ſnare; it makes one dwell upon an obſcene matter, in order to find out what was not clearly expreſſed. And is this a matter fit to be ſuggeſted to the reader's meditation? Were it not better to prevent his ſtopping at it?

XII. This is ſtill of greater force againſt the writers who ſeek for covers and reſerves. Had they uſed the firſt word they met with in a Dictionary, they had only touched upon an obſcene thing, and gone preſently over that place; but the covers they have ſought out with great art, and the periods they have corrected and abridged, till they were ſatisfied with the fineneſs of their pencil, made them dwell ſeveral hours upon an obſcenity. They have turned it all manner of ways; they have been winding about it, as if they had been unwilling to leave ſuch a charming place [C]. Is not this ad ſirenum ſcopulos conſeneſcere, to caſt anchor within reach of the ſyren's voice, and the way to ſpoil and infect the heart? It is certain, that excepting thoſe who are truly devout, moſt of our other Puriſts are not in the leaſt concerned for modeſty, when they avoid ſo carefully the expreſſions of our anceſtors; they are profeſſed gallants, who cajole all ſorts of women, and have frequently two miſtreſſes, one whom they keep, and another who keeps them. Truly it becomes ſuch men very well to exclaim againſt a word that offends modeſty, and to be ſo nice when ſomething is not left to be ſupplied by the reader's imagination! We may apply to them what Moliere ſaid of a pretended

[C] They have been winding about it, as if they had been unwilling to leave ſuch a charming place.] This puts me in mind of an inſcription engraved in golden letters on a black marble upon the bridge Nôtre Dame at Paris.

Sequana cum primum Reginæ allabitur urbi,
Tardat præcipites ambitioſus aquas.
Captus amore loci, curſum obliviſcitur anceps,
Quo fluat, & dulces nectit in urbe moras.
Hinc varios implens fluctu ſubeunte canales,
Fons fieri gaudet qui modo flumen erat.
Anno MDCLXXVI (u).

When the ſeine firſt enters the metropolis of France, he ambitiouſly ſtays his rapid ſtreams, and being enamoured with the place, he forgets his courſe, is uncertain whither to flow, and winds in ſweet meanders through the town, thence filling the pipes with his waters, he who was once a river, joys to become a fountain. Anno 1676.

Theſe verſes were made by Mr de Santeuil.

(v) Deſcription Nouvelle de la Ville de Paris, Tom. ii, pag. 206, Dutch Edit. 1685.

pretended prude: ‘ Believe me, thoſe women who are ſo very formal, are not accounted more virtuous for it. On the contrary, their myſterious ſeverity, and affected grimaces, provoke all the world to cenſure their actions. People delight to find out ſomething to blame in their conduct. And to give an inſtance of it, there were the other day ſome women at this play oppoſite to our box, who by their affected grimaces during the whole repreſentation, and turning aſide their heads, and hiding their faces, made people tell many ridiculous ſtories of them, which had never been mentioned if they had not behaved ſo; nay, a footman cried out, that their ears were chaſter than all the reſt of their body (52).’ The men I ſpeak of, think only of making themſelves admired for the delicacy of their pen.

The Janſeniſts are accounted the beſt Moraliſts; and I do but follow their opinion, when I ſay, that a groſs obſcenity is leſs dangerous than one that is nicely expreſſed. I am not ignorant, ſays one of them (53), ‘ that people call ordures only ſuch words as are groſsly obſcene; and gallantries, thoſe which are expreſſed in a nice, delicate, and ingenious manner; but groſs obſcenities, though covered with a witty ambiguity, as it were with a tranſparent veil, do not ceaſe to be obſcenities; they do not leſs offend chaſte ears, defile the imagination, and corrupt the heart; a ſubtile and imperceptible poiſon, is not leſs mortal than a violent one. There are ſome encomiums upon modeſty, which modeſty itſelf cannot bear, Witneſs that of * Father le Moine. The groſs obſcenities of a Carman or Porter, are not by a great deal ſo pernicious, as the ingenious words of a cajolling ſpark.’ This Janſeniſt having mentioned ſome gallant thoughts vented by Father Bouhours, under the name of an interlocutor in a dialogue, which are expreſſed in very nice words, goes on thus (54): All parents, not excepting thoſe who are moſt engaged in the world, will acknowledge that thoſe pernicious fooleries are MORE DANGEROUS than GROSS obſcenities (55); that they corrupt the hearts, and make the worſt of impreſſions upon the minds of youth. I have quoted in my Dictionary (56) a paſſage of Mr Nicolle, wherein he poſitively affirms, that unlawful paſſions are the moſt dangerous, when they are covered with a veil of modeſty.

This cannot be denied: Nay, women of an imperfect virtue would run leſs danger among brutiſh men, who ſhould ſing filthy ſongs, and talk rudely like ſoldiers, than among polite men who expreſs themſelves in reſpectful terms. They would think themſelves indiſpenſably obliged to be angry with thoſe brutes, and to quit the company, and go out of the room with rage and indignation. But ſoft and flattering compliments, or at moſt ſuch as are intermixed with ambiguous words, and ſome freedoms nicely expreſſed, would not ſtartle them; they would liſten to them, and gently receive the poiſon.

A man who courts a maid would immediately deſtroy all his hopes, ſhould he groſsly and filthily propoſe his ill deſign: he is a perfect ſtranger to the Art of Love, if he has no regard to modeſty in the choice of his expreſſions.

There is no father but would rather have his daughters bluſh than laugh at ſome ſtories told in their preſence. If they bluſh, they are ſafe (57); ſhame prevents the ill effect of the obſcenity; but if they laugh, it makes an impreſſion, and nothing diverts the ſtroke. If they laugh, it is doubtleſs becauſe the obſcenity was artfully wrapped up, and ſeaſoned with an apparent modeſty. Had it been groſsly expreſſed, it would have excited ſhame and indignation. Farces in our days are more dangerous than thoſe of our anceſtors: in former times they were ſo obſcene, that virtuous women durſt not appear at them; but now they do not ſcruple to ſee them under pretence that obſcenities are wrapped up, though not in impenetrable covers. Are there any ſuch? They would bore them through, were they made up of ſeven hides like Ajax's ſhield.

If any thing could make la Fontaine's Tales very pernicious, it is their being generally free from obſcene expreſſions.

Some ingenious men, much given to debauchery, will tell you, that the ſatires of Juvenal are incomparably more apt to put one out of conceit with leudneſs, than the moſt modeſt and moſt chaſte diſcourſes that can be made againſt that vice. They will tell you that Petronius is not ſo dangerous, with all his groſs obſcenities, as he is in the nice dreſs of Count de Rabutin; and that the reading of the book intituled, Les Amours des Gaules, will make gallantry much more amiable than the reading of Petronius.

It were wrong to conclude from what has been ſaid, that the leaſt evil would be to uſe the expreſſions of Porters. That is not the caſe. I know the Stoics laughed at the diſtinction of words, and maintained, that every thing ought to be called by its proper name, and that there being nothing diſhoneſt in the conjugal duty, it could not be denoted by any immodeſt word, and that therefore the word uſed by clowns to denote it, is as good as any other. You may ſee their ſophiſms in a letter of Cicero (58). Perhaps, it were no eaſy thing to ſilence them by the way of diſputation (59), but they do not deſerve to be admitted to diſpute on that ſubject. What has been accounted a rule of decency and modeſty in all ſocieties, time out of mind, and with the unanimous conſent of the public, ought to be looked upon as a firſt principle, (52) Moliere, Critique de l'Eſcole des Femmes, Scene iii, pag. 15.

(53) Réponſe à l'Apologie du Pere Bouhours, pag. 73, & ſeq. Edit. 1700. See alſo the Lettres curieuſes de l'Abbé de Bellegarde, pag. 253, Hague Edit. 1702; and the article ACCORDS, remark [C], at the end.

* Lettre Provinciale xi. Peintures morales, by Father le Moine, livr. vii.

(54) Ibid. pag. 78.

(55) See the Trevoux's Journal, for February 1703, Edit. of France, on the romance intituled La Princeſſe de Porcien.

(56) In the article MARETS (John des). citat (11).

(57) Erubuit, ſalva res eſt. Terent.

(58) The xxiid, of the ninth book, ad Famil.

(59) Compare with this what has been ſaid in the article HIPPARCHIA, remark [D].

which no man is allowed to contradict. And therefore when a whole nation are agreed in calling ſome words immodeſt, inſomuch, that the very Porters who uſe them moſt, are perſuaded of their obſcenity, and abſtain from them before perſons of honour, and would be offended to hear them pronounced in a public aſſembly; no private perſon can be admitted to oppoſe ſuch a judgment. All the members of the ſociety are obliged to reſpect it. The courts of juſtice afford us a remarkable inſtance of it; for Lawyers are not allowed to repeat ſuch words, when they plead for the puniſhment of thoſe who have uſed them in reviling their neighbours. They will have public modeſty reſpected in the hearing of a cauſe; but when they judge by report, they not only permit the reporter to mention the very words of the offender though never ſo obſcene, but alſo command him to do it. This I have from a Counſellor in the Parliament of Paris, who told me within theſe few years, that having uſed a circumlocution the firſt time he reported ſuch a cauſe, the Preſident gave him to underſtand, that there was no occaſion to have a regard to chaſte ears, but to judge of the nature of the offence, and that therefore he was obliged to ſpeak the very word it conſiſted in. I fancy the Inquiſition uſes the ſame method [D].

The Stoics muſt have followed very near the ſame rule, and if in their private conferences they did not think fit to prefer one word to another, there was at leaſt a neceſſity for them to conform in public to the common way of ſpeaking. The unanimous conſent of nations ought in that reſpect to be the ſtandard of all private perſons.

Wherefore if the word putain (a whore) which our forefathers uſed in their graveſt books (60), as freely as the Romans uſed the word meretrix, begins to be generally decried, it is fit all authors ſhould begin to diſuſe it, and ſubſtitute the word courtezan in the room of it, ſince the world will have it ſo. But this is at the bottom a groundleſs nicety for either the word courtezan excites as ſtrong an idea as the other, or a weaker one. If the former, there is nothing gained by it, every body will ſtill have a notion of an infamous object: if the latter, it is leſſening the abhorrence which the public ought to have for a proſtitute. But does ſuch a creature deſerve ſuch a regard? Were it not better to aggravate the infamous notion of the trade ſhe profeſſes? Are you afraid of making her too odious? You are for giving her a favourable name which formerly ſignified a court-lady (62). One would think you are afraid of offending her, and willing to ſoften peoples mind by giving her a quaint name. The conſequence of which would be, if people reaſoned right, that the word courtezan would quickly grow obſcene, and a ſofter one ſhould be uſed for it. One ſhould ſay, a woman who behaves herſelf ill, and then, a woman that is talked of, and then, a ſuſpicious woman, and then, a woman who does not live a holy life (63), and at laſt deſire the moſt finical ladies to invent ſome other circumlocution.

(60) The tranſlators of the Bible of Geneva uſed it.

(62) See the Chevræana, Part. ii, pag. 415.

(63) Note, That Sandoval ſpeaking of the abominable actions commited at Rome by the army of Charles V, in the year 1527, is contented to ſay it was not a holy action, obra no ſanta. See La Mothe le Vayer, pag. 177, of the ſecond volume, of the edition in 12*mo*.

An anſwer to the objection grounded upon incivility.

I am juſt now ſenſible of another objection. It is a piece of incivility, will ſome ſay, to inſert in a book what cannot be ſpoken in the preſence of virtuous women; and therefore ſince incivility is blameable, morally ſpeaking, the fault for which you may be blamed, does not concern Grammar, but Morality.

I anſwer in the firſt place, that incivility morally ſpeaking is an ill thing only when it proceeds from pride, or a wilful contempt of other men; but when one is wanting in point of civility, either becauſe he knows not the way of expreſſing it, or does not think himſelf obliged to follow it, he is guilty of no ſin. Do ye think that an old Profeſſor of the Sorbonne, is bound to know all the arts that are practiſed by the young Abbés of the court, to expreſs their reſpect to the ladies with great politeneſs? That Profeſſor has other things to learn, which are much more important; and though he were informed what ſort of civility is in faſhion, he might lawfully diſpenſe with it. His age and character do not require he ſhould conform to it, but rather the contrary. I add,

[D] I fancy the Inquiſition uſes the ſame method.] I do not think the inquiſitors will allow ſuch abjurations, as contain horrid obſcenities, to be publickly read; but during the trial they hear them, and when they are written down, they are read with a loud voice in ſome private place. Such was the method of the inquiſitors of Rome in the year 1698, towards brother Peter Paul, of St John the Evangeliſt, a bare-footed Auguſtin Friar, convicted of prophanation, impiety, and of an abominable leudneſs. I have a copy of the abjuration, Abjura ſemipublica, which he made in a chappel al Sacello di Caſa Graniſi, and I find that among other things this was read to him: Diceſti haver tu moſtrato e rimoſtrato alle tue ſopradette devote con le quali tu proſequivi gl' abbracciamenti in parte naſcoſte che tu per la dolcezza di quelli eri rapito in eſtaſi, e ſentivi un godimento infinito dell' amor divino, e che tu t'infervoravi in quell' eſtaſi . . . . Hai detto haver bacciate alle tue donne le parti vergognoſe, e che doppo haverle coſi bacciate e toccate l'hai benedette & li hai aperti li meati, e pregavi dio che li conſervaſſe in tutto quello benedetto clauſtro verginale . . . . Hai detto che alcune donne ti hanno lavato le parti baſſe tre volte, la prima per purgarſi dalle colpe mortale, la ſeconda dalle veniali, e la terza dalle imperfettioni. Hai detto che alcune volte in godere delle donne tu ſentivi ſpecie di martirio . . . che un giorno parimente l'hai fatte radunare e ad una per una invocare e bacciare il tuo membro genitale (w).

It is not to be queſtioned that the Inquiſition would publiſh thoſe things, were it neceſſary to undeceive a formidable cabal, and an exaſperated populace, who ſhould maintain that a Monk had been ſeverely puniſhed for ſmall faults. Thus it was thought neceſſary to publiſh the informations made againſt the Knights Templars, tho' never ſo full of horrid obſcenities, rather than people ſhould think their order had been deſtroyed without a juſt cauſe.

(w) I have followed the Orthography of the manuſcript copy imparted to me by Dr Sylveſtre at his return from Rome in the year 1700.

I add, that new civilities are a ſlavery introduced by great men, or invented by their flatterers to the prejudice of ancient liberty. But if it be lawful for every private perſon to depart from the old cuſtom, it is alſo lawful to keep it till every body has laid it aſide, and it becomes ſome perſons not to be too haſty in taking up new modes. It is with this as with faſhions in cloaths. Worldly people immediately appear in the new faſhion, but the grave and wiſe do it only when it is grown adult, if I may be allowed to ſay ſo. A medium ought to be kept in thoſe things; a man muſt not be one of the firſt who takes them up, nor the laſt who leaves them; and none makes himſelf ridiculous by keeping the old faſhion, but when it is quite out of doors.

I anſwer in the ſecond place, that an author is not bound to ſuppreſs all the words that cannot be civilly ſpoken in the preſence of virtuous women: witneſs Mr de St Olon, who is no ſtranger to the ways of the court: he would not have ſaid before the ladies in a ſerious converſation what he has writ concerning the marriages of the Africans (64).

There are many reaſons for taking a greater liberty in a book than in converſation. An obſcenity ſpoken before virtuous women in good company, makes them very uneaſy; they cannot ward off the ſhocking blow; it is not in our power to hear or not to hear, what we are told in the Vulgar Tongue. The accidental meeting of a naked man, or the ſight of a leud picture, is not without remedy; we may immediately turn aſide, or ſhut our eyes; but we cannot ſtop the mouth of a talking man. The ſhame occaſioned by an obſcene idea, is much greater when we are ſurrounded with people who obſerve our looks. The confuſion and perplexity of a virtuous woman on ſuch an occaſion, makes her very uneaſy: this uneaſineſs is attended with indignation, becauſe men do not uſe to talk ſo before women whom they reſpect, and think to be honeſt, but before women of whom they have an ill opinion. There are no ſuch inconveniencies with reſpect to a book. If there is any thing in it which in your opinion is unchaſte, you may read it or let it alone. For inſtance, you may foreſee that the article of the courtezan LAÏS in my Dictionary, will contain ſome lewd quotations; do not read it. Let ſome truſty perſons take a view of the book, before you undertake to read it, and let them inform you of what is to be paſſed over. Beſides, a woman who is alone when ſhe reads a book, is not expoſed to the looks of a company, which is the thing that moſt perplexes and confounds her (65): and becauſe an author ſpeaks to no body in particular, ſhe does not think herſelf ſlighted or offended.

But after all you could not but know, will ſome ſay, that there are now many women who read books of literature; and therefore you ſhould not have been contented with what you call common civility; you ſhould have obſerved the niceſt and the moſt rigid civility, that the fair ſex might not find any thing in your book that might ſully their imagination. My anſwer is, that had it been poſſible by obſerving ſuch a rigid civility to prevent the reader's finding any ſuch thing in my Dictionary, I had willingly ſubmitted to the rules of the Puriſts, who come neareſt to the taſte of preciſe women; but I was fully convinced that the greateſt niceneſs cannot remove any image of an obſcene object from the mind of the reader. This will not be eaſily believed, unleſs I ſhew the truth of it with the utmoſt evidence.

THAT the niceſt words ſully the imagination as much as the moſt obſcene.

In order to do it, I need only prove this ſingle propoſition, the moſt obſcene and the moſt modeſt words that can be uſed to denote a filthy object, do both paint it with an equal force and livelineſs in the imagination of the hearer, or the reader. This ſeems at firſt a great paradox, and yet it may be made ſenſible to every body by a popular argument. Let us ſuppoſe one of thoſe adventures, which are ſometimes the talk of a whole town, a marriage ready to be celebrated, and ſuſpended all of a ſudden by the oppoſition of a third perſon. This third perſon is a young woman, who happens to be with child, and demands that the marriage her lover has contracted with another ſhould be declared void. Let us ſuppoſe that a very virtuous woman, who has only heard of this oppoſition in general, is willing to know what reaſons that young woman has for it. She might be anſwered a hundred different ways, without uſing the words which a porter, or a debauchee uſes in ſuch caſes. She might be told, ſhe has the misfortune to prove with child; he has enjoyed her; he has kept her company; they have been too intimate together; he has had to do with her; he has had the laſt favour of her; ſhe has granted him the moſt precious thing ſhe had, as it appears from the conſequences; what paſſed betwixt them, cannot be modeſtly ſpoken, chaſte ears would be offended at it; ſhe is obliged to get her honour repaired. Several other phraſes better wrapped up might be found out in anſwer to the queſtion of that virtuous woman; but all of them would imprint in her mind the filthy and brutiſh action, which has produced that young woman's pregnancy, as ſtrongly as Michael Angelo could have done it upon a cloth: and if that virtuous woman had heard by chance the bawdy word whiſpered by a debauchee in the ear of another debauchee, to let him know the matter, ſhe could not have a clearer notion of the thing. No perſon though ever ſo modeſt, can ſincerely deny what I have been ſaying, if they will examine what paſſes within their breaſt: It is therefore certain, that the moſt modeſt and the moſt obſcene words equally defile the imagination, when the thing denoted by them is a filthy object.

---

(64) In his relation of the empire of Morocco, printed at Paris in the year 1695.

(65) The moſt virtuous perſons, when alone, are not aſhamed when they get out of bed, but they would be aſhamed if they were ſeen by others.

Though you uſe the moſt modeſt expreſſions employed in the Scripture, to repreſent what we call conjugal duty: Adam knew his wife Eve (66): Abraham went in unto Hagar (67): I went unto the propheteſs (68): you will never be able to blot out the image of that object; it will be imprinted in the mind as ſtrongly as if you uſed the moſt porterly language. The ſame may be ſaid of the phraſes, to conſummate a marriage, the marriage was conſummated, the marriage was not conſummated, expreſſions which, if I may ſay ſo, are conſecrated, and cannot be avoided in the moſt ſerious relations, and the moſt Majeſtic Hiſtories (69): thoſe words raiſe the ſame idea as the words of a ploughman. See the margin (70).

But how comes it then, will ſome ſay, that a virtuous woman is not offended with veiled expreſſions, and is angry with a filthy word? I anſwer that their indignation proceeds from the acceſſory ideas which attend ſuch a word, but do not attend a phraſe which is veiled. The impudence of thoſe who expreſs themſelves like porters, and their want of reſpect, is the true cauſe of ſuch an indignation. Their expreſſion excites three ideas: one is a direct and main idea; the others are indirect and acceſſory. The direct idea repreſents the filthineſs of the object, and does not do it more diſtinctly than the idea of another word. But the indirect and acceſſory ideas repreſent the diſpoſition of the perſon who ſpeaks, his brutiſhneſs, his contempt of the hearers, and his deſign of affronting a woman of honour (71). This is what ſhe is angry at. She is not offended, as ſhe is a modeſt woman; for under this notion nothing can offend her but the object itſelf which ſullies the imagination: but ſhe is not offended at that object; for if it had been repreſented to her imagination with other phraſes expreſſing the obſcenity as effectually as the filthy word, ſhe would not have been angry; and therefore her vexation proceeds from ſome other reaſon, I mean from her being uncivilly uſed. Hence it is that a woman of gallantry will often expreſs a greater indignation againſt thoſe who talk obſcenely to her, than a virtuous woman, becauſe ſhe takes it for an inſult, and a bloody affront. Her reſentment does not proceed from the love of chaſtity, but from pride and a deſire of revenge. As for virtuous women, who are provoked at a groſs obſcenity, they are ſo out of a reaſonable principle of ſelf-love; for reaſon requires they ſhould reſent an injury which deprives them of the reſpect due to their ſex; and beſides, it is very reaſonable they ſhould keep up a good reputation, which they could not do, ſhould they ſuffer the ſame things to be ſaid to them which are ſaid to leud women.

Thus I prove that it was impoſſible to leave out of this Dictionary every thing that ſullies the imagination. It muſt be ſullied, which way ſoever the reader be told that Henry IV had natural children.

IT is impoſſible to prevent objects from ſullying the imagination.

It is therefore enough for me to keep within the bounds of common civility. If any one was ſo great a lover of purity, as to wiſh not only that no immodeſt deſire ſhould ariſe in his mind, but alſo that his imagination ſhould be conſtantly free from every obſcene idea, he could not attain his end without loſing his eyes and his ears, and the remembrance of many things which he could not chooſe but ſee and hear. Such a perfection cannot be hoped for whilſt we ſee men and beaſts, and know the ſignification of certain words which make a neceſſary part of our language. It is not in our power either to have or not to have certain ideas, when certain objects ſtrike our ſenſes; they are imprinted in our imagination whether we will or not. Chaſtity is not endangered by them, provided we do not grow fond of them, and approve of them. If chaſtity was inconſiſtent with impure ideas, we ſhould never go to church, where impurity is cenſured, and ſo many banns of matrimony are bid: we ſhould never hear that office of the Liturgy that is read before the whole congregation on a wedding-day: we ſhould never read the moſt excellent of all books, I mean the holy Scriptures; and we ſhould avoid, as ſo many infectious places, all the converſations where people talk of pregnancies, childbirths, and chriſtenings. Imagination is a rambler which runs in a moment from the effect to the cauſe, and finds the way ſo well beaten, that it goes from one end to the other, before reaſon has time to ſtop it.

There is another conſideration which may teach the compilers of Literature, that it is enough for them to keep within the bounds of common decency; I mean, that they muſt not expect to be read by people, whoſe ears and imagination are ſo tender as to receive dangerous impreſſions from the leaſt obſcene object. I do not know whether it was reaſonably ſuppoſed in ancient Rome, that the filthy words which little children were taught to ſpeak in the chamber of a bride (72), were the firſt ſhe had heard; but I am perſuaded, that in our days, any perſon of either ſex, who has been converſant in the world four or five years, has heard abundance of obſcene things, eſpecially in ſuch countries where jealouſy is not tyrannical: there people enjoy a great freedom; merry converſations, parties of pleaſure, feaſts, and country-journies are very common; they only think of paſſing away the time merrily. It is true, the preſence of the fair ſex prevents obſcenities from appearing bare-faced, but they appear in a diſguiſe; which, as I have ſhown above, does not hinder the impreſſion of a filthy object, no more than if one ſhould uſe the plain words of a clown. Women dare not be angry when things are wrapped up (73) for fear of being accounted finical and preciſe (74). This is a mere diſpute about words: the thing ſignified is admitted, but not all the (66) Gen. iv, 1.

(67) Ibid. xvi. 4.

(68) Iſaiah viii, 3.

(69) Thoſe for inſtance which treat of the divorce of Henry VIII, and Catherine of Aragon.

(70) This expreſſion, The parts which it is not fit to name, is accounted very modeſt, and very chaſte; yet it is as ſignificant as any other: It is at bottom naming the thing which we ſay it is not fit to name; and denoting it in ſuch a manner, that no body can be at a loſs to know what is meant.

(71) Compare with this the article BEZA, citation (36), where I cite the Art of Thinking.

(72) See the article LYCURGUS, remark [G].

(73) See, above, citat. (52).

(74) See, above, citat. (20).

words which ſignify it. Therefore an author may very well believe that his readers will not be ſurprized, being ſtrengthened and hardened by cuſtom.

It is certain, that women who read a book of Literature, do not begin with that: they have already read romances, plays, and love poems. They are therefore ſufficiently experienced. There is nothing in my Dictionary that can daunt them, after they have encountered ſuch enemies. If the luxurious (75) Muſic of Opera's, the tenderneſs of Tragedies, the licentiouſneſs of Comedies, and the affecting deſcriptions of the effects and diſorders of love, make no dangerous impreſſions upon them, they need not be afraid of reading the articles of Abelard and Heloisa. If they find ſhocking paſſages in my Dictionary, their pain will ſoon be ſucceeded by the agreeable pleaſure they will feel, in having given to themſelves freſh proofs of the ſtrength of their modeſty. If they delight in ſuch paſſages, and ſpoil themſelves by dwelling on them, that will not be my fault, they muſt blame their own depravity. Do I not ſhew theſe things to be criminal?

(75) It is an epithet of Mr Boileau in his tenth ſatire.

Second queſtion. It cannot be ſaid that there are any obſcenities liable to cenſure in this book, as they conſiſt in the very facts related by me.

This is what I had to ſay upon the firſt of the two queſtions which I was to diſcuſs. I hope the reader will be ſenſible of the whole force of my juſtification, and own, that if there is in my Dictionary any obſcenity liable to cenſure, it does not proceed from the expreſſions I uſe when I ſpeak of myſelf. Let us inquire now whether it conſiſts in the things themſelves, either when I have ſet down the words of other authors, or have only given the ſenſe of them. This is the queſtion I have undertaken to examine.

No man can anſwer this queſtion in the affirmative, without laying down theſe two poſitions: 1. That an Hiſtorian is obliged to ſuppreſs all the leud actions which are to be found either in the lives of Princes, or in thoſe of private perſons. 2. That a Moraliſt, who condemns leudneſs, ought never to mention any thing that offends modeſty. The Puriſts I have been ſpeaking of, muſt neceſſarily admit theſe two poſitions, and it is certain, there have been at all times many people, who have condemned the hiſtories and invectives, in which the diſorders of leudneſs appear under dreadful images.

If our Puriſts are willing to argue conſiſtently, and to keep conſtantly to their maxims, they muſt admit the two poſitions I have mentioned. They muſt ſay, 1. That an Hiſtorian ought barely to obſerve, that Charlemagne, the two Joans of Naples, and Henry IV of France were not chaſte. 2. That a Preacher, and a ghoſtly Father, and any other man who deſires the reformation of manners, ought to cenſure leudneſs only in general. I have quoted (76) an author, who continually condemns the Hiſtorian Mezerai for mentioning ſome particular facts which offend chaſte ears. He cenſures him particularly for what he ſays of Margaret de Valois, the firſt wife of Henry the Great.

(76) See, above, citat. (44), (45).

There have been ſuch Puriſts in all ages; but there have always been alſo great authors who laughed at the ſcruples and fancies of theſe men; ſo that the Republic of Letters has always been divided into two parties upon this head: each of them alledged their reaſons and authorities; each of them raiſed objections, and made anſwers, and no ſupreme tribunal did ever determine the matter. I am therefore diſpenſed with entring upon a long diſcuſſion; this affords me a ſhort way to come off. For if they who deſpiſed the maxims of the Puriſts, did always make a conſiderable party in the Republic of Letters, if they always maintained their right, if that difference has never been decided, every private man may lawfully ſide with them, and believe at leaſt, that it is probable they are in the right. No man can reaſonably be denied the privileges of the doctrine of probability in this caſe. They who follow the Anti-Puriſts (77), are not reduced to two or three grave authors: they may be reckoned by hundreds, and may ſtrengthen their cauſe by the deciſive example of the inſpired writers (78). If you peruſe the book of Geneſis you will find that Moſes tells us, without any compaſs of words, that two daughters having made their father drunk, lay with him, and had children by him (79); that Dinah, Jacob's daughter, was raviſhed (80); that Judah, the ſon of the ſame Patriarch, defiled himſelf in an open road with a woman he took for a proſtitute, but ſhe was his daughter-in-law, and knew him very well (81); that one of the ſons of Judah * * * (82); and that Reuben, eldeſt brother to Judah, committed inceſt with a wife of his own father (83). There are many things in Leviticus, which are not proper to be read in Proteſtant churches. An abominable action is related in the book of Judges (84). The Prophets uſed the moſt energic expreſſions to repreſent the turpitude of leudneſs. See alſo the deſcription of the whore in the Apocalypſe. They have uſed ſome compariſons which the Miniſters durſt not mention entire [E]. All the Proteſtant tradeſmen in France could tell the Popiſh miſſionaries, diſputing

(77) So I call for brevity ſake thoſe who laugh at the pretended niceneſs of the Puriſts.

(78) See the article Sforza (Catherine) citat. (18).

(79) Gen. xix.

(80) Ibid. xxxiv.

(81) Ib. xxxviii.

(82) Id. ibid.

(83) Ibid. xlix. 4.

(84) Chap. xix.

[E] The Prophets uſed ſome compariſons, which the miniſters durſt not mention entire.] The following paſſage of Dr Menjot will ſerve for a commentary on the text of this remark. Hic obiter obſervabimus mulierem menſtruatam dici ἀποκαθημένην à ſeptuaginta . . . veteris Teſtamenti Græcis interpretibus, ὡς ῥάκος ἀποκαθημένης πᾶσα ἡ δικαιοσύνη ἡμῶν, † omnis noſtra juſtitia eſt quaſi pannus menſtruatæ; eò quod Iſraëliticæ fœminæ αἷς ἦν τὰ κατ᾽ ἐθισμὸν τῶν γυναικῶν, ‡ ut alibi loquuntur, iidem interpretes, during their monthly courſes, ſedere conſueviſſent, ut conſtat ex hiſtoriâ Rachelis ‡ . . . . Ità idem Eſaias anteà dixerat * λικμήσεις

† Eſaiæ cap. lxiv.

‡ Geneſ. cap. xxxi.

‡ Loc. cit.

* Ibid. cap. xxx.

diſputing about the merit of good works, that all our righteouſneſs is as filthy rags; but the remaining part of the paſſage was unknown to them, becauſe it was not put into Controverſial books. Has St Paul, in his Epiſtle to the Romans (85), ſuch a regard to chaſte ears as our Puriſts require? Does he not deſcribe, both in ſtrong and plain expreſſions the abominable impurities of the Heathens?

If it be objected, that the ſacred writers have privileges peculiar to them, ſunt ſuperis ſua jura; I anſwer, that not only the graveſt Heathen writers, but alſo the antient Fathers of the Church, wrote with the ſame freedom. When Livy does ſo gravely and majeſtically relate the ſuppreſſion of the Bacchanalia (86), he diſcovers ſeveral abominations, which ſully the imagination, and cannot be read without horror. Seneca, the graveſt and moſt rigid Philoſopher of antient Rome, deſcribes the moſt infamous leudneſs in the plaineſt words (87). He condemns it with all the ſeverity of a Cenſor, but at the ſame time he makes a plain and almoſt naked deſcription of it. When the Fathers of the Church ſpeak of the Gnoſtics or Manichees, or ſuch ſects, they relate ſeveral things which not only defile the imagination, but alſo make one's ſtomach riſe, and might ſerve for a vomit. Arnobius, in his invectives againſt the Heathens, is ſo little cautious in his words, that Mr de la Fontaine would certainly have dreſſed ſuch things more cleanly, and had been more reſerved in what concerns Priapus. St Auguſtin, on ſome occaſions, expreſſed himſelf in very plain and obſcene words (88). St Ambroſe and St Chryſoſtome have done the like; nay, the latter maintained, we ought to do it in order to inſpire a true abhorrence for ſuch leud actions as we deſcribe. Caſaubon did not approve this method [F]; but he muſt permit us to believe, that his opinion about moral queſtions, is not to be compared with that of ſo great a Saint.

If a catalogue was made of all the Hiſtorians from Suetonius down to Mezerai, who have groſsly related leud actions, it would fill up many pages; and if it be ſaid, that Suetonius has been blamed by famous authors, my adverſaries can take no advantage of (85) Chap. i.

(86) Titus Livius, lib. xxxix, pag. m. 749, & ſeq. Note, That Antony de la Faye in his French tranſlation of Livy, has not weakened the original.

(87) See the Hexameron Ruſtique, Journée II, pag. m. 45, & ſeq.

(88) Ibid. pag. 58, & ſeq.

λικμήσης ὡς ὕδωρ τῆς ἀποκαθημένης, ventilabis, hoc eſt diſperges ea (de idolis loquitur) ſicut immunditiam menſtruatæ, ut fert textus vulgatæ lectionis (x).

[F] Caſaubon did not approve this method.] It becomes him very ill to pretend to be wiſer than the antient Fathers. If the queſtion was about the ſenſe of a paſſage of Polybius, Suetonius, or Athenæus, one might reaſonably prefer his judgment. But for a man, who made the ſtudy of Philological learning his chief buſineſs, to pretend to tutor the moſt holy Fathers of the Church, upon matters of conſcience, is what cannot be digeſted. However, we muſt acknowledge his candour: he did not diſſemble that his cenſure upon Perſius, might be confuted by the maxims of St Chryſoſtome; he very ingenuouſly quotes the words of that Father. ‘Poëta alioquin graviſſimus, & verecundiæ virginalis, ut teſtantur de illo veteres, à moribus ſuis heic diſceſſit. Sic enim alienam impudicitiam caſtigat, ut ſermonis licentia, etſi figuris obſcurati, caſtas aures offendat meritò. Omnino ſatius erat verecundiam ſilentio vindicare. Sed neſcio quomodo pervaſit etiam ſapientiſſimorum hominum mentes illa opinio, obſcœnitatem obſcœnitate aut liberiore ſaltem dictione eſſe caſtigandam. Quod quàm à recta ratione alienum? & tamen ſummis viris ita olim placitum. Quis ſine rubore quæ de ſpeculo Hoſtii ſcripſit Seneca legat, paullo qui ſit αἰδημονέστερος? quid beatus Hieronymus, ille tantus caſtitatis & virginitatis buccinator? nonne & ipſe aliquando in turpia turpiculè invehitur? ſanè quidem: neque id uno loco. Sed cauſſam quæ viros graves compulit, ut ita ſentirent, itaque ſcriberent, aperit Johannes Chryſoſtomus, plenum illud omni virtute & ſanctimonia pectus. Ait ille homilia quarta in epiſtolam ad Romanos, eos quorum eſt ſcopus flagitia hominum nequam atque impudicorum reprehendere, cogi neceſſariò fœditatem illorum denudare, & quaſi ob oculos ſpectandam proponere: quia parum aliter profecturi ſint. Ἂν μὲν γὰρ, inquit, σεμνῶς εἴπῃς, οὐ δυνήσῃ καθικέσθαι τοῦ ἀκούοντος· ἐὰν δὲ βουληθῇς καθάψασθαι σφοδρῶς, ἀνάγκην ἔχεις ἀπογυμνῶσαι σαφέστερον τὸ λεγόμενον. Solet etiam in eam rem chirurgi exemplum afferre, qui ut tabo ac ſanie manans ulcus ſanet, non veretur ſibi manus inquinare, atque in fœtidiſſimum pus immittere. Ὁ ἰατρὸς, inquit, in priorem ad Corinthios, σηπεδόνα ἐκβαλεῖν βουλόμενος, οὐ σκοπεῖ πῶς καθαρὰς διατηρήσειε τὰς χεῖρας, ἀλλ᾽ ὅπως αὐτὸν ἀπαλλάξειε σηπεδόνος. Quam ſententiam totidem ferè verbis ſæpe repetit, idemque in eam ad Theſſalonicenſes diſtinguendum monet, utrum dicantur ejuſmodi ſermones, ἐξ οἰκείου πάθους, an ἀπὸ κηδεμονίας: ex loquentis affectu, an curandi voluntate (y). - - - - Perſius, a Poet, very grave, and exceedingly modeſt, as the Antients teſtify of him, did here depart from his character. For he laſhes immodeſty and leudneſs in ſuch a manner, that the licentiouſneſs of his expreſſions, though veiled and wrapped up in figures, gives juſt offence to the modeſt reader. It had been much better for him to have cenſured immodeſty by his ſilence. But I know not how it has happened, that even the wiſeſt men are come into an opinion, that obſcenity muſt be laſhed by obſcenity, or at leaſt by licentious expreſſions. How unreaſonable and abſurd is this opinion! and yet it has been received in antient times by the moſt eminent men. Can any modeſt perſon read without bluſhing what Seneca has written concerning the mirrour of Hoſtius? And even St Jerom, who ſo highly extolled chaſtity and virginity, does he not ſometimes inveigh againſt filthy matters in a filthy manner? He certainly does, and that in more than one place. The reaſon which induced ſober and grave men to think and write in this manner is explained to us by John Chryſoſtome, a man of the moſt conſummate virtue and piety. In his fourth Homily on the Epiſtle to the Romans he ſays, that they who purpoſe to cenſure the vices of leud and profligate men, lie under a neceſſity of unveiling their leudneſs, and of expoſing it as it were naked; becauſe otherwiſe their cenſures would do no good. For, ſays he, if your expreſſions are decent and modeſt, you will not be able to gain the attention of your hearers; but if you would force their attention, and ſtrike your audience, you are under a neceſſity of giving them an open and naked account of things. He likewiſe alledges upon this ſubject the example of a Surgeon, who when he would cure a ſore that emits a filthy corrupt matter, is not afraid of ſtaining his hands, and putting them into the moſt loathſome corruption. The Surgeon, ſays he, upon the firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians, when he would remove the corrupt matter, is not ſollicitous about keeping his hands clean, but only about curing the ſore. This ſentence he frequently repeats almoſt in the ſame words; and upon the Epiſtle to the Theſſalonians, he obſerves that we muſt diſtinguiſh between licentious expreſſions, when they come from the heart, and have the approbation of the perſon who uſes them, and when they proceed only from a deſign of reſtraining men from immodeſty.’ See the margin (z).

(x) Antonius Menjotius, de Paſſione uterina, pag. 4, 5.

(y) Caſaub. Comment. in Perſ. Sat. IV, pag. m. 344, & ſeq.

(z) Note, That St Chryſoſtome, and Caſaubon look upon this as a true point of morality: one will have it to be advantageous to good manners, and the other to be contrary to them. Wherefore I might ſay, that in a caſe of conſcience and morality Caſaubon's judgment ought not to be preferred; and I might ſay ſo without advancing any thing contrary to what I have ſaid above that the thing I could be blamed for would be only a Grammatical affair.

of it, ſince thoſe who vindicate him, are as eminent as thoſe who find fault with him [G].

There is a vaſt number of Moraliſts who have deplored the corruption of their age, and given a plain and naked account of the ſeveral exceſſes committed in it (89). I do not pretend to excuſe all the Caſuiſts; but I can poſitively affirm, that in the Church of Rome none of them can avoid ſaying many things that offend modeſty. It is well known, that Father Natalis Alexander declared for rigid Morality, and was engaged in many quarrels upon that account. I peruſed the other day in his Moral Doctrines what concerns the ſins forbidden by the ſeventh commandment (90), and hardly found any period in it, but what contains groſs obſcenities: and yet I think he is one of thoſe who treat ſuch matters with the greateſt modeſty; but it is a ſubject that does not permit a writer to have a tender regard for modeſty. The ſame may be ſaid of the Canoniſts (91), and thoſe who write Anatomical books: and to ſhew that to this very day men of a good taſte and great politeneſs ſide with the Anti-Puriſts, I ſhall ſet down a paſſage of the author, who criticized Mr de St Evremond. Do not we ſee ſtill, ſays he (92), in the Theological treatiſes of human actions, the explication of all the leud thoughts and actions that can be ſuggeſted by luſt? Thoſe explications are not contrary to modeſty, being neceſſary to thoſe whom God has appointed for the direction of others, who ought to have a perfect knowledge of ſins, with all their circumſtances, in order to make a ſinner ſenſible of the condition he is in, and work his repentance. But if you inſiſt, that thoſe treatiſes are inconſiſtent with modeſty; find out a ſcience more contrary to it than Anatomy, wherein all the parts of human bodies are viewed? Yet there is no law againſt thoſe who teach it (93).

The party of the Anti-Puriſts would be more numerous than it is, were it not that the vanity or malice of the Critics engage ſeveral writers to ſide with the contrary faction. There is hardly any book but what is criticized, and narrowly examined; and if there are any thoughts or expreſſions in it that want a certain niceneſs, with regard to obſcenity, ſeveral writers will riſe up againſt it, and expreſs a great zeal for offended modeſty (94). They fall upon that topic, and raiſe many clamours. Nothing can be more eaſy, nor more proper to prepoſſeſs the public. A Critic who ſtrikes upon that key is cried up by devout and polite people, and accounted the protector of purity: this is the reaſon which induces him to declare for the Puriſts. He raiſes his reputation two ways: he ſets up for a man who is concerned for good manners, and who converſes with the polite world. This is only a piece of craft in an author: Morality is no farther concerned in it than is neceſſary to form a fair out-ſide. Many who criticize books only in converſation, follow the footſteps of the Critics in print.

How many people inveighed againſt the book de contactibus impudicis, and the Hiſtoria Flagellantium (95), becauſe Dr Boileau was none of their cabal in the faculty of Theology? Had the author been of their party, who is a man famous for his probity and learning, they would have approved his giving a lively deſcription of the obſcenities cenſured by him; but becauſe they did not love him they ſided with the Puriſts.

But though this faction be ever ſo numerous, either through ſuch motives, or more honourable ones, it is certain the contrary party is conſiderable enough to juſtify thoſe who ſtand for it. The authority of the antient Fathers of the Church who followed it, and therein imitated the Prophets and Apoſtles, makes their opinion ſo highly probable, that if any one ſhould obſtinately maintain that it cannot be held with a ſafe conſcience, he would not deſerve to be minded.

If the Puriſts were contented to ſay that their opinion is better, we might think ourſelves obliged to debate the matter with them, and to compare together the reaſons of

(89) See among others Joannes Sariſberienſis, Biſhop of Chartres, de nugis Curialium, lib. iii, cap. xiii, who alledges the example of St Paul in his excuſe.

(90) Or, the ſixth, according to the Roman Catholics.

(91) When they explain the title de Frigidis and other matrimonial ſubjects.

(92) Diſſertat. ſur les Oeuvres de Mr de St Evremond, pag. 216, 217. Paris 1698.

(93) Mr Devaux, Provoſt of the ſociety of Surgeons at Paris, has publiſhed a book mentioned in the xxiſt Journal des Sçavans, for the year 1703. Tho' the Journaliſts cenſure the obſcenities of that author, they nevertheleſs tranſcribe ſome of them.

(94) Luther, whoſe expreſſions were very free, cenſured Eraſmus. See the anſwer of the latter, pag. 34, 35.

(95) That there were other books moſt pernicious, printed at Paris, and written by ſome Doctors, againſt which the ſacred faculty ſhould thunder out anathema's, whereas they were ſilent: whereupon he named a ſet of books, among which that of Dr Boileau de Contactibus impudicis was one. Afaire de Marie d'Agreda, pag. 11.

[G] Thoſe who vindicate Suetonius are as eminent as thoſe who find fault with him.] Beſides what I have quoted in another place (a a), I ſhall ſet down here a fine paſſage of Henry Glareanus. ‘De vitiis diſſertio ſive diſputatio duplex eſt. Una, qua ad vitia homines allicimus ſuaſionibus, exhortationibus, ac lenociniis: ut qui amare docent noſtra ætate, proh dolor! etiam potare, qui amatoria ludunt, ut juvenum mentes veluti inebrient, quales impudici Poëtæ. Ea diſſertio vitioſa eſt ac deteſtanda, maximè homini Chriſtiano, plus etiam illis, qui juventuti ut magiſtri præſunt. Altera eſt diſſertio de vitiis, ut ea deteſtemur ac execremur: imò quoties de eis fit mentio, ut ab iis dehortemur, ab iis abſtineamus, & execremur. Hæc diſſertio neutiquam reprehendenda eſt; multi enim ſancti viri ac Doctores quemadmodum de virtutibus ſcripſerunt, ita è regione de vitiis copioſè diſſeruerunt. Itaque Cæſarem refert vitia Suetonius, in odium illorum monſtrorum id facit, ut ea ſcilicet fugiamus ac evitemus: imò cogitemus in quanta cæcitate fuerint perditi illi nebulones: & multò magis in quanta ſtupiditate mundus, qui talia portenta dignatus eſt ullo honore, cum nihil illis tetrius ac magis abominabile fuerit (b b). ---- Diſcourſes on vice are of two ſorts, one wherein by perſuaſions, exhortations, and allurements the authors entice us to the practice of vice; ſuch are they who in our days inſtruct people how to carry on intrigues and amours, (how ſhameful a thing is this?) they who bring people into a habit of drinking, they who write amorous plays, and thereby, as it were, intoxicate the minds of youth, ſuch as the leud Poets. This ſort of diſcourſe is vicious and to be deteſted by all men, eſpecially Chriſtians, and ſtill more by thoſe who have the charge and inſpection of youth. The other kind of diſcourſe on vice is that which is deſigned to raiſe an abhorrence and deteſtation of it, and to refrain, diſſuade, and frighten, us from the practice of vice, as often as it is mentioned. Diſcourſes of this kind are far from being blameable, for many pious men and many Divines, as they have employed their pens on the ſubject of virtue, have on the other ſide written at large concerning vice. Thus Suetonious, by relating the vices of the Cæſars, deſigned to raiſe our hatred and abhorrence of thoſe monſters, and to make us avoid their example; nay, to make us conſider how blind thoſe abandoned wretches muſt have been, and in what a woful ſtupidity the world muſt have been ſunk, when they went ſo far as to pay them any honours, ſince nothing in nature could be more baſe, foul, and abominable, than thoſe prodigies of vice.’

(a a) In the article of SUETONIUS, remark [E].

Casarum

(b b) Henricus Loritus Glareanus, Præfat. in Sueton. apud Goldaſt. Prolegom. in Petronium, cap. ii, pag. m. 30.

of both parties, though in truth it ſeems very ſtrange that Chriſtians ſhould queſtion whether there is a better courſe to be taken than that of the ſacred writers. However we might yield our right, hear their objections, and propoſe our difficulties. I have no need of ſuch diſcuſſions; it is enough for me that the conduct of the Hiſtorians or Cenſurers, who relate obſcene things, is not only allowed and authorized by a conſtant practice, but alſo very good.

For if thoſe authors could lawfully write what I have written, I might imitate them, and lawfully quote them. I deſire no more. Others may examine, if they pleaſe, whether I had done better in taking quite another method.

The right I have to quote what I have quoted, is grounded upon two reaſons: one is, that if every body is allowed to read Catullus and Martial, &c. an author may be allowed to quote out of thoſe Poets ſuch paſſages as he thinks fit: The other is, that if it be lawful for an Hiſtorian to relate a leud action of Caligula, an author may relate an obſcene thought or remark of Montagne or Brantome; for ſuch a thought or remark is not near ſo criminal as the infamous actions of Caligula. Whoever has a right to mention the latter, has à fortiori a much greater right to mention the former: and it would be a contradiction or an abſurdity, to ſuffer that Petronius and Suetonius, and the moſt laſcivious Poets, ſhould be printed and publickly ſold with notes explaining their moſt brutiſh obſcenities, and to forbid the author of a Critical Dictionary, attended with a Commentary, to alledge a paſſage of thoſe writers for the confirmation or illuſtration of ſome particular.

An anſwer to three objections.

Here I muſt examine three objections that are commonly raiſed: It is ſaid that a Phyſician and a Caſuiſt are obliged, by the nature of their ſubject, to rake into many filthy things, but that my work required nothing like it. 2. That they who write in Latin, may take a liberty which the French tongue will not bear. 3. That what was allowable in former ages, ought to be forbidden in ours, becauſe of its prodigious corruption.

The firſt objection can only be made by ſuch readers as are utter ſtrangers to the nature of my book. It is not a book like thoſe that are intituled Bouquet Hiſtorial, Fleurs d'Exemples, Parterre Hiſtorique, Lemniſci Hiſtoriarum, in which an author inſerts only what he pleaſes. It is an Hiſtorical Dictionary with a Commentary. LAÏS ought to have a place in it as well as LUCRETIA; and becauſe it is a Dictionary which comes out after ſeveral others, it ought chiefly to contain what is not to be found in others. The reader muſt find in it, not only a general account of ſuch actions as are moſt known, but alſo a particular narrative of thoſe which are leaſt known, and a collection of what is diſperſed in ſeveral places. Proofs ought to be alledged, examined, confirmed, and cleared. In a word, it is a compilation. Now every body ought to know, that a compiler, who relates things, and comments upon them, has all the privileges of a Phyſician, and of an Advocate, &c. as occaſion requires; he may uſe their verbal proceſſes, and their terms of art. If he gives an account of the divorce of Lotharius and Tetberga, he may publiſh extracts from Hincmar, Archbiſhop of Rheims, who wrote the impurities that were averred in that trial (96). This is what I ſaid in my Remarks upon the pretended Judgment of the Public, in the year 1697. I repeat it with this other paſſage: 'When 'I am let into the ſecret of collecting in a compilation all that the Antients have ſaid 'concerning the courtezan Laïs, without mentioning leud actions, I ſhall own myſelf 'guilty. It muſt at leaſt be proved againſt me, that a Commentator has not the privi'lege of collecting whatever has been ſaid of Helen; but how can it be proved? Where 'is the Legiſlator who has told the compilers, Hitherto you may go, but you muſt advance no 'further: You muſt not quote Athenæus, nor ſuch a Scholiaſt, nor ſuch a Philoſopher? 'Has it not been their conſtant practice to make their writings as full and extenſive as 'their reading (97).' I could name many Divines, who having pitched upon a certain ſubject, have quoted out of all authors whatever they thought fit, though they were things that defiled the imagination; I ſhall only name three, Lydius (98), Saldenus, and Lomeier. They were Dutch Miniſters, the firſt at Dort, the ſecond at the Hague, and the third at Zutphen. They were very much eſteemed for their learning and virtue. Whoever reads the dialogues of the firſt concerning nuptial ceremonies (99), the Diſſertations of the ſecond de Canis pretio, and de Eunuchis (100); and the Diſſertation of the third concerning kiſſes (101); will find in them horrid obſcenities, and abominable quotations.

It will be ſaid, that thoſe books are written in Latin. This is the ſecond objection I am to anſwer, and I ſhall ſhew eaſily the weakneſs of it: for an obſcene object is no leſs offenſive to modeſty, when it offers itſelf in Latin to thoſe who underſtand Latin, than when it offers itſelf in French to thoſe who underſtand French; and if it were a fault to imprint obſcene objects in our own and the reader's imagination, theſe three Miniſters could not be juſtified. They underſtood what they wrote, and made it intelligible to their readers, and conſequently they have defiled their imagination, and do every day defile the imagination of thoſe who read their books. But were it not a very unjuſt thing to charge them with ſuch immorality? They who write in French ought not therefore to be charged with it, for they do no more than underſtand what they write, and make it intelligible to their readers.

I know

---

(96) Theſe words are taken from my Remarks upon a piece intituled, The Judgment of the Public, &c. num. ix.

(97) Ibid. num. xxxiv.

(98) James.

(99) I have given the title of it in the article LYDIUS, remark [B].

(100) In the book intituled, Otia Theologica, printed in the year 1684.

(101) In a book, intituled, Dierum Genialium ſive Diſſertationum Philologicarum Decas I, printed in 1694.

I know two differences will be alledged, one is, that they who underſtand Latin, are not ſo many as they who underſtand French: The other is, that they who underſtand Latin are better provided than others, againſt the malignant influence of obſcene objects. I make three anſwers to this. I anſwer in the firſt place, that Latin is underſtood by ſo many people all over Europe, that the firſt difference would not be ſufficient to juſtify thoſe who relate or quote obſcene things in that language; the miſchief would ſtill be great, and very great. I anſwer in the ſecond place, that it is only by degrees that ſtudy corroborates a man againſt objects which ſully the imagination; and therefore Latin obſcenities would ſtill have a dangerous effect upon young ſcholars. We hardly find, generally ſpeaking, that they are more chaſte and leſs debauched than other young men. Laſtly, I ſay that moſt of my readers are perſons who have applied themſelves to ſtudy; for they who have not ſtudied, little mind a book intermixed with Greek and Latin paſſages as mine is. However, they cannot underſtand the chief obſcenities, ſince they are in Latin. I conclude, that if there is any ſolidity in the differences objected to me, I may make an advantage of it.

I proceed to the third objection, which concerns the great corruption of our age. We have loſt ſay they, modeſty both in morals, and in expreſſions. The words that were formerly modeſt, are no longer ſo; we muſt uſe others which only excite modeſt ideas: otherwiſe we ſhould loſe the little virtue that remains. I ſhall not examine whether there is any reaſon to believe that men are now more corrupt than they were in former times (102). The ſame complaints have been made at all times (103), and that very thing ought to make us ſuſpect the truth of them. I can hardly believe that the corruption of our age is equal to that of the reign of Charles IX, and Henry III. But allowing it to be ſo, I ſhall draw a quite contrary concluſion from it; for it is never ſo neceſſary to repreſent in a ſtrong and lively manner the turpitude of vice, as when it prevails moſt [H]; and it is a wrong way of ſtemming the current of leudneſs, to cry it down with ſoft words, and to ſcruple to give an odious name to a proſtitute. Beſides, if there is ſo great a corruption, what benefit has the world got by that chaſtity of words introduced into the French tongue within theſe ſixty years, according to Mr Chevreau's calculation (104)? Is it not a proof that the proſcription of pretended obſcene ideas is an inſignificant remedy? Who told you they ought to be proſcribed, for fear of entirely deſtroying modeſty? Have you conſulted the women for whoſe ſake you chiefly abſtain from thoſe words? Have they confeſſed to you, that their honour is very much endangered by them? Would they not rather ſay, that you ſlander them if you

[H] It is never ſo neceſſary to repreſent in a ſtrong and lively manner the turpitude of vice, as when it prevails moſt.] See, above (cc), what induced Peter Damian to write the Gomorrhæus, and conſider how the Dominicans reſolved to preach againſt Sodomy, when they came to know that it was grown very common. Preaching being allotted to them, they deliberated whether they ſhould thunder out againſt that ſin, or ſay nothing of it; and they concluded that there was a neceſſity to thunder out againſt it, ſince it was grown ſo crying. ‘Fratres Ordinis Prædicatorum, qui eum apud Chriſtianos locum invaſerunt, quem olim apud Gentiles obtienurant Poëtæ & Satyrici, in tracta, de Turcis: Quæſitum extitit de gravi infectione populi Chriſtiani, quoad prædicta vitia (Sodomitica) an videlicet tam gravis infectio ex negligentia officii prædicationis contingeret, dum ipſi prædicatores gravitatem hujus vitii fidelibus non proponerent? Quæſitumque ulteriùs extitit, an propter ſimplices & innocentes expediret Prædicatoribus ſub ſilentio pertranſire de hujuſmodi vitiis differendo? Reſponſum fuit, quòd quia officium prædicationis eſt præcipuum in Eccleſia ad extirpationem vitiorum & plantationem virtutum, ſi gravitas hujus vitii fidelibus ardenter proponeretur, ut quia videlicet pro vindicta clamat ad cœlum, &c. Ad ſecundum quæſitum reſponſum fuit, quòd omnino ſub ſilentio pertranſire non expediret, etiam propter quoſcunque innocentes, multiplici ratione. Primò, quia videmus quod tales innocentes, etiam ex diabolica ſuggeſtione continuè ſeducuntur abſque auditione verbi Dei, & declaratione illorum vitiorum. Unde utriſque tam reis quam innocentibus expedit talis declaratio verbi Dei. Secundò ad hoc nos admonet Scriptura, prout eſt illud; Si non annunciaveris iniquo iniquitatem ejus, ſanguinem ejus de manu tua requiram. Et iterum; Clama, ne ceſſes: annuncia populo meo ſcelera eorum. Ratione etiam concludebatur. Nam Apoſtolus Paulus expreſſiſſimè loquitur ad Roman. 1. de hujuſmodi vitiis, & ſicut cuncta alia ſcripta ipſius neceſſariò prædicantur, ita & præſens hæc materia, cùm non ſit data diſtinctio inter ſuas doctrinas, quare videlicet una magis debeat eſſe prædicabilis quam altera. Ad hoc eſt Gregorius in Moralibus; Sicut incauta locutio in errorem pertrahit, ita indiſcretum ſilentium in errore relinquit (dd). - - - - A queſtion was ſtarted concerning the exceeding corruption of manners which prevailed among the Chriſtians, namely, whether the Sodomitical practices to which they were addicted, ought to be imputed to the remiſſneſs of the preachers, who forbore to inculcate the heinouſneſs of ſuch crimes? There was alſo ſtarted another queſtion, viz. Whether out of a regard for the ſimple people, who were ignorant of thoſe crimes, the preachers ought to paſs them over in ſilence? To the firſt of theſe queſtions it was anſwered, that becauſe the chief office in the Church, was that of preaching, an office deſigned for the rooting out of vice, and implanting of virtue, if the heinouſneſs of that crime was repreſented to Chriſtians in its ſtrongeſt colours, and as crying for vengeance from Heaven, &c. To the ſecond queſtion it was anſwered, that it ought not to be paſſed over in ſilence, for the ſake of ever ſo great number of people ignorant of theſe crimes; and that for many reaſons. Firſt, becauſe we ſee that ſuch people are continually ſeduced to vice by the ſuggeſtions of the Devil, when they hear not the word of God preached to them, and the ſinfulneſs of thoſe vices declared. And therefore ſuch a declaration of the word of God was neceſſary both for the guilty and innocent. In the ſecond place the Scripture enjoins it; as in that paſſage. If thou declareſt not to the wicked the iniquity of his ways, I will require his blood at thy hands: and again in this, cry aloud and ſpare not, and declare to my people their tranſgreſſions. This was further confirmed by reaſon. For the Apoſtle Paul in his Epiſtle to the Romans, mentions this kind of vice in expreſs terms, and as all his other writings ought to be the ſubject of preaching, ſo ought alſo the preſent matter ſince there is no diſtinction made between the doctrines of that Apoſtle, nor any reaſon aſſigned why one may not be preached as well as any other. Moreover Gregory ſays in his Morals, as an unwary ſpeech ſeduces people into error, ſo an injudicious ſilence ſuffers them to abide in it.’

---

(102) I am willing to own that certain orders of men are more corrupt than they were formerly; this is what I meant by theſe words in my Remarks on the Judgment of the Public: We would appear wiſer than our Fathers, and we are not ſo wiſe as they were.

(103) See a fine paſſage relating to this in the third volume of Vigneul Marville's Melanges.

(104) See, above, citat. (l).

(cc) Remark [B], of the article DAMIAN.

(dd) Goldaſt. in Prolegom. Petronii, cap. ii, pag. m. 32, 33.

you believe they are not proof againſt an idea and a word? Would they not tell you, that if they are for words, that expreſs leudneſs faintly, it is in order to give a better idea of their virtue which has a ſtronger attachment to modeſty, than that of their predeceſſors? They are not therefore afraid to be ſeduced by obſcene objects. Such objects would rather give a new ſtrength to their modeſty. They are only offended with them, becauſe they think there is ſome unpoliteneſs and incivility in certain words. They who pretend that conſidering the prodigious corruption of our age, all ſtories which they call obſcene, ought to be avoided, are like a traveller, who in order to keep his dirty cloak from ſoiling, ſhould take care not to put it in a ſmoaking room. If the depravation is ſo great, that the reading of an obſcene Hiſtorical fact might excite young people to commit adultery, you may be ſure theſe young people are ſo many perſons infected with the plague, whom you are afraid of making worſe, by placing them near a man who has got the Itch. A polite ſtyle, and nice expreſſions will not cure ſuch people, and ſtop them upon the brink of a precipice.

Certainly this is the Sophiſm called, à non cauſa pro cauſa. - - - - - - To aſſign for the cauſe of a thing, what is not the true cauſe of it. The fate of chaſtity does not depend upon that: you do not go to the ſource of the evil; it requires a quite different remedy. Young people have their minds full of obſcence thoughts, and go through a courſe of filthy obſenities, at leaſt in words, before they read Suetonius. Ill converſations, unavoidable to every lad who is not under continual inſpection, are a thouſand times more dangerous than Hiſtories of debauchery. A learned man ſays, that the French tranſlation of Plutarch by Amyot, is dangerous to morality, becauſe things are deſcribed in it with too great freedom and plainneſs, and there are ſome words in it that have now an immodeſt ſignification (105). He will give me leave not to be of his opinion. The deſcriptions and phraſes of Amyot's tranſlation have nothing in them that comes up to thoſe that are daily heard and uſed in the world. To which I add, that if this verſion of Plutarch was dangerous to Morality, any other verſion of Plutarch would be ſo too, unleſs the tranſlator took care to leave out all the paſſages wherein things are deſcribed with too great freedom and plainneſs.

(105) Dacier, Preface to his tranſlation of ſome lives of Plutarch.

There is no medium: either a book muſt never mention any impure action, or our cenſurers muſt own it will always be dangerous, though written ever ſo nicely. One tranſlation will be more polite than the other; but if they are faithful, the obſcene objects that are in the original will appear in them.

Mr Chevreau affirms, that faire des enfans is a groſs expreſſion, and that we ſhould ſay avoir des enfans and this may be granted to him; but if any one ſhould further ſay, that the firſt expreſſion is very prejudicial to good manners, and that the ſecond is very beneficial to them, he would be accounted a ſilly fooliſh man.

Upon a due examination of things, it will appear that the word paillard ought to be rejected only for the ſame reaſon that we reject the words contaminer, vilipender, vituperer, and a great many old French words: That is, it has no other fault but to be obſolete. They who have nice ears would be grated with the words I have juſt now mentioned. For the ſame reaſon they are offended with the words paillard, and paillardiſe; for if the thing ſignified by them was the cauſe of their diſguſt, they could not endure the word impudique, whoſe idea is no leſs ſignificant than that of paillard.

The inconſiſtency of the Puriſts.

I ſhall make two further obſervations: the firſt is, that our Puriſts approve in general what they condemn in particular. Aſk a Roman Catholic who is an enemy to the Quietiſts, whether an Hiſtorian ought not to avoid touching upon things that ſully the imagination? He will anſwer you, it is his duty to do ſo. Tell him ſome days after, that a relation of Quietiſm is come out, containing a particular account of the abominable impurity of Molinos's followers; give him to underſtand that you have been offended with the reading that book, and that modeſty cannot bear ſuch things; he will anſwer you, that it is neceſſary to diſcover the abomination of thoſe hypocrites, in order to undeceive many people who are inclined to Quietiſm, and that the author of that relation is therefore to be commended for expoſing to the public view the infamous practices of that ſect. You will find a thouſand other perſons who will agree with you, that we cannot have too great a regard for modeſt ears, and will exclaim with great zeal againſt Suetonius and Lampridius: but if you aſk them ſome days after, whether we ought to excuſe the Hiſtorians who have related ſo many abominable things concerning the Albigenſes, the Fratricelli, Adamites, Picards, Lollards, and Turlupins, they will anſwer that the character of Hiſtorians and zealous Catholics, engaged them to acquaint the world with the obſcenities of thoſe heretics, the forerunners of the Lutherans.

The Engliſh Papiſts, who fled into France or Spain, did not offend the chaſte ears of their friends, when they publiſhed ſeveral ſatires againſt Queen Elizabeth, wherein they repreſented her as a monſter of leudneſs. The Leaguers did not blame the libels, which contained impudent deſcriptions of the leudneſs of the court of Henry III.

The ſame inconſiſtency is obſerved among the Proteſtants. They did not complain that thoſe libels againſt Henry III their perſecutor, were offenſive to chaſte ears. Buchanan, who publiſhed a book concerning the lewdneſs of Mary Queen of Scotland (106), is a man of bleſſed memory among all the Preſbyterians; and yet that book horribly defiled the imagination. Nicolas de Clemangis, Pelagius Alvarez, Baptiſta Mantuanus, and ſeveral others, who made a very plain and obſcene deſcription of the leudneſs of the Court of Rome, are placed by the Proteſtants among the witneſſes of truth. They quote them to this very day upon all occaſions, and long paſſages out of thoſe authors are to be found in moſt controverſial books. You will find many of them in a French book of the famous du Pleſſis Mornai (107): not long ſince three Miniſters, two of whom are Swiſs, and the third a French-man (108), have revived thoſe quotations. Henry Stephens, who tells ſo many obſcene ſtories in his apology for Herodotus, did not diſpleaſe thoſe of his party: that book was thought very proper to ridicule the Church of Rome, and was approved upon that account; there are ſeveral editions of it, and I hear it has been lately reprinted at the Hague. Can there be a greater collection of ſilly jeſts, quirks, and mean and obſcene words, than what is to be found in ſome books of Sainte Aldegonde, who nevertheleſs was very much eſteemed and praiſed? The book which a German advertiſed in the Nova Literaria Maris Balthici in the year 1699, which is to be intituled, Sacra Pontificiorum Priapeia, ſeu obſcœnæ Papiſtarum in auricularibus confeſſionibus quæſtiones, quibus S. Confeſſionarii innocentes puellas fœminaſque ad laſciviam ſollicitant, will doubtleſs meet with a very favourable reception, and yet it will be very offenſive to chaſte ears, ſince it will contain a collection of the obſcene queſtions of confeſſors. This puts me in mind of the illuſtrious Peter du Moulin, who objected to the Roman Catholics the obſcenities that are to be found in their books concerning auricular confeſſion. He took notice (109) of ſome that are horrid, and no leſs abominable than the lewdneſs wherewith Procopius accuſes the Empreſs Theodora. Several Proteſtants controverſiſts (110) have publiſhed the obſcenities that are to be found in the books of confeſſors.

But to ſpeak of a thing of a later date, I ſay that the book intituled Les Avantures de la Madona & de François d'Aſſiſe, publiſhed (111) in the year 1701, is indeed written in very modeſt words; but the ideas which the author (112) excites in the mind of the reader, are ſo infamous, horrid, and monſtrous, that none but Lucian, and ſuch like men, can bear their enormity. The Proteſtants are not offended at it; on the contrary, they believe that the author deſigning to make every body ſenſible of the ridiculouſneſs of Popery without engaging in any controverſy, has done a ſervice to the good cauſe. Some complaints have been made of what he ſays in favour of Neſtorius, but he has not been blamed for the other things he advanced, which, as I have ſaid already, ſtartle, terrify and ſmite both the ſoul and body (113). The Biſhop of Meaux being obliged to mention a thing of the ſame nature in order to ſhew the extravagance of a fanatical woman (114), thought he had contracted ſome uncleanneſs, and for a remedy had recourſe to this prayer: ‘ But let us paſs to another ſubject: and thou, O Lord, If I durſt, I ‘ would beſeech thee to ſend one of thy ſeraphims with a hot burning coal to purify ‘ my lips defiled with this narrative, though neceſſary (115).’ Take notice of this laſt word: it makes much againſt thoſe who ſay that the imagination of the reader ought to be regarded even at the expence of truth. That prelate, who is otherwiſe ſo careful to avoid obſcenities, that he dares not uſe the word paillarde (whore) without making an excuſe for it (116); did not think that the obſcene and horrid extravagances of Madam Guyon ought to be ſuppreſſed.

I do not mean, that generally ſpeaking, all the Proteſtants who have behaved as I have mentioned, deſign to bring Hiſtorians, Compilers, and Commentators under the yoke of the Puriſts. I only believe that ſeveral of them pretend to do it in general; but ſince they approve afterwards when they come to particulars, what they had condemned; their taſte and their teſtimony can do me no prejudice, and I may take advantage of the opinion of all the reſt who are conſiſtent with themſelves, both in general and in particular.

It cannot be pretended that for the good of the Church, an author may be allowed to write things that ſully the imagination, and that in this caſe he is to be commended for doing it: this aſſertion I ſay cannot be admitted; for if the publiſhing of obſcenities was an ill thing in itſelf, it could not be uſed for the benefit of the good cauſe, without tranſgreſſing againſt a command of God, importing that we muſt not do evil, that good may come (117).

I proceed to the ſecond obſervation. Have I not acted againſt this precept of Iſocrates, believe that whatever cannot be honeſtly done, cannot be honeſtly ſpoken (118)? And ought not this precept to be a law to all Chriſtians, ſince St Paul would not have any thing that is filthy to be named among them (119)? I anſwer, that this excellent axiom condemns only the ill cuſtom [I] which prevails both among young people and married men,

(106) See the article BUCHANAN, citat. (9).

(107) Intituled, Le Myſtere d'Iniquité.

(108) Mr Heidegger, in his Hiſtoria Papatus, in the year 1684; and in Magna Babylone, in the year 1687; Mr Zuinger, in Tractatu de feſto Corporis Chriſti, in the year 1685; and Mr Jurieu, in his Prejugez Legitimes contre le Papiſme, in the year 1685.

(109) In his Nouveauté du Papiſme.

(110) Mr Jurieu among others, in his Apologie de la Reformation, Tom. i, pag. 150, & ſeq. Edit. in 4to.

(111) At Amſterdam.

(112) Mr Renoult heretofore a Franciſcan, and now a Miniſter of the Goſpel, at London.

(113) See the article NESTORIUS, remark [H].

(114) But what dream was it, and what did that woman ſee? A mountain, in which ſhe was received by Jeſus Chriſt; a chamber where ſhe aſked, whom the two beds ſhe ſaw were for: There is one for my mother, and another for you my ſpouſe. And a little after, I have choſen you to be here with me. Biſhop of Meaux's Relation, ſur le Quietiſme, pag. 28. Bruſſels 1698.

(115) Id. ibid.

(116) This holy Apoſtle took care not to call the proſtitute he ſpeaks of, an adultereſs, μοιχάδα, μοιχαλίδα, but a public woman, and if I may be allowed to uſe but once theſe odious names, a whore, a proſtitute, πόρνης. Id. Preface to the Revelation, pag. 27, of the edition printed at the Hague.

(117) Rom. iii. 8.

(118) Ἃ ποιεῖν αἰσχρὸν, ταῦτα νόμιζε μηδὲ λέγειν εἶναι καλόν. Quæ factu ſunt turpia, ne dictu quidem decora eſſe puta. Iſocrates ad Demonicum, pag. m. 6.

(119) Eph. v. 4.

[I] That excellent axiom condemns only the ill cuſtom.] Here ſollows the obſervation of a Commentator upon theſe words of Iſocrates. ‘ Prohibetur hic omnis αισχρολογία καὶ βλασφημία καὶ κακηγορία: quibus nihil eſt indocto vulgo jucundius aut uſitatius, cum ‘ nihil ſit turpius & homine indignius. . . Huc accerſatur ‘ D. Pauli men, to ſpeak on all occaſions of their lewd practices, and impudently to diſcourſe of every thing relating to that ſort of ſenſuality. It is at leaſt certain that the apoſtle never meant that men ſhould forbear talking ſeriouſly, honeſtly, and hiſtorically of a lewd action. He did not deprive parents of the liberty of examining their children concerning the Hiſtorical facts contained in the Bible, and making them repeat that Jacob's daughter was raviſhed, that a ſon of David raviſhed his own ſiſter, &c. nothing can be more diſhoneſt than this action of David's ſon; and yet there is no diſhoneſty in repeating, preaching, and printing it? Could St Paul forbid the mentioning of it? Would he have prohibited the reading of the Bible? Was he not willing that his letters ſhould be read, and that the very children ſhould know what he wrote to the Romans concerning the abominable lives of the Heathens? A man muſt be mad to think that the precept of Iſocrates means that a ſchool-boy ſhould never give an account to his tutor, or to his father, of ſuch paſſages of the Iliad as concern the adulteries of the gods.

If one had a mind to carry the diſpute to the utmoſt, he might ſay that robbing, betraying, lying, and killing, are diſhoneſt things, and that there is no diſhoneſty in mentioning thoſe crimes; but as it is evident that the precept of Iſocrates concerns only ſins contrary to chaſtity, ſuch an objection would be a meer cavil. The Cynics and the Stoics made uſe of it to juſtify their doctrine, that there is no obſcenity in any word: Cicero confutes them only by ſuppoſing that there is a natural ſhame (120).

It is time to conclude this long diſſertation. The clearing up of this matter is more difficult than people imagine. I hope my juſtification will be fully approved, not by thoſe who are too preſumptuous to ſee that we labour to undeceive them, but by thoſe who have been induced to believe on the credit of other perſons, or upon light and ſuperficial reaſons. If they were excuſable for being dazzled with ſpecious appearances, before I publiſhed theſe four EXPLANATIONS, they can be no longer ſo if they obſtinately perſiſt in their error. They would have done well to follow the command of Jeſus Chriſt, judge not according to the appearance, but judge righteous judgment (121). They have yielded to the firſt impreſſions of the objects, without waiting for the reaſons on both ſides; which is always neceſſary, eſpecially when we are to judge of a writer who does not follow the moſt common road. We ſhould immediately ſuſpect that he has ſome reaſons for it, and that he would not make ſuch a ſtep, if upon a long examination of his ſubject, he had not conſidered it on every ſide more carefully than thoſe who only read his work. This well grounded ſuſpicion ſhould have made people very cautious and ſlow in giving their judgment: but what is done cannot be undone; all that can be hoped is, that their ſecond thoughts will be better than the firſt.

I ſhall here acquaint my readers, that in ſeveral places of this Dictionary, they will find ſome apologetical reflections (122) immediately after ſuch things as may offend ſcrupulous perſons.

‘ D. Pauli præceptum: πᾶσα ἀκαθαρσία ἐν ὑμῖν μηδ᾽ ὀνομαζέσθω. Chriſtum etiam ματαίως λόγους ὑπευθύνους ἐποίησε. Sed nos parum curamus, proh dolor; reddendam Deo rationem de verbis. Nec mirum, cum tam flagitioſa & conſcelerata vitæ ſit & morum licentia. Væ væ nobis, niſi maturè reſipuerimus (ee). - - - - All blaſphemy and filthy diſcourſe is here forbidden, than which nothing is more grateful to, or more frequently uſed by the unlearned vulgar, and nothing more ſcandalous and unworthy of a man. Here let us cite the precept of St Paul; All uncleanneſs . . . let it not be once named amongſt you. Our Saviour likewiſe ſays, we ſhall be accountable to God for our very words. Nor is it to be wondered at, ſince our lives and manners are ſo wicked and licentious. Wo, wo unto us, unleſs we timely repent.’

(ee) Hieronym. Wolfius Annotat. in Parænesin Iſocratis, p. 132.

(120) Nec vero audiendi ſunt Cynici, aut ſi qui fuerunt Stoici pæne Cynici, qui reprehendunt & irrident, quod ea, quæ re turpia non ſint, nominibus ac verbis flagitioſa ducamus: illa autem quæ turpia ſint, nominibus appellemus ſuis. Latrocinari, fraudare, adulterare, re turpe eſt; ſed dicitur non obſcœne: Liberis dare operam re honeſtum eſt, nomine obſcœnum: pluraque in eam ſententiam ab eiſdem contra verecundiam diſputantur. Nos autem naturam ſequamur, & omne quod abhorret oculorum auriumque approbatione, fugiamus. - - - Nor ſhould we liſten to the Cynics, or thoſe almoſt Cynical Stoics, who cenſure and deride us, becauſe we eſteem ſome things ſcandalous and filthy in names and words, which in reality are not ſo; and call ſome things by their proper names, which are really filthy. To rob, defraud, or commit adultery, are in themſelves ſcandalous actions, but they are mentioned without obſcenity. To get children, is in reality honourable, but in name obſcene. The ſame Philoſophers alledge other arguments againſt modeſty to the ſame purpoſe. But let us follow nature, and ſhun every thing, which offends either the ears or the eyes. Cicero, de Officiis, lib. i, cap. xxxv, pag. m. 140.

(121) John vii, 24.

(122) Eſpecially with reſpect to obſcenities.

BRITISH MUSEUM

FINIS.

A
CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE
Of all the
EMINENT PERSONS
Treated of in this DICTIONARY:

Exhibiting the Synchroniſms of the times wherein they flouriſhed; and ſhewing, at one view, which of them were cotemporary.

N. B. We make uſe of three Æra's, viz: the year of the World, the year of Rome, and the year of our Lord.

A. M.
1 ADAM, and
Eve, his wife.
100 Abel, and
Cain, his elder brother.
800 Lamech, a deſcendant from Cain.
1000 Lamech, the father of Noah.
1700 Cham, one of Noah's ſons.
2000 Pheron, King of Egypt.
2100 Abimelech, King of Gerar.
Abraham, the Patriarch.
Agar, his concubine; and
Sarah, his wife.
2350 Job, the Patriarch.
2525 Aaron, High-Prieſt of the Jews.
Mary, or Miriam, his ſiſter.
2650 Ganymede, ſon of Tros, King of Troy.
2700 Europa, daughter of Agenor.
Melampus, a famous Soothſayer.
Olen, a Greek Poet.
2725 Gorgophone, daughter of Perſeus and Andromeda.
Perimede, a famous witch.
2750 Alcmena, wife of Amphitryon.
Amphiaraus, the ſon of Oicles.
Amphitryon, the ſon of Alcæus.
Byblis, the daughter of Miletus.
Chryſippus, natural ſon of Pelops.
Pelias, the ſon of Neptune.
Talaus, King of Argos.
Tireſias, a famous Soothſayer.
2775 Abderus, Hercules's favourite.
Adonis, minion of the goddeſs Venus.
Adraſtus, King of Argos.
Alcinoë, wife of Amphilochus.
Alcmæon, ſon of Amphiaraus.
Amphilochus, a famous Soothſayer.
Anchiſes, father to Æneas.
Ariſteus, ſon of Apollo and Cyrene.
Callirhoë, wife of Alcmæon.
Cinyras, father of Adonis.
Hercules, ſon of Alcmena.
Hipſipole, daughter to Thoas, King of Lemnos.
Manto, daughter of Tireſias.
Myrrha, the mother of Adonis.
Peribœa, wife of Telamon.
Pygmalion, King of Cyprus.
Telamon, King of Salamis.
2800 Nauſithous, King of the Phæacians.
Tamiras of Cilicia.
2825 Acamas, ſon of Theſeus.
Achilles, ſon of Peleus.
Ajax, ſon of Oileus.
Ajax, ſon of Telamon.

A. M.
Andromache, Hector's wife, and
Aſtyanax, their ſon.
Briſeis, a concubine of Achilles.
Calchas, a Soothſayer.
Caſſandra, daughter of Priamus.
Chryſeis, a concubine of Agamemnon.
Egialea, wife of Diomedes.
Helen, wife of Menelaus.
Oenone, wife of Paris.
Tecmeſſa, concubine of Ajax.
Tenes, ſon of Cygnus.
Teucer, ſon of Telamon.
Ulyſſes, King of Ithaca.
2850 Ajax, the ſon of Teucer.
Alcinous, King of the Phæacians.
Harpalicus, King of the Amymnians.
Nauſicaa, daughter to Alcinous.
Pyrrhus, ſon of Achilles.
2875 Sampſon, a Judge of God's people.
2900 Thamyris, a Greek Poet.
2950 David, King of the Jews.
3075 Ageſilaus I, King of Sparta.
3100 Elijah, the Prophet.
Pygmalion, King of Tyre.
3125 Eliſha, the Prophet.
Lycurgus, the Lacedæmonian Legiſlator.
3200 Jonas, the Prophet.

U. C.
1 PSammatichus, King of Egypt.
50 Crantor, a Greek Philoſopher.
75 Alcman, a Lyric Poet.
100 Archilochus, a Greek Poet.
Judith, a Jewiſh heroine.
Timeſius of Clazomenæ.
125 Periander, King of Corinth.
150 Achemænes, grandfather to Cyrus.
Alcæus, a Lyric Poet.
Lycophron, ſon to Periander.
Phaon of Mitylene.
Sappho, famous for her verſes and amours.
Tanaquil, wife of Tarquinius Priſcus.
Thales, one of the ſeven wiſe men of Greece.
175 Abaris, the Scythian.
Eſop, the firſt or chief author of fables.
Ezekiel, the Prophet.
Rhodope, a Courtezan.
200 Anthermus, a Sculptor.
Ariſteas. the Proconneſian.
225 Anacreon, the Poet.
Anaxandrides, King of Lacædemon.
Bathyllus, Anacreon's Minion.

U. C.
Brutus (Lucius Junius) who expelled the Tarquins.
Bupalus, a Sculptor, and ſon to Anthermus.
Calenus (Olenus) a Soothſayer.
Darius I, King of Perſia.
Hipponax, a Greek Poet.
Lucretia, wife to Collatinus.
Pythagoras, the Philoſopher.
Xenophanes, the Philoſopher.
250 Caſſius Viſcellinus (Spurius) a Roman Senator.
Horatius (Publius) ſirnamed Cocles.
Simonides, a famous Greek Poet.
275 Achæmenes, brother of Xerxes.
Ameſtris, wife of Xerxes.
Ariſtides, ſirnamed the Juſt.
Artabanus, the ſon of Hyſtaſpes.
Artemiſia, Queen of Caria.
Chryſis, Prieſteſs of Juno at Argos.
Cimon, the ſon of Miltiades.
Cleonice, a young lady of Byzantium.
Eſchylus, a tragic Poet.
Hiero I, King of Syracuſe.
300 Anaxagoras, the Philoſopher.
Diagoras, a famous wreſtler.
Diogenes of Apollonia.
Hiero, head of the colony which rebuilt Thurium.
Leucippus, a Greek Philoſopher.
Simonides, grandſon to the Poet of that name.
Zeno of Elea, an eminent Philoſopher.
325 Agathon, a tragic and comic Poet.
Archelaus, a Greek Philoſopher.
Archelaus I, King of Macedon.
Ariſto, a Greek Philoſopher.
Aſpaſia, miſtreſs to Pericles.
Democritus, the Philoſopher.
Diagoras, ſirnamed the Atheiſt.
Dorieus, ſon of Diagoras the Wreſtler.
Euripides, a tragic Poet.
Pericles, the Athenian.
Prodicus, a celebrated Sophiſt.
Zeuxis, a famous Painter.
350 Aſpaſia, miſtreſs to Cyrus the younger.
Berenice, daughter of Diagoras the Wreſtler.
Camillus (Marcus-Furius) the Roman Dictator.
Cyrus, ſon of Darius Nothus.
Conon, an Athenian General.
Critias, one of the thirty tyrants of Athens.
Euclid of Megara, a Philoſopher.
Hanno, a Carthaginian General.

BRITISH MUSEUM

U. C.
Laïs, a famous Courtezan.
Metrodorus of Chios, a Philoſopher.
375 Ageſilaus II, King of Sparta.
Ageſipolis I, King of Sparta.
Alcæus, a tragic Poet.
Anaxandrides, a comic Poet.
Calliſtratus, an Athenian Orator.
Eneas, or Æneas Tacticus, a Greek author.
Eurydice, wife of Amyntas, King of Macedonia.
Philiſtus, a Greek Hiſtorian.
Tachus, King of Egypt.
400 Artemiſia, wife of Mauſolus.
Aſclepiades, a Greek Philoſopher.
Cotys, King of Thrace.
Diogenes, the Cynic.
Euphratus, a diſciple of Plato.
Hegeſilochus, a licentious debauchee.
Lycurgus, an Athenian Orator.
Mauſolus, King of Caria.
Olympias, mother to Alexander the Great.
Philomelus, General of the Phoceans.
Stilpo, the Philoſopher.
Theopompus, an Orator and Hiſtorian.
425 Ada, Queen of Caria.
Amaſtris, wife of Dionyſius, tyrant of Heraclea.
Apelles, a famous Painter.
Ariſtander, a famous Soothſayer.
Ariſteus, the Geometrician.
Ariſtotle, the Philoſopher.
Cleopatra, ſiſter to Alexander.
Cleophis, an Indian Queen.
Diyllus, a Greek Hiſtorian.
Dionyſius, tyrant of Heraclea.
Ephorus, an Orator and Hiſtorian.
Harpalus, a Macedonian Lord.
Hipparchia, wife to the Philoſopher Crates.
Lyſimachus, tutor to Alexander.
Macedonia (Alexander the Great, King of).
Memnon, a Perſian General.
Philetas, a Grammarian, Critic, and Poet.
Philla, daughter to Antipater, Governour of Macedonia.
Pyrrho, a Greek Philoſopher.
Pytheas, author of ſome Geographical books.
Pythias, Ariſtotle's daughter.
Silanion, a famous Sculptor.
Thais, a Greek Courtezan.
Timoleon, General of the Corinthians.
Xenocrates, a Greek Philoſopher.
450 Arceſilas, a famous Philoſopher.
Aſclepiades, a Greek Philoſopher.
Bion, the Boryſthenite.
Craterus, author of a collection of the decrees of the Athenians.
Dicæarchus, a diſciple of Ariſtotle.
Epicurus, the Philoſopher.
Hermeſionax, an elegiac Poet.
Lamia, a celebrated Courtezan.
Lycophron, a Greek Poet.
Timæus, a Greek Hiſtorian.
475 Ariſto of Chios, a Philoſopher.
Arſinoë, wife of Magas, King of Cyrene.
Bion, a Bucolic Poet.
Cleonymus, ſon to a King of Sparta.
Danaë, daughter of Leontium.
Duellius (Caius) a Roman Senator.
Fabricius Luſcinus (Caius) a Roman General.
Leontium, an Athenian Courtezan.
Pyrrhus, King of the Epirotes.
500 Agis, King of Lacedæmon.
Amphares, one of the Lacedæmonian Ephori.
Berenice, wife of Antiochus Theus.
Chelonis, wife of Cleombrotus, King of Lacedæmon.
Conon, a Mathematician.
Hiero II, King of Syracuſe.

U. C.
525 Achæus, couſin-german to Antiochus the Great.
Apollonius of Pergamus, a famous Geometrician.
Archimelus, a Greek Poet.
Chryſippus, a Stoic Philoſopher.
Lacydes, a Greek Philoſopher.
Pergamum (Attalus, King of).
Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, grandſon to the Pyrrhus abovementioned.
550 Ariſtarchus, a Greek Philoſopher.
Dicæarchus, a Macedonian Admiral.
575 Artabanus I, King of Parthia.
Artaxias I, King of Armenia.
Carneades, a famous Greek Philoſopher.
Diogenes, the Babylonian.
Metrodorus, a Painter and Philoſopher.
Porcius (Marcus) commonly called Cato the Cenſor.
600 Ariſtarchus, a Grammarian
Fannius Strabo (Caius) a Roman Senator.
Hipparchus, a great Aſtronomer.
Titius (Caius) a Latin Poet, and Orator.
625 Albutius (Titus) an Epicurean Philoſopher.
Apellicon, who bought Ariſtotle's library.
Attilius, a Latin Poet.
Caſſius Hemina (Lucius) an Hiſtorian.
Caſſius Longinus (Lucius) a Judge, famous for his ſeverity.
Caſtor, the Chronographer.
Catius, an Epicurean Philoſopher.
Fannius (Caius) an Orator.
Fannius (Caius) an Annaliſt.
Licinia, a Veſtal Virgin.
Lucilius (Caius) a Latin Poet.
Perſius (Caius) a learned Roman.
Sulpicia, wife of Fulvius Flaccus.
650 Accius (Lucius) a tragic Poet.
Antony (Marc) the Orator.
Druſus (Marcus Livius) tribune of the people.
Lævius, a Latin Poet.
Soranus (Quintus Valerius) a learned Roman.
675 Andronicus, a Peripatetic Philoſopher.
Andronicus (Marcus Pompilius) a Grammarian.
Antony (Caius) Cicero's colleague in the Conſulſhip.
Antony (Marc) ſirnamed Creticus.
Aſclepiades of Pruſa, a famous Phyſician.
Caſtritius (Marcus) a Magiſtrate of Placentia.
Chelidonis, a woman of an ill life.
Eſop, reader to Mithridates.
Eſop (Clodius) a celebrated Comedian.
Fannia, wife to Caius Titinius.
Flora, a Courtezan.
Fulvia, who diſcovered Catiline's conſpiracy.
Hortenſius (Quintus) a great Orator.
Laberius (Decimus) a Roman Knight and Poet.
Laudice, ſiſter and wife of Mithridates.
Lucretius (Titus) Carus, a Roman Poet.
Metellus Celer (Quintus) a Roman Senator.
Monima, wife of Mithridates.
Mucia, wife of Pompey.
Ptolomy Auletes, King of Egypt.
Rutilia, wife of Marcus Aureſius Cotta.
Servilia, mother to Marcus Brutus.
Servilia, wife to Lucullus.
Tyrannion, a celebrated Grammarian.
Valeria, wife to Sylla.
Zeno of Sidon, an Epicurean Philoſopher.

U. C.
700 Antipater, an Idumean.
Artavaſdes I, King of Armenia.
Atticus (Titus Pomponius) one of the moſt honourable men in antient Rome.
Berenice, daughter of Ptolomy Auletes.
Catullus (Caius Valerius) a Roman Poet.
Ceſar (Caius Julius) firſt Emperor of Rome.
Cornelia, wife of Pompey.
Cratippus, a Peripatetic Philoſopher.
Dejotarus, King of the leſſer Armenia.
Demetrius (Magnes) a Greek author.
Dolabella (Publius Cornelius) Cicero's ſon-in-law.
Fulvia, wife of Clodius, and afterwards of Marc Antony.
Glaphyra, wife to Archelaus, High-Prieſt of Bellona.
Hortenſius (Quintus) ſon to the great Orator of that name.
Mamurra, a Roman Knight.
Metellus (Lucius) a tribune of the people.
Nigidius Figulus (Publius) a learned Roman.
Surena, General of the Parthians.
Tarpe (Spurius Metius) a licenſer of plays.
Tarruntius (Lucius) ſirnamed Firmanus, a Mathematical Philoſopher.
Timomachus, a famous Painter.
Tullia, Cicero's duaghter.
725 Antony (Marc) one of the Triumvirs.
Antony (Caius) and
Antony (Lucius) his brothers.
Archelaus, King of Cappadocia.
Artavaſdes, King of Media.
Artavaſdes II, King of Armenia.
Bathyllus, a freedman of Mæcenas.
Bathyllus, a Latin Poet.
Berenice, niece to Herod the Great.
Brutus (Marcus Junius) and
Caſſius Longanus (Caius) two of Ceſar's murderers.
Dellius (Quintus) a Greek Hiſtorian.
Fannius (Quadratus) a Latin Poet.
Lycoris, alias Cytheris, a famous Courtezan.
Ligarius (Quintus) one of Cæſar's murderers.
Lollius (Marcus) a Roman Conſul.
Octavia, wife of Marc Antony.
Parthenius, a Greek author.
Pylades, a famous Pantomime.
Porcia, wife of Marcus Brutus.
Quirinus (Publius Sulpicius) a Roman Conſul.
Severus (Cornelius) a Latin Poet.
Tyrannion, diſciple to the Tyrannion abovementioned.
Trebatius (Caius) ſirnamed Teſta, a great Civilian.
Virgil, the Poet.

A. D.
1 ALbutius Silus (Caius) a famous Orator.
Alfenus Varus (Publius) a Roman Conſul.
Antony (Marcus Julius) ſon of the Triumvir.
Antonia, ſiſter to the foregoing, and mother of Germanicus.
Antonia, younger ſiſter to the foregoing, and wife of Lucius Domitius Ænobarbus.
Caſſius Severus (Titus) a famous Orator.
Druſus (Nero Claudius) brother of Tiberius.
Glaphyra, wife to Alexander the ſon of Herod.

A. D.
Ovidius Naſo (Publius) the Poet.
25 Apelles, an excellent Tragedian.
Apion, a Mathematician.
Artabanus II, King of Parthia.
Artaxias III, King of Armenia.
Caligula (Caius Cæſar) Emperor of Rome.
Caſſius Chærea, Captain of Caligula's guards.
Druſilla (Julia) ſiſter to Caligula.
Druſus, ſon of Tiberius.
Druſus, ſon of Germanicus.
Lutorius Priſcus (Caius) a Roman Knight.
Macro (Nævius Sertorius) Captain of Tiberius's guards.
Numantina, wife of Plautius Sylvanus.
Paulina (Lollia) wife to Caligula.
Phædrus, author of the fables.
50 Afer (Domitius) a famous Orator.
Afranius Quinetianus, a Roman Senator.
Apollonius Tyanæus, a moſt extraordinary perſon.
Burrus (Afranius) Nero's Governour.
Claudius (Tiberius) Druſus, Emperor of Rome, and Octavia, his daughter.
Philo, the Jew.
Quintius Curtius, a Latin Hiſtorian.
Suetonius Paulinus (Caius) Governour of Numidia, and afterwards of Britain.
75 Akiba, a famous Rabbin.
Andromachus Phyſician to Nero.
Artabanus III, King of Parthia.
Berenice, daughter of Agrippa I, King of Judea.
Caſſius Longinus (Caius) a great Civilian.
Domitia Longina, wife of Domitian.
Druſilla, wife of Felix.
Fannia, wife of Helvidius.
John (St) the Evangeliſt.
Quintilian (Marcus Fabius) a teacher of Rhetoric at Rome.
Veſpaſian (Titus Flavius) Emperor of Rome.
100 Apollodorus, a famous Architect.
Ariſto (Titius) a Roman Lawyer.
Plotina (Pompeia) the wife of Trajan.
Tacitus (Caius Cornelius) a great Hiſtorian.
Trajan, a Roman Emperor.
125 Antinous, Hadrian's Minion.
Artemidorus, the Epheſian.
Barcochebas, a famous impoſtor.
Caſtritius (Titus) a teacher of Rhetoric.
Fannius (Caius) a Latin author.
Hadrian (Publius Ælius) Emperor of Rome.
Prodicus, founder of the ſect of the Adamites.
Suetonius Tranquillus (Caius) an Hiſtorian.
150 Apollinaris (Caius Sulpitius) a Grammarian.
Apuleius (Lucius) a Platonic Philoſopher.
Phlegon, ſirnamed Trallianus, a Latin Author.
Polyænus, a Greek author.
175 Athenagoras, an Athenian Philoſopher.
Cerinthus, an Arch-Heretic.
200 Julia, wife of Septimius Severus Emperor of Rome.
225 Artabanus IV, the laſt King of Parthia.
Athenæus, a Greek Grammarian.
Babylas, Biſhop of Antioch.
Origen, a Father of the Church.
250 Amelius, a Platonic Philoſopher.
275 Arnobius, Profeſſor of Rhetoric at Sicca.
Aurelianus (Lucius Domitius) Emperor of Rome.

A. D.
Zenobia, wife of Odenatus a Saracen Prince.
300 Sophronia, a Roman lady ſo called by ſome modern writers.
325 Acyndinus (Septimius) a Roman Conſul.
Alypius, a Philoſopher of Alexandria.
Arius, the Heretic.
Cyril, Deacon of the Church of Heliopolis.
Fauſta, wife of the Emperor Conſtantine.
350 Marcellinus (Ammianus) an Hiſtorian.
375 Ajax, an Eccleſiaſtic.
Alypius of Antioch.
Alypius (Faltonius Probus) Prefect of Rome.
Arſenius, a Deacon of the Roman Church.
Auſonius, a Latin Poet.
Heliodorus, Biſhop of Trica.
Hierocles, ſon of Alypius of Antioch.
Leontius, an Athenian Philoſopher.
Nazianzen (Gregory) a celebrated Father of the Church.
Obſequens (Julius) a Latin writer.
Priſcillian, a Spaniſh Heretic.
Prudentius, a Chriſtian Poet.
Rufinus, a favourite of the Emperor Theodoſius.
Theon, a Greek Sophiſt.
400 Alypius, Biſhop of Tagaſta.
Auguſtin (St).
Honorius, a Roman Emperor.
Nemeſius, a Chriſtian Philoſopher.
425 Abdas, a Biſhop in Perſia.
Hierocles, a Platonic Philoſopher.
Neſtorius, Biſhop of Conſtantinople.
Oroſius (Paul) a Spaniſh Prieſt.
Sedulius (Caius Cælius) a Prieſt.
Severus (Sulpitius) a Lawyer, and afterwards a Prieſt.
Vigilantius, a Spaniſh Prieſt.
450 Attila, King of the Huns.
Leo I, Pope, ſirnamed the Great.
Marullus a Poet of Calabria.
Quintus (Calaber) a Greek Poet.
475 Amable, a Prieſt of Riom in Auvergne.
Baſina, mother to Clovis, King of France.
Honoria, ſiſter of Valentinian III. Emperor of Rome.
550 Jornandus, Biſhop of Ravenna.
625 Mahomet, the grand impoſtor.
650 Fatima, daughter of Mahomet.
675 Alpaide, a concubine of Pepin.
700 Lambert, Biſhop of Maeſtricht.
725 Abderame, a great Saracen General.
Abumuſlimus, a Saracen General.
Damaſcen (John) an illuſtrious Father of the Lower Empire.
Eudo, Duke of Aquitain.
Munuza, a Mooriſh Captain.
Virgil, Biſhop of Saltzburg.
750 Abucaras (Theodore) a Prelate.
800 Abgillus (John) called in Engliſh Preſter John.
825 Eginhart, Secretary to the Emperor Charlemagne.
850 Achmet, the ſon of Seirim.
Pope Joan.
Radulphus, Archbiſhop of Bourges.
925 Abudhaber, chief of the Karmatians.
975 Aragon (Mary of) wife of Otho III, Emperor of Germany.
Capet (Hugh) King of France.
1000 Boliſlaus, King of Poland.
Emma, wife of Ethelred King of England.
Otho III, Emperor of Germany.
1025 Aretin (Guy) a Benedictine.
Alchindus, an Arabian Phyſician and Aſtrologer.
1050 Damian (Peter) Cardinal, &c.
1075 Anſelm, Archbiſhop of Canterbury.
Bennon, Biſhop of Miſnia.
1100 Actuarius, a Greek Phyſician.

A. D.
Arbriſſel (Robert d') founder of the Abbey of Fontevraud.
Hildebert, Biſhop of Mans, &c.
Urraca, daughter and heireſs of Alphonſo VI, King of Leon and Caſtile.
1125 Abelard (Peter) a famous Divine.
Berengarius (Peter) diſciple to the foregoing.
Bernard (St) Abbot of Clairvaux.
Foulques, Prior of Deuil.
Heloïſa, concubine and afterwards wife of Abelard.
Tandemus, a German Heretic.
Alchabitius, an Arabian Aſtrologer.
1150 Averroës, an Arabian Philoſopher.
Bulgarus, a famous Civilian.
Jarchi (Solomon) a famous Rabbi.
Lewis VII, King of France.
Noradin, Sultan of Aleppo.
Radulphus, a Benedictine Monk ſirnamed Flaviacenſis.
1175 Harravad (Iſaac Ben) a noted Rabbi.
Henry IV, Emperor of Germany.
Irnerius, a German Civilian.
Sariſberi (John of) Biſhop of Chartres.
1200 Ammonius, ſirnamed Saccas, a famous Philoſopher.
1225 Accurſius, Profeſſor of Civil Law.
Caſtile (Blanche of) Queen of France.
Elmacin (George) a Saracen Hiſtorian.
Francis of Aſſiſi, a ſaint of the Romiſh Church.
Gualdrada, a Florentine lady.
Scotus (Michael) a learned author.
Thibaut V, Earl of Champagne.
1250 Accurſius (Cervot) ſon to the Profeſſor abovementioned, and Accurſius (Francis) his elder brother.
Albertus Magnus, Biſhop of Ratiſbon.
Colonna (John) Archbiſhop of Meſſini.
1275 Abulpharage (Gregory) a Phyſician.
Arſenius, Patriarch of Conſtatinople.
Bacon (Roger) an Engliſh Franciſcan.
Balbi (John) a Dominican.
Burnettus (Latinus) author of ſeveral books.
Caſtile (Alphonſo X, King of).
Cavalcante (Guido) a noble Florentine.
Guillelma, or Guillelmina, the head of an infamous ſect.
Polonus (Martin) a Dominican.
1300 Apona (Peter of) a famous Philoſopher.
Aurelius (Peter) a Franciſcan.
Barberini (Francis) a Poet and Civilian.
Dante, an Italian Poet.
Reynier (Peter de) Knight of the Order of St John of Jeruſalem.
1325 Abulfeda (Iſmael) Prince of Hama.
Acyndinus (Gregory) a Greek Monk.
Arſenius, Biſhop of Monembaſia.
Ciccus, an Italian author.
Cinus, a famous Civilian.
Laurentio (Nicolas) author of a ſurprizing revolution at Rome.
Menandrino (Marſilius de) a learned Civilian.
1350 Andreas (John) a famous Canoniſt.
Arioſta (Lippa) concubine and afterwards wife to Opizzo Marquis of Eſt and Ferrara.
Cauliac (Guy de) a Phyſician.
Coronel (Alphonſus) a Spaniſh Lord.
Naples (Joan I, Queen of)
Padilla (Mary de) miſtreſs to Peter the Cruel, King of Caſtille.
Rimini (Gregory of) a ſchoolman.
Roquetaillade (John de la) a Franciſcan.
Ruyſbroeck (John de) founder of a Convent of Canons regular of the Order of St Auguſtin.
Taulerus (John) a Dominican Fryer.

Baldus,

A. D.

1375 Baldus, a famous Civilian.
Froiſſard (John) an Hiſtorian.
Gueſelin (Bertrand du) Conſtable of France.
Guiſe (James de) a Franciſcan Monk.
Wickam (William) Biſhop of Wincheſter.
1400 Ailli (Peter de) Biſhop of Cambray, &c.
Montaigu (John de) High Steward of France.
Savonarola (Michael or John-Michael) a Phyſician.
1425 Alamandus (Lewis) Archbiſhop of Arles.
Aretin (Charles) Secretary to the Republic of Florence, and Aretin (Leonard) his immediate predeceſſor.
Barbarus (Francis) a noble Venetian.
Blondus (Flavius) Secretary to ſeveral Popes.
Burgundy (Philip Duke of) ſirnamed the Good.
Caraccioli (John) gallant to Joan II, Queen of Naples.
Camaldoli (Ambroſe de) Abbot-General of the Order of Camaldoli.
Capiſtran (John) a Franciſcan.
Chaſtelux (Claudius Sire de) Viſcount d'Avalon, &c.
Chatel (Tanneguy du) Marſhal of the wars of the Dauphin.
Conecte (Thomas) a Carmelite Fryer.
Eugenius IV. Pope.
Franciſca, a devout lady.
Naples (Joan II, Queen of)
Parts (James des) a Phyſician.
Patricius (Francis) Biſhop of Gaeta.
Sebonde (Raymundus) Profeſſor of Phyſic, &c. at Toulouſe.
Sforza (Giacomuzzo) founder of the family of Sforza.
Vegius (Maphæus) an Orator and Poet.
Vergerius (Peter Paul) a Civilian.
1450 Amyrutzes, a Peripatetic Philoſopher.
Andreas (John) author of a book againſt the Mahometan religion.
Andronicus of Theſſalonica, a Profeſſor at Florence.
Aretin (John) ſirnamed Tortellius, Chamberlain to Pope Nicolas V.
Ariſtotle, a famous Architect.
Auriſpe (John) Secretary to Nicolas V.
Buridan (John) a famous Philoſopher.
Franc (Martin) Provoſt and Canon of Lauſanne.
Guarinus, one of the firſt revivers of learning in Italy.
Naples (Alphonſus I, King of) and Panormita (Antony) his Secretary.
Philelphus, an Italian author.
Sforza (Francis) Duke of Milan.
Valla (Laurence) a great critic.
Weſalia (John de) Doctor of Divinity.
1475 Abrabanel (Iſaac) a celebrated Rabbi.
Acciacoli [Donato] a learned Florentine.
Agricola [Rodolphus] a learned Frieſlander.
Altilius [Gabriel] a Latin Poet.
Aretin [Francis] a tranſlator of ſome of Chryſoſtome's works.
Argyropylus [John] a learned Greek.
Barbarus [Hermolaus] a learned Venetian.
Barletta [Gabriel] a Dominican.
Bergamo [James Philip de] an Auguſtin Monk.
Bonfinius [Antony] an Hiſtorian.
Boſſus [Matthew] a regular Canon.
Brandolinus [Aurelius] an Auguſtine Fryar.
Brezé [Peter de] Lord de la Varenne, &c.

A. D.

Britannicus [John] a learned Commentator.
Burgundy [Charles Duke of] and Burgundy [Mary of] his only daughter.
Calderinus [Domitius] a teacher of polite learning.
Campanus [John Antony] a learned Prelate.
Cattho [Angelo] Archbp of Vienne.
Chaſtelan [Geo.] a Flemiſh gentleman.
Donatus [Jerome] a noble Venetian.
Dante [Peter Vincent] an Italian Poet.
Edward IV, King of England.
Experiens [Philip Callimachus] tutor to Albert King of Poland.
Fontius [Bartholinus] a teacher of Rhetoric at Florence.
Fulginas [Sigiſmund] an Hiſtorian.
Gentilis de Bechis, Biſhop of Arezzo.
Guarinus [Baptiſt] Profeſſor of the Belles Lettres.
Hibten [John] a German Franciſcan.
Innocent VIII, Pope.
Lamponiano [John Andrew] a domeſtic of Galeazzo Sforza Duke of Milan.
Laſcaris [Conſt.] a learned Greek.
Laſcaris [John] ſirnamed Rhyndacenus.
Leonicenus [Nicolas] Profeſſor of Phyſic in the Univerſity of Ferrara.
Lewis XI, King of France.
Mahomet II, Emperor of the Turks.
Mainus [Jaſon] a Civilian.
Majus [Jurianus] teacher of the Belles Lettres.
Mancinellus [Antony] a Grammarian.
Marche [Oliver de la] High Steward to Maximilian of Auſtria.
Marſus [Peter] a Commentator.
Marullus [Michael Tarchaniota] a Poet.
Monſtrelet [Enguerrard de] Author of a Chronicle of France.
Nannius [John] a Dominican.
Nero [Bernard del] a Florentine Nobleman.
Nevers [John of Burgundy Count of]
Omnibonus, a noted Grammarian.
Oricellarius [Bernard] a Florentine author.
Patricius [Aug.] Biſhop of Pienza.
Politian [Angelo] a learned and polite author.
Præpoſitus [Nicolas] a Phyſician at Tours.
Savonarola [Jerome] a Dominican Fryar.
Scala [Bartholomew] a learned Florentine, and Scala [Alexandra] his daughter.
Sforza [Catherine] wife of Jerome Riario.
Sixtus IV, Pope.
Sulpitius [John] ſirnamed Verulanus.
Tiphernas [Gregory] Greek Profeſſor in the Univerſity of Paris.
Torquato [Antony] a famous Aſtrologer.
Triſtan l'Hermite [Lewis] Great Provoſt of the King's houſhold.
Valla [George] a Phyſician, &c.
Valla [Nicolas] Doctor of the Civil Law, &c.
Vaquerie [John de la] firſt Preſident in the Parliment of Paris.
Urceus [Antony Codrus] a learned Italian.
Utinus [Len. de] a Jacobin Monk.
Weſſelus [John] a learned Dutchman.
1500 Abſtemius [Laurence] teacher of the Belles Lettres.
Acciaioli [Zenobius] a Dominican.
Alexander ab Alexandro, a Civilian.

A. D.

Alexis, a Piedmontois.
Almain [James] Doctor of Divinity.
Ammonius [Andrew] a Latin Poet.
Andrada [Diego de Payva d'] a Portugueze Divine.
Andrelinus [Publius Fauſtus] Profeſſor of Poetry in the Univerſity of Paris.
Anteſignanus [Peter] a good Grammarian.
Aquaviva [Andrew Matthew] Duke of Atri.
Aragon [Iſabella of] wife of John Galeazzo Sforza, Duke of Milan.
Auton [John d'] Abbot of Angle.
Badius [Jodocus] ſirnamed Aſcenſius, a learned author.
Berſala [Anne] wife to Philip of Burgundy.
Briſſot [Peter] a Phyſician.
Bunel [William] Profeſſor of Phyſic in the Univerſity of Toulouſe.
Buſleiden [Jerome] illuſtrious for his embaſſies, &c.
Carteromachus [Scipio] a learned Italian.
Decius [Philip] a famous Civilian.
Delphinus [Peter] General of the Order of Camaldoli.
Durer [Albert] an excellent Painter and Engraver.
Flaminius [Antony] Profeſſor of Polite Literature in the college of Rome.
Gonzaga [Iſabella de] wife of Guido Ubaldo de Montefeltro, Duke of Urbino.
Grapaldus [Francis Marius] a learned Italian.
Hadrian, a Cardinal, &c.
Jacettius [Francis Cataneus] an excellent Platoniſt.
Julius II, Pope.
Krantius [Albertus] a famous Hiſtorian.
Langius [Rodolph] Provoſt of the Cathedral Church of Munſter.
Lewis XII, King of France.
Linacer [Thomas] an Engliſh Phyſician.
Machiavel [Nicolas] Secretary to the Republic of Florence.
Manard [John] a Phyſician.
Marlianus [Raimond] a learned Frenchman.
Molſa [Francis Maria] a Poet.
Muſurus [Marc] Greek Profeſſor in the Univerſity of Padua.
Parrhaſius [Janus] a Profeſſor of the Belles Lettres.
Phædrus [Thomas] Profeſſor of Eloquence at Rome.
Pomponatius [Peter] teacher of Philoſophy at Padua.
Prierias [Sylveſter] a Dominican.
Ritius [Michael] a Civilian.
Sylvius [Francis] Profeſſor of Eloquence, &c. at Paris.
Simonetta [Hyacinthus] a brave and experienced ſoldier.
Stoflerus [John] a famous Mathematician.
Thomæus [Nicolas Leonicus] a Profeſſor in the Univerſity of Padua.
Valdes [John] a handſome young Spaniard.
Vigerius [Mark] a Cardinal, &c.
Zabarella [Francis] Archbiſhop of Florence, &c.
1525 Accurſius [Mariangelus] a Critic.
Adrichomia [Cornelia] a Nun.
Agricola [George] a German Phyſician.
Agricola [John] a Saxon Divine.
Agrippa [Henry Cornelius] a Phyſician.
Akakia [Martin] a Profeſſor of Phyſic.

A. D.

Alciatus (Andrew) a great Civilian.
Alcyonius (Peter) a learned Italian.
Aleander (Jerome) a Cardinal.
Aleſius (Alexander) a famous Divine.
Altenſtaig (John) Doctor of Divinity.
Amaſæus (Romulus) Profeſſor of Greek and Latin at Bologne.
Ammonius (Livinus) a Carthuſian.
Andronicus (Tanaquillus) a teacher in the univerſity of Leipſic.
Apianus (Petrus) a German Mathematician.
Aquæus (Stephen) Lord of Beauvais.
Aragon (Joan of) wiſe to the Prince of Tagliocozzi.
Aretin (Peter) a ſatirical writer.
Aventine (John) an Annaliſt.
Aurogallus (Matthew) a Profeſſor in the uinverſity of Wittemberg.
Balmis (Abraham de) a Jewiſh Phyſician.
Bandel (Matthew) a Dominican.
Barbara, wiſe to the Emperor Sigiſmond.
Barbarus (Daniel) author of ſome Commentaries.
Barnes (Robert) Chaplain to Henry VIII, King of England.
Beda (Noel) Doctor of Divinity, in the univerſity of Paris.
Bellai (William du) Lord of Langey.
Bellai (John du) a Cardinal.
Bembus (Peter) a Cardinal.
Berauld (Nicolas) Tutor to Admiral de Coligny.
Bibliander (Theodorus) Profeſſor of Divinity at Zurich.
Bigot (William) a Phyſician and Philoſopher.
Blomberg (Barbara) a Lady of a good family at Ratiſbon.
Boleyn or Bullen (Anne) wiſe to Henry VIII, King of England.
Bombaſius (Paul) Secretary to Cardinal Pucci.
Bomberg (Daniel) a famous Printer.
Bore (Catherine de) wiſe of Luther.
Bouchet (John) a French author.
Braſavolus (Antony Muſa) a Phyſician and Profeſſor at Ferrara.
Brodeus (John) a learned Critic.
Budæus (William) a learned Frenchman.
Bunel (Peter) a good Latin writer.
Burana (John Francis) a Profeſſor at Bologne.
Buteo (John) a famous Mathematician.
Cæſarius (John) a Phyſician and Philoſopher.
Calderinus (John) a Profeſſor of the Civil-Law.
Capycius (Scipio) a famous author.
Capiſucchi (Paul) Canon of the Vatican.
Carion (John) Profeſſor of the Mathematics, in the univerſity of Francfort.
Carmilianus (Peter) a Latin Poet.
Caſtellan (Peter) great Almoner of France.
Ceratinus (James) a good Grecian.
Changy (Peter de) Eſq;
Charles V, Emperor, and King of Spain.
Chateau-Briand (the Counteſs of)
Ciolek (Eraſmus) Biſhop of Ploczko.
Cochlæus (John) Doctor of Divinity.
Cordier (Maturin) a Schoolmaſter.
Coricius (John) an encourager of learned men.
Cornelius (Antony) Licentiate of the Civil-Law.
Dolet (Stephen) a learned Frenchman.
Dryander (John) a Proteſtant martyr.
Driedo (John) Doctor of Divinity.

A. D.

Durant (Samuel) Miniſter of Charenton.
Egnatius (John Baptiſt) a learned Eccleſiaſtic.
Emeri (Sebaſtian) Advocate in the Parliament of Paris.
Emilius (Paul) an Hiſtorian.
Eppendorf (Henry) a German nobleman.
Eraſmus (Deſiderius) a famous Latin author.
Eſtampes (Anne de Piſſeleu, Ducheſs of)
Ferrarienſis, a Scholaſtic Philoſopher, whoſe true name was Francis Sylveſter.
Ferretus (Æmilius) an able Civilian.
Feras (John) Warden of the Franciſcans at Mentz.
Fevre of Etaples, a learned Frenchman.
Finæus (Orontius) Profeſſor of Mathematics, in the royal college of Paris.
Flaminius (Marc Antony) a Latin Poet.
Florimont (Galeacius) Biſhop of Seſſa.
Francis I, King of France.
Francus (Sebaſtian) an Anabaptiſt.
Geldenhaur (Gerard) a Monk, and afterwards a Proteſtant.
Gelenius (Sigiſmund) corrector of a printing-houſe.
Gonzaga (Eleonora) wiſe to Francis Maria de la Rovere, Duke of Urbino.
Gonzaga (Julia) Ducheſs of Trajetta, &c.
Gonzaga (Lucretia) wiſe of John Paul Manfrone.
Grammont (Gabriel de) a French Cardinal.
Graſſis (Paris de) Maſter of the Ceremonies under ſeveral Popes.
Grynæus (Simon) a Profeſſor of Greek at Heidelberg.
Guevara (Antony de) Preacher and Hiſtoriographer to Charles V.
Guicciardin (Francis) the Hiſtorian.
Guindano (Sigiſmund) a Poet.
Guiſe (Claudius de Lorraine, Duke of)
Hadrian VI (Pope).
Helvicus (Chriſtopher) Profeſſor of Divinity in the univerſity of Gieſſen.
Hochſtratus (James) a Dominican, &c.
Hoffman (Melchior) a dogmatical Preacher.
Hortenſius (John) a Phyſician.
Hungary (Mary Queen of)
Hungary (Iſabella Queen of)
Hungerus (Wolfgang) a Civilian.
Hutten (Ulric de) a Poet.
Jovius (Paul) an Hiſtorian.
Juſtiniani (Auguſtin) Biſhop of Nebbio.
Laciſcus (Paul) a regular Canon of the congregation of Lateran.
Lambert (Francis) a Franciſcan Monk.
Landa (Catherine) a learned Italian lady.
Langius (Paul) a German Monk.
Leland (John) Antiquary to Henry VIII.
Lemnius (Lævinus) a famous Phyſician.
Leo X. (Pope)
Lizet (Peter) firſt Preſident in the Parliament of Paris.
Loyola (Ignatius) founder of the Jeſuits.
Lucidus (John) author of a book of Chronology.
Luther (Martin) a Reformer of the Church.

A. D.

Macrin (Salmon) a Poet.
Majoragius (Marc Antony) Profeſſor of Eloquence at Milan.
Marot (Clement) a French Poet.
Marulus (Marcus) a Dalmatian author.
Melanchthon (Philip) a famous Proteſtant author.
Micyllus (James) a Profeſſor at Francfort.
Mutius (Huldric) Profeſſor at Baſil.
Navagiero (Andrew) a noble Venetian.
Navarre (Margaret de Valois, Queen of)
Nevizan (John) an Italian Civilian.
Niphus (Auguſtin) a celebrated Civilian.
Nonius (Peter) a learned Portugueze.
Ochinus (Bernardin) a Capuchin.
Oecolampadius (John) one of the Reformers of the Church.
Padilla (John de) one of the ringleaders of a ſedition in Spain.
Palingenius (Marcellus) a Latin Poet.
Parthenai (Anne de) wiſe of Antony de Pons, Count de Marennes.
Periers (Bonaventure Des) Valet de Chambre to the Queen of Navarre.
Pighius (Albertus) a Sophiſtical writer.
Pin (John du) Biſhop of Rieux.
Pinet (Antony du) Lord of Noroy.
Poitiers (Diana de) miſtreſs to Henry II, King of France.
Polydamus (Valentinus) an Italian Phyſician.
Prat (Antony du) Chancellor of France, &c.
Quiqueran (Peter de) Bp. of Senez.
Regius (Urban) a Lutheran Divine.
Ricius (Paul) Profeſſor of Rhetoric at Pavia.
Rorarius (Hierome) Nuncio of Clement VII.
Rucellai (John) a noble Florentine, and good Poet.
Sabeus (Fauſtus) keeper of the Vatican library.
Samblancai (James de Beaume, Baron de) Superintendant of the Finances.
Schomberg (Nicolas of) Cardinal, &c.
Schorus (Antony) a Grammarian.
Seymour (Anne, Margaret, and Joan) three ſiſters illuſtrious for their learning in England.
Selve (John de) firſt Preſident in the Parliament of Paris.
Sforza (Iſabella) a learned woman.
Sylvius (James) a famous Phyſician.
Socinus (Marianus) a Profeſſor of the Civil-Law.
Stifelius (Michael) a Lutheran Miniſter.
Sturmius (James) famous for the deputations he performed.
Tapperus (Ruardus) Profeſſor of Divinity at Louvain.
Tartaglia (Nicolas) a famous Mathematician.
Tiraquellus (Andrew) a learned Frenchman.
Turrel (Peter) Rector of the College of Dijon.
Valdes (John) a Civilian.
Villamarini (Iſabella) wiſe to the Prince of Salerno.
Virgil (Polydore) an Hiſtorian.
Volſius (Paul) an Abbot.
Urſinus (John) a French Phyſician.
Wechel (Chriſtian) a famous Printer.
Wida (Hernan de) Archbiſhop of Cologn.
Wimpina (Conrad) Profeſſor of Divinity at Francfort.

A. D.

Ziegler (James) a Profeſſor of Divinity.
1550 Acontius (James) a Philoſopher, Civilian, and Divine.
Acronius (John) teacher of Mathematics, &c. at Baſil.
Adriani (John Baptiſt) an Hiſtorian.
Agricola (Michael) a Lutheran Miniſter.
Altaemps (Mark) a Cardinal.
Althamerus (Andrew) a Lutheran Miniſter.
Amboiſe (Michael de) Eſq;
Amyot (James) Biſhop of Auxerre.
Aramont (Gabriel) an Ambaſſador of France, in the reign of Henry II.
Baduel (Claudius) a learned author.
Baronius (Dominic) a Florentine Prieſt.
Baudouin (Francis) a Civilian.
Belleau (Remi) a French Poet.
Bertelier (Philibert) Regiſter, &c. at Geneva.
Billon (Francis de) Secretary of William du Bellai.
Bonfadius (James) Hiſtoriographer to the Republic of Genoa.
Bononia (John de) Archdeacon of Palermo.
Bouquin (Peter) a Carmelite Fryer.
Broſſe (James de) a great warrior.
Bruſchius (Gaſpar) a Latin Poet.
Buchanan (George) a famous Latin Poet, &c.
Bullinger (Henry) one of the Reformers of the Church.
Calvin (John) Miniſter at Geneva.
Caninius (Angelus) a Grammarian.
Capiſucchi (John Antony) a Cardinal by the title of St Pancrace.
Caraccioli (John Antony) Biſhop of Troyes.
Cardan (Jerome) a Phyſician.
Carranza (Bartholomew) a Dominican.
Caſtalio (Sebaſtian) Profeſſor of Greek at Baſil.
Caſtelvetro (Lewis) a ſubtle writer.
Chabot (Peter Gualtherus) a good Humaniſt.
Chocquet (Lewis) a French Poet.
Cipierre (Philibert de Marcilli, Lord of).
Clarus (Julius) a Civilian.
Couſin (Gilbert) a Canon at Nozeret.
Creſpinus (John) a famous Printer.
Curio (Cælius Secundus) a learned Piedmontois.
Daurat (John) a learned Humaniſt and Poet.
Doni (Antony Francis) an Italian author.
Donzellinus (Jerome) an Italian Phyſician.
Eſmendreville (John du Boſc, Lord of).
Eſſe (Andrew de Montalembert, Lord)
Fauno (Lucio) an Italian author.
Fernelius (John) a Phyſician.
Feron (John le) Advocate in the Parliament of Paris.
Ferrara (Renata of France, Ducheſs of).
Ferrier (Arnaud du) Preſident of the Parliament of Paris.
Funccius (John) a Lutheran preacher.
Gallars (Nicolas des) a Miniſter of Geneva.
Gambara (Laurence) a Latin Poet.
Garnache (Francis de Rohan, Lady de la).
Gentilis (John Valentinian) an Arian.
Gratarolus (William) a Phyſician.
Gribaldus (Matthew) a Civilian.
Gropper (John) a Cardinal.
Grynæus (Thomas) a Profeſſor at Baſil.

A. D.

Gryphius (Sebaſtian) a famous Printer at Lyons.
Guiſe (Francis de Lorraine, Duke of).
Hartungius (John) Profeſſor of the Belles Lettres at Friburg.
Henry II, King of France.
Herold (Baſil John) a Proteſtant Miniſter and author.
Hyperius (Andrew Gerard) a Profeſſor of Divinity.
Hortenſius (Lambert) a learned Dutchman.
Huarte (John) a Spaniſh author.
Illyricus (Matthias Flacius) a learned Proteſtant Divine.
Julius III (Pope).
Junius (Hadrian) a Phyſician.
Knox (John) a Scotch Reformer.
Labe (Loyſa) a Courtezan of Lyons.
Leon (Peter Cieça de) a Spaniſh Hiſtorian.
Leovicius (Cyprian) a famous Aſtronomer.
Lippoman (Aloiſio) a learned Prelate.
Liſmanin (Francis) a Doctor of Divinity, &c.
Longiano (Fauſtus da) an Italian author.
Longvic (Jaqueline de) Ducheſs of Montpenſier.
Lotichius (Peter) Abbot of the convent of Solitar.
Lotichius (Peter) ſirnamed Secundus, and nephew to the foregoing.
Lotichius (Chriſtian) younger brother to the foregoing, and Vicar to the Abbey of Solitar.
Maldonat (John) a Prieſt of Burgos.
Marillac (Charles de) Archbiſhop of Vienna.
Marinello (John) a Phyſician.
Marius, ſirnamed Æquicola, an Italian author.
Martinenghus (Titus Proſper) a Benedictine.
Maſſarius (James) a Doctor of Phyſic.
Maugin (John) a French tranſlator.
Modrevius (Andrew Fricius) Secretary to the King of Poland.
Monardes (Nicolas) a Spaniſh Phyſician.
Morlin (Joachim) Profeſſor of Divinity at Konigſberg.
Muſculus (Wolfgang) a famous Divine.
Muſſo (Cornelio) Biſhop of Bitonto.
Naogeorgus (Thomas) a Latin Poet.
Navarre (Joan d'Albret, Queen of).
Orichovius (Staniſlaus) a Poliſh gentleman.
Oſorius (Jerome) a Portugueze Prelate.
Palearius (Aonius) Profeſſor of the Belles Lettres at Siena.
Paré (Ambroſe) Surgeon to Francis II, King of France.
Pariſet (Lewis) a Latin author.
Patricius (Andrew) Bp of Wenden.
Peraxylus (whoſe true name was Arnoldus Arlenius) a great Grecian.
Pereira (Gomeſius) a Spaniſh Phyſician.
Piccolomini (Alexander) Archbiſhop of Patras, &c.
Piccolomini (Francis) a famous Philoſopher.
Pienne (Joan de Halluin) maid of honour to Catherine de Medicis.
Place (Peter de la) Preſident in the court of Aids at Paris.
Poinet (John) Biſhop of Wincheſter.
Pontius (Conſtantine) preacher to Charles V.
Quintin (John) Profeſſor of the Canon-Law at Paris.

A. D.

Radziwil (Nicolas) Palatin of Vilna, &c.
Ramus [Peter] Royal Profeſſor of Philoſophy and Eloquence.
Raſario [John Baptiſt] an Italian Phyſician.
Rataller [George] Preſident of the Council of Utrecht.
Rauber [Andrew Eberhard] a German Knight.
Richer (Peter) a Carmelite, &c.
Robert (John) Profeſſor of the Civil-Law in the univerſity of Orleans.
Rohan (Renata de) wife of Francis de Rohan, Lord de Gié.
Ronſard (Peter de) a French Poet.
Roſeo (Mambrin) an Italian author.
Ruſſilianus (Tiberius) a ſubtle Philoſopher.
Saint-Cyre, a brave ſoldier.
Serbellone (Gabriel) a great Captain.
Serbellone (Fabricius) brother to the foregoing.
Soubiſe (John de Parthenai, Lord of) a zealous Proteſtant.
Spifame (James Paul) Biſhop of Nevers.
Stancarus (Francis) a zealous promoter of the Reformed Religion in Poland.
Strigelius (Victorinus) a Proteſtant Divine.
Sturmius (John) Rector of the college of Straſbourg.
Sulacha (Simon) a Neſtorian Monk.
Suſanneau (Hubert) Doctor of Law and Phyſic.
Taiſnier (John) a teacher of Mathematics.
Taveau (Renata) wife to Francis Rochechoüart, Lord of Tonnay Charente.
Tetti (Scipio) a learned Neapolitan.
Tillet (John du) Protonotary and Secretary to the King, &c.
Tillet (John du) younger brother to the foregoing, and a learned Eccleſiaſtic.
Truberus (Primus) a Sclavonian author.
Tulenus, a learned Frenchman.
Tuppius (Laurence) a Civilian.
Valla (Nicolas) Counſellor in the Parliament of Paris.
Velſius (Juſtus) Doctor of Phyſic.
Vergerius (Peter Paul) famous for his embaſſies, &c.
Villegaignon (Nicolas Durand de) a Knight of Malta.
Viret (Peter) a Proteſtant Miniſter.
Weidnerus (Paul) a Jewiſh Phyſician.
Weſtphalus (Joachim) a Lutheran Miniſter.
Wicelius (George) a Divine.
Zanchius (Baſil) Keeper of the Vatican library.
1575 Abdiſſi, Patriarch of Muſal in Aſſyria.
Abelly (Antony) Doctor of Divinity.
Accords (Stephen Tabourot, Lord of).
Acidalius (Valens) Rector of the ſchool at Breſlaw.
Adrichomius (Chriſtian) a Dutch Prieſt.
Aguirre (Michael de) a Civilian.
Ayrault (Peter) Lieutenant-Criminal in the Preſidial Court of Angers.
Akakia (Martin) Doctor of Phyſic of the Faculty of Paris.
Alciatus (John Paul) a gentleman of Milan.
Aldrovandus (Ulyſſes) Profeſſor of Philoſophy, &c. at Bologne.
Althuſius (John) a Civilian.

A. D.

Anania [John Laurence d'] an Italian author.

Angiolello [Maria] an Hiſtorian.

Antoniano [Sylvio] a Cardinal.

Arigoni [Pompeio] a Cardinal.

Arrera [John d'] Counſellor in the Parliament of Bourdeaux.

Audebert [Germain] a Latin Poet.

Auge [Daniel d'] Greek Profeſſor in the univerſity of Paris.

Auſtria [Don John of] natural ſon to the Emperor Charles V.

Babelot, Chaplain to the Duke of Montpenſier.

Bachovius [Reinier] a Civilian.

Baius [Michael] Profeſſor of Divity, at Louvain.

Barclay [William] a learned Civilian.

Barleus [Melchior] a Latin Poet.

Baron [Peter] Profeſſor of Divinity, in the univerſity of Cambridge.

Baſta [Nicolas] an Officer in the Spaniſh ſervice.

Bautru Des Matras [Maurice] chief Lieutenant of the Provoſtſhip of Angers.

Beaucaire de Peguillon [Francis] Biſhop of Metz.

Beaumont [Francis de] Baron Des Adrets.

Begat [John] Counſellor in the Parliament of Dijon.

Belleforeſt [Francis de] a French author.

Beme, murtherer of Admiral de Chatillon.

Bencius [Francis de] an Italian author.

Beroaldus [Francis] Sieur de Verville.

Beroaldus [Matthew] Teacher of the Hebrew.

Bertram [Cornelius Bonaventura] Hebrew Profeſſor at Geneva.

Beza [Theodorus] a famous Proteſtant Miniſter.

Belli [James de] an Abbot.

Blandrata [George] a Phyſician.

Bodin [John] a learned author.

Boi, a famous player at Cheſs.

Boiſſard [John James] Governour to the Baron of Clervant's Children.

Bolſec [Jerome] an abuſive writer.

Borgarutius [Proſper] an Italian Phyſician.

Boſquet [George] an Advocate in the Parliament of Paris.

Boſſu [James le] Doctor of Divinity, in the univerſity of Paris.

Boſſulus [Matthew] a great Orator.

Botal [Leonard] Phyſician to Henry III, King of France.

Botero (John) tutor to the Duke of Savoy's children.

Boucher [John] Doctor of the Sorbonne.

Bouchet [William] Sieur de Brocourt.

Braun [George] Archdeacon of Dortmond, &c.

Brocardus [James] an Apocalyptical writer.

Brunus [Jordanus] a Philoſopher.

Brutus [John Michael] a learned author.

Buſbequius [Augerius Giſlenius, Lord of]

Caniceus [James] author of a romance.

Capilupus [Camillus] author of a book called The Stratagem.

Capiſucchi [Blaſius] Marquis of Monterio, &c.

Carbon [Lewis] Profeſſor of Divinity at Perugia.

Caurres [John des] principal of the college of Amiens.

Carafi [Tiberius] an Advocate.

Ceſalpinus [Andrew] a Profeſſor at Piſa.

A. D.

Chalvet [Matthew de] Preſident of the Inqueſts in the Parliament of Toulouſe.

Charpentier [Peter] a teacher of the Civil-Law.

Charron [Peter] a French author.

Chaſtel [John] a famous Aſſaſſin.

Cipierre [Renatus de Savoie, Lord of]

Clavius [Chriſtopher] a Jeſuit.

Cologne [Peter de] Miniſter of Metz.

Corbinelli [James] Preceptor to Henry III, King of France.

Cotta [Catellian) a Latin author.

Creſpet [Peter] a Celeſtin Friar.

Criſpus [John Baptiſt] a Divine and Poet.

Criton [James] a prodigious wit.

Dalmatin [George] a Lutheran Miniſter at Laubech.

Dalmatin [George] a Lutheran Miniſter in Upper Carniola.

Dante [Ignatius] a Jacobin Monk.

Dinoth [Richard] an Hiſtorian.

Doneau [Hugh] a Civilian.

Dreſſerus [Matthew] Profeſſor of Polite Learning, in the univerſity of Leipſic.

Eimeric [Nicolas] a Dominican.

Eiſengrein [Martin] Doctor of Divinity.

Elizabeth, Queen of England.

Fauchet [Claude] firſt Preſident of the Court of the Mint at Paris.

Feuardent [Francis] a famous Franciſcan.

Freigius [John Thomas] Rector of the college of Altdorf.

Fugger [Hildric] Chamberlain to Pope Paul III.

Furius [Frederic] a learned Spaniard.

Galés [Peter] a learned Spaniard.

Gallutias [John Paul] an Italian Aſtronomer.

Gardie [Pontus de la] Great Marſhal of the armies of Sweden.

Gediccus [Simon] Doctor of Divinity, and Miniſter at Magdeburg.

Gentilis [Alberic] Profeſſor of Civil-Law at Oxford.

Gentillet [Innocent] a Civilian.

Gifanius [Obertus] a good Humaniſt and Civilian.

Golius [Theophilus] Profeſſor of Ethics at Straſbourg.

Gontaut [Armand de] Baron de Biron.

Gorlæus [Abraham] a man curious in collecting medals.

Goſelini [Julian] Secretary to ſeveral perſons of a high rank.

Gregory [Peter] a learned author.

Grillon, a valiant gentleman of Provence.

Guarini [Baptiſt] author of the Paſtor Fido.

Guignard [John] a Jeſuit.

Guiſe [Henry de Lorraine, Duke of]

Hacket [William] an Engliſh Fanatic.

Hay [John] a Scotch Jeſuit.

Haillan [Bernard de Girard, Lord of] Hiſtoriographer of France.

Hall [Richard] an Engliſh Divine.

Harchius [Jodochus] a Phyſician.

Hardenberg [Albert] a Proteſtant Divine.

Hemmingius [Nicolas] Profeſſor of Divinity at Copenhagen.

Henry III, King of France.

Heſhuſius [Telemannus] a Divine of the Augſburg confeſſion.

Hoffman [Daniel] Superintendant and Profeſſor at Helmſtadt.

Horſtius [James] Profeſſor of Phyſic in the univerſity of Helmſtadt.

Hoſius [Staniſlaus] a Cardinal.

A. D.

Hoſpital [Michael de l'] Chancellor of France.

Hotman [Francis] teacher of the Civil-Law.

Hunnius [Giles] Doctor of Divinity.

Jodelle [Stephen] a French and Latin Poet.

Joubertus [Laurence] Counſellor and Phyſician in ordinary to Henry III, King of France.

Junctin [Francis] a Mathematician, &c.

Junius [Francis] Profeſſor of Divinity at Leyden.

Kilianus [Cornelius] a corrector of the preſs.

Koornhert [Theodore] Secretary of the town of Haerlem.

Kuchlin [John] a Miniſter and Profeſſor of Divinity.

Languet [Hubert] Counſellor to the Elector of Saxony.

Laſicius [John] a Poliſh Gentleman.

Latinus [John] a Schoolmaſter.

Launoy [Matthew] a violent Leaguer.

Lazzarelli [N.] a Prieſt, and Provoſt of Mirandola.

Lentulus [Scipio] Miniſter of Chiavenne.

Leon [Aloiſio] Profeſſor of Divinity in the univerſity of Salamanca.

Leon [Gonſalez Pontius de] a Spaniſh author.

Leonclavius [John] a learned German.

Leonin [Elbret] Profeſſor of the Civil-Law.

Leri [John de] a Proteſtant Miniſter.

Lydius [Martin] Profeſſor of Divinity at Franeker.

Liebaut [John] a Phyſician.

Lipſius [Juſtus] a Great Critic.

Limeuil [Iſabella de la Tour de Turenne Demoiſelle de] maid of honour to Catherine de Medicis.

Lyſerus [Polycarp] a famous Proteſtant Divine.

Livineius [John] a Chanter and Canon at Antwerp.

Lorme [Philibert de] a famous Architect.

Louet [George] a Counſellor of the Parliament of Paris.

Magius [Jerome] a famous Engineer.

Mahomet [Galadin] Emperor of Mogul.

Maldonat [John] a Spaniſh Jeſuit.

Malherbe [Francis de] a French Poet.

Margunius [Maximus] Biſhop of Cythera.

Mariana [John] a Jeſuit and Hiſtorian.

Martellus [Hugolin] Biſhop of Glandeves.

Molſa [Tarquinea] an eminent Italian lady.

Monantheuil [Henry de] King's Profeſſor of Mathematics at Paris.

Monin [John Edward du] a French Poet.

Montecatinus [Antony] Profeſſor of Philoſophy at Ferrara.

Mont-joſieu [Lewis de] an excellent antiquary.

Navarre [Margaret de Valois, Queen of]

Niphus [Fabius] Profeſſor of practical Phyſic at Padua.

Oſſat [Arnaud d'] a Cardinal.

Pacard [George] Miniſter at Rochefoucaut.

Pacheco [Alvarez] a Spaniſh Colonel.

Pareus [David] a Reformed Divine.

Parthenai [Catherine de] wife to Renatus de Rohan, the ſecond of the name.

Paſchali

A. D.
	Paſchali [Giulio Cæſare] an Italian Poet.
	Patricius [Francis] Biſhop of Gaeta.
	Peckius [Peter] Profeſſor of Canon-Law at Louvain.
	Perrot [Nicolas] an Italian author.
	Pezelius [Chriſtopher] Profeſſor of Divinity at Bremen.
	Pincier [John] a Proteſtant Miniſter.
	Piſtorius [John] Doctor of Phyſic.
	Poncet [Maurice] Doctor of Divinity.
	Puccius (Francis) a Proteſtant Divine.
	Quellenec [Charles de] Baron of Pont, &c.
	Raphelengius [Francis] Profeſſor of Hebr. in the univerſity of Leyden.
	Rapin [Nicolas] a Provoſt-Marſhal and Poet.
	Remond [Florimond de] Counſellor in the Parliament of Bourdeaux.
	Rhodoman [Laurence] Profeſſor of Hiſtory in the univerſity of Wirtemberg.
	Rochefoucaud [Alexander de la] Abbot of St Martin.
	Roſe [William] Biſhop of Senlis.
	Roſier [Hugh Sureau du] a famous Miniſter of the Church of Orleans.
	Rotan [John Baptiſt] Miniſter of Rochelle.
	Rua [Peter] a learned Spaniard.
	Ruggeri [Coſmo] Abbot of St Mahé.
	Sabellicus [Marc Antony Cocceius] an Hiſtorian.
	Sacratus [Paul] a Canon of Ferrara.
	Saint-Aldegonde [Philip de Marnix, Lord du Mont].
	Santa-Croce [Proſper] Cardinal.
	Sancteſius [Claudius] Bp of Evreux.
	Sanders [Nicolas] an Engliſh Prieſt.
	Sarnanus [Conſtantius] a Cardinal.
	Schilling [Chriſtopher] Rector of the college of Heidelberg.
	Schomberg [Theodorus of] a brave ſoldier.
	Schomberg [Gaſpar de] Count of Nantueil.
	Schultingius [Cornelius] a Licentiate in Divinity, &c.
	Schutze [John] a Lutheran Miniſter.
	Scribonius [William Adolphus] a German Phyſician and Philoſopher.
	Simonides [Simon] a good Latin Poet.
	Simonius [Simon] a Phyſician and Philoſopher.
	Socinus [Fauſtus] founder of a ſect that goes by his name.
	Spina [John de] a Proteſtant Miniſter.
	Spinoza [John de] a Spaniard of great abilities.
	Spondanus [John de] Lieutenant-General to the Preſidial of Rochelle.
	Stevin [Simon] an excellent Mathematician.
	Strozzi [Philip] ſon to Peter Strozzi, Marſhal of France.
	Surgier [Francis] a Friar.
	Taſſo [Torquato] a famous Italian Poet.
	Taurelius [Nicolas] a Phyſician and Philoſopher.
	Texera [Joſeph] a Portugueze Friar.
	Typotius [James] a Civilian.
	Tyſſander [N.] a French author.
	Torelli [Pomponio] Count of Montechiarugula.
	Tori [Jeffery] King's Printer at Paris.
	Touchet [Mary] miſtreſs to Charles IX, King of France.
	Valerius [Auguſtin] Cardinal.
	Valle [Rolandus] an Italian Civilian.
	Verſoris [Peter de] Lord of Fontenai le Viſconte, &c.
	Villavicentius [Laurence] preacher to Philip II, King of Spain.
	Ulfeld [James] a Daniſh Senator, &c.
	Urſinus [Zachary] a famous reformed Divine.
	Urſus [Nicolas Raimarus] author of ſome Aſtronomical tracts.
	Vulcanius [Bonaventura] Greek Profeſſor in the univerſity of Leyden.
	Xylander [William] Profeſſor of the Greek tongue at Heidelberg.
	Zabarella [James] a Profeſſor in the univerſity of Padua.
	Zanchius [Jerome] a famous Proteſtant Divine.
	Zarlino [Joſeph] an excellent Muſician.
1600	Accariſi (Francis) a Civilian.
	Adam, Archdeacon of the Patriarchal Chamber, and Superior of the Monks of Chaldæa.
	Akakia (Martin) Doctor of Phyſic at Paris.
	Alabaſter (William) an Engliſh Divine.
	Alcaſar (Lewis de) a Spaniſh Jeſuit.
	Amboiſe (Francis d') an Advocate, &c.
	Amboiſe (Adrian d') Biſhop of Freguier.
	Amboiſe (James d') Doctor of Phyſic.
	Arminius (James) Profeſſor of Divinity at Leyden.
	Arnauld (Anthony) Advocate in the Parliament of Paris.
	Arriaga (Robert d') a Spaniſh Jeſuit.
	Baldus (Bernardin) Abbot of Guaſtalla.
	Bandole (Antony de) Advocate in the Parliament of Provence.
	Barclay (John) a Latin author.
	Baſta, a famous General.
	Bauderon (Brice) a French Phyſician.
	Baudius (Dominic) Profeſſor of Hiſtory in the univerſity of Leyden.
	Bautru des-Matras (John) Mayor of Angers.
	Bellarmin (Robert) a Cardinal.
	Beloy (Peter de) Advocate-General in the Parliament of Toulouſe.
	Beni (Paul) Profeſſor of Eloquence in the univerſity of Padua.
	Berault (Michael) Miniſter, and afterwards Profeſſor of Divinity at Montauban.
	Bergier (Nicolas) an Advocate.
	Boccalini (Trajan) an Italian author.
	Bochius (John) a Latin Poet, &c.
	Bonciarius (Marc Antony) a ſchoolmaſter at Perugia.
	Bongars (James) famous for his Embaſſies, &c.
	Botereius (Rodolphus) Advocate in the grand Council at Paris.
	Breauté (Charles de) a Norman gentleman.
	Broughton (Hugh) an Engliſh Divine.
	Broſſier (Martha) a woman that pretended to be poſſeſſed with a Devil.
	Buſtomantinus [John] a Profeſſor in the univerſity of Alcala.
	Cayet (Peter Victor Palma) Doctor of Divinity in the Faculty of Paris.
	Camden (William) an Hiſtorian.
	Carthagena (John) a Jeſuit, and afterwards a Franciſcan.
	Chamier (Daniel) a famous Proteſtant Divine.
	Cheſne [Joſeph du] Sieur de la Valette.
	Ciconia [Flaminius] a Philoſopher.
	Concini [Concino] known by the name of Marſhal d'Ancre.
	Cremoninus [Cæſar] Profeſſor of Philoſophy at Padua.
	Criton [George] Greek Profeſſor in the royal college at Paris.
	Criton [William] a Jeſuit.
	Daillé [John] miniſter of the church of Paris.
	Dandini [Jerome] a Jeſuit.
	Dauſqueius [Claudius] Canon of Tournay.
	Dempſter [Thomas] a Schoolmaſter.
	Druſius [John] Hebrew Profeſſor in the univerſity of Franeker.
	Elich [Lewis Philip] a German author.
	Elmenhorſt [Geverhart] a learned Hamburgueſe.
	Emmius [Urbo] a Profeſſor at Groningen.
	Eremita [Daniel] Secretary to the Duke of Florence.
	Feithius [Everard] a learned Dutchman.
	Fenoillet [Peter] Biſhop of Montpellier.
	Ferrier [Jeremiah] Profeſſor of Divinity at Niſmes.
	Frachetta [Jerome] a Political writer.
	Gaigneur [William le] a man who excelled in the art of writing.
	Galligay [Leonora] wife of the Marſhal d'Ancre.
	Gallonius [Antony] a prieſt of the Oratory of Rome.
	Gamon [Chriſtopher de] a French author.
	Gentilis [Scipio] Profeſſor of the Civil-Law at Altorf.
	Gomarus [Francis] a Profeſſor of Divinity.
	Gontaut [Charles de] Duke of Biron.
	Goulart [Simon] Miniſter of Geneva.
	Gournay [Mary de Jars de] a learned Frenchwoman.
	Grain [Baptiſt le] an Hiſtorian.
	Grawerus [Albert] a Doctor of Divinity.
	Gretſerus [James] a Jeſuit.
	Gruterus [Janus] a learned Philologer.
	Guaguin [Alexander] Governour of the fortreſs of Witebſk in Poland.
	Guiſe [Lewis de Lorraine, Cardinal de]
	Hacker [James] Profeſſor of Divinity at Friburg.
	Hemelar [John] a Canon of Antwerp.
	Henry IV, King of France.
	Herlicius [David] a Philoſopher, &c.
	Herwart [John George] Chancellor of Bavaria.
	Hæſchelius [Dav.] Rector of St Anne's college at Augſburg.
	Hoſpinian [Rodolphus] a Swiſs author.
	Hutterus [Leonard] Profeſſor of Divinity at Wittemberg.
	Jeniſchius [Paul] a learned Flemiſh man.
	Jonas Arngrimas, a learned Iſelander.
	Jungerman [Godfrey] a corrector of the preſs.
	Keckerman [Bartholomew] Profeſſor of Philoſophy at Dantzick.
	Keller [James] a Jeſuit.
	Kornmannus [Henry] a German Civilian.
	Labourlotte [Claudius] a brave Captain.
	Langius [Joſeph] Profeſſor of Mathematics, &c. at Friburg.
	Laurens [Andrew du] Profeſſor of Phyſic in the univerſity of Montpellier.

A. D.

Lingelſheim [George Michael] Preceptor, and afterwards Counſellor to the Elector Palatine.
Lorme [N. de] a French Phyſician.
Loyer [Peter le] Counſellor in the Preſidial Court of Angers.
Lubert [Sibrand] Profeſſor of Divinity at Franeker.
Lubin [Eilhard] Profeſſor of Poetry, and afterwards of Divinity in the univerſity of Roſtoc.
Maccius [Sebaſtian] a learned Humaniſt.
Maginus [John Antony] Profeſſor of Mathematics in the univerſity of Bologna.
Marinella [Lucretia] a Venetian lady.
Marnix [John de] Baron des Potes.
Matman [Rodolphus] a Jeſuit.
Mendozza [John Gonſales de] an Auguſtin Friar.
Montgaillard [Bernard de] Abbot of Orval.
Mongne [Roberta] a learned Proteſtant lady.
Narni, an Italian Capuchin.
Newton [Adam] Dean of Saliſbury.
Pineau [Severin] a Surgeon.
Pineau [Gabriel du] Counſellor in the Preſidial of Angers.
Pinſſon [Francis] Profeſſor of the Civil-Law at Bourges.
Pitiſcus [Bartholomew] Preacher to the Elector Palatine.
Plantevit-la-Pauſe [John] Biſhop of Lodeve.
Politian [Giovanni Angelo] teacher of Logic.
Politian [Antony Laurentin] Profeſſor of Logic in the univerſity of Piſa.
Puteanus [Erycius] Hiſtoriographer to his Catholic Majeſty.
Refuge [du] author of a treatiſe on the court.
Renou [John de] Counſellor and Phyſician to Henry IV, King of France.
Rinuccini [Ottavio] gentleman of the bed-chamber to Henry IV.
Rocco [Girolamo] a great maſter in the art of writing.
Rubenus [Leonard] a Benedictine.
Sanchez [Francis] a Phyſician.
Sanchez [Thomas] a Spaniſh Jeſuit.
Scot [Reginald] an Engliſh gentleman.
Scultetus [Abraham] author of ſeveral books.
Segla [William de, Sieur de Cayras] Counſellor in the Parliament of Toulouſe.
Smiglecius [Martin] a Jeſuit.
Stouppa [John Nicolas] Profeſſor of Phyſic at Baſil.
Sutcliffe [Matthew] an Engliſh Divine.
Val [John du] a Phyſician.
Valdes [James] an Advocate at Valladolid.
Verſerus [Mark] a learned Civilian.
Volkelius [John] a Socinian Miniſter.
Vorſtius [Conrad] a Profeſſor of Divinity.
Uſher [Henry] Archbiſhop of Armagh, and Primate of Ireland.
Windeck [John Paul] Doctor of Divinity.

A. D.

Wower [John de] Counſellor to the Duke of Holſtein.
1625 Aarſens [Francis] Lord of Somelſdyck, and Spyck, &c.
Abbot [George] Archbiſhop of Canterbury.
Abbot [Robert] Biſhop of Sarum.
Abram [Nicolas] a Jeſuit.
Accariſi [James] Doctor of Divinity.
Acoſta [Uriel] a Portugueze gentleman.
Acuna [Chriſtopher] a Spaniſh Jeſuit.
Adam [Melchior] Rector of a college at Heidelberg.
Agreda [Mary de] a religious viſionary.
Airault [Renatus] a Jeſuit.
Alamos [Balthazar] a Civilian.
Alciatus [Terence] an Italian Jeſuit.
Aldringer, a famous General.
Aleander [Jerome] Secretary to Cardinal Octavio Bandini.
Alegambus [Philip] a Jeſuit.
Allatius [Leo] Librarian of the Vatican.
Alſtedius [John Henry] a German Divine.
Altingius [Henry] Profeſſor of Divinity at Heidelberg.
Amama [Sixtinus] Hebrew Profeſſor in the univerſity of Franeker.
Ameſeus [William] Profeſſor of Divinity at Franeker.
Amyraut [Moſes] Miniſter and Profeſſor of Divinity at Saumur.
Aquinas [Philip] a converted Jew.
Archirota [Alexander] an Abbot.
Arnauld d'Andilli [Robert] eldeſt ſon of Anthony Arnauld the Advocate.
Arniſæus [Henningus] Profeſſor of Phyſic in the univerſity of Helmſtadt.
Arſenius, a Greek Monk.
Aubertin [Edmund] Miniſter of the Church of Paris.
Audiguier [N. d'] a French author.
Bacon [Francis] Lord High-Chancellor of England.
Bagni [John Francis] a Cardinal.
Balzac [John Lewis Guez, Sieur de].
Baranzon [Redemptus] a Barnabite Friar.
Barleus [Gaſpar] Profeſſor of Phyſic at Amſterdam.
Barleus [Lambert] Greek Profeſſor in the univerſity of Leyden.
Barnes [John] an Engliſh Benedictine.
Barthius [Gaſpar] a famous author.
Baſnage [Benjamin] Miniſter of Charenton.
Baudier [Michael] a French author.
Bautru [William] Count de Serrant, and Bautru [Nicolas] Count de Nogent, his brother.
Bedell [William] Biſhop of Kilmore.
Belot [N.] Advocate in the King's Privy-Council.
Berigardus [Claudius] Profeſſor of Philoſophy at Piſa.
Berulle [Peter de] Cardinal.

A. D.

Blondel [David] a Proteſtant Miniſter.
Borſtel [Adolphus de] a German gentleman.
Boſc [N. du] a Franciſcan.
Bouchin [Stephen] Counſellor and King's Attorney in the Royal Courts of Beaune in Burgundy.
Braunbom [Frederic] a Proteſtant author.
Brezé [the Marſhal de] and
Brezé [Armand de Maillé] his only ſon.
Bzovius [Abraham] a Dominican.
Cameron [John] a famous Proteſtant Divine.
Capriata [Peter John] a Civilian and Hiſtorian.
Cauſſin [Nicolas] a Jeſuit.
Ceriſantes, a Swediſh Reſident at Paris.
Charnaie [the Baron de].
Croius [John] a Proteſtant Miniſter.
Dieu [Lewis de] Miniſter of Leyden.
Digby [Sir Kenelm] an Engliſh gentleman.
Donaldſon [Walter] Principal of the college of Sedan.
Druſbicki [Gaſpar] a Poliſh Jeſuit.
Elichman [John] a Phyſician.
Emilius [Antony] Profeſſor of Hiſtory in the univerſity of Utrecht.
Epiſcopius, a learned Arminian.
Eſpagne [John d'] Miniſter of the French Church in London.
Eſpagnet [John d'] Preſident of the Parliament of Bourdeaux.
Eſſars [Charlotte des] wife of the Marſhal de l'Hoſpital.
Fakreddin, Prince of the Druſians in Syria.
Farel [William] a Proteſtant Miniſter.
Farnaby [Thomas] a learned Philologer.
Faucheur [Michael le] a Proteſtant Miniſter.
Ferrand [James] Doctor of Phyſic.
Ferri [Paul] a learned Divine.
Fevret [Charles] Advocate in the Parliament of Dijon.
Forbes [Patrick] Biſhop of Aberdeen, and
Forbes [John] his ſon.
Forbes [William] Biſhop of Edinburgh.
Gallutius [Tarquin] a Jeſuit.
Gamache [Philip] Doctor of the Sorbonne.
Garaſſe [Francis] a Jeſuit.
Gariſſoles [Antony] Profeſſor of Divinity at Montauban.
Gilles [Peter] a Proteſtant Miniſter.
Gioachino [Greco] a famous player at Cheſs.
Goldaſt [Melchior Haiminsfeld] a learned Calviniſt.
Gombauld [John Ogier de] a French Poet.
Gorlæus [David] a learned Dutchman.
Goulu [John] General of the Feuillants.
Goulu [Jerome] a Phyſician of the Faculty of Paris.
Gramond [Gabriel Bartholomew de] Preſident in the Parliament of Toulouſe.

A. D.

Gramont [Scipio de] Lord of St Germain.

Grandier [Urban] Curate and Canon of Loudon.

Grævius [John] an Arminian Miniſter.

Grotius [Hugo] a famous author.

Gruterus [Peter] a Phyſician.

Gryphiander [John] Doctor of the Civil-Law.

Guadagnolo [Philip] Reader of Arabic and Chaldee at Rome.

Guebriant [Renata du Bec] widow of the Marſhal de Guebriant.

Guimené [the Princeſs of].

Guiſe [Charles de Lorraine, Duke of].

Guyet [Francis] a great Critic.

Hall [Joſeph] Biſhop of Norwich.

Heraldus [Deſiderius] Advocate in the Parliament of Paris.

Hoe [Matthias] a famous Lutheran Miniſter.

Hoelzlin [Jeremiah] Greek Profeſſor in the univerſity of Leyden.

Horſtius [Gregory] firſt Phyſician of the city of Ulm.

Hortenſius [Martin] Profeſſor of Mathematics at Amſterdam.

Hoſpital [Francis de l'] Marſhal of France.

Janſenius [Cornelius] Biſhop of Ipres.

Jarrige [Peter] a Jeſuit.

Javerſac [N.] a French author.

Inchofer [Melchior] a Jeſuit.

Jungerman [Lewis] an excellent Botaniſt.

Junius [Francis] ſon to the abovementioned Francis Junius.

Kepler [John] a great Aſtronomer.

Keſler [Andrew] a Lutheran Divine.

Kircher [John] a proſelyte to the Church of Rome.

Kirchman [John] a famous author.

Knot [Edward] an Engliſh Jeſuit.

Kotterus [Chriſtopher] a Fanatic.

Kyriander [William] a German Civilian.

Langle [John Maximilian de] a Proteſtant Miniſter.

Lanſbergius [Philip] a Mathematician.

Leſcarbot [Mark] an Advocate.

Lewis XIII, King of France.

Lingendes [Claudius de] a Jeſuit.

Lingendes [John de] a celebrated Preacher.

Loges [Mary Bruneau, Lady des].

Longomontanus [Chriſtian] Profeſſor of Mathematics at Copenhagen.

Lotichius [John Peter] a Phyſician.

Lugo [Francis de] a Spaniſh Jeſuit, and Lugo [John de] his brother; a Jeſuit and Cardinal.

Lydiat [Thomas] an Engliſh author.

Linde [Sir Humphry] an Engliſh gentleman.

Maets [Charles de] Profeſſor of Divinity at Utrecht.

Magni [Valerian] a Capuchin.

Mayerne [Theodorus Turquet, Sieur de] a Phyſician.

Makowſki [John] Profeſſor of Divinity at Franeker.

Mareſts [John des] Sieur de St Sorlin, and Mareſts [Roland des] his elder brother.

Marillac [Lewis de] Marſhal of France.

A. D.

Maſcardi [Auguſtin] Chamberlain to Pope Urban VIII.

Meynier [Honoratus de] a French author.

Meſplede [Lewis] a French Dominican.

Meſtrezat [John] a Miniſter of the Church of Paris.

Meziriac [Claudius Gaſpar Bachet, Lord of].

Micrælius [John] Profeſſor of Divinity at Stetin.

Milletiere [Theophilus Brachet, Sieur de la) a Lawyer, and afterwards a Divine.

Monſerrat [Montanus Michael] a Spaniſh Proteſtant.

Montmaur [Peter de] Profeſſor of the Greek tongue in the College Royal of Paris.

Morgues [Matthew de] Sieur de St Germains.

Morinus [John Baptiſt] Phyſician and Royal Profeſſor of Mathematics at Paris.

Motte-Aigron [James de la] a French author.

Moulin [Peter du] a famous Proteſtant Miniſter.

Muſac, a gentleman of Burgundy.

Muſtapha, Emperor of the Turks.

Neufgermain [Lewis de] a French Poet.

Nibuſius [Barthold] a famous Divine.

Oginſki [Charles] a gentleman of Lithuania.

Okolſki [Simon] a Dominican.

Oregias [Auguſtin] a great Philoſopher.

Oſman, Emperor of the Turks.

Ottoboni [Peter] Pope under the name of Alexander VIII.

Padilla [Louiſa de] Counteſs d'Aranda.

Pallavicino [Ferrante] a ſatirical author.

Paravicin [Vincent] a Proteſtant Miniſter.

Pareus [Philip] a Grammarian, and Pareus [Daniel] his ſon.

Paſor [Matthias] Profeſſor of Divinity at Groningen.

Peyre [James d'Auzoles] a ridiculous author.

Peyreſc [Nicolas Claudius Fabri, Lord of].

Petavius [Dionyſius] a Jeſuit.

Prideaux [John] Bp of Wincheſter.

Racan [Honorat de Beuil, Marquis de].

Raynaud [Theophilus] a Jeſuit.

Reihing [James] Profeſſor of Divinity at Tubingen.

Reineſius [Thomas] a Phyſician.

Ryer [Andrew du] Sieur de Malezair.

Rittangelus [John Stephen] a converted Jew.

Rohan [Anne de] ſiſter to the Duke of Rohan.

Rorenco [Marco Aurelio] Grand Prior of St Roc at Turenne.

Ruarus [Martin] a Socinian Miniſter.

Saint-Cyran [John du Verger de Hauranne, Abbot of].

Sancta-Clara [Francis of] an Engliſh Franciſcan.

Sanſon [James] a barefooted Carmelite.

Saporta [Antony] Royal Profeſſor of Phyſic in the univerſity of Montpellier.

Scheiblerus [Chriſtopher] Superintendant of the Church, and Rector of the College at Dortmund.

A. D.

Schiller [Elias] author of a book of Controverſy.

Schomberg [Henry de] a Marſhal of France.

Simon [Theodorus] famous for frequently changing his religion.

Soubiſe [Benjamin de Rohan, Duke of].

Sozomenus [John] a Civilian.

Spanheim [Frederic] Profeſſor of Divinity at Leyden.

Strozzi [Philip] a zealous republican in Florence.

Theron [Vital] a French Jeſuit.

Thomas [Paul] Sieur de Girac.

Triſtan l'Hermite [Francis] Gentleman in Ordinary to the Duke of Orleans.

Tronchin [Theodore] a Miniſter and Profeſſor of Divinity.

Vedelius [Nicolas] a noted reformed Divine.

Villareal [Emmanuel Fernandes] Conſul for the Portugueze nation at Rouën.

Vinay [Alexander de] Miniſter of the Reformed Church of Annonay.

Vorſtius [William Henry] Miniſter of the Arminian congregation at Warmond.

Uſher [James] Archbp of Armagh.

Wert [John de] a great warrior.

Wilhem [David le-Leu de] Counſellor in the Council of the Princes of Orange.

1650 Abelly (Lewis) Biſhop and Earl of Rhodes.

Acheri (Luke de) a Benedictine of the congregation of St Maur.

Adam (John) a Jeſuit.

Aitzema (Leo de) Reſident for the Hans-towns at the Hague.

Altingius (James) Profeſſor of Divinity at Groningen.

Ancillon (David) a Proteſtant Miniſter.

Andreas (Tobias) Profeſſor of Hiſtory, &c. at Groningen.

Anglus (Thomas) an Engliſh Prieſt.

Annat (Francis) Confeſſor to Lewis XIV.

Anſelm, a barefooted Auguſtine.

Antonio (James) Knight of the Order of St James, and Canon of Seville.

Aproſio (Angelico) a learned Italian.

Aproſio (Paulo Auguſtino) a Lawyer, &c. at Florence.

Arnauld (Antony) Doctor of the Sorbonne.

Aubertin (N.) a French Hiſtorian.

Baldus (James) a Jeſuit and Latin Poet.

Baleſdens (John) Advocate in the Parliament of Paris.

Balthaſar (Chriſtopher) a learned Proteſtant in France.

Banck (Laurence) Profeſſor of the Civil Law in the Univerſity of Franeker.

Bangius (Thomas) Doctor and Profeſſor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Copenhagen.

Barde (John de la) Counſellor of State, Marquis de Marolles, &c.

Baron (Vincent) a Dominican.

Baroni (Leonora) a fine Singer.

Beaulieu (Lewis le Blanc Sieur de) Miniſter and Profeſſor of Divinity at Sedan

Benedictis (Elpidio de) Cardinal Mazarin's Secretary, and afterwards his Agent at Rome.

Benſerade (Iſaac de) a celebrated French author.

A. D.

Billaut (Adam) a pretty good French Poet.

Blondel (Francis) Profeſſor of Phyſic in the Univerſity of Paris.

Bochart (Matthew) Miniſter at Alençon.

Bochart (Samuel) Miniſter at Caen.

Boſquet (Francis) Biſhop of Montpellier.

Boulu (Cæſar Egaſſe du) Regiſter and Hiſtoriographer of the Univerſity of Paris.

Bourignon (Antoinette) a famous Fanatic.

Brezé (Clara Clementia de Maillé) daughter to the Marſhal of that name.

Bruyn (John de) a Profeſſor at Utrecht.

Brun (Antony le) Ambaſſador of Spain at the Hague.

Chigi (Fabio) Pope under the name of Alexander VII.

Cygne (Martin du) a Jeſuit,

Comenius (John Amos) a Grammarian and Proteſtant Divine.

Coſta (Margaret) an Italian Poeteſs.

Daſſouci (Charles Coypeau Sieur) a Muſician and French Poet.

Des-Barreaux (James de Vallée Lord).

Diana (John Nicolas de) a Jeſuit.

Drabicius (Nicolas) a famous Enthuſiaſt.

Drelincourt (Charles) Miniſter of the Church of Paris.

Duaren (Francis) Profeſſor of the Civil Law at Bourges.

Dury (John) a Proteſtant Divine.

Ecchellenſis (Abraham) a learned Maronite.

Euſtache (David) a Proteſtant Miniſter.

Fabricius (Vincent) a good Poet, Phyſician, &c.

Ferrier (John) a Jeſuit.

Gaffarel (James) a learned Provencial.

Gallutius (Angelus) a Jeſuit.

Golius (James) Mathematic and Arabic Profeſſor in the Univerſity of Leyden.

Graſwinckel (Theodore) a Civilian.

Grenaille (Francis de) a Monk.

Guichenon (Samuel) an Hiſtorian.

Guiſe (Henry de Lorraine) Duke of.

Hali-beigh, firſt Dragoman at the Grand Seignior's court.

Heidanus (Abraham) Profeſſor of Divinity at Leyden.

Henichius (John) Profeſſor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Rinthel.

Hobbes (Thomas) author of the Leviathan.

Hoornbeeck (John) Profeſſor of Divinity at Utrecht, and afterwards at Leyden.

Hottinger (John Henry) a learned Swiſs.

Hugues (James) a Divine and Canon.

Joly (Claudius) Chanter and Canon of the Church of Notre Dame at Paris.

Yſe (Alexander d') Miniſter of Grenoble.

Larroque (Matthew de) a famous Proteſtant Miniſter.

Launoy (John de) Doctor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Paris.

Leſſeville (Euſtachius Leclerc de) Biſhop of Coutance.

A. D.

Lubienetzki (Staniſlaus) a Socinian Miniſter.

Macedo (Francis) a Jeſuit, and

Macedo (Antony) his brother, likewiſe a Jeſuit.

Maignan (Emmanuel) a Philoſopher and Minim Friar.

Maimbourg (Lewis) a Jeſuit.

Marca (Peter de) Archbiſhop of Toulouſe.

Mareſius (Samuel) a Miniſter and Profeſſor of Divinity.

Margarin (Cornelius) Abbot of mount Caſſin.

Mey (John de) a Doctor of Phyſic, &c. at Middelburg.

Menage (Giles) one of the moſt learned men of his time.

Milton (John) a famous Engliſh Poet.

Montfleuri, a famous Comedian.

Morinus (Simon) a Fanatic.

Moriſon (Robert) a Phyſician and Profeſſor of Botany at Oxford.

Morus (Alexander) Profeſſor of Divinity at Middelburg.

Nidhard (John Everard) a Jeſuit.

Paſcal (Blaiſe) a famous French author.

Patin (Guy) Profeſſor of Phyſic in the Royal College of Paris.

Peyrarede (John de) a Latin Poet and Critic.

Peyrere (Iſaac la) famous for his Treatiſe concerning the Pre-Adamites.

Perrot (Nicolas) Sieur d'Ablancourt one of the great wits of his age.

Piaſecki (Paul) Biſhop of Premiſlia in Poland.

Pinon (James) Abbot of Condé.

Pinſſon (Francis) an advocate at Paris.

Poquelin (John Baptiſt) known by the name of Moliere.

Price (John) a learned Engliſhman.

Priezac (Daniel de) a Member of the French Academy.

Prynn (William) an Engliſh Lawyer.

Priolo (Benjamin) a French Hiſtorian.

Quillet (Claudius) a Latin Poet.

Reverend-de-Bougy (John) Marquis de Bougy.

Ryer (Peter) a Member of the French Academy.

Roberval, Profeſſor of Mathematics at Paris.

Rodon (David de) Profeſſor of Philoſophy at Die, and afterwards at Orange.

Roſen (Reinhold) a good warrior.

Rovenius (Philip) a titular Archbiſhop of Philippe.

Ruffi (Antony de) Counſellor in the Seneſchal's court of Marſeilles.

Scheffer (John) a Profeſſor in the Univerſity of Upſal.

Scheſtad (Annibal) a Daniſh Nobleman.

Schomberg (Charles de) Duke of Haluïn and Marſhal of France.

Sengebere (Polycarp) a Civilian.

Sennertus (Andrew) Profeſſor of the Oriental Tongues in the Univerſity of Wittemberg.

Souches (Lewis Rattuit Count de)

Tabor (John Otto) a German Civilian.

Tavernier (John Baptiſt) Baron d'Aubonne, a great traveller.

A. D.

Vayer (Francis de la Mothe le) Member of the French Academy, &c.

Vander-Linden (John Antonides) Profeſſor of Phyſic at Leyden.

Verdier (N. du) Hiſtoriographer of France.

Wart (Bernard de) a Dominican Friar, &c.

Zuerius (Boxhornius Mark) Profeſſor at Leyden.

Zuylichem (Conſtantine Huygens Lord of) Secretary and Counſellor to the Princes of Orange.

1675 Apaſi (Michael) Prince of Tranſylvania.

Arnoldus (Nicolas) Profeſſor of Divinity at Franeker.

Bacone (Leo) Biſhop of Glandeve.

Barlow (Thomas) Biſhop of Lincoln.

Baſnage (Henry) an Advocate in the Parliament of Normandy.

Berault (Claude) Regius Profeſſor of Syriac.

Bigot (Emeric) a learned Norman.

Blondel (Francis) the King's Profeſſor of Mathematics and Architecture.

Borri (Joſeph Francis) a famous Chymiſt, Quack, and Heretic.

Borrichius (Olaus) Profeſſor of Philology, Poetry, &c. in the Univerſity of Copenhagen.

Boſc (Peter du) a French Miniſter.

Bouhours (Dominique) a Jeſuit.

Bourſault (Edmund) a French author.

Brun (Charles le) chief Painter to the French King.

Capiſucchi (Raimond) a Cardinal.

Chevreau (Urban) a French Hiſtorian.

Claude (John) Miniſter of the Church of Paris.

Collatius (Peter Apollonius) a Prieſt of Novarra.

Colomiés (Paul) reader in the French Church at London.

Cotin (Charles) one of the French Academy.

Dati (Carlo) Profeſſor of Philology at Florence.

Donatus (Marcellus) Count of Ponzano.

Drelincourt (Charles) Profeſſor of Phyſic at Leyden.

Felibien (Andrew) Sieur des Avaux, &c.

Flavigny (Valerian de) Doctor of Divinity.

Fonte Moderata, a Venetian Lady, whoſe true name was Modeſto Pozzo.

Gabriel (Giles) Licentiate of the Univerſity of Louvain, &c.

Gonet (John Baptiſt) a Dominican.

Guarini (Guarinus) a Theatin Monk, &c.

Hallé (Peter) Profeſſor of Canon-Law in the Univerſity of Paris.

Henault (N.) a French Poet.

Hermant (Godfrey) Doctor of the Sorbonne.

Huybert (Peter de) Lord of Burgh, &c.

Jardins (Mary Catherine des) famous for her romances.

Innocent XI, Pope.

Kirſtenius (Peter) Profeſſor of Phyſic at Upſal, &c.

Knuzen (Matthias) an avowed teacher of Atheiſm.

Konig (George Matthias) Profeſſor of Poetry, &c. in the Univerſity of Altorf.

A.D.
	Kortholt (Chriſtian) Doctor and Profeſſor of Divinity at Kiel.
	Kuhlman (Quirinus) a Viſionary.
	Lambecius (Peter) firſt Librarian to the Emperor.
	Lancelot (Claudius) a Benedictine Monk.
	Liſola (Francis de) a man famous for his embaſſies.
	Lyſerus (John) author of the Polygamia Triumphatrix.
	Maraſcia (Joſeph Vincent) of the Oratory of St Jerom de la Charité.
	Maſcaron (Julius) Biſhop of Agen.
	Nicaiſe (Claudius) a learned Frenchman.
	Nicolle (Peter) one of the fineſt Pens in Europe.
	Orobio (Iſaac) a Jewiſh Phyſician.
	Pageau (N.) an Advocate of the Parliament of Paris.
	Pays (Renatus le) a Knight of St Maurice.
	Peliſſon (Paul) one of the French Academy.
	Perez (Joſeph) Profeſſor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Salamanca.
	Pezelius (Chriſtopher) a Proteſtant Divine.
	Pincier (John) a Proteſtant Miniſter.
	Portugal (Alphonſo VI, King of).
	Pradillhon (John Baptiſt) a Feuillant.
	Quetif (James) a Dominican.
	Rangouze, a French author.
	Rapin (Renatus) a Jeſuit.
	Reſenius (Peter) Counſellor and Profeſſor at Copenhagen.
	Rez (Antony de) Advocate in the Parliament of Paris.
	Ricci (Michael Angelo) a Cardinal.
	Rocaberti (John Thomas de) Archbiſhop of Valencia.
	Roy (James le) Baron of the Holy Empire, and Lord of St Lambert.
	Roſe (Touſſaint) Marquis de Coye, Secretary to the King's Cabinet, &c.
	Schomberg (Frederic de) Marſhal of France.
	Serroni (Hyacinthus) firſt Archbiſhop of Alby.
	Spinoſa (Benedict de) a Jew by birth, and a Syſtematical Atheiſt by profeſſion.
	Tellier (Michael le) Chancellor of France.
	Triſtan de Saint Amand (John) an Antiquary and Medalliſt.
	Turretin (Francis) a Miniſter and Profeſſor of Divinity at Geneve.
	Vaumoriere (Peter Dortigue Sieur de) Sub-Director to the Academy of the Abbot d'Aubignac.
	Viviani (Vincentio) a great Mathematician.
	Weile (Frederic Ragſtat de) Miniſter at Spiik.
	Wittichius (Chriſtopher) Profeſſor of Divinity at Leyden.
1700	Aulnoy (Maria Catherina le Jumel de Berneville Counteſs d') famous for her writings.
	Tauvry (Daniel) Doctor of Phyſic of the Faculty of Paris.

A LIST of thoſe ARTICLES which are not mentioned in the CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE.

A*Bbeville*, the capital city of the Duchy of Ponthieu in Picardy.
Abdera, a maritime town in Thrace.
Abdias of Babylon, a Legendary Impoſtor.
Aberdeen, an Epiſcopal city of Scotland.
Abydos, a city of Egypt.
Acarnania, a country ſituated on the Ionian ſea.
Acco, a fabulous old woman.
Achilles, the name of ſeveral perſons.
Achillea, an iſland of the Euxine ſea.
Actor, the name of ſeveral perſons mentioned in fabulous Hiſtory.
Adamites, a ridiculous ſect.
Agricola, a name which a vaſt many authors bear.
Aguirre: perſons of this name.
Aguillon, a ſmall town of Guienne.
Aimon, a Prince in Romance.
Alains, a barbarous people.
Alais, a city of France.
Alalcomenium, a ſmall town of Bœotia.
Albret, a family.
Albunea, a famous place in Italy.
Alcmæon: perſons of this name.
Altieri: Cardinals of this name.
Amelia, a city of Italy.
Ammonius: writers of this name.
Anabaptiſts, a ſect.
Andlo (Petrus ab) a fictitious name.
Andrinople, or Adrianople, a city of Thrace.
Andromachus: perſons of this name.
Anicius, a Roman family.
Anna, the name of ſome perſons mentioned in the Scripture.
Antinoë, or Antinopolis, a town in Egypt.
Antony, a Roman family.
Apicius; perſons of this name.
Apollodorus; perſons of this name.
Archelaus: perſons of this name.
Arimanius, one of the chief deities of Perſia.
Arion, a wonderful horſe.
Arnauld, a family of Auvergne.
Arodon (Benjamin d') a Jew.
Arria, the name of ſome Roman ladies.
Arſinoe: Queens of this name.
Artaxata, the capital city of Armenia.
Athenæum, a public edifice in Rome.
Atrax, or Atracia, a city of Theſſaly.
Auriege, or rather Ariege, a river in France.
Azotus, a city of Paleſtine.
Babylon, a city of Meſopotamia.
Balbus, ſome perſons of this name.
Balzac, a ſmall lordſhip in Angoumois.
Bellai, a family in Anjou.
Belley, a city of France.
Berenice, the name of ſeveral women and Cities.
Berytus, a maritime town of Phœnicia.
Bezanites, or Bezanians, an imaginary ſect.
Byblos, a maritime town of Phœnicia.
Bigois, a Tuſcan nymph.
Bodegrave, a village of Holland on the Rhine.
Boreas, one of the four Cardinal winds.
Brachmans, Indian Philoſophers.
Burgundy (Houſe of)
Burgundy, one of the circles of the empire.
Buſiris; perſons of this name.
Butas, a Greek Poet.
Cainites, a ſect of Heretics.
Capiſucchi, a family in Rome.
Cappadocia, a country in Aſia.
Caracciol, or Caraccioli: perſons of this family.
Caſſius, the name of a Roman family.
Cethegus, a Roman family.
Chederles, which among the Turks is, what St George is among the Chriſtians.
Chigi, a noble family of Siena.
Comana: cities of this name.
Combabus, a Syrian Lord.
Conrad (Herimannus) a fictitious name.
Conſtance, a city of Germany.
Crito, the name of ſeveral antient authors.
Dinant, a city in the Netherlands.
Dioſcorides, an iſland in the Red-Sea.
Dioſcurias, a city of Colchis.
Dryades; the name of certain Pagan female deities.
Drummond, a moſt noble and antient family of Scotland.
Druſus, a Roman family.
Egnatia, a city of Italy.
Ereſus, a place in the iſle of Leſbos.
Erfurt, a city of Germany.
Eſop, the name of ſeveral antient Perſonages.
Eſop, a Greek author of a romantic Hiſtory of Alexander the Great.
Eſtampes, a city of France.
Eurydice, an Illyrian lady.
Fakeddin, a Mahometan author.
Fannius, a Roman family.
Fervaux (John) the true author of the Annals of Bavaria.
Flora, an imaginary Courtezan.
Fontarabia, a city of Spain.
Fontevraud, or rather Frontevaux, a famous Abbey in the dioceſe of Poitiers.
Frangipani, a very antient Roman family.
Fratricelli, a ſect of Heretics.
Garonne, one of the four great rivers of France.
Gergenti, a town of Sicily.
Goſſelin, authors of this name.
Guiſcard, the name of a family.
Guiſe, a town of Picardy.
Gymnoſophiſts, a ſect of Philoſophers.
Hay, a family of Scotland.
Halicarnaſſus, the capital city of the kingdom of Caria.
Hamadryades, a kind of nymphs.
Harpalice, a beautiful young woman in fabulous hiſtory.
Hierocles, a Greek author.
Hierophylus, an Athenian Phyſician.
Hirpini, a people of Italy.
Hortenſius, the name of a Plebeian family of Rome.
Japan, the name of a country.
Joachim, the fabulous huſband of St Anne.
Ipres, or Ypres, an epiſcopal town in the Earldom of Flanders.
Iſlebians, a ſect.
Italica, a town in Spain.
Juba; Princes of this name.
Julis, a town of the iſle of Cea.
Juno, ſiſter and wife of Jupiter.
Jupiter, the greateſt of all the Heathen gods.
Kermatians, a ſect in Arabia.
Lamia, a Roman family.
Lamia, a town of Theſſaly.
Lamia, the daughter of Neptune.
Landau, a city of the Lower Alſace.
Lemnos, an iſle in the Ægean ſea.
Leſbos, an iſland of the Ægean ſea.
Leſley, an illuſtrious family of Scotland.
Leſtrygons, or rather Læſtrygons, a very brutal people.
Leucas, firſt a Peninſula, then an iſland.
Lewentz, a town of Hungary.
Loudun, an antient town in the Upper Poictou.
Lupercalia, a feaſt celebrated by the Romans.
Luxemburg, the capital city of the province of that name.
Macon, a city of Burgundy.
Mamillarians, a ſect among the Anabaptiſts.
Manducus, a name which the Romans gave to certain figures.
Manichees, an infamous ſect of Heretics.
Marcionites, a ſect of Heretics.
Mary, the Egyptian.
Mauſoleum, the name of a magnificent monument erected to Mauſolus.
Mecca, a town of Arabia.
Melchiorites, an imaginary ſect.
Metella, name of ſome Roman ladies.
Methydrium, a city of Peloponneſus.
Minutoli, perſons of this family.
Molionides, two brothers who have a good ſhare in the fabulous Hiſtory.
Montauban, a city of Guienne in Quercy.
Mopſus, perſons of this name.
Moſynians, or Moſynoecians, certain mountaineers in the neighbourhood of the Euxine ſea.
Motte, or Motthe (La) a town in Lorrain.
Naucratis, a city of Egypt.
Nymphodorus of Amphipolis, a Greek author.
Nully, perſons of this name.
Paraclete, an Abbey of Nuns founded by Abelard.
Parthenai, a city of Poitou.
Parthenai, a family.
Paulicians, a ſect of Heretics.
Pelias, the name of a lance.
Perga, a city of Pamphilia.
Pergamum, a city of Aſia in Myſia
Phaſelis, a ſea-town in Lycia.
Phaſis, a river that runs through Colchis into the Euxine ſea.
Philyra, daughter of Oceanus.
Picards, the followers of a certain Heretic.
Pithom, a city of Egypt.

Pozzuolo, a town in the kingdom of Naples.
Prætextatus (Papyrius) a Patrician of Rome.
Reckheim, a county, &c. of the empire.
Rigorists, a name given in the Spanish Netherlands, to the Jansenists, the Fathers of the Oratory, &c.
Roses, a town in Catalonia.
Rotterdam, a city of Holland.
Sadducees, a sect among the Jews.
Sancta-Maura, an island.
Salmacis, a fountain at Halicarnassus.
Scamander, a river of Phrygia near Troy.
Serbellone, an Italian family.
Sicyon, a town of Peloponnesus.
Synergists, a name given to certain Germ. Divines in the XVIth cent.
Siris, a river of Italy.
Sommona-codom, a name given by the Siamese to a certain extraordinary man.
Soubise, a town in Saintonge.
Stellingi, a name which certain Saxons took.
Teleboæ, a people who inhabited an island in the neighbourhood of Acarnania.
Telmessus, a sea-port town in the furthest part of Lycia.
Tenedos, an island in the Ægean sea.
Teos, one of the twelve cities of Ionia.
Termessus, a town of Pisidia.
Tettix, a native of Crete.
Thesmophoria, festivals celebrated in honour of Ceres, considered as a law-giver.
Tibarenians, a people of Asia.
Tibur, a city of Italy.
Tilli, or Thilli, a Lordship in Brabant.
Toulouse, a city of France.
Trabea (Quintus) a comic Poet.
Traerbach, a small town in the Palatinate.
Turlupins, a sect of impudent and scandalous Heretics.
Verona, a city of Italy.
Villena, a Marquisate on the confines of New Castille.
Ulm, an Imperial city.
Usson, a small town in Auvergne.
Westphalus (John) an imaginary person.
Zahuris, a name bestowed on a certain sort of men in Spain.
Zia, or Zea, an island of the Archipelago.

BRITISH MUSEUM

AN INDEX
Of the moſt
MATERIAL THINGS
Which are mentioned or explained in this Work.

For the uſe of this Index it muſt be obſerved, that the Roman numbers denote the volume, and the figures the page; when the figures ſtand alone they denote the text, and when they are followed by the letter a or b, they denote the firſt or ſecond column of the remarks: and if the letter n be added, it denotes ſome marginal note.

A.

ABBEY of St Denys, the court had ſo much the more authority over it, as the Monks thereof were debauched. I. 31. b.

Abbey. An Abbey given as a reward for a ſong. I. 428. n. (c.)

Abbots. Court-Abbots compared to lap-dogs. IV. 64. b.

Abbot (George) Archbiſhop of Canterbury; it was adjudged that an involuntary murther had not diſqualified him. I. 11, 12.

Abbreviators ought to have a good taſte. I. 74. b. Should not ſuppreſs ſingular facts. 422. b. 423. a. Often give us balderdaſh. II. 712. a. See Abridgments.

Abdera, a city of Thrace, where on certain days a perſon was devoted, and then ſtoned to death. I. 20. Its laws ſet a note of infamy upon thoſe who had ſpent their patrimony. II. 635. a.

Abderame compared to Alexander and Scipio in point of continence. I. 14. b. He did not plunder the city of Tours. II. 851. a. How he diſpoſed of the daughter of Eudo, Duke of Aquitain. IV. 283.

Abderites, the diſtemper which they had. I. 19. a. b. The opinion which they entertained of Democritus. 20. b. Whether they wrote to Hippocrates to deſire him to come and ſee Democritus. II. 638. a. What Cicero underſtands by an Abderite. 642. b.

Abderus, Hercules's favourite. I. 18. a.

Abdias's book the ſource of ſeveral fabulous ſtories. III. 577. b.

Abdiſſi, Patriarch of the Neſtorians, whether he aſſiſted at the Council of Trent. III. 359. a. b.

Abel (Leonard) is ſent to the Levant with the character of Apoſtolic Nuncio. III. 259. b. He compoſed a book concerning the ſtate of the Oriental Chriſtians. ibid.

Abelard, his turn of wit. I. 27. a. Vanity was his diſtinguiſhing foible. ibid. He had an inclination to retire among the Infidels in order to ſecure himſelf from the proſecutions of the Inquiſitors. 199. a. A catalogue of his manuſcripts. 248. b. the printing of which did him no honour. 249. a. A liſt of his particular ſentiments whether truly or falſely aſcribed to him. 759. a. He continues ſtill to be charged with the errors that were imputed to him. 760. a. b. St Bernard endeavours to prepoſſeſs all the world againſt him. 773. b. 774. a. His apology is laughed at. II. 533. b. His learning draws auditors to him from all parts. III. 70. a. He is reduced to indigence by women. 71. a. Suſtains an irreparable loſs. 73. a. His misfortune is lamented. 75. a. particularly by his wife, who goes the length to murmur againſt providence. ibid. b. The arguments made uſe of to comfort him were not all good ones. 73. b. Two of his aſſaſſins were puniſhed. 76. b. He would believe nothing but what was proved by natural reaſons. IV. 80. b. Is perſecuted, by whom, and for what. 469, 470. To whom we are indebted for the edition of his works. I. 248. and b. There are copies of them which carry the name of Francis d'Amboiſe, and others which carry that of Andrew Du Cheſne. 249. a. b.

Abenſperg. What name that city bore in the Roman Hiſtory. I. 548. a. b.

Abiram. It is pretended that the Pagans alluded to the ſtory of Corah, Dathan, and Abiram. I. 275. a.

Ablancourt (Fremont d') facts that concern him. IV. 589. b. 590. a. An examination into one of his notions, viz. that Princes ought to underſtand Latin. 590. b.

Ablancourt (Perrot d') reviſed ſix times the books he had a mind to publiſh. I. 487. b.

Abnepos, Grammarians are not agreed upon the ſignification of that word. II. 709. b.

Abortions, untimely or anticipated, are real murthers. IV. 500. a. Have been practiſed a great while. ibid.

Abortive children, or untimely births, how great their number is. IV. 498. b. 499. a. b. as far as 502. a.

Abrabanel, his books are full of venom againſt the Chriſtians. I. 43. b. His impious notion about the motive of God's forbidding our firſt parents to touch a certain fruit in the garden of Eden. II. 854. a.

Abraham, his diſſimulation. I. 37. a. b. Is the Patriarch of the Refugees. 44. a. It is ſaid that he became a converter. 45. a. Idle traditions touching the moſt conſiderable circumſtances of his life. 44. a. b. as far as 46. a. b. The print of his feet honoured by the Saracens. 124. a. He lies with Hagar in obedience to Sarah. V. 54. b. 55. a. He is falſely ſaid to have written the book of the creation. I. 173. a. Whether he authorized a law of Solon's touching marriage. II. 504. b. Whether he feared death more than any conjugal diſhonour. V. 50. b.

BRITISH MUSEUM

Abram (Father) his notes upon the paraphraſe of Nonnus. I. 47. b. He draws a ſtrange conſequence from a paſſage of Cicero, relating to the Lupercalia. III. 933. b.

Abridgments: The neceſſary qualities of a good abridgment. I. 510. b. It requires a very good diſcernment. 518. a. Advice to thoſe who write abridgments. II. 685. a. They would be found very faulty, if compared with the originals. 703. b. Abridgments and copiers of abridgments: great ſources of falſification. IV. 609. a.

Abſolution from the crimes of Fornication, Sodomy, Beſtiality: what it coſts. I. 628. a. b. An abſolution of a very rigorous kind. 96. b.

Abſtinence: It is poſſible that a man may abſtain long from eating and drinking. III. 582. b. Objections made to Laurence Joubert, touching the abſtinence of Moſes, Elias, and Jeſus Chriſt; his anſwer. ibid.

Abu-Gabſhan parts with a conſiderable employment for a bottle of wine. IV. 176. b.

Abuſes, in what caſe it is thought that they ſhould be tolerated in the Church. II. 374. a. When they have taken ſuch deep root that a Magiſtrate would only endanger his authority by oppoſing them, in that caſe they ought to be tolerated. V. 179. b. Monks and pariſh-prieſts at this day call for a reformation of abuſes, though they continue to be Catholics and great enemies to the Proteſtants. 68. b. The remedy of one abuſe is often-times the introduction of another. II. 106. b.

Abyſſins, why their Emperors have born the name of Preſtor-John. I. 36.

Academy; the founder of the middle or ſecond Academy. I. 409. a. The founder of the third followed the doctrine of the ſecond. II. 326. a. III. 697. a.

Academy (the French) injuriouſly treated. IV. 257. a. The Hiſtory of it has always been looked upon as a maſter-piece. 534. n. (b). A diſagreement between two liſts of its members. I. 627. b.

Acamas, the iſle of Cyprus had formerly that name. I. 53. a.

Acarie, Maſter of Accompts, called the Lacquey of the League, and for what reaſon. IV. 243. a.

Acarnanians, often at war with the Etolians. I. 55. Their generous policy. ibid.

Acatalepſia, ſee Incomprehenſibility.

Acciaioli, his daughters portioned for marriage at the public expence. I. 56.

Acciaiolus (Zenobius) his paraphraſe upon a poem of Marc Muſurus in praiſe of Plato. IV. 295. a.

Accidents, Peter d'Ailli explained them in the ſame manner as Des Cartes does. I. 166. a. The idea which Philoſophers give us of them. V. 221. a. b. They are not diſtinct from ſubſtances. III. 558. a. Their manner of ſubſiſting without a ſubject in the Euchariſt. IV. 59. a.

Acciſſare, or ἀκκίζεσθαι, the ſignification of that word. I. 63. a. b.

Accius (Lucius) his character. I. 60. b. 61. a. b.

Accords (the Sieur des) cited. I. 346. b. III. 762. b. IV. 157. a.

Accommodation: worſted Princes generally defer an accommodation with the victor as long as they can. V. 661.

Accords (des) an imaginary Lordſhip. I. 66. a. b.

Account; the firſt that was given of what had been ſaid was unfaithful. II. 852. a. which was a bad omen for the time to come. ibid.

Accurſius (Mariangelus); a paſſage of that author explained. I. 33. a. Why he called Salluſt his countryman. 69. a.

Accuſations; Some admirable heads of accuſation. I. 391. a. Who thoſe privileged perſons are that may accuſe with impunity. I. 758. a. b. 759. a. It is almoſt in vain to oppoſe reaſons drawn from probability to an accuſation that is attended with circumſtances of fact. II. 240. b. To accuſe people of ſtate-crimes an ordinary artifice with perſecutors. I. 30. a. It was not lawful to receive accuſations againſt thoſe who were abſent in the ſervice of the Republic. 351. II. 345. a. Whether a perſon is always obliged to repel accuſations in order to be reckoned innocent. I. 784. a. b. A ſure way of knowing whether they be ſlanderous. 795. a. b.

Accuſed. In certain caſes nothing can be concluded from the ſilence of accuſed perſons. I. 784. a. They ought to be believed, when they publickly deny things which may be eaſily proved, and which their adverſaries do not prove. IV. 217. b.

Accuſers meet with too much indulgence. I. 327. a. ought to undergo the puniſhment of retaliation when they accuſe falſely. ibid. Thoſe whom we have moſt reaſon to fear are the prieſts. 468. a. Profeſſed accuſers were hated among the Pagans, and that too at a time when accuſing gave young Advocates of quality an opportunity of exerciſing themſelves. II. 356. b. A reflexion upon that. ibid. Accuſers have at all times taken notice of the manner how people talk of news, in order to ground their accuſations thereupon. 627. a. The character of thoſe who make it their buſineſs to accuſe others of Hereſy. IV. 780. b. Very often make uſe of religion for a pretence. I. 307. a. If people were reaſonable they would make accuſers ſtand in awe of them. 780. a. Ought to be ſeverely puniſhed when they ſuborn domeſtics to depoſe againſt their maſters. II. 627. a. Are capable of doing any thing to make their adverſaries odious. V. 170. b. See Informers.

Achillea (a fountain ſo called), whether that word be a noun ſubſtantive or adjective. I. 86. b.

Achilles, that name was given equally to the champions of Venus, and to thoſe of Mars. I. 82. a.

Achilles appeared to Homer ſurrounded with ſo much glory, that he could not bear the ſplendor of it. I. 85. b. Birds ſwept the temple of Achilles every morning. 85. a. n. (20). Whether love made a part of his character. II. 140 a. b. He would not ſuffer any other Greek to ſhoot darts at Hector. III. 183. b. By what name he was called whilſt he wore woman's cloaths. IV. 659. a. How his deſigns upon Hemithea were prevented. V. 315. a. What was to be his deſtiny. ibid. a. b.

Achilleum Argumentum, what it ſignifies, and why. I. 82. b.

Achilleus Index (the) of Mr Drelincourt very much improved in the ſecond edition. II. 140. b.

Acidalius, why the Diſſertation intituled Mulieres non eſſe homines was aſcribed to him. I. 89. a.

Acontius, what has been ſaid of him and of his book of the ſtratagems of the Devil. I. 92. a. b. 93. a.

Acrotatus, the ingenuous acclamations with which the women and old men of Lacedemon followed him, as he was returning from the place where he had repulſed the enemies aſſaults. II. 523.

Act: An act that has been purloined from the records of the parliament of Paris. III. 297. b. 298. a.

Action of a Catholic gentleman the moſt ſingular and ſtrange that ever was known. II. 91. a. b.

Actions: We find examples of good actions in each country, age, and religion. I. 561. a.

Actions (human), the fear and love of God are not their only ſpring. V. 811.

Actions (remarkable) are aſcribed by the people ſometimes to one King, ſometimes to another. The ſame thing is practiſed with regard to ſaints. II. 770. b.

Actors on the ſtage, the advantage they have over Advocates. I. 61. b.

Acts of the Apoſtles and Apocalypſe in French rhyme calculated for the ſtage: a very uncommon work. II. 477. a. b. Acted at Paris in the year 1541. ibid. The undertakers and Bookſellers proſecuted. ibid. b. Extracts from that work. ibid. a. b. &c.

Acts (public): at what time they began to be drawn up in the vulgar tongue in France and Spain. II. 379. a. III. 97. a. and in Germany. ibid. They were made in Latin for ſeveral ages almoſt all over the weſt. II. 517. a. The Spaniards, Germans, and French, began very late to make uſe of their own language in thoſe writings. 518. b.

Actuarius, a particular dignity belonging only to the Phyſicians at the court of Conſtantinople. I. 99. a.

Acugna (Don Antonio d'), to what length his violence proceeded in the civil-war of Caſtille. IV. 456. a. b.

Adam, how long he continued in the ſtate of innocence. I. 22. a. b. Dreams of the Rabbins about his mourning for Abel's death, and divorcing himſelf from Eve's bed. 23. a and about his knowledge. 101. b. 102. a. What the Talmudiſts ſay of his ſtature. ibid. From whence proceeded his fall according to Agrippa. 154. Whether he was an Hermaphrodite. 102. a. b. II. 856. a. b. An hypotheſis which is not at all well calculated to juſtify the providence of God with reſpect to his fall.

857. a. What was his eſcutcheon. III. 27. b. His article in this Dictionary raiſes the indignation of divers perſons; the author's anſwer. I. 103. b. V.

Adam (Antonius ab): what that author was. V. 461. a. b.

Adam (Father), what he ſaid of St Auguſtin, and St Paul. I. 106. a. b. One of his ſermons gave occaſion to a jeſt. 108. b.

Adam (Melchior) cenſured for ſeveral anachroniſms. I. 139. a. He does not much examine what he compiles. V. 520. a. b.

Adamites, were calumniated. I. 111. b. Whether there be ſtill any ſuch in England and Italy. 112. a. b. Their error with reſpect to nakedneſs renewed, and carried to a more extravagant length in the XVth century. IV. 628. a. b. 629. a. b. Their uncleanneſſes. 784. a. b. 785. a. b.

Additions. It is difficult to make pertinent additions to a book. IV. 79. b.

Adeſora (Marques) a Preacher who converted a Mahometan by one of his ſermons. I. 326. n. (a).

Adiatorix baſely maſſacres a colony of the Romans. II. 532. b. But he is puniſhed for it by Auguſtus. ibid.

Adjectives, whether thoſe ending with an é maſculine, may be placed before their ſubſtantives. IV. 887. b. 888. a.

Adolphis, an Epic Poem dedicated to Chriſtina Queen of Sweden. III. 140. b. 141. a. b.

Adolphus of Naſſau choſen Emperor of Germany. V. 67. Killed in an engagement by Albert of Auſtria. ibid.

Adonijah, why Solomon cauſed him to be put to death. V. 803.

Adonis (the) of Cavalier Marini, cenſured and defended. I. 387. a.

Adonis, ſon to Cinyras by Metharme his wife. IV. 641. Or ſon to Cinyras by his own daughter. 642.

Adoptions, what the practice of them was in old times. I. 325. b. n. (10).

Adrian (Matthew) a converted Jew, was the firſt Profeſſor of the Hebrew tongue in the college of the three languages at Louvain. II. 236. b.

Adverſaria, that word ridiculouſly tranſlated Adverſaries, V. 43. a.

Adverſaries: An adverſary accuſed of a falſe doctrine cannot mortify his enemies more than by appearing quite different from their repreſentations. I. 654. b. One ought never to deny their good qualities by affecting an air of contempt for them. 696. b. Some people are concerned that they have not a ſufficient number of adverſaries. 339. b. People have always endeavoured to turn the perſon and doctrine of their adverſaries into ridicule. III. 698. b. It is prudent, when one gets the better of them, to be ſatisfied with a moderate advantage. 972. b. Authors hardly ever conſult their writings. IV. 637. a. b. 638. a. See Antagoniſt.

Adverſaries in point of religion, a perſon ſhould never make a merit of their hatred. II. 695. b. Why he ſhould not. ibid.

Adverſity, the unſettled way in which people have reaſoned upon adverſity and proſperity. IV. 194. a. Falſe conſequences that are drawn from adverſity and proſperity. 55. a. b. 216. a. The manner in which adverſity is accounted for, makes the condition of human life incomprehenſible. 468. b.

Advice: it is dangerous to give advice about public affairs. IV. 795. a.

Advocates: who is their idol. I. 66, 67. They are ſubject to contradict themſelves and for what reaſon, 351. b. 352. a. II. 626. a. b. IV. 805. a. It is even a privilege which Cicero allows them. I. 352. b. The humorous anſwer of an advocate touching the bad cauſes which he had taken upon him to plead. 224. b. Their buſineſs is more difficult than that of preachers. 61. b. Their labours avail nothing againſt the raſhneſs of a corrupt judge. 224. What Ammianus Marcellinus ſays againſt thoſe of his time. 226. a. b. They lay hold of every thing which they think advantageous to their cauſe. II. 343. b. The diſadvantage which modern advocates lie under, when compared with thoſe of antiquity. 724. b. Their qualities deſcribed in verſe. 309. a. b. 310. a. An advocate refuſes to charge himſelf with the intereſts of the Ducheſs of Angoulême at the time of her difference with the Conſtable of Bourbon. 761.

Adultery, whether it may be innocently committed to ſave the life of an huſband or wife. I. 91. a. b. In what manner the antient Romans puniſhed women that were taken in the fact. 592. a. b. And by whom that cuſtom was aboliſhed. ibid. Adultery wiſhed for by way of imprecation. II. 247. b. The encouragement people have to commit that crime. V. 17. a. b. How common it is. 425. a. b. Reflexions upon a trial for adultery. 112. a. b. 113. a. b. A very odd kind of puniſhment that was antiently inflicted on adulterers. I. 191. a. b. And which ſerves to explain a paſſage of Catullus. ibid. How thoſe were puniſhed that were taken in the very fact. III. 74. a. b. Adulteries puniſhed with death at Orleans, and the reflexions which people about court made upon that puniſhment. V. 17. a. What puniſhment the Roman laws inflicted upon thoſe that were guilty of it. 113. a. b. A plant that hindered women from committing adultery. IV. 610. a. b.

Æneid, a diſtich on the order which Virgil gave to burn it. I. 375. a. b.

Ædeſius gives a governour of Egypt a box on the ear. III. 445. a. b.

Ælii, the Antonini, Emperors of Rome were deſcended from that houſe. III. 711. a.

Æra (Chriſtian) a new beginning which a Viſionary gives it. II. 123. a.

Ætius, the method he followed in explaining the Catechiſm. I. 472. a.

Ætna, a city built by Hiero King of Syracuſe. II. 823. a. 825. b.

Affairs, what ſort of people great affairs require. I. 178, 179. a. There are few great affairs but what owe their ſucceſs as much, at leaſt, to the miſconduct of one of the parties, as to the prudence of the other. 588. a. To excel both in learning and the tranſaction of affairs is a very rare talent. II. 314. b.

Affairs of State, there are perſons who render you ſuſpected if you differ from them on theſe affairs. I. 681. a. Savonarola meddled too much with ſtate affairs, and ruined himſelf thereby. V. 61. b. 62. a.

Africa, a deſign to ſend ſome perſons ſecretly there to inform themſelves of the ſtate of Chriſtianity. III. 527. a.

Agamede, according to the Scholiaſt on Theocritus was the ſame with Perimede. IV. 585.

Agamemnon, his amorous diſpoſition makes one queſtion the truth of his having obſerved the oath which he made to Achilles. II. 139. a.

Agathion, his diſcernment with reſpect to a veſſel of milk that was preſented to him. II. 636. b. Philoſtratus called him a Diviner upon that account. ibid.

Agathocles, plunders and ravages the iſlands of Corfu and Ithaca, the ridiculous reaſon he gives for it. I. 54. b.

Agathon: ſome of his ſentences. I. 126. a.

Age, women are not the only perſons that conceal it. III. 177. a. It is the only only thing which they never tell. 309. a. n. (8). Princeſſes cannot conceal their age. IV. 333. a. The extent of its autumn, and when a man is in the winter of life. I. 125. b. IV. 163. a.

Ages. Our age is almoſt as eaſy to be impoſed upon as any whatſoever. I. 7. b. In every age they can hardly believe what Hiſtorians ſay of antient times, if it is too remote from the modern cuſtoms. II. 710. a.

Ageſilaus, deſpiſed by the Egyptians on account of his ſmall ſtature. V. 278. a. b. 279. a. b. Why his ſtratagems of war did not ſucceed. IV. 654. n. (9). He lived in great ſimplicity. I. 130. a. The theory of that Prince. ibid. b. 131. a. He was rather willing that the Perſians ſhould break the truce. 131. a. What anſwer he made to the perſon that ſurpriſed him riding on a hobby-horſe. ibid. He regrets the loſs of Ageſipolis. 134. a. b. A fine anſwer that Ageſilaus made. 130. b. He is compared with Conon. 550. a. b.

Ageſipolis. II. what anſwer that Prince made to thoſe who told him that he had been an hoſtage. I. 133. b.

Ageteridas goes to Memphis, and on what errand. I. 208. b.

Agis, is the firſt King of Lacedæmon, who was put to death in the city. I. 273. a.

Agnes, widow to Henry III. A queſtion which ſhe put to Peter Damianus. III. 80. b.

Agnus Caſtus, what the virtue of that herb is, and why it was ſtrewed on the beds of the Greek women, during certain ſolemn rites. V. 334. a. b. Its virtue not near ſo great as that of the plant Leucophillus. IV. 610. b.

Agreda (Mary d') extracts from a pamphlet touching the condemnation of her book. I. 137. b. 138. a.

Aggreſſor. Whether in perſonal reproaches he ſhould ſuffer the defendants writings to go without an anſwer. I. 697. a. The aggreſſor is not he who gives the firſt blow, but he who prepares to give it. II. 104 a. Puffendorf's opinion in this point. ibid. According to John Bouchet and the Baron du Villars, this was the caſe of Henry II, with Charles V. ibid.

Agricola (John) was founder of the Antinomian ſect. I. 140. Was one of thoſe who drew up the Interim. 141.

Agricola (Rodolph) dedicates his Latin verſion of the Axiochus of Plato to Rodolph Langius. III. 725.

Agrigentum, at what time and by whom that city was founded. III. 157. a. In what condition it was when the Romans ſettled there. ibid. b. What the qualities of it's ſalt were, and what uſe St Auguſtin made of thoſe qualities. ibid. and 158. a. To what a pitch the devout zeal of the inhabitants for the ſtatue of Hercules roſe. 158. b.

Agrippa (Henry Cornelius) had not much credit with the Devil. I. 148. b. He at firſt looked upon Luther as a deliverer of the oppreſſed. 149. b. Was not for the raiſing of altar againſt altar. 155. a. Foretold that the conſtable of Bourbon would ſtill be victorious in the year 1526. For which he was diſgraced. 147. b. 148. a. Sutcliffe charges him with having ſpoke diſhonourably of Sixtus IV. V. 164. b.

Agrippina wife to Germanicus, what ſhe ſaid of the orator Afer. I. 120. a. Overcame the weakneſs of her own ſex, by imitating the fortitude of the other. 523. a. An encomium which a Roman Hiſtorian has beſtowed upon her. II. 757. a. She wanted to marry a ſecond huſband. ibid. b. What Tiberius ſaid to her. IV. 143. b.

Agrippina, Nero's mother, all her rivals with the Emperor Claudius were reduced to two. III. 860. a. She cauſed one of them to be murthered in her exile. 861. b.

Agrippina, a piece writ by Cirano Bergerac, which was ſuppreſſed on account of ſome impieties which he had inſerted in it. II. 825. a.

Agropoli (the Marquis of) particulars that concern him. V. 467. a. b.

Aguirre (Cardinal d') writ againſt the deciſions of the Clergy of France aſſembled in the year 1682. I. 157. a. b. His zeal for the court of Rome raiſed him from being a ſimple Monk to the dignity of a Cardinal. ibid. b.

Ajax, what anſwer he made to his father who recommended to him that he ſhould pray to God. I. 160. b. Invoked by the Greeks. 161. b. He and his ſon were extremely honoured by the Athenians. V. 304. His deſcendants were not very illuſtrious. ibid. b. His ſtature was like unto Saul's. I. 160.

Ajax (the Locrian) in what manner the crime which he committed upon Caſſandra was expiated by the Locrians. II. 340. a. b.

Ayeſha, the Hiſtory of that woman. IV. 48. a. b.

Ailli (Peter d') bigotted to judicial Aſtrology. I. 164. b. 165. a. He condemned ſeveral tenets of the Church of Rome. 165. b.

Aymar (James) relies upon the virtue of his wand. I. 7. a. b. 8. a. b. 9. a. b. Confounded at the palace of Condé, where he confeſſes his impoſture. 7. b. reflexions thereupon. 8. b. 9. a.

Air is the principle of all things according to ſome Philoſophers. II. 672. a. b. III. 649. b. 650. a. b.

Akiba is accuſed of having altered the Hebrew text of the Bible. I. 173. a.

Alamanni (Lewis or Aloïſio) III. 90. a. IV. 11. b.

Alarcon charged with the perſon of Francis I, after his being taken priſoner at the battle of Pavia. III. 97. b.

Alba (The Duke of) his anſwer to Henry II. II. 444. a. A mark of his fierceneſs. III. 274. b. 275. a. b.

Albert (the Archduke) the author of his Hiſtory printed at Cologne in the year 1693 ſhews very little exactneſs. II. 128. a. b.

Albertus Magnus, it is ſaid that his body was preſerved from putrefaction. I. 183. b. He was ſo little that he was thought to be on his knees, while he was really ſtanding. 184. a. His ſagacity made him diſcover the miſ-conduct of his ſervant maid by the tone of her voice. II. 636. b.

Albertus (Leander) his deſcription of Italy. III. 693. a. When it was publiſhed. IV. 165. b.

Albigenſes, it is not true that they were Manichees. IV. 97.

Albret (a certain Lord) killed in his tent, in the arms of his miſtreſs. IV. 302. a.

Albret (Joan d') Queen of Navarre: Garaſſe ſharply cenſured for publiſhing the tale of her Tapeſtry. III. 134. It was affirmed that he had caſt groſs reflexions on that Princeſs, but he cleared himſelf from that charge. ibid.

Albunea, a goddeſs worſhipped by the Heathens. V. 350. b. 351. a. b.

Alcaçar, whether it is a village, a borough, or a town. IV. 382. a.

Alcadenus, Profeſſor of Philoſophy and Phyſic; ſeveral Princes deſired very much to have him. IV. 763. a.

Alcæus in deſcribing his houſe ſpeaks of nothing but helmets and bucklers. I. 426. b.

Alcander (the Great) the Hiſtory of his amours printed with notes. II. 245. b.

Alciatus (Andrew) united polite Literature with the Civil Law. I. 67. a. In what manner he juſtified himſelf as to his inconſtant humour 195. a. He learned by the action of a peaſant the ſenſe of a paſſage of Plautus. III. 154. b. He talks pretty freely of the Pope, in a letter to one of his friends. III. 590. b. 591. a. His miſtake as to the time when Marc Antony harneſſed a ſet of lions. 960. a. He never was Profeſſor of the Civil Law at Milan. V. 139. b.

Alcibiades, by whom he was recalled to Athens. II. 571. a. He was always attended by two concubines. III. 703. a. He was the greateſt lover of pleaſures in the world, and the readieſt to quit them when the exigency of his affairs required it. 414. a.

Alcinoi Menſa and Alcinoi Apologus, are two different proverbs. I. 201. a.

Alcmena, the ſtory went that ſhe diſappeared during the ceremony of her funerals, and that the Thebans paid her divine honours. I. 208. She wore three moons on her forehead, and for what reaſon. 284. a. She is a very fit example to prove that a ſincere ignorance is a good excuſe. 206. a. Upon what conditions ſhe offers herſelf for a wife. V. 306, 307, 308. Different opinions on that head. 307. b. 308. a. b.

Alcoran, it's text corrected by Bibliander. I. 801. b. The veneration which the Turks have for it. IV. 41. a. b. Whether Mahomet declared to ſome, that only the third part of it was true. 47. a. After what manner it was compoſed. ibid. It's chapter of the Elephant. 177. a. Revealed in one night to Mahomet at Mecca. I. 326. a. Compoſed in twenty years. ibid. Tranſlated into the language of Arragon. 326. Andrew du Ryer's French tranſlation of it cenſured by Windet. IV. 872. b. The Engliſh tranſlation which is made upon the French one is alike faulty. ibid.

Alcoran of the Cordeliers, adorned with marginal notes: What it is. III. 82. a. b.

Alcyonée, a tragedy very much eſteemed. IV. 873. b. 874. a.

Aldegonde (the Sieur de Sainte) receives a commiſſion to go upon a new tranſlation of the Bible into the Dutch tongue. II. 705. a.

Adhelme (Saint) in what manner he mortified his luſt. III. 80. a. b. And how he likewiſe expoſed himſelf to danger, to make the Devil mad. ibid. What he required of one of his devotees, in order to make trial of himſelf. 280. b.

Aldobrandin (Thomas) commits three faults in ſpeaking of the temple of Venus Lamia. III. 715. b.

Aleander (Cardinal) whether he was a Jew. I. 215. a. b. 216. a.

Alegambe (Father) publiſhes a falſhood touching Theodorus Beza. I. 726. a. Commits a fault for which

Mr Ogier ſhould have demanded reparation. III. 133. b. Alegambe and his continuator were ignorant of the diſguiſes which a writer of their order made uſe of. 657. a. b. Alegambe is not always ſo exact as people imagine. IV. 76. a. b. He does not ſuppreſs what may enhance the birth and riches of the writers of his order. I. 747. a. is confuſed in his computations. ibid.

Alençon (The Duke of) there was a prodigious antipathy between him and the King his brother. III. 407. b. 408. a. He is put upon very wicked deſigns by two of his favourites. IV. 935. a. b.

Alethæus (Theophilus) a fictitious name which Lyſerus borrowed. III. 973.

Alexandra (a Statue) why ſo called. II. 342. b.

Alexandra, a Poem that has very much exerciſed the Critics. III. 957. a. b.

Alexander the Great, his anſwer to the perſon that offered him the lyre of Paris. I. 83. a. A fine anſwer which he made to a Queen who ſent him delicious refreſhments. 100. He is alarmed on the propoſals of Pexodares's Ambaſſador. ibid. b. He deſires to ſee and honour the tomb of Ajax. 161. a. Whether he was chaſte. 366. b. Whether he was treated by Apelles in the manner as is pretended ibid. and 367. a. b. He was very ſuperſtitious, and put an extreme confidence in ſoothſayers. 447. a. His ſoothſayer did him more ſervice than any of his generals. ibid. He ſometimes lends a helping hand to the ſoothſayers, in order to make their predictions ſucceed. ibid. Sometimes alſo he diſregards them. ibid. b. One ought not to be too much ſurprized at his ſuperſtition. ibid. He acquired no ſmall ſkill both in the theory and practice of Phyſic. 465. a. Whether in the like ſituation others would have done no leſs than he. II. 414. a. b. Democritus could not have laughed at him. 637. a. He ſaid that if he was not Alexander he would wiſh to be Diogenes. 666. b. Had once a deſign of returning into Europe, and upon what occaſion. III. 356. b. Had books ſent him into Aſia, and particularly the productions of the Poets. ibid. Whether he had drank the cup of Herules when he fell ſick. 428. a. b. The thought which he made uſe of to comfort the King his father afflicted with a wound that he had received in a battle 485. b. He draws theſe words from the mouth of the Prieſteſs of Delphi, My ſon, thou art invincible. 568. b. By what invention his tutor made himſelf agreeable. 973. a. b. The oppoſition between his character and that of his father. IV. 8. a. b. Whether he could have any reaſons for ſuppreſſing miracles that had been wrought in his favour. 607. b. 608. a. b. In what other Kings endeavoured to imitate him. 660. b. 661. a. He ruins Perſepolis. V. 320. a. b. A reflexion upon his birth-day. III. 59. a. b. V. 360. a. He expended fourſcore thouſand talents upon learning the properties of animals. 351. b. He deprives Cleophis of her kingdom, enjoys her, and ſettles her again upon the throne. II. 523.

Alexander, King of the Indies, ſon to Alexander the Great by Cleophis. II. 523. a. b.

Alexander Severus (Emperor) had the image of Apollonius in the ſame place where that of Jeſus Chriſt was. I. 381. a. He had in his chapel the images of Apollonius, Jeſus Chriſt, Abraham, Orpheus, &c. and practiſed religious ceremonies in honour of them. ibid. b. Encolpius's Hiſtory of that Emperor is not extant. II. 770. An impoſter pretends to have tranſlated it from the Greek. ibid. a. He aſſociates to the empire Ovinius Camillus, who had aſpired to it, and who renounces it. ibid. a. b.

Alexander VI (Pope) loſes his life, by drinking of the poiſon which he had cauſed to be prepared for another. III. 321. a. There was in him neither truth, nor faith, nor religion. 765. b. Journal of his life. V. 757. He had like to have been cruſhed to death on St Peter's day. II. 472. a. b. He orders Mancinellus's tongue to be cut out, and his hands to be cut off. IV. 89. Cauſes Lorenzo to be thrown into the Tyber. 90. b. His conduct with reſpect to Savonarola, &c. V. 61. b. 62. a. b. & ſequent.

Alexander VII (Pope) a ſtory that is told about his religion. II. 474. b. 475. a. He diſapproves the Duke of Savoy's conduct towards the Vaudois. 475. b. He ſpeaks to ſome Engliſh gentlemen with a great deal of good-nature. ibid. He preaches up to them maxims which Mr Jurieu has praiſed, without foreſeeing that he ſhould one day oppoſe them 476. a. It is pretended that he was related to the Grand Signior. ibid. He was baſely deceived by three Dutch Bookſellers whom he had brought to Rome. ibid. b. He died much more lamented by the Jeſuits than by the Janſeniſts. 476.

Alexander (Natalis) the character of his Theologie Morale V. 853.

Alexandria: the feaſt of Adonis was celebrated there in the time of St Cyril. I. 116. a. It's ſchool deprav'd by the vain ſubtilties of the diſputants. 268. Reſtored to a wonderful luſtre by Ammonius. ibid. A Heathen Philoſopher teaches there openly the eternity of the world in the VIth century. 270. b. The inhabitants thereof ſend Embaſſadors to Caligula to complain againſt the Jews. 374. It's chronicle gives us a pleaſant chimera touching the daughter of Aquila. III. 316. b. 317. a.

Alfonſines. Aſtronomical tables, who the author of that work is, and what it coſt. II. 379. a.

Alhazen, what he writ on the twilight, joined to Father Nonius's treatiſe upon the ſame ſubject. IV. 382. b.

Alypius, inſtead of perſuading St Auguſtin to live ſingle, ſuffers himſelf to be perſuaded to marry. I. 563. a. b. The character of his diſpoſition of mind. II. 401. a. n. *.

Allatius, no man ever carried the power of the Pope a greater length than he. I. 231. The pleaſant reaſon he gave to Pope Alexander VII, why he did not take orders. ibid. b. The character which Mr Claude, Mr Simon, and Mr Sallo give him. ibid. a. b. 232. a.

Alliance. A monſtous alliance between the worſhip of the gods and the moſt filthy paſſions. I. 597. a. b.

Alliances, reflexions on thoſe that are entred into with Heretics or Infidels. I. 407. a. b. The mutual reproaches which the French and Spaniards beſtow upon one another, on account of their entring into alliances with Heretics. II. 338. a. The Pope may with a ſafe conſcience make uſe of Infidel ſoldiers. ibid. a.

Allix declares that Antichriſt ſhall periſh either in the year 1716, 1720, or 1736. II. 125. b.

Allum, whether there be a virtue in Allum to make wood incombuſtible. I. 424. a. b.

Alluſions: ridiculous alluſions borrowed from a paſſage of St Bernard. I. 492. a.

Almachius (St) killed by the Gladiators. I. 230. b. It is nevertheleſs conjectured that he is an imaginary ſaint, and for what reaſon. 230. b. 231. a. b.

Almanack, that word being abridged was taken for a man's name, and the man ſuppoſed to be a martyr. I. 230. b. 231. a. b.

Almanack. Leon Morgard condemned to the gallies, on account of the predictions which he had put in his Almanack. III. 955. b. The contempt which the Phyſician Sylvius expreſſed for the Almanack. V. 138. a.

Almanon Calif, diſturbs the devotion of the Muſſulmen V. 286. By what means. ibid.

Almoner, at what time the title of the King's Great Almoner, and that of the Great Almoner of France, began to take place. II. 393. a. When and upon what occaſion the Great Almoners of France were created, in virtue of their office, commanders of the order of the Holy Ghoſt. I. 258. b.

Alms, bad reaſons to excuſe one's ſelf from giving any. II. 110. a. b. 112. a. b.

Almucheſi, a looking-glaſs, what the virtue of it is. I. 598.

Aloïſia Sigæa Toletana, the book compoſed under her name is abſolutely to be condemned. V. 837.

Alopo (Pandolfo) is beheaded, and for what reaſon. IV. 306. b.

Alphonſo King of Naples, how far he expreſſed his eſteem for Ovid. IV. 433. a.

Alphonſus X, King of Caſtile, the cenſure which he is ſaid to have paſſed on the works of God. II. 379. b. 380. a.

Alphonſus, two Kings of that name have been confounded, and ſeveral things taken from the one and aſcribed to the other. II. 381. a. But neither of theſe took the pains to compile the Law-book or Code. 380. b. 381. a.

Alſace, whether the free towns of that province could have continued to hold immediately of the empire, under the protection or guardianſhip of a King of France. III. 717. b. 718. a.

Altieri (Cardinal) was greatly concerned when he received the news of the conqueſts which Lewis XIV made upon the United Provinces. II. 758. b.

Altieri: Cardinals of that name. I. 237.

Altingius, a ready reply which he made. I. 240. a. His ſhift compared to that of St Athanaſius. ibid.

Alviano (Bartholomew d'): Navagiero goes to the wars with him, and compoſes his Funeral Oration. IV. 315.

Amadæus Guimenius, who the author of that book was. IV. 833. b.

Amadis; the reading of the Amadis inclines one to laſciviouſneſs. I. 65. b.

Amalricus Augerii, what he ſays of the She-Pope. IV. 739. a.

Amama (Sixtinus) proves Roſweide to be in an error. II. 150. b.

Amand Flavien, the fictitious name of an author. II. 27.

Amantius, the praiſes which he beſtows on Capriata. II. 309. a. b. 310. a.

Amaſæus (Romulus) has miſunderſtood a paſſage of Pauſanias touching the epitaph of Æſchylus. II. 826. a.

Amaſis, the tranſmigration of his ſoul into the body of a lion. I. 382.

Amaſtris, the Hiſtory of that Princeſs. II. 676. a. b. And of the town which bore her name. ibid. b. 677. a. b.

Amaulry, an Heretic condemned at Paris, and for what reaſon. I. 103. a. His doctrine touching the reunion of the two ſexes. ibid. A reflexion upon that head. ibid. b.

Amauri, King of Jeruſalem, aſſiſts Dorgan. IV. 383.

Amazons, their impiety puniſhed by Achilles. I. 85. b. 86. a.

Ambition confounded for being too refined. II. 737. a. b. The want of it often proves the beſt ſanctuary. III. 438. a. It ſtifles all natural affection. 647. a.

Ambitious: The ambitious live in a ſtate of ſervitude. II. 427. b.

Amboiſe (Adrian d') publiſhes his father's treatiſe of devices. I. 248. a. His moral devices. ibid. His other works. ibid.

Amboiſe (Francis d') is miſtaken when he fancies that Accurſius ſpoke of Abelard. I. 32. b. 33. a.

Ambres caſtle: it is not true that Francis I. was carried to that place. III. 97. a. The Mareſchal de Villeroi is ſhut up there. ibid. b.

Ambroſe (St) his apology for the conduct of Sarah and Abraham. V. 55. a. In what manner he treated Theodoſius. I. 593. a. b.

Ambroſians, a title which ſome ſorcerers of Nancy in Lorrain gave themſelves. III. 126. a.

Ambrun. The Archbiſhop of Ambrun preſents a petition to the King againſt the Janſeniſts. IV. 765. a.

Amé II, Count of Savoy, a piece of Hiſtory concerning him. I. 739. a. b.

Amelot tranſlates a paſſage of Father Paul ill. III. 499. b. 500. a.

America, the firſt voyage that was made into that part of the world, under the protection of France. III. 783. a. b.

Americans, the depravity of their manners. III. 773. a. b. 774. a. b.

Amynias, how he touched the judges that were ready to condemn his brother. II. 824. b.

Amyntas, what he did in favour of Antony, and how he was rewarded for it. II. 628. a.

Amyot miſleads Vigenere in explaining a paſſage of Plutarch. I. 75. b. Whether he changed his religion. 260. a. b. He is cenſured for tranſlating ſome paſſages of Plutarch ill. II. 14. b. 486. a. b. III. 56. a. What occaſioned his being made Great Almoner of France. III. 323. b. He does not underſtand a paſſage of Plutarch touching Laïs. 705. b. Nor another paſſage of Plutarch where mention is made of Lyſimachus. 713. b. n. (12).

Amyraut is reconciled to his moſt violent oppoſers. I. 261. b. 262. a. n. (9). His reſolution in withſtanding an Arrêt of the Council of State. 265. b. He was much eſteemed by the Duke of Longueville. II. 475. a. A great imitator of Cameron. 288. b. 289. a.

Ammianus Marcellinus; Mariangelus Accurſius pretends to have corrected five thouſand faults in that Hiſtorian. I. 69. Quoted. 228. a. b. Ridicules the Advocates of his time. 226. a. b. Is cenſured for confounding one Mopſus with another. IV. 253. a.

Ammonius, an excellent maſter in Philoſophy. IV. 688.

Ammonius Saccas, upon what account he was called Theodidactus. I. 269. a. All his works are loſt, if we may believe Henry Valeſius. 270. a.

Amours of the royal palace, an order to buy up all the copies of that book, and to burn them upon the ſpot. IV. 506. b. Whether Buſſi-Rabutin be the author of it. V. 753. b. 754. a.

Amphiaraus was called the royal Prophet. I. 278. a. He won the prize in a horſe-race by the fall of Polynices. 446. a. b.

Amphilochus was both a King and a Prophet. I. 281.

Amphitheatre of honour, a book againſt the royal authority, wrote by a Jeſuit. I. 220. b.

Amphytrion: The Amphytrion of Moliere ſurpaſſes that of Plautus. I. 283. a. Obſervations upon the piece which bears that name. V. 308. a. b. 309. a. b.

Amurath cauſes Fakreddin to be ſtrangled in his own preſence. III. 4.

Anabaptiſm, the reaſons of the great progreſs which it has made. I. 287. a. The beginning of its fury. II. 83. a. b. A woman of that ſect makes a judicious reflexion. IV. 852. a. b.

Anabaptiſts refuted by a Proteſtant writer in the ſame manner as the Catholics refute the Proteſtants. I. 287. a. b. Reaſons why they are tolerated in the United-Provinces. 288. b. 289. a. They are charged with an extravagant doctrine. 290. a. b. The anſwer they return, when aſked what would become of the magiſtracy, if all the world was of their opinion. III. 313. a. Who was their firſt Patriarch in the Netherlands and Lower Germany. 481. b. They are very rigid in their morals. IV. 86. a. b. 87. a. Certain Fanatics among them had a mind to renew the extravagancies of the Adamites, and were put to death for it. 628. a. b.

Anchoret (an) who boaſts that he had ſeen the place where heaven and earth touch one another. IV. 678. a.

Anachroniſms, moſt of the elogies of illuſtrious men are full of them. II. 403. b. The Annaliſts themſelves are not always exempt from them. ibid.

Anacreon, his diſſolute life excuſed by le Fevre. I. 675. a. b. His ſtatue placed near that of Xanthippus in the citadel of Athens. V. 48. a. Of what country he was. 316. b.

Anagrams, who was the firſt reſtorer of them. II. 618. And where he found the pattern. ibid.

Anarchy: There is a ſource of anarchy in the ſtate of man, which can never be wholly rectified. I. 499. a.

Anaſtaſius the Library-keeper: It does not appear that he has mentioned the She-Pope. IV. 725. a. b. 726. a. b. That fable has been foiſted into the manuſcripts of his Hiſtory. 725. a. b. Blondel obſerved that they were the very words of Martinus Polonus. ibid. b. Sarravius obſerved that in the manuſcript of the King's library the ſtory of the She-Pope was an additional piece. 726. a. It is only told there by an it is ſaid, that, &c. ibid. An examination into what Salmaſius, ſaid touching an edition of that author publiſhed by the Jeſuits of Mayence. ibid. b. 727. a. b.

Anatomy, a doubt propoſed to Caſuiſts touching a curious point of Anatomy. I. 109. a.

Anaxagoras, his indifference about the good things of this world. I. 294. a. b. II. 635. b. His doctrine touching the firſt formation of men and animals. I. 296, 297. a. b. 414. a. b. 415. a. b. His falſe ſuppoſition in eſtabliſhing Homogeneities. 303. a. b. 304. a. b. 305. a. b. He was ſirnamed νȣς, or the mind. 297. b. His ſentiments explained. 298. a. b. He was the firſt who ſuppoſed that an intelligence was the efficient cauſe of the world. 299. a. b. 300. a. b. Was ſirnamed the Atheiſt. 301. b. His doctrine of the Homœomeriæ is full of contradictions. 303. a. b. 304. a. b. 305. a. b. He was accuſed of impiety, and in danger of being ſtoned as an Atheiſt. 307. a. b. IV. 566. b. His witty ſayings. I. 308. a. b. He ſuffers perſecution for having dogmatized againſt the popular opinions. II. 864. He taught a rational religion, while he explained by natural reaſons what appeared extraordinary. IV. 565. a. He is accuſed of irreligion, under pretence that he explained meteors by philoſophical reaſons. 579. b.

Anaximenes, his hypotheſis corrected. I. 302. a. b. 303. a. He taught that the air was the principle of all things. III. 649. b.

Ancients, a great many of them gave no credit to fables. I. 76. a. They had not variety enough of invention. 115. b. A controverſy which has been raiſed of late years, about the ſuperiority or inferiority of the Ancients. 283. a. If they were to come back to the world, they would ſee that many things were ſuppoſed to be contained in their books, which they never dreamt of. 462. a. b. A reflexion upon the compariſon between the Antients and Moderns. II. 553. a. b. How people come to be ſo ready to praiſe and ſupport the Ancients. IV. 414. b. The difference between them and the Moderns, with reſpect to comedies. 743. a. b. The diſeaſe of admiring only them prevailed no leſs formerly than now. V. 492. b.

Ancre (the Marſhal d'), a paſſage cited out of his trial. I. 397. b. 398. a. Feigned by Malherbe the Poet to be curſed by the god of the Seine. II. 543. a.

Ancyranum Monumentum, a moſt curious and inſtructive inſcription, but not entire. II. 231. a.

Andlo (Daniel ab) his book againſt Samuel des Marets. I. 322.

Andradius, his book very ſcarce, is nevertheleſs very often quoted. I. 324. a. The reaſon of it. ibid.

Andreas (James) attacked by Hemmingius. III. 391. A great promoter of Ubiquitiſm. ibid.

Andreas (Valerius) cenſured with reſpect to Buſbequius and his embaſſies. II. 230. b. He is miſtaken in the title of a book which he aſcribes to Badius. I. 602. b.

Andreis, a province of Bœotia ſo called from Andreus, the ſon of the river Peneus. IV. 626. a. It was afterwards named Phlegyantis. ibid.

Andrinople, built by Oreſtes whoſe name it bore. I. 331. a. b.

Androgynes, thoſe of Plato a kind of Hermaphrodites. I. 102. b. What they were, what they attempted, and what became of them. V. 6. a. b. 7. a.

Androïs, what it was. I. 182. b. 183. a. A word abſolutely unknown, and invented by Naudé. 184. b.

Andromache, a tragedy fit to kill players. I. 333. a.

Andromachus, founder of a city in Sicily. V. 357. a.

Andromeda, a tragedy of Euripides. I. 19. a.

Andronicus (Emperor), what he did to upbraid the inhabitants of Conſtantinople with their wives leudneſs. III. 631. b.

Anean (Bartholomew) is killed in a religious tumult. III. 624. b.

Anecdotes, what their ſources are. I. 361. a. A curious fact for ſuch as are fond of them. 724. a. b.

Angelocrater, there was little honour to be got by confuting him, and for what reaſon. III. 388. b. He publiſhes in 1601 a piece on Chronology, and is deputed in 1618 to the Synod of Dort. IV. 731. a.

Angels, there were two ſorts of bad angels according to Athenagoras. I. 532. b. Nothing can be more needleſs than to diſpute, whether they form unto themſelves an human body when they appear. V. 215. a. b.

Angels (tutelar or guardian) the doctrine of the Heathens concerning them. II. 249. b. 250. a. And of ſome Proteſtants. III. 595. a. b. The doctrine of theſe angels antienter than the Chriſtian religion. IV. 689. b. 690. a.

Angerone, a goddeſs that was the patroneſs of Silence. V. 184. b.

Angers, the corruption of that city. III. 60.

Angevin (the) or the little Angevin, John Maugin was thus ſirnamed. IV. 173. A ſign of his mean extraction. ibid. a. b.

Angevin. Who was the moſt learned Angevin. III. 308. b.

Anglara, a town in Tuſcany which Thuanus confounds with one in the Milaneze called Angleria. II. 294. a. Quenſtedt is almoſt guilty of the ſame miſtake. ibid. n. (2).

Angoulême (the Ducheſs of), at the time of the difference between her and the Conſtable of Bourbon, an Advocate in the Parliament of Paris refuſed to charge himſelf with her intereſts. II. 761.

Anicetus, his baſeneſs and villany. IV. 399. a.

Animals, how they were produced according to Anaxagoras and Archelaus. I. 296. 415, 416. III. 650. a. b.

Anjou (Fulk Rechin, Earl of): his wife leaves him. III. 62. a. He makes a thouſand mean ſubmiſſions to her. ibid. b.

Anjou (Charles of) created King of Naples and Sicily by the Pope, did not obtain the peaceable poſſeſſion of them, till he had defeated Manfred and Conradin. IV. 300. a.

Annaliſt, it is proper that he ſhould have ſeveral copies of his annals, and that he ſhould lodge ſome of them in the hands of his friends. II. 283. b.

Annat (Father), a parallel betwixt his conduct and that of Father Nidhard. IV. 366. b.

Anne (St), how many huſbands and children ſhe had. III. 572. She is no where ſpoken of in the Scriptures, nor in the writings of the three firſt centuries. I. 342. The ridiculous ſtories that are told about her. III. 570. a. b. 571. a. b.

Anne, daughter to Phanuel: whether ſhe was a cloyſtered religious. I. 342.

Anne, ſiſter to Dido: perſecuted after her ſiſter's death by their brother Pygmalion. IV. 642. a. b.

Anne of Auſtria, Queen of France, liked the reliſh of the fruits which came from Pompone. I. 487. b. The King could not conſent to declare her Regent. III. 816. b. 828. a. She gets the Parliament of Paris to make the King's laſt will void. ibid. b. Maſcaron makes her Funeral Oration. IV. 172. Provoked at the ſcandalous reflexions that were thrown out againſt her during the ſiege of la Motte, ſhe cauſes that place to be raſed contrary to the articles of capitulation. 278. a. b. This piece of reſentment blamed by the Marquis de Beauvau. ibid. b.

Anonymiana quoted. V. 280. a. b. 330. a.

Anſelme (Father) much leſs intelligible than Mr le Laboureur, whom he epitomizes. II. 133. b. He is miſtaken when he ſays that a good part of the inheritance of the houſe of Bourbon was reſtored. III. 864. a. His error with reſpect to the age of Madam de Rohan. IV. 481. a.

Anſwer; whether it be better to anſwer certain fiery and impetuous tempers, or not to do it. II. 195. b.

Antagoniſt. Whether a perſon ought not to take as much pains to repreſent his antagoniſt's reaſons as his own in a fair light. II. 486. b. 487. a. b. 488. a. b.

Anti-Anicianus, a book that was never printed, and for what reaſon. I. 341. a. b.

Anti-Baillet, a paſſage of that book examined and cenſured. II. 180. a. b.

Anti-Coton, the author of that book quoted and cenſured. IV. 772. b. 773. a. b.

Antichriſt, a very ſingular opinion concerning him. II. 113. a. b. In what manner he was to ſeize on fortified towns. IV. 265. b. 266. a. An author who deſcribes all the periods of his reign. II. 122. Aloiſio de Leon applies to Mahomet the predictions of the Apoſtles concerning Antichriſt. III. 772. b.

Antyllus betrothed to Auguſtus's daughter, but murdered on account of his virile gown. III. 119. b.

Anti-Mondori, who was called by that name, and for what reaſon. IV. 82. a.

Antinomians, the followers of John Agricola were ſo called. III. 597. Father Garaſſe's ſcurrilities on that head. ibid. a. b. 598. a. b.

Antioch, the feaſt of Adonis was ſtill celebrated in that city when Julian the Apoſtate made his entry there. I. 114. b.

Antiochide finding herſelf barren, has recourſe to a pretended delivery. II. 304. b.

Antiochus the Great vanquiſhed by the Romans. IV. 559. a. b.

Antiochus was deſperately in love with his mother-in-law. V. 45. a.

Antipater, his diſputes with Carneades. II. 329. a. How that Philoſopher defined God. IV. 572. a.

Antipathy is the true cauſe of quarrels between huſband and wife. III. 663. a.

Antiperiſtaſis takes place in religion. III. 949. a.

Antiphates, King of the Leſtrygons: eats one of Ulyſſes's Deputies. III. 786. a.

Antipodes placed by Pope Zachary in the number of chimeras that are pernicious to religion. V. 493. a. b.

Antiquarians, ſnares are often laid for them. III. 215. a. b.

Antiquity can never be admitted as a proof for any doctrine, without firſt determining the duration that is ſufficient to diſtinguiſh truth from error. III. 744. a.

Antiquities (Roman), Flavius Blondus was almoſt the firſt who attempted to reſtore them. II. 32.

Antiſthenes, whether at the time that Diogenes was his ſcholar, he could have had Socrates for his maſter. II. 665. a. b. 666. a. In what manner he made the Athenians ſenſible of the abuſe committed in the promotions to public poſts. III. 616. b.

Antocles, what health he drank with Epicles. IV. 571. b.

Antony (Caius), the ill treatment that he met with from his nephew. III. 115. a. b. 116. a.

Antony (Caius), the Triumvir's brother, what his end was, and how his death was revenged. III. 496. a. b.

Antony (Lucius), to whom he was indebted for his authority, and his triumph. III. 111. b.

Antony (Marc) ſends to ſignify to Cleopatra, that ſhe ſhould come into Cilicia to juſtify her conduct. II. 631. The debauching of his wife hindered the city of Rome's being involved in an horrible confuſion. 679. His anſwer to Julius Cæſar upon his demanding an account of the ſale of Pompey's goods. ibid. b. 680. a. His difference with Dolabella. 680. a. He harangues the Senate upon peace and concord, and his harangue charms the men of probity. ibid. He ſends his ſon for a hoſtage to the conſpirators, who durſt not come down from the capitol. ibid. With what ſpectacle he entertained himſelf at table during the time of the proſcriptions. III. 113. a. How his firſt wife was called. ibid. b. How his ſecond wife was called, and why he put her away. 114. b. He commits a thouſand extortions at Rome. 119. a. He has even the audaciouſneſs to ſell Pompey's goods by inch of candle. ibid. He did not marry Cytheris. ibid. He cauſes lions to be yoked in his chariot. 959. b. 960. a. The trick which he ſerved his wife, and the conſtruction that was put upon it. 991. a. b. He enters himſelf into the ſociety of the Luperci. 932. a. He cauſes Arſinoë to be killed, out of complaiſance to Cleopatra. IV. 791. b.

Antonia, whether that family was a Patrician or Plebeian one. I. 356. a. b. 357. a. How it ſhould be divided. 356. a. And what names belong to its different branches. ibid.

Antoniana Margarita, that book is grown very ſcarce. IV. 546. a.

Antoninus, Archbiſhop of Florence, quotes John Columna, and in ſeveral places copies James Columna. II. 529, 530. a. b.

Antoninus Liberalis, what he tells us about Alcmena. I. 208.

Antonio, King of Portugal: Philip II takes Portugal from him. V. 319.

Antonio (Don Nicolas), the faults of that author cenſured. I. 41. a. b. 42. a.

Ants, a falſe reaſon given for their wiſdom. III. 528. b.

Antwerp, how the five baſtions of its fortreſs were called. IV. 453. a. The King of Spain is adviſed to order that city to be burnt. V. 293. a. A popular inſurrection there in 1567. II. 121.

Apelles, his adventure at the court of Egypt. I. 366. a. b.

Apelles, the tragedian, cried out in a muſical tone while he was whipped. 370.

Apellicon, his library tranſported to Rome. V. 378. b. The hiſtory of him. 379. b.

Aphrodiſienſis (Alexander), whether he believed the mortality of the ſoul. II. 567. a.

Apicius Cælius, who the author of that book is, and what it treats of. I. 371. a. b.

Apion tells an incredible ſtory of a certain Phyſiognomiſt. I. 370. a. b. Boaſted that he beſtowed immortality on thoſe to whom he dedicated his works. 373. b.

Apocalypſe, See Revelations.

Apollo, ſirnamed the Hyperborean. I. 4. b. The wonderful effects of the dart with which he had killed the Cyclops. 5. How he recovered that dart. ibid.

Apollo is blamed for commending a Poet that had wrote a thouſand obſcene things. I. 427. a. His temple and oracle at Daphne rendered very famous by ſuperſtition and debauchery. 594. a. He acted the Merchant; for he did nothing gratis. II. 258. a. The prieſteſs of Apollo at Daphne was to be a virgin. 339. a. The virtue of his ſpittle. ibid. b. Apollo tells a lie in the oracle which he pronounced upon the deſtiny of Euripides. 863. b. 864. a. Who it was that built him a temple at Claros. IV. 97. a. The Athenians plunder him by ſea and by land. 621. a. b. 622. a. b. Why he is called Smintheus. V. 312. a. Why ſpared by Verres. 315. b. He gets Coronis with child, and kills her father Phlegyas with arrows. 626. IV, Apollonius Pergæus: Mr Viviani reſtores the fifth book of his Conic ſections. V. 498.

Apollonius, the Poet, is very excuſable in having followed the crowd with reſpect to Chiron. I. 79. a.

Apollonius Tyanæus had mimicked the Son of God. I. 380. a. How he cenſured the Athenians. II. 81. b. The ſtory that they tell of him with reſpect to the aſſaſſin of Domitian. V. 731, 732.

Apologia pro Puritanis, what that book is. II. 681.

Apology for John Chaſtel and the Jeſuits: An analyſis of that work. II. 457. b. 458. a. b. 459. a. Aſcribed to the Jeſuits, but it is highly probable that it was compoſed by John Boucher. 459. b. It is very ſcarce. ibid. The Jeſuits ſuppreſs it, and for what reaſon. ibid.

Apologies ſhould be conſulted by thoſe who write the lives of learned men, and by the author of ſuch a book as this. II. 8. b.

Apologiſt: There is often room to believe that the ſharpneſs of an Apologiſt offends people more than that of the aggreſſor. II. 296. b.

Apologiſts: It is a difficult matter to reduce the Apologiſts for certain people to a non-plus. V. 66. a. Savonarola's Apologiſts. ibid. b. 67. a. b. They are ſuſpected of being guided by infatuation, or the intereſt of their community. 70. a.

Apologues, to whom the glory of inventing them belongs. II. 832. a. Whether the Antients believed that they came down from heaven. ibid.

Apopompæus, a name which the Jews gave to one of their victims. IV. 828. b. 832. b.

Apoſtate; a certain Engliſh Lord called an Apoſtate by the people of Geneva, becauſe he did not believe that their diſcipline was Apoſtolical. II. 150.

Apotheoſis, what the ſureſt way of obtaining it was. IV. 572. a. b.

Apparition, whether, from the apparition of a ſoul, one can draw any proof of its immortality. II. 66. b. 67. a. b. An apparition may occaſion a mortal diſtemper. 715. b. 716. a. There are apparitions againſt which the moſt ardent warriors could not be proof. ibid. Obſervations upon ſome of them. III. 881. a. b. See Phantoms.

Appearances are deceitful. I. 126. a. b. 127. a. A proof of the raſh judgments which are only grounded on firſt appearances. ibid. 733. b.

Applauſe: The hopes thereof a great encouragement to authors. IV. 450. a.

Apple: The golden apple adjudged to Venus. III. 644. a. b.

Application. Too long application produces bad conſequences. III. 342. a.

Apuleius, if he was a Magician, his crime was leſs than that of the Magicians of theſe times. I. 390. a. What things he was reproached with. 391. a. b. The Pagans compared his miracles to thoſe of Jeſus Chriſt. 394. One of his epiſodes has furniſhed Moliere with matter for a dramatic piece, and Mr de la Fontaine for a romance. 396. b.

Aquapendente (Fabricius d'), it is not true that du Laurens profited by his converſation with him. III. 746. b.

Aquaviva (Andrew-Matthew), celebrated for the ſame thing as Mr de Montauſier. I. 397. b.

Aquaviva, General of the Jeſuits, whether he approved Mariana's book de Inſtitutione Principis. IV. 130. a. b.

Aquila, a city that roſe upon the ruins of Amiternum. I. 69. a.

Aquileia, the ſentence of Pilate found in that city was a ſuppoſititious piece. II. 556. b.

Aquinas (Thomas) knew ſomething of the Cabala. II. 114. a. Was called the mute ox by his ſchool-fellows, and for what reaſon. 802. b. Is cenſured by Vogelſang. 877. b. 878. a.

Aquitain (Eudo Duke of) what his daughter's name was. IV. 282. a. b. How ſhe fell into the hands of the Calif of the Saracens. 283. a. b.

Aquitain. The annals of Aquitain by John Bouchet. II. 103. The judgment which Robert Cenalis and John Quintin paſs upon it. ibid. a. b. 104. a.

Aquitainians, were formerly the ornament and glory of the Gauls in point of wit and eloquence. V. 124. a. b.

Arabia, the women there have a great deal of modeſty. IV. 34. a.

Arabians, what they ſaid of the ſtature of our firſt parents. I. 104. a. What they ſaid of Adam's books. ibid. b. They worſhipped a ſtone. 124. b. Their Philoſophers rather chuſe to ſwerve from the opinions of their Prophet Mahomet, than to contradict Ariſtotle. 469. b. The Arabians have introduced many things into the practice of Phyſic, that are contrary to the precepts of Hippocrates and Galen. II. 140. They continue exactly to obſerve the cuſtom of marrying with the women of their own tribe. IV. 27. a. Some of their authors boaſt of having ſeen a copy of the Goſpel, where mention was made of Mahomet. 46. b. 47. a.

Aragon (Ferdinand of) unjuſtly deprives John d'Albret of his kingdom. III. 623. a.

Arbriſſel (Robert d') how he lived with his Nuns. III. 63. a. b. 64. a. b.

Arcadia, men were ſacrificed to Jupiter in that country. III. 651. b.

Arcadius was ordered by Theodoſius, to ſtand uncovered before his Preceptor. I. 507.

Arceſilas was a Pyrrhoniſt without bearing the name. I. 408. b. 409. a. He was the firſt diſturber of the public peace among the Philoſophers. 409. b. He carried the Hypotheſis of uncertainty farther than Socrates. ibid. Why he eſpouſed the ſide of the Epoché. ibid. 410. a. He did good and endeavoured to conceal it. 412. b. 413. a. What he ſaid to Carneades the Epicurean. 413. b. Ariſto of Chios was his antagoniſt upon the Hypotheſis of uncertainty. 462. a. Whether he abſolutely denied the exiſtence of truths. II. 327. a. What difference there was between his opinions and thoſe of Pyrrho. IV. 653. a. b. If he ſhould return into the world he would be formidable to the Divines. 654. a.

Arthagathus was the firſt Phyſician that ever came to Rome. II. 353. a.

Archambald, Archbiſhop of Bourdeaux, is depoſed, and afterwards becomes Lord of St Maixent. IV. 479, 480.

Archelaus, upon what terms Pompey gave him the pontificate of Comana. II. 531. b. 532. a.

Archelaus, King of Macedon, a witty ſaying of that Prince. I. 418. a. What he ſaid upon his ordering a golden cup to be given to Euripides. II. 869. a. He delivers up Decamnichus to Euripides to be uſed by him at diſcretion, and why. 868. b. 869. a. One of his dogs ſacrified and eat. 870. b.

Archelaus (The Philoſopher) what he taught touching the production of men and other animals. I. 416. a. b.

Arch-Heretics, one of them works a kind of miracle at Rome. II. 86. b.

Archidamia comes with ſword in hand into the Lacedemonian ſenate, to complain of the ill opinion that was entertained of the womens courage. II. 523.

Archidamus fined by the Ephori, and for what reaſon. I. 128. b.

Archilochus valued himſelf more upon being a ſoldier, than a Poet. I. 426. b. Whither the man that killed him was ſent. V. 317. a. b.

Archon. Who the laſt perpetual Archon was. I. 208.

Arci (the Marquis of) commits an aſſaſſination in Frejus, for which the Prince of Condé, and the Admiral are exceedingly concerned. II. 511. a.

Arcturus called Phaſis, and for what reaſon. IV. 609.

Aremberg: (the Count d') his anſwer touching the troops of the circle of Burgundy, which were introduced into the Electorate of Cologne. II. 224. b.

Arena, a city, whence it was ſo called, and by whom it was built. III. 194.

Areopagites: The Areopagites could neither endure Atheiſts nor impious perſons. II. 572. a. 573. a. A cauſe referred to them. 681. b. They cauſe Menedemus and Aſclepiades ſo be ſummoned before them. I. 525. b.

Aretin (Peter) whether his books of devotion ſavour of a true convert. I. 438. b. His Raggionamenti, a book abſolutely to be condemned. V. 837.

Arezzo, the inhabitants thereof obliged to kneel before a lion of ſtone, and for what reaſon. II. 633. a. b.

Argenis, a famous book, tranſlated into Italian, to ſatisfy the curioſity of the women. I. 644. b. Continually read by Cardinal Richelieu. 645. b. Likewiſe very much eſteemed by Balzac. ibid. b. 646. a. It is nevertheleſs writ in bad Latin. 646. a. Tranſlated into French. 646. b.

Argenterius, a Lawyer, writ every thing that he heard in converſation. III. 154. b.

Argentocoxus, how his wiſe excuſed the adulteries that were committed in Great Britain. III. 604. a. b.

Argentum purum putum, the meaning of theſe words. I. 227. a.

Argentré: (Bertrand d') confounds Franciſco Sylveſtro with Sylveſter Prierias. III. 32.

Argonauts, their arrival and their exploits in the iſle of Lemnos. III. 465. a. b. They are obliged to ſail up the river Phaſis. IV. 610. They are ſirnamed Minyans from Minyas. 626. b.

Argonauts; what the Argonauts of the Painter Cydias were ſold for. III. 492. a.

Argos, Juno's temple there was entirely burnt down by the careleſſneſs of the prieſteſs. II. 498. a. b. The inhabitants thereof made a vow to Apollo, when they plundered the city of Thebes. IV. 97.

Argument, whence it comes that the principal argument of a ſect is called it's Achilles. I. 82. b. In what caſe a negative argument takes place. II. 115. b. and in what caſe it is a good demonſtration. 392. b. Books have been writ for and againſt it's authority. III. 457. a. n. (15). A conſideration on the force of it with reſpect to the She-Pope. IV. 734. a. b. 735. a. b. A refutation of the reaſons that may be objected to it. 736. a. b. The Proteſtants allow it to be demonſtrative in the queſtion: whether St Peter was at Rome, and will not hear of it in the affair of the She-Pope. 737. a. Character of that argument. V. 648. b.

Argumentum; an inexcuſable miſtake of thoſe who took Argentum for Argumentum in Aulus Gellius. I. 82. b.

Arianiſm, its extent and duration. I. 476. a. b. The inſurmountable difficulties in which a Proteſtant Divine has engaged himſelf upon that head. ibid. It is extirpated in Spain by Recaredus. 477. b.

Arians. The Arians ſeem to have been of a more tolerating ſpirit than the Orthodox. I. 477. b. Calvin's explications accuſed of favouring them. III. 538. b. A ſect of them ſprings up at Lyons, againſt which Viret exerts himſelf V. 483. a. b. They are ſolidly confuted by Laſicius. III. 732. a.

Arioſto, the judgment which Cardinal Hippolyto d'Eſt paſſed upon one of his poems. III. 764. a. A bull expedited in favour of his poems. ibid. The beginning of his poem coſt a great deal of pains. 837. b. Whether he lived in lodgings. V. 400. b. 401. a.

Ariſtagoras, whether there was a Philoſopher of that name, who was Socrates's maſter. II. 653. a. b.

Ariſtarchus, whether he was called the Prophet or Diviner. I. 451. b.

Ariſteus, the ſon of Apollo, diſappears. I. 456. Is placed among the ſtars. 457. The conformity of his Hiſtory with that of Moſes. ibid.

Ariſteas (the Proconneſian) appeared in the world three ages after he had compoſed a poem. I. 458. b. 459. a. He boaſted that his ſoul had left his body and rambled thro' different places. 458. b.

Ariſteus: Mr Viviani's divination on that author. V. 499.

Ariſtænetus, what he tells us of his miſtreſs. III. 704. a.

Ariſtides, his daughters portioned for marriage at the public expence. I. 56. His virtue. 278. b. From what motive he contributed towards Cimon's advancement. II. 504. b.

Ariſtippus, what his footman ſaid to him about Lais. II. 670. a.

Ariſtodemus, the Kings of Lacedemon were deſcended from him. I. 130. a.

Ariſtomenes, the greateſt hero that was among the Meſſenians. II. 650. a.

Ariſtophanes, why he compoſed the Comedy of the clouds, according to ſome. I. 418. b. To whom the public is indebted for the firſt edition of that author. IV. 295. In what manner he ſpoke of devotional watchings. V. 336. b. 337. a.

Ariſtotle, his learning compared to that of Adam. I. 101. b. 102. a. He ridicules Xenocrates. 112. b. His doctrine as to the neceſſity there is for ſome principle to be the firſt mover of matter. 299. a. He obſerves that Anaxagoras admitted an intelligence for the production of things only as a θεὸς ἀπὸ μηχάνης. 301. a. Whether he was a Proſelyte of righteouſneſs, or even a Jew. 466. a. b. His anſwer to thoſe who demanded the reaſon of his retreat. 468. a. The greateſt part of his works was brought to Rome with Apellicon's library. V. 377. b. Several copies of them were taken full of faults. ibid. They added to them the tables, which we have at preſent, after putting them in order. ibid. Who writ the paraphraſe upon his Ethics. I. 336. a. Some have attempted to explain the myſteries of religion by his principles. 339. His Philoſophy has been violently ſhaken in the XVIIth century. 464. but ſtrongly ſupported by the Proteſtant and Catholic Divines. ibid. The extravagant praiſes that have been beſtowed upon him. 468. b. 469. a. His conformity with Spinoza. 470. II. 411. a. 412. b. Whether he believed the immortality of the ſoul, and the Trinity, and whether he had any glimpſes of the Incarnation of the Son of God. I. 470. b. 471. a. and IV. from 714. a. to 719. a. Whether he ought to be put in the number of the Refugees. I. 471. b. Whether he threw himſelf into the Eurypus. 473. a. b. 474. a. The profeſſors that are ſtrongly prejudiced in favour of Ariſtotle's Hypotheſes, have much leſs reaſon on their ſide than the parliaments which proſcribed all others. 470. Some authors have believed that his doctrine went the length of Atheiſm. 470. What is ſaid as to his converſation with a Jew, does not ſeem to be well grounded. 465. b. 466. a. b. It is not probable that he behaved ſo ill to Plato, as he is ſaid to have done 466. b. 467. a. Nor that he was guilty of impiety and idolatry in his amours. 467. a. b. It is doubted whether he acknowledged the immortality of the ſoul. 470. b. 471. a. It is not certain what kind of death he died. 473. a. b. 474. a. b. He was extremely honoured in his own city. 471. b. Who was the firſt and almoſt the laſt of the moderns, that comprehended Ariſtotle's opinions. II. 411. a. His Doctrine touching an univerſal intellect, which is the ſame in all men. 565. b. Whether he burnt all the books of thoſe who had philoſophized before him, and the books of Solomon. 643. b. 644. a. A fooliſh ſtory of the Jews to that purpoſe. 644. ibid. He looks upon the eternal motion of matter to be an abſurd ſuppoſition. 787. b. He is very ill uſed by Luther. III. 952. a. b. When and how nature forms women, according to that Philoſopher. 144. b. It was with good reaſon that he ſpoke ill of the Lacedemonian women. 968. a. To what he compares thoſe who leave off Philoſophy, and apply themſelves to other ſciences. IV. 543. a. His opinion about the ſouls of beaſts. 549. a. b. to 551. b. It is in vain that ſome people endeavour to find in his writings the ſeeds of Des Cartes's opinion, touching the ſouls of beaſts. 551. b. 552. a. The reverſe of Ariſtotle's Doctrine has been publickly defended, which occaſioned great troubles. 835. a. b. The fate of his works Hiſtorically deſcribed. V. 377. b. 378. a. An inference very glorious for him, but which may raiſe ſome doubts concerning his works. 379. a. b. He is unjuſtly cenſured by the author of the Art of Thinking, in favour of Parmenides. 575. b. He advances facts which cannot be confirmed. 772. a. b. His Rhetoric tranſlated into Latin, by M. A. Muretus, and explained by Bencius. I. 747. b. The agreement between the ſects of Ariſtotle and Plato. 268. a. b.

Arithmetic: the authors that have writ upon that ſubject. V. 297. a. b. Tartaglia excels in it, and all the reſt copy and plunder him. ibid.

Arius: Nicolas, Biſhop of Mirra, gives him a box on the ear, in the council of Nice. II. 530. a. n. (15).

Ark: whether matrimonial functions were ſuperſeded and ſuſpended in the ark. II. 431. a. b.

Arles: none is admitted into the academy of Arles, but upon requeſting it. IV. 459. a. The Cardinal of Arles. I. 178. How deſcribed by a Polander. ibid. a. b. 179. a. He dies in the odour of ſanctity. ibid. a. b.

Arliquiniana quoted. I. 750. b.

Arminianiſm, is of an inſinuating nature V. 513. a.

Arminians. The Arminians ſhould not have exceeded the bounds ſet them by the Reformers. I. 481. a. b. Their Hypotheſis cannot ſolve the principal difficulties upon the ſubject of Predeſtination. ibid. 482. a. They reject the authority of the Synod of Dort. II. 793. They are depoſed and baniſhed. ibid. The populace curſes them as the firſt cauſe of the diſorders, both in Church and State. ibid a. They retire to Antwerp during the truce, ibid. b.

Arminius, a conjecture upon his diſputes with Gomarus. I. 687. a. 688. b. His recommendations and thoſe of Uytenbogard are prejudicial to Druſius. II. 705. a. He denies that his opinions were the ſame with thoſe of Pelagius. III. 173. a. There is no fundamental hereſy in them. 174. a. What he anſwered touching the writings which he had orders to confute. III. 676. An exhortation which Joſeph Hall addreſſes to him. 343. a. b.

Arms (Coats of) John le Feron's book upon that ſubject. III. 27. a. Another book upon that ſubject. ibid b. Adam's coat of arms, what? ibid.

Arms, people who have confeſſed that they threw down their arms when they fled. I. 189. a. b. What the arms of the Church were in primitive times, when ſhe was perſecuted. 592. a. Whether it is lawful for a private perſon, to bear arms againſt the allies of his ſovereign, when he may either liſt or not, as he pleaſes II. 196. a. A book wherein it is maintained that miniſters have a call to bear them, and the trouble which that brought the author into. I. 756. a. b. Mr Amyraut condemns one's taking up arms againſt his Prince upon any occaſion whatever. 264. b. 265. a.

Army. A ſpiritual army, which was to be raiſed by the advice and inſpiration of the Holy Ghoſt, and commanded by the King of France, to extirpate impieties and hereſies. IV. 115. a. b. A Janſeniſt's reflexion thereupon. ibid. b. 116. a.

Arnauld (Antony) Advocate, whether he was of the Reformed religion. I. 484. b. 485. a. There were ſeveral perſons of the Reformed religion in that family. II. 727. a. Among others Mr Arnauld, Comptroller of the Reſtes. ibid. In his pleading againſt the Jeſuits he employs the words of Lepidus. III. 956. a.

Arnauld (Antony) Doctor of the Sorbonne, the ſource of his quarrels with the Jeſuits. I. 487. a. b. 488. a. He did not deſerve to be ſtiled one Arnauld. 489. b. 490. a. The ſecret of ſilencing him. ibid. b. The reaſons which he gave for his ſilence, with regard to two books that were publiſhed againſt him. 494. b. His diſpute with le Fevre Doctor of the Sorbonne. III. 70. b. A pretended letter from the King of France: 593. a. b. He is in the wrong to blame Quiſtorpius. 246. a. b. He is contradicted by Mr Claude with reſpect to Allatius and Hottinger. 528. b. Acknowledges that he had been in the wrong to Mr Mallet, as to the extravagancies of which he had believed him to be the firſt author. 854. b. Received a ſmall ruffle on account of a citation from Luther. 950. a. Is quoted. IV. 719. a. b.

Arnobius vented very dangerous errors. I. 501. a. b. He grounds a very bad objection upon a falſe aſſertion. II. 498. a. He ridicules the Pagans for making nine nights neceſſary to Jupiter to get one child. III. 427. b. His way of arguing againſt Jupiter's adulteries. 646. a. b. He puts Paganiſm to a nonplus. 647. a. b. What anſwer he made to the Pagans when they accuſed the Chriſtian religion, as being the cauſe of all the misfortunes which befel the empire. IV. 423. a. b. He is leſs orthodox upon the ſubject of matter conſidered as one of the principles, than the Stoics. 521. a. Has very ſtrongly refuted thoſe two ſorts of gods, ſome whereof are beneficent and others miſchievous. ibid. But he went too far. ibid. His notion touching the ſoul of man. 903. b. 904. a. A paſſage of his examined. ibid. What he obſerves concerning the nature of God. V. 146. a. The confeſſion he makes with reſpect to thoſe who deny the Deity, or a providence. 217. a. b. 218. a. What his view was in ſaying that the Pagans had the Amphytrion of Plautus acted in order to appeaſe Jupiter. 309. b. His anſwer to ſuch of the Pagans as required ſome of Cicero's books to be prohibited. 506. b.

Arnoldus, the tranſlation of a paſſage of his cenſured. I. 48. a. b.

Arras, the treaty of Arras relating to the ſubmiſſion of Charles VII King of France. II. 212. a. b.

Arria kills herſelf to give an example to her huſband. IV. 594.

Arriaga quoted. V. 223. b. IV. 545. a. b. V. 611. a. 618. a.

Arrian, his extreme credulity for fables. I. 85. a. b.

Arrow: the flying arrow. I. 4. a. b.

Arſinoë cauſes Achillas to be put to death. She is received into Megabyzus's houſe. Marc Antony cauſes her to be killed out of complaiſance to Cleopatra. IV. 791. a. b.

Art. The Civil Law requires that a perſon who excels in any art ſhould have his life given him, altho' he may have deſerved to loſe it. III. 197. b. 198. a.

Art of Love: Ovid's books on that ſubject were leſs the cauſe than the pretence of baniſhing him. IV. 445.

Art of Writing: A man ſtyled the firſt of all the writers of the kingdom. III. 123.

Art of Slandering: there is one according to Scaliger. Thoſe who are ignorant of it hurt themſelves more than they hurt others. I. 343. b.

Art of War; it was formerly very far from the ſtate of perfection to which it is come now. I. 162.

Art of Poetry; one of its rules examined. IV. 744. a. b.

Art of French Poetry: Des Accords promiſed that work. I. 66. a. Daniel d'Auge's book upon that ſubject. 562. a.

Art of Thinking: that book referred to. I. 791. a. n. (36).

Artagnan: the Memoirs publiſhed under that name are ſuppoſititious. III. 881. a.

Artemidorus cited on the ſubject of dreams and their ſignification. I. 6. a.

Artillery, by whom invented. I. 183. b.

Artiſts. Famous artiſts are liable to be capricious. I. 377. b. And have often reaſon to repent it. ibid.

Arundel, (Earl of) his Marbles. IV. 771. a. b.

Aſiatics were the aggreſſors in the firſt wars which they had with the Europeans. III. 372. a. b. Their readineſs to believe the moſt ridiculous traditions. 576. a.

Aſcribe: ſeveral perſons aſcribe to others, pieces which they themſelves have compoſed. II. 353. a.

Aſking: people often meet with a refuſal, becauſe they are too free in aſking. I. 418. b.

Aſmodeus transforms himſelf into an angel of light, in order to ſurprize devout women. II. 110. a.

Aſpaſia abuſed by the Poets, and upon the ſtage, IV. 569. a. Her Hiſtory. 578. b. 579. a. b. 580. a. b.

Aſpaſia, Cyrus's miſtreſs, an abridgment of her hiſtory. IV. 512. b. 513. a. b. 514. a. b. 515. a.

Aſprenas accuſed of having poiſoned an hundred and thirty gueſts with one diſh. II. 354. b.

Aſs: An aſs that had a wonderful attention for Poetry. I. 267, 268. A ſtory that is told of a Collier's aſs. III. 804. a.

Aſs (Buridan's), the original of that proverb. II. 226. b. 227. a. b.

Aſs (golden), who is the author of its firſt tranſlation into French. I. 395. b. It is a continued ſatire. 396. a. One might draw up a very good commentary on that romance. ibid. a. b. Some perſons believe that it contains the myſteries of the grand operation. ibid. a.

Aſs: Who firſt brought aſſes-fleſh into vogue. IV. 768. a. b.

Aſſacan: eldeſt ſon to Cleophis an Indian Queen. II. 523. a.

Aſſaſſins, or murderers of Kings, their panegyriſts rewarded by the Spaniards. II. 103. b.

Aſſaſſins, ſuch as John Chaſtel, diſcover as much conſtancy as the moſt illuſtrions martyrs. II. 459. a. The proceed from the ſchool of the Jeſuits. ibid. b.

Aſſembly: one ought not ſlightly to believe all that is charged upon the religious aſſemblies of the Heretics. I. 111. b.

Aſterites, a ſtone which the rays of the ſun can ſet on fire. II. 834.

Aſtrea, what people blame in that romance. III. 866. b. 867. a.

Aſtrology (Judicial) the vanity of that ſcience. I. 164. b. 165. a. Whether the birth and miracles of Chriſt could have been foretold by it. ibid. According to its rules a man ought ſometimes to die ſeveral years before his death. 194. b. Perſons that have been infatuated with it. 599. a. III. 591. b. 592. a. b. 619. b. 804. a. b. V. 254. b. 255. a. b. Its rules prove falſe. II. 321. a. b. The judgment which Caſtellan makes of it. III. 401. a. There are ſome fortuitous conjunctures which hinder people from ſeeing the vanity of it. 438. a. It's fatal effects. 499. a. b. The greateſt men ſuffer themſelves to be infatuated with it. IV. 260. b. 261. a. b. 262. a. A reflexion on its horoſcopes. 369. a. b. 370. a. It would be a kind of Magic, if it could foretel future events. 938. a. b. 939. a. II. 391. a.

Aſtrologer. An Aſtrologer who ſtarved himſelf to death, to confirm his prediction. II. 320. b. An Aſtrologer who frightens the Duke of Guiſe. III. 873. The greateſt part of Aſtrologers are not cautious enough in their predictions. 436. b. They can turn their horoſcopes to the advantage of their religion. 935. a. b. Aſtronomers ſent to the Gallies, and for what reaſon. IV. 936. a. Their vanity and tricks. 261. b. Their ſubterfuges. 264. a. b. They rather chuſe to relate facts which are little to their credit, than to conceal the reaſons which they can aſſign for them by their principles. 267. b. Aſtrologers expoſed by Gaſſendus. 531. b. 532. a. b. Aſtrologers confounded. V. 243. a. b. to 246. a. b. It is not an eaſy matter to diſcredit them. 245. a. b. Few of them venture to draw retrograde horoſcopes. 295, 296. a. b. Why they cannot ſee the gallantries of their wives in the ſtars. 322. a. b. They threaten a deluge for the year 1524, and cauſe a general alarm. IV. 380.

Aſtronomers muſt needs have been free from ſenſuality. I. 295. b. 296. a. In what manner Ovid and Pliny ſpeak of them. III. 462. a. b.

Aſtronomy, Socrates diſſuaded the ſtudy of it. I. 311. a. b.

Aſylums very ſcarce. An enquiry made at Rome into falſe ones. IV. 555. b. 556. a.

Atellanæ, what ſort of Comedies they were. IV. 90.

Atheiſm, does not give us more falſe notions of the nature of God than the Pagan religion. I. 132. a. Whether it be a leſs evil than the worſhip of the Pagan deities. 382. a. Whether it be not a kind of Atheiſm to admit a firſt mover, and to maintain at the ſame time that the world is eternal. 562. b. It isalmoſt without example among women. 639. a. It requires a certain degree of force and furious ſtrength of mind to fall into Atheiſm. II. 450. b. 451. a. b. 452. a. b. 648. b. It is not by ſatires that Atheiſm muſt be combated. III. 132. a. b. There are three degrees of it. V. 324. a. b. When it began to appear in France and in Italy. 286. a. b.

Atheiſts, what, according to them, was the cauſe and origin of the laws that are eſtabliſhed among men. II. 571. b. Their ſyſtem. 552. a. b. 553. a. b. Thoſe who are ſo by perſuaſion do not amuſe themſelves with preaching up impiety. III. 648. b. Whether it is poſſible for them to be Magicians. IV. 938. b. to 940. a. b. One is accuſed of being an Atheiſt, whenever he refuſes to adopt all the particular articles of his ſect. III. 470. b. 471. a. When and how men begin to turn Atheiſts. 768. b. An Atheiſt hanged and burnt at the Greve. IV. 845. b. Who, as ſome ſay, write the beſt againſt Atheiſts. III. 132. a. b. An explanation concerning the remarks which are diffuſed thro' this Dictionary, touching their good morals. V. 811. to 814. It is leſs ſurprizing that they ſhould have lived like honeſt men, than that Idolaters ſhould have done good actions. 811. Self-love was the end of their good actions. 812. Examples of their bad morals cited by the author, who had enquired after more. 813. Theoretical Atheiſts, Diagoras, Vanini, Spinoza, &c. ibid.

Athenæus is cenſured for a fault againſt good ſenſe. I. 116. a. b. To whom the public is indebted for the firſt edition of that author. IV. 295. He makes Herodotus ſay what he does not ſay, with reſpect to the Egyptian prieſts, 789. b. 790. a.

Athenæus the Philoſopher, what he ſaid after he was ſet at liberty by Auguſtus. I. 537. b.

Athenagoras, whether as Deputy for the Chriſtians he preſented his apology to the Imperial Court. I. 531. a. b. 532. a. He had heterodox opinions. ibid. b. 533. a.

Athenians offer ſacrifices in behalf of all the Greeks. I. 5. a. The worſhip which they paid to the god Boreas. II. 81. They introduce fictions and idle ſtories into their ſyſtem of religion: ibid. b. 82. a. b. When and by whom they were delivered from the dominion of the thirty tyrants. 548. a. What value they ſet upon the freedom of their city. 558. b. They aſſiſt Ariſtagoras, and help him to burn the city of Sardis. 599. b. What they do againſt Diagoras. 652. a. 653. a. b. 654. a. b. An explication of their decree, touching the Tragedies of Æſchylus. 826. b. A law of theirs which prohibited women and ſlaves to ſtudy Phyſic. 453. A curious piece of Hiſtory on that ſubject. ibid. a. b. The Athenians cenſured for their want of courage, by Demetrius. 714. a. Their laws abrogated by Chriſtianity. IV. 128. a. How they were cured of a panic that was occaſioned by an eclipſe of the ſun. 565. b. 566. a. They put ſix of their generals to death moſt unjuſtly. 581. a. Plunder Apollo by ſea and land. 621. b. 622. a. Forbid their Sophiſts to plead cauſes. 784. a. They ſuffered a man to marry his ſiſter by the father's ſide but not by the mother's V. 49. b. Baniſhment the common fate of thoſe who governed them. II. 259.

Athens, a conteſt between Neptune and Minerva, which of them ſhould give a name to that city. I. 445. A man was in danger of loſing his life there, when he entertained certain notions touching the properties of the ſtars. 307. b. It was fertile in producing informers. 468. a. We have nothing but a fair repreſentation of that Republic, which in truth was enſlaved by the Demagogues. IV. 581. b. It was propoſed there to add a new tribe to the ten old ones. 557. b. A collection of the decrees of the people of Athens, a work that is loſt, and the loſs of which is to be regretted. II. 562. a. The Areopagus of Athens, was formidable to Atheiſts and impious perſons. 572. a. b. 573. a.

Athenion, by what means he became very powerful in Athens. V. 379. b.

Athletics, their abſtinence. I. 142. a. The antient Greeks and Romans made them wear girdles. III. 964. a.

— Atia, the mother of Auguſtus, what country ſhe was of. IV. 397. a. She durſt not go into a bath, and for what reaſon. 407. b.

Atlas, the coaſt of Teuchira is called the manſions inhabited by him. IV. 252. b.

Atomiſts, are not ſo abſurd in their ſyſtem as the Spinoziſts in theirs: the reaſon of it. II. 644. a. They admit an infinite number of firſt principles. V. 827.

Atoms, the difference between the atoms of Democritus and thoſe of Epicurus. II. 779. a. The advantage that may be drawn from the ſuppoſition of their being animated. ibid. b. 790. a. b. 791. a. b. 792. a. b. III. 790. b. 791. a. b. 792. a. Their motion of declination did no ways ſerve the two purpoſes for which Epicurus deſigned it. II. 791. a. b. 792. a. The abſurdity of ſuch a motion. ibid. Who was the inventer of atoms. III. 788. a. They are admitted with a vacuum, by a ſect of Philoſophers in the Eaſt. 792. a. An obſervation upon that Hypotheſis. IV. 437. b. 438. a. The bare motion of atoms, is not able to produce that regularity which is to be ſeen in plants. 266. b. 267. a.

Attack: the greateſt generals, and thoſe who are appointed by Heaven to perform the greateſt exploits, do not take all the towns which they attack. V. 655.

Attention of a profound and ſingular kind. II. 597. b. 637. b. 638. a.

Atticus (Pomponius) the longer his epiſtles were, the finer they were. I. 427. b. Statues were erected to him at Athens. 539. b. He was of the ſect of Epicurus, and nevertheleſs a man of great worth. 541.

Attila kills himſelf on his wedding-day, by too much drinking. III. 482. a. Being ſoftened by a ſpeech he marches back beyond the Danube. 758. b. 759. a. His ſeverity to one of his Panegyriſts. IV. 169.

Attilius, whether he ought to be ranked among the Tragic or Comic writers. I. 60. b.

Attorneys: There never was a ſaint of that profeſſion. IV. 487. b.

Avarice, a ſentence of Bion's touching that vice, canonized by St Paul. II. 15. Bad excuſes for that vice. V. 147. b. 148. a. b. The ſordid avarice of a Profeſſor of Phyſic. 136. a. b. 137. a.

Avaux (the Count d') ſends ſeveral copies of the book intituled, Lux in Tenebris, &c. to Paris. III. 679. a.

Aubertin, the plan of his book on the Euchariſt. I. 545. a. b.

Aubeterre (the Viſcount d') what trade he followed at Geneva for a livelihood. V. 187. b.

Aubignac (the Abbot d') his academy was compoſed of perſons of merit and erudition. V. 444. b.

Aubigné (d') has improved upon a paſſage of Thuanus. I. 119. a. b. A paſſage of his criticized. 711. a. Examination of a ſtory which he relates. II. 148. a. b. He renders his other ſtories ſuſpected by his ſatirical ſtrokes. ibid. b. His miſtake as to the place where Goudimel was maſſacred. III. 197. a. Whether he was deſcended from Joan d'Albret, Queen of Navarre. IV. 331, 332. a. b. What he ſays of a book of taxes. 649. b. 650. a. Remarks upon two paſſages of his. V. 733. He is deputed by the King of Navarre touching the affront offered to his wife. IV. 341. b. Cenſured on that head. ibid.

Aubigné (Conſtant d') ſon to the foregoing: his children. I. 546. b.

Audebert, a Jeſuit, offers in the name of his communion to give up many things for the ſake of peace. I. 263. b. He enters into ſecret negotiations with ſome miniſters for the re-union of the two religions. III. 123. a. b. Gives in a project of re-union to Cardinal Richelieu. V. 804.

Audiguier (d') quoted. II. 128. b. 129. b. III. 300. b. 301. a. 857. a. 859. b. Two authors of that name. I. 548.

Auditors, their memory is a terrible thing to preachers, and advocates who contradict themſelves. I. 351. b.

Avein, the ſmall advantages that were reaped from that victory. III. 829. b.

Aventine (John) The Proteſtants publiſhed his annals from an entire manuſcript. I. 549. a. His fate may be compared with that of Father Paul. 551. a. He is accuſed of having forged ſeveral ſatirical reflexions, in order to ſlander the Popes. III. 233. b. 234. a. He reſolutely denies the ſtory of the She-Pope, and paves the way for all thoſe who have denied it ſince. IV. 731. b. 732. a. 710. b. He is cried down by the Cardinals, Baronius and Bellarmin. 732. a.

Aventinus (Mount) the mutinous populace withdraws to it. III. 490. b.

Averroës was Avicenna's rival and enemy. I. 553. a. His opinion touching the ſoul, or univerſal intellect, common to all particular underſtandings. 554. a. b. 555. a. b. II. 316. b. IV. 913. a. At preſent no body waſtes time in reading him. I. 556. a. His irreligion. ibid. b. 557. a. b. He wiſhed his ſoul might be among the Philoſophers. IV. 704. b. N. Vernias, and A. Niphus maintain his opinion on the unity of the intellect. 377. b.

Augſburg, the magiſtrates of that city erect a ſchool, which they call St Ann's. III. 145. b. When and how their library was enriched with good manuſcripts. 478. a. What office is that of Duumvir, and that of Prætor in that city. V. 447. a. Popery is baniſhed from thence. IV. 285. b. 286. a.

Auguries, reaſons againſt the ſcience of Auguries. II. 629. b. The Roman ladies went to ſeek for nuptial Auguries or preſages. IV. 200. b.

Auguſtin (Saint) the reaſon he gives why Adam did not conſummate his marriage till after his fall. I. 22. a. b. He is cenſured for his looſe morality on a capital point. 91. a. b. In what he makes the opening of our firſt parents eyes to conſiſt. 101. a. b. He is called an African, violent and full of heat. 106. a. is called obſcure in his writings, and fickle in his notions with reſpect to the doctrine of Grace. ibid. He is ill treated by ſome Proteſtants. 109. b. He approves of Cicero's raillery upon a religious worſhip which conſiſted in weeping. 114. a.

His

His exclamation on Abraham's concubinage. 123. a. He found an apology for perſecution in Sarah's. treatment of Hagar. ibid. Is deſervedly reprimanded for it in the Philoſophical Commentary. ibid. A paſſage of that Father againſt perſecution. 287. b. 288. a. What he ſaid of Apollonius Tyanæus. 282. a. and of Apuleius. 394. a. His authority with the Roman Catholics. 470. a. The picture which he has drawn of his youth. 562. a. b. 563. a. b. He gave himſelf up betimes to debauchery. 563. a. b. His ſyſtem, for which the Church of Rome has engaged her reſpect, caſts her into perplexity. 564. a. b. to 566. a. He aſks of God the gift of continency, but is afraid of being taken at his word. 108. a. Has ſolidly refuted the doctrines of Democritus. 643. a. And has ſhewn us the difference between that Philoſopher and Epicurus. ibid. He begs of God the grace of being delivered from certain dreams. III. 73. a. He is ſeverely reprimanded by a modern author, on account of ſome notions touching the practice of the Cynics. 458. b. By what arguments he ſupports the miracles of the Scripture againſt the Heathens. 578. b. Reflexion on one of the effects of prejudice. ibid. and 579. a. He throws the blame of an ignominious peace which Jovian had made, upon Julian. 586. a. Ridicules Paganiſm. 642. a. One of his objections examined. 912. b. 913. a. It was an happy thing that he abandoned the Manichean Hereſy. IV. 95, 96. He is unjuſtly cenſured by Tanaquillus Faber with reſpect to the licentiouſneſs of the ſtage. 568. a. b. Was more fortunate than wiſe in his notions touching the ſoul of beaſts. 901. b. His exaggeration of Sarah's decay. V. 53. b. He has not made a good apology for the conduct of Sarah and Abraham. 54. b. 55. a. b. People have no great opinion of the learning of St Auguſtin's Friars. 235. a. He made an improper choice of examples to convince the Heathens, that the mother of Jeſus Chriſt was a virgin. 772. a. b. His maxim touching the neceſſity of ſpeaking about obſcene things. III. 135. b. What he ſaid of the gods Stercutius and Cloacina, and of ſome people who ſeemed to ſing when they broke wind. ibid.

Auguſtin (Antony) cenſured upon the ſubject of the Familia Hortenſia. III. 490. a. He is ſent by the Pope to Philip II. IV. 200. Is a friend of John Metel's. ibid.

Auguſtus remits an hundred talents to the inhabitants of the iſland of Coos, for the Venus Anadyomene. I. 369. a. One of his jeſts. II. 356. b. He was the firſt who took cognizance of Defamatory Libels, in order to puniſh the authors of them. 353. a. b. 354. a. b. 355. a. b. 356. a. His deſign was to marry his daughter Julia to Cotiſon, King of the Getæ, and that he himſelf ſhould marry the daughter of the ſame Cotiſon. 560. a. He makes choice in the enemies army of thoſe whom he intended to admit to his greateſt familiarity. 632. b. The Poets of his court were animated with the ſame ſpirit as the Poets of the preſent time. 715. a. He had a ſingular tenderneſs for Druſus. 717. a. How he would have the ſupreme authority called. 718. a. He cauſes a library to be erected in the temple of Apollo Palatinus. III. 8. a. To what length his weakneſs, touching dreams, proceeded. IV. 73. b. The empire was foretold to him when he was an infant. 369. a. Reflexion on that prediction. ibid. b. and 370. a. It was under him that dancing came to its perfection. 646. b. A fine edict of that Emperor for preſerving the chaſtity of maids. V. 337. a. His treatment of Ovid. IV. 445. Idolized literally by that Poet. ibid. and 446. a. b. His grief and his anger muſt have been awakened when Ovid mentioned what he had ſeen, and what was the cauſe of his baniſhment. 443. b. Suetonius ſays nothing to inſinuate his amours with his daughter or grand-daughter. 444. a. Reaſons againſt the conjecture of his being guilty of inceſt with his grand-daughter. ibid. b. His policy in not recalling Ovid from baniſhment. ibid. and 445. a. He orders all inſtruments concerning debts, which occaſioned calumnies and quarrels, to be burnt. III. 278. a.

Avignon ſold to the Pope for a very inconſiderable ſum. IV. 301, 304.

Aulus Gellius, a whole chapter of his quoted. I. 127. a. b. Examination of his apology for Virgil. II. 234. a. b. His opinion touching the abſurdities that were aſcribed to Democritus. 639. b. He did not underſtand a graſhopper by the word ſaltatricula. III. 491. b. He is falſely corrected upon the ſubject of Lævius. 699. a. b. Cenſured. II. 259. a. The difference of that author's chapters according to the different editions. 385. a.

Aunoi (Madam d') quoted. IV. 365. a. b.

Aurelian, the ſeverity of his morals was only fit for the ſect of the Montaniſts. I. 571. a. What ſirname was given to him. ibid. b. The judgment which Vopiſcus paſſed upon that Prince. 576. b. His elogy. 575. b. 576. a. In what manner he juſtifies himſelf for having led a Queen in triumph. V. 603. a.

Aurelius (Marcus), the piece attributed to that Emperor is not the hiſtory of his life, as Naudé believed it was. II. 321. His anſwer to thoſe who adviſed him to divorce his wife. III. 793. a.

Auſonius, whether or not he was a Chriſtian. I. 582. b. 583. a. b. He was cenſured with reſpect to the dead body of Hector. 81. b. To what a degree an epigram of that Poet was admired. II. 619. b. He ingeniouſly obviates an objection in his acknowledgment to Gratian. III. 107. a.

Auſpices, reaſons againſt the ſcience of Auſpices. II. 629. b. 630. a. Who invented it. V. 386.

Auſterities of ſome Indian Philoſophers. II. 115. a. b. 116. a. b. III. 312. b. 313. a. b.

Auſtralians, their particular make. V. 4. a. b. 5. a. Their notion of eternal reſt. ibid. a. b. Why they never ſpeak of God. ibid. b. Their origin, and the notion they have with reſpect to that of the Europeans. ibid. 6. a. Who the author is that ſpeaks of the Auſtralians. 7. a. b.

Auſtria (the houſe of), from whence it derives its pedigree, according to the Benedictine Monks. I. 341. a. b. Who reſtored that houſe to all its former ſplendor in Germany. II. 692. It carries on the negotiation at Munſter with great policy. 691. b. Its proſperity notwithſtanding the threatenings of ſome pretended Prophets. 537, 538, 539. 690, 691, 692. III. 682. a. b. 683. a. Richelieu formed a deſign to humble it. I. 785, 786. a. Cardinal de Berulle oppoſes it, and is ſeconded by Marillac, Keeper of the Seals, &c. ibid. a. It cauſes the troops of the Circle of Burgundy to enter the Electorate of Cologn. II. 224. a. b.

Auſtria (Anne of) her anſwer to a Bookſeller. I. 544. b. See Anne.

Auſtria (Don John of) headed a party that oppoſed the Queen-Regent. IV. 365.

Authority (the way of), people come back to it after having cried it down. I. 242. b. 243. a. IV. 474. a. Without it every ſect is liable to be ſplit into a great variety of ſubdiviſions. I. 287. Whether the Roman Catholics and Proteſtants differ in that reſpect. IV. 65. a. The difficulties attending the ſaid way. 361. a. b. to 364. a. 535. a. b. 536. a. It neceſſarily leads every particular man to be of the national religion. 792. a. To make a right uſe of the ſaid way in our ſearch after truth, we muſt firſt examine where it reſides. 536. a. to 538. a.

Authority of the Pope: John-Thomas Rocaberti writes ſeveral volumes in defence of it, and cauſed to be printed at his own expence a collection in twenty volumes in folio under the title of Bibliotheca Pontificia. IV. 883.

Authors: An author divided into three, and his works in the ſame manner. I. 12. When a perſon has a mind to deſcribe an author by his relations, he ſhould ſpeak of relations that are known. 652. b. At what time an author may be ſaid to flouriſh and become illuſtrious. II. 396. b. His age may almoſt be as eaſily known by the ſtrokes of his pen, as by the features of his face. IV. 689. a. Authors who quote no body hope to be quoted themſelves. I. 20. a. They copy after each other. 23. b. Ought not to be cited for conjectures which other perſons have advanced. 63. b. Ought to make their retreat in time. 120. a. b. II. 619. They are very unwilling to confeſs a miſtake. 161. b. No authors cite themſelves ſo often as thoſe who ſuppreſs their names. 181. b. Several of them falſify facts in order to make them ſerve their purpoſes. 198. a. b. Some perſons, thro' too much care of becoming good authors, never become authors at all. 200. b. Authors that were only rich in words. 330. a. Thoſe who amplify what they quote cannot be too much cenſured for it. 338. b. They ought never to ſuppreſs the principal circumſtances of a fact. 372. a. It would be of great uſe to criticize on their falſe Logic. 394. b. They ſometimes put off their creditors with an aſſignment on the next dedication. 442. a. Their addreſs and policy. 451. 460. b. II. 643. b. Their rude and unpolite behaviour in former times, when they were at war with one another. I. 514. b. They occaſion a great deal of obſcurity by their neglecting to put the words in their natural order. 602. b. They change maxims as their occaſions require; but chiefly Divines do ſo. 616. a. 617. a. b. A moral reflexion which may ſerve to comfort authors of a low rank. 701. a. It is very uſeful to collect examples of their inſincerity. 799. b. Authors ought continually to be on their guard againſt diſtractions of mind. 759. a. Profane authors may be conſulted in order to explain the chronology of the Scripture. 775. b. They ought to be acquainted with the moſt common books, and the moſt ſcarce pamphlets. II. 94. a. There are things which authors never publiſh when they rightly underſtand their duty. 266. b. There are ſome who would never have been authors if they had not been attacked. 328. a. Many falſely brag of having been familiarly acquainted with an author that is grown into reputation by his writings. 284. b. 404. b. Severe tribunals ſhould be ſet up againſt ſome authors. 451. b. An author who is a Layman is more at liberty than a Preacher to ſpeak his ſentiments. 454. b. There are ſome authors who do not publiſh every part of a work according to its order. 484. b. They relate what the Antients tell us, with a thouſand alterations. 535. b. It is hardly poſſible that future ages ſhould not put ſeveral quite different conſtructions upon what authors ſay. 595. b. III. 447. b. The different circumſtances in which they are, contribute much to make them more or leſs famous. II. 518. b. Their diſputes never fail to produce effects that are fatal to the reputation which they had as men of worth. 583. b. Perſons who have wrote books concerning authors of the ſame name. 633. a. b. They do not love that another ſhould interfere with them. 683. a. The groſs artifice of thoſe who make a merit of being hated by people of other perſuaſions. 695. b. Whether ſome Proteſtant authors were hated by the Romans Catholics, becauſe they defended the good cauſe well. ibid. Authors that quote no body do not deſerve to be quoted. 778. a. b. 779. a. The moſt effectual method of reſtraining ſuch of them as are given to ſlander. 800. a. b. Thoſe of the firſt rank ought to die, as ſoon as their glory is arrived at its meridian. 825. a. It is ſometimes dangerous to be too laviſh in beſtowing praiſes upon them. III. 249. b. Their tenderneſs for their own works is immoderate. 377. a. 378. b. 384. a. b. Their fate is deplorable: for even when they think that they apply their utmoſt attention, they miſtake the ſenſe of the eaſieſt paſſages. 838. b. They forget in one place of the ſame book, what they have ſaid in another. 14. b. There are ſome who compoſe treatiſes which are only fit to be poſthumous ones. 175. b. 176. a. There are ſome who ſeem to compoſe with a wonderful facility, who nevertheleſs take great pains in writing. 261. b. 262. a. b. IV. 85. a. b. 86. a. They ought ſometimes to prefer their own judgments before the judgments of others. 337. b. What they ought to do in order to obtain rewards from the public. 340. a. b. A cauſe of their miſtakes, that ſpreads itſelf farther than is imagined. 451. b. There are ſome who correct their writings too much. 836. a. b. 877. a. There are ſome who are harder to be pleaſed in the beginning than in the ſequel of their work. ibid. b. There are others, who, reviſing a work they deſire to reprint, are at greater pains, than at the firſt compoſition. ibid. There are ſome who are only learned in their collections. 195. a. b. One of the cauſes which have produced chimerical authors. 402. b. There are ſcarce any who do not complain of the ingratitude of the age. 459. b. to 461. a. It is impoſſible that thoſe who have a great many adverſaries ſhould not contract an habit of reproachful language. 475. a. They ſhould miſtruſt their memory, and not alledge any thing without firſt conſulting over again the books where they had read it. 568. b. They ſeldom give any thing for nothing, in point of praiſes and compliments. 595. a. b. Have a right to coin new words. 743. a. b. It were to be wiſhed that they were neither poor nor rich. 894. b. 895. a. In what ſenſe thoſe who traffic with their works are to be commended, and in what ſenſe to be blamed. 843. a. What authors have wrote collections of proverbs. V. 199. a. b. One is ſeldom at a loſs to find out the religion of the preſent authors. 235. a. Their bad way of quoting. 325. b. 326. a. Famous authors get honour by indifferent performances. 340. b. Reflexion upon the conduct of thoſe who procure the prohibition of their adverſaries books. 343. a. And upon the conſequences that may be drawn from their writings to their morals. 420. a. b. &c. There are ſome of them whom it would be very difficult to enrich. 403. b. Modern authors ſhould advance nothing but what they have credible witneſſes for. II. 639. a. A maxim which they ought carefully to ſtudy. V. 738. a. There are no authors ſo ſubject as Poets to forget their promiſes not to print any more. II. 83. a. Fontaine's verſes upon that ſubject. ibid. Menage's chapters upon the ſame ſubject. ibid. b. It is a method of obliging an author in the moſt agreeable manner, to adviſe people to buy his books. 314. A great author of little books, who was ſo called, and in what ſenſe. 528. An author who ſuffers ſome things to be inſerted in his works gives a handle for ſaying that they are not his. 688, 689. The ſmalleſt change of letters in their proper names multiplies them without reaſon. III. 534. It is a crying injuſtice to deſpiſe authors who had great obſtacles to ſurmount at a time when literature was but beginning to revive. IV. 166. a. Some authors ſurpaſs them at preſent, who would not have equalled them, if they had lived in their time. ibid. It is not without example, that a lacquey has become a diſtinguiſhed author. 173. b. Typographical errors multiply them. 193. One cannot do an author a greater diſſervice than by proclaiming his works under too pompous a character. 284. a. Several are negligent in correcting their works, and give it over. 451. a. The ableſt authors rather chuſe to be ſilent than to attack a book that is too ſtrong for them. V. 179. b. 180. a. It is allowable for them to contrive the matter ſo as to make their books acceptable. 810.

in

Automata: The hypotheſis of Automata is the only way to get out of the plunge. II. 779. b. Whether or not, and how far, Des Cartes was the inventer of them. IV. 546. b. Whether the Antients taught that the ſouls of beaſts were only Automata. 552. a. b. to 554. a. b. The greateſt difficulties which attend that ſyſtem. 908. b. 909. a. b. The Automata of Des Cartes are very advantageous to the true religion. 901. b. & ſeq.

Autumn of age, how far it reaches. IV. 163. a.

Auvergnates (in Latin Arverni) boaſted to have Julius Cæſar's ſword. II. 419. b. When and by what means they appeared at the court of France in the higheſt poſts. I. 482. a.

Auvergne (the Count Dauphin of) killed in the King's preſence, and in full council. II. 463. a. b.

Auxerre, the rebellion of that city. I. 258. b. The ſervice which the Sieur de Chaſtelux performed to the Chapter of that city, and what privilege was granted to him by the Chapter. II. 461. a.

Axtius (the Phyſician) condemned to make a public recantation of a calumny which he had vented. IV. 504. b.

Azizus, King of the Emeſenians, cauſes himſelf to be circumciſed, to marry a Jew. II. 701.

Azotus, the length of its ſiege. I. 590. IV. 790.

Azrun, twin-ſiſter to Cain occaſions the death of Abel, and how. I. 24. a. She marries Cain. ibid.

B.

Babylonian numbers, Horace would not ſuffer them to be conſulted. II. 125.

Babylonians: They boaſted of an antiquity which far exceeded the age of the world. I. 595. a. b. Father Hardouin's correction of a paſſage of Pliny touching the antiquity of letters among them, explained. 596. a. b.

Bacchus, the celebration of his feaſt required continence the preceding night. III. 934. a. He was adored by the Pagans under an infamous name. V. 134. a. b. He encroaches leſs upon Venus in the ſouth, than Venus upon Bacchus in the north. II. 823. a. b.

Bacon: his new Atlantis. III. 345. a.

Baden, how the Swiſs bathe there. V. 423. b.

Baden (the Marquis of) introduces the reformation in his dominions. III. 256.

Baduellus: his quarrel with William Bigot. II. 8. a. b.

Bagnio-keepers. The Bagnio-keepers of Paris had a mind to aſſaſſinate James des Parts, becauſe he forbid the uſe of baths in time of peſtilence. IV. 484. b.

Baïard fought a duel with Alphonſo de Sotomajore, in the year 1503. V. 139. b.

Bajazet ſets the Count de Nevers at liberty upon his paying his ranſom. II. 206. a. b. 207. a. He ſends to Rome the iron of the lance, which pierced the body of our Saviour. III. 566. a. b. He loved Philoſophy. 729. a. b.

Baif (Lazarus de) goes as far as Rome to attend the leſſons of a Greek Profeſſor. IV. 295. b.

Baif (John Antony de), what he ſays of his poverty and education. V. 462. a. b.

Baillet quoted. I. 219. b. 220. a. b. III. 662. a. b. & paſſim alibi. Praiſed for his civility and equity. I. 796. a. His judgment upon what paſſed in the Conference of Ratiſbon. III. 536. a. He has forgot an Anti in the collection that he has made. 701. b. His civility to the author of this Dictionary is an exceſs of ceremony, prejudicial to the liberty which every body ought to enjoy in the commonwealth of learning. IV. 548. b. His diſcourſe of the life of the ſaints. V. 433. b.

Bains, the Emperor Charles V is magnificently feaſted there. III. 530. a. Henry entirely burns down the magnificent palace which was there. ibid. b.

Baldus, a quick repartee which he made. I. 616. a.

Baldus Lupatinus, upon a ſuſpicion of Hereſy is thrown into the ſea, after he had been impriſoned twenty years. III. 557. a.

Ballets: The uſe of ballets was eſtabliſhed in France, before Mary de Medicis brought Rinuccini there. IV. 879. a. b.

Balls dangerous to chaſtity. V. 23. a. b. to 25. a. b.

Balqhane, a noble family in Scotland. III. 784.

Baltaſarini, See Beaujoyeux.

Baluzius, the hiſtory of his diſpute with the Abbot Faget. IV. 102. b. 103. a. b. He has furniſhed the author with divers memoirs. 427. n. (a). V. 111. n. (a). a. n. (1).

Balyra, a river of the Peloponneſus, whence ſo called. V. 326. b.

Balzac, his pleaſant reflexion on Alexander ab Alexandro. I. 224. a. Balzac and Balſac are very different. 622. a. A curious piece, which gives room to ſuſpect that Balzac had once a mind to turn Huguenot in Holland. 623. a. b. Very ill uſed by Theophilus. ibid. b. His jokes on the impatiency of modern women who have too cold huſbands. II. 79. a. b. Quoted. 350. a. V. 333. a. b. n. (1), (2). He looked upon it as a ſad puniſhment to be obliged to praiſe all new printed books. II. 620. b. He ridicules a Grammarian who hectored the Deity. 648. b. 649. a. His criticiſm on Alexander cenſured by Coſtar. 667. b. What he ſays of ſome devout women in Spain. III. 82. a. b. One plainly perceives that his productions coſt him a great deal of pains. 262. b. IV. 85. a. b. The ſource of his difference with Phyllarchus. III. 204. a. How much he contributed to the politeneſs which is ſpread over the kingdom of France. 855. a. He inveighs againſt Montmaur. IV. 249. a. b. 250. a. b. He would fain have been thought the author of a work which he did not write. 279. a. b. 280. a. b. What he ſaid of the contrariety of ingredients in the human compoſition. 441. a. He had too much vanity. 459. b. He expreſſes himſelf too eloquently upon the ſubject of his diſeaſes. 461. a. How he ſpeaks of the Prince of Condé with reſpect to a civil war. 488. b. He ſays that he loved the Proteſtants much. 528. a. Could not endure the word Pangloſſia. 531. b. He tells a witty ſaying of Cato the Cenſor. 754. b. 755. a. He is guilty of a ſmall piece of plagiariſm in making uſe of the words which Famianus Strada applied to Quintus Curtius. 811. b. A judgment paſſed upon his works. V. 345. b. 346. a. b. His character of d'Audiguier. I. 548. b. He brings a ridiculous charge againſt ſome anonymous perſons. 801. a. b. He ridicules the vain diſplay of reading, which was a cuſtom that formerly prevailed at the bar. II. 105. b. A trick which he made uſe of to give one a great idea of his reading. 398. b. A ſupplement to the hiſtory of his diſpute with Father Goulu. IV. 284. a. b. 285. a. b. Jokes upon his works. 284. b. He beſtows hyperbolical praiſes on the Abbot de St Cyran. V. 15. b.

Bandel relates an elogy given to Luther by Leo X. III. 766. b.

Bangius, a learned Dane, would not accept the place of Hebrew Profeſſor, but upon condition that he ſhould go to Paris to perfect himſelf under Gabriel Sconita. IV. 493. a.

Baniſhment; ſome people have looked upon it as a piece of good fortune. I. 637. b. The common fate of thoſe, who had the greateſt ſhare in the government of the commonwealth of Athens. II. 289.

Banquet of the wiſe-men; is a defamatory Libel compoſed by Father Garaſſe, againſt the honour of one of the firſt Magiſtrates of France. III. 134. Alegambe does not deny it. ibid.

Banquets, there are ſome which are as dangerous to certain people, as a ſet battle to a Colonel. III. 846. a.

Baptiſm, in the Primitive Church, people received it naked, of what age or ſex ſoever they were. III. 331. a. And ſeveral put off receiving it till the laſt moment of their lives. V. 257. b.

Bar, its tireſome wranglings. II. 724. a. b. The vain reading which people formerly diſplayed there. 105. b.

Baram, interpreter of dreams at the court of the King of Perſia. I. 87.

Barbaroſſa (Frederic), whether he was trod under foot by the Pope. II. 406. a.

Barbaroſſa, King of Algiers, takes Fondi by aſſault, and what was his motive. III. 189. b.

Barbo (Nicholas), a noble Venetian, father to Pope Paul II. IV. 509.

Barchobebus paſſes for the Meſſiah. I. 173. Akiba declares for him. ibid.

Bark, how that powder was called at firſt. III. 931. b.

Barnes, editor of Euripides, his explication of Lucian's Balance examined. II. 865. b. 866. a.

Barnevelt, what he ſaid to Gomarus and Arminius before the States of Holland. III. 174. a. One of his ſons was beheaded at the Hague, and for what reaſon. 802. b.

Barocius (Petrus), his gentle remonſtrances to Nicoletus Vernias, and Auguſtin Niphus. IV. 377. a. b.

Baronius dares not decide the point between Theodoret and Socrates, touching one of the Kings of Perſia. I. 13. a. Is cenſured with reſpect to St Anne. 342. a. Deceives the Proteſtants in the idea of a book of Damian's, to the diſadvantage of his own communion. II. 589. b. Why he never named, even while he confuted, the centuriators of Magdeburg. 643. b. Whence it comes to paſs that he confirms certain ſlanders of the Pagan authors. III. 20. b. He commits a fault in Chronology, which was not known to Mr du Pin. 219. a. Is an enemy to ſovereigns; and his annals are full of lies. V. 93. b. Expected to be made Pope after Paul V. 96. b. Continuation of his annals. II. 241. He is cenſured for what he ſays of Florimond de Remond's book touching the She-Pope. IV. 732.

Barrenneſs: The Jews ſay that an huſband ought not to cohabit with his wiſe, after he has found her barren for the ſpace of ten years. I. 122. b. An obſtacle to a widow's marriage. 393. b. Philoſophers who pretended to cure it. III. 311. b.

Barriere: (Don John de la) firſt Abbot of the Feuillants, his conduct during the troubles of the league, and his attachment to Henry III repreſented by Father Pradhilon. IV. 764. a. b.

Bartas (du) his Week is attacked with ſome ſort of reſpect. III. 128. a. b.

Barth (John) beats the Dutch men of war, and ſaves the corn which was in the ſhips under his convoy. IV. 211. a.

Barthius cenſured. I. 538. b. He paſſes a reaſonable judgment upon the works of Marſus. IV. 166. a. b. The juſtice which he does to authors who lived in the time that learning began to revive. ibid. He engages himſelf in a ſuperfluous refutation touching the marrow of lions. I. 76. a. He is not conſiſtent with himſelf. 118. a. His cauſeleſs fear of dying without poſterity. 664. a. He cenſures ſeveral great men for ranking a modern Poet among the antient authors. II. 524. b. His blunder touching a courtezan, whom he takes for another. III. 701. b. He is cenſured with reſpect to Patricius of Siena. IV. 507. a. b.

Bartholomew (Maſſacre of St) Charpentier's apology for that maſſacre. II. 446. a. b. 447. a. The cauſes of it falſely related. IV. 700. b. 701. a. b. An author who was not aſhamed to make an ode in praiſe of it. II. 399.

Bartolus deſires ſome time to anſwer an objection. I. 615. a. Cinus was his maſter, not his ſcholar. II. 508. a.

Baſiarians, a queſtion whether there ever will be ſuch a ſect among the Anabaptiſts. IV. 87. b.

Baſil, all its relics were, in the time of the council, carried and placed in the room of the abſent Biſhops. I. 178. The memory of Eraſmus is very much reſpected there: proof of it. II. 804. a. b. They ſhew his cloſet, &c. there. ibid. b. Twelve cart-loads of images are burnt there before the town-houſe. 813. a.

Baſil (St) would not have people truſt to the mutilations of eunuchs. II. 533. b. A compariſon which he alledges for that purpoſe. ibid. He makes a bad anſwer to the Manichees. IV. 112. b. 113. a. 515. a. b.

Baſilides (the great Duke) plunders the country of the Livonians. II. 42. a. b.

Baſnage quoted. II. 301. b. III. 943. b. IV. 91. a. 97. See the Diſſertation upon Junius Brutus. V. 731, & ſeq.

Baſnage Sieur de Beauval: his Conſiderations ſur deux Sermons de Mr Jurieu. V. 642. a. b. His Lettre ſur les Differens de Mr Jurieu, & de Mr Bayle. 645. b. n. (53). His Mr Jurieu convicted of Impoſture and Calumny. 646. b. 647. a.

Baſſompierre quoted. III. 301. a. b. 302. a. V. 531. a. 532. a. The head of that family is ſprung from the commerce of a woman with a ſpirit. IV. 408. b. The Hiſtory of ſome of his gallantries. V. 391. a. b.

Baſſora (the Prince of) pretends to be Mahomet's chief favourite, and by his credit with him to give ſuch or ſuch a place in Paradice. IV. 123. a.

Baſtard, whether it is a diſhonour to be one. III. 722. a.

Baſtards have commonly a good ſhare of wit. II. 228.

Bath: it was againſt decency among the Pagans, that a father and a ſon ſhould bathe in the ſame place. I. 563. a. n. (6). See Baden.

Baths were in uſe at Paris in the time of Charles VII. IV. 484. b.

Bats (Violente de) cauſes her huſband to be aſſaſſinated by her adulterers. V. 107. a. b. 108. a.

Battle, it is ridiculous for a man to boaſt of having won a battle, when he draws no advantage from it. II. 413. a. b. The moſt common cauſe of its uſeleſſneſs, is when the commander of the victorious army fears peace. ibid. n. (6).

Battles; the gaining of battels more ſubject to Hiſtorical Pyrrhoniſm, than the taking of fortified places. III. 719. b.

Bavaria (Lewis of) excluded from the rank of Emperors, but reſtored to it by a public retractation. II. 238. a. His reign counted for nothing by Rainaldus, who affects to call him by no other name than the Bavarian. ibid. His apology by Herwart is condemned by the Inquiſition, and for what reaſon. 238. a. b. Who the true author of the annals of Bavaria is. III. 43. a. b.

Bavaria (the Elector of) ſurprizes Ulm by an admirable ſtratagem which was well executed. V. 504.

Bauderon, the ſon, accuſes John de Renou of Plagiariſm. IV. 864.

Baudouin, King of Jeruſalem, is poiſoned by his own Phyſician. IV. 383.

Baudouin (the Civilian) changes his religion as often as his linnen. I. 690. b. What he adviſed to be done for defeating the conference of Poiſſy. 692. a. He has writ a treatiſe of the means of attaining to a good reformation. 697. b. His anſwers to Calvin and Beza. III. 523. a. b. 524. a.

Baudrand cenſured with reſpect to Antinoe. I. 346. a. b. The change which happened to the city of Azotus, was juſt the reverſe of what he makes it. 590. b.

Baudri (Paul) Profeſſor of ſacred Hiſtory at Utrecht, made himſelf very much eſteemed by his Lectures. I. 672.

Beans, who was the firſt that abſtained from them. I. 277. b. The Egyptians abſtained from them. IV. 670. a. b. The Pythagoreans likewiſe abſtained from them, and for what reaſons. ibid. b. 671. a. The Schola Salernitana forbids the eating of them. ibib. b. Whether they can be converted into blood. 672. a.

Bearn, put in a better condition than it was in before. IV. 317. a. b. The progreſs which the Proteſtant religion makes there. 325. a. b. to 327. a. b. The exerciſe of the Catholic religion is aboliſhed there. ibid.

Bearnois (or He of Bearn) a name which thoſe concerned in the League gave to Henry IV. III. 276. a.

Beaſt. A diſcovery which was made of the number of the beaſt. I. 719. b. 720. a.

Beaſts, the great diſadvantages that attend moral reflexions grounded on their conduct. I. 640. a. b. 641. a. b. Theſe moral reflexions are liable to be be turned into a jeſt and ſo to be eluded. 640. a. Whether they could determine themſelves, if two objects were preſent, which drew them with equal force, one one way, and the other another. II. 226. b. 227. a. Anaxagoras attributed to them an intelligent ſoul, to which he gave the ſame name as to God. I. 301. a. Their actions perhaps are one of the moſt profound myſteries, on which our reaſon can be exerciſed. 641. b. Several of them have been celebrated by the wits. III. 209. b. Whether Des Cartes may be looked upon as the inventer of the opinion which he had about them. IV. 548. a. b. What was the opinion of the antient Philoſophers about the ſouls of beaſts. ibid. b. 549. a. b. 550. a. b. Whether the Antients taught that they were no more than Automata. 551. b. to 554. a. b. The facts which concern the capacity of beaſts are no leſs puzzling to the followers of Ariſtotle than to thoſe of Des Cartes. 901. a. b. A catalogue of thoſe who have believed that the ſouls of beaſts were rational. 902. b. to 905. a. b. The ill conſequences of the opinion which gives beaſts a ſenſitive ſoul. 905. b. 906. a. b. &c. Beaſts expoſed for a ſpectacle after their death, in order to keep other beaſts in awe. 908. b. Authors who have maintained that they have rational ſouls. 911. b. 912. a. b. &c. Their actions imputed to an external principle. 913. a. Authors who have maintained that beaſts are mere machines, or who have confuted that opinion. ibid. b. 914. a. b. &c. Different opinions about their ſouls. V. 115. a. b. 116. a. b.

Beaujoyeux renders himſelf famous at the Court of France in the reign of Henry III, by his inventions of ballets, concerts, &c. IV. 879. b.

Beaume Montreuïl (Francis de la) was ſo learned that ſhe converted a Rabbin in a regular diſputation. V. 298. b.

Beauty, the picture of a perfect beauty. I. 399. a. Of a laſting kind. 401. a. II. 514. a. b. 515. a. III. 371. a. b. 372. a. It wounds us at a diſtance. 65. a. Thirty things neceſſary to make it perfect. 363. b. Wherein its force conſiſts. 377. a. b. After ſome ſome time the beauty of wives begins to affect their huſbands leſs. 646. a. Not only the ſpring but likewiſe the autumn of beauty is agreeable. IV. 236. a. There have been cities where not only the women, but alſo the men diſputed about beauty. V. 312. b. n. (15).

Beauvais, privileges that were granted to the women of that city. II. 217. a. b.

Becanus, his calumnies, and his falſe conſequences againſt Calviniſm. V. 441. a. b.

Bees, what we are told of their acute ſmell. II. 636. a.

Behme was an Enthuſiaſt. III. 689. a.

Being: whether the idea of Being may be applied ſynonimouſly to God and his creatures. I. 488. b. The general doctrine of Philoſophers touching the idea of it. V. 221. a. b. to 223. a. b.

Bela, King of Hungary, in what manner he recompenſed the Frangipani's who had aſſiſted him with money. III. 101. a. b.

Believe. Des-Barreaux pretended that there was nothing ſo difficult to a man of wit as to believe. II. 649. b.

Belino (Gentile) a famous Venetian Painter returns from the Sultan's Court loaded with preſents. IV. 54. a.

Bellai: Meſſieurs du Bellai concern themſelves extremely in the good ſucceſs of Henry VIIIth's divorce. I. 716. a. b. The Cardinal's conſcientious marriage. 724. a. The art which William du Bellai uſed with the Proteſtants of Germany. 721. a. b. Facts that concern Martin du Bellai. 721. b. 722. a. They are the patrons of William Bigot. II. 8. a. b. Tarcagnota tranſlates into Italian a treatiſe of the Military Art, which is aſcribed to William du Bellai. IV. 918. Different editions of Martin du Bellai's Memoirs. I. 722. a.

Bellay (the Biſhop of) is puzzled about the power that is attributed to the Holy Virgin. III. 84. b.

Bellantes (Antony) a Nobleman of Siena, how he got off when accuſed of ſeveral miſdemeanors. IV. 463.

Bellarmin, his contradictions. I. 132. a. A Proteſtant Profeſſor makes a recantation of what he had charged him with. 727. b. 728. a. One of his uſual ſayings. 732. b. The vow which he made in caſe the Papal dignity ſhould be conferred upon him. 733. b. 734. a. Said there were too many Chriſtians. V. 525. b. Acknowledges and reckons up two hundred and thirty-ſeven contrarieties of doctrine among the Romiſh Divines. III. 343. b. Cenſured. I. 769. a.

Belleforeſt, ſcruples to tranſlate what an Italian Monk had writ about love. I. 630. b.

Bellier (Peter) tranſlates into French a part of Philo's works: the verſion is reviſed and augmented by Frederic Morel. III. 623.

Bellievre, his embaſſy to ſave the life of Mary, Queen of Scots, was a meer farce. II. 760. a. Sent by Henry III to the King of Navarre, about the affront given to the Queen of Navarre. IV. 341. a. b. His negotiation in that affair. ibid.

Bellievre (Pompone de) Firſt Preſident in the parliament of Paris, reſtores to the ſtudents of the Canon-Law the privilege of pleading. III. 346. a.

Bellona; what her prieſts had in common with the prieſts of Cybele. II. 531. b.

Beloi (John) repreſents to the Leaguers that the Canon-Laws excommunicate thoſe who engage in intrigues about the ſucceſſion in a Prince's life-time. III. 955. a.

Belonius cited. IV. 35. b. His obſervations. III. 749. b. 750. a.

Belvederenſis (Theodorus) his writings againſt the Vaudois, and the refutations of them by Peter Gilles. III. 162. b.

Bembus (Cardinal) the queſtions which he put to Sabinus. IV. 193. b. Confounds himſelf in ſpeaking of thoſe who go round the world eaſtward or weſtward. V. 781.

Bencius: four brothers of that name, Jeſuits. I. 747.

Benedict XII (Pope): The taxes of the Penitentiary of Rome, appeared under his Pontificate. I. 629. b.

Benedictines, of what family the founder of their order was. I. 341.

Beneficed. A beneficed man deprived of all his revenues for not pronouncing the letter q as others did. IV. 837. a. b.

Benefices, the Venetian miniſters at the Court of Rome durſt not accept of any. I. 634. What anſwer Pope Hadrian VI made to thoſe who objected to him his inconſiſtent conduct with regard to their plurality. III. 330. a. Eccleſiaſtical Benefices given to Poets as rewards for the leud and profane verſes which they had compoſed. IV. 896. b. John du Tillet is the author or promoter of the edict, which prohibits the remitting money to Rome for the diſpatching of Benefices. V. 354, 355.

Benefit. To receive a benefit is to loſe one's liberty. II. 206. a.

Benerque, a town where the neighbours meet in arms on the 25th of April. IV. 611. b.

Bengy, Profeſſor at Bourges, particular facts that concern him. IV. 652. a. b.

Benivenius (Dominic) writes a book of the miracles and prophecies of Savonarola. V. 66. b.

Bennon, his miracles. I. 749. a.

Benoit (Renatus): whether he is the author of a book which clears the Proteſtants from the charge of Hereſy. IV. 373. b.

Benſerade; the anſwer he made when he was but ſeven or eight years of age. I. 749. a. Another anſwer which he made to a courtier. 753. a. He contradicts himſelf in his ſonnet upon Job. 967. b. 968. a. One of his Roundels quoted. V. 401. b.

Benſyrah, a great Cabaliſt, how he was conceived in his mother's womb. II. 114. a.

Benzonius (Rutilius) defends the ſtory, that Trajan's ſoul was delivered from Hell by the prayers of St Gregory. V. 397. b.

Berault (John) his tranſlation of Barclay's Euphormio, with a key and commentary ſubjoined. I. 647. b. Quoted. II. 163. b. n. (21).

Berchere (de la) Memoirs ſent for that Preſident's life. I. 264. a.

Berenice, her leudneſs. I. 765. a. b. 766. a. b. Titus ſends her away. 766. b. Her Jealouſy againſt her ſiſter Druſilla. 767. b. II. 701. b.

Berenice, a play, the judgment that was paſſed upon it. I. 767. a. b.

Bergamo (Matthew de) created a Count Palatine by the Emperor Lewis of Bavaria. I. 769. a. b.

Bergier, his treatiſe on the Point of Day. V. 776.

Bergius (John) his diſpute with Micrælius. IV. 210. a.

Berigardus looked upon as a great favourer of Pyrrhoniſm, and a propagater of impiety. I. 770. b. 771. a. b.

Bern: conferences which give occaſion to the reformation of that Canton. I. 235. The churches of that Canton diſapproved of their aboliſhing unleavened bread, the baptiſmal fonts, and the feſtivals at Geneva. II. 264. b.

Bernard (St) one of his maxims. I. 126. a. His character. 758. and a. b. & ſeq. He preaches up the cruſade, and promiſes very different ſucceſs from that which attended it. III. 796. a.

Bernartius (John) injudiciouſly cenſures Pliny, with regard to an Egyptian King. IV. 667. a.

Berneggerus (Matthew) aſcribes to a Jeſuit, the ſpeech which came out againſt the United Provinces, under the name of Herimannus Conrad. II. 550.

Bernier (Francis) miſtakes a word in a paſſage of Gaſſendi. IV. 763. a. b. Quoted 42. b. 264. a.

Bernier (John) his character and works. III. 967. a. IV. 897. b.

Beroaldus (Philip): how ridiculous he makes himſelf, while he endeavours to juſtify Martial and others like unto him. V. 421. a. He obſerves that Boccace has taken one of his beſt tales from Apuleius. II. 37. b. 38. a.

Beroaldus (Matthew) cenſured. I. 538. a.

Bertelier, a new confutation of his pretended act. I. 783. b. 784. a. b. II. 61. b.

Bertier, Bookſeller, what anſwer the Queen-Mother, made to him. I. 544. a. b.

Bertrade, Queen of France, her Hiſtory. III. 62. a. b. Her death. ibid. b.

Bertrand (the Preſident) is very much out with regard to the Caſſius that was ſo renowned for his integrity. II. 347. and b.

Berulle: perſons of that family. I. 786.

Beſa, the name of a city, and of a particular deity that was adored there. I. 348. b. The oracle of that god was ſtill in being in the reign of Conſtantius. 37. and a.

Beſançon, Thomas Buyrete admitted Miniſter at nineteen years of age, founds a private church there. II. 694. a.

Beſſarion (Cardinal) ſaid that the new ſaints made him call in queſtion the old ones. III. 740. a. How he was hindered from being made Pope. IV. 587. a. b. Being threatened with excommunication by Paul II, he ſigns a decree which he had not ſeen. IV. 511. b.

Beſtiality; Abſolution from it, what it coſt. I. 628. a. b.

Beton (David), Archbiſhop of St Andrews, is killed in the revolutions of Scotland. III. 666. a.

Betuſſi (Joſeph) his book intituled Imagini del Tempio della Signora Donna Giovanna Aragona. I. 402. a.

Beuningen (Conrad van), what he ſaid in favour of the toleration which was granted to the Mennonites in the United-Provinces. I. 288. b. 289. a. His opinion of a book which the Spaniards put out, to diſprove the pretenſions of the King of France. III. 850. a. b.

Beza (Theodore) treats Joſephus as he deſerves. I. 39. a. One of his letters was by ſome thought to be the foundation of the pretended Mahometaniſm of Paul Alciatus. 198. b. He is cleared from the abominable calumny which had been charged upon him. 546. a. b. 547. a. and 795. b. 796. a. His diſputes with Baudouin. 695. a. Whether he owned that Bellarmine had overthrown all the Proteſtant authors. 726. a. A cruel and impudent invective of Scioppius againſt him. 745. b. 746. a. He is calumniated. 790. and a. b. 795. a. b. 798. a. b. Whilſt he was young he kept a woman under the promiſe of marriage, which he performed at laſt. 791. b. 792. a. and 795. a. He does not explain all his reaſons for leaving Lauſanne. 792. a. II. 274. a. b. Is reproached on account of the frequent corrections which he made in the editions of his New Teſtament. I. 792. b. A little Macaronic book is aſcribed to him. 791. b. As likewiſe the Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos. V. 735. Bolſec's accuſation of him is not to be credited. II. 60. b. 61. a. b. He deſerves more credit than Maimbourg and Varillas, as to the hiſtorical order of Calvin's travels, in ſuch things as neither tend to increaſe nor diminiſh the reputation of the latter. 236. a. b. He is upbraided with having too eagerly picked up the flying reports that were ſpread about his enemies. 364. a. His epigram on the picture of Eraſmus criticized. 810. b. He preſerves a commendable moderation in ſpeaking of the death of Henry II. III. 400. b. Is ſtruck with the Plague. 575. a. A ſtanza made on that occaſion. ibid. He looks upon the Eccleſiaſtical Hierarchy as a fundamental corruption. 666. b. What he ſays of Marot's morals. IV. 154. b. 155. a. His verſion of 100 Pſalms. 157. b. He does not give a fair anſwer to Dudithius, touching the ſentence of Zurich againſt Ochinus. 389. a. b. Broughton aims particularly at him, and writes him very rough letters. II. 150. He is blamed by Colomiés for altering a paſſage in the French verſion of the Pſalms. IV. 164. b. He expreſſes a proper indignation againſt Simon Simonius. V. 150. b. 151. a. He writes the life of Calvin in Latin and in French. II. 274. There are ſome things in the one which are not in the other. ibid. He retired from Lauſanne for reaſons that have not been well explained. ibid. a. b. His narrative touching Caraccioli different from that of Peter Martyr. 313. b. 314. a. b. He refutes the doctrine of Harchius upon the Euchariſt. III. 352. and a. b. He is miſtaken about Marot's age. IV. 162. b. How he mentioned the ſtory of the She-Pope at the conference of Poiſſi. 735, 736, 737. What he relates of a woman and her two daughters. 882. a. b.

Bias, a maxim of that Philoſopher. III. 601. b. His dilemma upon marriage may receive a different turn. IV. 844. b.

Bible, the Hebrew text of it altered in what relates to the age of the Patriarchs. I. 173. a. The deſign of publiſhing it tranſlated into the Iriſh language meets with great oppoſition. 718. a. A queſtion which Bochart is ſaid to have been aſked touching that ſacred book. II. 41. a. It is tranſlated into the vulgar language in Spain. 379. A commiſſion ſent to Druſius, empowering him to go upon a new tranſlation of the Bible into the Dutch tongue. 705. a. Luther's tranſlation, and that which the Churches of the Low-Countries made uſe of judged defective. ibid. An objection ſcandalouſly retorted againſt the authors of that holy book. IV. 373. and a. b. What Politian is charged with ſaying of it. 704. a. b. Tranſlated into the Poliſh language. 825. b.

Bible (French) firſt printed at the deſire of Charles VIII. I. 1. a. Falſified as well by the way of ſuppreſſion, as by that of addition. ibid. b.

Bible of Zurich, by whom it was reviſed and corrected. I. 802. a.

Bible, tranſlated into the Sclavonian tongue by George Dalmatin. II. 585.

Bibliotheca Maxima Pontificia. See Authority of the Pope.

Bibliotheque of the Jeſuit authors; by whom it was begun, and by whom continued. I. 219. and a. b. Qualities requiſite to make a good Bibliotheque, and the ordinary fault of thoſe who are employed in a work of that nature. ibid. b. 220. a. b. 221. a. b.

Bibliothoque Univerſelle quoted. I. 116. b.

Biblus, the Egyptians ſend thither every year a paſteboard head, without any other ceremony than throwing it into the ſea. I. 116. a.

Bibulus (Conſul) is wholly taken up in making Paſquinades. I. 425. a. b.

Bigarrures & Touches (i. e. The Miſcellany and Touches) of Des Accords, books which are too free and trifling. I. 63, 64. a. b. 65. a. The editions of them. 64. b. 65. a. The Touches compoſed in two months, what the nature of that work is. 65. a.

Bigot (Emeric), what he ſaid to a man who waited for the ſecond editions of books. I. 319. b.

Bigot (John), father to William. II. 7.

Bigot (William) promiſed a treatiſe upon the neceſſity of matrimony. I. 603. a.

Bigots, their artifices to make a great many devout women fall into the ſnare. II. 110. a. There is no paſſion which they do not juſtify at the expence of religion. III. 533. b.

Bilia lived to be old without knowing that her huſband, who had a ſtinking breath was different in that from other men. II. 726, 727. and a.

Billichius (Everard) defends the Univerſity and Clergy of Cologn againſt Melancthon, Bucer, and others. III. 240. b.

Billon quoted. I. 720. a. b. III. 280. b. 281. a. IV. 359. b. 360. a. b.

Bindoni (Bernardino) makes additions to the Italian edition of Philip de Bergamo's Chronicle. I. 769. a.

Binet (Stephen) a Jeſuit, declares, though not without trembling, for the ſalvation of Origen, while he examines the matter in the form of a rehearing of his trial. IV. 415. b. 416. a.

Binet (Claudius) cenſured for an inſipid hyperbole which he makes uſe of in ſpeaking of the birth of Ronſard. IV. 890. b.

Bion, his anſwer to Antigonus. II. 11. a.

Bionei Sermones, what one is to underſtand by that. II. 12. a.

Birds that ſwept the temple of Achilles every morning. I. 85. a. n. (20). A bird which can take up into the air a horſe with his rider. III. 132. b. Birds deſtroy an army of Ethiopians. IV. 177. a. Their language underſtood by ſome people. 181, 182. and a. Worſhipped in Lemnos. III. 755. and b. The language of birds. V. 381. b. 382. a.

Biroat convicted of impurities, according to the teſtimony of Jarrige. I. 108. b. 109. a.

Biron (the Marſhal de) receives a terrible reprimand from the Duke of Anjou, and the occaſion of it. III. 178. a. b. He performed great ſervices to Henry IV. ibid. b. 179. a. He gives that Prince too ſenſible a proof of his thinking himſelf a moſt neceſſary man. 179. b. He could not bear to ſee the faith given to the Huguenots violated. 180. a. He was fit for all ſorts of employments. ibid. a. b. He was too much given to wine. ibid. b. And was unwilling to finiſh the war. ibid. and 181. a. He becomes credulous and ſuperſtitious. ibid. a. b.

Biron (the Marſhal Duke de) his impious wiſh. III. 182. b. He affects to hate the Huguenots. 183. a. He diſplays an inſupportable vanity. ibid. a. b. He is confounded with his father in the point of learning.

learning. ibid. b. 184. a. Henry IV ſaves his life three times. ibid. b. That Prince had a mind to make him his ſon-in-law. ibid. a. b. His duel with Carency. 856. a. b.

Birth. Few people care to have the meanneſs of their birth talked of. I. 256. b. V. 125. a. b. It has ever been common to debaſe the birth of thoſe whom fortune raiſes to the higheſt dignities. I. 350. b. V. 125. a. b. 126. a. 189. a. A mean birth is no crime. I. 360. b.

Biſhopric: a biſhopric procured by the Muſes. I. 237. and 238. a. b.

Biſhoprics: the abuſe of giving biſhoprics to children prevailed in the XVIth century. IV. 819.

Biſhops of the Eaſt ſubject to the King of Portugal, acknowledge no Patriarch. I. 22. There are Biſhops, who having once obtained the mitre by preaching, preach no more after they are made Biſhops. 238. a. Lent-Biſhops; who were ſo called, by whom, and for what reaſon. 703. a. The dignity which is poſſeſſed, and the functions that are exerciſed by the Biſhops of the Church of England. II. 759. b. A Biſhop that was of an apoſtolic character. III. 69. and a. Biſhops were highly reſpected by the Pagans themſelves when their morals were good. IV. 104. b. They diſhonour their profeſſion when they ſet up for informers. ibid. 105. a. Good Biſhops faithfully diſcharge their miniſterial office. III. 772. b. The Proteſtants acknowledged Caraccioli for Biſhop, after he had publickly embraced their religion. II. 313. and a. b. 314. a. b. By divine right all Biſhops are equal to the Pope. IV. 198.

Biſhops of France prevailed with the King to deprive Caraccioli, who was acknowledged for Biſhop by the Reformed, of his biſhopric. II. 313. a. b. 314. a. b.

Bitings (of an immodeſt kind), Orators as well as Poets have mentioned them. III. 56. a. b.

Bitter, ſtories which the Rabbins tell concerning the ſlaughter of the Jews, at the taking of that city by the Romans. I. 649. a.

Blackſmith of Salon: It is not poſſible for private men to diſcover certainly what concerns him. II. 386. b.

Blæſus (Junius) obtains the honour of a triumph from Tiberius. V. 277. a. b. 278. a.

Blanc (William le) tranſlates Xiphilin into Latin. V. 589. a.

Blanc (Richard le) tranſlates Cardan's book de Subtilitate into French. II. 322. b.

Blancanas, the Jeſuit, cenſured for a double miſtake. I. 49. a.

Blanche (Queen) expoſed to detraction more than one way. V. 337. a. b. 338. a.

Blanchinus (Bartholomew) writes the life of Urceus. V. 515.

Blaſphemies. The horrible blaſphemies of a fanatic. III. 815. a. b. A blaſphemy of a horrid and ſingular kind. V. 514. a. b. 515. a.

Bleeding. The practice of frequent bleeding introduced at Paris by Botal. II. 99. and a. b. A diſpute on that head between Botal and the Phyſicians of the Faculty. ibid. The uſe that Averrhoës made of it. ibid. b.

Bleſkenius falſely relates ſeveral things of the Iſlanders, both with reſpect to witchcraft, III. 580. a. b. and laſciviouſneſs. ibid. b. 581. a. b.

Blind. One born blind cured by Hadrian. III. 319. a.

Blois: A motion made by the States of Blois for excluding the King of Navarre from the ſucceſſion to the crown of France. II. 5. a.

Blond (John le) tranſlates Carion's Chronicle into French, and writes an appendix to it. II. 324. a.

Blondel (David), the character of his wit and memory. II. 22. a. b. 23. a. He cenſures Suidas touching the Sibyl Lampuſa unjuſtly. 252. b. What he ſays of the Fathers. III. 55. a. b. Omits ſeveral authors who have affirmed the ſtory of Pope Joan. 78. b. Is miſtaken as to the time when Lucidus flouriſhed. 904. What he ſays of the ſtory of the She-Pope. II. 24. a. b. 25. a. b. IV. 729, 730. Is not for loſing time in enquiries about its origin, and cenſured on that account. 739. Finds that the ſaid ſtory in a manuſcript of Anaſtaſius the library-keeper is framed in the very words of Martinus Polonus. 725. b. 726. a. 738. b. 739. a.

Blondus (Flavius), certain works of his tranſlated into Italian by Lucio Fauno. III. 18.

Blount (Charles) his writings condemned. I. 383. a. His tranſlation of Philoſtratus. ibid. His tragical end. ibid.

Boarders: the avarice of thoſe who keep Boarders in univerſities. III. 167. b.

Bobowſki, in Latin Bobovius and Bobonius, is the ſame with Halibeigh in the Dictionary. III. 341.

Boccace falls in love with a Princeſs, and writes two excellent books for her ſake. IV. 302. b. 304. b. What he relates of Guido Cavalcante. II. 398. a. b. His Decameron univerſally known. ibid. Of a thouſand perſons who read it, ſcarce two or three remember any thing that is not an adventure of gallantry, or pleaſantry. ibid. What he ſays of Pope-Joan. IV. 730. b. 731. a. How far his Decameron is to be condemned. V. 837.

Boccalini, againſt what kind of authors he ſhould have made Apollo hold his extraordinary ſeſſion, and ſummon all the forces of Parnaſſus. II. 528. a. Does not follow the advice which he himſelf gives to Hiſtorians. 65. a. b. Complains with great wit of thoſe who brought in the Neopolitan diſeaſe. IV. 284. b.

Bochart has read a paſſage in Strabo, concerning Telmeſſus, wrong. V. 311. b. His conjecture upon a paſſage of Suidas, where that author ſpeaks of the cray-fiſh of Tenedos, is one of the beſt that he has made. 312. a.

Bodies, an explication of the doctrine of ſome of the Carteſians concerning the formation of bodies. II. 251. a. b. The difference between living Bodies and Bodies void of life according to Des Cartes. 660. b. 661. a. b. n. (51). Bodies are incapable of thinking. 661. b. n. (53). 662. a. b. The qualities of Bodies which ſtrike our ſenſes are only mere appearances. IV. 654. a. b. 655. a. b.

Bodies (dead) that have remained exempt from corruption. I. 183. a. b. II. 442. b. III. 233. a. b.

Bodin, one of the reaſons for which he wrote his Demonomania. I. 385. b. 386. a. His panegyric. II. 48. a. b. 49. a. He has wrote a dialogue about religions, in which he gives the advantage to the Jewiſh. 45. a. Is taken for a man without religion. 50. a. b. 51. a. b. An ingenious anſwer which an Engliſhman made to him. 53. a. He is cenſured for what he ſays of Cato's lending his wife. III. 495. a. Quoted. 403. b. 404. a. b. IV. 502. a. His prevarications to ſave the honour of the Aſtrologers. V. 244. b. to 246. a. b. A groſs miſtake charged upon him by la Mothe le Vayer. 112. b. He relates a ſingular anſwer of Henry II. III. 405.

Bœotia, what puniſhment was inflicted there upon bankrupts. II. 863. a.

Bohemia, all the Miniſters of that kingdom proſcribed. II. 536. Facts which concern the revolution that happened there. V. 102. a. b. to 104. a. b.

Bohemia (the King of), Elector Palatine: his exerciſes are to be ſeen in the Vatican library at Rome. I. 239. a.

Bohemians divided into three ſects. IV. 629. a. b. Laſicius writes a book on the confeſſion of faith of the Proteſtants of Bohemia. III. 732. b. 733. a. b. They degenerate from from their anceſtors. ibid. n. (6).

Boboritſch (Adam): he and Dalmatin tranſlate the Bible into the Sclavonian tongue. II. 565. and a. b.

Boileau (Dr), complaints againſt two of his books. V. 853.

Boiſleduc; an edict prohibiting the public exerciſe of the Romiſh religion in that town. III. 548. a. Diſputes occaſioned by the ſaid edict. ibid. and b. Its Magiſtrates tolerate a fraternity of the Virgin, and enter themſelves into it. IV. 121. a. b. 122. a.

Boiſſieu (the Preſident of) juſtly cenſures Caſaubon, and Corradus for what they ſay about Pyrrhus, and the place of his interment. IV. 660. b. A character of his commentary on Ovid's poem againſt Ibis. 452. a. b.

Bolduc, a Capuchin. Nothing can be more ſcandalous than what he ſays of Job's diſtemper. III. 573. a.

Boleyn (Anne), her bad qualities. II. 57. b.

Bologna, its colony was ſettled four years before that of Piſaurum. I. 62. b.

Bolſec, a witneſs not credited even by the Roman Catholics. II. 61. b. 62. a. b. Inſults Calvin for the frequent corrections of his Inſtitution. 262. b. All his fooliſh ſtories againſt Calvin are given out as matters of fact by Cardinal Richelieu. 62. a. And will be ſo eternally by thoſe who write againſt the Calviniſts, if we except authors of reputation and gravity. ibid. and. 61. a. b. What concerns the proſtitution of his wife is not to be found in the French life of Calvin. 274. n. (p). A more particular account of the differences betwixt Calvin and him given in that life. ibid. b.

Bona (Cardinal). An author undertakes to criticize him, becauſe he had never quoted him. IV. 2. a.

Bona Sforza, Queen of Poland, gives people large room to talk of her. I. 405. b. She is very angry with her ſon for marrying Barbara Radzivil. III. 847. and a. b. Their mutual reproaches on that head. 848. a.

Bonanni (a Jeſuit) ſets about compoſing a catalogue of the writers of his ſociety. I. 219. a. Quoted. V. 164. b. Maintains a kind of paradox about Moſchus. II. 11. b.

Bond, the elogy of his Commentary upon Perſeus. IV. 598. a. b.

Bone; what the Jews tell us of a ſmall bone. I. 649. b. 650. a. b.

Bonet (Honoratus) Doctor of the Canon-Law, is the author of a book, intituled, The Tree of Battles. III. 78. b. Affirms the ſtory of Pope-Joan. ibid. Several miſtakes which concern that writer. 79. a. b.

Bonfires. What are the fineſt Bonfires that can be lighted up to pleaſe the people. III. 317. b. 318. a.

Bongars quoted. II. 69. a. b. What Velſer wanted to have him reproached with, is probable enough. 70. a. The author of the new tranſlation of his letters, cenſured. III. 155. b. V. 538. a. b. Bongars was ſomewhat credulous. III. 696. b. Falſely accuſed as being the author of the Idolum Hallienſe. 838. a. b.

Boniface VIII, being ſollicited by one of the parties which divided the commonwealth of Florence, prevails with Charles de Valois, to compoſe the confuſions of that city. II. 296. a.

Bonifacius (Balthaſar) raſhly attempts to criticize Athenæus touching Democritus, and the manner in which he prolonged his life. II. 637. b. n. (38).

Bonnivet (Admiral) his attempt upon Margaret de Valois. I. 724. a. IV. 322. b.

Book of the Creation, the Cabaliſts pretend to work miracles by it. I. 173. a.

Book. A French book formerly was no more than a certain number of Latin pages, with a few lines of French. II. 105. b.

Book of ſentences condemned to be burnt under the name of Abelard. I. 761. b.

Book de tribus Impoſtoribus, it is not probable that there ever was ſuch a book. I. 437. a. IV. 861. a. V. 536. b. 537. a. Some ſay that Averroës ſupplied the materials of it. 557. a.

Books, their faults ought to be carefully remarked, when they may miſlead a great many readers. I. 77. b. A book that ſhould treat of the religion of a ſoverereign would ſell well. 130. b. Some books are taken no notice of by zealots for a long time. 153. a. Authors who enlarge them, ſeldom take proper care to alter the dates. 154. a. They forget to make the proper alterations, when they abridge or tranſcribe paſſages. 158. a. The firſt editions of books only ſerve to make an author's works appear in a fairer character. 318. a. b. There is no edition ſo bad but ſome advantage may be reaped from it. 319. a. b. One ſhould always ſet down the titles of books in the language that the author made uſe of. 344. b. Suppreſſions that are made in them only ſerve to draw one's attention the more. 498. a. b. 499. a. II. 94. a. b. Books deceive people ſometimes, by the falſe prints that are put into them. 100. b. The faults of books are not excuſable when they concern the principal ſubject. I. 579. a. The faults of great men lead other great men into errors. 523. b. Are like ſparks of fire. 671. b. A conſideration which ſhould oblige authors to avoid the very ſmalleſt miſtakes. II. 22. a. Books called Gentlemen in a compliment. 626. b. A perſon may very eaſily be miſtaken as to thoſe whom he fancies to be authors of ſuch and ſuch books. 682. b. V. 396. b. There are many books againſt which nothing would be ſaid, if authors were obliged to inſert them at length in their anſwers. II. 25. a. A book of admirable uſe, if we judge of it by the title. 236. and a. b. Bochart quotes it ſometimes. ibid. b. Some books become more perfect by being reviſed and printed. 279. a. A beautiful paſſage of Mr Smith on that head. ibid. a. b. Books can never be good, when an anthor writes them purely for bread. 321. a. Faults that are often to be found in them. 323. a. b. Books condemned to be burnt. 355. a. b. 356. a. Callimachus ſaid that a great book is always a great evil. 526. b. A book dedicated to our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. 578. a. There is no book ſo deſpicable, but ſome advantage may be reaped from it. 582. a. The firſt that a man publiſhes is ſometimes an accompliſhed piece. ibid. a. b. Some books are publiſhed under the names of celebrated authors, chiefly ſuch books as concern magic. 640. b. 641. a. Conſiderations upon books that are full of quotations. 778. b. 779. a. Examiners of books detain manuſcripts long, and ſtrike many things out of them. 809. a. Some have been ſuppreſſed, others forged, and others fitted up as people had a mind. III. 67. a. What a man expoſes himſelf to, when he only judges of a book by the title of it. 134. a. How dangerous impure books are. V. 38. and a. b. &c. It is of great uſe to publiſh ſeveral books upon the ſame ſubjects, when they are important. III. 335. a. b. Whether the condemnation of a book by a ſynod hinders it from being read. 377. b. 378. a. They are moſt of them extracts and copies of others. 471. b. Are often ſpoiled by too much poliſhing 836. a. b. 837. b. The riſk that poſthumous books run. 848. b. The blind zeal of thoſe who retrench whatever diſpleaſes them in books. 948. a. b. It is a more difficult taſk than people imagine to make additions to books. IV. 79. b. A book that contained nothing but the reproaches which two profeſſors divulged one againſt the other. 122. a. In what manner thoſe of the antient Arabs were made. 177. b. A man that ſeeks to paſs for the author of a book which he did not write, is guilty of a wilful cuckoldom. 280. b. Reaſons which ſhould hinder the greateſt part of authors from publiſhing many books. 493. b. They generally contain nothing new. 590. b. Thoſe who write books ſhould firſt of all read Quintilian. 814. What Pliny ſays of the pompous titles of ſome. V. 2. b. Whether every word that cannot be ſpoken before a modeſt woman ſhould be baniſhed out of them. 132. b. 133. a. b. There are ſome which have been printed a great while, and which nevertheleſs remain unknown to the moſt learned authors. 462. a. Whether ſingle men ſtudy better, and compoſe more good books, than thoſe that are married. 524. b. 525. a. b. A great author of little books; who was called ſo, and in what ſenſe. II. 528. The multiplicity of books debauches the mind. I. 65. a. The title of a book which alarmed the Court of Rome, and in conſequence thereof was reformed. III. 122. Nothing is more apt to make them be looked upon as bad, than the pompous idea under which they are repreſented. IV. 284. a. A book too hard; the moſt underſtanding authors rather chuſe to be ſilent, than to attack it. V. 179. b. Several books which are deſpiſed by men of parts; ſeem good to the author: how he read them. 802. How Antony Arnauld read them. ibid. Character of Jurieu's books. ibid. and 803. Why the States of Holland grant privileges to them. 804. The difference between a good and an uſeful book. 806. Great books are long expected, and meet with a thouſand ſtorms, when they firſt launch forth. 808. 809. A reflexion of la Bruyere upon the way that people judge of books. 809.

Books of Devotion, it does not belong to a vicious man to write them. I. 439. a. b.

Books of Heretics: whether thoſe who prohibit the ſale of Heretical books, ought to permit the objections of Heretics, to appear in the writings of the orthodox who confute them. II. 488. a. b. 489. a.

Books (Apocryphal) the objections made to theſe books are retorted. III. 601. a.

Bookſellers, what they do in order to enhance the price of books. I. 521. b. II. 23. a. b. 38. b. 809. b. Bookſellers who impoſe upon Alexander VII. 476. b. 477. a. b. They have a cuſtom to print many titles for one and the ſame book. 524. a. III. 274. b.

It is not of them that we ought to complain, if they print bad books. II. 562. b. Some of their ſly tricks. 621. a. b. 809. b. Whether we can rely upon the commendations which they procure to the authors they print. 763. b. They give corrected editions of the French authors, with reſpect to the antiquated phraſes. IV. 427. b. 428. a. The confuſion which they cauſe, by reprinting the title pages of books. 476. a. The German Bookſellers generally add good indexes to the books they reprint. 498. b. Bookſellers are often ruined by authors. 834. a. b. A cuſtom which they have, impoſes on the Bibliographers. V. 547. b. An author who had ſworn never to have any thing to do with them. II. 82. a. b. 83. a. The extream negligence of a Bookſeller. 322. b.

Boreas was very warm in his love. II. 79. a. b. 80. a. b.

Boreel (Adam) tranſlates Broughton's Commentary on the Prophet Daniel into Latin. II. 150. a.

Borel (Peter) his miſtake with reſpect to Deſpauterius. IV. 538. a. b.

Borello (Camillo) takes a great deal of pains to prove in a book, that the ſentence of Pilate found in the city of Aquila is fictitious. II. 556. b.

Borri (the Cavalier) had a ſtrange thought concerning the conception of the Virgin. III. 571. a. b.

Borſel (Francis de) facts that concern him. II. 90. a.

Borſtel: perſons of that family. II. 90. a. b.

Boſc (du) a miniſter; what a Catholic gentleman did at his return to Caen. II. 91. a. b.

Boſſu (the Count de) his treachery. II. 841. b. 842. a. Why he was not puniſhed for it. ibid.

Boſſuet, Biſhop of Meaux, his error touching Ubiquity, and the firſt authors of that tenet. V. 549. b. Quoted. IV. 65. b. & paſſim alibi.

Bouchavanne (Mr de) takes the Preſident de la Place privately to the caſtle of Couſſy. IV. 682. a.

Bouchel, his Bibliotheque of the French law quoted. IV. 806.

Boucher (John) thought to be the author of the apology for John Chatel. II. 101. a. 103. a. n. (15). 459. b.

Boucherat receives an extraordinary commiſſion to preſide at trials for poiſoning and witchcraft. II. 345. b.

Bouchet (Peter) takes the poiſon which a neighbour's wife had prepared for her huſband, and dies. II. 104.

Bouhours, his judicious advices touching the French tongue. II. 775. b. Quoted. V. 361. a. b.

Bouillon (the Duke of) promiſed to abjure his religion when he married Mademoiſelle de Berghes. IV. 120. a.

Boulai (Du) commits faults, upon the ſubject of Faunus and Omphale. III. 934. b. His miſtake touching a Roman lady, whom he took for a Veſtal Virgin. V. 516. a. b. Quoted. 130. a.

Boulduc (Father) laughed at for the monaſteries which he ſuppoſes to have been erected at Haran. I. 45. b.

Boulogne (Claudius Dormi Biſhop of) is treated as a rebel, and caſt into priſon. IV. 258.

Bouraque, what ſort of an animal it is. IV. 42. b.

Bourbon (Antony de) King of Navarre, ſollicited to procure an agreement in religion. I. 691. b. See Antony.

Bourbon (the Conſtable of) animated to the ſiege of Rome by predictions. I. 147. and b. 148. a. Makes his eſcape upon horſes ſhod backwards. 482. Conſpires againſt the ſtate. IV. 694. a. b. How this conſpiracy was diſcovered. 695. b. 696. a. At what time he entered into the party of Charles. V. II. 845.

Bourbon (Cardinal de) ſets up, at the ſollicitation of the League, for the lawful ſucceſſor to the crown of France. III. 520. a. b.

Bourbon (Frances de) eldeſt daughter to the Duke of Montpenſier, openly profeſſes the Proteſtant religion. III. 864. and b.

Bourbon (James de) impriſoned by his wife in the caſtle of Ovo. IV. 307. b. Eſcapes to Taranto, where he is beſieged: he ſurrenders the place, and goes to be a Monk in France. ibid.

Bourbon (Nicholas) quoted. IV. 247. b. n. (19). Praiſes exceedingly the poem de Crucifixo, wrote by James Pinon. 651.

Bourdeaux. The parliament of Bourdeaux reprimanded. III. 512. a. b. Rejects the claim of two Proteſtant captains, whom it had condemned to death, not allowing them the privilege of being tried by a judicature of half Proteſtants and half Catholics. II. 289. a. b. And condemns a libel on that ſubject to be burnt. ibid. b.

Bourel, who that author is in the tranſlation of Thuanus's Hiſtory. II. 237. b.

Bourg (Antony du) Lieutenant-Civil of the Provoſt of Paris, and afterwards Chancellor. II. 556. a.

Bourg (Anne du) what Henry II ſaid to him. III. 400. a. He diſowns the concluſions of his advocate who tried to ſave his life by an officious lie. IV. 139. b. 140. a.

Bourg en Breſſe, when its citidel was razed. I. 738. b.

Bourg-Fontaine, the chimerical aſſembly of Bourg-Fontaine. I. 486. 491. a.

Bourgoign (Edme) Prior of the Dominicans; directs his diſcourſe in the pulpit to James Clement, and calls him the holy martyr of Jeſus Chriſt. III. 601. a. b. Is treated as a confeſſor and martyr by John Guignard. 276. a.

Bourgoign (Francis) General of the Oratory, collects the works of Cardinal Berulle, and adds a preface to them. I. 786. b.

Bourignon (Antoinette) her viſions touching Adam. I. 102. b. 103. a. b. The ſpirit which governed and led her. II. 111. a. b. Who was the learned man that ſhe eſteemed moſt. 540. a. How ſhe diſcovered that John Rothe was no more than a falſe prophet. III. 690. a. Whether ſhe had foretold the bombarding of Bruſſels. IV. 889. a. b. What her notion was of the perfect ſtate of man, with reſpect to his generative faculty. V. 4. a. b.

Bourignoniſm, makes ſome noiſe in Scotland. II. 114. a. b.

Bourſaut, a paſſage quoted from one of his letters. II. 647. b. 648. a. IV. 806. a. b.

Bonthiller de Rance (Armand) Abbot de la Trappe, underſtood the Greek Poets at ten years of age. I. 293. a. b. What he ſaid upon hearing of the death of Mr Arnauld, Doctor of the Sorbonne. 498. a.

Box on the ear; Ædeſius gives a governor of Egypt one. III. 445. a. b.

Bozius (Thomas) his errors touching the Lœſtrigons. III. 786, 787.

Braccio, the inhabitants of Perugia, choſe him for their Prince on account of his valour. II. 292. a.

Brachmans always carry a ring and a ſtaff. I. 5. a.

Braggadocio (in learning) his character. I. 373. a. b. II. 253. a.

Brandenburg (the Elector of) what he wrote to Richard Cromwell touching the invaſion of Poland by the Swedes. II. 539. b.

Brandon (Charles, Duke of Suffolk) his intrigue with the Princeſs Royal. III. 88. a.

Brandt (Sebaſtian) his work intituled, Navis Stultorum. I. 602. b.

Brantome quoted. I. 256. a. b. 592. a. b. 723. a. 724. a. b. II. 207. b. 208. a. V. 36. a. 337. b. What he ſays of the beauty of Donna Maria of Aragon. I. 401. a. And of Don John of Auſtria's birth. II. 20. a. b. 21. a. His falſe way of reaſoning about the children of great Lords. ibid. He ſpeaks with too much diſdain of the other Princes, who oppoſed the ambition of Charles V. 435. b. He improperly alledges the apology of the Prince of Orange, on occaſion of Charles the fifth's ſentiments in point of religion. 441. and a. b. His narrative touching Mary of England, Queen of France, is different from that of Mezerai, and Varillas. III. 88. a. b. According to him it is poſſible that a Queen may ſuppoſe a child in the midſt of a numerous Court. 89. a. He is miſtaken in two things with reſpect to a cup which Helen cauſed to be made by the pattern of one of her breaſts. 363. a. A curious paſſage of his, touching a certain Prince and a certain Lady of a very good family. 835. a. b. What he ſays of the Cardinal de Lorrain's liberality towards the poor and the ladies. 872. a. What he thinks of the ladies who accompanied their huſbands in the holy war. 795. b. 796. a. n. (25). He affirms four things touching Joan of Naples, which are all four falſe. IV. 305. a. Applauds the complaiſance of Henry II, for the Ducheſs of Valentinois. 698. b. 699. a. His miſtake touching Laurenza Strozzi, a Dominican Nun. V. 252. b.

Braſil, the Savages of that country have no religion. III. 781. a. b.

Bravery, whether there be any connexion between bravery and luſt. III. 414. b. 415. a. b. Of all virtues it is the only one that is ſubject to fanatical tranſports. IV. 664. a. Joined with effeminacy and a ſtrong inclination for pleaſure. V. 271. a. b. 272. a. b.

Brazen: Some popular ſtories about certain brazen heads. I. 598. a.

Breaſts; the ſeverity of the Anabaptiſts againſt a man's handling of his miſtreſs's breaſts. IV. 87. b.

Breda confounded with Bretta. V. 357. b.

Bredenbourg (John) accuſed of being a Spinoſiſt, and for what reaſon. V. 207. b. 208. a. He dies nevertheleſs with lively ſentiments of religion. 208. a.

Bread. What is meant by chapter-bread. II. 815. b.

Bregi, the French Embaſſador at the Court of Poland, what his pretenſions were. III. 264. a. b.

Bremen, in what manner Calviniſm was introduced into that city by Hardenberg. III. 352, 353. a. b.

Brentius, a zealous Ubiquitarian, forewarns all ſtates not to allow the Zuinglians a toleration. II. 196.

Brerley, whether he and thoſe he quotes have calumniated John Knox. III. 668. a. b. 669. a.

Breſman (Gregory) a Profeſſor at Leipſic, praiſes Baduel, and his diſcourſe on the marriage of men of learning, which he cauſes to be reprinted. I. 603. a.

Bretagne (the Duke of) neglects his wife, who was daughter to the King of Scotland, and falls in love with Antoinette de Maillezé, wife to the Lord Villequier. II. 464. b. One of his moſt faithful ſervants makes remonſtrances to him, againſt it in vain. ibid.

Bretagne (Anne of) becomes barren, and at length loſes her life by the ignorance of the midwives, who aſſiſted at her laſt delivery. III. 28. a.

Breviary of Burgos, the correction of it. IV. 76. a. b.

Breuin (William) the circumſtance which he added in the ſtory of Pope Joan. IV. 729.

Brezé (the Marſhal de) deſires to be prayed for in the Proteſtant Church of Saumur. I. 263. b. Draws his ſword againſt the Marſhal de Chaſtillon, and for what reaſon. III. 821. a.

Brezé (James de) puniſhes his wife's infidelity. II. 132. a. b.

Brianville (the Abbot de) invents the Heraldry cards. III. 51.

Bride: a bride whom a man carried to Church in his arms, to be married. IV. 324. a.

Briefs, ſome compoſers of briefs. I. 361. a. b.

Briet (Father) his faults with reſpect to Collatius. II. 524. b. 525. a. In ſpeaking of Lucretius, he commits eight faults in eight lines. III. 917. b.

Brin, particulars relating to the ſiege of that place. V. 192. b.

Brinvilliers (the Lady de) among other proofs, her judges made uſe of her written confeſſion, in order to condemn her. II. 460. b.

Briſac and Friburg, remained in the poſſeſſion of France by the peace of Nimeguen. III. 720. a.

Briſſac, his zeal for the glory of the French monarchy. III. 396. a.

Briſſon (Barnaby) quoted. V. 17. b.

Britons, the barbarities which they exerciſed upon the Romans. V. 260. a. b.

Brixen (a town in Tirol) the aſſembly there declares that Gregory VII, had forfeited the Pontificate. III. 231.

Brochard (Bonaventure) the age in which he lived. II. 529. a. b. Writes a deſcription of the Holy Land. ibid.

Brodeau, perſons of that family. II. 145. b. 146. a. b.

Broekhuſius, his conjecture upon a paſſage of Propertius. IV. 585. b.

Brogitarus buys the Pontificate of Peſſinus, and is put in poſſeſſion of it. II. 628. b. But he was driven out as an Uſurper. ibid.

Broſſe (René de) condemned to loſe his head by an Arrêt of the parliament of Paris. II. 840. a. How his ſon John entered again upon the poſſeſſion of his father's eſtate. ibid. b.

Broſſier (Simon) diſputes with Villegaignon, and confounds him. V. 478. b.

Brother. A lay-brother that occaſions a whole convent being ſet on fire. III. 284. b.

Brothers, a proverb of the Antients touching the hatred of brothers. II. 701. b.

Broukolakas, what the Greeks underſtand by that word. I. 508.

Brown (Thomas) his thoughts concerning the manner of human propagation. V. 6. a.

Bruce (Robert) in vain ſollicited by William Criton to put the Chancellor of Scotland to death, and accuſed to the governor of the Low-Countries. II. 577.

Brueys, in what manner he attacks Mr Jurieu upon his propheсies. II. 683. b. to 685. a. b. Wherein he is blame-worthy on that head. 684. b. 685. a. His reflexions upon Mr Jurieu's gay humour. 954. a. b.

Brugenſis (Lucas) what he ſays of the Scribes. V. 8. a. b. An obſervation which he makes. 11. b.

Bruyere (La) quoted. II. 118. a. b. 119. a. 452. b. Delicately touches the curioſity of the fair ſex for nudities. III. 964. a. The character he gives us of children. 815. b. n. (7). He ridicules the profuſion of reading which certain authors ſhew. II. 105. b.

Brun, in Latin Braunius, his anſwer to Mr Stoupp's book. V. 204. a.

Brune (La) was not ſufficiently guarded in what he publiſhed, concerning the Nuncio Chigi. II. 474. b. 475. a. b.

Brunchaut extravagantly commended by Gregory the Great. III. 222. b. 223. a.

Brunſman (John) refutes the Polygamia triumphatrix, of Lyſerus, by a book intituled, Monogamia Victrix. III. 973.

Brunſwic (the Electoreſs of) named to ſucceed to the crown of England. V. 194. b.

Bruſquet, a King's Jeſter, famous in his way. II. 668. a. n. (32).

Bruſſels, whether the bombarding of that city was foretold by Mademoiſelle Bourignon. See Bourignon.

Brutum Fulmen, a miſtake of Thuanus and Deckher, touching that book. III. 521. a. How the author was rewarded for it. ibid.

Brutus (Decimus) was a good judge of Poetry, and, was well verſed both in the learning of Rome and Greece. I. 60. and a.

Brutus and Cicero had not the ſame taſte in Oratory. II. 166. a.

Brutus (Lucius Junius) does himſelf condemn his own children to death. II. 162. a.

Brutus (Marcus Junius) his intrepidity. IV. 746. a. b.

Brutus (Stephanus Junius) a diſſertation upon that diſguiſed author. V. 731. & ſeq.

Brutus (John Michael) differs from other Hiſtorians in his opinion touching Conſtantia, Queen of Sicily. III. 395. b.

Buccafoco: the family-name of the Cardinal Sarnanus, or de Sarnano. V. 57.

Bucer ſaid that if Thomas's works were ſuppreſſed, he could deſtroy the Church of Rome. I. 472. b. Conjecture upon the pretence there was for accuſing him of Judaiſm. II. 175. a. b. His writing was very bad. IV. 285. a. He endeavours to make out that the ſentiments of Luther and Zuinglius concerning the Lord's Supper, were at bottom the ſame. V. 103. b. Is recommended by Gropper to Herman de Wida, Archbiſhop of Cologne. III. 240. a. His intimacy with Gropper. ibid. a. b.

Buceriſm, in what it conſiſted. II. 171. a. b.

Buchanan, the horrible ſlanders of Garaſſe and Barclay againſt him. II. 181. a. b. 182. a. Whether his political maxims, are not the maxims of the Proteſtants. ibid. and b. His enemies cannot deny but that he was at leaſt once in his life a Philoſopher. 185. b. He is accuſed of having blackened Queen Mary. 282. a. b.

Budæus (William) compared to Badius. I. 601. and a. b. Repreſents himſelf as married to two wives. II. 189. b. Makes himſelf feared. 192. Gives a taſte for uniting Polite Literature with the Civil-Law. I. 67. a. How his body was carried to the grave. IV. 845. b. He would have kept William Bigot at Paris, but Caſtellan prevented. it. II. 8. a.

Budos (Louiſe de) wife to the Duke of Montmorency, hearkens to a propoſal of marriage before her huſband's death. III. 184. b.

Bueil, a baſtard ſon to the Count de Sancerre, murthered at Orleans, by whom and for what. IV. 887. a. b.

Buyrette (Thomas) falls into the hands of the murderers, at the maſſacre of Paris. II. 694. a.

Buiſſiere, his letter on the real effects of James Aymar's wand. I. 8. a. b. and n. (71). His letter to the author. 9. a. n. (75).

Bulgaria, the Manichean Hereſy takes deep root there. IV. 512. a. b.

Bulgarus, a lecture which he makes, raiſes a laugh in the audience. II. 193. and b.

Bulls, who it was that was denoted by the title of Bull-Carrier. I. 217. a. A Bull where the placing of the words, and the omiſſion of a comma, occaſions great obſcurity. 607. a. b. One which declares the King of Navarre, to have forfeited the ſucceſſion only on account of his Hereſy. 739. a.

Bupali Odium and Bupali Pugna, whether or not they are proverbs, and what they ſignify. II. 203. a. b.

Burchard, his Journal. V. 757. Amply quoted, touching the affair of Savonarola. 63. b. 64. a. b. &c.

Burdeus (Peter Areas) an Auguſtin Monk is hanged and quartered for Adultery and Murther. V. 107. a. b.

Bure (Idelette de) Calvin's wife. II. 267. b. Her death. ibid.

Burgundy (Adolphus of) a letter which Eraſmus writ to him. I. 782. b. He died in the year 1558. ibid.

Burgundy (James of) Grandſon to Baldwin, a natural ſon of Philip the Good, turned Proteſtant. II. 215. a. But taking offence at the diſputes between Calvin and Bolſec, he fell off. ibid.

Burgundy (John Duke of) after having cauſed the Duke of Orleans, the brother of Charles VI, to be murthered, is treacherouſly aſſaſſinated himſelf. II. 462. b. 463. a.

Burgundy (the branch of) always confederated with the greateſt enemies of the French name. II. 462. b. 463. a. Aggrandizes itſelf very much. 214. b. The States of the province of Burgundy, reſolve to diſobey the King's edict. I. 720. a. b.

Burial refuſed from a motive of religious zeal. I. 139. b. 140. a. Was a thing indifferent to Diogenes the Cynic. II. 668. b. 669. a. We ſhould never refuſe it to our enemies. IV. 194. b. 195. a.

Burleſque defended. II. 603. a. b. 604. a.

Burman quoted. III. 651. a. n. (67).

Burnet, examination of his controverſy with Mr Varillas about Camden's Hiſtory. II. 283. b. 284. a. What he ſays of the Proteſtant Divines who were named to reviſe the Liturgy of Edward III. — 563. a. b. Makes a convert of the Earl of Rocheſter, and writes a book upon that head. V. 804. What they make him ſay concerning this Dictionary, and a confutation of it. 805. His criticiſm upon Sanders. 43. a. b.

Burrhus, by what argument he diſſuaded Nero from divorcing Octavia. III. 794. a.

Buſbequius, his letters are a model of writing well for Embaſſadors. II. 232. a. Quoted. V. 529. b.

Butas made Plutarch by frequent correction. II. 237. b.

Butcher, whether that word ought to be taken in a literal ſenſe, in Dante's ſatire againſt the third race of the Kings of France. II. 296. a. b.

Butter-women (the thanks of) it is the name of a ſatire, which was one of the ſequels of the Anti-Coton. III. 207. a.

Buzenval very ill received at the Court of Queen Elizabeth, and for what reaſon. II. 754. a. b.

Bzovius, whether a good anſwer has been made to the cenſurers of his Annals. II. 240. a. b.

C.

CAbala finds any thing in every text of Scripture. I. 174. b. 175. a. b. 176. a. b. What it teaches concerning the alliance of the elementary inhabitants with our ſpecies. 314. a. Its followers have a great eſteem for the book of the creation. 173. a.

Cacus, the ſon of Vulcan; why the Romans ſaid that he caſt fire and flame out of his mouth. V. 45. a.

Cadenet aſpires to an alliance with the royal-blood, after a Profeſſor's widow had refuſed to marry him. II. 576. a. b.

Cælius Apicius, what that book treats of, and who was the author of it. I. 371. and a. b. 372. a.

Cajado, a Portugueſe Poet, puts an impoſture on the public. III. 215. b. 216. a.

Cajetan, his opinion about the formation of women. III. 144. b.

Caille (John de la), his miſtakes touching Badius. I. 602. b. and Wechel. V. 537. b. 538. a.

Cayet, a learned man, and a fool. III. 883.

Cain, the occaſion of his quarrel with Abel. I. 23. b. 24. a. b. In what manner he killed the latter. ibid. b. Why God took upon himſelf the immediate cognizance of that murther. II. 247. b. Abundance of fantaſtical conjectures about the mark which God ſet upon him. ibid. Reaſons for which it is pretended that his offering was rejected by God. 248. a.

Calamity (public), exiles who would not return to their native country at ſuch a price. II. 259. a. b. 260. a. b.

Calais, how long it was in the hands of the Engliſh, and when taken by Henry II. III. 25. a.

Calanus makes away with himſelf in the retinue of Alexander, to ſhun diſgrace. III. 312. IV. 7. a.

Calcagnini accuſed of falſhood with regard to Venus. I. 368. b. Attacks Cicero. IV. 69. a. Writes obſcene verſes. V. 422. a.

Calchas dies of vexation, and for what. IV. 253, 254.

Calderinus has been undeſervedly placed among the witneſſes of the truth by the Proteſtants. II. 252. b.

Calendar, ſee Kalendar.

Calepin, his Dictionary compoſed or corrected without exactneſs. I. 534. a. Pliny is falſely quoted there about the Lamiæ. III. 712. b. 713. a. b. The judgment that has been paſſed on that Dictionary. IV. 586. b. 587. a.

Calf (golden); the Rabbins tell us that the powder of that calf which Moſes made the children of Iſrael ſwallow, ſtuck upon the beards of thoſe who had worſhipped it. I. 1. a. And had almoſt the ſame effect as the waters of jealouſy. ibid. b.

Caligula takes for a reproach an inſcription which was made with a deſign to pleaſe him. I. 121. Is charmed with a piece of his own compoſing. ibid. a. b. The queſtion he aſked a Player. 370. and a. b. Surprized in the act of inceſt with his ſiſter. 358. II. 255. a. b. 702. a. b. His impiety. 255. b. 256. a. And his extravagancies to honour the memory of Druſilla. 703. a. b. He makes away with his coheir. 718. b. 719. a. The Jews refuſe to put up his ſtatue in the temple of Jeruſalem. I. 374. b. What he ſaid to his brother. 758. b. He reſtores books which had been ſuppreſſed for their invectives. II. 357. a. How he was killed. 359. a. b. At what age he took the virile gown. 702. b. Complains that in his reign there happened no great misfortunes. III. 433. b. Was not ſuperſtitious. IV. 7. b. How Macro endeavoured to inſinuate himſelf into his favour. 20. b. 21. a. His ingratitude. ibid. b. and 22. a. b. He ſaid that his mother was ſprung from the inceſtuous embraces of Auguſtus and Julia. 332. b. In the flower of his youth he falls deſperately in love with Cæſonia, who was not young. II. 256. a. b. IV. 695. b. A falſhood touching his nurſe, which Guevara affirms, as if he had read it in Dion. II. 339. b. 340. a. His whimſical regard for his horſe. IV. 918. a.

Callimachus had a maxim that a great book is always a great evil. II. 526. b.

Callipædia, what judgment ought to be formed of that poem and its author. IV. 808. a. b.

Calliſthenes, what Suidas ſays of him. V. 360. a.

Callonge, Barony erected into a Marquiſate. IV. 866. b.

Calprenede, what he ſays of his Caſſandra and Cleopatra. IV. 192. b. Made no memoirs nor collections for his works. V. 444. a.

Calvary; it is thought that Adam was buried there. I. 104. b.

Calvin, his quarrel with Baudouin. I. 694. a. b. Bertelier's teſtimony againſt him of no weight. 782. a. b. 783. a. II. 61. b. What weight Bolzec's teſtimony againſt him can have. 58. a. b. 59. a. b. 60. a. b. 61. a. b. He writes letters againſt Blandrata. 17. a. b. Bucer's letter to him. 173. b. 174. a. b. Being accuſed of making God the author of ſin, he pleads his own cauſe at Bern, but they came to no deciſion there about his doctrine. 601 a. He was never in Prieſt's orders. 260. a. Did not know that there were two Seneca's. ibid. b. When and why he publiſhed his Inſtitution. 261. a. 262. a. b. 263. a. Refuſes to ſubmit to the regulations made by the Synod of Bern. 264. b. Commended for not commenting on the Revelations. 265. b. The pleaſant ſtories which they ſpread about of his devotion for St Hubert. 266. a. b. His diſintereſtedneſs. 269. b. 270. a. His differences with Caſtalio. 361. b. 362. a. He is upbraided for having too eagerly picked up the flying news which was ſpread concerning his enemies. 364. a. Has not ſaid much more againſt the Popes and the court of Rome than Caſtellan has. 370. b. 371. a. Whether he was ever in England. 663. a. Goes to Paris upon his return from his ſtudies of the law. IV. 318. b. Had ſeverely handled ſome perſons whom the Queen of Navarre protected. 319. b. 320. a. Judges freely of the conduct of Sarah and Abraham. V. 53. b. 54. a. b. 55. b. In ſpeaking of the Euchariſt he makes uſe of phraſes which ſeem to imply a ſubſtantial preſence. 103. b. n. (47). Calumniated by a Lutheran. 548. b. 549. a. b. His ſermons tranſlated into Latin by Claudius Baduel. I. 603. He had been Maturin Cordier's pupil, and dedicates one of his books to him. II. 554. Divers of his books tranſlated by Des Gallars. III. 124. a. b. A dæmon ſuggeſted to him his falſe gloſſes on the Scripture. 538. b. 539. a. b. Is not treated as an Arian by Hunnius, who ſays no more than that his expoſitions are favourable to the Arians. ibid. His Inſtitution tranſlated into Italian by Giulio Ceſare Paſchali. IV. 492. See Peter de la Place at Poictiers. 681. a. Meſſieurs Du Tillet were his pupils. V. 356. a. He diſputes at Frankfort with Juſtus Velſius. 450. b. Some people wrongfully aſcribe the Anatomy of the Maſs to him. 461. b. He converts Paul Volſius. 507. What he ſays about the origin and effects of ſin. 822. What God he has introduced, as the Roman Catholics pretend. 824. His advertiſement touching the general inventory of relics. II. 274. b. His nephew Prior of the Carmelites at Paris. V. 43. Schultingius undertakes to refute his Inſtitution. 86. His Inſtitution compared to Martyr's Common-Places. ibid. b. The great eſteem in which that book is held. ibid. b. 87. a. Abridgments that are made of it. ibid. A ſupplement to what has been ſaid of its different editions. 87. a. b. &c. How they vary from one another. ibid. a. b. Marlorat compoſes the indexes of it. 88. a. It has been printed times without number. ibid. b. Faults of the author of the Eſſais de Literature touching that Inſtitution. ibid. b. His Geneva Catechiſm, and a remark upon the date of it. ibid. a.

Calviniſm, the author of the True Hiſtory of Calviniſm cenſured for his minute obſervations. I. 796. a. b. Whether Calviniſm favours the paſſions. II. 843. a. b. The judgment which ſome Lutherans paſs upon it. III. 477. a. b. Introduced into Bremen by Hardenberg, and how. 352, 353.

Calviniſts, violences that were exerciſed upon them by the Lutherans. III. 535. a. b. 536. a. Their martyrdom looked upon as a falſe martyrdom by ſome Lutherans. 541. b. 542. a. Are falſely accuſed of deſigning to eſtabliſh an equality of conditions. IV. 919. a. b. 920. a. b. The Lutherans join with the Catholics againſt them. II. 121.

Calvino-Turciſmus cited. I. 789. b. 790. a. 797. a. Who was the author of that book. V. 275. a. b.

Calvinus Judaïzans, the hiſtory of that book. III. 537. a. b.

Calviſius (Sethus) cenſured as to the time of Ovid's death. IV. 447. a. b.

Calumniator (public), every one that owns himſelf to be ſuch with reſpect to things of conſequence, ſhould hide himſelf from the eyes of men. III. 554. b. 555. a.

Calumniators meet with too much indulgence. I. 327. a. Are capable of putting in practice the moſt ſhameful artifices. 393. b. 394. a. The beſt way to be revenged of them ſometimes is to return them no anſwer. 784. b. The way to diſcover them. 795. a. b. Their knaviſh tricks. 714. b. 715. a. There are ſeveral Eſcobar's and Banni's who abſolve them. II. 154. a. Policy finds its intereſts in letting them go unpuniſhed ſometimes. 626. b. 627. a. A good ſaying of Simonides touching calumniators. 726. b. How they were treated in the time of Gregory I. III. 221. b. 222. a. How they muſt be ſilenced. IV. 25. a. b. They have nothing to fear when they are powerful. 351. a. b. 352. a. Bring thoſe whom they calumniate into great trouble ſometimes. V. 249. a. b. 250. a. Calumniators on the ſcore of hereſy, they ſeldom receive the puniſhment which they deſerve. 512. b.

Calumny, its ſpirit. I. 393. b. In what caſe calumnies ſhould be left unanſwered and deſpiſed. 491. b. Such as are eaſily refuted do ſervice to thoſe they were deſigned to defame. 727. b. 728. a. Plain and diabolical calumnies which have nevertheleſs turned to the advantage of thoſe that were the authors of them. III. 90. b. 91. a. b. Advantages drawn from them in religious diſputes. IV. 101. b. What thoughts calumny raiſed in St Baſil. V. 102. b. Peoples readineſs to believe it. 103. a.

Calzaveglia (Vincent), a Phyſician at Breſcia, publiſhes a book, which is confuted by Donzellinus. II. 689.

Cambyſes, to what he compares new ſtratagems of war. I. 129. a. b.

Cambles eats his wife, and then kills himſelf. IV. 563. a. b.

Cambray, a powerful league formed againſt the Venetians there. III. 811. a.

Camden, his teſtimony concerning Buchanan's repentance is not altogether ſolid. II. 182. b. 183. a. But preferable at the ſame time to that of Mr du Puy related by Varillas. ibid. a. The praiſes that have been beſtowed upon him. 279. b. 280. a. A gentleman breaks off the noſe of his ſtatue. 284. b. In what manner part of the memoirs he made uſe of were loſt. ibid. and 285. a. b.

Cameleon, who is the author of the book which treats of the occult qualities of that animal. II. 639. b.

Camels, the Turks have a great veneration for them. IV. 40. b. According to theſe a certain camel will riſe again. 41. a.

Camener (Timan) propoſed by Alexander Hegius, and choſen director of the ſchool at Munſter. II. 242.

Camerarius (Joachim) changes the ſtate of the queſtion in defending Herodotus, who attributes envy and jealouſy to God. IV. 575. a. b.

Camerarius (Philip) does not find it likely that Francis I. deliberated in his council whether he ſhould make Charles V priſoner or not. II. 437. b.

Cameron, his conference with Tilenus. II. 285. b. 286. a. What he got by preaching up Paſſive Obedience. ibid. and b. Thought that many things in the Reformed Church wanted a farther reformation. 288. a. b. It was from him Mr Amyraut had the doctrine of Univerſal Grace. ibid. b. 289. a.

Camillus, the greateſt action of his life. II. 290. His deſcendants lived in obſcurity. ibid. b. 291. a. b. Whether it be true, that he forced the Gauls to reſtore the money which had been given to them, when they beſieged the capitol. 709.

Camillus (Ovinius) having aſpired to the empire, is aſſociated to it by Alexander Severus, and begs it as a favour that he may have leave to reſign. II. 770. a. b. Is killed. ibid. b.

Campagnelle (Madam. de), Balzac's niece, the hiſtory of her marriage. I. 622. b. 623. a. b.

Campanella; his city of the ſun. III. 345. a. b.

Campanus (John) makes the peaſants of Juliers believe that the end of the world was near. V. 238. a. b.

Campbel (Alexander), a Dominican, his tragical end. I. 221. a.

Campian, his diſpute with Whitakers. III. 940. a. b. 941. a. b.

Camps (the Abbot of), his diſſertation upon medals. V. 122. a. b.

Camus (John-Peter), Biſhop of Belley, what he ſays of the epiſcopal ſee of that town. I. 737. b. 738. a. b. His differences with the Monks of that dioceſe. ibid.

Cana (marriage of), who were the two betrothed perſons. III. 577. a. b. And whether they conſummated the marriage. ibid.

Canathus, what virtue that fountain had. III. 636. a. b.

Candale (the Duke of) challenged by Ceriſantes. II. 408. a. b.

Canibals; the cruelty of canibals was exerciſed in America. III. 774. a.

Canonizations, the vaſt expence made at them. III. 330. a. b.

Canons (goſpel) to whom the invention of them is to be aſcribed. I. 269. b. The difference between them and the harmony of Ammonius. ibid.

Cantel (Father) his falſe quotation with reſpect to Lucius Caſſius. II. 345. a. b.

Canterbury (St Thomas, Archbiſhop of), his perſecutor becomes his votary. III. 797. b.

Canterus (Andrew) was a prodigy of learning in his younger years. III. 217. b.

Capilupi, his Cento Virgilianus. V. 770. b.

Capiſtran (a Franciſcan) obliges the Jews to wear the letter Thau. IV. 309. b.

Capitals or large Greek letters, who brought them again into uſe. III. 732.

Capitol, the dogs who guarded it were not to bark in the day-time, at thoſe who came to pay their devotions in the temple. I. 773. b. Application of this to myſtical dogs. ibid.

Capitulation; the ſudden news of one coming after a great many falſe miſrepreſentations aggravates the diſguſt which people have at being impoſed upon. III. 719. b. Should not be granted to thoſe whom there is a deſign to puniſh. IV. 278. b.

Cappadocia, at what time it became a province of the Roman empire. I. 423. a.

Cappadocians very ſuperſtitious. II. 304. a.

Cappel (William) tranſlates Machiavel's Prince. IV. 15. a. n. (59).

Caprea, the leaps of that iſland immortalized. IV. 19. a. b.

Captains, what qualities they muſt have in order to ſucceed in great enterprizes. II. 413. a. b. 414. a. Several have dreaded the ſovereign judge of the world, upon remembring the blood that they had ſhed in wars which they thought juſt. 417. a. Some Captains branded with infamy, and for what reaſon. III. 284. There are ſome who love their pleaſures, but who love glory ſtill more. IV. 414. a. V. 271. a. b. 272. a. b.

Capuchins, when that order of Monks commenced. IV. 386. a. b. How far Pope Paul III was incenſed againſt the whole order, and for what reaſon. 388. b. A charge of forgery which proved unfortunate to the Capuchins of Paris. III. 896. a. b.

Caracalla, a perfidious action of his, which may be looked upon as the model of the St Bartholomew. I. 513. It is not true that he married his ſtepmother. III. 604. b. 605. a. b. 606. a. He was no leſs Julia's ſon than Geta. 606. a. He puts four Veſtals to death, one of whom he had enjoyed. 605. b. Kills his brother Geta in the arms of his mother. 605. When, and upon what occaſion, he was proclaimed by the ſoldiers an aſſociate to the empire. 607. b. How far his zeal for Alexander the Great went. IV. 7. b.

Carben (Victor de), a Rabbin converted to Chriſtianity. V. 540. a. b. 541. a.

Cardan, there are according to him twelve ſublime geniuſes who have excelled in the ſciences. I. 191. a. His heavieſt misfortunes. II. 315. b. He was rather a ſuperſtitious man, than an hardy unbeliever. ibid. Had more of the Fanatic in him than the Atheiſt. 316. a. A madman. 321. a. He abſtained from nouriſhment, that his prediction might prove true. 320. b. What he ſays of the Magic ſchools that had been in Spain. IV. 725. b. His ingenuity. II. 7, 8. His diſputes with Tartaglia. V. 297. and a.

Cardinal of quality, a competent judge in the affair of beauty. I. 399. a. Why there are ſo few Cardinals in the catalogue of Saints according to Bellarmine. 732. b. They are very ſeldom quite unanimous in the election of Popes. II. 472. Begin to be luxurious. 860. and b. 861. a. b.

Cardinals: the Pope ſhuts the mouths of the new Cardinals, and opens them again in another conſiſtory. IV. 284. b. n. (5). Obliged by Paul II to ſign bulls and decrees which they were wholly ignorant of. 511. a. b.

Carians were the firſt who ſet creſts on their helmets. IV. 790. a. b.

Carlos (Don), a book wrote concerning his ſtubbornneſs, caprice, whims, and maggots. II. 96. a.

Carmel, the oracle of the god ſo called. V. 466. b. 467. a. b.

Carmelite-Nuns introduced into France. I. 785. a. Their direction given to the ſuperior of the oratory. ibid. The Monks of the ſame order who wanted the direction of them, clamour loudly. ibid. Certain Carmelite-Nuns intermeddle with the political differences of Richelieu and Berulle. 786. a.

Carmelites (Friars), upon what they ground the antiquity of their order. V. 466. b. 467. a. b. They libel Cardinal Berulle. I. 785. a. A narrative of that quarrel. ibid. b. 786. a.

Carneades cenſures a common-place of conſolation: his objections anſwered. I. 280. b. He limits in ſome degree the doctrine of incomprehenſibility which Arceſilas taught. 410. b. Is very ill uſed by Numerius. II. 327. a. b. Had doctrines for his friends, and others for his ſcholars. ibid. a. It was impoſſible to diſcover what he thought the moſt probable. ibid. 334. b. It is ſaid that the ſun was darkened at the time of his death. 335. b. What he ſaid of Chryſippus. 486. a. b. He entirely demoliſhes an invention of Chryſippus. 494. a. b. In what manner he uſed to joke, when he happened to fall upon any ſubtile diſputes. 675. a. Whether he philoſophized at the ſame time with Epicurus. 777. a. How he explained human liberty. 792. b. He argued againſt juſtice. 330. a. b. IV. 752. a.

Carnival, to continue it to the firſt Sunday in Lent, one needs only go to Milan. V. 778. b.

Caroli, ſome of his tricks. III. 15. a. b.

Carpocratians, they pretended to have the image of Jeſus Chriſt, which was procured by Pilate. I. 472. a.

Carranza, his being ſuſpected of hereſy gave ground for ſuſpecting Charles V of the ſame thing. II. 336. a. b. Reflexion on the juſtice which the people did to his memory. 337. a. b.

Carrouſels, a law which is obſerved in them. III. 302. b.

Carſula, a town in Italy, at this day called Caſcina. IV. 713. b. n. (66).

Carſulanus (Martinus), the ſame with Martinus Polonus. IV. 713. b.

Carteſianiſm, what retards the progreſs of it. I. 472. b. Involved in Theological diſputes. II. 696. a. b. 697. a. Introduced into the ſchools by Wittichius. V. 564. Which procured him a great number of opponents. ibid. It is the leaſt in favour with the great and powerful in Holland. ibid.

Carteſians, the judgment which la Bourignon paſſes on their principles. II. 111. b. The ableſt among them are obliged to admit of mediate intelligences. 251. a. b. An explication of the doctrine of ſome of them concerning the formation of bodies. ibid. A Carteſian called learned, for ſaying that this propoſition two and two make four, admits of no difficulty. 389. b. The arguments of theſe Philoſophers againſt ſubſtantial forms prove too much. V. 116. b. Their principle for proving the immortality of the ſoul is not evident to all the world. IV. 717. b. 718. a. b. & ſeq. What incommodes them moſt in the ſyſtem of Automata. 908. b. 909. a. b. & ſeq. 912. b. 913. a. b. The advantage which they give to the Pyrrhoniſts. 654. a.

Carthage built an hundred and twenty-ſix years after the temple of Solomon. IV. 642.

Carthaginians, who was the firſt of all the Romans that beat them at ſea. II. 726.

Carthuſians: the pleaſant anſwer which a Carthuſian made to Philip de Comines. III. 223. a. Carthuſians fined in two thouſand piſtoles by whom, and for what. 541. b.

Cartigni, a demoniac in Savoy, who was tried in ſixteen languages. III. 211. b.

Cart-load; whether a cart-load of ſkins was the ſource of the war between the Duke of Burgundy and the Swiſs. II. 219. a.

Carvial (Cardinal) is the only one that withſtands Paul II. Who obliged the Cardinals to ſign bulls and decrees which they had never ſeen. IV. 511. b.

Caſa (John de la), why the Proteſtants have exclaimed ſo much againſt his verſes. IV. 235. a. He writes againſt Vergerius, and why. 410. a. What he aimed at in his abominable Capitolo del Forno. V. 422. a. b. Many have condemned it, without reading it. 423. a. A poem which he addreſſes to the Germans. 458. a. His book againſt Vergerius. ibid. a. b. &c.

Caſaubon (Iſaac), a conſiderable omiſſion of his. I. 519. b. His conjecture on a paſſage of Strabo approved. II. 632. a. b. He wrongfully cenſures Xiphilin touching Hadrian's Genealogy. III. 316. b. Had freed himſelf from the ſlavery of writing over and blotting out. IV. 85. b. Contradicts the great Julius Scaliger, but at the ſame time humbles himſelf with reſpect at the foot of his throne. 597. b. 598. a. His opinion about the four verſes that are aſcribed to Nero, is very odd. 596. a. Juſtly cenſured with reſpect to the place of Pyrrhus's burial. 660. b. Is cruelly taken to pieces in a ſatire. V. 98. a. b. Laughs at the fable of the She-Pope. IV. 739. b. 740. a. Blames St Chryſoſtome for telling obſcene ſtories. V. 852. and a. b. Is himſelf cenſured in his turn. ibid. &c.

Caſaubon (Meric), his obſervation on Homer with reſpect to the good and evil that there is in nature. V. 576. b. In what reſpect he conſidered Euripides as an inſpired writer. ibid.

Caſelius, Profeſſor at Helmſtadt; thoſe who had an eye to Eccleſiaſtical preferments, durſt not ſtudy under him. IV. 772. a. b.

Caſpian Sea taken for the Pontus Euxinus. IV. 678. a.

Caſſander, his conſultation. I. 691. b. 692. a. Compoſes a Latin diſcourſe, which is the origin of a very ſharp quarrel. 694. a. b. 695. a. From whom he took his conciliating ſpirit. V. 551.

Caſſini commiſſioned to find means for preventing the inundations of the Chiana. V. 499. a. b.

Caſſini (Samuel de) calumniates the Vaudois. IV. 916. b.

Caſſius (Lucius), his tribunal was called the rock of the accuſed. I. 351. II. 345. and a. His maxim cui bono. 345, 346. and b. 347. a. His ſeverity gave occaſion to all rigid judges being ſtiled Caſſiani. ibid. a. b.

Caſſius Longinus (Caius) harangues his ſoldiers. II. 350. b.

Caſſius Severus (Titus) took pleaſure in accuſing people. II. 356. b. Gave occaſion to the law which Auguſtus made againſt defamatory libels. V. 743.

Caſſock: one ought never to deſpiſe a man in a caſſock, how low an object ſoever he may ſeem. I. 361.

Caſſolus could not anſwer the queſtion that was put to him. I. 616. a.

Caſtalio diſguiſed under the name of Martinus Bellius, wrote againſt puniſhing Heretics. I. 789. a. b. Broached ſome very ſingular opinions. II. 360. b. Gave ſignal examples of moderation. 364. b. His extreme poverty. 365. b. 366. a. Whether he be the author of a dialogue againſt the right which is allowed to the Civil Magiſtrate, of putting Heretics to death. V. 167. a. b. His differences with Calvin more particularly related in the French life of Calvin than in the Latin one. II. 274. b.

Caſtellan, a pleaſant anſwer which he made to Francis I. who aſked him if he was a gentleman. II. 367. a. b. Gets his landlord's daughter with child. 369. b. 370. a. b. His application to ſtudy was ſurpriſing. ibid. b. He did not ſtay long at Rome, and the reaſon of it. ibid. and 371. a. Was of opinion that indulgence ſhould be uſed towards inquiſitors and informers. 372. a. b. How he checked a Cardinal for the reproaches he had caſt upon him with reſpect to Dolet. 683. b. 684. a. What he ſaid of Aſtrology. 401. a. b.

Caſtellan (John), an account of his martyrdom wrote by Lambert. III. 708.

Caſtello (James de) was of ſuch a ſmall ſtature that Pope Boniface VIII ordered him to riſe, thinking he was upon his knees. I. 326.

Caſtile, when, and on what occaſion, the Kings of that country began to lay hands on the Eccleſiaſtical revenues. II. 378. a. And who was the firſt that permitted all the public acts to be drawn up in the vulgar tongue. 379. Diſorders occaſioned in that kingdom by a dream which a woman had. IV. 456. a.

Caſtor and Pollux make an inroad into Attica. I. 52. a.

Caſtor; whether the Caſtor who compoſed many books, be the ſame with the ſon-in-law of Dejoatarus. II. 630. b. 631. a. Three reaſons for the negative. ibid. There was another Caſtor beſides, who was an excellent Botaniſt. 631. b.

Caſtrate; perſons who caſtrated themſelves out of complaiſance. II. 535. and a. b.

Caſtration, the puniſhment that was inflicted on adulterers. III. 74. a. b. What other perſons were condemned to it. 77. a.

Caſtritius, his anſwer to the Conſul Carbo was like that which had been made by ſome others. II. 384. and b. The meaning of that anſwer. ibid.

Caſtro (Alphonſus de) cenſured for two reaſons, with reſpect to Damaſcen and the time in which he lived. II. 586. a.

Caſtro (Roderigo à) ſeconds Marinello in the compoſition of his book on the diſeaſes of women. IV. 148. a. b.

Caſtrocaro perſecutes the Vaudois. III. 757, 758.

Caſuiſts, a doubt propoſed to them on an Anatomical curioſity. I. 109. a. They are obliged to treat of ſubjects full of obſcenity, in order to ſolve caſes of conſcience. 182. a. Their books teſtify that there are married women who make uſe of drugs to cauſe abortion. II. 314. b. Their books contain the art of cavilling with God. III. 894. b. Nothing that concerns matrimonial cauſes eſcapes their curioſity. V. 40. b. 41. a. b. Looſe Caſuiſts take a great advantage of Abraham's conduct with regard to Sarah. 51. a. Write down minutely all kinds of immodeſty, which they only know by the report of vicious men. III. 135. b. Are obliged to write or ſay things which are ſhocking to modeſty. V. 853.

Caſus Regius: whether that book be juſtly aſcribed to the Abbot de St Cyran. V. 15. b. 16. a.

Cat. A penſion left to a cat, and a famous law-ſuit about it. IV. 918. b.

Catalans, what they did to obtain from heaven the recovery of Mr de Marca. IV. 100. b.

Catalogue of the witneſſes of the truth, by whom collected. I. 165. b. The occaſion of that book. III. 560. a. b.

Catalogues of Heretics, the writers of them follow one another like ſheep. I. 760. b.

Catalonia, Lewis Meſplede's book concerning the right which the crown of France has to that province. IV. 199. a.

Catechiſm explained according to the method of Ariſtotle's Categories. I. 472. a.

Catechiſm of Calvin criticiſed by John d'Eſpagne. II. 837. a. b. Does not differ much, in explaining the Euchariſt, from the opinion of J. Poinct, who admits a Real Preſence, but which is no more than ſacramental at the ſame time. IV. 693. b. The date of it. V. 88. a.

Categories, a queſtion concerning them. V. 436. a.

Catherine de Medicis, her conferences with the Duke of Alba. I. 119. a. b. Her terrible rebuke to Amyot. 258. a. Her own artifices played againſt her. III. 419. b. The anſwer which Henry the Great made to her one day. 422. a. It is ſaid that ſhe made Machiavel's Prince her peculiar ſtudy. IV. 15. and b. 16. a. A letter that was wrote to her. 160. a. b. 161. a. b. Fables uttered in her Funeral Oration. V. 36. a. Reflexion upon her conduct. 255. a. Her inſenſibility with regard to ſlanders. 760, 761. A maxim aſcribed to her. 750. See Medicis.

Catherine de Navarre, ſiſter to Henry the Great, refuſes to marry with the condition of going to Maſs. IV. 330. a. b. Found no great ſatisfaction in her marriage. ibid. 331. a. She continues ſteadfaſt in her religion. ibid.

Catholic: of what Prince it was ſaid, that he was a good Catholic, but a very bad Chriſtian. III. 809. b.

Catholicon ; who was the firſt that made uſe of that word for the title of a Dictionary. I. 614. b.

Catholicon, a paſſage from that book ; deſcribing a proceſſion of the League. IV. 243. b.

Catholics and Proteſtants reproach each other with having Adamites among them. I. 712. and a. b. Several Roman Catholics have all their life-time made profeſſion of the Catholic religion, although they wiſhed for a reformation in many things. 659. They are not at all ſcrupulous when the queſtion is about the conqueſts which they make upon the Proteſtants. II. 246. b. What their making the ſign of the croſs ſerves for. 616. b. Engliſh Catholics, their threatenings and imprecations againſt their country. III. 521. b. The reaſon of ringing a bell at noon in Roman Catholic countries. IV. 50. a. The free exerciſe of their religion is promiſed them in Holland. III. 675. a.

Catiline, by what means his conſpiracy began to be diſcovered. III. 112. b. 113. a. How we may ſuppoſe him to have paſſed for one of Fulvia's huſbands. 112. b.

Catinat (Mr de) did not raiſe the ſiege of Suſa, on the contrary he took it, and kept it till the peace. IV. 210. b. Was not beaten at Coni. ibid. 211. a. Gains the battle of Marſaglia. ibid. It is falſe that he was forced by the allies, to return beyond the Alps. ibid.

Cato the Cenſor expels one Manlius from the ſenate, and why. I. 40. b. What he ſaid in order to deride Iſocrates's ſchool. 615. a. It is ſaid that no one durſt aſk an unjuſt thing of him. II. 27. a. b. The offers which he made to King Ptolomy, in order to engage him to ſurrender up the iſland of Cyprus to the Romans. 507. The reſpect which the people ſhewed him, at the Floral Games, and Martial's raillery. III. 54. a. He harangues vehemently againſt the liberty which the women took of running in crowds. IV. 769. b. The judgment he paſſed upon the three Philoſophers that came Embaſſadors from Athens. II. 329. b. And why he adviſed them to be ſent back immediately. ibid. and IV. 751. b. 752. a. His Origines. 750. a. b. His contempt for all the Greek literature. 751. b. He is blamed for indulging the leudneſs of his Domeſtics. 754. a. His uſury. ibid. and. b. He is rallied. V. 434. a.

Cato Uticenſis ſays that God does not hear the prayers of the ſlothful. I. 94. b. Deſired rather to be an honeſt man, than to ſeem ſo. II. 420. b. 421. a. Part of his Hiſtory. IV. 745. a. b. 746. a. His ſurprize at a letter which he read. V. 123. a. b. He cenſures Cæſar's opinion touching the puniſhment of bad men ; but he only does it indirectly and with moderation. II. 418. a.

Cattho (Angelo) his gift of prophecy. II. 391. b. 392. a. Reflexions on that head. ibid. a. b. 393. a.

Catullus writes verſes againſt Cæſar. IV. 88. a. b.

Caucaſus (Mount) why ſo called. II. 82. b.

Cave (William) treats the ſtory of Pope Joan as a mere fable, and maintains that it has been thruſt into the chronicle of Martin Polonus, by another hand. IV. 709. a.

Cavern : what uſe the Lacedemonians made of a cavern near the mountain Taygetus. III. 965. a. b.

Cauſe, the Schoolmen plagued themſelves to aſſign a cauſe for every effect. II. 227. a.

Cauſe (Firſt) the doctrine of ſome Philoſophers concerning it. II. 672. a. b. 673. a. b.

Cauſes, ſome are very eaſily defended, though the Defendant be a little in the wrong. I. 391. b. The beſt may be loſt in certain circumſtances. IV. 852. b. 853. a. Some cauſes which bear the name of luſcious. 799. a. b. to 802. a. b.

Cauſes (Occaſional) whether the Devil makes uſe of the ſtaff as an occaſional cauſe. I. 4. b. Reflexion upon the Hypotheſis of occaſional cauſes. II. 251. a b. Its uſe. 767. b. There is no Hypotheſis more capable of giving an account of events. IV. 690. a. May be of ſome uſe towards accounting for dreams. 72. a. And explaining the Phænomena relating to bodies. 94. b. Whether they produced the miracles of the antient law. 609. a. b. This ſyſtem does not bring in God acting miraculouſly. 914. b. Whether it can be of any uſe towards reſolving ſome difficulties touching Providence. V. 371. a. b. 372. a.

Cauſſin, to what he compares St Paul and St Auguſtin. I. 109. b. His ſympathy with the ſun. II. 402. b. And Henry the fourth's prognoſtication concerning him. ibid. and 403. a. He gives us the long particulars of a ſtory all taken out of his own head. III. 19. b. 20. a. Condemns a cenſure of Longin. V. 328. b. 329. a.

Cea, the inhabitants of that iſland place Ariſteus, ſon to Apollo, in the number of the gods. I. 456. a. See Zia.

Cedrenus, miſtaking Xiphilin's meaning falls into a groſs error, touching Hadrian's extraction. III. 316. b.

Ceylon, a comical opinion of the inhabitants of that iſland, touching the tears of Eve. I. 23. a. A mountain of that iſland, called the Peak of Adam, and for what reaſon. 104. a.

Celeſtin III, what he did to ſhew that he could give the Imperial crown to whom he pleaſed. III. 394. a.

Celibacy ; Agrippa declaimed againſt the law of Celibacy. I. 156. b. That law has terrible conſequences, and is an inexhauſtible ſource of impurities and diſorders. II. 554. b. 588. a. b. III. 13. b. 14. a. b. 224. b. 225. a. b. IV. 240. and a. b. The vow of Celibacy is raſh. III. 13. b. The number of Clergymen who cannot bear the yoke of it is innumerable. 235. a. Whether Philoſophers ought to prefer it to marriage. 382. b. Whether it be poſſible to be obſerved. 595. a. b. The ſuppreſſion of Celibacy was very inconvenient to the great Proteſtant Lords in Germany. 727. b. Cannot be defended by the diſorders of ſome married perſons. V. 425. b. 426. a. Joſeph Hall diſputes upon that ſubject. 344. a. b. 345. a. A curious paſſage of the Hiſtory of Huldric Mutius on the ſame ſubject. IV. 296. a. b. 297. a. Paſſages from others to the like purpoſe. 411. a. b.

Celſus laughs at the Chriſtians, and at their Do not examine, only believe. V. 816. Confuted by Origen ibid. and 817.

Celſus, has raiſed beaſts above men. IV. 911. b.

Celtæ, whence ſo called. III. 433. a.

Celtes (Conrad) there were ſome famous Latin Poets in Germany before him. III. 724. and b.

Cenalis (Robert) his judgment on John Bouchet's Annals of Aquitain. II. 103. a.

Ceneus, killed in the quarrel between the Centaurs and Lapithæ. I. 537. a.

Cenſor. He who is very guilty, himſelf ought not to ſet up for a Cenſor. 210. b.

Cenſors of Books, their little attention. I. 101. a. They detain manuſcripts too long, and ſtrike many things out of them. II. 809. a.

Cenſure ; the inclination which people have for cenſure. I. 696. a. Cenſures that are groſs and indiſcreet, produce very bad conſequences. 377. b. The inconveniencies which attend thoſe Cenſures, which fall upon a multitude of propoſitions, in a looſe and indeterminate manner, and without particularizing each propoſition. 340. a. 607. a. The fatal effects of it, when it is ill managed. III. 464. a. b. 465. a. b.

Centula, city, why ſo called. I. 10. a.

Centuriators of Magdeburg, what they relate touching Gregory the Great, deſerves no credit. III. 224. b. 225. a. b. &c. How they were treated. 600. b. Some facts which concern their work. 560. b. 561. a. b. & ſeq. Their Epiſtle Dedicatory to Queen Elizabeth. 562. a. b. 563. a. b.

Century, the XVIth and XVIIth, compared in point of learning. I. 92. b. 220. b. 221. a. b.

Cepio favours the Knights cauſe againſt the pretenſions of the Senate. II. 711. b.

Ceramica ; there was in Athens, a fine ſtreet, and likewiſe a ſuburb, which were called by that name, but for different reaſons. IV. 343. b.

Cerdagne, taken for the iſland of Sardinia, by a learned Civilian. II. 464. b.

Ceremonies (Sacred) ought not to be divulged. III. 216. b. It is better to bear with them, than to diſmember the Church. 343. a. b.

Ceres, for what benefactions the world ſtood indebted to her. V. 333. a. In what manner her feaſt called Theſmophoria, was celebrated. ibid. b. How Baubo cured her of her melancholy. 336. a. b. And what was the conſequence of that. ibid.

Cerigo. See Cythera.

Ceriſantes has wrote ſome very pretty Latin verſes, which are quoted by Menage. III. 102. b. n. (18).

Cervantes (Michael) his novels tranſlated by d'Audiguier. I. 548. a.

Ceſar (Auguſtus) owes the greateſt part of his glory to the intereſt he had among the learned men of his Court. V. 660.

Ceſar (Julius) whether that which Valerius Maximus relates concerning Accius, ought to be applied to him. I. 59. a. Was a Poet when very young. ibid. His ſoul ſuppoſed to have been changed into a ſtar. 348. b. He deſerved death, but it was not the buſineſs of three or four private perſons, to undertake to puniſh him. II. 165. b. What weapons his murderers made uſe of to kill him, and with what weapons they were killed themſelves. 349. a. Valerius Maximus is the only Hiſtorian who ſpeaks of his apparition to Caſſius. ibid. b. Whether he ever returned into Gaul after the paſſage of the Rubicon. 394. b. An inſtance of his moderation. ibid. a. Whether ſome others in the like ſituation could have done what he did. 414. a. b. The three celebrated words which he wrote to a friend. 415. b. Different judgments on his Commentaries. 417. b. 418. a. Some facts relating to the ſame book. 425. a. b. Who was the firſt that publiſhed it in Greek. III. 620. and a. He does not vouchſafe to riſe up to the Senate. II. 421. b. 422. a. b. V. 399. a. Attempts of his favourites to procure him the title of King. II. 420. a. Why he gave no deciſion in Dejotarus's cauſe. 626. a. b. 627. a. Said he had nothing to fear from ſuch fat and well-dreſſed men as Dolabella and Marc Antony. 679. b. What ſort of friends he made choice of, according to Cicero. 680. a. The effect which Cicero's oration for Ligarius had upon him. III. 831. b. He is too fond of diſcourſing upon the profeſſion of others. 871. a. Seizes upon the treaſure which was kept in the temple of Saturn. IV. 204. b. 205. a. b. Suppreſſes that action in his Hiſtory. ibid. Makes Pompey his ſon-in-law. 281. a. Was wont to forget nothing but injuries. 488. b. n. (48). Receives a love-letter in the Senate-houſe. V. 123. b. Indulged his ſoldiers in all manner of debauchery after a great victory. 271. a. Wiſhed for a ſudden death. 439. b. The Arverni ſhewed his ſword hung up in one of their temples. II. 419. b. His Commentaries tranſlated and commented on by Vigenere. I. 631. a. A parallel drawn between him and Henry IV, by Antony de Bandole. ibid.

Ceſarius, a letter of St Chryſoſtome to that Monk. II. 5. b.

Ceſy-Sancy, on what terms he married the Counteſs de Moret. III. 266. a. b.

Ceſonia, Caligula's wife, facts that concern her. II. 256. a. b.

Cevennes: it was falſely affirmed that the Count de Souches, was born there. V. 192.

Chabot (Joan) publickly profeſſes the Proteſtant religion without quitting the habit of a Nun. IV. 470.

Chains; why Kings were loaded with Chains of gold or ſilver, I. 516. b.

Chaiſe (Father de la) a ſatire againſt him. I. 343. a. b. 344. a.

Chalcondyle has ſpoke of the Bohemians from very bad authority. II. 298. a.

Challenges of a remarkable kind. II. 208. a. b.

Chamber-maid: a young fellow in the diſguiſe of a Chamber-maid. I. 405.

Chambers of the Edict, when granted to the Huguenots. III. 156. b.

Chambers of Meditations: places into which the Jeſuits carry the greateſt ſinners. &c. II. 457. a. Deſcribed. ibid.

Chambre (the Abbot de la) what he took for his text in the funeral oration on the French Queen. III. 601. b.

Chamier dies like Zuinglius, with his ſword in his hand. II. 432. a. b. 433. a. His character. ibid. and b.

Champion des Dames, who was the author of that Poem. III. 77.

Chanaan, the cauſe of his wickedneſs, and the firſt ſymptoms of it. II. 431. b.

Change: we ought to continue in the communion we were brought up in, unleſs we can be gainers by the change. IV. 375. a.

Changes in point of belief, proved by authentic facts. IV. 737. a. Maintained to be impoſſible by the Roman Controverſiſts, with regard to the Euchariſt, by Meſſieurs de Port-Royal, and with regard to all the articles of Faith by Langevin. ibid. n. (150).

Changy; that land is in Burgundy. II. 435. b.

Chanvalon, Queen Margaret's gallant. V. 529. b. 530. a.

Chaos, who was the firſt of the Philoſophers that ſuppoſed an Intelligence to reduce it into form. I. 299. a. b. 300. a. b. The antient Philoſophers went back as far as the Chaos, and the firſt original of all things. 302. a. b. 303. a. Whether the ideas of the Antients, who have mentioned the Chaos are juſt, and whether they could pretend with any ſhew of reaſon, that this ſtate ſubſiſted no longer. 304, 305, 306. IV. 434. b. as far as 442. b. Different ſignifications of that word. V. 323. a. b. &c. What it was according to Plato. 634. b.

Chapelet du S. Sacrement: a piece compoſed by a ſiſter of Antony Arnauld, aſcribed to the Abbot de St Cyran, and condemned by the Sorbonne. V. 16. and b.

Chapter of Paris, its tyrannical treatment of the Paſtouraux puniſhed. II. 383. a. b. When thoſe kind of affranchiſings became very common. ibid. b.

Chapuzeau (Samuel) quoted. III. 93. a. Convicts Mr Jurieu of having reflected on the Dutch, very little leſs than Tavernier has done. V. 300. a.

Character. The true Character of turbulent zealots. I. 716. a. b.

Characters (Round) in Printing; who was the firſt that brought them into France. I. 600. a.

Charenton, its national ſynod of 1631, charges its Deputies not to deliver their ſpeech to the King on their knees, but ſtanding as the Clergy of the kingdom do. I. 261. a. After a long conteſt, an audience is obtained in the manner it was deſired. ibid. Fruitleſs attempts to ſet up a college there. II. 686. On what occaſion their was preaching in the church-yard of Charenton. 695. b. 696. a.

Charicles diſgraces himſelf by his conduct, with reſpect to Pythionice's tomb. III. 357. a.

Chariot (Triumphal) drawn by four white horſes, was looked upon by the Romans, as a thing peculiarly ſacred to the ſovereign of the gods. II. 290. a.

Chariots (ſailing) invented by Stevin; Grotius writes a Poem on that ſubject. V. 236. and b.

Charivari (or Mock-Muſic) which was given to a woman that was married again immediately after the death of her huſband, authorized by law. II. 104. a. Approved of by a great many Lawyers. ibid. n. (3). Diſapproved of by Faber and Chaſſaneus. ibid. n. (3).

Charlemagne, his life aſcribed to Plutarch by Wicelius. I. 57. How that Emperor diſcovered his daughter's intrigue with his Secretary, and in what manner he behaved after the diſcovery. II. 744. b. 745. a. Whether he created the Peers of France. III. 336. a. The book which John du Tillet publiſhed under his name, is as old as his time at leaſt. A diſpute on that head. V. 355. a. b. 356. a.

Charles, Duke of Sudermania, declared King of Sweden, by the States of the Kingdom. V. 652. Propoſes to the King of Denmark, that they ſhould terminate their quarrel by a duel. 653.

Charles V, whether he made uſe of the counſels of Agrippa. I. 152. a. Accuſes to the Princes and States of the Empire, Henry II, of having entered into a League with Soliman. 407. a. b. Agrees with the Pope to accuſe him in full council. ibid. a. An excellent ſaying of his. 587. a. He diſcovers to Philip II the true birth of Don John, and charges him to acknowledge him as his brother. 587. and a. b. What he ſaid of Langey's pen. 720. a. What occaſioned people to ſay that he died a Lutheran. II. 336. a. b. 440. a. b. He offers to fight Francis I, in ſingle combat. 437. a. Whether he was very chaſte. 442. a. b. Who aſſiſted at his laſt moments. 336. a. And with what ſentiments he died. ibid. Facts concerning his confeſſor. ibid. and b. The reaſon of his being preferred to his competitor for the empire. 435. b. 436. a. By what intrigues he prevented his being ſtopped at the Court of Francis I. 841. a. And reduced the Court of France to ſtrange extremities. ibid. b. 842. a. Of which he did not know how to make a proper uſe. 841. b. His impoſtures againſt Francis I, produce all the effect that he could expect from them. III. 90. b. 91. a. b. &c. He repents of having neglected the Latin tongue.

323. a. b. Does violence to nature two different ways in two marriages. 966. a. A Lord in the Low-Countries blew up the houſe where he had entertained that Emperor. IV. 40. b. A generous action of his. III. 950. b. He takes poſſeſſion of the Milaneſe. V. 129. a. Subdues Conſtance. II. 551. What it was that chiefly traverſed his deſign of an univerſal monarchy. V. 671. He was ſomewhat too late in pacifying the differences in point of religion. 672.

Charles VI, King of France, the miſery and diſorder of France under that Prince. II. 213. b. 214. a.

Charles VII, King of France, the bad reputation of the Queen his mother. II. 209. a. b. A ſentence paſſed againſt him. 210. a. b. 211. a. He makes a kind of Amende honorable. 212. a. b. 213. a. If he had had courage and genius enough, he never would have proſtituted his honour as he did. 213. b. What Mezerai ſays of him. III. 798. b.

Charles VIII, King of France; Haillan gives out that he was ſuppoſititious. III. 337. a. His education. 799. a. He was extremely infirm both in body and mind; and the reaſon of his being ſo. 813. a. b. Before his time the Pox was unknown in France. IV. 574. a. A Surgeon kneels before his ſtatue, and for what reaſon. ibid. Savonarola had propheſied that he ſhould return into Italy. V. 59, 60. That Monk's affection to him, and the reaſon of it. 72. His death. 58. b. 60. a. It contributed nothing towards Savonarola's downfal. 58. b. His expedition looked upon as one of the greateſt miſfortunes that ever befel Italy. 60. a. Savonarola exhorts him by letters to return into Italy. 70. b.

Charles IX, King of France, what he ſaid to the Admiral de Coligni. I. 14. a. b. He harangues his Parliament with a courageous and threatening boldneſs. 256. a. III. 512. b. Does not eſteem Amyot's Poetry. I. 259. a. And reproaches him with his avarice. 256. a. To whom he owed his ill qualities. II. 509. a. His policy with reſpect to Poets. 617. b. And witty authors. IV. 894. b. Threatens the King of Navarre and the Prince of Condé. III. 418. a. b. Did himſelf, from his chamber-window, fire upon the Huguenots that were flying from the maſſacre. IV. 471. a. It was unjuſtly laid to his charge that he did not love women. V. 392. a. b. 393. a. b.

Charles X, pretended King of France: what the League did for him againſt Henry IV. IV. 730. a.

Charles I, King of England; his death being imputed to the Preſbyterian party, occaſions the drawing of a thouſand odious conſequences againſt the Proteſtants of France. I. 265. a. His execution condemned by ſeveral Proteſtant writers. III. 426. a. He is ſuppoſed to have died a member of the Romiſh Church, in a book that was dedicated to his ſon. IV. 215. b. Was not the author of a book which was aſcribed to him. 221. a. b. &c. His Prayer in the Time of Captivity. 222. b. 223. a.

Charles II, King of England, papers that were found in his ſtrong-box concerning the controverſy between the Proteſtants and the Church of Rome. II. 700. b. A book which was dedicated to him by Milletiere. IV. 215. a.

Charles II, King of Spain, to what his recovery was aſcribed. IV. 355. a.

Charles, Duke of Calabria, enjoins a Neapolitan gentleman to maintain an old horſe which he had abandoned, after having received conſiderable ſervices from him. IV. 918. b.

Charlevois, what ſnares were laid to ruin him. III. 265. a b.

Charpentier commits a blunder in an harangue which he had prepared. III. 649. a.

Charron, placed by Garaſſe in the catalogue of Atheiſts. II. 450. a. b. Had a mind to be a Carthuſian. 448. a. Contracted a very ſtrict friendſhip with Montagne. ibid. and b. Quoted. 453. a. b. 454. a. What Sorel obſerves concerning this author. ibid. b. 455. a. It has been ſaid that he was more dangerous than Montagne. 454. b. His doctrine touching the incomprehenſibility of the Divine Nature. V. 145. a. b. 146. a. He approves the doctrine of John Huarte concerning wits. III. 528. b. n. (4). How the faculties of Divinity in France dealt with his treatiſe Of Wiſdom. V. 810.

Chartier (Alain), ſeveral pieces not compoſed by him were mixed with his works. IV. 163. a.

Chaſſaneus, what ſtory he relates concerning the Virgin Mary. IV. 805. a.

Chaſtel (John), the apology for him. II. 101. a. 103. a. n. (15). His attempt on the life of Henry IV, and its conſequences. 456. a. b. & ſeq. Who was the author of his apology. 459. b. A conjecture upon what moved the Parliament of Paris to involve the Jeſuits in his cauſe. III. 280. and a. b.

Chaſtelet (du) quoted. III. 818. b. IV. 142. b. 143. b. &c.

Chaſtity did not continue long upon earth. I. 380. a. A ſurprizing example of that virtue. II. 108. b. 109. a. V. 603. b. 604. a. Chaſtity not only immanent, but tranſitive or penetrative. II. 108. b. 109. a. Why private perſons ſtumble more in that reſpect, than with regard to all the other virtues. 382. a. The moſt ardent love of it does not neceſſarily exclude the mechanical diſpoſitions to incontinency. 556. b. 557. a. III. 99. b. In order to preſerve it, one ought to wiſh for a quality like that of the Hirpes. 72. b. It is not incompatible with bravery. 414. b. Attended with an incredible circumſtance. 186. a. b. 187. a. Some nations have quite loſt the ideas of honour with regard to this virtue. 580. b. 581. a. b. 604. a. b. and 773. a. b. See Continency. It is reported that the emerald is a great friend to chaſtity: a curious example on that head. IV. 864. b.

Chaſtity of Converſation: a new proof againſt what Mr Chevreau advances concerning it. V. 540. a. b.

Châtel (John du), a ſoothſayer and fortune-teller, his depoſition againſt Concini and his wife. III. 126. b.

Chatillard, a French gentleman beheaded in Scotland, for making an attempt upon the honour of the Queen. IV. 896. b.

Châtillon (Marſhal), the firſt ſeed of diviſion betwixt him and Marſhal Brezé. III. 821. a.

Châtillon (Admiral) plainly pointed at in a ſeditious harangue that was pronounced in the name of the Clergy. IV. 815. b.

Chavagnac, obſervations upon his memoirs. V. 191. b. 192. a. b.

Chaumont, his negligence when he read the books that he went about to confute. II. 580. a.

Cheeſe, who invented the ſecret of making it. I. 455. a.

Chelonis frees herſelf from a nice and difficult juncture. II. 467.

Chemnitius treated as a formidable adverſary by Don Nicolas Antonio. I. 323. a. b.

Chenailles, an agreeable houſe upon the Loire. II. 647. a.

Chereſtrata, mother to Epicurus, why that woman could not fail to form a ſage. II. 775. a.

Cheriſs are held in ſuch veneration among the Turks, that they alone wear the green turbant. IV. 40. b.

Cherſeoglis turns Mahometan out of ſpite. III. 730. b.

Cheſne (Andrew du), it is probable that the world is indebted to him for the edition of Abelard's works. I. 249. b.

Cheſs, a book treating of that game is ſpoken of as ready to come out. II. 53. a. b. 54. a. b. A famous player at it. III. 162.

Chevillier, his treatiſe on the origin of Printing at Paris: a curious paſſage of that book. I. 780. a. Quoted with reſpect to Aretin's ſonnets. 440. a.

Chevreau (Urban) confounds himſelf while he relies on the teſtimony of Herodotus. I. 72. a. b. Is put right with reſpect to the martyrdom of St Babylas. 594. b. 595. a. A very probable conjecture touching a miſtake in his hiſtory. II. 352. b. What he ſays of old men who marry. IV. 88. b. And of a cauſe about adultery. V. 112. a. b. 113. a. His judgment concerning the quarrel between Girac and Coſtar. 345. and b. His notions with regard to politeneſs of ſtile, and a confutation of them. 843. and a. b. 856.

Chevreuſe (the Duke of), as proxy to the King of Great-Britain, marries the Princeſs Henriette-Mary of France. III. 300. a.

Chevreuſe (the Ducheſs of), the miſchief ſhe occaſions. III. 303. a. b. 304. a. b. 305. a.

Chiabrera (Gabriel) looked upon as the inventer of the Anacreontic ſongs. IV. 879.

Chicocius, an author unknown to Guy Patin. V. 74. a. b.

Chievres, governour to Charles V, whether it be true that he diſcouraged his pupil from ſtudying Latin. III. 323. a. b.

Child (Suppoſititious): Ageſilaus pretends that Leotychides is a ſuppoſititious child. I. 128. a.

Child-births; French women are not ſo ſcrupulous in that ſituation as the women of other countries. III. 453. b. Fictions of the Antients touching the goddeſs that preſided over them. 633. a. b. 641. a. b. What term the Antients allowed for them. I. 128. a. n. (5). A woman, who, under the pains of child-birth, diſcovers an extraordinary courage and reſolution. IV. 324. and b. A ſpiritual child-birth, which gave the ſame pains as a child-birth in a proper ſenſe. II. 110. b.

Childeric, the ſtory that is told of him and Baſina. I. 668. a. b. 669. a. b. 670. a. b.

Childhood: an ambition that diſcovers itſelf in one's childhood deſerves to be feared. II. 711. a.

Children, it is their inevitable fate to follow the religion of thoſe who educate them. I. 44. b. The cuſtom of frightening them is very antient. 63. and b. Songs with which they are lulled to ſleep. 69. b. Formerly people were perſuaded that the ſuckling of children made part of their education. II. 382. a. b. A proof thereof taken from a very ſingular fact. ibid. Their education. 495. a. b. They are made to believe any thing. III. 645. b. Whether it be better to educate them at home, or to ſend them to the univerſities. 662. a. Their character. 815. b. n. (7). Some infirm children grow ſtrong and healthy. IV. 117. a. b. A child of a prodigious capacity for learning. II. 707. a. b. A child who grows three cubits in three years, and decreaſes with the like proportion. V. 283. b. It is ſuppoſed that Tapperus had never heard how children come into the world. 294. a. A maxim for their education. 573. b. A Phyſician treats of the formalities requiſite in order to beget children of good capacities. III. 529. a. b. Their diſpoſitions ought to be conſulted in the choice of employments. ibid. b. Sacrificed to the Dii Penates, and to Mania, the mother of the Lares. II. 163. b. The cruelty of that ſacrifice aboliſhed by Lucius Junius Brutus. ibid.

Chiliaſts ſuffer a great mortification by the peace of Piſa. IV. 122. b.

χιλὸς, the ſignification of that word. I. 77. b.

Chymiſts, an order made againſt them by the Parliament of Paris. I. 469. b.

China, the greateſt part of Literati there are Atheiſts, being idolaters only through diſſimulation and hypocriſy. IV. 81. b. Whether it be prudent to grant an edict of toleration to the miſſionaries in that country. 223. b. 224. a. The Hiſtory of that Empire, which was wrote by John Gonzalio de Mendozza, tranſlated into French by Luke de la Porte. 198. and a. b. 199. and a. b.

Chineſe, a ſect that is in vogue among them. II. 118. a. V. 180. b. 181. a. How many figures they make uſe of in writing. III. 171. b. Moſt of them are much addicted to the opinion of the tranſmigration of ſouls. 341. b. What doctrine the ſect of their Literati have embraced. II. 412. b. V. 180. b. 181. a. 217. a. b. 218. a. The Theology of one of their ſects. 202. a. b. 203. a. An hypotheſis that is greatly in vogue among them. 217. a.

Chios, Cicero's anſwer to the inhabitants of that iſland. V. 350. b.

Chirocmeta; remarks concerning that book. II. 640. a. b.

Chiron and Phœnix cannot both have been Preceptors to Achilles. I. 78. a. b. 79. a. b. The birth of Chiron. IV. 617. and b.

Chytræus (David) publiſhes the apology for the Confeſſion of Augſburg wrote by George Braun. II. 122. b. His Hiſtory of the Confeſſion of Augſburg. ibid. Tranſlated into French. ibid.

Chœnix; what it is not to ſit upon a Chœnix. IV. 670. a.

Choler very fit to ſupport certain maxims. V. 194. b.

Chryſippus did not approve of frightning us from our ſins by Divine juſtice, and for what reaſon. I. 63. Refuted by Carneades. II. 328. a. b. Deſires to write much out of envy to Epicurus. 485. b. Collects ſo many arguments for the Hypotheſis of uncertainty, that he could not refute them afterwards. 486. a. b. 487. a. b. 488. a. b. 489. a. b. 490. a. b. 491. a. b. Lays down a wrong maxim, and contradicts himſelf. 486. b. 487. a. b. Is accuſed by Plutarch of making God the author of ſin. 489. a. b. &c. IV. 519. b. There never was a greater diſturber of all things in the empire of Philoſophy. 495. a. According to Plutarch, he compares God to King Dejotarus. 627. a. b. He takes a vain precaution to eſtabliſh what was called Fatum. 790. b. 791. a. Amuſes himſelf too much with explaining the traditions of the Poets. III. 648. b. 652. b. 653. a.

Chryſopolis, whence that city took its name. II. 482. a.

Chryſoſtome (St) magnifies without reaſon the courage and prudence of Abraham. I. 38. a. And the obedience of Sarah. ibid. Pays the Gentiles in their own coin, with reſpect to their renouncing the world. 294. b. He is miſtaken about the cauſe of St Babylas his death. 592. a. b. It appears that he had but little conſulted Hiſtory on that ſubject. ibid. b. He errs very innocently in affirming ſeveral falſities. 593. a. The general grounds of ſome of his miſtakes. ibid. b. His letter to Cæſarius the Monk, expreſs againſt Tranſubſtantiation. 672. a. II. 5. b. He does not reaſon better than Bion (or Bias) upon the ſubject of marriage. 14. a. Ill-uſed by Eraſmus. 813. b. 814. a. Why he did not appear before the Synod of Theophilus. IV. 347. b. His exaggerations on Sarah's decay. V. 53. b. His letter to Cæſarius with the diſſertations of James Baſnage. I. 672. a.

Chriſt, whether he ought to manifeſt himſelf at the end of about ſix thouſand years. I. 173. b.

Chriſtian, Elector of Saxony, far from being ſo rigid a Lutheran as his father. III. 972.

Chriſtian II, King of Denmark, lays ſiege to Stockholm, and obliges the Swedes to acknowledge him as their King. V. 651. Depoſed for his cruelties, and confined in a caſtle, during the reſt of his life. ibid.

Chriſtian IV, King of Denmark, having a deſign to divorce his wife, the Judges give it againſt him. V. 80. His amours, his marriage to, and divorce from, Chriſtina of the antient houſe of Monch. 500. b.

Chriſtianity, treated like an old palace which wants props on every ſide. I. 94. b. What Averrhoës ſaid of it, when he reflected on the practice of the Romiſh communion. 556. b. The ſcandal of the diviſions which prevail among thoſe who profeſs it. II. 455. b. 456. a. It is not always the ſame. III. 551. a. Fired with the ſpirit of perſecution. ibid. Its ſpeedy propagation alone ſufficient to prove its Divine original. 889. b. Has been eſtabliſhed by other methods than it was in the three firſt ages of the Church. IV. 32. a. b. The truth of it not ſufficiently proved from its large extent. ibid. b. and 33. a. Nor from its proſperity. ibid. and b. An inconvenience which happened in its infancy. 41. a. b. A great many abuſes like thoſe of the Heathens have crept into it. 584. b. Why impudent ſects have been oftener ſeen in it than under Paganiſm. V. 415. a. Its Divine inſtitution and character. 830, 831, 832.

Chriſtianopel, a city belonging to the Danes, taken and ſacked by the Swedes. V. 653.

Chriſtians, a bloody victory gained over them by the Saracens. I. 15. a. When they diſputed moſt ſtrongly againſt the Jews. 173. b. What they ought to do when they are perſecuted. 264. b. 265. a. Have no right to inſult the Heathen Philoſophers, touching promiſed fidelity. 380. a. Have left off patience and ſubmiſſion a great while. ibid. Their motto. V. 154. a. In what country they do not underſtand one word of the religion they obſerve. II. 677. b. Who is the author of an impudent invective made againſt them, which is related in the dialogue of Minutius Fœlix. III. 109. a. b. Many of them, in the time of St Gregory, wavered in their belief of the immortality of the ſoul, and the reſurrection of the body. 267. a. Nothing is more ſcarce than a Chriſtian worthy of that name. 172. b. Whether one may be a Chriſtian without embracing any particular communion. 246. a. b. It is much harder for them to make a right uſe of riches, than to go without them. III. 738. a. Quadratus and Ariſtides, preſent apologies on their behalf. 320. Thoſe of the IVth century, made frequent mention of the antiquity of their families. 379. b. The prepoſſeſſion of their communions one againſt another. 579. a. It is ſtrange that they, whoſe ſyſtem is ſo pure, ſhould be ſo corrupt in their manners. 649. a. There were Chriſtians found among the Senators themſelves who endeavoured to maintain the celebration of the Lupercalia. 933. They cannot juſtly reproach the Infidels, as to morals. IV. 33. b. 34. a. Have been infinitely more cruel than the followers of Mahomet. 32. a. b. Were accuſed of being the cauſe of all the public calamities. V. 454. a. b. And in their turn accuſed their enemies of the ſame thing. ibid. Rallied and laughed at by Celſus for their, examine not, only believe. 816. Defended by Origen. ibid. and 817. Captives to faith, and not judges of doctrines. 822. Every good Chriſtian ought to be ſatisfied with his faith being founded on the word of God. 829. Their diſputes ſhould only be carried to the tribunal of Revelation. 830.

Chriſtina de Piſe, what ſhe relates concerning Novella. I. 325. a.

Chriſtina, Queen of Sweden, writes to the general of the Jeſuits, deſiring that two of their ſociety might be diſpatched to her. IV. 3. and a. b. How ſhe was taken out of a lake, into which ſhe fell. 526. a. n. (122). Never a day paſſed but ſhe read ſome pages of Tacitus. V. 281. a.

Chriſtmas Songs. The Catholics reproached with the prophane tunes of their Chriſtmas Songs. IV. 160. a.

Chronicle (Martinian) ſo called from Martinus Polonus the author of it: tranſlated into French with the additions of Verneron and Caſtel. IV. 713.

Chronicle-Writers, many of them copy the ſame falſe ſtories. I. 30. a.

Chronologers, ſome of them relate their own Hiſtory very confuſedly. I. 389. a.

Chronology; whether the Chronology of the Scripture could have been diſentangled without the help of prophane authors. I. 775. b. There is little Chronology in moſt of the Greek and Latin Hiſtorians. II. 309. b. Several authors have neglected it, where there was no occaſion to give a preciſe account of the time in which people lived. 352. b.

Chronological Accounts: It would be of great ſervice to the compilers of Hiſtory, if Chronological Accounts were publiſhed like that of Father de Londel. IV. 211. b. Chronological Accounts that claſh with appearances, are never to be admitted, but in the utmoſt neceſſity. II. 162. b.

Chronologies are very liable to the gloſſes and additions of thoſe into whoſe hands they fall. IV. 728. a.

Church, it was ſaid to have begun in Abel. I. 23. b. Whether, if it had not been for Ariſtotle, the Church would have wanted ſome of its articles of Faith. 469. a. b. Whether it be true that the Church never employed the ſecular arm againſt the ſects. 476. b. 477. a. b. The infallibility of it cannot be maintained as to facts. 494. a. Cannot ſubſiſt without her liturgy and diſcipline. II. 112. b. When it is proper to tolerate abuſes therein. 374. a. Thoſe who are poſſeſſed of great dignities in the Church, may eaſily give a free ſcope to their paſſions. III. 223. a. A Fanatic taught that there was no pure Church upon earth. 673. a. What rendered the reformation of the Church difficult, and even impoſſible. 686. b. 687. a. What uſe ought to be made of its revenues. IV. 271. b. What it has moſt to fear. 474. a. b.

Church of England accuſed of tarrying ſtill in the ſuburbs of Babylon. III. 343. a. Looked upon as an heaven in compariſon of Amſterdam. ibid.

Church Militant, thoſe who talk ſo much of it, are more in the right than they think. II. 149. b. 150. a. b.

Church (New ſyſtem of) whence that book of Mr Jurieu, which has ſo many imperfections, came to be looked upon as his maſter-piece. IV. 363. b. 364. a.

Church of Rome, whether it may be accuſed of having condemned the doctrine of St Auguſtin. I. 609. b. 610. a. Receives with open arms any one that offers himſelf to it. II. 246. b. There are ſeveral abuſes in that Church, which in all probability will laſt as long as it. III. 87. b. Junius believed that ſalvation might be obtained in the Church of Rome. 628. a. b. It ſeems to have adopted the religion of the god Terminus. 744. a. Has the advantage over the Laity in point of revenge. 567. b. 568. a. b. With what vigilance it minds the buſineſs of converſions. IV. 373. a. Whether there were warrantable reaſons for quitting the communion of that Church. 375. a. b. n. (35). It has not been weakened in the laſt ten years of the XVIIth century. II. 125. b. See Popery.

Church (Gallican) its origin rendered obſcure by the falſe zeal of the Monks. II. 94. a. b.

Churches: the privilege of ſome Churches in London. IV. 637. a. b.

Churches of the Vaudois: Peter Gilles, by order of his ſuperiors, compoſes the Hiſtory of them. III. 161, 162. They ſend Yſe into England. 597.

Churchmen, great flatterers of Princes. I. 233. b. There are few Churchmen of great abilities, who do not endeavour to make a noiſe in the world. 717. b. See Eccleſiaſtics.

Ciaconius writes a treatiſe upon the deliverance of the ſoul of Trajan from Hell, by the prayers of St Gregory. V. 397. b.

Cicero blames thoſe who deſpiſe their own tongue, and the authors of their own nation. I. 60. a. b. Ridicules the worſhip of Adonis. 114. a. St Auguſtin approves his raillery. ibid. and b. A paſſage of that Orator corrected with regard to Albutius. 185. a. b. Another explained. 186. a. His treatiſe De Gloria. 202. and b. &c. How he juſtifies himſelf as to the contradictions he was reproached with. 352. b. 353. a. Believed to be author of the letters to Cerellia. 395. a. b. What he ſays of his friend Atticus's letters. 427. b. Ridicules the interpreters of dreams. 448. a. Was afraid of Atticus's nails. 452. b. His letters to Atticus comprehend the Hiſtory of thoſe times, and in ſome ſort a prophecy of what was to follow. 541. b. A thought of his concerning the dogs of the Capitol. 773. b. II. 372. a. His eloquence was not reliſhed by all the world. 166. b. He is made Governor of Cilicia. 303. b. Demands quarter from Arceſilas, and Carneades. 330. b. There are certain facts with regard to which his authority is not deciſive. 343. a. b. It was, according to him, a great blemiſh on the family of Junia, to have produced an Orator, who exerciſed the trade of an Accuſer. 356. b. 357. a. He laughs at the notion of hell. 418. b. 419. a. If he did not believe what he ſaid of Cæſar, he ought to have believed it. 423. b. 424. a. He is reproached as guilty of an unpardonable fault, for ſpeaking Greek in a Greek Senate. 516. b. Took many things out of Crantor's book of Conſolation, when he compoſed a book upon the ſame ſubject. 562. a. Contradicts himſelf. 626. a. b. 627. a. He diſplays his eloquence on occaſion of the Pontificate of Peſſinus being ſold. 628. b. 629. a. The judgment that he paſſes on a tenet of Democritus. 642. b. 643. a. His deference to the authority of Dicæarchus. 657. a. b. Either he did not underſtand the doctrine of that Philoſopher, or elſe the latter contradicts himſelf. 660. a. His Rhetorical Legerdemain. 678. a. b. 679. a. He gives a very ill character of Cæſar as to the choice of his friends. 680. a. His wife by order of the Veſtal Virgins, ſignifies to him that he ſhould put his deſigns in execution for the good of his country. 746. b. The judgment he paſſes on an hypotheſis of Epicurus. 792. a. What he ſays of a ſolution which Carneades invented for the Epicureans. ibid. b. To perfect himſelf in the action of an Orator, he put himſelf under the diſcipline of two famous Actors. 835. He was killed while he was reading the Medea of Euripides. 871. b. Whether he was confuted in a demonſtrative manner by his friend Atticus, on the ſubject of Fannius the Hiſtorian. III. 8. a. b. His taſte is different from Plutarch's, with reſpect to a witticiſm, which concerns the birth of Alexander. 59. a. b. A baſe and brutal vengeance exerciſed upon him. 113. a. His inclination for peace. 515. b. He upbraids the Philoſophers with having introduced gods that were deſtitute of life and knowledge. 653. a. b. His maxim, that a doctrine which grows old muſt be true. 744. a. His oration for Ligarius. 831. and a. b. He contradicts himſelf with reſpect to Lucilius. 907. a. The injury which his freed-man did by publiſhing after his death, a collection of his jeſts. 939. a.

Two paſſages of his, which St Auguſtin has preſerved to us. IV. 441. b. His works that are loſt were ſome of the fineſt that he wrote. 509. a. b. He could not anſwer the difficulties which Cotta ſtarted upon the queſtion, Whether the faculty of Reaſon in man be a gift of the gods. 516. b. 517. a. He makes Cotta wiſh that his objections againſt the exiſtence of the gods might be confuted. 516. b. n. (34). According to him providence labours to procure pleaſures to mankind. 573. a. His taſte, with reſpect to the hiſtory of a tyrant, who was a very crafty man. 619. a. b. Whether he taught that beaſts were no more than Automata. 552. a. b. Reflexion upon what he ſays concerning the Divinity of Romulus. V. 77. b. 78. a. He is accuſed of improprieties and barbariſms by Scioppius. 94. b. His raillery touching one of the daughters of Servilia. 123. a. His religion was more in his heart than in his head. 208. a. b. Admired the verſes of Pacuvius concerning Telamon's being angry with Teucer. 317. a. b. 318. a. What Pliny relates as a witty repartee of his. 350. b. Whom he employed to put his library in order. 379. and b. 380. a. b. He divorced his wife Terentia ſeveral years before his death. 380. a. b. He treats Dolabella tenderly. 408. a. b. 409. a. Offers to go with him to Syria as his Lieutenant. 408. b. He inveighs ſtrongly againſt him after the death of Trebonius. 409. a. Is inconſolable after his daughter's death. ibid. b. 410. a. b. Is accuſed of having had an inceſtuous paſſion for her. ibid. b. Wants to build a temple to her. 411. a. b. Was ignorant of the reaſon why God placed us in the world. 412. a. b. In his affliction he would have reliſhed Arnobius better than Lactantius. 413. b. The idolaters required that ſome of his books ſhould be prohibited by the Senate. 506. b. His obſervation concerning the antient Greek Comedies. 746, 747. Sentences extracted from his familiar epiſtles by Daniel d'Auge. I. 562. a. An analyſis of his orations publiſhed by Martin du Cygne. II. 499.

Ciceronians, why ſo called. II. 804. b. The whimſical ſuperſtition of that ſect. IV. 69. b.

Cid, how that piece was received by the public. IV. 620. a.

Cydias (Painter), how much his Argonauts coſt. III. 492. a.

Cyllene; the height of that mountain. II. 659. b.

Cymbalum Mundi, who was ſo called. I. 373. b. One does not underſtand the meaning of that expreſſion, when it is oppoſed to Tympanum famæ publicæ. ibid.

Cymbalum Mundi, extracts from that book. IV. 583. b. 584. a.

Cimon had put in practice the ſtratagem which Ageſipolis made uſe of. I. 133. a.

Cynegirus, we are to believe nothing but what Herodotus tells us concerning the action which he did. II. 827. b.

Cynics (a ſect of Philoſophers), who was their founder. II. 665. They preached up ſome very good moral precepts. 671. a. b. Why called Cynics. III. 458. b. 459. a. The ſophiſm by which they defend their infamous practices. ibid.

Cinyras, ſome will have him to be Noah. II. 506. b. Reigned in Cyprus when the Grecians made war againſt Troy. IV. 641. Had Adonis by his own daughter. 642.

Cyniſca was the firſt woman that obtained the prize in the chariot-races of the Olympic games. I. 131. b.

Cyniſm, according to the Stoics, was the ſhorteſt way to attain to virtue. II. 671. b.

Cinq Mars, the ſource of his averſion for Cardinal Richelieu. I. 826. a. b. Is condemned to death. IV. 142. a.

Ciofanius: his hypotheſis touching Ovid's death. IV. 447. a.

Cypreſſes, called the Virgins, and for what reaſon. I. 210. b. Why they were formerly put in the houſes of the dead. III. 73. a. n. (21).

Cyprus; that iſland was formerly called Acamas. I. 53. a.

Cypſelus; the firſt inſtitution of tyranny is aſcribed to him. IV. 563. a.

Cyran (Abbot of St), what he thought of the Council of Trent. I. 36. b. The eſteem which he expreſſes for the ſociety of the Jeſuits. III. 133. a. His criticiſm on Garaſſe is an excellent piece. ibid.

Circe, the virtue of her wand. I. 5. a.

Circle, perſons who pretended to have found out the quadrature of it. III. 862. b. 863. a. According to Mathematicians, it can only exiſt ideally. V. 612. b.

Circumſtances, of what conſequence it is to be placed in ſuch and ſuch circumſtances. II. 518. b.

Cyrenaïcs, a ſect of Philoſophers. III. 424. b. Wherein they differed from the Cynics. ibid. 425. a.

Cyril (St), his conduct cenſured by the Emperor. IV. 347. b. His irregularities, with reſpect to Neſtorius. ibid. 348. a. He does not deſerve to be uſed tenderly. 885. b.

Cyril Lucar, his confeſſion was conformable to the opinions of Geneva. I. 509.

Cyrus, how he liked Aſpaſia. II. 512. b. 513. a. b. Why he judged himſelf more worthy of the ſceptre than his elder brother. 598. a.

Citeaux, Abbey, by whom founded. II. 383. b. n. (12).

Cythera: an iſland of the Archipelago, now called Cerigo. IV. 124. n. (a).

Cytheris, how Mark Antony, whoſe concubine ſhe was, behaved to her. III. 118. a. b. 119. a. b. He did not however marry her. 119. a. b. See Lycoris in the Dictionary.

City; one that was reputed holy among the Pagans. I. 420. a. b. Cities that oppoſe burthenſome edicts only make their condition worſe. IV. 353. a.

Clarence (Duke of), in what manner he was put to death. II. 739. a. b.

Claros, who built a temple there to Apollo. IV. 97. a. b.

Claude, Miniſter at Charenton, has reproached the Janſeniſts with inconſiſtencies. I. 18. b. His diſpute with Mr Arnauld. 493. a. b. II. 518. b. He accuſes St Auguſtin of having been a turncoat in his opinion, concerning the penal laws againſt Heretics. I. 566. b. His opinion on that ſubject might have expoſed him to cenſure. ibid. His Plaintes des Proteſtans quoted. IV. 815. a. b. The advice he gave to a man who had been a prodigious reader. III. 70. a. Reflexion upon what he ſays touching the Devil's conference with Luther. V. 73. a. b.

Claudia, Queen of France, how ſhe came by a vile diſtemper which haſtened her death. III. 89. b.

Claudian, Mariangelus Accurſius ſaid that he had corrected near ſeven hundred faults in that Poet. I. 69. a. Reflexions upon his doubts about providence. IV. 932. b. 933. a. b. &c.

Claudin, a famous Muſician. III. 197. a. b.

Claudius, ſaluted Emperor in the camp of the Pretorian cohorts. II. 359. The Senate was forced to approve this election, whether they would or not. ibid. How his mother treated him. I. 358. b. He knew nothing of the infamy of his wife Meſſalina, when all the world knew that ſhe proſtituted herſelf in the ſtews. III. 382. a. All the ladies of beauty and diſtinction rival one another in their pretenſions to marry him. 860. b. 861. a.

Claves (de), an excellent Chymiſt of the XVIIth century. II. 468. a. Had the ſecret of making the forms of plants revive from their aſhes. ibid.

Cleanlineſs. In what true cleanlineſs conſiſts. I. 187. b.

Cleanthes ſaid that Arceſilas deſtroyed the duties by his words, but eſtabliſhed them by his actions. I. 413. a. What he has related touching Boreas, the mountain Niphates, &c. II. 82. b.

Clearchus, what he relates touching the conferences which Ariſtotle had with a Jew. I. 465. b. Whether he deſerves to be credited. ibid. 466. a.

Clemency is pernicious on certain occaſions. II. 528. a. b.

Clemens Alexandrinus, what his opinion was concerning Diagoras, and ſome others who paſſed for Atheiſts. II. 656. a. b.

Clement VII (Pope), the anſwer which he made to Pompey Colonna. II. 529. a. b. And when he was ſollicited to grant a diſpenſation to ſome ladies. V. 161. b. 162. a. When he was created Pope. III. 592. b.

Clement VIII (Pope), in order to incline Scipio Gentilis to accept of a Profeſſor's place at Bologna, promiſes him liberty of conſcience. III. 155. a. His ſentiments touching the Scientia Media. V. 824.

Clement (James) ſtabs Henry III, prompted thereto by a viſion which was approved by a Monk. III. 601.

601. a. b. It is probable that the Preachers of the League had been acquainted with the deſign of that parricide. II. 101. b. Some have been ſo bold as to maintain that he did not kill Henry III. 411. b. 412. a. b. 413. a. The Jeſuits commend him. IV. 129. a. His action is looked upon as a gift of the Holy Ghoſt by John Guignard. III. 276. a. He is inſtructed by Bourgoign, and compared to Judith by Guignard. ibid.

Clenard ſent to Braga to ſet up a ſchool there. III. 734. a.

Cleopatra, wherein the force of her charms conſiſted. II. 631. a. b. 632. a. She had a criminal converſation with Dellius. ibid. b. Did not well entertain thoſe who made her taſte the ſweets of love. ibid. a.

Cleopatra, ſiſter to Alexander, had great intereſt with him, and likewiſe with their mother Olympias. II. 675. a.

Cleoſtratus, his cycle corrected. III. 254. a.

Clerc (le), his letter to Mr Jurieu concerning Epiſcopius. II. 795. b. 796. a. Reflexions upon that letter, and the conſequences of it. ibid. and b.

Clergy, their debaucheries are agreeable to the court. I. 30. b. It is more dangerous to offend them than to offend religion. 468. a. They are a true Imperium in Imperio. II. 149. b. The ſame ſpirit, which, under Chriſtianity, has enriched the Clergy, prevailed alſo under the Pagan religion. 531. a. Their leudneſs in keeping concubines. 545. b. n. (20). And their bad lives. III. 328. b. 329. a. b. See Concubinage and Celibacy.

Clergy of Africa ſollicits the ſecular arm againſt the followers of Pelagius. I. 229. a. b. 230. a.

Clergy of France have made great uſe of St Auguſtin's reaſons to juſtify perſecution. I. 567. a. See Eccleſiaſtics. They make an ill-grounded complaint againſt the Proteſtants. IV. 479. a. b. What they propoſe to the court for the extirpation of Heretics. 815. a. They accuſe the Proteſtants of having blotted out of their Pſalms a prayer for the King. 164. a. Mr Daillé's anſwer to this charge. ibid. b.

Clergyman. A Clergyman who owns that continence is beyond his power, gives people great reaſon to ſuſpect his conduct in the time that preceded his marriage. III. 344. b. See Eccleſiaſtics.

Clermont in Auvergne; the hiſtory of two married perſons whom the inhabitants of that city call the two lovers. III. 381. a. b. A ſynagogue of the Jews pulled down there. 220. a.

Clervant diſpatched by the King of Navarre to demand the removal of the garriſons from his fortified places. IV. 341. b.

Clevis (Lewis de), Bachelor in Divinity, whoſe theſis concerning Epiſcopacy meets with difficulties, and for which Flavigny made an apology. III. 53. and a. b.

Clitarchus is not a faithful writer. IV. 9. a.

Clitomachus, what he ſaid of Carneades. II. 327. a. b. 334. b. His book of Conſolation. 331. b.

Cloaths: a man tears his cloaths, and for what reaſon. II. 159. and b. 160. a.

Clodia, Catullus's miſtreſs. II. 394. Proſtituted herſelf to the firſt Comer. ibid. Accuſes Cœlius of ſeveral crimes. IV. 202. a. Gets the ſirname of Quadrantaria. ibid. b. Was the ſame whom Catullus called Leſbia. ibid. a.

Clodius ſells the Pontificate of Peſſinus. II. 628. b. Which gave Cicero an occaſion to diſplay his eloquence. ibid.

Cloyſters, what Eraſmus thought of them. I. 272. a. b. They have occaſioned a proverb. V. 23. b.

Cloſe-ſtool: rare precepts relating to the cloſe-ſtool. I. 174. a. b.

Clovis, whether Aimonius was the firſt who loaded the birth of that Prince with ignominy. I. 669. a. There is ſcarce any truth in what is told of the Kings of France before him. V. 494. b. n. (13).

Clovis, an Epic Poem, by whoſe aſſiſtance it was finiſhed and poliſhed. IV. 114. and a. b.

Coach: learning ſeldom enables a man to roll about in his coach. II. 708. a.

Cobourg, a city in Franconia, Prince John Caſimir, Duke of Saxony erects a famous ſchool there. III. 660.

Cocceius, his doctrine was the leaſt in favour with the great and powerful in Holland, but was moſt to the reliſh of young people, and of ſuch as ſet up for men of wit. V. 564.

Cochleus, what kind of a machine he employed, tho' to no purpoſe, againſt the Lutherans. III. 143. b. 144. a. His accuſations againſt Luther. 942. a. A book which he intitles Luther with ſeven Heads, and in which he relates all his impurities. 136. a. b.

Cock; the Jews offer a cock for their ſins in the feaſt of Reconciliation. III. 125. b. The ceremonies which attend that oblation. ibid.

Cock-fighting; the Antients were exceedingly fond of that diverſion, and wagered all they were worth that ſuch or ſuch a cock would be victorious in the battle. IV. 819. b. Quinqueran cenſured for being too much addicted to ſuch paſtime. ibid.

Coconas, his crime and puniſhment. IV. 935. a. b. 936. a. His confeſſion upon the rack. 939. b. 940. a. By whom his head was buried. V. 526. a. b.

Codes, compilation of divers Codes. II. 380. b. 381. a.

Codinus, who firſt publiſhed his book de Officialibus Palatii Conſtantinopolitani & Officiis magnæ Eccleſiæ. III. 627. a.

Coëffeteau complains of Du Pleſſis Mornai upon the ſubject of Gregory VII. III. 230. a. Very much perplexed in one part of his anſwer to Du Pleſſis. 565. b. Makes but a poor anſwer to Du Pleſſis with reſpect to the praiſes which Langius beſtows on Luther. 723. a. b. Takes a town for a man. IV. 763. b. Is cenſured by Rivet with reſpect to Turpin, and Pope Calixtus. V. 417. b. Does not make a ſolid anſwer to Du Pleſſis, touching John de Weſalia. 542. a. b.

Cœlius defended by Cicero againſt the accuſations of Clodia. IV. 202. a.

Coffin, whether it is poſſible to ſuſpend an iron coffin between two loadſtones. IV. 43. a.

Coglione, Minion to Joan II, Queen of Naples. IV. 309. b.

Coiffé; whence comes this proverb, il eſt né coiffé. III. 591. b. 592. a.

Colbert, his moderation with regard to a ſonnet, wherein he was very much abuſed. III. 393. b. He hinders the printing of ſeveral books againſt the houſe of Auſtria. 767. a.

Coligny (Admiral de) refuſes to be a churchman. I. 754. b. 756. a. b. The miſtakes of the author who wrote his life. IV. 696. b. 697. a. How he was killed. I. 746. and b. Paſſionate verſes wrote on his death by John des Caurres. II. 399.

Coligny (the Count de) fights a duel with the Duke of Guiſe. III. 303. a. b. &c. His brother carries off a young lady. 365. b.

Colin falls into diſgrace with Francis I, and loſes his office of reader. II. 371. b. 372. a. How this happened. ibid.

Collado, or Colladon, carries his cenſure againſt Laurens too far. III. 746. a. b.

Collection of ſeveral impertinent authors. III. 854. b.

Collections, in what caſe they are to be looked upon as precious treaſures. I. 536.

Collections: The collections of men of letters reſemble Virgil's fame. I. 19. a. Collections of ſpiritual ſongs ſet to the moſt burleſque tunes. 478. a. b.

Collections made for the churches of Germany, and particularly for thoſe of the Palatinate. I. 241.

College, the foundation of that of Navarre. II. 224. b. The building of its library. I. 164. a. The college della Sapienza at Rome, by whom the building of it was finiſhed, and by whom it was adorned with a fine library. II. 476.

Collenuccio; his Neapolitan Hiſtory tranſlated into Latin by Stouppa. V. 247, 248.

Colletet, what Mr Menage deſigned to do with reſpect to him. II. 139. b.

Colletet (Francis) makes an abridgment of the Annals of Paris. IV. 270. a.

Collier, a ſtory that is told of a Collier's aſs. III. 804. a.

Cologn, its Divines cenſured by Luther on the ſubject of Ariſtotle's doctrines. I. 470. b. The young people who turn Catholics are educated in a college there. IV. 372. b. 373. a. The univerſity of that city oppoſes the deſign of Langius to make learning flouriſh again. III. 724. a. b.

Cologn (the Elector of), a converſation which he had with a peaſant concerning his train. III. 768. b. The laſt Elector very much exclaimed againſt, and for what reaſon. II. 224. a. b. Laid under the ban of the empire. ibid. His method of juſtifying himſelf. ibid.

Cologn: a congreſs held there to make peace in the Low-Countries. II. 223. a. The quarrel which its chapter had with Gebhard Truchſes. 224. b.

Colomiés cited. I. 259. b. Blamed for telling a certain ſtory on the authority of Iſaac Voſſius. 666. b. What he ſays concerning one of Grotius's books. III. 247. b. He wrongfully aſcribes an oration of Broughton's to Druſius. II. 150. b. Cenſures Blondel touching the ſtory of the She-Pope inſerted in a manuſcript of Anaſtaſius. IV. 738. and b.

Colonies uſually took the arms of their mother town. I. 20. a.

Colonius is ſuſpected of Heterodoxy becauſe of his moderation, when the Arminian diſputes began to riſe. III. 360.

Colonna (Antony) ſends Galeacius Florimond to Paris in quality of his agent. III. 58.

Colonna (Aſcanio) his misfortunes. I. 400. b. 401. a. 402. b.

Colonna (Marc Antony) procures his father to be impriſoned for high-treaſon. I. 400. b. 401. a.

Colonna (Proſper) at the age of ſeventy years, falls in love with Clara Viſconti, and proceeds to public extravagancies. IV. 378. b. 379. a.

Colonna (the Conſtable) his ſon cannot obtain the niece of Prince Marc Antony Borgheſe in marriage. II. 471. He marries a niece of Cardinal Mazarin. 472. a. Which proved an unhappy marriage. ibid.

Colophon: that city deſtroyed by Lyſimachus. III. 779. a. Who it was that built it. IV. 97. a.

Coloſſus of Rhodes, the inattention of Scaliger, when he computed the weight of it. II. 390. a.

Colours are not in bodies. IV. 654. a. b.

Column: a column of marble, erected in honour of Julius Cæſar, has Divine honours paid to it. II. 680. a. What thoſe called Roſtratæ were. 726. Miracles told of one. I. 274. a.

Columna (James) an Hiſtorian whom Antony, Archbiſhop of Florence copies in ſeveral places. II. 529, 530. and a. b. Several authors make mention of him. ibid.

Com, a city in Perſia, what Saint is worſhipped there by the Muſſulmans. III. 16. a. b. 17. a. b. Lela, is the name given there to the Bleſſed Virgin. ibid. a.

Comana, the Pontif of that place was likewiſe its ſovereign. I. 421. a.

Combat: a Combat, twenty-two againſt twenty-two. II. 128. and a.

Combats: the inequality of ſucceſs in Combats where juſtice ſeems to be equal. III. 300. b.

Combination: a remarkable Combination of Moral and Phyſical things, which Father Malebranch ſpeaks of. II. 16. a.

Comedian; See Player.

Comedies; one favoured with a prodigy. IV. 300. and a. b. Another repreſented before the King and Queen of Navarre. 324. b. 325. a. Wherein the difference betwixt the Antients and Moderns conſiſts with reſpect to Comedy. 741. b. 742. a. One employed to repreſent the abuſes of Popery. V. 85. a. b. Which is the ſame that was acted before the King and Queen of Navarre. ibid. b. The licence which the Greek Comedy had to vent ſcandal. IV. 568. a. b. 569. a.

Comenius, his portraiture very like that of ſome other Fanatics. II. 538. a. b. 539. a. Some perſons have been ſurprized that he lived ſo long. 539. and b. The cordial and ſpiritual eſteem which Mrs Bourignon and he had for one another. 540. a. How he extricated himſelf from the embaraſſment he was in between the fear of God and the fear of man. 692. Deputed into Hungary. ibid. a. His Janua Linguarum tranſlated into Greek by Theodore Simonis. III. 548. b. He is ſuſpected of Political contrivances. 682. a.

Comes (Natalis) blamed. II. 82. b. See Noel le Compte.

Comets, a ſtrange opinion about them. II. 51. a. Are looked upon as evil preſages. 113. It was entirely for his book intituled, Thoughts on the Comets, that the Magiſtrates of Rotterdam depoſed the author, and there was no mention made of his Advice to the Refugees. V. 647. a. b. The deſign of the Penſées ſur les Cometes. 813.

Comforters, are troubleſome, when they do not take a proper time. II. 564. b.

Comines (Philip de) Haillan's judgment of him. III. 335. b. 336. a. He praiſes Savonarola, and aſcribes to him the glory of having propheſied. V. 58. b. 59. a. b. Reflexions upon his narrative. ibid. b. 60. a. He was better acquainted with ſtate affairs than with the conduct of thoſe who deal in prediction-makers. 59. b. Is too good-natured with reſpect to Savonarola, and puts too favourable a conſtruction upon his prophecies, in order to help him out with them. 60. a. He ſerves as a witneſs to thoſe who cenſure that Monk. ibid. b. 61. a.

Commendon puts a ſtop to a paper-war. II. 605. a.

Commentaries and marginal notes are very uſeful for the right underſtanding of ſatires. I. 35. b.

Commentator (Hiſtorical) ſhould compare together the reaſons pro and con, with all the impartiality of a faithful relater. V. 810.

Commentators; what they ought to aim at. III. 45. a.

Comminges (Mr de) what he ſaid to Mr Amyraut. I. 264. a. b.

Commire (Father) his name was Commere. IV. 854. b.

Commiſſary-General of the Horſe, that office was unknown in the Netherlands before the year 1567. I. 673. a.

Commiſſioners are ever ſuſpected, and for what reaſon. IV. 241. b. A decree of the parliament of Paris relating to them. ibid.

Commodus, a Roman Emperor, expoſes a man to be devoured by wild beaſts, for reading the life of Caligula. V. 265. b.

Common-wealth of learning, has a greater number of ſubtle men now, than it had in the preceding age. I. 92. b. The liberty which every body ought to enjoy in it, and how far that liberty ſhould extend. IV. 548. b.

Commonwealths, it is a misfortune to them that ſome Philoſophers have applied themſelves wholly to the ſtudy of nature. I. 295. a. An alteration of government will always be inevitable in ſuch as amuſe themſelves with conqueſts. II. 165. b. 166. a. See Republics.

Communion, the effect of diſputes which are raiſed in a Communion. I. 241. b. It is not for the temporal intereſt of any Communion, that all the members of it ſhould be men of judgment. II. 708. a.

Company; there is nothing worſe than bad company. I. 279. b.

Compariſon of the minds of men with apples. I. 60. b. 61. a. Of able men with beaſts for ſacrifice. 619. b. A remark upon the deſign of compariſons. V. 360. b. 361. a. b. A compariſon of the author's, which gave offence to ſeveral, vindicated. 824.

Compel them to come in. Reflexion on that maxim. III. 40. a. b.

Compilations, their ordinary defects. I. 219. b. Thoſe who continue and enlarge them oftentimes, occaſion confuſion by their neglect. 615. a. b. If they every where pleaſed one kind of people, they would not be good. III. 337. b. Should be calculated to ſerve every body. V. 806. What the nature of them ought to be. ibid.

Compilers often want exactneſs, and the reaſon of it. I. 60. a. Such a Compiler whom our age might not eſteem in the leaſt, would be admired a thouſand years hence. 536. A paſſage that ought to ſerve for a looking-glaſs to Compilers. II. 232. b. 233. a. An inſtance of the alterations which facts undergo, by paſſing through their hands. 802. a. They highly injure the reputation of great men, by compiling all that they ſay without any diſcernment. III. 939. a. b. One that relates and comments has all the privileges of the writers that he makes uſe of. V. 799.

Compliments, an example of the falſities with which they are generally ſtuffed. IV. 101. a.

Conchini and his wife make uſe of the Cabala, and the Jewiſh books. I. 397. b. 398. a.

Conclave; there is nothing more rare, than for a Cardinal to be ſure of his Election to the Papal Dignity, before he enters the conclave. III. 608. a. How the beſt concerted intrigues are fruſtrated there. I. 361. b.

Conclaviſt, the pleaſant anſwer of one, whoſe allowance they wanted to retrench at the council of Baſil. I. 178. a. b. 179. a.

Concord in the Church, the earneſt deſire of Joſeph Hall to ſee it once eſtabliſhed. III. 343. b.

Concord: what the book of the Concord is. III. 250. a. b.

Concord (the book of) ſternly rejected by the King of Denmark. III. 390. a. A magnificent copy of it, which that Prince threw into the fire. 391. a. Does more harm in Germany, than if the Turks had entered it with fire and ſword. ibid. b. A letter from the Reformed Churches in Holland againſt that book, and who is ſuppoſed to have writ the letter. ibid. 392. a. b.

Concord between the Lutherans, and Calviniſts, why it has never been brought about, and why it probably never will. III. 526. a. b. By what emblem the Antients, repreſented the power of Concord. IV. 232.

Concordate paſſed between Francis I and Leo X, and the abuſes which it occaſioned. IV. 764. a. b. to 766. a. b.

Concubinage of the prieſts, the time has been, when it was hardly looked upon as ſhameful. III. 887. a.

Concubine: A concubine and a whore are commonly eſteemed two very diſtinct characters. II. 315. a. The power of the concubines of Princes offends none but ſuch as hardly read any thing. IV. 455. b. There have been pariſhes which obliged their prieſts to keep a concubine, in order to ſecure the honour of their wives. III. 345. a.

Condé (Lewis I, Prince of) condemned to be beheaded. III. 287. a. n. (11). IV. 327. b.

Condé (the Princeſs of) a narrative of the ceremonies that were obſerved at her abjuration, and a remarkable particular on that occaſion. V. 319. a. b.

Condé (Lewis II, Prince of) by whom he was arreſted, and by whom conducted to Bois de Vincennes. I. 184. Whether he married below himſelf, when he took to wife the Marſhal de Brezé's daughter. II. 135. a. b. 136. a. Particulars that do honour to his memory. 137. b. He writes with his own hand a little before his death, to recommend the Princeſs his wife to the King. 138. b. The declaration which he made of his Orthodoxy at his death. IV. 504. a. b. How he concerned himſelf in the buſineſs relating to the author of the Pre-Adamites. 530. b. The judgment which ſome paſſed upon his conduct at the battle of Senef. V. 190. b. 191. a. b. He ſends for Spinoza, and talks with him. 205. a. b.

Condé (the Princeſs of) wounded by one of her Domeſtics. II. 138. and a. b.

Condé, Condæus, there was no French General of that name in the year 1691. IV. 210. b.

Condé (Henry Julius, Prince of) his diſcernment fatal to impoſtors. I. 7. b. He draws from James Aymar, a confeſſion of his tricks. 8. b.

Condere, the ſignification of that word. I. 252. b.

Conditions, there is none more deplorable than that of a man who cannot die when he deſires it. III. 319. a. b. Thoſe are often the happieſt which ſeem leaſt to be ſo. I. 308. b.

Conduct, an example of a very uniform conduct. I. 580. a. b.

Conecte, how he triumphed over the head-dreſſes and the attire of the women. II. 544. a. IV. 667. b.

Conference, the miniſters once looked upon every propoſal of a conference as a ſnare. II. 520. b. A conference, broke off and renewed with regard to the Ducheſs of Bouillon. IV. 921. a A conference between Cardinal du Perron and Sieur Beraud, and the iſſue of it. 923. a. b.

Conference of Poiſſy, an intrigue deſigned to break it off. I. 691. b. The miniſters of that conference conſulted on the queſtion, whether children, baptized by a woman, ſhould be re-baptized. 704. b. Offence taken by the prelates of that conference. 790. b. 791. a.

Confeſſion by letters maintained by Suarez, and condemned by Clement VIII. I. 661. a. Ought not to be revealed on any account, or in obedience to the command of any one whatever. II. 460. a. b. The abuſes of it, and complaints that are made againſt them. ibid. a. Their own written confeſſions are made uſe of againſt criminals. ibid. b. Sick perſons put it off as a bad omen. IV. 537. b. n. (24).

Confeſſion of Augſburg; remarks upon the variations of it. II. 122. a. b. Preſented to the Emperor at the Diet in that city, in the year 1530. IV. 185. Laurens Tuppius tranſlates into Latin a book which the Princes of that Confeſſion cauſed to be wrote, touching the Council of Trent. V. 514. a. b. 515. a. b.

Confeſſionaries, what impure caſes are heard there. V. 41. a. b.

Confeſſors would not be qualified to remedy the complaints of their penitents, if they had not a thorough inſight into all manner of obſcenities. I. 182. a. V. 40. a. b. Whether others beſides them muſt not know the obſcenities of the confeſſionary. I. 182. a. Laymen diſguiſed as Prieſts, and ſent to confeſs criminals. II. 459. b. 460. a. b. Named with a prohibition to apply to others. ibid. a. Several Prieſts revealed confeſſions to Savonarola. V. 61. a.

Confucius, is as blind as the other Literati of China, with regard to the true God. IV. 81. b.

Congreſs, what an uncertain and ſhameful way it is of diſcovering a man's impotency. IV. 801. a. b. &c. The author's apology for what he has ſaid of it in this Dictionary. 803. b. 804. a. 881. a. b. 882. a. b. The immodeſt practice of it condemned. V. 799.

Coni, Mr Catinat was not forced to raiſe the ſiege of it, neither was he beaten there. IV. 210. b. 211. a. It was Mr de Dulonde who commanded the beſiegers there, and who was diſgraced for retiring, as the French believed, without any neceſſity. ibid.

Conjectures, a perſon may be happier in his Conjectures, without being conſequently a man of more ſkill. I. 148. a.

Conjunctions of the planets, how many great Conjunctions there have been ſince the creation of the world. I. 164. b.

Conquerors; reaſon prompts them both to ſtop, and not to ſtop. I. 14. a.

Conqueſts: though the conqueſts of a monarch are not the intereſt of his people, yet they ruin themſelves with more ſatisfaction for the ſake of a warlike Prince, than for the ſake of any other. V. 664.

Conrart, his opinion touching the tranſlations of Amyot and the Abbot Tallemant. I. 259. a. Conſults Laurence Drelincourt on the French tongue. II. 694. b. The verſes which Lewis de Neufgermain made for him. IV. 357. b. 358. a. He is conſulted by the Sieur d'Ablancourt. 591. a. b. Mr Roſe ſucceeds him in the French Academy. 917.

Conſcience; a doubt upon a caſe of conſcience. I. 109. a. A man ſhould not hazard his conſcience in order to puſh himſelf. 224. b. One is obliged to follow its dictates always. 166. b. The people whoſe intereſt it was moſt to defend this maxim, have been for ſome time the oppoſers of it. ibid. One cannot be too reſerved in accuſing others of preaching againſt their conſciencies. II. 374. a. Whether it can be forced to embrace the true religion. III. 220. b. 221. a. The contradictions which thoſe who aſſert ſuch a thing, fall into. ibid. The directors of conſciences ought to have but ſhort converſations with devout women. 230. b. The light of conſcience is not able to withſtand the greateſt part of the paſſions. 375. a. b. 376. a. Its liberty. 676. a. b. 677. a. b. A compariſon of the Power of conſcience with that of the point of honour. IV. 500. a. b. A tender conſcience will grieve even for a fault that is purely material. 929. b.

Conſcience (erroneous), the privileges of it. I. 166. b. Never did any Philoſopher ſay a more ſenſible thing on that ſubject than what Archelaus ſaid. 418. a. An author who confutes himſelf in writing upon that ſubject. II. 476. a.

Conſcientiaries, a ſect of Atheiſts. III. 671. and a. b.

Conſequences (oppoſite) drawn from the ſame principle, but ſolidly refuted by Seneca. II. 14. b. 15. a.

Conſequences: it is allowed to point out to an adverſary thoſe which reſult from his doctrine, whether he rejects or admits them. V. 644. b. 645. a. Some of them have ſuch a cloſe connexion with the principle from which they are drawn, that it is impoſſible impoſſible to conceive how a man of ſenſe can admit that and reject theſe. 645. a.

Conſiſtory (Walloon) at Rotterdam, their proceedings againſt this Dictionary. I. lxxix, lxxx, lxxxi.

Conſolation, a common-place of Conſolation examined. I. 280. a. b. Carneades refuted it. ibid. b. III. 73. b. A pernicious maxim of Conſolation. I. 428. a. A common-place of Conſolation. 699. b. 700. a. b. Another common-place. II. 561. a. b. 562. a. b. Another. III. 73. a. b.

Conſpiracy requires diſpatch; and this ſpoils all very often. II. 428. a. Some perſons ſuffer themſelves to be drawn into one by motives which they think good. 553. b. A law which makes thoſe who have notice of a conſpiracy, and do not reveal it, guilty of a capital crime. III. 802. a. b.

Conſpiracy, the not diſcovering one is a crime puniſhable with death. IV. 346. a. b.

Conſtance, Queen of Sicily, is with child at the age of fifty-two, and reſolves to be brought to bed publickly. III. 394. b. 395. a.

Conſtantine, the ſtrange and ſurprizing extravagancy of his decree againſt the Arians. I. 474. a. b. 475. a. His donation. II. 594. b. 595. a. b. His cruelties. III. 18. a. b. 19. a. b. To what cauſe the Pagan authors aſcribe his converſion. 20. a. He orders all contentious libels to be burnt. 278. a.

Conſtantine (Copronymus) fouls the baptiſmal font without knowing it. II. 422. b.

Conſtantine (Dame) the midwife, her crimes and puniſhment. IV. 498. a. 499. a. b.

Conſtantinople, its Patriarch ſtrangled during the ſeſſion of the Council of Florence. I. 266.

Conſtantius; why he throws himſelf into a terrible paſſion. I. 37. a.

Conſtitution; an effect of the ſtrange power of it. II. 719. a. b.

Conſul, whether he re-deſcended to the Pretorſhip. II. 345. a. b. Two Conſuls depoſed from their Conſulate, for ſhewing diſreſpect to a letter from the Senate. 291. a.

Conſulate, two brothers diſcharge that office at the ſame time, a thing which had never been ſeen before. I. 341. Who was the firſt ſtranger that was honoured with it at Rome. 611. b. There were not two degrees of it. 613. a. The cauſe of their miſtake who have thought ſo. ibid.

Contempt: one ought not to ſhew contempt for any perſon whatever. I. 366. 376, 377. a. b. 421. b. 422. a.

Conti (the Prince of), his judgment of two ſonnets. I. 752. a.

Continence, a rare example of that virtue. I. 14. b. 357. Found in a married life. 34. and a. b. Such a ſtate between a man and a woman who have every thing elſe in common, is too great a violence offered to nature. ibid. Prejudicial to the health of the fair ſex ſometimes. 390. b. 391. a. The gift of it is not a thing on which a man may depend. III. 13. b. How thoſe who make a vow of Continency ought to conduct themſelves. 64. b. Men devoted to it ought to wiſh for the ſame qualities as the Hirpes had. 72. b. What it ought to cauſe in order to be a true virtue. 620. Is rather a quality of conſtitution than of Morality. IV. 332. a. Whether it be poſſible: Reaſons pro and con. III. 344. b. 345. a. Reckoned impoſſible among Proteſtants, and among ſome Roman Catholics. 345. a. A Clergyman who owns that it is beyond the power of man, gives great reaſon to ſuſpect his conduct in the time that preceded his marriage. 344. b. This controverſy ought to be handled with circumſpection. ibid. See Fornication.

Continuation of an hiſtory: when authors find one ready done, they chuſe rather to copy it, than be at the trouble to compoſe a new one. IV. 210. b.

Contradictions, Polemic Divines and Lawyers are very ſubject to them. I. 351. b. 352. a. Theſe have ſincerity enough to own it, but not thoſe. ibid. and b. 353. a. The excuſes which Baldus makes for them. 616. b. It is an ill character to be of a ſpirit of contradiction. II. 376. b. Whether they are of any uſe. III. 135. a.

Contraries. One may feel one of the Contraries without having ever felt the other. IV. 514. a. b. &c.

Controverſies, thoſe who handle them give too much injurious language to their adverſaries, and diſguiſe their ſtrongeſt arguments. I. 718. b. The way of handling them right. ibid. Who has given them the beſt form. 734. a. There are ſome, where neither peace nor war can be made but to one's confuſion. III. 84. a. Cannot be ended by indeterminate, ambiguous, and intricate forms of expreſſion, where each party finds its own account. IV. 287. a. It is chiefly in the matter of controverſy that the underſtanding is the dupe of the Paſſions. 737. a.

Controverſiſts, examples which are a little puzzling to thoſe of the Roman party. I. 179. a. b. Two of their greateſt faults. 718. b. n. (14). Are great liars. 790. a. Their zeal very often ſtifles their knowledge and their virtue. ibid. b. An Hiſtorian ought to lay no ſtreſs on the abuſive language which they give each other. 795. a. Moſt of them aggravate the evil of the other party, and extenuate the evil of their own cauſe, as much as they can. II. 136. b. All of them mutually complain of the artifices of thoſe who write againſt them. 488. b. Thoſe among the Proteſtants who defended their cauſe like men of honour have never been hated by the Roman Catholics. 695. a. b. Of what weight the teſtimony of a Controverſiſt is upon a fact reflecting on the other party. III. 764. b. One muſt take care not to be ſurprized by their air of triumph. IV. 56. a. Moſt of them are inclined to give things a malicious turn. 137. b. See Diſpute. They know not how to diſtinguiſh between what is to the purpoſe, and what is mere cavilling. I. 236. b. After they have uſed all their ſtrength againſt ſome weak part of the oppoſite cauſe, they leave the ſtrongeſt unanſwered, and aſſume a diſdainful arrogance. II. 223. b. Ought not to ſtop at the authors of their own party, without conſulting thoſe who write againſt them. IV. 825. a. b. Are wont to reduce their adverſaries to an abſurdity. V. 824. Such as defend their cauſe well vex their adverſaries. 846.

Controverſiſts (Roman), their perplexity touching the book of Taxes. I. 629. b.

Contzen, Jeſuit, deſcribes the violences exerciſed by the Lutherans upon the Calviniſts. III. 535. a. Refutes the viſions of Braumbom. II. 126. b. 127.

Convents, the inſtitution of them aſcribed to the devil. I. 272. a. The ſpirit of the goſpel does not reign there. II. 109. A ſtrange corruption of morals there in the XVth century. 276. a. b. 277. a. b.

Converſation, thoſe who have the addreſs to revive a languiſhing converſation, are a great help in the world. I. 701. b. 702. a. There are ſome who write down what they hear there. III. 154. b. Such perſons are dangerous. ibid. People that are very agreeable in converſation. IV. 591. a. The ſtrange ſlavery of thoſe who have the reputation of excelling in it. 707. b. n. (93). Things are miſerably confounded in the indeterminate diſcourſes of Converſation: we have a thouſand inſtances of it in the Scaligerana, and in the Menagiana. 727. b.

Converſions, writers who undertake to ſpeak of them, are apt to fall into contradictions. I. 477. b. Converſions wrought by dragooning will be eternally abhorred by honeſt men. IV. 535.

Converts are almoſt forced to ſpeak ill of the party which they forſake. II. 130. b.

Cookery. The hiſtory of a book of Cookery. I. 371. a. b.

Cooks. What Cooks are the moſt excellent. I. 100.

Coos, Auguſtus remits to the inhabitants of that iſland, an hundred talents of the tribute which they were indebted to his Exchequer, and upon what account. I. 369. a.

Cop (Luke le) tranſlates into French the Hiſtory of the Confeſſion of Augſburg, wrote by Chytræus. II. 122. b.

Copernicus: the beauty of his ſyſtem. V. 825.

Copies become imperfect in proportion as they multiply. I. 747. b.

Coppenius (Bartholomew) cannot obtain leave to go and diſpute with the Jeſuits. IV. 74. a.

Coquets, the fate of people depends very often upon their caprices. II. 841. a. A ſign by which one may know them. IV. 688. a.

Coras, a famous Civilian at Toulouſe. III. 580. b.

Coras, an apoſtate Miniſter, ſome of his adventures. III. 579. b. 580. a. b.

Cordemoi, an examination of what he ſays concerning Eudes and Charles Martel. I. 15. a. His reflexion upon the boldneſs of ſome modern authors. 16. b. 17. a. b.

Corderius (Maturinus), his pious fraud with regard to his ſcholars. IV. 574. b.

Cords for diſcipline; two thouſand crowns were laid out upon them in one week. IV. 314. a.

Coryciana, a collection of verſes printed at Rome. I. 68. b. 69. a.

Corinna; that name does not ſtand for Julia in Ovid's Art of Love. IV. 444. a.

Corythus raiſes the jealouſy of Paris, and is killed by him. IV. 401. a.

Corinth, in what manner Venus was ſerved and worſhipped there. III. 699. b. 700. a. The women of that city, at the tyrant's ſummons, repair to Juno's temple, where they are ſtripped, and their cloaths burnt. IV. 563. a.

Corinthians, what they do to diſcharge themſelves of the infamy of having killed Medea's ſons. II. 874. a.

Cornarius (John) has tranſlated a paſſage of Parthenius ill. I. 52. b. Tranſlates out of Greek into Latin Parthenius's book de Amatoriis Affectionibus. IV. 482. a. Is miſtaken about the motive of the dedication to Cornelius Gallus. ibid. b. 483. a.

Cornelia, her fidelity to Pompey proved the accidental cauſe of his deſtruction. IV. 282. a. b.

Cornelius Gallus: Parthenius dedicates his book de Amatoriis Affectionibus to him. IV. 482. b. The falſe motive which Cornarius aſſigns for it. ibid. 483. a. The reaſon which Parthenius himſelf gives for the dedication. ibid.

Cornelius à Lapide, in a great paſſion with certain authors. I. 40. b. Attributes his own thoughts to the Jews. 104. b. 105. a.

Cornelius Nepos, Verona and Cataneus diſpute between them the honour of having produced him. II. 357. b.

Cornelius (Antony), a name borrowed to conceal the true author of a book, which Father Garaſſe calls impious. V. 536. a. b.

Cornetz (Cornelius), upon what condition he married the daughter of Dideric de Groot. III. 241. b.

Cornuel (Madam), her frank reflexion upon ſeeing a man, who ſhe had been told was impotent. II. 534. b. 535. a.

Corona Regia, a ſatire againſt King James I. II. 338. a.

Coronis is got with child by Apollo; where, and when, ſhe was delivered of Æſculapius. IV. 626.

Corradus commits a blunder in not having rightly underſtood Aſconius. II. 347. b. Miſtakes Plutarch's meaning with reſpect to Lucullus, and the ſocial war. III. 493. b.

Correcting: ſeveral authors find the correcting or reviſing of their works too troubleſome, and give it over. IV. 451. a. An author ſhould be adviſed by his friends in correcting his works. 591. a. b.

Correctneſs. There is a certain degree of correctneſs beyond which nothing can be done but what inſtead of perfecting the work, and giving it more nerves and ſtrength, weakens and diſpirits it. III. 836. b. 837. a. IV. 896. b. 897. a.

Correctors of the preſs are often very innocent of the faults that are to be met with in printed books. III. 661. a. b.

Corrupt: men can never be ſo generally corrupt, but ſome will avoid the contagion. III. 272. b.

Corruption of the heart of man: Nothing can be a better proof of it than ſhewing that thoſe who have no ſupernatural aſſiſtance, are as wicked under the profeſſion of a religion, as others who live in a ſtate of Atheiſm. V. 812.

Corſairs (Turkiſh) made tractable by the game at Cheſs. II. 53.

Corunna, what is ſaid concerning the foundation of it is a mere fable. III. 431. b.

Coſmetic, what is the object and uſe of that art. II. 575. a.

Coſroës, King of Perſia, what he did to vex the Emperor Heraclius. IV. 350. a.

Coſtar, unjuſtly accuſed of a groſs ignorance by Girac. I. 75. a. Took the ground or baſis of his collections from Bacon's works. 599. b. 600. a. Did not comprehend Horace's thought with regard to Catius. II. 389. b. Juſtly cenſures Balzac, who had criticized Alexander. 667. b. Quoted. III. 262. a. 939. a. Has no reaſon to cite Eraſmus on the ſubject of Bilia. II. 727. and b. Was ignorant of what the Antients had ſaid concerning that Roman Lady. ibid. Is cenſured by Girac with reſpect to the cuſtom which Pompey had of biting his miſtreſs. III. 56. a. Cenſured for making uſe of one of Frangipani's jeſts. 102. a. Is charged with treaſon by Girac. 399. a. Cenſured with reſpect to Hercules, and the poſture in which he deſired to be painted. 430. a. b. How he argued againſt the Politician, who maintained that the moſt dangerous ſovereigns were thoſe who were too much ſovereigns. 825. a. He juſtly cenſures Girac, with reſpect to the two veſſels of Jupiter. IV. 93. a. b. Is rallied for his way of explaining ſome verſes of Horace. V. 134. a. b. The Hiſtory of his quarrels with Girac. 341. a. b. &c. Is ſtrongly attacked upon his jokes of Gallantry. 343. a. b. A judgment on his diſpute with Girac. 345. a. b. He does not approve a thought of Longinus. 360. a. b. Endeavours to find out the reaſons why Sylla wanted to take the ſirname of Fortunate. 366. b. 367. a. Finds himſelf at a loſs when he is obliged to account for a thing which he had advanced. 400. b. 401. a.

Coſte (Mr de la) a particular of which he informs the author. I. 602. b. n. (30).

Cotin (the Abbot de) quoted. I. 94. b. What he ſays of an epitaph that Menage had compoſed. III. 739. a. b. And of Epicurus. 929. b. 930. a. b.

Coton (Father) great outcries raiſed againſt him with reſpect to a woman poſſeſſed with the Devil. III. 214. b. Vindicated from the charge of leudneſs. 891. a. b. Diſcovered by his ſmell thoſe who had violated the laws of chaſtity. IV. 125. a.

Cotta (Pontiff) his objection againſt the Divine providence. II. 713. a. His anſwer to thoſe who inſtead of arguments only alledged public ſtories. III. 743. b. Overpowers with arguments thoſe who ſay that reaſon is a gift which the gods have beſtowed upon man. IV. 516. b. n. (34). 517. a. Why, according to him, it was dangerous to deny the exiſtence of the gods. V. 239. b.

Cottibi (Miniſter) writes againſt a certain faſt, after having changed his religion. I. 108. n. (e). A pleaſant ſtory which he tells. II. 581. a. b. Gives the epithet of Saint to Origen, for which he is cenſured by Daillé. IV. 412. a.

Coverdal (Milon) carried always a woman about with him, and what name he gave her, according to Sanders. V. 42. b.

Council of Baſil; upon a ſeſſion-day, the relicks of Baſil were brought there, and placed in the room of the abſent Biſhops. I. 178.

Council of Conſtance: a project of reformation laid before it. I. 165. b. Cautious not to diſoblige the Duke of Burgundy. IV. 605. a. b.

Council of Piſa promiſed the canonization of Savonarola to the Dominicans, upon condition that they would take part againſt Pope Julius II. V. 69, 70, 71.

Council of Trent, what the Abbot of St Cyran ſaid of it. I. 36. b. V. 15. b. The ſpirit of that council. 704. a. Who was regarded as the right hand of it. IV. 291. b. Reaſons why it was declared to Vergerius, that he could not aſſiſt there. V. 454. b. 455. a.

Councils, when that of Soiſſons, and when that of Sens was held. I. 29. b. 30. a. Whether many volumes of the councils be proper to convert Heretics. 604. b. 605. a. A ſatirical deſcription of the council which condemned Abelard. 757. a. Who are the fitteſt perſons to draw up the deciſions of one. 703. b. 704. a. The Pope can do nothing againſt the canons of councils. III. 741. a. Compared with the States General. IV. 139. b. Why it is neceſſary that the Holy Ghoſt ſhould preſide in them. 348. a. b. They have only ſerved to render Heretics obſtinate, when they oppreſſed them by the Imperial authority. 349. b. 350. a. Whether general councils lawfully aſſembled, can err in points of faith. III. 595. a. b.

Councils of war, by what kind of proofs people ſometimes maintain the opinions they have given there. I. 515. a. b.

Counſellor: a counſellor who burns the writings of the two contending parties. II. 647. a.

Counſels or Precepts (Evangelical) the wrong uſe that may be made of them, by the ſpinning out of conſequences. I. 735. b.

Countryman, one who makes the preſent of a turnip to Lewis XI, King of France. III. 803. b.

Courage. Whether a man can lawfully be condemned to death for want of courage. III. 59. b.

Court; a remarkable inſtance of the intrigues of Courts. I. 100. b. Their uneven conduct. II. 210. b. 211. a. A court without women is ſomething abſurd. IV. 354. b. It is the great model of moſt religions. 355. b. A deſcription of the different parts that are acted there by thoſe who ſollicit affairs. 460. b. How nice they are in the choice of men there. V. 419. a. b. Du Refuge's treatiſe on the Court, a very good one. IV. 850. a. b. 851. a. b.

Court. It is often the trueſt policy to pay one's court, even when they are in diſgrace, to thoſe whom we ſee in the road to high preferment. I. 422. a.

Court of Rome, its corruption. II. 370. b. 371. a. The Cardinals reſent its being diſhonoured in the Diet of the empire. III. 329. a. Was deeply dipt in James Clement's crime. 413. a. Its tyranny. IV. 330. b. 331. a. Marſilius of Padua, diſplays in a lively manner its pride, luxury, and other irregularities. 198.

Court of France, its corruption. IV. 329. a. 330. b. 333. b.

Courtezan; whether that word be leſs ſhocking than the word Putain (W...). V. 848.

Courtezans have always been, and ſtill are, the way to preferment. II. 426. b. 427. a. And to the gaining of law-ſuits. 466. a. b. 467. a. Reduce their galants to beggary. III. 71. a. b. A courtezan who honoured and diſhonoured learning at the ſame time. 694. and a. How they ought to die according to the principles of the Pagans. 702. b. Have very often a power over mens hearts, even when they are grown old. IV. 694. b. 695. a. Their pictures conſecrated in temples. III. 57. a. b. Courtezans conſcientious. IV. 582. b. 583. a.

Courtiers, a remarkable inſtance of their intrigues. I. 100. b. The turn of a fine courtier. 583. b. They ought not in their court devotions to imitate the Huguenots who invoke none but God. II. 602. b. Compared to the Euripus. III. 585. a. Are commonly more ambitious than jealous. IV. 21. a. What talent they ſtand moſt in need of. 397. b. 398. a.

Couſin (Preſident) denies a thing concerning Preſident Ferrier, and the Chancellor de l'Hoſpital, which appears very probable. III. 38. a. Quoted. 215. a. b.

Coza, the name of the Sultan's Preceptor. IV. 425. a.

Cragius criticized with reſpect to the Lacedemonian habit. III. 968. b.

Craig (John) the deſign of his Theologiæ Chriſtianæ Principia Mathematica. V. 835.

Cramail (the Count de) engages the Abbot of St Cyran to handle his Queſtion Royale. V. 16. a.

Cramier (Daniel) Profeſſor of Divinity at Stetin, and Super-intendant of the churches of Pomerania. IV. 210. n. (a).

Crantor, his book of Conſolation. II. 561. a. b.

Craon (the Baron de) what effect a ſermon had upon him. III. 60.

Crapula, the meaning of that word in the time of St Auguſtin. I. 567. a. b. 568. a.

Craſſus, the Orator, does not deſire that his readers ſhould be altogether ignorant or very learned men. IV. 593. a.

Craſſus rallies Dejotarus; but his raillery is returned. II. 630. b. His defeat and death. V. 273.

Cratea commits inceſt with her ſon. IV. 562. b. 563. a.

Crates, what he did to diſſuade Hipparchia from the reſolution ſhe had taken to marry him. III. 457, 458. Where and how he conſummated his marriage. 458. a.

Cratippus, his conference with Cicero and Nigidius. IV. 370. b.

Cray-fiſh, whoſe ſhell repreſented an ax. V. 312. b. 313. a.

Creation; there is a book of the creation which was aſcribed to Abraham. I. 45. b. All the Philoſophers are conſtrained to admit of a creation. 304. b. 305. a. b. Thoſe who deny it, muſt neceſſarily admit of miſchievous Genii, as well as beneficent ones in the univerſe. II. 251. a. The importancy of this doctrine. ibid. and b. It is neceſſary to admit of the creation of matter. III. 650. a. b. 651. a. And of that of motion, if we would conceive that God framed the world. IV. 436. b. 437. a. b. &c.

Creatures, their Obediential power, according to the Schoolmen. II. 662. a. b. Their conſervation is a continual creation. IV. 886. a. b.

Credulity, deſtroyed by her own fruitfulneſs. I. 87. a. Is the ſource of the multiplication of miracles. ibid. Blame-worthy in the Orthodox as well as in Heretics. 198. a. Reflexions upon the inclination of people to Credulity. II. 879. b. 880. a.

Creed (Apoſtles) whether the Apoſtles formed it by pieces. V. 435. b. 436. a.

Cregut, his apology. III. 596. a. b. 597. a. b.

Crellius, his opinion about the ſouls of beaſts. IV. 905. a.

Cremutius Cordus, put to death by Tiberius, and for what reaſon. II. 355. b. n. (37).

Crequi (the Marſhal de) his jugment of a Prior after having converſed fifteen days with him. II. 374. b. n. (57).

Crequi (the Duke of) Embaſſador at Rome, receives an inſult there which is ſaid to have proceded originally from a paſſion of gallantry. II. 470. b. A Legate à Latere comes to Paris to make ſatisfaction for it. ibid. n. (19).

Creſcentius endeavours to retain to himſelf the ſovereign power at Rome. IV. 428. In what manner he was puniſhed for it. 429. a. b.

Creſſy, reaſons which facilitated the treaty of peace that was concluded there. III. 95. a. The Dauphin's proteſtation againſt. it. ibid.

Crevant, the ſiege of that town. II. 461. and a.

Creutz (Erneſt John) has tranſlated into Latin Boccalini's Pietra del Paragoni Politico. II. 39. a.

Crimes; whether it be lawful to ſave one's life, or that of any other, by a crime. I. 91. a. b. Crimes of ſtate are generally hooked in by Prieſts in their accuſations. 30. and a. Crimes are maintained by crimes. II. 736. b. No crimes are committed without ſome proſpect of advantage. 346. b. There are ſome which can only be committed by great men. III. 228. and a. The common excuſe of thoſe who commit very great ones. 858. b. It is a principle of the Natural as well as of the Divine law, that a man ought not to commit crimes with an intention to ſerve God. II. 576. a.

Crinitus (Peter) cenſured touching the name of a Tragedy. I. 59. b. His miſtakes concerning Caſſius Severus. II. 358. a. b. He confounds a paſſage of Suetonius with regard to Cæſar and Catullus. 394. a. b. Makes verſes in praiſe of an Aſſaſſin. III. 716. a. b.

Criſpus, put to death by Conſtantin. III. 18. a. b. 19. a. b. 20. a.

Critias was an Atheiſt. II. 571. b. &c.

Critical Learning, the ſtudy of it is fallen. I. 220. b.

Criticiſm, a fatality inſeparable from it. II. 773. a. It is permitted to jeſt in Criticiſm, but not to reaſon wrong. III. 631. b. How dangerous a work it is. 853. b.

Critics are liable to heap chimera's on chimera's. I. 35. b. Such as take advantage of an equivocal expreſſion, ought not to omit the favourable ſenſe. 119. b. The edge of their genius is often greatly blunted. 419. a. An inſtance of the confuſion which they ſometimes occaſion in the commonwealth of learning. 543. and a. b. They ſeldom agree on the reading of the manuſcripts. ibid. a. They ſometimes change the readings to ſerve a turn, and when they do not underſtand them. ibid. b. It is ſurprizing that two excellent Critics ſhould not have known a fact which few men of letters are ignorant of. ibid. Nothing contributes more to the multiplying of miſtakes in their writings, than the licence which they take of extending, farther than they ought, the authorities upon which they build. II. 351. a. Such as criticize books, ought not to be confounded with the writers of ſatires and defamatory libels. 389. a. b. The reaſon of it. ibid. Thoſe Critics who found fault with the book de Uſu Patrum, do really commend it. 582. a. The moſt learned are apt to give us very falſe corrections. 633. a. Their illuſions. 634. a. They were wont to put a piece of wax upon ſuch places of of a book as ſeemed obſcure to them. 640. b. The quarrels of Critics are uſeful in one ſenſe, and ſcandalous in another. III. 253. b. 254. a. Whether ſuch of them as are authors themſelves, be more to be dreaded than others. 337. a. b. Their taſte is far from being uniform. 589. a.

Critolaus, the Peripatetic, ſent to Rome. II. 329. b.

Cræſus diſmiſſes Solon without giving him any mark of his eſteem. II. 831. a. Cauſes golden tiles to be conſecrated in the temple of Delphos. IV. 622. b.

Croiſes (or the members of the Cruſade) why they did not ſucceed. I. 774. b.

Croix (Mr de la) his Etat préſent des Nations & Egliſes, &c. III. 4. n. (f).

Croſs, it is ſaid that the inſcription of it was found at Rome in the Pontificate of Innocent. VIII. III. 566.

Crotona reformed from its luxury and debauchery by Pythagoras. IV. 667. a. b.

Crown: a woman that recovered, by her leudneſs, a crown which ſhe could not preſerve by her courage. II. 523.

Crown-lands. The States-General in France, will not conſent to alienate them. III. 409. a.

Croze (Mr de) cited. I. 47. a. n. (3). II. 398. n. (a). 558. a. n. (3). IV. 809. a. n. (5).

Crucifix, the nocturnal apparitions of one to Bencius. I. 747. a.

Cruelties juſtified. I. 710. a.

Cruquius, his blunder with reſpect to Stobæus, in a paſſage where he mentions Epicurus. II. 774. a. b. Other blunders of the ſame author. 775. a.

Cruſade proved unſucceſsful, and for what reaſons. V. 339.

Cuckold, (voluntary) II. 239. a. Such an one excites the indignation of all the world againſt him. 60. a. A diſpute about that word. III. 630. b. 631. a. b.

Cuckoldom, a common-place of conſolation for that diſgrace. I. 699. b. 670. a. It was what the Antients prayed might light upon evil-doers. II. 247. b. Wiſhed for in the form of an imprecation. 742. a. In ſome climates, huſbands learn to bear that diſgrace with patience. 743. a. b. Whether a man ſhould carry it to be regiſtered in the parliament rolls. 845. a. V. 112. a. b. In what caſe a huſband may publiſh it without reproach. ibid.

Cuckolds, a Comedy writ upon them, intituled, Nephelococugy or Cloud of Cuckolds, which is very obſcene, but full of invention, and ſeaſoned with a good deal of ſprightlineſs and wit. III. 883. a. b.

Cujas; an account of his daughter's conduct. V. 240. b. 241. a.

Cui bono, who was the author of that maxim. II. 346. and b. 347. a. And upon what principle it is founded. 346. b.

Cunæus abuſes Ariſtotle for a piece of folly, which he never was guilty of. I. 466. a. An anecdote letter of his. V. 535. a. b.

Cunilago; the virtue of that plant. V. 334. a. b.

Cups of a prodigious ſize. III. 205. b. 206. a. b.

Curate, one who could not read the church books of the faireſt character, and yet diſtinguiſhed the ſmalleſt dice. III. 762. b. How the Curate of Midiani was excited to pray for the King. IV. 457. a. b. One who refuſed to pray for the health of a ſick perſon, and why. 487. b. Thoſe of Paris at law with the Jeſuits. I. 167. a. n. (2).

Curates, there have been pariſhes which obliged them to keep each a concubine, that the honour of their wives might be ſecured. III. 345. a.

Curator of the univerſity of Leyden, to whom that office was commonly given. I. 787.

Curcellæus cenſured. II. 27. a. b. An extract from one of his letters to the Sieur Sorbiere touching Pope Alexander. VII. 475. b. He engages to attack Mareſius. 583. b.

Curio (Auguſtin) confounds himſelf greatly in ſpeaking of the Saracens. I. 15. a.

Curioſity. A remarkable example of private curioſity. I. 212.

Cuſanus (Cardinal) quoted. I. 617. a. b.

Cuſpinian, notes upon his Cæſars by Hungerus. III. 534.

Cuſtom, its authority. I. 446. a. b. It concerns every body to conform to the cuſtoms of the places where they are. II. 645. a. Why it blunts the ſenſation. IV. 514. a. b. Can render innocent in one country, that which is contrary to public decency in another. II. 645. and a. Its caprices. 634. a.

D.

Dacier (Mr) limits the epithet of Achæmenidæ, to the time of Darius the ſon of Hyſtaſpes. I. 72. b. 73. a. Cenſures Voſſius for confounding an Orator with a Poet. II. 354. a. Examination of that cenſure. ibid. His inattention. 388. a. b. III. 907. a. What he ſays concerning the genealogy of Druſus and Tiberius. II. 714. b. What he ſays of Lollius. III. 860. a. b. Gives a proof of his excellent judgment, in declaring for Horace againſt Quintilian, with reſpect to Lucilius. 908. a.

Dacier (Madam) underſtood a paſſage of Plato concerning Prodicus, better than Creſollius. IV. 783. b.

Dacquin, a converted Jew, gives in a depoſition againſt Concini and his wife. III. 125. b. 126. a.

Demonomagia, a book of Elichius's, which the Magiſtrates of Marpurg had a mind to ſuppreſs; but which he got publiſhed, notwithſtanding their prohibition. II. 750. and a. b.

Dæmons: whether Dæmons can be the paſſive or active ſubjects of any generation. II. 751. b. Their original according to the Rabbins. 855. b. The doctrine of the Pagans concerning them. V. 572. a. b. A treatiſe on the nature of Dæmons. I. 294. Whether their apparitions were related by Rhetorical figures. V. 73. a. b.

Daillé, his anſwer to Father Adam has remained without a reply. I. 108. and a. b. What he ſays of the Fathers in general, and of St Auguſtin in particular. 109. b. His books are commended by the Archbiſhop of Paris. 264. a. His treatiſe concerning the right uſe of the Fathers. II. 582. a. b. His quarrel with Mareſius was ſoon ended. 583. a. He had a great ſhare in Balzac's eſteem. 584. b. His anſwer to the inveſtives of ſome paſſionate Lutherans. III. 218. a. Has not traced Campain and Whitaker's diſpute. 940. a. The reproaches which are caſt upon him by Cottibi, and Father Adam, touching Mr Morus. IV. 274. a. The opinion which Mr Morus had of him. 276. b. What cenſures he paſſes upon the title of Saint given to Origen by Cottibi. 412. and a. b. 413. a. b. &c. What he ſays of Tertullian. V. 142. b. With what view he read the accounts of travellers. 427. b. He filled the place of Samuel Durant at Charenton. II. 727. His anſwers to the reproaches of the Catholics touching the alteration of a paſſage in the Pſalter. IV. 164. a. b.

Daillé, the ſon, quoted touching a book of his father's. I. 108. a.

Daimachus: whether Ephorus could be his plagiary. II. 773. a. b.

Dalechamp, a famous Phyſician, and of great practice. I. 536. b. Unhappy thoſe who take things upon truſt from him. 372. b. His tranſlation of the verſes of Ibicus, cited by Athenæus, is neither free from faults of omiſſion nor commiſſion. IV. 232. a. A paſſage in his tranſlation of Athenæus cenſured. II. 557. a. b. 558. a.

Damage; whether one is always obliged to make it up by reſtitution, or ſome other way. I. 13. b.

Damagetus, King of Jalyſus, for what reaſon he aſked Ariſtomenes to give him one of his daughters in marriage. II. 650. a.

Damianus (Peter) what anſwer he made to the queſtion which Agnes, widow to the Emperor Henry III, aſked of him. III. 80. b. His Gomorrhæus. II. 588. a. b. 599. a. b. V. 855. a. b.

Damnation (Eternal) the Myſtics are much exclaimed againſt, for giving their conſent to it. IV. 943. a. b.

Damned: what the opinion of Prudentius was, concerning their ſtate and number. IV. 788. b. 789. a.

Damophila; her hymns compoſed to the honour of Diana. IV. 554.

Danaë, a Courtezan, being condemned to death, when ſhe came to the place of execution, dropt a moſt inſolent murmur againſt providence. III. 779. b.

Dancing juſtly condemned by the Reformed Churches. V. 23. b.

Daneau (Lambert), cabals againſt the authority of the States of Holland in favour of England. II. 688. a. Commits ſome faults in ſpeaking of Marcion. IV. 107. a. b.

Danes defeated in Scotland by the valour of a peaſant. III. 332.

Danger: when the danger is over, people are apt to forget the vows which they made to God. II. 649. a.

Danhawerus overthrows the pacific deſign of the Elector Palatine. III. 526. b.

Daniel, neither he, nor the Angel which inſtructed him, nor the ſoul of Jeſus Chriſt, underſtood his numbers. II. 122. a. b.

Daniel (Father) his hypotheſis concerning the ſouls of beaſts refuted. IV. 909. a. b. Quoted. I. 670. His defence of St Auguſtin againſt Mr de Launoi. III. 745. b.

Daniſh women, what is ſaid of them in the memoirs of Beaujeu. II. 821. a.

Dante, the Poet; what revenge he took upon Prince Charles de Valois, and the reaſon of it. II. 296. a. b. His Comedy of Hell, Purgatory, and Paradiſe. 592. b. 593. a. b. He affords ſome proofs to thoſe who ſay that he was a good Catholic, and to thoſe who ſay he was not. 595. b. The anſwer which he made to the Prince of Verona. 596. b. He boaſts of the ſhare he had in Guido Cavalcante's friendſhip. 399.

Darius, the different anxieties which he undergoes on his wife's account. IV. 6. a.

Darkneſs; the removal of the darkneſs mentioned by Moſes, was only with reſpect to the corporeal eye. I. 306. a. The darkneſs which happened during our Saviour's paſſion. IV. 624. b. 625. a. b.

Darmſtadt bravely defended, but taken by ſtorm during the war of Smalcalde. III. 386. b.

Darnalt quoted. IV. 610. b. V. 528. b.

Daſſoucy called an Heretic in point of love. II. 601. b. His zeal for the Ducheſs of Savoy. 602. b. 603. a. He is ill uſed by Loret. 604. a. b. Incurs the diſpleaſure of the ladies at Montpellier. 601. b. III. 406. a.

Date ought to be nicely obſerved in prefaces. I. 493. a. The date of the ſetting up of a monument, taken for that of his death who was to be buried there. II. 515. n. (c).

Dathenus (Peter) obtains, from the Elector Palatine, a retreat at Frankendal. III. 362. b. 363. a.

Daughter: It is not true that a daughter always follows her mother's example, whether it be good or bad. II. 702. a. Of what uſe daughters are in families ſometimes. V. 34. a.

Daughters of Adam, their names. I. 23. a.

David, whether two families of his race paſſed into Spain at the time of the deſtruction of the firſt temple. I. 41. a. The explanation which the author has joined to that article, full of ſubmiſſion to the holy Scripture. V. 798. 807. The author's correction of that article. ibid.

David, Preacher to the King of Navarre, ſome particulars concerning him. IV. 324. b. 325. a.

Davila, his calumnies againſt Francis I, are unluckily too eaſy to be confuted. III. 94. a. He and Maimbourg directly contradict each other in their narrative touching the Duke of Guiſe. 292. b. 293. a. He falſely accuſes a Miniſter of having preached up, that the French ought not to obey their King, and that they might lawfully kill him. IV. 920. a. Quoted and cenſured. ibid. and b. V. 529. a. b.

Daviſon renounces Aſtrology, and applies himſelf to Phyſic. IV. 258. b.

Dauphin of France; they give him Bongar's letters to read. II. 68. a.

Dauphiné; what a conſiderable place was that of the Civil and Criminal Recorder to the Parliament of Dauphiné. IV. 538. a.

Daurat compares the Parliament of Paris to Plato's Androgynes. III. 873. b.

Day, a Diſſertation upon that ſubject. V. 775. Remarks on the definition of the Natural and Artificial Day. ibid. Nations who reckoned by nights. 776. Of the Civil and Aſtronomical Day. ibid. and 777. Inconveniencies of the line of the point of Day. ibid. b. 778. a. b. They who go round the world, get or loſe a Day. 778, 779. Puteanus has ill expreſſed himſelf in ſaying, that thoſe who go round the world eaſtward loſe a Day. 780. Authors who have committed the ſame fault as he. ibid. Pliny, Bembus, and Scaliger, criticiſed. 781. & ſeq. How two contagious places may differ twenty-four hours, as to the beginning of the Day. 779.

Dead; Urban Regius was of opinion that we ſhould pray for them. IV. 854.

Death; there is little ſtreſs to be laid on the reports that are ſpread about the death of great men, and of diſtinguiſhed authors. I. 88. a. b. 655. and b. 656. a. b. Moraliſts ought to be reſerved in their reflexions on this head. I. 88. a. b. What ſhould be the diſpoſition of all men at the approach of death. 216. a. A thought of Arceſilas concerning death. 413. Perſons who promiſed to appear after their death. 631. II. 65. and b. 66. a. A common-place of conſolation for death. I. 699. b. 700. a. b. An extraordinary death which was attributed to a juſt judgment of God, both by the Orthodox and Heterodox. II. 19. a. Raſh and haſty reflexions are made on the death of Heretics. 373. b. 374. a. What ſome Pagans ſaid of death. 418. a. b. 419. a. &c. It is a favour to the wretched. III. 643. b. 644. a. Lewis XI, King of France, had given ſtrict charge that no man ſhould pronounce that word to him. 803. b. 807. a. IV. 320. b. The grounds of conſolation, which Epicurus and Lucretius alledged againſt death, conſidered. III. 926. a. b. 927. a. b. The Spinoziſts have no ſolid ground of conſolation againſt it. 928. b. A reſolution taken that the decrees of death ſhould not be executed till the tenth day after ſentence. 955. b. The doctrine of ſeveral Pagans concerning the characters of death. IV. 788. a. Reflexions upon ſudden death. V. 439. a. b. How the Pagans recommended themſelves to God, at the point of death. 628. b.

Debauchees raiſe people's contempt and horror, when they do not obſerve the rules of decency. IV. 232. a. b. They deſerve to have no countenance ſhewn them, but their books ought to be cried down. III. 136. a.

Debts: Princes do not always make a conſcience of paying their debts. II. 206. b.

Decalogue; its laws are impracticable in the ſtate that mankind is in. II. 65. b. The ſenſe of the ſeventh commandment perverted. 243. a.

Decameron of Boccace, facts concerning that book. II. 35. b. 36. a. b. The old tranſlator of it. 36. a.

Decamnichus conſpires againſt Archelaus, and for what reaſon. II. 869. a.

Deceive: Sometimes a man deceives people by declaring his true intentions to them. I. 129. a. b. Nothing is more eaſy than to deceive thoſe who never deceived others. 745. a. It is lawful to deceive children and ſick perſons. III. 319. a.

Decemvirate abrogated, and for what reaſon. I. 350.

Decency. The moſt diſſolute perſons are often religious obſervers of decency. IV. 407. a.

Dechales: his judgment of Peter Nonnius. IV. 382. b.

Decimator: a criticiſm on his faults touching the Preceptor of Achilles. I. 78. a. Statius is not in the leaſt favourable to him. 79. a. b.

Deciſive authors find themſelves ſometimes lead into a ſcrape. I. 76. b.

Decius was not denied entrance into the Church by St Babylas. I. 592. a. b. 593. a. b.

Decius (Philip), to what height the jealouſy of profeſſion between him and Mainus was carried. IV. 67. a.

Deckher, his miſtake touching the book intituled Brutum Fulmen. III. 521. a. And touching the writing of Optatus Gallus. IV. 100. b.

Deckher (Conrad), accuſed by Father Labbe of having confounded Radulphus Flaviacenſis with Ralph Higden. IV. 824. a.

Declaimers: their common fate. V. 798.

Declamatory Speeches that were made on imaginary ſubjects. II. 358. b.

Decorum: a decorum is always obſerved by the moſt profligate men when they can reap no advantage by offending againſt it. V. 160. a.

Decrees (Academical, Synodal, &c.) the manner in which they are extorted ſometimes. I. 137. b. 138. a. b. 715. b.

Decrees often contain honourable things, which, properly ſpeaking, are nothing but compliments. IV. 147. b. Were formerly ſtuffed with Greek and Latin. II. 105. b.

Decrees (the compilers of). The contempt and indignation which Mr de Mauſſac expreſſes againſt the modern compilers of Decrees or arrêts. II. 562. a.

Dedication; one that was rewarded with a penſion of three hundred crowns. I. 428.

Defects: ſome defects have given names to illuſtrious families. I. 610. a.

Deification (Poetical) of an illuſtrious lady. I. 398. a. b. All ſorts of languages were employed in it. 399. a.

Dejotarus conceals his true ſentiments from Cæſar. II. 625. b. A verſe which he applied to two pieces of news which he had received at the ſame time. 627. a. He refuſes to acknowledge that the ſcience of Auguries, to which he was extremely addicted, had deluded him. 629. a. Cicero's Reflexions upon that head. ibid. n. (43). The ingenious anſwer which that King made to Craſſus's raillery. 630. b. His Embaſſadors over-reached by Mark Antony. III. 116. b.

Deiſm, when it began firſt to be talked of. V. 482. b. 483. a. See Impious.

Deity: The moſt profligate wretches mentioned in Hiſtory have acknowledged a Deity. II. 257. b. A Deity which was ſo much the more reſpected by being unknown. 418. a. It requires a certain maniac force of mind to deny the exiſtence of a Deity. 450. b. 451. a. and 648. a. b. 649. a. There are two ſorts of unbelievers, with regard to the exiſtence or non-exiſtence of the Deity. 648. a. Why Lucan imagined that the Deity was better known in Greece and Italy than at Marſeilles. 678. a. The Pagans laid great weight upon tradition, when they were to prove the exiſtence of a Deity. 872. b. Whether a perſon that has loſt all ideas of this may not ſtill retain the ideas of virtue. III. 671. a. Some Heathens maintained the mortality of the deities of the ſecond rank. 349. a. Numa would not have the Deity to be repreſented by any images. IV. 675. a. The fear and love of the Deity are not the only ſpring of human actions. V. 811.

Delicacy. The ridiculous delicacy of Garaſſe, with regard to the word lavement. III. 136. b.

Delivered: a ridiculous cuſtom obſerved in ſeveral countries, with reſpect to women newly delivered. V. 346. and a. b. 347. a. b.

Delos, its inhabitants were the firſt that crammed hens. III. 6. a.

Delphians, what they did in order to deliver themſelves from the Peſtilence and Famine with which they were puniſhed for the death of Eſop. II. 831. a.

Delphos, its temple ſeized upon and pillaged. IV. 621, 622. The gold and ſilver taken out of it, when turned into current money, amounted to ten thouſand talents. 623. a. Its temple burnt by Phlegyas, and the puniſhment which Apollo inflicted upon him. 626.

Del-Rio confuted touching the Magic art of Agrippa. I. 152. a. b. 153. a.

Deluge; it is impoſſible to penetrate beyond it without the aſſiſtance of Moſes. II. 854. b. Mechlinius, diſciple of Albertus Magnus, maintains, that it was cauſed by the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn, &c. IV. 940. b. 941. a. b.

Deluge: the alarms that were occaſioned by the prediction of an univerſal deluge. V. 243. a. b. 244. a. b. A prophecy that it was to happen in the year 1524 cauſes a mighty conſternation. ibid.

Demades propoſes to the Athenians that Alexander ſhould be put in the number of the great gods. IV. 405. a.

Δημαγωγὸς, how that word ought to be tranſlated. II. 714. b.

Demagogues kept the Republic of Athens in a ſtate of true ſlavery. IV. 581. b.

Demeſn: there is not any more inalienable than that which is founded upon mechanical paſſions. II. 531. a.

Demetrius cenſures the Athenians for their want of courage. III. 714. a. His thought has been diſfigured by Athenæus's tranſlator. ibid. He demands 250 talents of the Athenians, to be laid out in buying ſoap for his courtezans. ibid. Was eaſily induced to new marriages. IV. 662. a.

Democritus, the judgment which the Abderites formed of him. I. 20. b. II. 638. a. He neglects his temporal concerns. 635. a. b. A ſtory that is told of his ſagacity. 636. a. b. Was thought worthy of divine honours on account of ſome of his predictions. 641. a. What we are to think of his opinion about nature, which he calls God. 642. b. Whether it be very different from the opinion of Father Mallebranche. ibid. Whether a man of mean parts is capable of forming ſuch an opinion. ibid. 643. a. His ſyſtem of Atoms is not by much ſo abſurd as Spinoziſm. 644. and a. How he defines the Venereal Act. ibid. a. b. He attributed all things to a neceſſitating deſtiny. 790. a. b. Seems to have aſſigned a ſoul to every atom. III. 790. b. 791. a. b.

Demonſtration (moral), the true nature of it. I. 707. a. b. &c.

Demonſtrative: why the brighteſt orations have been aſcribed to the demonſtrative kind. IV. 783. a.

Demoſthenes: the longer his orations were, the finer they were. I. 427. b. A witty ſaying of his to thoſe that were praiſing Philip as a great drinker. II. 598. a. He feigns a ſore throat npon a certain occaſion, that he might not be obliged to ſpeak. III. 355. b. His apoſtrophe to Minerva. IV. 582. b. He is told in jeſt that his orations ſmelt of oil. 678. b. Calliſtratus induced him to dedicate himſelf entirely to the ſtudy of Eloquence. I. 259. Some pretend that he was a diſciple of Plato. ibid.

Demoſthenes (Poliſh), Staniſlaus Orichovius was ſo called. IV. 411.

Dempſterus; there is no relying upon the authorities which he cites. IV. 542. a.

Denier Royal: a book wrote by Scipio de Grammont under that title. III. 210. What Naudé ſays of it. ibid. a. b.

Denis the Carthuſian anſwers Gerſon's Critical Diſſertation upon the ſpiritual marriage of Ruyſbroeck. IV. 942. Is not one of thoſe who turned into Latin the works of Ruyſbroeck. 943. b.

Denmark; what the power of the High-Steward was there. V. 500 a. b.

Denores abuſes the authors of Tragi-Comic Paſtorals very much. III. 259. a.

Derpt, its univerſity founded by Guſtavus Adolphus. V. 660.

Des-Adrets; the reaſon why he embraced the Proteſtant party. I. 712. b. 713. a. He imitates St Paul's Evangelical Salutation. ibid. b.

Des-Barreaux was a famous Libertine. II. 649. b. 650. a. b.

Des Cartes, his epitaph. I. 309. a. Accuſed of Atheiſm. 327. a. Has juſtice done him. ibid. His argument for the exiſtence of a God. 345. b. V. 495. b. 496. a. His followers have diſcovered a want of moderation. I. 472. b. From whom he borrowed ſome of his notions. II. 158. b. Des-Barreaux comes from Paris to Holland on purpoſe to ſee him. 647. a. His is praiſed in a Funeral Oration, by order of the firſt Magiſtrate of Utrecht. 766. b. His diſintereſtedneſs. III. 340. b. 341. a. b. The judgment he paſſes upon Aſtrology. 499. a. b. Who was his maſter in Optics. 659. b. 660. a. In what he has only revived the notions of other Philoſophers. 788. b. 789. a. Reflexion upon the doubting which he requires, in order to come at the certainty of truth. IV. 81. b. His modeſty truly Philoſophical. 267. a. b. His maxim touching the ſuſpenſion of our judgment ought not to be admitted in the affair of religion. 363. a. His notion of the manner in which the world might have been made. 437. b. His objections againſt a piece of Mr de Fermat. 485. a. Mr de Roberval anſwers theſe objections. ibid. Whether he may be looked upon as the inventer of the opinion which he had concerning the ſouls of beaſts. 546. and a. b. 547. a. b. &c. Whether the ſeeds of his doctrine about the Automata are to be found in the Antients. 551. b. to 554. a. b. He acknowledges that his maxim, God can neither deceive nor be deceived, admits of a great many exceptions. 875. and b. 876. and a. b. &c. His doctrine about the ſouls of beaſts rids us of a great many difficulties. 901. b. 902. a. b. &c. He is nevertheleſs deſerted in this point by ſeveral of his followers. 902. b.

Deſerters: their buſineſs is to pleaſe by agreeable lies. III. 719. b.

Deſerters of a ſect are generally not to be credited in what they ſay againſt it. II. 782. b.

Deſiderius (Archbiſhop of Vienna), ſharply reproved by St Gregory, and for what reaſon. III. 223. b. 224. a.

Deſires; one ought to confine them within narrow bounds. II. 200. a.

Deſlandes (the Abbot) has related an apocryphal ſtory concerning Charnace. II. 446. b. Touching Fernelius. ibid. III. 25. a.

Deſlyons (John), Dean and Theologal of Senlis, has publiſhed ſome treatiſes againſt the rejoicings of the twelfth-day. IV. 299.

Deſpauterius; ſome of his verſes taken for violent exorciſms. II. 147. a.

Deſpœne, a title of honour which the Greeks gave to the eaſtern Chriſtian Princeſſes. IV. 52. a. b.

Deſpreaux; his ſatires ſtand in need of a commentary already. I. 35. b. n. ‡. II. 600. b. His ſatire on the fair-ſex. I. 639. a. His rutting hind a falſe compariſon. 641. a. He has perfectly well tranſlated what Horace and Juvenal have ſaid of the war which men make with one another. 639. b. 640. a. What it is he puts among the moral impoſſibilities. II. 650. a. b. Cenſured by Des Marets on the ſubject of Alexander. IV. 9. a. b. One cannot come into his opinion touching the four verſes which he aſcribes to Nero. 596. b. An obſervation in his Art Poëtique examined. 744. a. b. He makes an excuſe for not celebrating the King's victories. V. 361. a. Has not contradicted himſelf with reſpect to Moliere. IV. 744. a. b.

Deſtiny. See Fate.

Devils. The Devil mimicks God in all his works. I. 5. a. Whether he makes uſe of a rod as one of his occaſional cauſes. ibid. In what caſe it would be better to harangue the Devils than men. 491. b. Two Devils examined. 698. b. 699. a. Several have been of opinion that the Devils could beget children. II. 113. b. 114. a. A compact entered into with the Devil. 243. a. b. The conqueſt which he obtained over the firſt woman was not a very glorious one. 852. b. It is aſtoniſhing that Chriſtian Judges ſhould admit the teſtimony of Devils as true, and reject the exceptions made againſt them. III. 213. a. The Devil oppoſes the truths which God declares to men. IV. 46. a. How he came to oppoſe the eſtabliſhment of Mahometiſm. ibid. b. Whether it can well be concluded from the exiſtence of Devils, that there is no God. 938. b. 939. a. The denying that the Devil has any power cannot be reconciled with the Scripture. 938. b. The great extent of his kingdom. V. 577. b. &c. How far the progreſs of his arms goes. 578. a. b. He reigns much more in the time of war than in the time of peace. ibid. Martin del Rio does not argue conſequentially upon certain extraordinary facts which he aſcribes to the Devils. 597. and a. b. The Devil incapable of Atheiſm, and the promoter of all the ſins of mankind. 813. The ſquabbles which the Devils had with Savonarola, of whom they were afraid. 72. b. A dramatical writer who often brings the Devils upon the ſtage. II. 478. a. b. The Devil ſuggeſts falſe gloſſes on the Scripture to Calvin, according to Hunnius. III. 538. b. 539. a. Diſcovers all his malice in Pareus's book. ibid. and b.

Devotees; thoſe who are fond of them, aſcribe many more things to them than they themſelves pretend to. V. 72. a.

Devotion; what is the moſt powerful motive to keep it up in the heart of man. II. 783. b. 784. a. There is nothing more dangerous to the mind, than too myſtical and too abſtracted devotions. IV. 87. b.

Devout. The jargon and myſtical phraſes of ſome devout women. IV. 926. a. b. &c. A devout life ſuitable even to the temporal intereſts of men. V. 754. b. 755. a.

Deuteroſes, or Jewiſh traditions, by whom compiled. I. 173. b. The obſervance of them reaches even to the cloſe-ſtool. 174. a. b.

Dexippus, his love for his native-country. IV. 175. b.

Dhona, an illuſtrious houſe. V. 194. a.

Diabolus Sacramentarius: the title of a book compoſed by the Lutheran John Schutzius. V. 89.

Diacettin conſpires againſt Cardinal Julian de Medicis. IV. 11. b.

Diagoras (the Rhodian) a famous Athlet. I. 762. b. A compliment which a Lacedemonian made to him, differently related by Cicero and Plutarch. II. 651. a. b. He was the ſon of Mercury. 652. a.

Diagoras, ſirnamed the Atheiſt, what it was that hurried him into his impiety. II. 652. a. b. He publiſhes the motives of his apoſtacy. 654. a. Was really an Atheſt. 656. b.

Diallacticon, a book writ by John Poinet upon the ſubject of the Euchariſt. IV. 692. Printed together with Bertran's treatiſe de Corpore & Sanguine Chriſti. ibid. b. And with the book of the Phyſician Harchius. 693. b. n. (15). And inſerted in the firſt volume of Beza's Opuſcula. ibid. a. Tranſlated into French, and aſcribed to Antony Cooke. ibid. The Doctrine of it explained by Andrew Rivet, and John Couſin. ibid.

Dialogue; the rules of it. II. 809. b. 810. a. The title of a very pleaſant dialogue, againſt thoſe writers who love to make uſe of obſolete phraſes. I. 69. b. 70. a.

Diamond; one ſold at a very low price. II. 219. b.

Diana had not a Virgin-ſacrifice, in the perſon of Iphigenia. I. 84. a. An admirable ſtatue of that goddeſs. II. 203. Several Pagan cities boaſted that they had the true ſtatue of Diana. 530. a. b. 531. a. In what place her prieſteſſes boaſted of being able to walk on burning coals without hurt. ibid. a. An Hiſtorian's reflexion on the way how ſhe came to let her temple at Epheſus be burnt. III. 59. a. b. IV. 405. b. V. 360. a. Where and when it was that they ſung the hymns, which Damophila had compoſed to the honour of that goddeſs. IV. 554.

Diana of Poitiers: facts that concern her. IV. 160. a. b. 161. a.

Dias (John) in what manner he was maſſacred by his brother. II. 697. a. b.

Dicæarchus oppoſed the immortality of the ſoul. II. 657. b. A reaſoning againſt his ſyſtem. 658. a. b. The objections to that reaſoning conſidered. 660. b. 661. a. b. &c.

Dictator; who was the firſt Roman that died in that office. III. 490.

Dictionary; what an hard matter it is to compoſe a Dictionary of Authors. I. 547. b.

Dictionaries, nothing ſhould be ſuppreſſed in them. I. 80. b. Advice to thoſe who make Supplements to them. 86. b. It is a great misfortune when people that compoſe them, have not all the neceſſary books. 331. b. An unpardonable omiſſion cenſured. 398. a. The Italian Dictionary of the Academy della Cruſca meets with almoſt as many Critics as Readers. 748. a. Hiſtorical Dictionaries do not ſufficiently clear the chaos of facts, which they relate. 768. b. It is the fate of Dictionaries to improve by being often printed. II. 279. a. Dictionary of the Bible; a remark on one of its articles. 615. b. 616. a. b. The author of this Dictionary thought himſelf obliged to pleaſe ſometimes one ſort of people, and ſometimes another. III. 173. b. Why he gives ſometimes a greater extent to his remarks than the text requires. 871. b. The author of a Dictionary is ſometimes tranſcribed by perſons who know more than himſelf. IV. 496. b. A general obſervation againſt thoſe who cenſure this one. 744. b. 745. a. Of all writers, thoſe of Dictionaries ought leaſt to be over ſcrupulous. V. 133. b. The nouns adjectives of inhabitants ſhould be inſerted in Geographical Dictionaries. 235. The reader ought not to be ſurprized, when the author ſometimes make it appear in this Dictionary, that with reſpect to the moſt myſterious evangelical ſubjects, reaſon puts us to a ſtand. 615. a. If the gentlemen of the French Academy, would give us an univerſal Dictionary of all arts, they would engage in an endleſs work. 753. a. The writers of them take more pains to compile new things, than to mend the faults of their predeceſſors. 767. The nature of this Dictionary. 810. 854. Complaints made againſt ſome parts of it, and the authors conduct thereupon. 811. Had no right to repreſent people, otherwiſe than they actually were. 812. Remarks on a pamphlet intituled, The Judgment of the Public, and particularly of the Abbot Renaudot, Renaudot, on Mr Bayle's Critical Dictionary. 797. to 809. How that libel ſhould have been intituled, and its character. 797. The idea which the author had formed of his Dictionary. 800. &c. It is not true that the Chancellor of France burnt it in his houſe, or that he cauſed it to be burnt by the hand of the hangman. 806. Advertiſement concerning the reprinting of part of this Dictionary. 808. Proceedings of the Walloon Conſiſtory of Rotterdam againſt it. I. lxxix, lxxx, lxxxi. How that of the French academy was received. V. 809.

Dictionary of French rhimes; who the author of that book is. I. 65. b. 66. a.

Didius (Julianus) Emperor, cauſed all thoſe to be burnt who conſulted the Diviners, upon the Emperor's fortune. III. 955. a.

Dido no ſooner ſaw Æneas, but ſhe forgot all her fine reſolutions. III. 189. a. An application of that. ibid. Was otherwiſe called Eliza. IV. 642. She was married to Sicharbas. ibid. Retires to Carthage. ibid.

Die: it is a miſerable thing not to have it in our power to die when we earneſtly long for it. III. 319. and a. b. A young lady who died jeſting. 835. b.

Dying. Whether the oaths of dying perſons ought to be taken for proofs. II. 55. b. They are often made to ſay things which they never ſaid. III. 289. a. The Pagans applied their mouths to that of dying perſons. IV. 135. b.

Dieppe; the precaution of Lewis XIV, was of no uſe to the inhabitants of that city. II. 31. b.

Dieu (Lewis de) in what manner he excuſed himſelf to Prince Maurice. II. 663. a.

Difficulties; it is only ſhallow wits that find difficulties no where. IV. 690. b.

Digby (Sir Kenelm) praiſed by Anglus. I. 339. a.

Dignities; when an honeſt man ought to refuſe them. I. 540. a. People deſpiſe thoſe who ſhew an indifferency about them, and admire thoſe who court them. II. 201. a.

Digreſſions. Effects of the ſpirit of digreſſion. III. 373. b. They are a fault of which a very good uſe may be made. IV. 619. b. 620. a. People are not always reaſonable in the cenſure which they paſs upon them. V. 329. b. 330. a.

Dijon; a miracle which is told of a Senator of that city. III. 386. b.

Dilemma againſt marriage, who is the author of it. II. 13. b. 14. a.

Dina, a Daniſh woman, convicted of ſlander, and as ſuch condemned to loſe her head. V. 501. a.

Dinant; that town treated with the utmoſt rigour. II. 216. a. b.

Diocles; his ſurprize the firſt time he ſaw Epicurus in a temple. II. 784. a.

Diocleſian uſed to ſay that there is nothing more difficult than to reign well. I. 573. b.

Diodorus Siculus; what he ſays of the faults of Hiſtorians. V. 358. a. 359. b. What Pliny ſays of him. II. 82. a.

Diodorus the Sophiſt, a witty anſwer which Herophilus the Phyſician made to him. V. 618. b. 619. a.

Diogenes Laërtius generally did not know what he ſaid, when he abridged the opinions of the Philoſophers. I. 298. b. Although an Epicurean, he does not blame the peccavi of Bion. II. 13. b. Was not acquainted with all the ſtratagems of authors. 643. b.

Diogenes of Apollonia; his doctrine touching the firſt cauſe. II. 672. a. b. His ſyſtem hardly differed at all from Spinoziſm. ibid. b. How he philoſophized upon the production of the world. ibid. &c.

Diogenes the Cynic; his anſwer to Antiſthenes, when he took a cudgel to turn him out. II. 665. a. And to Alexander. 667. b. 668. a. His eloquence. 669. a. b. He ſtood up in defence of the moſt abominable impurities. 669. b. III. 458. b. 459. a. b. Whether he was an Atheiſt. II. 670. and a. b. 671. a. He is taken by a Pirate, and draws an argument againſt providence from his ſlavery. III. 357. a. b. What muſt have been his ſentiments touching the ſouls of beaſts. IV. 547. a. b. He was not ſo far from Platoniſm, as it is commonly thought. ibid. b. Laboured to make himſelf inſenſible. ibid. Whether he made a good anſwer to the Philoſopher who denied motion. V. 617. b. 618. a.

Diogenes the Stoic ſent to Rome. II. 675. b. Preaches by example upon patience. 674. a.

Diomedes; the explication of the fable which makes him to have fed his mares with the fleſh of his gueſts. III. 712. b.

Dion; a wrong obſervation which he makes upon Hadrian's omitting the common preamble in his letter to the Senate. I. 649. b. Dion and Tacitus do not agree upon the reaſon, which induced Auguſtus to make a law againſt defamatory libels. II. 356. a. Dion ſpeaks either as a bad Geographer, or as a bad Hiſtorian, touching the journey of Tiberius, towards Druſus. 716. b. He aſcribes to Cicero a ſpeech which he himſelf had forged. III. 114. b. He falſifies two things there, which ought to make us ſuſpect his veracity in many others. ibid. An idle ſtory which Guevara falſely warrants by his authority. II. 399. b. 400. a.

Dionyſius the tyrant, how he expreſſed himſelf when he had a mind to ſay that a tyrant ought never to renounce his tyranny. IV. 564. b.

Dionyſius Halicarnaſſenſis; his good taſte with reſpect to narratives. II. 635. b. What he relates touching the religion which Romulus eſtabliſhed. III. 914. b. 915. a. b.

Dionyſius falſely believed to be the Areopagite. II. 678. b.

Dionyſius the Areopagite; who was called the ſecond. IV. 942.

Dioſcorides: it is believed that Fauſtus da Lo[illegible] had tranſlated him into Italian, before Ma[illegible] publiſhed a like verſion. III. 861.

Directors of conſciences are pretty often co[illegible] ſeldom obeyed by the Chriſtians. II. 41[illegible] a. [illegible] ſeldom weary of the company of devout w[illegible]. IV. 827. b. Have a great deal of buſineſs on their hands. V. 525. b.

Diſagreement between Joſephus and Tacitus, in the main circumſtances of matters, that were near their time. I. 512. b.

Diſcipline; the terrible effects of that inſtrument. II. 700. a.

Diſcipline (Eccleſiaſtical) fallen into a very great relaxation. I. 223. a.

Diſcipline (Military) of a very ſtrict and ſevere kind. I. 570. a. b.

Diſcover: not to diſcover a plot againſt the Government: a crime of itſelf capital. IV. 346. a. b.

Diſcourſe: perſons who find it much eaſier to diſcourſe well off-hand, than to write a good book. II. 566. a. b. IV. 251. b.

Diſcourſes: the ill effects of ſuch diſcourſes as are too free. III. 966. a.

Diſcuſſions (Philoſophical) one ſhould conſult in them the ideas of order. V. 827.

D'Iſe, or rather d'Yſe, Miniſter. III. 594. His diſputes with Cregut. 596. a. b. &c.

Diſeaſe (Pedicular) the Philoſopher Pherecydes died of it. I. 211. b.

Diſgrace. It is policy to pay one's court, even when they are in diſgrace, to thoſe whom we ſee in the road to high preferment. I. 422. a. The diſgrace of cuckoldom and death have the ſame commonplace of conſolation. 669. b. 700. a. Men endeavour to comfort themſelves in their diſgraces, by leſſening the glory of the enemy, who has beat them. V. 659.

Diſpenſation of marriage; abſtracts of the reſult of a congregation held at Rome for that purpoſe. IV. 633. a. b.

Diſputation, what the laws of it require. IV. 934. a.

Diſpute: what was the Diſpute between Cain and Abel, according to the Targum of Jeruſalem. I. 23. b. The effects of heat in a Diſpute. 90. a. 309. b. Men who engage in Diſputes, are commonly ſtronger in the offenſive, than in the defenſive. 598. a. Among all the Philoſophical exerciſes, there is none where moderation is more neceſſary than in this. II. 847. a. We loſe ſight of truth by too much diſputing. 848. b. and n. (33). A Diſpute between two Divines, which laſted ſeventeen years. III. 972. a. There is not a more commodious way of coming off in a Diſpute than a witty jeſt. IV. 713. a. b. The ill effects of Diſputes. V. 229. a. b. In what the ſcandal of Diſputes ſhould be made at preſent to conſiſt. I. 244. b.

Their fate is ſuch that one is ſcarce ever at full liberty to make uſe of maxims that are purely univerſal. 494. a. It is a great misfortune for ſome perſons to engage in perſonal Diſputes. One would think that their evil genius brings them to thoſe unlucky circumſtances. II. 584. b. Whence it comes that thoſe about univerſal grace, are not conſidered now as Diſputes of importance. ibid. The misfortune in Diſputes of religion is, that the ſame perſons are judges and parties. IV. 231. a. See Controverſies. What a number of them would ceaſe, would but the diſputants underſtand one another. 347. a. The humour of diſputing, is what ſeems the leaſt approved in the œconomy of the Goſpel. V. 816. A diſreliſh for Diſputes, and the love of eaſe induce Thomas Grynæus to retire from his employ. III. 256. When a perſon mentions the Diſputes of authors, he ſhould not forget to take notice of what firſt occaſioned them. V. 352. b. Thoſe between Calvin and Bolſec, ſcandalize James of Burgundy, who falls off from the doctrine of the Reformed. II. 215. a. The odious conſequences which they force one to draw. III. 504. b. 505. a. b.

Diſpute (Philoſophical) the deſign of one. V. 816.

Diſtempers: the mind is ſubject to Epidemical Diſtempers as well as the body. I. 19. a. III. 948. b. Whether they made part of the primitive ſcheme [illegible] providence. II. 496. b. 497. a. Phyſicians for- [illegible] made them depend much upon the influence [illegible] ſtars. III. 620, 621, and a. b. Feigned Di- [illegible] have been the means of preſerving the [illegible] of ſome people. IV. 767. b.

Di[illegible]o; the meaning of that word when it is taken for a diſtemper. I. 619. a.

Diſtruſt is often neceſſary. I. 71. b.

Dyteutas; a very generous action which he performed. II. 532. b.

Diverſions (public) are ſchools of leudneſs. III. 261. a.

Divination; how Cratippus reaſoned upon that ſubject. II. 565. b. 566. a.

Diviners are generally ramblers. I. 6. a. The difference between thoſe who foretel things after the manner of an Oracle, and other Diviners. 276. b. A Diviner who performs greater ſervices to a Prince than any of his Generals. 447. a. Is happy when he ſerves a Prince whom providence deſigns for great purpoſes. ibid. b. It is not to be wondered at, if they ſhould boaſt of being maſters of the ſcience of dreams. 520. b. How vain their anſwers are. 542. a. b. In antient times an army never marched without having ſome Diviner to go along with them. II. 251. A falſe argument which is alledged to prove that they certainly foretold future things. IV. 182. b. The ſad fate of ſome Diviners. 254. a.

Divines, a judgment that was paſſed upon their debates. I. 242. b. 243. a. Their diſputes occaſion a great many miſchiefs. 261. a. b. Their anſwers cannot always be ſo ſtrong as the objections of a Philoſopher. II. 455. b. 456. a. b. Their Controverſies have always very much embarraſſed the Princes and Magiſtrates. III. 504. a. b. 505. a. b. In an aſſembly where a re-union is treated of, they ſhould be reduced to the bare plain function of Advocates. 526. b. They will always be worſted in a diſpute wherein people ſhall only have recourſe to the light of nature. V. 815. Maxims of the modern Divines concerning myſteries. 817.

Divines (Polemic) apt to contradict themſelves. I. 352. a.

Divines: Court-Divines concern themſelves too much with Political affairs. V. 103. b.

Divinity and Philoſophy are two faculties, which cannot well agree about their juſt boundaries. I. 472. b. Human ſciences are the handmaids of Divinity. II. 698. Zealots would have a man to be more determinate and reſolute than Bartolus in matters of Divinity. 706. a. Whether a thing that is true in Divinity can be falſe in Philoſophy. III. 479. a. 951. a. b. 952. a. b. 953. a. 970. a. b. See Theology.

Divinity (Myſtical) a ſpecimen of that doctrine. V. 302. a. b. IV. 926. a. b. 927. a. b. Ruyſbroeck paſſed for one of the greateſt maſters in that ſcience. 942. and a. b.

Divinities. The Pagans imagined that there were Divinities jealous of the proſperities of mankind. II. 289. a. An heroic prayer on that head. ibid. and b. See God, Gods, and Deity.

Diviſibility in infinitum would hinder all manner of contiguity. V. 611. b. & ſeq. Several difficulties againſt the Geometrical proofs of a diviſibility in infinitum. 612. a. b. 613. a. It would ſuppoſe the penetration of dimenſions. 611. b. 612. a.

Diviſion; there are ſome caſes wherein ſocieties are not deſtroyed by it. IV. 271. a. b.

Divorce; whether it be true that all the antient and modern Divines are agreed about that matter. IV. 217. b. 218. a.

Divorce (ſatirical), a book wrote by the Sieur d'Aubigné, quoted. IV. 334. a. b. 340. a.

Doctors would often be taken for great Comedians, if it were lawful for one to judge of the thoughts of others. I. 564. b. It is happy for ſome of them that the people never trouble themſelves to demand of them any account of their doctrine. ibid. Some of them may be compared to thoſe Engliſh maſtiffs which Father Maimbourg ſpeaks of in one of his ſermons. 773. b. IV. 64. a. b. Do not deſerve to be blamed if their minds are not always bent in converſation. II. 566. a. IV. 251. b. Doctors in Law; when, where, and upon what occaſion, the cuſtom of creating them was introduced into the univerſities. III. 594. Paſſionate Doctors, what revenge their adverſaries take of them. 542. a. b. It is very rare to find among them a perſon that is altogether exempt from avarice and ambition. 737. b. Many Doctors forced to renounce a theſis, in which they maintained that Ego amat was as good a phraſe as Ego amo. IV. 837. b. 838. a.

Doctors (Eccleſiaſtical), whether they have any reaſon to ſtand in fear of the capacities of the people. I. 565. a.

Doctors Degree: Laurens is obliged to paſs through all his exerciſes again, in order to take his Doctor's Degree a ſecond time. III. 745. a.

Doctrine. There are a great many authors who can diſcover the weak ſide of a doctrine to admiration, but never where the force of it lies. I. 506. b. There is hardly a better way of attacking a doctrine, than by turning it into ridicule. V. 20. a. 481. b. Thoſe who are over-fond of particular doctrines, conſider all thoſe who oppoſe them as falſe brethren. I. 739. b. Doctrines very oppoſite to the true faith. II. 156. a. What a perſon muſt know in order to judge of the nature of a doctrine. V. 231. b.

Dogmatiſts; the ordinary and inevitable rock which they ſplit upon. I. 410. a. Did not propoſe the arguments of both parties with the ſame force. II. 487. b. Have too much preſumption to be good Chriſtians. IV. 655. b.

Dogs. Whether Agrippa's dog was not a natural one. I. 150. b. 151. a. A thought of Cicero concerning the dogs of the Capitol. 773. b. III. 372. a. b. IV. 74. b. Never enter into the churches or moſques of Miſitra. III. 430. b. 431. a. Good dogs bark againſt all ſtrangers, though they may be the greateſt friends of their maſter's houſe. IV. 74. b. A ſermon upon the different kinds of dogs. 64. a. b.

Dog-ſtar; its raging heat abated by Ariſteus. I. 456. b. 457. a.

Dolabella, why thwarted by M. Antony. III. 115. a. His manners, his conduct, and the troubles of which he was the cauſe. V. 406. b. He nevertheleſs performs a fine action for which he is highly praiſed. 408. a. b.

Dolet (Stephen) his Epiſtle to Marot, and his Annotations on that Poet's Hell. IV. 163. a. The friendſhip between theſe two men. ibid. b.

Domeſtic Affairs; a rule which every body ought to obſerve in the management of them. I. 241. b. 242. a. Thoſe who have the moſt intereſt in knowing how they proceed, are the laſt who receive notice of it. 28. III. 382. a.

Domeſtics; one ought to take pains to marry them. III. 193. a. How Cato the Cenſor regulated his domeſtics. IV. 753. b. 754. a.

Domine non ſum dignus, &c. The words of the Centurion, with which a Spaniſh Embaſſador received a viſit of James I, King of England. I. 725. a.

Dominic (St), according to Mayer, had the knowledge of the Philoſophers ſtone. I. 182. a. Whether or not he gave blows with a ſpit to Francis of Aſſiſi. III. 82. b. A Nun in an extacy ſees him come into her chamber, and bring an ointment wherewith he rubbed her leg. IV. 137. a. b.

Dominicans are ever at war with the Franciſcans. II. 239. a. The earneſtneſs of their Generals to get the Pugio Fidei publiſhed. IV. 167. b. Their diſſenſions. 199. a. b. See Jacobins.

Dominion; two things neceſſary to acquire and keep it. II. 421. b.

Dominis (Marcus Antonius de), Joſeph Hall writes a letter to him repreſenting the neceſſity of remaining ſeparate from the communion of the Church of Rome. III. 344.

Domitian returns the dignity of Empreſs to a woman who had proſtituted herſelf to a Player. II. 685. a. Employed others to compoſe his letters, ſpeeches, and edicts. III. 317. a. What is told of Apollonius Tyanæus, with reſpect to the perſon who aſſaſſinated Domitian. V. 731, 732. A decree of the Senate againſt his memory. IV. 729. b.

Domna; what that name was. III. 606. b.

Donatiſts; their error about Baptiſm condemned in a general council. III. 742. b.

Doricus, ſon to Diagoras, the hiſtory of him. II. 651. b.

Dorotheus; whether there was at Tyre a Biſhop of that name who ſuffered martyrdom. II. 752. a. b.

Dort; its Synod would not admit the Remonſtrants as members, but only as perſons cited before them. II. 793. IV. 75. a. b. V. 510. a. b. 511. a. 513. b. 514. a. b.

Dortmund; facts which relate to the eſtabliſhment of Lutheraniſm in that city. II. 121. a. b.

Doukan (the Sieur Count de), Conſtable of Scotland; is defeated and taken priſoner by the Sieur de Chaſtelux. II. 461. a.

Douza (George), affectionately received by Simon Simonides. V. 149. and a. b. 150. a. b.

Dowry. To receive a great dowry is to loſe one's liberty. II. 206. a.

Drabicius; ſome people expected that he was to baptize the grand Turk. II. 693. a. Whether the name of Drabicius was unknown in France, in the year 1690. III. 679. a. He ſays nothing of Tekeley. 680. a. His tragical end. 681. a.

Draco wrote his laws in blood; the meaning of that expreſſion. III. 969. a.

Dragooning will eternally be abhorred by honeſt men, whatever country or religion they be of. IV. 535.

Dreams. Cicero ridicules the interpreters of dreams. I. 448. a. Very judicious reaſonings upon that ſubject. 510. a. b. The vanity of them. 520. a. b. Are ways of inſtructing not at all worthy of thoſe intelligences to whom we impute them. ibid. a. Divers authors who have written on the interpretation of dreams. ibib. b. 521. a. Remarks upon a dream. III. 877. b. 878. a. b. 879. a. b. How much they employ the mind ſometimes. IV. 63. b. A reflexion on the truth or falſhood that may be contained in dreams, and whether they are ſent to advertiſe us of future things. 72. a. b. 73. a. b. 74. a. b. There are dreams which confound unbelievers more than they are willing to own. 78. a. b. The dream of a woman produces ſtrange confuſion through a whole kingdom. 456. a. A Philoſophical dream. V. 242. b. 243. a. b.

Drelincourt (Charles), Miniſter, the anſwer which he made to a Biſhop. I. 505. b. Preached ſeven times in one day. II. 695. b. Defends the Proteſtant Ritual by the ſentiments of a famous Franciſcan. III. 43. a. Anſwers a complaint of the Clergy of France. IV. 479. and a. b. His reproachful words to the Biſhop of Belley. 650. a. An extract from his anſwer to Prince Erneſt, Landgrave of Heſſe. 826. b. 827. a. Quoted. III. 267. a. b. IV. 356. b.

Drelincourt, Profeſſor of Phyſic, his Elogium. I. 74. The information which he gave the author, touching one of the Akakia's. 172. a. b. His character. 335. a. II. 140. b. 694. b. 695. a. 696. IV. 497. n. (c). 505. a. n. (76). V. 504. and a. b. & paſſim alibi.

Dreſs: women forbid all ſuperfluity of dreſs. II. 98. a. b. 99. a. b.

Drielenburch (Vincent) ſets up for a prophet. I. 654. a.

Drink. Their way of drinking at Lacedæmon. II. 574. b.

Drinker. What Demoſthenes ſaid to thoſe who praiſed Philip, King of Macedonia, as a great drinker. II. 598. a. Hard drinkers were eſteemed among the Perſians. ibid.

Drunkenneſs: the horrible prevalency of that vice in the univerſity of Franeker. I. 247. a. b. Who put a ſtop to it. ibid. a. More deteſted than fornication. II. 823. b. A freſh proof that it becomes faſhionable among women. V. 540. a.

Druſians; a ſmall part of the hiſtory of that people. III. 3, 4.

Druſilla, daughter of Agrippa, whether ſhe renounced the Jewiſh religion. II. 701. a.

Druſilla (Julia), her inceſt with her brother Caligula. II. 702. a. b. Impieties committed after her death to honour her memory. 703. a. b.

Druſius, the judgment which Father Simon paſſes upon him. II. 704. a. b. Accuſed of not being a ſincere Proteſtant; and what anſwer he made to this charge. 705. b. 706. a. b. His only daughter is reduced to great miſery. 707. b. 708. a. He is taken for the author of a letter of Broughton's, by Roſweide and Colomiés. 150. b.

Druſus (Marcus Livius), the fine anſwer which he made to an Architect. II. 713. and 714. a. b.

Druſus, brother to Tiberius; it is ſaid that he preſerved his conjugal fidelity. I. 357. b. His elogy. II. 714. b. 715. a. b. 717. a. b.

Druſus, ſon to Tiberius, his friendſhip for Germanicus. II. 719. a. b.

Druſus, the ſon of Germanicus and Agrippina; a report ſpread that he had eſcaped out of priſon. II. 721. a. b.

Dualiſts, Magi who admit of two co-eternal principles. V. 636. a. b.

Duaren was reported to have been a Proteſtant. II. 722. Gives a reaſon why he perceived the paſſion, which he had for going over to the Proteſtants, diminiſh. 726. b. Cited. III. 768. b.

Dubravius; what he tells us of the modes which a King of Bohemia brought from France. III. 969. a.

Ducherius (Gilbertus) his epigram againſt Julius II. III. 610. a. b.

Duel; the effects of a ſermon againſt that way of fighting. III. 18. a. A book upon the true and antient uſage of duels. I. 547. a. b.

Dueliſts, what reaſon induces them to right themſelves. IV. 887. a. b.

Duncan; particulars concerning that family. II. 408. a. 411. a. b. n. *.

Du-Pleix (Scipio), ſee Pleix.

Du Prat, the prudent advice which he gave to the Count of Angouleſme. III. 88. a.

Duræus not being able to unite the Reformed and Lutherans, undertakes to re-unite all the ſects of Chriſtians. II. 731. b. His conference with Ferri and Ancillon. III. 34. a. b. He becomes a ſort of viſionary. ibid. b. 35. a. Mr Amyraut's miſtake touching the time of his death. 34. a. b. The Oxford catalogue confounds him with a Jeſuit. II. 731. b. A great pacificator, publiſhes ſeveral pieces. III. 343. b. 344. a.

Durel; his book in defence of Epiſcopacy, and the anſwer which was made to it. II. 313. a.

Duret, Phyſician; playing on the equivocal meaning Saigneur (Bleeder) uſed to ſay that he was a very little Seigneur (Lord). II. 99. a.

Duronius, while he was tribune of the people, repealed a law, reſtraining the immoderate expences of feaſts. I. 351.

Durazzo; a hiſtory of the Princes of that name. IV. 305. a. b. 306. a. b.

Durazzo (Charles of) put to death, and for what reaſon. IV. 305. a.

Durazzo (Lewis of) impriſoned and poiſoned in the caſtle dell' Ovo. IV. 306. a.

Durazzo (Robert of), Prince of the Morea, comes into France, where he is killed fighting. IV. 306. b.

Duty (Conjugal), rules touching that duty. I. 504. a. b. III. 80. b. 81. a. b. What the Cynics taught upon that head. II. 669. b. 670. a. III. 458. b. 459. a. b.

E.

EArs; a catalogue of perſons who had the faculty of moving them. III. 429. b.

Earth. Ariſtarchus was one of the firſt who maintained that the earth turned round upon its center. I. 449. a. b. Whether it be animated. III. 659. a. b. Whether its bowels are divided like the air into three regions. IV. 258. a.

Earth: a kind of Earth which had great virtues. III. 751. b. 752. a. b.

Earthquakes; ſacrifices which the Romans offered up on thoſe occaſions. V. 185. b.

Eaſe. There is a real and an apparent Eaſe in writing. III. 261. b. &c. IV. 85. a. b. 86. a.

Eaſtern people, a ſmall ſpecimen of their legends. I. 49. They are extravagant in their commendations. 51. The reaſon of it. ibid. It was their cuſtom to conſecrate golden figures, which repreſented thoſe parts of the body in which they had ſuffered any inconvenience. 116. b. They uſed to ſay that thoſe who recovered from a great fit of ſickneſs, or eſcaped any imminent danger, were raiſed again out of the grave. ibid. They turned their faces towards one particular point of the Heavens when they prayed. IV. 176. a. Conſiderations upon their religion. 939. a. b.

Eat. To die of exceſſive eating, is ſcandalous in any one, much more in men of letters. I. 443. a. It is a folly for people to adore what they eat. 556. b. Renaud de Beaune could eat a vaſt deal without being thereby made heavy or drowzy. V. 35. b.

Eaters. We have I know not what natural averſion for great Eaters. II. 598. a.

Eberard, a pretended Prince of Weſtphalia; what is told of him. III. 166. b. 167. a. b.

Eburones; what people we are to underſtand by that. IV. 834. a.

Eccleſia (Auguſtin ab) writes the Hiſtory of the Biſhops of Piedmont. IV. 772. a. Another book of his intituled, Corona Regia Sabaudica. ibid.

Eccleſiaſtics; their irregular lives turned to advantage by the ſovereigns. I. 30. b. 31. a. Love to change their poſts. 56. a. Thoſe of the XVIth century exerciſed their tyranny over the minds and conſciences of men. 149. b. Are much to be dreaded, when they turn Accuſers. 468. a. It is happy for them that the people under their direction have no great capacity. 564. b. Some Eccleſiaſtics who have writ love-verſes. 630. b. Of what conſequence it is to keep a cloſe rein on them. II. 95. a. b. 96. a. The ſame ſpirit which has procured them ſo much wealth and honour, prevailed alſo under the Pagan religion. 531. a. The rigour of the antient Canons with reſpect to them. III. 221. a. b. They praiſe all thoſe who are liberal to the Church. 223. a. Many of them chuſe rather to be excommunicated by the Pope, than to part with their wives. 229. a. Thoſe of the northern countries ſubmit to the law of Celibacy, more unwillingly than thoſe of the ſouthern. ibid. Thoſe who cannot bear the yoke of Celibacy are innumerable. 235. a. Their vices incurable. 329. a. b. Who it was that introduced the cuſtom of depoſing ſuch as lay with their wives after their ordination. 378. They ſhould not be ſuffered to keep young ſervant maids, when they are not married. 736. b. It is dangerous to attack them. V. 434. b. 435. a. For what ſum they obtained abſolution from Fornication, Sodomy, Beſtiality. I. 628. a. b. See Clergy. The artifices which they make uſe to excite a liberal piety. 738. b. 739. a. b. Thoſe who formerly abſtained from Adultery and Fornication, were looked upon as Eunuchs or Sodomites. III. 345. a.

Eckius; his Obeliſks againſt Luther's theſis on Indulgences, publiſhed by Luther himſelf. IV. 772. b.

Eclipſes; who was the firſt among the Greeks, that could foretel the time of them. III. 462. a. An eclipſe of the ſun which happened during our Saviour's paſſion. IV. 624. b. 625. a. b. An eclipſe of the moon occaſions the ruin of a fleet to the Athenians. 566. a. b.

Edeſſa (Joſſelin de Courtenay, Count of) dies in irons at Aleppo. IV. 383.

Edinburgh. When the caſtle of Edinburgh was built. III. 783, 784.

Edict: what the Edict of January 1562 was, and in what ſituation the affairs of the Romiſh religion were then. III. 507. b. &c. The parliament of Paris refuſes to regiſter it. 509. b. 513. a. Edict of July 1561, its reſtrictions. 507. b. n. (28). Edict of Nantes, by whom drawn up. II. 433. and b.

Edicts frequently contain honourable things which muſt not be taken in a literal ſenſe. IV. 147. b.

Editions: what Mr Loyſel uſed to ſay of firſt editions. I. 318. b. The indolence of thoſe who wait for the ſecond. 319. a. b. There is no edition which ſome advantage may not be reaped from. ibid. b. There are authors who beſtow more pains upon the ſecond edition than they did upon the firſt. III. 837. b. Francis I, praiſed for having encouraged the printing of excellent editions. 97. b. The taſte of preferring the moſt ample ones, has always prevailed. IV. 544. b. 545. a. b. There are perſons who dare to falſify ſecond editions, even in the author's life-time. 711. b.

Education ſinks under the weight of nature. I. 80. a.

Edward (Saint) his ſimplicity contributed much to his obtaining a place in the Kalender. II. 707. a. He undergoes the penance of being ſcourged, and for what reaſon. ibid. and b.

Edward I, King of England makes an irruption into Scotland. III. 332. a.

Edward III, King of England, offended at an inſcription that was put upon Windſor caſtle. V. 559. a. b. His miſtreſs could do every thing with him, and her power ended only with the life of that Prince. 556. a. b.

Edward VI, his death occaſioned great joy at Rome; but the reaſons of that joy ceaſed in a little time. III. 617. b. 618. a. The Court of Rome offended at the title of King being given to him. 621.

Effigy: ſome perſons have ſaid that they had never been ſo cold as they were that day on which their effigy was burnt. II. 85. b.

Egg, according to the doctrine of the Antients, ſerved for the generation of things. I. 101. a. 444. a. b. Compared with the words of Moſes in his account of the creation. ibid. a. Another Egg, which, hatched by a dove, produced Venus, or Love. ibid. The myſterious meaning, which Dr Burnet finds in it. ibid. and b.

Egypt, prieſts in the nature of Deans or Superiors there were called prophets. I. 347. a. Who built the moſt celebrated pyramid in Egypt. III. 57. b. When and upon what occaſion people of a different language came firſt to ſettle in that country. IV. 790. Which of their Kings drank wine firſt. ibid.

Egypt (the going out of) a Tragedy; who is the author of it. II. 880. and b.

Egyptians deſpiſe Ageſilaus. I. 129. a. 130. a.

Egnatius (Baptiſt) what anſwer he gave to the criticiſm which Robortellus had writ upon his works. III. 464. b.

Ehud: every Proteſtant has received an order like unto that which he received. II. 123. a.

Εἴδωλα; what Epicurus underſtood by that term. II. 388. a. And how it was interpreted by the Schoolmen. ibid.

Electus; that word taken for a proper name, and for a title by Florimond de Remond and by Bodin. IV. 106. a. b.

Elegy. An Elegy compoſed in honour of thoſe who had loſt their lives at the battle of Marathon. II. 825. b.

Elements: whether the war of the Elements ceaſed after the chaos was diſentangled IV. 438. b. 439. a. b. 440. a.

Eleanora (Heireſs of Guienne) is divorced from the King of France, and married to the King of England. III. 794. a. b. Her gallantry with Saladin. ibid. b. 795. a. Her jealouſy, vengeance, and puniſhment on that account. 796. a. b. Her death. 797. a. b. She has been put in the catalogue of learned women. ibid. b.

Elect. The Elect among the Manichees were not allowed to exerciſe Agriculture. IV. 97. a. b.

Elephants; the chaſtity of thoſe animals. I. 641. b. White ones are held in great veneration in the eaſt. III. 549. b. When ſeen by the Romans for the firſt time. IV. 663. a.

Elephantis was a Courtezan, who had compoſed a book full of obſcenities. III. 703. b.

Eleuſina Sacra patefacta; who is the author of that book. IV. 648. b. n. (3). Quoted. 88. a.

Elian (or rather Ælian) excuſes Anacreon. I. 292. a. Vents a corrupt maxim of morality. II. 654. b. His unjuſt partiality as an Hiſtorian. ibid. He or his tranſcribers wrote Pericles for Epicles. IV. 571. b.

Elias; whether his complaint was that of a man inſpired. I. 106. b. 107. a.

Eliot (Thomas) wrote a book which he falſely aſcribed to Encolpius. II. 770. a.

Elis. The ſevere law which the inhabitants of Elis made againſt all women, who by ſtealth ſhould be preſent at the Olympic games. I. 762. That city grants the privilege of immunity to all Philoſophers. I. 656. b.

Eliza, ſiſter to Pygmalion, King of Tyre, is infinitely better known by the name of Dido. IV. 642.

Elizabeth, Queen of England; how ſhe called Bodin. II. 49. b. Why in her reign no endeavours were uſed to juſtify her mother. 55. a. The difference there was between her and Agrippina. 757. b. 758. a. In what manner ſhe diſcourſed about the Earl of Eſſex. III. 182. a. A Fanatic curſes her with all manner of imprecations. 315. b. What Prince ſhe moſt deſired to ſee. 397. b. The reformation which ſhe eſtabliſhed. 562. b. 563. a. b. She commands William Criton the Jeſuit to be ſet at liberty. II. 576. b. More policy than ſincerity in what ſhe ſaid upon that occaſion. ibid. Thoſe who made her head of the Church, ſaid to be more criminal than the electors of the She-Pope would be. IV. 735. a. n. (126). Called Jezabel by a preacher of the League. V. 273.

Ellebodius (Nicaſius) his Latin verſion of Nemeſius's book de Natura hominis. IV. 345. a. b. He treats George Valla's tranſlation with the utmoſt contempt. ibid. b. 346. a.

Elogies; lying is not any more allowable in a writer of Elogies, than in an Hiſtorian. I. 693. b. An Elogy which is a mixture of good and bad. 754. b. An ill cuſtom of thoſe who write them. II. 253. b. See Encomiums.

Eloquence. The jealouſy of Eloquence. I. 317. b. 318. a. III. 492. b. 493. a. b. It generally appears finer to one's auditors than readers. II. 358. b. The ſurprizing effects of it. 299. a. b. 300. a. b. 374. b. 375. a. How great the force of it is. IV. 566. b. 567. a. b. 568. a. The talents of Eloquence, and a vaſt erudition ſeldom meet together. 757. b. 758. a. b. Calliſtratus's force of Eloquence, raiſed in Demoſthenes a ſtrong deſire of diſtinguiſhing himſelf the ſame way. II. 259.

Eloquent. A perſon may be Eloquent, tho' he does no more than pronounce the diſcourſes which have been compoſed by others. III. 410. a. b.

Elpinice; why ſhe met with a refuſal, when ſhe ſollicited for her brother Cimon. IV. 578. b. Kept by her own brother. ibid.

Embaſſador of the United Provinces; who was the firſt that was acknowledged for ſuch at the Court of France. I. 3.

Embaſſadors; an inſtance of their little ſincerity. I. 721. a. An article of their Catechiſm. ibid. They have as much occaſion for their ſwords as for their tongues. 724. b. A compliment which a Spaniſh Embaſſador made to James I, King of England. 725. a. Embaſſadors are of the ſame make, be their religion what it will. II. 70. a. Do not ſcruple to divulge falſe news, and calumnies forged by themſelves. 154. a. Buſbequius's letters are to them a model of writing well. 232. a. Embaſſadors who refuſe to make their court to ladies of pleaſure. 427. a. b. Their children are reckoned natives of the place where their fathers would reſide, were they not Embaſſadors. III. 930. b. They ought to be cautious in writing news. V. 19. a. Tricks which are common with them. 20. b. 21. a. b. 22. a. b. The definition that has been given of them, viz. that they are men ſent abroad to lie for the good of the ſtate. 667.

Embaſſadreſs extraordinary, what lady was inveſted with that character. III. 263, 264. and a. b.

Embaſſy. The denomination of an Embaſſy, is not taken from the town where the Embaſſador has his audience, but from the court to which he is ſent. II. 230. a.

Embezzling: whether the embezzling of the public moneys ought to be puniſhed with death. IV. 143. b. 144. a.

Embroidery (Gold) by whom invented. IV. 561. b.

Emerald preſerves from the falling-ſickneſs, ſtrengthens the memory, and enables one to reſiſt carnal concupiſcence. IV. 864. b.

Emeritus; no man ſhould be declared ſuch, while he begets children. II. 618. b.

Emilius, or Æmilius, author of an Hiſtory of France, cannot be put upon the ſame level with the Salluſts and Livys. II. 764. b. 765. a.

Emilia, or Æmilia Lepida, her crimes and death. II. 721. b.

Emilius, or Æmilius, (Antony) refuſes a profeſſorſhip. III. 477. a.

Emmerick was formerly a good ſchool. II. 194.

Empedocles divided into two. III. 157. b. Was miſtaken in annexing to the four elements amity and enmity. IV. 439. b. What Ariſtotle ſays of him. V. 584. b.

Empire (Roman) there were not ſo many diſorders as people fancy, committed there, after the ſoldiers took upon them to create and kill their Emperors. I. 572. b. In all the Roman empire there were but three Cities, which were permitted to have ſchools of law. 771. a.

Empire and Emperor did not concern themſelves with the troubles of the Low-Countries. II. 222. a. b. 223. a. b. The Emperor acted only as a mediator between the King of Spain and the revolted Provinces. ibid. The empire is diſcharged of what concerns the circle of Burgundy. ibid.

Empiricus (Sextus) the ſubtilty and uſeleſſneſs of his Logic. IV. 655. b. 656. a. b. His ways of ſuſpending the judgment. ibid.

Employments, the author did not deſire any, and had refuſed ſome. V. 800. How he came to loſe his employment, and his behaviour thereupon. 801.

Employments (Public) when a public employment is to be conferred, the vigour of a man ſhould be conſidered, and not his age. IV. 784. b. Great application to ſtudy generally diſqualifies a man for them. II. 314. b. They do not leave an author time to finiſh his writings. 515. a. It were to be wiſhed that every man had an employment aſſigned to him, ſuch as beſt fitted his natural diſpoſition and capacity. III. 529. b.

Ἐνχειρῶν νόμῳ; the meaning of that phraſe. I. 427. a.

Encomiaſts, many do not know the difference between them and Hiſtorians. V. 804.

Encomiums; we ought to be ſparing of them. III. 896. b. 897. a. See Panegyriſts A great abatement ſhould always be made with regard to public Encomiums beſtowed by friends. IV. 651. b.

Encomiums (Poetical) Expreſſions made uſe of in them, are not to be conſtrued literally. II. 309, 310.

End. In what Anaxagoras and Carneades make the chief end of man to conſiſt. I. 295. II. 332. a. The principle of Chriſtians, with regard to the chief end of life, is a principle only in Theory. 200. b. See Happineſs.

Enemies. There are no enemies worſe than thoſe who praiſe immoderately. I. 469. a. An author is not to be underſtood too rigorouſly, when he is ſpeaking of his profeſſed enemy. 2. b. We ought never to condemn any man upon the teſtimony of his enemies. III. 551. b. It is not always policy to oppoſe their conqueſts. 806. b. There is nothing more dangerous than to deſpiſe them in hard and difficult times. V. 22. a.

Engage; if it be an imprudence to engage in certain attempts, it is ſtill a greater one to abandon them after being once engaged. I. 365. b.

Engaſtrimiths; what they can do. III. 854. a.

England; the number of Heretics that were daily burnt there, ſo great, that it raiſed the price of wood. I. 272. b. The Parliament of England exerciſes an arbitrary power. II. 56. a. The Lutherans and Papiſts burnt there at the ſame time. 180. A project there to reform the colleges of the the nation, hindered by the civil war. 536. In what reſpect the Engliſh nobility ſurpaſſed in former times, and to this day ſurpaſſes all other nations. 803. b. What difference there was between the feaſts of the churchmen there, and thoſe of the nobility. ibid. The learned men of that country have not been ſo eaſily impoſed upon with reſpect to Euripides, as thoſe of France. 871. a. The Emperor Hadrian cauſes a wall to be built there, and for what end. III. 318. Richard Smith is ſent there in quality of Ordinary over all the Catholics, but the Jeſuits force him to leave the kingdom. 665. a. Cruelties which the Romans and Britons exerciſed there by turns. V. 260. a. b. An encomium upon the univerſities there. 513. b.

Engliſh; how they were converted to Chriſtianity. III. 219. b. 220. a. Taken for gods by the inhabitants of New Albion, and why. IV. 572. b. Whether the Engliſh did almoſt conquer France. II. 463. b. Whether they made it tributary. 739. b. 740. a. Their Divines accuſed of inclining to Pelagianiſm and Socinianiſm. I. 656. a. The Engliſh Catholics throw out a thouſand imprecations againſt their country. III. 521. b. It had not begun to be an uſual thing amongſt them in the year 1613, to publiſh diſcourſes in the form of letters. 344, 345. Joſeph Hall did not approve of Engliſh gentlemen travelling in foreign countries. 345. and b. Sanders's Hiſtory of the Engliſh Schiſm. An account of that book, its editions and tranſlations. V. 41. b. 42. a. b. 43. a. b.

Engraving ſometimes is the means of falſifying Hiſtory. II. 100. a. b.

Ennius, what Quintilian ſaid of him. IV. 161. b.

Enoch. The Hebraizers may ſay that the Pagans alluded to the hiſtory of Enoch. I. 276. a.

Enochia; that city compared with Poneropolis. II. 248. a.

'Εντελέχεια, a word eſſential to Ariſtotle's Natural Philoſophy, but almoſt unintelligible. I. 636. a.

Enterprize. An enterprize diſcovered by a very ſurprizing accident. II. 577. a.

Enthuſiaſts, whether their extaſies be compatible with the opinion of thoſe who ſay that the ſoul is not diſtinct from the body. II. 660. a.

Entremangeries Monachales; a book wrote in oppoſition to the Entremangeries Miniſtrales of Feuardent. V. 57. b.

Envy, its tortures. III. 643. b. 644. a.

Enzinas, author of a Spaniſh tranſlation of the New Teſtament. II. 697. b. 698. a.

Epaminondas, his grave reply to Calliſtratus. II. 259.

Eparchus, Biſhop of Corfu, had made a collection of excellent manuſcripts, with which the library of Augſburg was enriched. III. 478. a. b.

Epernon (the Duke d') maintains his haughty ſpirit even on his death-bed. III. 289. a. A preſent which the city of Roüen makes to him. 409. a. He was ſatisfied with his good fortune. V. 369. b.

Ephemeris of Cæſar, a work wholly diſtinct from his Commentaries. I. 613. a.

Epheſians, one of their laws. I. 318. a. Their readineſs to believe the moſt abſurd traditions. III. 576. a.

Ephori, the fortune of the Lacedæmonian Kings depended upon their caprices. I. 135. a.

Ephorus, an Hiſtorian; the character of his genius. V. 327. b. 328. a.

Epyaxa behaves with all manner of courteſy to Cyrus. II. 512. a.

Epic Poetry formerly admitted childiſh meanneſſes. I. 81. a. Does not allow of them at preſent. 333. b.

Epicharmus, an excellent doctrine of his. I. 275. b.

Epicles, what health he drank with Antocles. IV. 571. b.

Epictetus; at what price his lamp was ſold. III. 939. a.

Epicureans would not acknowledge any thing ſupernatural in dreams. I. 85. b. Whether one Epicurean was allowed to rally another, and on what. II. 389. a. Some of them lived up to the rules of Morality with more exactneſs than the greateſt part of the Heathens. 347. V. 398. Their union. II. 777. a. b.

Epicurus; no antient Philoſopher came nearer the truth than he. II. 63. b. Some of his followers were very regular in their morals. 350. a. b. What was the voluptuouſneſs that he recommended. 388. a. The hypotheſis of preſages and fortune is directly oppoſite to the ſyſtem of that Philoſopher. 419. b. He did himſelf wrong in not owning his obligations to Democritus. 642. b. III. 789. a. His opinion touching the compoſition of the ſoul. 790. b. His civility and extreme meekneſs. II. 776. b. 777. a. Whence proceeds the ill opinion which people have of him and his ſect. 781. b. 782. a. b. to 786. b. A fictitious diſpute between him and a Platonic Philoſopher. 787. a. b. Another between him and a Pagan Prieſt. 789. b. 790. a. He takes unneceſſary precautions. ibid. b. Epicurus ſhould have allowed ſpirits, if he had reaſoned conſequentially. III. 919. b. 920. a. Whether he could poſſibly have reconciled his ſyſtem to the public worſhip, and deceived the Athenians. 923. a. b. Cenſured by Plutarch. 926. a. b. And by Muretus. ibid. The hypotheſis of the exiſtence of the gods is the weakeſt part of his ſyſtem. 929. a. b. Whether he owned a Providence. ibid. b. 930. a. b. His objection touching the evil which happens in the world ill refuted by Lactantius. 513. b. 514. a. b. He rejected Geometry and the other branches of the Mathematics. V. 626. a. b.

Epidemical diſtempers; the mind is ſubject to them as well as the body. I. 19. a.

Epigones, how that word ſhould be tranſlated. I. 117. a.

Epigrams. An epigram rewarded with five thouſand quarters of corn. I. 428. Another cruelly cenſured. 654. b. 655. a. b. An epigram of Auſonius admired by Daurat. II. 619. b. What ſhould be the qualities thereof. IV. 364. a. b.

Epilepſy: who defined the pleaſure of love a little epilepſy. II. 644. a. b.

Epinac (Peter d'), Archbiſhop of Lyons, a famous Anti-Royaliſt, at the conferences of Surenne. V. 34.

Epiphanius (St) does not ſay that acts of uncleanneſs were committed in the aſſemblies of the Adamites. I. 111. b. Has no other ground but a falſe tradition for the bellowing of a golden calf. II. 752. a. b. 753. a.

Epirotes almoſt deſtroyed by famine, and for what cauſe. IV. 665.

Epiſcopacy, as diſtinct from the prieſthood, is no ſacrament. III. 53. and b.

Epiſcoparians (Engliſh), a Monk undertakes to ſhew that the thirty-nine articles of their Church may be reconciled with the Council of Trent. V. 25.

Epiſtles Dedicatory; a common-place topic which is ſeldom omitted in that kind of epiſtles. I. 346. b. No longer produce any thing. III. 16. a. Are prepared for thoſe who are likely to reward the author beſt. IV. 843. a. b. It is a fault not to date them. V. 256. a. When an Hiſtorian addreſſes an Epiſtle Dedicatory to ſome powerful patron, he gives room to ſuſpect that he has not ſtrictly adhered to the laws of Hiſtory. II. 311. and b. 312. a. b. That of an Hiſtorian to a Prince, whoſe conduct he had juſtly blamed, would be imprudent. 312. a. b. The deſign of ſuch Epiſtles. ibid. Nothing is more neceſſary to the author of ſuch a work as this, than to conſult them. II. 8. b. The editors of books do wrong to leave them out. I. 225. b. IV. 164. a. A piece of raillery upon thoſe who affirm, in their Epiſtles Dedicatory, that their works have, in a manner, been taken out of their hands by force. 173. b. 174. a. b.

Epiſtolæ obſcurorum Virorum; an effect which the reading of them produced. II. 812. b. Who the author of that book is. III. 474. b. 475. a.

Epitaphs. Deceitful epitaphs. I. 105. b. One not well underſtood. 216. a. b. That of an Actreſs buried in holy ground. 328. a. b. When an author cites one, he ought not to change the leaſt letter. III 697. a. An epitaph full of preſumption and orthodoxy. IV. 468. a. Many of them are only mere ſallies of wit, and were never engraved upon tombs. I. 437. a. b. Rules to be obſerved by thoſe who cite them. ibid. b. 438. a. They are more to be relied on than Hiſtories, as to the day of a perſon's death. II. 698. b.

Epoch. The epoch of an event ſhould not be marked with the indefinite term of this year. I. 50. a. b. 329. a.

Epoché; to whom the invention of it is to be aſcribed. I. 409. b. The opinion of the Academics concerning it. II. 325. a. b. 326. a. b. 327. a. b.

Equivocations; Prierias Sylveſter's doctrine on that ſubject is very looſe. IV. 772. and b. &c.

Eraſiſtratus; how he diſcovered the diſtemper of Antiochus, who was deſperately in love with his mother-in-law. V. 45. a.

Eraſmus cenſured for his explication of a Greek proverb. I. 17. a. b. And for the meaning he gives to a paſſage of Cicero. 19. a. Why he did not embrace the Proteſtant religion. 139. a. What Agricola prognoſticated concerning him. 144. a. He conſidered Luther in the beginning as a deliverer. 149. b. Abuſes Alexander. 216. b. Paſſes for a favourer of Lutheraniſm. ibid. 217. a. b. His letters are often ill dated and miſplaced. 271. a. II. 325. b. The advice he gave to one of his friends concerning the proper ways of puſhing his fortune. I. 271. a. b. He did not hate wine. 272. a. b. Cenſures the poems of Andrelinus. 330. a. Miſrepreſents a fact which Ælian relates in ſpeaking of Alexander. 367. a. b. His conteſts with Beda. 714. a. b. 715. a. b. 716. a. b. The judicious advice which he gave to Berquin. 777. a. b. Quoted. 781. a. b. 782. a. One of his letters which had never been made public. II. 77. a. b. He could never obtain the favour to be quoted by Budæus. 191. b. 192. a. Is ill uſed by Egnatius. ibid. and b. His works were corrected by Caſtellan. 369. a. b. His ſtrength did not lie in Greek language. ibid. a. Employed too little time in compoſing his books. ibid. His miſtake touching the impure practice of Diogenes. 669. b. 670. a. His diſpute with Eppendorf. 797. and a. b. 798. and a. b. 799. and a. An effect which the reading of a book, intituled, Epiſtolæ obſcurorum Virorum, had upon him. 812. b. Why old-age was agreeable to him. 814. a. b. His heroic ſentiments towards one of his adverſaries. III. 47. a. b. Turns a coward with regard to the court of Rome. 146. a. Was not of opinion that Princes ſhould be exhorted to take away from the Monks the great eſtates which they poſſeſſed. 147. a. b. How he explained this proverb, Take heed of a man with a black breech. 429. a. b. His Printers play him a malicious trick. 531. a. b. It is ſtrange he had not read what authors ſay of Jupiter's being transformed into a cuckoo, to lie with Juno. 632. a. He writes a falſe piece of news touching the too haſty lying-in of Luther's wiſe. 947. b. Opens the way for the Reformation by his railleries. 948. a. 954. and b. Underſtands a ſentence of Ariſtophanes, better than Valerius Maximus. IV. 577. b. 578. a. The Magiſtrates of Baſil offer to buy his ſtatue. 926. a. b. What he ſays touching the uſefulneſs of Hiſtory. V. 265. b. Endeavours uſed to deſtroy all his works. 293. a. He does an action which ought to ſerve for a model to all authors. 494. a. The reproachful things Polydore Virgil ſaid of him. 497. a. b. Noel Beda charges, as a crime upon him, his giving the title of King of France, to the King of England. I. 715. a. 801. b.

Erfort; the Augſburg Confeſſion, and Hebrew, are taught in that univerſity, by the conſent of the Profeſſors, who were all Roman Catholics, except one. II. 697.

Erhardus (George), his cenſure on a very obſcene epigram of Campanus. II. 293. b.

Eric, King of Sweden, is dethroned. III. 138. Makes William Lemnius his Phyſician. 750.

Eric-ſon (Guſtavus) drives the Danes out of all their garriſon towns in Sweden. V. 651. Is proclaimed King of that country. ibid.

Eryngo (white), the virtue of that herb. IV. 607. a. b.

Erythreus (Valentine) was the firſt who enjoyed the Rectorſhip of the college of Altorf. 105.

Erpenius did not underſtand a paſſage of Elmacin. I. 52. b.

Err. It requires a ſuperiority of reaſon and genius, to know how to pity thoſe who err. IV. 323. a. b. A Monk favourable to ſuch as err with a good intention. V. 25.

Errata. In what part of the book a perſon that acts fairly, ſhould place the Errata. III. 257. a. The very large Errata of a very ſmall book. V. 455. b.

Errors; whether thoſe of the Antients be more excuſable than thoſe of the Moderns. I. 501. a. b. 502. a. The ſervile caution that is obſerved with reſpect to errors. II. 94. b. A pleaſing error is in ſome caſes better than a diſagreeable truth. 369. b. 370. a. Every particular man has the right of the ſword with reſpect to error. 389. a. How difficult it is for men to avoid it. IV. 538. a. When they are, or when they are not, to be feared. V. 810.

Errors (popular), whether a man ought to regulate his conduct by them. I. 680. b.

Errors in religion, by accident, take deeper root when they are attacked. IV. 353. a.

Errol, an eminent family in Scotland, its greatneſs and original. III. 332.

Erudition. France ſeems too much diſguſted with all that ſavours of erudition. V. 428. a. See Learning.

Eſchylus, or Æſchylus; for how much his table-book was ſold. III. 939. a.

Eſchines, or Æſchines, ignominiouſly reproached, and for what reaſon. II. 775. b. A ſtory that he tells. V. 77. a. b.

Eſcodeça (Peter d'), although a Huguenot, and married man, was Abbot of St Sulpice of Belley; his conduct with the Monks, &c. is aſſaſſinated by thoſe of his own party. I. 737. a. b. 738. a. b.

Eſculapius, or Æſculapius, is born near Epidaurus: his mother was Coronis, the daughter of Phlegyas. IV. 626.

Eſculapius of Germany; Gregory Horſtius had that ſirname given him. III. 487.

Eſop, or Æſop, a Player; his ſon ſwallows a pearl of great price. IV. 200. a.

Eſpencæus (Claudius), takes upon him to publiſh a ſilly ſtory againſt Calvin. II. 267. a.

Eſpence (Claude d'), exclaims loudly againſt the enormities of the book of Taxes of the Romiſh Chancery. I. 629. b. The Inquiſition cauſes this paſſage in the Doctor's book to be expunged. ibid. His ſix books of Continence tranſlated into French by Creſpet. II. 567. a. b.

Eſprit de Mr Arnauld; the Hiſtory of that book. I. 490. a. b. Its calumnies. 492. b. The author of it did not underſtand what good raillery was. II. 527. a. He reflects upon the Epiſcopal Clergy. ibid. b. The promiſe which he makes to the King of France in the name of Drabicius, and in that of all the Proteſtants. 537. b. and n. (8). He did not know his Scaligerana well. 706. a. Makes no ſcruple to lye. V. 176. a. n. (72). He is accuſed and convicted of Socinianiſm by his own reaſonings. 177. a. b. 178. a. Could bring no proofs to ſupport the heinous accuſation which he publiſhed againſt the gentlemen of Port-Royal. 178. a. b. It is aſtoniſhing that the author of ſuch a book ſhould have remained without anſwer. 300. b.

Eſprit des Cours de l'Europe, the author of that book cited. III. 234. a. b. 235. a.

Eſprit (James), when admitted into the French Academy. V. 419. a. A paſſage of that author examined. IV. 441. a.

Eſſays on Literature; the author of that book commits groſs blunders in ſpeaking of Ruyſbroeck. IV. 943. b. 944. a. b.

Eſſars (Charlotte de), her Hiſtory. III. 307. b. 308. a. 517. a. b. 518. a.

Eſſex (the Earl of), whether Queen Elizabeth ſhewed his head to the Duke of Biron. III. 182. a.

Eſtampes (the Ducheſs of) deſires Francis I. to take from Madam de Chateau-Briand the jewels which he had given her. II. 462. a. Reflexions upon her Calviniſm, and the motives, which, according to Varillas, induced her to embrace it. 843. a. b. Her pretended Lutheraniſm. ibid. b. Her huſband cauſes a judicial enquiry to be made after her conduct, and for what reaſon. ibid. 844. a. Juſtification of the Duke of Eſtampes concerning the enquiry againſt his wife. ibid. b. 845. a. She forms a faction to oppoſe that of Diana de Poitiers. III. 401. a.

Eſtate: an anſwer very like that of a Philoſopher, who boaſted that he carried about him his whole eſtate. V. 146. b.

Eſte (Borſa d') was the firſt who had the title of Duke of Ferrara and Modena. V. 57. n. (c).

Eſthonians, a people of Livonia who adored a pine-tree. IV. 928. a. b.

Eſtrix, a Jeſuit, writ the book de Fraudibus Hæreticorum. IV. 847. a.

Eternal duration of puniſhment, conſiderations upon that doctrine. V. 175. b.

Eternity; the definition which Boëtius gives of it, is more incomprehenſible than the doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation. V. 596. a. b. 597. a. b.

Ethelred, King of England, refuſed to hear the Pope's Miſſionaries but in the open field, and why. III. 219. b. Is converted to Chriſtianity, and the greateſt part of the Engliſh follow his example. ibid.

Ethiopia; Lucian pretends that the ſcience of the ſtars had its beginning there. III. 311.

Etolians often at war with the Acarnanians. I. 55.

Etrée (Gabrielle d') what ſhe ſaid upon ſeeing the pictures of two Princeſſes, when it was reported that Henry IV would marry one of them. V. 392. a.

Eu (the Count d') his amiable and good qualities. III. 865. a. His marriage. ibid. His infidelity to his wife. ibid. b. His death. ibid.

Evagrius, what he tells of certain Monks. I. 112. a.

Evarigus, King of the Goths; one of his Counſellors compared with Apollonius. I. 383. b.

Eubates; his wife erects a ſtatue to him, to recompenſe his fidelity. III. 704. b.

Eubulides was the inventer of divers ſophiſms. II. 846. b. 847. a.

Euchariſt. The Church of England has given no poſitive definition of the manner how the body of Chriſt is preſent in the Euchariſt. I. 718. b. Beza calumniated on this ſubject. 797. b. &c. to 800. a. The manner how God preſerves accidents without a ſubject in the Euchariſt. IV. 59. a. b. 60. a. Expreſſions of Calvin on this head, which ſeem to admit of a corporal preſence. V. 103. b. n. (47). The advocates for Tranſubſtantiation make a wrong uſe of the words Change, Converſion, or Tranſelementation. 209. b. Bucer's ambiguous way of ſpeaking on this ſubject. II. 177. a. b. After thirty-four years labour, the miniſters could not agree in this point. ibid. b. Harchius attempts to find out a middle way in the doctrine of the Euchariſt, between the Catholics and Proteſtants, but his project is laughed at by both. III. 352. John Poinet tries to reconcile the controverſies about it, and particularly thoſe of the Lutherans and Zuinglians. IV. 692. That author's opinion. 693. b. The opinion of the Calviniſts in this point extreamly ill uſed by John Schutzius, and a reflexion thereupon. V. 89. b. The warmth of diſputes on this ſubject, between the Lutherans and Calviniſts is over. ibid.

Euchrocia: a Heretic gets her with child. IV. 780. a. She is put to death. ibid.

Eudes (Duke of Aquitain) acts a cunning part with Charles Martel. I. 15. a. Did not favour the irruption of the Saracens. 16. a. There was much more room for ſuſpecting Charles Martel than him in that affair. ibid. and b. To which of theſe two chiefs, the honour of the victory belongs. ibid.

Eudoxia ſends privately to Giſeric, and conjures him to come and revenge the death of Valentinian. III. 759. b.

Eve, what her reaſon was for giving the name of Seth to one of her ſons. I. 23. a.

Events: what thoſe ought to do, who relate myſterious events. II. 386. a. b. 392. a. b. There are ſome which occaſion much ſpeculation, and are little ſpoken of. 400. a. The moſt conſiderable may depend upon a trifle. 422. a. It is of the laſt conſequence to find them ranged in their natural order. 756. b. The difference between the accounts of Catholics and Proteſtants chiefly conſiſts in the order of events. ibid. Great events hit our taſte exceedingly. III. 433. b. 434. a. The Antients affirmed that a man's prudence had a leſs ſhare in them than his good or ill fortune. IV. 460. a. b. We hardly ever judge of things but by the event. V. 104. a. b. We cannot read with pleaſure a deſcription of thoſe events which were diſagreeable to us. II. 311. b.

Eugene of Savoy (Prince) is not a brother's ſon of the Duke of Savoy, but Charles Emmanuel's great-grandſon. IV. 210. b. Commanded only the Emperor's troops of Italy. ibid. Did not force the lines of the beſiegers at Coni. ibid. 211. a.

Evidence; whether it be the mark and meaſure of truth. IV. 654. b. 655. a. b. V. 586. b.

Evil. Chimerical evils forged by the Poets, have ſerved as an apology for real evils. I. 54. a. b. How it fares with people who judge of complicated evils. 95. a. Such is the condition of mankind, that they can only chuſe between the leſſer and greater evil. II. 211. b. Whether there is a greater proportion of evil than of good in the conditions of men. 832. a. b. IV. 844. a. b. V. 415. a. 423. b. 424. a. 576. a. b. & ſeq. Whether it be nothing. II. 846. a. Many people complain of the evil which they ſuffer, and ſay nothing at all of that which they themſelves did before. III. 42. a. b. A reflexion upon the Heathens ſaying that the gods puſhed men on to do evil. 374. a. b. IV. 441. b. 442. a. A phyſical evil ought never to be remedied by a moral evil. III. 965. a. The difficulties about the origin of evil are very antient. IV. 92. a. b. 93. a. b. It is impoſſible to ſolve them without having recourſe to Revelation. 94. a. b. &c. 112. b. 113. a. b. The origin of evil is incomprehenſible. 513. a. b. &c. 524. b. 525. a. b. &c. 788. a. b. 932. b. 933. a. b. &c. V. 212. b. &c. How ſome excuſed providence with reſpect to the origin of evil. 576. a. b. See Principles (the doctrine of two). Thoſe who approve it deſerve the ſame puniſhment as thoſe who commit it. 764, 765. 824. The queſtion about its origin, very difficult. 815, 816. 830, 831. The introduction thereof with the doctrines annexed to it, is one of the moſt impenetrable myſteries of religion. 822. 830. 831.

Eumenes, King of Pergamum, lived in a ſtrict friendſhip with his brothers. IV. 558. a. b. 559. a.

Eumenius, the Rhetorician, had a yearly penſion of fifteen thouſand crowns. I. 196. a.

Eunapius ſaid that the Hiſtory of Apollonius ſhould have been intituled, The Deſcent of a God upon Earth. I. 382. a.

Eunuchs; whether women may be ſafely truſted to their keeping. I. 31. b. II. 533. a. b. What St Baſil ſays of them. III. 56. b. Two ſorts of Eunuchs. ibid. Compared to oxen, whoſe horns are cut off, and who nevertheleſs do not ceaſe to ſtrike with their heads. 383. b. II. 533. b. Their impotence with regard to women, is no obſtacle to their having the other qualities of great men. III. 414. b. They may be very brave. ibid.

Eunus, the trick which he made uſe of in order to raiſe an inſurrection. I. 647. and. b. 648. a.

Euphorbia, an herb; whence it had that name. III. 598. a. b.

Euphormio; that book ſeverely cenſured. I. 646. a. Condemned by the Inquiſition. ibid. Which did not hinder the author from being much careſſed at Rome, and receiving favours on account of that very book. ibid. Tranſlated into French by John Berault. ibid. Two other tranſlations which leave the work at leaſt as difficult as they found it. 647. b.

Euphorus; whether there has been any author of that name. II. 772. b. 773. a.

Euphrates, when it was the boundary of the empire. III. 317. and a. b.

Evremont (St) author of a ſatire againſt the French academy. I. 59. a. n. (7), (8). Quoted. IV. 492. b. 615. b. 797. b.

Eurymedon; how he was puniſhed by Jupiter, and for what. III. 630. b.

Euripides was delighted with a maxim of Agathon. I. 126. b. The energy of one of his ſentences. ibid. Said that God concerns himſelf only with great things, and leaves the leſſer to chance. 310. a. b. His cuſtom was to introduce perſons upon the ſtage, in whoſe mouths he put impious ſentiments. II. 572. a. b. 573. a. b. An argument ad hominem which a courtezan alledged to him. III. 705. a.

Europe. The Chriſtians in Europe are addicted to drunkenneſs and lewdneſs. II. 819. b.

Europeans; it was only by way of repriſal, that they ſtole away the King of Tyre's daughter. III. 372. a.

Euſebius; what he ſays of Apollonius Tyanæus, examined. I. 381. b. 382. a. b. He makes an improper uſe of a paſſage of Porphyrius, which he has preſerved to us. II. 773. b. How he refuted the ſlanders of Hierocles againſt the Chriſtian religion. III. 448. a. b. What he quotes from Phlegon. IV. 624. b. &c.

Euſebius Captivus, a controverſial work of Jerom Maſſarius, under that title, where he feigns that a true believer gives an account of his faith before the Pope and the Inquiſition. IV. 173. a. b.

Euthymenes; how much his ſon grew in three years, and what happened to him afterwards. V. 283. b.

Euthymius Zigabenus; the ſtory which he tells of a ſtone. I. 124. a.

Eutychius; his narrative concerning the quarrel between Cain and Abel. I. 24. a.

Eutropius; whether a paſſage of that author has been well tranſlated by the Abbot de Marolle. II. 255. a. b.

Exactions impoſed under divers pretences. II. 421. b.

Examination (the way of) when people have no further occaſion for it, they return to the way of authority. I. 241. b. The difficulties which attend it. IV. 361. a. b. 362. a. b. 363. a. 535. a. b. 536. a. There are ſome who affirm that no body makes uſe of that way. ibid. and b. What are the greateſt obſtacles to a proper examination. 537. a. A common place againſt the way of examination. V. 441. a. b. See Authority.

Example. An example which a modern author alledges to prove that a ſincere ignorance is a good excuſe. I. 206. a. An example of the bad cuſtom which prevails of intereſting religion in the diſputes of learned men. II. 141. a. b. Thoſe who ſet bad examples, ought to be ſeverely puniſhed. IV. 18. a The contagion of bad examples. V. 755. b.

Excommunication, a ſeverer puniſhment ſometimes than the afflictive pains which the civil magiſtrate impoſes. I. 96. a. Againſt what authors it is made uſe in the Proteſtant churches. V. 806. How Savonarola behaved, when he found himſelf lying under the ſentence of excommunication, and the opinion of the Proteſtants upon that head examined. 70. b. 71. a.

Excuſes; however good they may be, it is ſtill better not to ſtand in need of them. II. 794. a. b. 795. a.

Exerciſes of the King of Bohemia, preſerved in the Vatican Library. I. 239. a.

Exerciſes (public) Oecolampadius does not trouble himſelf about the honour that is to be gained by them in the univerſities. IV. 400.

Exile. An Exile is not qualified to write an Hiſtory. III. 345.

Exorciſm. Deſpauterius's Grammar preſented to a woman poſſeſſed with a devil, as a formulary of exorciſm. II. 147. a.

Exorciſts, and mean and mercenary employment among the Pagans. II. 775. a. b. In what manner it was exerciſed. ibid. n. (15). What ſort of queſtions they generally put to the poſſeſſed. III. 214. b.

Exploits; ſeveral give the glory of them to God, only out of policy. V. 366. a. b. 367. a. b.

Expreſſions. Some expreſſions offend us, though they import no more than other expreſſions at which we are not at all offended. I. 790. b. 791. a. We are apt to be deceived, when we ſtick to the firſt ſenſe, which they offer to our mind. 595. b.

Extemporè. A boy of ten years of age. who compoſed verſes extemporè. I. 360. and a. b.

Extenſion. Whether we have any idea of an extenſion that is immaterial. V. 143. b. 144. a. Extenſion is made up of parts which are each a particular ſubſtance. 208. b. 209. a. Objections againſt its exiſtence. 608. b. 609. a. b. 610. a. b. & ſeq. Whether there can be two ſorts of it, the one diviſible, moveable, and impenetrable, and the other immoveable, indiviſible, and penetrable. 615. b. 616. a. b. 617. a. b.

Extracts. Unfaithful extracts. I. 714. b. 715. a.

Extravagancies: to what extravagancies the human mind is liable. I. 103. a. b.

Eye-brows (joining each other) paſſed for a beauty among the Phrygians. II. 140.

Ezekiel; what a Rabbin affirms concerning his tomb. V. 544. b.

F.

Faber (Antony) his judgment concerning the greateſt Lawyers of his time. III. 201. a.

Faber Stapulenſis delivered out of the hands of the Inquiſitors by the Queen of Navarre. II. 261.

Faber (Tanaquillus) who are the perſons qualified to judge of his books. I. 189. a. Cenſured for quoting Plato and Herodotus, on the ſubject of Anacreon. 290. b. 291. a. What he ſays to a Journaliſt. 452. a. Gives us a piece of ſecret Hiſtory. 675. a. A common-place which he made uſe of. 745. a. b. Cenſured by Mr Dacier with little ſucceſs. II. 388. a. b. In what he has very well ſhewn the miſtakes of the interpreters of Horace, with regard to Catius. ibid. b. 389. a. He wrongfully pronounces a definitive ſentence upon a paſſage of Plutarch, touching Critias and his Atheiſm. 573. b. 574. a. Unjuſtly cenſures St Auguſtin touching the liberties which the Comic Poets gave themſelves. IV. 568. a. b. He and Madlle his daughter criticized on the ſubject of Anacreon and his cotemporaries. V. 44. a. b.

Fables of the Antients very ill concerted. I. 80. a. They applied the unravelling of them to too many ſubjects. 115. b. People are unwilling to be undeceived as to Fables, when they find their account in them. 362. Who invented, and who brought them to perfection. II. 828. a. b. The difference between a Fable and a fabulous narration. 829. a. Freinſhemius's miſtake upon this head. ibid. Which are the moſt uſeful of all the Fables of antiquity. 831. b. 832. a. The apology which Strabo makes for them. ibid. How Seneca could ſay that the Romans had never attempted this ſort of compoſitions. 833. and b. They ſhould never be made uſe of to explain the myſteries of religion. IV. 896. a. A conjecture about the origin of the antient Fables. V. 288. a. Jewiſh Fables with reſpect to a falſe Meſſias. I. 648. a. b.

Faces. Some women have disfigured their faces, leaſt they ſhould occaſion a temptation. II. 109. a. n. (5).

Faciendaire; an old French word which is very expreſſive, and which deſerved to have been kept up. IV. 640. a.

Factions. It is ordinary for all factions to produce libels. III. 517. b. There is nothing more advantageous, according to the notions of the world, than to be always for the ſtrongeſt faction. V. 250. a. It commonly happens that men of a peaceable diſpoſition, are carried down with the torrent of a faction. 675.

Facts; there are ſome which one may pronounce to be falſe, purely becauſe they are doubtful. I. 67. b. To make one a credible witneſs in certain facts nothing more is neceſſary than the truth of the relation. 75. a. A fruitful ſource of falſifications in matters of fact. 186. b. Whether it be ſufficient on all occaſions to deny a fact, when an adverſary does not prove it. 199. a. b. 200. a. b The reaſon why they come to be ſo variouſly reported. 308. b. An exactneſs in relating them is inſeparable from a tireſome prolixity. 335. a. Contrariety in matters of fact. II. 28. b. 29. a. b. There are many remarkable facts for which we have but a ſingle teſtimony. 349. b. One ſhould forbear to ſpeak of facts till time has ripened them. 65. a. There are ſome which reduce Philoſophy to a nonplus. 391. b. 392. a. b. There are others the publiſhing of which only offends, becauſe they are true. III. 148. b. We ſhould in matters of fact follow the advice which Des Cartes gives with reſpect to philoſophical ſpeculations. 204. a. The ill-placing of circumſtances makes a fact doubtful, though it be never ſo certain and true in itſelf. 226. a. How the circumſtances of facts come to be changed. 314. a. b. There is ſometimes a great illuſion in proving a fact by a reaſon of right. V. 11. a. b. They are exaggerated in paſſing from mouth to mouth. I. 747. b. Should not be affirmed as certain, when one does not find them in credible authors. III. 779. b. Thoſe which are to be found every where, have leſs need to be ſupported by quotations than ſingular facts. ibid. The probability of a thing does not warrant the affirming it as a certain fact. ibid. Hiſtorical facts are very ſubject to a metamorphoſis. IV. 89. b. A world of tranſcribers and great authors confound them with their conjectures. 609. a. A compiler of facts ſhould not neglect to engage the reader's attention to thoſe which have ſomething ſingular in them. V. 642. a.

Fæneſte (the Baron of), one of his adventures pleaſantly related by d'Aubigné. II. 243. b.

Faërnus, his fables. IV. 613. a. b.

Faget (the Abbot), a diſpute between him and Baluzius. IV. 102. b. 103. a. b.

Fagnanus, his intimate acquaintance with Pradilhon, General of the Feuillants. IV. 764. a.

Fay (du), a new remark upon his writings. III. 516. b. 517. a. b.

Faydit (Abbot) quoted. III. 739. b. After what manner he ſpeaks of the author of the memoirs of M. L. C. D. R. V. 84. a. A very ſtrong invective which he makes on the ſubject of the Trinity againſt the explications of the Schoolmen. 820. The inſuperable perplexities to which he reduces them. ibid. n. (30). A long paſſage of his Telemacomanie cited and cenſured. IV. 643. a. b. 644. a.

Fair: whether any thing is lawful and fair againſt an open enemy. II. 154. a.

Faith. There is a local, and a temporary faith. I. 477. a. Bucer's judgment on this theſis, We are juſtified by faith alone. II. 178. a. b. What makes it become a true act of religion. 662. b. IV. 592. b. 593. a. b. 717. a. b. &c. to 720. a. b. Nothing but Faith can convince us that bodies do really exiſt. 654. a. n. (12). All the articles of Faith defended and attacked by the arms of Philoſophy alone, do not come off honourably. V. 815. The firſt thing required by Chriſt and his Apoſtles. 816. It is a gift of God; and is not to be acquired by reaſonings, and a train of Philoſophical diſcuſſions. ibid. Wherein the Faith of a Chriſtian, and the Science of a Philoſopher differ. ibid. It ought to ſatisfy every good Chriſtian, that his Faith is founded on the word of God. 829. It is the way by which it has pleaſed God to conduct Chriſtians. 831. The moſt precious Faith is that, which, upon the Divine teſtimony, embraces the moſt oppoſite truths to Reaſon. 834. A raillery upon this notion. ibid. Confutation of that raillery. ibid. It ſerves for a ſword and buckler againſt the knots of difficulties. 835. Few people ſeriouſly examine the nature of it. 836. It is proper to enumerate the arguments which reſpect the difficulties of the Chriſtian Faith. ibid.

Fall of Adam: it is one of the greateſt myſteries. V. 821.

Falſhood. There are ſeveral things the falſhood whereof is ſufficiently expoſed by barely relating them. I. 245. Whether it may appear in the ſame guiſe as truth. 410. b. People are ever publiſhing notorious falſhoods. 343. a. b. 344. a. Whether time deſtroys them. III. 744. a.

Famagoſta; the Turks take that town. IV. 23, 24.

Families; there are few which may not be reproached with ſome adventure. I. 490. b. An antient Roman family that was illuſtrious for chaſtity. II. 291. b. Fabulous traditions that are kept up in old families. 709. a. V. 400. The fabulous genealogy of ſeveral families. 468. a. b. 469. a. b. See Genealogiſts.

Families (Patrician), ſome of them became Plebeian. II. 167. a.

Fanaticiſm; its prodigious variety. III. 692. Is a more contagious evil than is imagined. ibid. A proof of Savonarola's fanaticiſm. V. 71. a. b.

Fanatics of Amſterdam who ran about ſtark-naked. I. 112. How dangerous thoſe perſons are to a ſtate. 647. b. 648. a. They are perfect incendiaries. II. 143. and a. b. 537. Their uſual faults. 538. a. b. Their firſt works overthrow their laſt. ibid. a. They are touched to the quick when they are upbraided with contradictions of that kind. ibid. Are watchful over events, in order to amend their predictions according to the news of the Gazette. ibid. b. Have often no other aim than to ſtir up the people. 539. a. Chuſe rather to expoſe the authority of the Scriptures, than to own themſelves in the wrong. ibid. Loſe nothing of their credit, though they have deceived the public a hundred times. ibid. Are never at a loſs. 692. a. Their obſtinacy in finding out evaſions. ibid. b. 693. a. b. n. (23). They will never want patrons, provided they have cunning enough to accommodate themſelves to the paſſions of the times. 693. There are two ſorts of them: which are the moſt ſuſpected. III. 682. a. A touch-ſtone to diſcover whether they are ſincere Fanatics. IV. 36. a. They cannot anſwer for themſelves, and why. 115. b. Do not trouble themſelves about the greateſt difficulties. 116. a. b. The XVIIth century was fruitful in Fanatics. 269. a. The ſect of the Fanatics very well characterized. I. 241. b.

Fannia; at what time the law, which goes by that name, was made. V. 386. and b. 387. a.

Fano (Barthelemi Denys de) continues the Hiſtory of Tarcagnota, and of Mambrin Roſco. IV. 918.

Farces. The preſent farces are more dangerous than thoſe of our anceſtors, and for what reaſon. V. 847.

Fardella, his Logic. V. 614. b. 615. a.

Farel ſent with the character of a Deputy into Germany. I. 790. a. His diſpute at Baſil. III. 10. a. His too paſſionate zeal. ibid. and b. His intrepidity. ibid. Eraſmus has uſed him very ill. ibid. 11. a. and 14. a. His marriage. 13. a. b.

Farelliſts: a chimerical ſect. 15. b.

Faret; his Honnête Homme tranſlated into Latin by Charles Oginſki. IV. 402. Tranſlated into Spaniſh, Italian, Engliſh, and High-Dutch. ibid.

Fargis, the French Embaſſador in Spain, makes a diſadvantageous treaty. I. 786. a.

Farmers of the Taxes are very ſeldom honeſt. V. 465. a. b. Would have aſſeſſed moſt of the gods if they had been ſuffered to go on. I. 280. b. 281. a. b.

Farnaby criticized on the ſubject of an epigram againſt Fulvia. III. 163. a.

Farnace (P. de) writes the life of Peter de la Place. IV. 681. a. b. n. (2).

Farts: ſome people could diſpoſe of them in ſuch a manner, that they ſeemed to make them ſing. III. 135. b.

Faſting is a thing which the Northern nations cannot eaſily bear. III. 231. a. May be of a very long continuance. 582. b. An objection propoſed to Laurence Joubert about the faſting of Moſes, Elias, and Jeſus Chriſt. ibid. A ſyſtem, according to which one might elude the laws of the Church with reſpect to faſt-days. V. 777, 778.

Fatality annexed by the Pagans to certain inanimate things. II. 254. a.

Fate. The doctrine of the Stoics, touching Fate, made God the author of Sin. II. 489. a. b. 490. a. b. 491. a. IV. 519. b. &c. How they endeavoured to reconcile it with human liberty. II. 490. b. 491. a. This doctrine does not exclude all wiſhes. III. 924. a. Invectives of the Pagans againſt Fate. IV. 811. a. b. They believed that one word was ſufficient to change it. II. 253. a. b.

Father. A father who gives his ſon a very good education. IV. 754. b. Nature has given a great deal of force to the affection of a father. 637. a.

Fathers of the Church: ſome of them were ignorant that it is unlawful to ſave either one's own life, or another's, at the expence of a crime. I. 38. a. b. Have inſerted the moſt ſhocking impurities in their works. 103. b. Generally believed that Adam was buried upon mount Calvary. 104. b. Whether thoſe of the firſt three centuries taught Arianiſm implicitly. 477. a. b. People are more or leſs tender of them in proportion as they are more or leſs of their way of thinking. 564. and a. b. They ſometimes alledge very weak arguments againſt the Gentiles. II. 498. a. III. 55. a. Had reaſon to reproach the Pagans with the infamous amours of Jupiter. 130. a. b. What anſwer they made to the railleries of the Heathens upon the adventure of Jonas. 578. a. b. The doctrine of thoſe of the firſt three centuries concerning the Trinity. IV. 601. a. b. 602. a. b. When the Proteſtant Divines of France began to read them. I. 756. The Fathers have publiſhed the impieties and obſcenities of the antient Heretics. III. 135. b. 136. a. b. Are blame-worthy, if at bottom it was a pernicious and ſinful thing. 136. a. Whether it be true that they wrote only for the learned, and in a language not underſtood by the vulgar. ibid. What they required of believers in a particular manner. V. 816. Did not diſcuſs the myſteries of religion by the rules of Logic and Metaphyſics. 817. n. (17).

Faula, Hercules's whore, has Divine honours paid to her. III. 55. b.

Faults. A reflexion on hidden faults. I. 619. b. It requires a great deal of dexterity to tell people their faults, without giving them room to be angry. 753. a. Men do not love to be told publickly of their faults. II. 311. b.

Faults in books. See Books.

Favour; what Regnier ſays of it. V. 370. b.

Favourites; people court their daughters, however ſmall their fortunes be. I. 460. b. The judicious reflexion of a great wit on that head. ibid. They labour to procure to themſelves, or their relations, the moſt profitable and honourable employments. III. 826. and a. A favourite can bring into faſhion not only ſuch cloaths, but alſo ſuch meats as he likes. IV. 768. a. People take a pleaſure in charging them with more crimes than they are really guilty of. V. 370. b.

Fauſta; her leud practices. IV. 201. a. b.

Fauſtina; how far ſhe carried her immodeſty. III. 794. b. n. (5).

Feaſts. The prodigious ſumptuouſneſs of a feaſt made at Rome by the Pope's Financier. II. 469. a. Another of a vaſt expence. 835. a. b. A law, which reſtrained the immoderate expence of feaſts, repealed by Duronius. I. 351. A magnificent feaſt which was given by a gentleman of Lombardy. 402. a. b. Regulations for moderating the expence of them. III. 6. a. The Romans did not ſuffer maids to be preſent at feaſts; and the Greeks did not even allow women to be there. 966. b. 967. a.

Felix does not go into Judæa, till after the condemnation of Cumanus. II. 702. b. Married three Queens. ibid.

Feltri (Victorinus of), one of the firſt reſtorers of antient Latin. IV. 408.

Ferdinand I. beſieges Buda, and his army is cut in pieces by Soliman. III. 532.

Ferdinand II, ſucceeding to the empire, ſaw himſelf diſpoſſeſſed of two kingdoms. 819. b.

Feria (the Duke of) dies of grief, occaſioned by the ill conduct of Aldringer. I. 211. b.

Feronniere, miſtreſs to Francis I, why infected by her huſband. III. 89. a. b.

Ferrand is to be pitied for having engaged to apologize for St Francis. III. 83. a. b. Quoted. IV. 109. b. 110. a.

Ferrara (Renée de France, Ducheſs of) receives as many Refugees as ſhe can at Montargis. V. 193. a.

Ferrier (Father), Confeſſor to the King, writes a little book concerning probable opinions. IV. 64. a.

Ferrier (Arnoul du), a famous Profeſſor of the Civil-Law at Toulouſe. II. 687.

Feuardent; the impertinence of that Franciſcan. II. 751. a. The apology he makes for the worſhip of the bleſſed Virgin. III. 85. a. n. (49). The accuſations which he brings againſt Calvin. V. 53. b. 54. a. b.

Fever (purple), James des Parts was the firſt that wrote upon that ſubject. IV. 484.

Feuillant (the little), ſee the article Montgaillard, in the Dictionary.

Feuillants: the abbey and chief of the order ſituated in the dioceſe of Rieux. IV. 764.

Fevre de la Boderic (Guy le), tranſlates from Italian John Andreas's book, intituled; The Sect of Mahomet demoliſhed. I. 326. b.

Fevre (John le), author of a Dictionary of French rhimes. I. 65. b. 66. a.

Fevrier (John), a Jeſuit, confounded with Father John Ferrier by Southwell. III. 43. a. b.

Fichard (John) publiſhes the writings of Julius Clarus. II. 515. a. b. The praiſes which he beſtows on him are juſt. ibid. b.

Ficinus (Marſilius), what we are to underſtand by his Commentaries. IV. 689. a. See Marſilius Ficinus. He explains the doctrine of Guido Cavalcante, touching the nature of love. II. 399. b.

Figures (Arithmetical) have both their conveniencies and inconveniencies. I. 249. a.

Filleau, the King's Advocate at Poitiers, gloried in perſecuting the Proteſtants upon all occaſions. IV. 479. b. His account of what paſſed in the chimerical aſſembly of Bourg-Fontaine. I. 491. a.

Financier; probity is a rare thing to be met with in that employment. V. 465. a. b.

Finæus (Orontius), Peter Nonnius corrects ſeveral of his miſtakes. IV. 382. b.

Finland; who was the firſt that tranſlated the New Teſtament into the language of that country. I. 141.

Fire has often fallen upon ſacrifices. I. 24. b. The Pagans boaſted of having had this mark of approbation from heaven. 25. b. Who invented divinations by fire. 277. b. Trial by fire. 405. Prieſteſſes who boaſted that they could walk upon it without receiving any damage. II. 531. a. A lucky preſage, when it kindled of itſelf upon the altars. 746. a. b. Which neverthleſs had not always that conſtruction put upon it. ibid. b. The ſtory of a people who trod upon fire without being burnt. III. 466. and a. b. 467. and a. b. Was the principle of all things according to Heraclitus. V. 323. b. n. (23).

Fiſh: a fiſh adorned with ear-rings. I. 358.

Fitz-Simon, a Jeſuit, quoted. I. 756. a. III. 937. b. 945. b. Whether he diſputed with Uſher. V. 525. a. b.

Flaccus, a ſirname to be found in ſeveral cities of Italy. IV. 599. b.

Flacius (Matthias): a Roman Catholic having praiſed him without knowing him, repented of it after he came to know him. V. 124. b. See Illyricus.

Flaminius had like to have been refuſed the honour of a triumph, for not opening a letter from the Senate, till after he had routed the enemy. II. 291. a.

Flaminius (Lucius) cauſes a criminal to be put to death in his preſence, while he was at dinner, and for what reaſon. IV. 17. b.

Flatterers do not regard a mere title. I. 233. b. Their ſharping tricks. IV. 430. a. b.

Flattery; the effect which it muſt naturally have upon the minds of Princes. II. 256. b. 257. a. A ſtrange inſtance of that vice. III. 222. b. 223. a. Is one of the plagues of Hiſtory. IV. 142. b. 143. a. A ſuperannuated piece of flattery. I. 349. a.

Fled. Perſons who owned that they had thrown down their arms and fled. I. 189. a. b.

Fleece (golden), on what occaſion that order of Knights was inſtituted. II. 215. a. b.

Flemings; whether or not their writers are paſſionate. II. 437. b. What Comines ſaid of them. III. 806. a.

Fleſh: the Brachmans eat no fleſh. II. 115. and b. 116. a.

Fleuri (Abbey). When the Proteſtants plundered it, they found there a great many good manuſcripts. II. 69. a. Some of them were ſold to the Queen of Sweden, and the reſt fell to the Vatican. ibid.

Floyd, the Jeſuit, quoted. I. 745. b. n. (49).

Floral Games; after what manner they were celebrated. III. 53. b. What paſſed one day between the people and Cato with reſpect to that celebration. 54. a. When, and by whoſe authority, they were exhibited for the firſt time. ibid. b. 55. a. How a fund was raiſed to defray the charges of them. ibid.

Florence, in Savonarola's time, was ſplit into factions. V. 61. The great authority which that Monk had there. 57.

Florentines, their ridiculous geſtures and motions repreſented in a Comedy. IV. 10. a. b. It is pretended that they were more effectually converted by Savonarola's Sermons, than the Ninevites were by the preaching of Jonas. V. 57. b.

Florilegium, its author and uſe. III. 725. a. b.

Floron (a ſpirit of the order of Cherubims), his anſwer when he was aſked what the ſpots in the moon were. II. 498. b. 499. a.

Florus cenſured for a groſs fault which had not been taken notice of in the Variorum of Holland. II. 161. a. Commits a fault in Geography, with regard to the town of Heraclea. IV. 662. b. 663. a.

Fluſhing, a city in Zealand, drives out the Spaniſh garriſon. IV. 453.

Focaria; the uſe which the Latin of the lower age has made of that word. III. 736. b.

Foe, was the firſt founder of a ſect among the Chineſe. V. 202. a. b. 203. a.

Fœtus: the formation of it is the moſt exquiſite production of an intelligent Being. I. 305. b. and n. (129).

Foix, a college at Toulouſe, has neither Profeſſors nor any other teachers in it. II. 95. a.

Foix (Paul de) why he refuſed to ſee Francis Patricius at Ferrara. I. 472.

Foix (Gaſton de) a true thunderbolt of war. III. 812. a.

Folembray, a palace built by Francis I, entirely burnt, by whom, and for what. III. 530. b.

Folly. Eraſmus's praiſe of it is very well received by the public; eſpecially by people of diſtinction. II. 810. a. It has been printed about a hundred times, more or leſs. ibid.

Fondi; Barbaroſſa, King of Algiers, beſieges and takes it by aſſault. III. 189. b.

Fontaine (la) quoted on the jealouſy of ſiſters. II. 701. b. Makes a ſophiſm in defence of his works. III. 260. a. Is cenſured on the ſubject of Æſop's life, written by Planudes. II. 829. a. b. Has not adjuſted his reckoning in an Hiſtorical performance, ſo well as Madam Scuderi has done in a romance. 830. a. He might have given a better account of the tranſlation which Socrates made of Æſop's fables. ibid. b. Whom he owns for maſters. IV. 156. a. One of his tales is taken from Boccace and Apuleius. II. 38. a. b. He does not always point out the fountain he draws from. ibid. b. His verſes on the vain promiſes which Poets make to print no more. 83. a. b. His tales, how far to be condemned. V. 837. Condemned by the ſentence of a magiſtrate of Paris. 807. 838. n. (10). So much the more pernicious, as the expreſſions made uſe of in them, are not groſly obſcene. 847.

Fontanus (Petrus) an Adulterer meets with the puniſhment of Abelard. II. 8. b.

Fontevraud; the complaiſance that was ſhewn to an Abbeſs of that abbey. III. 67. a. The family of one of its Abbeſſes. V. 298. b. And her death. II. 67. b.

Forbes (John) ſee in the Dictionary, the article Leſley. III. 783.

Force (James de la) how preſerved in the maſſacre of St Bartholomew. III. 180. a.

Foreſti; Philip de Bergamo was of that family. I. 769. a.

Foretel. Thoſe who take upon them to foretel things to come, are happy when they ſerve a Prince, deſigned for great purpoſes. I. 447. b. Whether it be poſſible to foretel things to come, which have no dependence upon a neceſſary cauſe. II. 332. b.

Formiæ the capital city of the Læſtrigons, built by Lamus. III. 786.

Forms (Subſtantial) a reflexion upon that doctrine. II. 250. a. b. 251. a. b. The inexplicable difficulties of it. III. 196. a. b. 362. a. Into how many abſurdities they lead thoſe who maintain them. IV. 266. a. b. Conſequences that may be drawn from them. V. 594. b. 595. a. b. &c.

Formularies; the more general they are, the better calculated are they to prevent ſchiſms. I. 718. b. It is difficult to draw up one that ſhall cut off all occaſion of diſpute. III. 390. b. People ſign them every day againſt their conſciences, in order to avoid impriſonment, exile, death, &c. V. 811.

Fornication; whether the magiſtrate has a right to puniſh it. I. 222. a. b. 223. a. b. The indulgence which is ſhewn to that vice. 222. b. 223. a. And for what reaſon. ibid. See Uncleanneſs.

Fortune; one ought not to abuſe her favours. I. 71. b. Her favours are ſooner acquired by unlawful than by lawful means. 224. b. Fraudulent ways of making one's fortune. 271. a. b. People debaſe as much as they can the birth of thoſe whom ſhe raiſes to the higheſt dignities. 350. b. People often complain without reaſon of what they call her caprices. 698. a. b. The ſyſtem of the Atheiſts is inconſiſtent with the account that is given of ſuch a being. II. 419. b. 438. a. IV. 55. a. b. She reſembles women in this, that ſhe prefers young perſons to the old. II. 438. a. Scioppius unſeaſonably acts the part of a Divine upon this head. ibid. She loves to have her favours ſnatched from her. 736. a. Is never ſo much honoured, as when curſed and reviled. III. 428. b. 429. a. What Pliny ſays of Fortune. IV. 933. b. 934. a. She has among her creatures ſome that are elect, and ſome that are reprobate. 460. b. How a man ought to behave to her. ibid. Complaints againſt her. 477. and b. 478. a. A ſacrifice which the Roman ladies offered to her. V. 130. a. What the Antients ſaid of her influence. 367. b. &c. Whether ſhe favours ſome in a manner independent on their prudence, and perſecutes others in a manner independent on their imprudence. 368. a. b. &c. It is hard to know what to make of her. 369. b. 370. a. b. The idea which the Pagans formed of her. 367. b. 368. a. b. 369. a. b. People often impute to her what they ought to charge on their own imprudence. 372. a. But on ſeveral occaſions a man that is unhappy by his own fault, has as much right to complain of Fortune as an unfortunate man, who has punctually diſcharged his duty. ibid.

Forum; there was a time when people could not have their ſtatues placed there without a ſpecial privilege. II. 290. b.

Foſſeuſe; her intrigue with Henry the Great. IV. 335. b. 336. a.

Foucher, Canon of Dijon quoted. II. 331. b. 332. a. n. (101), (102), (104).

Fougaſſe has tranſlated into French the firſt century of Boccalini's Ragguagli di Parnaſſo. II. 38. n. (a).

Founders of orders, have generally had female votaries, who conſtantly attended them. III. 888. b.

Fountains which had a ſingular property. III. 636. a. b. 644. a. b.

Fracaſtor dedicates one of his pieces to Marc Antony Flaminius, and to Galeacius Florimont. III. 58.

France; the Prelates of that country have not the liberty of propoſing what they pleaſe in their aſſemblies. I. 157. a. b. Carried on a correſpondence with Count Tekeli. 171. a. Choſe to wage war with the edict of Nantes, rather than with the houſe of Auſtria. 305. b. From whom its Kings are derived according to ſome. 529. a. b. 530. a. b. Has been full of ſeditious preachers. II. 95. 101. b. 102. a. And expoſed to horrible factions. 208. b. 209. a. Was formerly a ſtate like the empire of Germany. 222. a. The court of France ſends an Embaſſador extraordinary to the States General, in favour of the houſe of Orange. 153. b. Formerly its Kings were not of age till twenty-one years complete. 381. Was bubbled, and ſhamefully betrayed in a treaty of peace. 443. Its monarchy brought to the brink of ruin, by the immoderate ambition of the branch of Burgundy. 462. b. 463. a. Makes a peace which was very diſhonourable in ſome reſpects. 739 b. 740. a. b. Goes upon the antient maxim Divide & impera. III. 851. a. Not lawful for its Kings to marry baſtards. 797. b. Makes a peace with England, that was more uſeful than glorious. 800. a. b. More money raiſed in it by Lewis XI, than by any of his predeceſſors. 800. Why its ſubjects are more quiet at this time than ever they were. 815. a. b. A great ſlavery for the court of France to want the Pope's bull for the making of Biſhops. IV. 100. a. Its limits in the county of Rouſſillon. 102. b. Was very unfortunate in the XVth and XVIth centuries. 310. a. b. The office of Prime Miniſter there compared to a net, in which all madmen are catched. V. 95. a. There is hardly a word of truth in what is related of its Kings before Clovis. 494. b. n. (13). France is become more Popiſh between the year 1690, and the year 1701. II. 125. a. b. A new plan upon which John du Tillet undertakes to write the Hiſtory of France. V. 351.

Francfort; the magiſtrates of that city order a ſpeech to be ſtruck out of the catalogue of their fair. III. 169. b. The Dutch congregation there is entirely diſperſed by perſecution. 173. The Jews are driven from thence by popular commotions. 387. The diviſions of the Reformed Church there. V. 450. b.

Francfort upon the Oder, when its univerſity was erected. III. 539.

Franché-Comté and the ſeventeen provinces of the Low-Countries, made up the circle of Burgundy. II. 222. Conquered in the year 1674. IV. 211. b.

Francis I, King of France, an extemporary harangue made to him by Alciatus. I. 194. b. 195. a. Whether he enquired what an Ariſtotelian Phiſopher was. II. 6. b. Makes a progreſs to the coaſts of Normandy in hopes of finding a cool air. 189. The evaſion which he made uſe of to curry favour with the Proteſtants. I. 721. II. 261. b. 262. a. His indignation upon reading a paſſage of Dante. 296. b. His ſoul goes directly to Heaven without ſtopping ping at Purgatory. 372. b. 373. a. The merry reaſon which his ſteward gave for it to the deputies of the Sorbonne. ibid. He boaſted that he had never ſeen any learned man, whoſe knowledge he had not exhauſted in two years. 374. b. Ill paid for all his cabals, to favour the amours of Henry VIII. 435. a. Deſires one of his miſtreſſes to return ſome jewels, which having received in ingots, he ſends back again to her, and approves of her conduct. 462. a. b. What we are told concerning his amours with the Counteſs of Chateau-Briand. ibid. What we ought to think of the proteſtation which he is ſaid to have made, with regard to the Ducheſs of Eſtampes. 845. and a. b. His complaints againſt providence. III. 89. and b. The prudent advice which was given him, before he came to the crown, by Gouffier Boiſy, or Du Prat, or Mr de Grignaux. 88. a. b. 89. a. Ill ſerved by his own mother. 90. b. The calumnies with which he is blackened. ibid. 91. a. b. 92. a. b. 93. a. He charges his children to revenge him on pain of his curſe. 95. b. Judgment of the Hiſtories that have been writ of him in his own time, or in that of his ſon Henry. 334. b. 335. a. He grew worſe humoured as he advanced in years. 395. b. Was very unhappy in the choice of his miniſters. ibid. Diſgraces his favourite the Conſtable de Montmorenci, at the ſame time that Solyman diſgraces and puts to death his favourite Ibrahim Baſha. 588. b. Approves Marot's verſion of the Pſalms. IV. 157. a. b. 160. b. 161. a. Deſires Melanchthon to come into France. 185, 186. and a. b. 191. b. Receives ſignal ſervices from his ſiſter, and has an extraordinary friendſhip and eſteem for her. 316. a. b. 317. a. Is ſomething ſhaken with the propoſal of a maſs of ſeven points. 318. b. Whether his love for the Ducheſs of Eſtampes, began before his confinement, or after it. II. 845. When he was ſet at liberty. ibid.

Francis II. The Proteſtants had been entirely ruined in France, if he had lived two years longer. III. 400. and b.

Francis de Paula; a falſe miracle that has been aſcribed to him. III. 95. b. 96. a.

Francis de Sale has a great eſteem for Peter Fenoillet, and gives him a benefice. III. 22. Said of Lewis XI, that he was a good Catholic, but a bad Chriſtian. 809. b.

a man like

Franciſcans; a continual jealouſy reigns between them and the Dominicans. II. 239. a. Very much puzzled about a book. III. 84. a. b. 85. a. Do not obſerve the rules of their order. ibid. b. 86. a. Preach abſurd things concerning their founder. ibid. and b. Can have no property in any thing. IV. 198. The concern they had in Savonarola's affair, and the generous and open proceeding of one of them, in what related to the challenge about the trial of fire. V. 62. b. 63. a. b. 64. a. b. The advantage was wholly on their ſide in this affair. 64. a. b.

Frankenſtein faulty in his notes upon Priolo. III. 266. b.

Franco-Gallia; a judgment paſſed on that book. III. 519. b. 520. a.

Franeker; by whoſe care the garden of that univerſity was enlarged. V. 442. Who was the firſt that read lectures there. ibid. a. The diſputes of that univerſity ſilenced by authority. 817.

Fraſſen, Cordelier, would have been puzzled to anſwer Spinoza. I. 26. a.

Fraternity: a fraternity or brotherhood, founded upon adoption, was no leſs an obſtacle to marriage than a natural fraternity. V. 49. b. 50. a.

Frauds (pious). I. 726. b. 727. a. 777. b. 778. a. 793. a. 796. b. 797. a. II. 176. a. b. 177. a.

Frederic II, King of Denmark, rejects the articles of Union. III. 390. a.

Frederic Barbaroſſa, and Lewis of Bavaria: Hungerus writes an apology for theſe two Princes. III. 534.

Frederic, Elector Palatine, created King of Bohemia. V. 677. Accepts that crown with the conſent of the Proteſtant Princes of Germany. 678. Whether, in accepting it, he acted contrary to the rules of prudence. ibid. and 679.

Freedom of Rome; thoſe who obtained it, took upon them the name of him who procured them that honour. I. 610. a.

Free-will; the different ideas that people form of it. I. 661. a. b. There are certain articles which it is difficult not to adopt, when once the doctrine of Free-will is embraced. 759. a. The definition of Free-will properly ſo called. II. 226. b. Does not hinder all the actions of man's will from being unavoidable conſequences of Fate. 496. a. Was not poſſible to be explained by the ſyſtem of Epicurus. 790. a. b. 791. a. His motion of declination did not mend the matter. ibid. b. 792. a. b. Carneades invents a more ſubtle ſolution. ibid. b. Some perſons have made it a doubt whether a man was endowed with it. III. 374. b. The Thomiſts, the Janſeniſts, and the Calviniſts, maintain the ſame ſide of the queſtion here. 548. a. Difficulties upon this head. IV. 94. a. b. 95. a. b. 96. a. Whether it can be of any uſe, to ſolve the difficulties concerning the origin of evil. 112. b. 113. a. b. 414. b. 415. a. b. 416. a. 517. a. b. to 521. a. b. 788. a. b. 789. a. Ochinus's labyrinths upon this ſubject. 390. b. 391. a. A doctrine which ſeems to deſtroy it. 782. b. Whether it be a good proof of the ſpecific difference between the ſouls of men and thoſe of beaſts. 907. a. b. to 909. a. b. Victorious objections are made pro and con. V. 151. a. b. to 156. a. b. Reaſon is againſt it. 208. a. b. One cannot ſee how to reconcile it with the quality of a being that is created out of nothing. 212. b.

Fregoſa, the French Embaſſador, is killed, and falſe inſtructions are forged and aſcribed to him. III. 91. a.

Freber (Marquard) it is ſaid that the Jeſuits played him a ſhameful trick, and that he complained of it in a Manifeſto which is not to be ſeen now. IV. 726. b. 727. a.

Freber (Paul) his contradiction with reſpect to Geldenhaur. III. 148. and b. 149. a. b.

Freigius (Nicolas) particulars concerning him. III. 105. a.

French are very apt to let the life of an illuſtrious kinſman fall into oblivion. I. 705. II. 433. It is not true that they obtained a victory over the Dutch at Bodegrave. 43. and a. Beſieged in little Leith, are forced to capitulate, and leave Scotland for ever. 146, 147. After having rendered themſelves odious there. ibid. So diſfigure proper names, that they cannot be known. III. 722. b. 723. a. Are driven out of Italy. 766. a. Have extremely magnified the part they had in the defeat of the Turks at the paſſage of Raab. 793. b. Their folly ſet in oppoſition to the wiſdom of the Venetians. 814. b. They do not idolize their monarchs, ſo much as they are ſaid to do. 815. a. Their genius full of vivacity and variety. I. 64. b. It is againſt their inclination to be tied down to one ſcience. ibid. Whether a Frenchman may give the title of King of France to the King of England. 800. b. 801. a. Whether by ſo doing he declares his maſter an uſurper, and renders himſelf guilty of Felony and Treaſon. ibid. St Romuald, Balzac, and N. Beda affirm it, and are confuted. ibid. and 801. b. They are to blame for having eſteemed Guevara's Dial of Princes. III. 270. and a. b. Compared to the Romans by Langolius. V. 417.

Friburgh and Briſac remain in the poſſeſſion of France by the peace of Nimeguen. III. 720. a.

Fricius (Andrew) Orichovius diſputes with him. IV. 411.

Friderickſburg; the Unitarians who had obtained leave to reſide there, are ordered to depart by the Duke of Holſtein. III. 902.

Friends. What judgment we ought to form of thoſe perſons who keep even the leaſt notes of their friends, with a deſign to take advantage of them, in caſe of a rupture. III. 553. a. The illuſions to which friends are liable. IV. 272. a. b. Good advice that was given to a couple of friends. V. 148. b. 149. a. b.

Friendſhip; an inſtance of a tender friendſhip. I. 525. a. b. 526. a. It is ſeldom of a very long continuance. II. 5. b. A rare proof which the wife of Auguſtin Niphus gave of it. IV. 379. b.

Frieſland; the writers of that country publiſh a thouſand fables. II. 769. a.

Froila, King of the Aſturias, whether his wife was daughter to Eudes, Duke of Aquitain. IV. 283. a. b.

Froiſſard; the harangue which he puts into the mouth of Joan, Queen of Naples, contains divers falſities. IV. 303. b. n. (49). Quoted. 897. a. b. 898. a. n. (1), (4).

Frontoniani, a ſect of Orators. III. 107.

Frugality. The extraordinary frugality of Ageſilaus. I. 130. a. A remarkable inſtance of that virtue. III. 1. a. b.

Fruterius; the uſe that was made of his manuſcripts after his death. III. 159. b. 160. a.

Fugitives for Religion; nothing more common than to ſee them ringing the alarm againſt the ſects. III. 758.

Fulnec, a ſmall town, erects a ſchool. II. 536. Is plundered by the Spaniards. ibid.

Fulvia receives the Roman ladies, who had recourſe to her interceſſion againſt the Triumviri, in a very rough manner. III. 489.

Fulvii; the origin of that family. III. 114. a. b.

Fumbling is more uſed in the little towns, than in the great ones. IV. 461. b.

Funds: a kingdom cannot poſſibly preſerve its reputation abroad, and keep its neighbous in awe, if the ſovereign has not the funds in readineſs. V. 659.

Furetiere has committed a groſs blunder in ſpeaking of Caſſius. II. 348. b. 349. a. The ſatirical ſtrokes which he levels at thoſe writers who live by their pen. IV. 843. a. His Dictionary corrected and improved by the Sieur de Beauval. I. 672. b.

Furius. The Furius of Catullus is very different from the Furius mentioned by Horace. II. 395. a. b. Voſſius cenſured on that head. ibid.

Furmerius; the fact which he alledges to prove that the antient Kings of Frieſland were very long-lived is altogether improbable. I. 542. b. 543. a.

Furſtembergh (the Prince of), his being forcibly carried away diſſolves the conference about the general peace which was treating at Cologn. IV. 122. a.

Future events; thoſe who venture to foretel them, are happy when they ſerve a Prince whom the providence of God deſigns for great purpoſes. I. 447. b. A wiſe man ought to be extremely reſerved concerning them. 749. b. II. 749. b. The difficulty of foretelling them, when they have no dependance upon a neceſſary cauſe. 332. b. Thoſe who take upon them to foretel future events are the moſt dangerous peſts of mankind. III. 321. a.

G.

G*Abay Faro* (Aaron), a Portugueſe Jew that was converted to Chriſtianity. V. 539. n. (d).

Gabalis (le Comte de), whether that piece ought to paſs for an original. II. 87. a. A fragment of it concerning Noah and his wife. 431. b. 432. a.

Gaguin does not defend Joan, Queen of Navarre, well againſt the calumnies with which ſhe is blackened. II. 224. a. b. 225. a. Unjuſtly put upon a level with Paulus Æmilius. 764. b. 765. a.

Gaillard (Giles) turns Proteſtant, and publiſhes the motives of his converſion. IV. 884. a.

Gain: the love of gain occaſions a great deal of meanneſs. I. 194. a. b.

Galatinus (Peter), a Franciſcan, accuſed of having ſtolen from Porchettus Salvago. IV. 168. and a.

Galba would have been thought worthy of a crown, if he had never wore one. III. 405. and a. His complaiſance to Mæcenas. IV. 21. a.

Galeazzo (John) dies by poiſon, and not by over careſſing his wife. I. 404. a. b.

Galen, his objection againſt animated atoms. II. 779. b. He thinks it ſtrange that Chryſippus ſhould trouble himſelf to give a ſerious explication of poetical traditions. III. 648. b. Who was the firſt that tranſlated his works into Latin. 775.

Galileo ſtiled Firſt Mathematician to the Grand Duke of Tuſcany. V. 499. His buſt honourably placed and reſpected by Viviani. ibid.

Galiſſard is guilty of two overſights concerning John Damaſcen. II. 586. a.

Gallant, one that meets with the puniſhment of Abelard. II. 8. b.

Gallantry; what is the greateſt ſin that can be committed in its empire. II. 602. a.

Gallantries of the Kings of France; the author of that work has adopted all the miſtakes of Varillas, and even made them worſe. IV. 697. b. The firſt edition of it has more the air of a true Hiſtory than the ſecond. V. 393. b.

Gallois (le) cenſured for ſeveral errors with reſpect to Aretin's plagiariſm. I. 435. a. b.

Gall-nut, certain inſects produce it by pricking the oak. V. 499. b.

Gallucci (Father) confounds himſelf in the deſcription of a fight. II. 130. b.

Gallus Romæ Hoſpes: a book compoſed under that title by Lewis de Mont-joſieu. IV. 245. a. b.

Gameren (Hanard), who that author was. V. 236. n. (a).

Games (Compital) re-eſtabliſhed by Tarquin the Proud. II. 163. b.

Games (Olympic), women were forbid to be preſent at them. I. 761. and a. b. III. 964. a.

Gammut; from whence that word comes. I. 633.

Ganges (King) put to death by the Gymnoſophiſts. III. 311. b. The evils which happened after his murther. ibid.

Gantois. The Gantois reduced to reaſon by Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy. II. 214. a. b.

Gap; its national Synod orders that a new article ſhould be inſerted in the Confeſſion of Faith, importing that the Pope is properly Antichriſt. III. 39. a.

Garamont (Claudius) makes puncheons, and prepares moulds for the Roman capitals. V. 388. He was Tori's diſciple. ibid.

Garaſſe; a paſſage concerning alabaſter quoted from him. I. 174. a. b. One of his calumnies againſt Beza refuted by a Roman Catholic. 798. a. The pitiful ſhift he made uſe of. 799. a. b. His character. ibid. b. and 800. a. An impertinent ſtory in his Doctrine Curieuſe. II. 180. a. b. Another that is ſtill more impertinent. 181. a. b. He vents a falſhood againſt Calvin with reſpect to Servetus. 265. a. Is a calumniator. 361. a. A train of his impertinences. 666. a. b. His judgment of Democritus and Diogenes ſeverely cenſured. 667. a. b. His ſcurrilities with reſpect to the Antinomians. III. 597. a. b. 598. a. b. The liberty he takes to change facts in the Hiſtory of Athenais. 780. a. b. How he abuſes the authority of Prateolus to blacken the Calviniſts. 936. a. b. Cenſures Paſquier, and takes occaſion to give examples of a ridiculous ignorance. 908. b. Is guilty of ſeveral miſtakes concerning ſome Magicians. IV. 939. b. 940. a. b. Publiſhes two violent ſatires under the name of Andreas Scioppius. V. 98. a. b. Is convicted of a groſs miſtake, with regard to Lucan and Tacitus. 282. a. b. Treats as an Atheiſt the anonymous author who concealed himſelf under the name of Antony Cornelius. 536. a. b. A ſuggeſtion of this Jeſuit examined. 523. &c. His miſtakes concerning the Querela Infantium. II. 556. a. b.

Garcia (Martin) cauſes the Alcoran to be tranſlated into the language of Arragon. I. 326.

Gard (Guy de la) tranſlates into French Baduel's diſcourſe on the marriage of men of letters, and gives it a wrong title. I. 604. a. b.

Garden (George) writes the life of John Forbes. III. 69.

Gardens of Adonis paſs into a proverb. I. 114. b. And thoſe of Alcinous likewiſe. 201. a.

Gardie (de la) traduced by Typotius. V. 374. a. b. 375. a. b.

Gardiner depoſed in the reign of Edward VI, for not ſupporting the rights of the crown. IV. 692. a. And reſtored by Queen Mary. ibid. b. A jeſt concerning John Poinet aſcribed to him, but falſely. 694. a. b.

Garlick; thoſe who had eat of it were not allowed to enter into the temple of the mother of the gods. V. 240. a.

Garnier (Giles), a man who transformed himſelf into a were-wolf, condemned to be burnt by an arrêt of the Parliament of Dole. I. 562. b.

Gaſſarus (Achilles), a Phyſician, was a true Heluo Librorum. III. 110.

Gaſſendus drops his deſign of writing a criticiſm upon Ariſtotle for fear of perſecution. I. 470. a. n. (80). Cenſured for taking an ironical praiſe in Horace for a ſerious one. II. 389. b. His elogy. ibid. Whether he ſuffered himſelf to be deceived by the Latin tranſlator of Plutarch, with reſpect to Carneades and Leontium. 782. a. None has wrote ſo well as he in behalf of Epicurus. 783. a. b. Wherein he differs from Des Cartes. III. 790. a. He was never in better health, than at the time when he ſhould have died according to the predictions of the Aſtrologers. IV. 264. a. Was a dreadful adverſary to that ſort of men. 531. b. 532. a. b. Peireſkius deſires him to write upon the Aſtronomical operation concerning Marſeilles. 678. a. Uſes all his ſkill to enervate Des Cartes's arguments for the immortality of the ſoul. 718. a. His doctrine relating to the conſervation of the creatures abſurd. 886. a. b. What he obſerved with reſpect to Mathematicians, and particularly Geometricians. V. 620. b.

Gaſſion (the Marſhal de), a panegyric on him forbid to be ſpoke. III. 438. a. How he refuted the reflexions of the Abbot de la Riviere at the ſiege of Courtray. IV. 460. a. A ſaying of his. V. 326. b.

Gauden is the author of Icon Baſilike. IV. 221. b. 222. a.

Gaulard (Sieur), tales under his name. I. 64. a.

Gaultier (James) multiplies the ſects of the Proteſtants as much as he can. II. 434. b. Enlarges his catologue of Heretics with the Melchiorites, an imaginary ſect. IV. 193.

Gauric (Luke), what he declared to Henry II, in his horoſcope. III. 401. b. 402. a.

Gautruche (Father), his faults remarked the more carefully becauſe he is in every body's hands. I. 77. b. n. (38).

Gaza, what he did for Argyropilus. I. 442.

Gazetteers, their relations not to be truſted to. I. 15. b. The moſt ſcurvy ones may promiſe themſelves immortality for the groſs lies they invent. II. 265. b. 266. a. 296. a. It is as difficult to reconcile the Gazetteers with themſelves, as to reconcile thoſe of different parties. III. 718. b. 719. a. The ignorance of the Paris Gazetteer. ibid. and b. Their ſhifts to augment and diminiſh the troops of a place beſieged. ibid. Thoſe of the Imperial towns generally great liars. V. 504.

Gazettes; the former are more to be truſted than the latter in certain caſes. I. 15. b. The invention of them was not the firſt way that was made uſe of to deceive the public. 129. Whether the Catholic Princes do right in ſuffering their vows and their pilgrimages in order to obtain a glorious campaign, to be put in the Gazettes. 161. a. Thoſe of Amſterdam are not uſed to celebrate the praiſes of the Popes. II. 475. b. They nevertheleſs praiſe Alexander VII. ibid. An obſervation upon the news which they contain. III. 271. b. The uſefulneſs of an office that might be ſet up with reſpect to the Gazettes. V. 751. a. The judgment which Guy Patin paſſes upon the Paris Gazette. 752. b. Their uſe with reſpect to dates. IV. 211. b.

Gediccus has not rightly comprehended the true intention of the author, who made it a doubt whether women were human creatures. III. 143. a. b.

Gela; by whom that city was built. III. 157. a. Its inhabitants ſend a colony to Agrigentum. ibid.

Gelée (Theophilus) tranſlates the Anatomical Hiſtory, and ſeveral other pieces of Du Laurens. III. 745. b.

Geminius (Livius), his infamous flattery, and his horrible imprecations. II. 703. b.

Genealogies; thoſe of the Jews attended with inſurmountable difficulties. I. 41. a. Figures are not much more neceſſary in matters of Geometry than in matters of Genealogy. II. 133. a.

Genealogiſts, their impertinences. IV. 650. a. b. V. 468. b. 469. a.

Genebrard treats Joſephus as an impious perſon for having compared Alexander's paſſage through the ſea of Pamphylia, with that of Moſes through the Red-Sea. IV. 608. b. 609. a. A difficulty relating to the firſt edition of his Chronicle. 509. b. 510. a. He treated thoſe who were not Catholics with ſevere calumnies. III. 733.

Gener, that word is taken indifferently in antient writers, for father-in-law and brother-in-law. IV. 644. b.

Generals of armies ſometimes ſupply the enemy with an after-game. I. 764. a. There are a great many of them whoſe victories turn only to the profit of thoſe who deal in mourning cloaths. II. 413. b. The Romans changed their Generals often. ibid. How much it concerns them to be diligent. 414. b. A political craft proves ſometimes more uſeful to them than all their ſkill in war. 547. b. Their tricks to render themſelves always neceſſary. V. 126. a. It concerns no body ſo much as them to be free from the ſuperſtitions of Judicial Aſtrology. 255. a. b. Too much circumſpection is hurtful to them ſometimes. 261. a. b.

Generation. The moſt excellent Naturaliſts before Ariſtotle admitted no generation, properly ſpeaking. I. 470. b. The relations which Phyſicians pretend to find between the organs of generation, and the throat. II. 636. b.

Generoſity; a very ſingular example of that virtue. I. 482. b.

Geneſt (St) ended his days by a tragedy. IV. 487. b. n. (37).

Geneva; a falſe preſage of Scaliger with reſpect to that city. I. 794. a. b. Diſorders prevailed there, notwithſtanding the reformation of doctrine. II. 264. The Italian Conſiſtory draws up articles of Faith there. III. 152. a. Its academy reſolves to admit no other ſyſtem but that of Ariſtotle. IV. 840. b. When, and upon what occaſion, a ſchool for the languages, &c. was erected there. II. 274. a. An oration which Broughton addreſſed to the inhabitants of Geneva. 150. a. A Greek and Latin copy of that oration. ibid. and b.

Genevois (the Prince of), why ſo called. III. 142. In attempting upon Beauvois he becomes his mother's priſoner. ibid.

Genii; whether they may not preſerve their ſpecies by generation. II. 66. b. Whether any ſuch beings really exiſt. 350. a. b. The doctrine of the Heathens touching a particular genius that attends every man. 249. b. 250. a. What Cardan ſays of his particular genius. 318. b. A ſmall pattern of the Platonic doctrine concerning them. IV. 689. b. 690. a.

Genius: men of an extraordinary genius. II. 661. b. 662. a. That kind of genius which inclines to ſport and toy with the Muſes, is generally a preſervative againſt the ill effects of too ſtrong an application to ſtudy. III. 883.

Gennadius, Patriarch of Conſtantinople, receives the croſier from the hands of Mahomet II himſelf. IV. 53. a.

Genoa; that city, from Luitprandus's time, was rather called Janua than Genoa, and for what reaſon. I. 614. a. Deſires to have Charles VII for her Lord. II. 464. a.

Gentiles; one does not know what the Fathers dreamed of, in ſome of their arguments againſt them. II. 498. a.

Gentilis; his differences with Calvin are more particularly deſcribed in the French than in the Latin life of Calvin. II. 274. b.

Gentius, King of Illyricum, is led in triumph at Rome. I. 340. b. 341. a.

Gentlemen: moſt of the gentlemen of France come from a village. III. 137. a.

Geometrical exerciſes, a ſaying of Plato, that God is continually employed in them. V. 621. b.

Geometricians; the ſmalleſt degree of inattention may occaſion a great many miſreckonings in their calculations. II. 388. b.

Georgians; their manners. IV. 33. b.

Gerard (Balthazar), what example encouraged him to aſſaſſinate William I, Prince of Orange. III. 601. a. He aſſaſſinates that Prince. II. 459. a. n. (27). III. 601. a.

Germain (St), Biſhop of Auxerre, reſtored to the Calendar by a decree of the Parliament. III. 897. a. b.

Germanicus; to whom that ſirname was given, and for what reaſon. II. 716. What Tacitus ſays of him in deſcribing his triumph. III. 921. b.

Germans; they require that the very hour of a perſon's birth ſhould be inſerted in his elogy. II. 429. a. But Roland Des-Mareſts blames them for it. ibid. n. (1). Who is the moſt antient Hiſtorian of that nation. 743. The Germans, at a time, tricked by Pope Julius II. III. 614. b. Refuſe to follow more than one profeſſion at once. I. 64. b. The loſſes which they ſuſtained at the ſiege of Landau. III. 718. b. 719. a.

Germany; ſeveral Catholic Princes of that country ſend Deputies to Lewis XIII, to recommend to him the intereſts of their religion. II. 134. b. What place was was called the paradiſe of Germany. 816. b. What was the ſource of the war, which deſolated Germany from the year 1618, to the peace of Munſter. III. 657. a. It produced ſome famous Latin Poets before Conrad Celtes. 724. b.

Gerſon criticizes Ruyſbroëck's treatiſe of the ſpiritual marriage. IV. 942. John de Schoonhove and Denis the Carthuſian, write anſwers to his Critical Diſſertation. ibid.

Gervaſe of Tilbury makes mention of the She-Pope, in his Otia Imperialia. IV. 738. b. 739. a. Martin Polonus takes from him the materials of his Chronicle. ibid. and b.

Geſner has expreſſed himſelf ſo ill in ſpeaking of Tortellius, that he might eaſily occaſion ſeveral groſs faults. I. 433. b. 434. a. His inattention. II. 142. a. The books of an author which Geſner gave hopes would be publiſhed, have been miſtaken for books actually printed. IV. 544. a. b.

Getæ; their Embaſſadors who were ſent on a treaty of peace or a truce, to perſons whoſe wrath was provoked, preſented themſelves playing on the lyre. I. 83. a. They were the moſt warlike of all men, and for what reaſon. III. 312. b. Are in this reſpect a ſhame to the Chriſtians. ibid. Treat Ovid with a great deal of humanity and civility. IV. 448. That Poet writes a poem in their language to the praiſe of Auguſtus. 445, 446. a. b.

Ghoſt. A Ghoſt which was ſaid to have haunted a perſon every night. II. 522. and a. b.

Ghoſt (the Holy) why he deferred his coming into the world for ten days. I. 652. a. A mean and unworthy anſwer to that queſtion. ibid. Among the Turks certain perſons born of a virgin-mother, are called ſons of the Holy Ghoſt. IV. 346. and a. b. The Popes moved Cardinal Pallavicini's pity, when they had no other aſſiſtance but his. V. 826.

Gibbets; the extraordinary height of ſome, and for what end. I. 591. and a. b.

Gibieuf (Father) enriches the works of Cardinal Berulle, with arguments and ſummaries. I. 786. b.

Gieſſen; the Landgrave of Heſſe erects a college there, on which the Emperor did the year following beſtow the title of univerſity. III. 386, 387. The univerſity of that town tranſported to Marpourg. V. 80.

Gifanius; a ſolution of the difficulties propoſed about him. III. 158, 159, and a. b. 160. a. b. 161. a. It was he that wrote the life of Lucretius. IV. 476. a.

Gifts are commonly ſeparated, ſome fall to one man's ſhare and ſome to another's. IV. 758. a. b.

Gyges; what his maxim was touching women who ſtript themſelves naked. III. 331. a.

Gil (Father) a Jeſuit, never knew any woman by ſight. IV. 125. a.

Gilles (Peter) compoſes, by order of his ſuperiors, an Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the churches of the Vaudois. III. 161, 162.

Gymnoſophiſts, there were two ſorts of them II. 117.

Girac cenſures Coſtar moſt injudiciouſly, I. 75. a. Does not act the part of an exact Critic. ibid. Does not reaſon conſequentially. ibid. Is ignorant of what he ſhould have known. ibid. and b. Explains Plutarch ill. ibid. b. Does not take the right way of confuting facts borrowed from the Pagan Mythology. ibid. b. 76. a. Quoted. 259. a. II. 813. b. 814. a. The judgment which he paſſes upon Amyot's tranſlation of Plutarch. I. 259. a. b. He conſtrues into treaſon a paſſage of Coſtar's reply. III. 399. a. Juſtly cenſures Coſtar with reſpect to the two veſſels of Jupiter. IV. 93. a. b. The Hiſtory of his quarrels with Coſtar. V. 341. a. b. &c. to 346. a. b.

Giraldus miſerably confounds things with reſpect to Parthenius. IV. 483. b.

Girardus (Albertus) tranſlator of Stevin's works. V. 236. a.

Girl. Whether a girl that ſhould read lectures, would promote or retard the improvement of her hearers, by hiding her handſome face. I. 325. a. b. The behaviour of one that was a novice in the affairs of love. II. 513. a. b. A girl who contradicts her father's words as to a promiſe which he made in her name. III. 258. a. IV. 87. b. 797. a. See Maid.

Giſeric, King of the Vandals, takes Rome, &c. III. 759. b.

Gladiators; their ſhews aboliſhed by Honorius. I. 230. a. They hired themſelves to the firſt comer to kill one another. II. 196. a.

Glandorpius cenſured for making three Conſuls out of one. I. 612. b. For dividing one Poet into two. II. 354. a. b. He cenſures Rutilius unjuſtly with reſpect to the Parthian war. 348. a. b. His notion about the time when the law Fannia was made, does not at all agree with what Pliny ſays of it. III. 6. a. b. 7. a. b. He impoſes upon the reader twice, in ſpeaking of Fulvia. 119. b. His error in taking Hortenſius for Sylla's Lieutenant-General. 491. a. b.

Glaphyra; her dream; with the moral reflexions which Joſephus has added to it. III. 164. a. b.

Glaſs. It was a cuſtom with lovers, in drinking to apply their lips to the ſame part of the glaſs, to which their miſtreſſes had applied theirs. III. 867. a. b.

Glycera, a courtezan, rallies Stilpo. V. 242. b.

Glory; men are extremely greedy of it. II. 298. a. b. 299. a. It is inſeparable from what is uſeful in affairs of war. 413. a. b. Thoſe who aſpire to the ſame glory, may very well eſteem, but can never love one another. 867. a. b. The deſire of it is the laſt thing which a man parts with. V. 325. b. There is nothing more uncommon than for a man to know how to enjoy quietly the glory that he has acquired. 365. b.

Gloſſographers; the great authority of thoſe who commented upon the Civil-Law. I. 66. a. b. 67. a. Their ignorance of good literature made them fall into divers miſtakes. 67. a. Who was the firſt of the French Lawyers that exploded their barbariſms. II. 721.

Gloves of Frangipani, whence ſo called. III. 102. a. b.

Gnoſtics; one need not ſcruple to believe that they admitted thoſe powers and principles which it is ſaid they did. II. 251. a. The impertinent ſtories which they told about the ſouls that aſcended up to Heaven. 751. b. They ridiculed thoſe who ſuffered martyrdom. IV. 108. b.

Goat. A Goat ſacrificed to a Poet by his friends, in a carnival ſport. III. 574. and a. b. What conſtruction was put upon it. 575. a. b. A ſhe-Goat, the miſtreſs of an Italian General. I. 675. a. The ſhe-Goats of a whole country burnt, and for what reaſon. ibid. b. Whether the blackneſs of a ſhe-Goat can give any particular quality to her milk, and whether it be poſſible for a man to diſcern that quality. II. 636. a. b. The drinking of Goat's blood makes a man look pale. 712. a.

Gobelin (John) his judgment of Flavius Blondus. II. 32. a. b.

Goblet of the world; what the Arabian Philoſophers underſtood by it. I. 469. b.

GOD. The doctrine of the School-men, touching the diſtinguiſhing character of God, and of his creatures. I. 136. b. His name called the Tetragramma. 244. b. 245. a. b. What the Heathens thought of a God that had died. 281. a. b. God has the ideas of an infinity of worlds, different from each other, but regular to the laſt degree. 311. a. An argument to prove his exiſtence. 345. b. Not to know him is a leſs evil than to attribute to him what the Pagans attributed to their gods. 382. a. His vengeance is leſs dreaded than that of men. 435. b. 436. a. One cannot perceive his greatneſs better than by deſpairing to comprehend it. 461. b. Whether the incomprehenſibility of his nature, is a reaſon for neglecting the worſhip of him. 462. a. A maxim of ſome people, that we never have recourſe to him, except when we diſtruſt the valour and prudence of the Princes of this world. 573. a. His fore-knowledge is ſo far from deſtroying man's liberty, that, on the contrary, it eſtabliſhes it. 661. b. Whether the things which never were, nor ever ſhall be, are poſſible to him. 759. a. 760. b. 761. a. God in the Scripture acts after the manner of men, and this his behaviour is anſwered in ſuch a manner as if he were really taken for a man. II. 247. a. To obey his laws out of a due regard to his majeſty, and againſt the ſtrongeſt inclinations of nature, is the moſt acceptable worſhip that can be paid to him. 315. b. 316. a. A bold and blaſphemous cenſure paſſed on his works 379. b. In what manner the author of that cenſure was puniſhed for it. ibid. 380. a. The uncertainty of tradition upon that head. ibid. Every body does not agree that there is a neceſſary connexion between his providence, and the immortality of the ſoul. 419. a. The Sadducees are a proof of this. ibid. It is poſſible to believe in him, and at the ſame time be perſuaded that ſhame is only founded on a poſitive law. 670. a. Every objection againſt his exiſtence, does not convince a man that there is no God. ibid. b. How far his glory was proſtituted by the Pagan Poets. 742. b. The moſt perfect way of loving him, is to love him for his own ſake. 780. a. In what ſenſe it may be ſaid that he is ſubject to laws. III. 462. b. Thoſe who deny his exiſtence have leſs right to deny Magic and Sorcery than others. 471. a. The great efficacy of his word. 625. a. b. Some nations are ignorant of his exiſtence. 781. a. b. His ſpirituality proved. 791. b. The belief of his exiſtence, without the belief of his providence, can neither be a motive to virtue, nor a reſtraint to vice. 923. b. The anſwer that was made to a Prince who aſked the definition of God. V. 141. a. b. to 145. a. He could have made things otherwiſe than he has made them. 155. a. b. An objection againſt this, and the anſwer to it. ibid. As ſoon as he declares a new doctrine to men, the devil oppoſes it. IV. 46. a. b. It has always been lawful and even neceſſary to prove his exiſtence. 80. a. b. He is perfectly good. 416. b. 417. a. b. 418. a. b. 419. a. 572. a. b. 788. a. b. The way to be like him. 675. b. He is incapable of envy and jealouſy. I. 311. b. IV. 574. b. &c. It is infinitely more advantageous to believe that he exiſts, than to believe that he does not. 489. a. The deſire of vindicating him has obliged the Divines to turn themſelves a thouſand ways. 523. a. b. Whether the doctrine that ſhould make him the author of ſin, would lead to Atheiſm. ibid. b. That ſyſtem which places him in the higheſt degree of glory and elevation, ought to be preferred to all others. 524. a. Two oppoſite things lead men to the knowledge of him. 572. b. An examination of what is uſually ſaid, that we muſt not meaſure his privileges and duties by the line of ours. 655. a. Whether it be as eaſy for him to produce a new ſoul every moment, as to reproduce the ſame. ibid. b. None but he is wiſe. 675. a. Whether he can lie or deceive. 876. a. b. Whether it can well be concluded from the exiſtence of God, that there are dæmons. 938. b. 939. a. b. A reflexion on the incomprehenſibility of his nature. V. 5. b. His immutability inconſiſtent with the nature of extenſion. 209. b. He cannot be the ſubject of inherence of the thoughts of men. 210. a. b. He muſt neceſſarily be happy. 211. b. Whether he be the immanent cauſe of the alterations in the univerſe. 588. b. A reflexion upon the conſequences from the eternity or of the beginning of motion with reſpect to his exiſtence. 593. b. 594. a. Whether nothing but the eternity, of motion can prove the exiſtence of a mover diſtinct from matter. ibid. a. b. Facts ſhewing that it is lawful for the Orthodox to diſpute about the arguments for his exiſtence. 595. b. 596. a. He is continually employed in Geometrical exerciſes, according to Plato's maxim. 621. b. The opinion of Divines touching his eſſence and ſubſtance being diffuſed through all bodies, is liable to a thouſand difficulties. II. 100. b. He may be preſent in imaginary ſpace. ibid. It was pretended that Savonarola converſed with him. V. 72. a. b. What the God of Calvin is, if we believe the Catholics and Bertius. 824. What the God of the Socinians is, according to Mr Jurieu. ibid. It becomes his Majeſty to ſpeak with authority, and not to argue. 833.

Goddeſſes; a tradition that prevailed concerning mortals that lay with them. I. 314. a.

Godeau; what he ſays of the facility in compoſing. III. 262. b. Attacked by a Critic on the ſubject of an hymn. 823. and b. 824. a. b.

Godfroy (Theodore) publiſhes John d'Auton's Hiſtory of Lewis XII. I. 589.

Gods; their amours. I. 454. a. b. Their Pederaſty. II. 482. a. b. 483. a. Reflexions upon the Heathen ſyſtem of a multitude of gods. 250. a. b. The Hebraicians pretend that they have all been taken from the Jewiſh tradition. 431. b. The falſe arguments which the Fathers alledged to deſtroy their worſhip. 498. a. Chimera's touching their original. 673. a. b. The Pagans accuſed their gods of forcing them to evil. III. 374. b. 375. a. b. 376. a. Their condition was very miſerable. 641. a. b. II. 788. b. 789. a. Great Philoſophers have aſſigned for the cauſe of their exiſtence, a being that was not God. III. 649. a. b. 650. a. b. Others have deprived them of life and knowledge. 653. a. b. Cicero ſays that they were formerly men. V. 411. b. See Divinities. Knowledge their chief priviledge. 587. b. 588. a. I. 311. a. b. The Romans were leſs jealous of the honour of their gods than of that of their countrymen. 761, 762. The Pagans repreſented them under the notion of beings which puniſhed one crime by inducing the offender to commit another. IV. 229.

Gods (tutelar) of towns were called forth by the beſiegers, when they thought it likely that they would be obliged to ſurrender. V. 185. a. b.

Goldaſt (Melchior) his brother murders a gentlewoman in the high-way near Straſbourg. III. 168. b. 169. a. He inſerts the Defenſor Pacis of Marſilius de Mambrino, in the ſecond tome of his monarchy. IV. 198. a.

Golius (James) was a good Proteſtant. III. 389. His profound knowledge of the Oriental tongues. ibid. 525.

Golius (Peter) his voyages to the Levant, where he is treated with great civility on his brother's account. III. 389. a. b.

Gomarus; what Baudius prognoſticated, would be the iſſue of his controverſy with Arminius. I. 687. b. 688. a. What Joſeph Hall ſays of it. III. 343. b. He procures an edition of the Defenſor Pacis writ by Marſilius of Padua. IV. 198. a. b.

Gombauld is rallied on his being ill lodged. V. 401. b.

Gomez (Ruy) by what device he acquired the friendſhip of Philip II. V. 326. b. n. (10).

Gomorrhæus; what book it is. II. 588. a. b. 589. a. b.

Gonzaga (Cecilia of) deſpiſes the pleaſures of the world, and conſecrates herſelf to God. II. 551.

Gonzaga (Louiſa Mary de) an Aſtrologer promiſes her a crown, and the prediction was fulfilled. III. 826. b. See Poland (the Queen of).

Good ſurpaſſed by Evil according to Xenophanes. II. 834. b. Whether it ſurpaſſes evil in the nature of things. V. 576. a. b. &c.

Good-fortune, one of the three qualities of a good Phyſician. III. 487, 488. and a. Reflexions on this head. ibid. and b. Whether good and bad fortune are the effect, one of them of prudence, and the other of imprudence. ibid. and 489. a. b. Whether there be in human life good-fortune independent on prudence. V. 367. b. 368. a. b. 370. a. b. 371. a. b. 372. a. b. 373. a. b. People call by this name and impute to fortune that which is ſometimes the effect of prudence. 371. a. b.

Good (Public) a cloak for avarice. II. 259, 260.

Goodneſs. What is the idea that we ought to have of perfect goodneſs. IV. 416. b. 417. a. b. 418. a. b. Taken for ſimplicity. II. 164. a. b.

Goods. Whether it comes nearer perfection to have a community of goods, or to keep every man his own, in order to ſupply therewith the neceſſities of others. II. 776. a. b. &c. People aſcribe to worldly good all the defects which the Pagans aſcribed to fortune. 369. b.

Good ſouls take it ill that a book which attacks their party ſhould remain unanſwered; and they are not able to diſcover the weak ſide of a bad confutation. V. 180. a.

Gooſe. A gooſe in love with a boy. I. 282. b. 283. a b. Another in love with a Philoſopher. III. 697. b.

Gordian (Emperor) Philip cauſes him to be depoſed, and afterwards to be killed. I. 593. b.

Gordius, what preſage he had of the crown. V. 310. and a. b.

Gorgias; to whom he ſerved as a model for the loftineſs of writing. II. 571. a. Harangued without preparation, and for what reaſon. IV. 784. a.

Gortynians, an Atheiſtical people of Phocis, the ſame with the Phlegyans. IV. 626. a.

Gortys, a city of Crete; by whom it was built. II. 875. a.

Goſpel; Jeſus Chriſt was willing it ſhould claſh not only with the religion of the Pagans, but likewiſe with their wiſdom. V. 831.

Goſpel according to St John; a Pagan quotes the beginning of it, to confirm Plato's doctrine. I. 255.

Goſpel (New), ſeveral of Cardinal Palavicini's maxims are cenſured in it. III. 326. b.

Goſpels publiſhed in the Anglo-Saxon tongue. III. 629. a. What Luther is charged with ſaying of the firſt three goſpels. 940. a. 942. a.

Goſſelin (William), French tranſlator of Tartaglia's Arithmetic. V. 297. a. b.

Goudron (the Marquis de) marries a proſtitute enriched by the great gifts of the Duke of Vitry. IV. 499. a. b.

Gouffier de Boiſy put for Duprat in ſeveral relations. III. 88. a. n. (6).

Goulu; his anſwers to a criticiſm on a paſſage of his tranſlation of Socrates's apology, examined. I. 514. a. b. A Supplement to the Hiſtory of his diſpute with Balzac. IV. 284. a. b.

Governors beſieged always ſend to know where a King fixes his quarters, when he aſſiſts at a ſiege. III. 718. a. b.

Gown: an action of damages brought againſt a man for diſordering the pleats of a gown. III. 492. a.

Gracchi; they transfer all the courts of judgment from the Senatorian to the Equeſtrian order. II. 710. a. b.

Grace; St Auguſtin, Calvin, Janſenius, the Thomiſts, were, at bottom, of the ſame way of thinking on that head. I. 106. a. III. 548. a. Bellarmin was likewiſe of the ſame opinion. I. 729. a. b. There is no ſyſtem which can remove all the difficulties which are to be met with on that ſubject. 481. b. 482. a. The inamiſſibility of Grace determined by the Synod of Dort. II. 70. a. b. It has been ſaid, that the doctrine of Grace is a ſea that has neither ſhore nor bottom. III. 548. a. The weak ſide of this doctrine. IV. 846. b. 847. a. A perſon may err in this point through good motives. V. 153. a. b. It is a ſcandal that the diſputes about Grace ſhould produce ſo many diviſions. 153. a. The cauſe of theſe diſputes. 821.

Grace (Univerſal), whether that hypotheſis be far from ſatisfying reaſon. I. 261. b. 262. a. The diſputes which it occaſioned. ibid. and b. Theſe diſputes are looked upon now with another eye than they were formerly. II. 584. b. See Predeſtination.

Gracian; two ſorts of readers complain of his works. IV. 457. a. b.

Grævius is miſtaken about the death of Francis Junius. III. 629.

Grammar; the not knowing one of its rules by heart, occaſions a learned man being ſent back to his rudiments. II. 404. a.

Grammar (French) more exact than the Greek or Latin grammar. I. 74. b. V. 327. b.

Grammar (Iriſh), who wrote the firſt. I. 718. a.

Grammarians: one that was made Emperor. I. 375. Another who thought that diſputing on any material queſtions of Divinity, was ſo much time ill employed. II. 190. b. Cenſured for looking after the misfortunes of other people, while they are ignorant of their own diſorders. 671. a. b. Grammarians and Philologers are eaſily provoked, and difficultly appeaſed. IV. 476. a.

Grammont (Marſhal), how he talked of the Proteſtant religion. IV. 276. a. It was thought that he loſt a battle on purpoſe. III. 59. b.

Grand (Mr le), his vindication of Sanders againſt Burnet. V. 43. b.

Grandeur. Our minds are not very capable of knowing true grandeur. IV. 669. b.

Grandier; what is affirmed of him in Mr d'Artignan's memoirs. III. 880. b. 881. a.

Grangier (Bonaventure) writes againſt the frequent practice of Bleeding introduced by Botal. II. 99. a.

Grape-ſtone; Anacreon choaked by one. I. 292. and a. b.

Gras (Henry) publiſhes Antony Saporta's treatiſe de Tumoribus præter Naturam. V. 44.

Gratitude is not ſubject to the ſame laws among Princes, as it is among private perſons. II. 755. a. b.

Great men are not ſo happy as people imagine. II. 219. b. 220. a. V. 581. b. 582. a. b. 583. a. b. In all places one ſhould ever ſpeak of them with reſpect. II. 754. b. It is neceſſary to watch the favourable moments for preſenting one's ſelf before them. III. 281. a. b. They eaſily make up their differences. IV. 698. a.

Greece deſerves the epithet of lying, of fabulous, and of malè feriata. I. 74. a. The General Hiſtory of Greece is a book full of faults. IV. 581. b. 582. a.

Greek language, what work deſerves to be called the treaſure of it. II. 295.

Greeks; what title they gave to the King of Perſia. I. 130. b. 514. b. A precept addreſſed to them to live in peace, to honour the Muſes, and to compoſe their differences, according to the rules of equity. 208. b. They are reproached with being always children. II. 82. a. Decried for their falſe evidences. 303. a. Their affection for their own tongue. 517. b. In what reſpect the Trojan war was uſeful to them. III. 317. a. Being ingenious and voluptuous, they ſtood in need of a religion burthened with ceremonies. V. 814.

Greeks (modern) complain of the little affection which the Church of Rome has for them. I. 508. and a. b. Follow the opinions of John Damaſcen more than thoſe of any other Father. II. 587. b. Their Prieſts falſely boaſt of a miracle every year at Eaſter. 746. a. What was the cauſe of the evils which they ſuffered at the taking of Conſtantinople. IV. 55. a. b. Four learned men of that country fled for refuge into France, under the reign of Charles VII. 169. b.

Gregory Nazianzen; an apology for him with reſpect to what he ſays of the kind of death which Ariſtotle died. I. 473. a. b. What he ſaid of his father. III. 729. a. b. See Nazianzen.

Gregory Nyſſenus; ſome think him author of the book which goes under the name of Nemeſius. IV. 346.

Gregory the Great; whether he was a Benedictine Monk. III. 126. a. b. &c. By what means he was found out in his ſolitude. 219. a. Whether he was obliged to revoke the law of Celibacy. 225. a. b. He once doubted of the reſurrection. 267. a. A book of Radulphus Flaviacenſis aſcribed to him. IV. 824. The ableſt men of the Church of Rome confute now-a-days the ſtory that is told of this Pope's having delivered the ſoul of Trajan from Hell. V. 397. and a. b.

Gregory V, Pope, how he was a near relation to Otho. IV. 428. a. b.

Gregory VII, Pope; a ſupplement to one of the remarks in his article. III. 517. b. Another ſupplement. IV. 296. a. b. 297. and a. b.

Gregory XI, Pope; complains to the Deputies of the Faculty of Theology at Paris, againſt the French tranſlation of the Defenſor Pacis of Marſilias of Padua. IV. 198. b.

Gregory (Peter) did not underſtand the author he cites in ſpeaking of Diagoras. II. 655. b.

Grim (Egbert) quotes the teſtimony of 135 writers for the ſtory of Pope Joan. III. 78. b.

Grynæus; famous men of that name. III. 255. b.

Grind; what the ſignification of that word is among the Hebrews. V. 37. a. b.

Griſons; their edict againſt Heretics. III. 757. a. They publiſh an edict againſt the Heretics, and Scipio Lentulus writes an apology for it. 758.

Groendal; Ruyſbroeck founds a convent of Canons-Regular of the order of St Auguſtin at Groendal. IV. 942.

Groningen. Who firſt preached the reformation in the territory of Groningen. I. 238. a. And in the great church, after the reduction of that place to the power of the States-General. ibid. b. The Lutherans there drive out all thoſe who followed the Reformation of Calvin. II. 768. That city aſſociates itſelf with the United-Provinces. ibid. Erects its college into an univerſity. ibid. Defends itſelf vigorouſly againſt the Biſhop of Munſter, and when. IV. 211. b.

Gropper betrays his maſter. V. 559. b. Compared to Judas, and accuſed of having ſtrangled himſelf. ibid.

Gros (Valerius) defends the Vaudois againſt the Prior Rorenco. IV. 917. b.

Grotius; whether one has reaſon to be ſurprized at his taking Caligula for that man of ſin whom St Paul deſcribes. II. 257. n. (i). He was in the wrong not to have ſent a copy of his hiſtory to his friends. 283. a. b. What made King Guſtavus reſolve to make uſe of him. III. 247. a. His book de Veritate Chriſtianæ Religionis. 394. a. What he ſays with reſpect to the ſuccours which the Spaniſh Embaſſador ſollicited in England for the Duke of Rohan. 397. b. The confeſſion which he makes uſe of to refute Mahometaniſm. IV. 28. a. b. He is accuſed of not ſpeaking with reſpect enough of the rights of Kings. 120. a. It was ſaid that he followed the religion of learned or prudent men. 860. a. What he ſays of an external intelligence with regard to ſome of the actions of beaſts. 913. a. An incident of his diſpute with Rivet. I. 235. a. b. 236. a. b. Cenſured by Rivet, anſwers nothing to the purpoſe. II. 173. b. 178. b. 179. a. b.

Gruterus treated unkindly by Baudius. III. 254. a. And ſcandalouſly by Philip Pareus. ibid. b. How many cruel reproaches he threw out againſt one of his adverſaries. IV. 476. b.

Guaſt (du) an arrant villain. III. 858. b.

Guaſto (the Marquis del) exhorts Aretin not to ſpare his faults. I. 436. b.

Guaſtala (the Counteſs of) founds a fraternity, where a very ſingular method was taken to overcome the fleſh. V. 426. a.

Gueinceſtre; his fury and ſcurrilous invectives againſt Henry III. III. 294. a.

Guelderland (the province of) erects an univerſity at Harderwic. III. 361.

Guerche (Sylveſter de la), though not learned himſelf, had a great affection for learned men. III. 60. a. b.

Guerchi (Mademoiſelle de), the hiſtory of her amours and death. IV. 498. b. 499. a. b.

Gueret (John), a Jeſuit; the Profeſſor under whom John Chaſtel had ſtudied Philoſophy. II. 456. a. b. 457. a. Is put to the torture, confeſſes nothing, and is baniſhed for ever. ibid. b.

Guevara (Antony de) impoſes upon men of ſenſe by his falſities. III. 705. b. His ſevere rebuke to the Biſhop of Zamora. IV. 456. a. b. He has publiſhed an infinite number of falſhoods. 927. a. b. A Spaniſh impoſtor. II. 400. a. Fathers upon Dion a falſhood touching Caligula's nurſe. ibid. Des Caurres robs him of ſeveral things without naming him. ibid. He trumps up an hiſtory of Marcus Aurelius. 770. a. III. 270. a. b.

Guibelet (Jourdain) confutes Huarte's Trial of Wits. III. 528. b. 529. a. b.

Guicciardin (Francis), his Hiſtory put in the Index, and for what reaſon. III. 273. a. Was naturally averſe to jeſting. 274. b. He ſhews too great an inclination to excuſe Savonarola. V. 62. b. 63. a. Amply quoted with reſpect to that Monk's affair. 58. b. 64. b. Cenſured on that head. 65. a. b.

Guicciardin (Lewis) impriſoned. III. 275. a. b.

Guichenon refutes a pious fraud concerning the foundation of a monaſtery. I. 739. a. b.

Guienne (Eleonora, heireſs of) is courted in marriage by the King of England, after ſhe had been divorced from the King of France on account of her leudneſs. III. 794. The ſequel of her adventures. ibid. b. 795. a. b. 796. a. b. 797. a. b. Is put in the catalogue of learned women. 797. b.

Guignard (John), a Jeſuit, is looked upon as a martyr. II. 459. a. n. (31).

Guilleminot (John), his vain efforts with regard to ſubſtantial forms. III. 362. b. n. (6).

Guillet vindicates two great men ill from the reproach of jealouſy. II. 299. a. Should not have attempted to apologize for the nakedneſs of the Lacedemonian maids. III. 967. b. 968. a.

Guyon (Lewis), his raſh judgment concerning the deſcription which Niphus gives of Joan of Arragon. I. 399. a. b.

Guyon (Madam), an obſcene ſtory of that viſionary. V. 857. n. (114).

Guiſe (Meſſieurs de), the title of Prince is refuſed to them. III. 285. b. Whether they had ever any thoughts of turning Proteſtants. 286. a. b. 287. a. The hatred which the Proteſtants had conceived againſt them. 286. b. 287. a. The perſecution which they exerciſed againſt the Proteſtants. V. 478. b.

Guiſe (the Chevalier de) kills the Barons of Lux, father and ſon. III. 300. a. b.

Guiſe (Francis, Duke of), why his death wrought a great alteration in the Council of Trent. III. 871. a. b.

Guiſe (Henry, Duke of) killed at Blois. III. 408. a. b. 857. a. b.

Guitaut arreſts the Prince of Condé. I. 184. What he ſaid to Madam de la Trimouille. 264. b.

Guitmond, author of three books againſt Berengarias confounded with Guy Aretin by Voſſius. I. 433. a. b.

Guns: what great guns are in kingdoms. V. 62. n. (f).

Gurtler believes that Babylon ſhall fall in the courſe of the XVIIIth century. II. 125. b.

Guſtavus (Adolphus), King of Sweden; a ſtory that is told of him. II. 135. b. Grants a truce of fifteen days to the Princes of the Catholic League. ibid. a. The eſteem which he had for a book of Grotius. III. 247. a. He calls an aſſembly at Leipſic, of Lutherans and Calviniſts, in order to endeavour at an accommodation. 476. a. Received ſome checks in Germany. V. 581. b. His victories give weight to Braunbom's prophecies, which were neglected before. II. 123. b. His death ſinks their credit again. ibid. See the Hiſtorical Diſſertation on his life. V. 651. &c.

Guſtavus (Charles), King of Sweden, had no deſign againſt the Catholic religion, when he entered Poland. II. 539. b.

H.

H*Aberkorn*, his Anti-Valerian. V. 741. and a. b.

Habit, how that of the maids of Lacedæmon was made. III. 968. b. 969. a. b. The faſhion of wearing ſhort habits. ibid. b.

Habit (of a Monk) does not cure a man of his inclinations. I. 345. b.

Habſburg (Rodolphus, Count of) is elected Emperor by a re-union of the ſuffrages which had been divided betwixt two other Princes. II. 377. And acknowledged by the Pope, who by threatenings obliges Alphonſus, King of Caſtille, to a renunciation of his rights. ibid. and 378.

Haddarſchan; what he relates concerning Abraham. I. 44. b. 45. a.

Hadrian (a Roman Emperor), reliſhes an old piece of flattery. I. 349. a. Roughly ſpoken to by an Architect in preſence of Trajan. 376. Diſperſes the Jews in a very cruel manner. 648. b. 649. a. Looked upon by that people as one of the greateſt deſtroyers of their nation. 649. a. b. Whether he was perſonally in the war againſt them. ibid. b. In what manner he travelled. III. 320. b. His gratitude to his benefactreſſes. IV. 692. and b. He cauſed his wife to be poiſoned. V. 266. b. 267. a.

Hadrian VI, how he was elected Pope. III. 272. b. Was too ſcrupulous. I. 733. a. III. 326. b. Perſiſts in his firſt opinion, that a Pope may err even in matters belonging to faith. 328. a. Was ſo far from running into the luxury of his predeceſſor, that his charge was not above twelve crowns a-day. 327. a. How he was diſſuaded from demoliſhing the ſtatue of Paſquin. V. 758, 759.

Haemſted; from whom that family is deſcended. III. 542. a. b. 543. a.

Haerlem beſieged and taken by the Spaniards. III. 622.

Hagar is introduced into Abraham's bed by his wife. V. 54. b. 55. a. b.

Hagenau: which were the ten towns that made up what they call the Prefecture of Hagenau. III. 717. a. b. Subject to France. ibid. The French made it ſerve as a rampart in 1675. IV. 211. b.

Hay (Alexander), a Jeſuit, is baniſhed by an arrêt of the Parliament of Paris, and why. III. 333. a. b.

Hailbrunnir pretends to be ſick, and for what reaſon. III. 656. a.

Haillan (du) the reproaches which Du Pleix caſts upon him. III. 338. a.

Hair the loſs of it prejudicial to beauty. I. 292. a. III. 376. b. A man who had the power of moving his hair without any motion of his hand or head. 429. b. Whether it be lawful for men to wear long hair. IV. 22. b.

Halicarnaſſeus (Dionyſius) his own miſtakes, in cenſuring thoſe of Fabius Pictor, concerning the Tarquins. V. 290. b. 291. a. b.

Halicarnaſſeus, who were the tyrants of that city. IV. 114. b.

Hall (Joſeph) Quoted. III. 947. b. n. (126). What he wrote againſt Lipſius concerning his Hiſtories of the miracles of the Holy Virgin. 846. b. 847. a. b.

Hallier (du) forced by the Duke of Lorrain to retire from before La Motte. IV. 278. a.

Hamburgh, it's magiſtrates are very much troubled, on account of the diſputes of their miniſters, that divided the people. III. 504. b. 505. a. When that town began to have ordinary Syndics. 686. a.

Hameſton, the only ſanctuary of the faithful, during a certain time. III. 666. a.

Hamilton, (Patrick) the elogy of that martyr. I. 221. a.

Hamilton (John) an Archbiſhop, whether it be likely that Cardan foretold him he ſhould be hanged. II. 316. b. 317. a.

Hammon, that god adviſed King Tementhis to beware of cocks. IV. 790. a.

Hand: what Anaxagoras ſaid of our hands. I. 301. b. Several people ſend the picture of their hands in order to get their fortunes told. V. 285. and a.

Handſome: it is thought that Ageſilaus II, forbid his picture to be drawn, becauſe he was ſenſible he was not an handſome man. I. 130.

Hangeſt (Claudius) Calvin dedicates his Commentary upon Seneca's treatiſe de Clementia, to him. II. 260. a. 274. b.

Hangings, when, as it is pretended, they begun to be known at Rome. IV. 561. a. b.

Hanover (the Ducheſs of) diſcovers the impoſtures of James Aymar. I. 8. b.

Happineſs of man, what is the formal and efficient cauſe of it. II. 780. b. Examination of Mr Arnauld's opinion concerning it. 781. a. b. It is one of the moſt evident Attributes of God. V. 828. Wherein Anaxagoras and Carneades made it to conſiſt. I. 295. II. 332. a. b. Wherein Epicurus placed it. 780. b.

Haran, the brother of Abraham, how he died, and for what reaſon. I. 45. a.

Haranguers very often diſpleaſe thoſe whom they praiſe. III. 823. a.

Harangue, who was the firſt that wrote his Harangues before he recited them. IV. 567. b. An indifferent one recited by an excellent Orator, may charm the hearers. ibid. The effect which one ſpoken by Calliſtratus had upon Demoſthenes. II. 259.

Harangues formerly too much ſtuffed with Latin and Greek. II. 104. b. 105. a. b. 106. a. b.

Hardouin (Father) did very well to correct a paſſage of Pliny, relating to Lucilius. IV. 593. b. Makes a ſuppoſition concerning Pythagoras, that is inconſiſtent with the account given by Herodotus. 667. a. Prefers Plutarch to Varro and Verrius, with reſpect to ſome monuments. V. 288. b. 289. a.

Harlai (Achilles de) firſt Preſident of the parliament of Paris, brutally uſed. II. 459. a.

Harlotry of Rome: the authors of ſuch ſort of books, are not original authors. I. 267. a.

Harma, what was ſaid of that village in relation to Amphiarias, I. 274. a. b. 275. a.

Harmony of the Goſpel, which goes under Ammonius's name, different from the Goſpel-Canons. I. 269. b. 270. a. Whether Ammonius wrote it. ibid.

Harpax, the ſon of Boreas and Chloris. II. 82. b.

Harphius (Henry) his character. IV. 942. b. 943. a. Borrows a great deal from Ruyſbroeck. ibid.

Harpocration, a paſſage of that author corrected by Mauſſac, which Voſſius mentions as his own. I. 267. a. b.

Hart (Von der) his opinion of Cham's crime. II. 432. b. If believed might do hurt to the narratives of Moſes. ibid.

Hartnaccio (Daniel) writes the life of Micrælius. IV. 210. a. n. (2). Continues his Syntagma Hiſtoriæ Eccleſiaſticæ, and his Syntagma Hiſtoriæ Politicæ. ibid. A criticiſm upon that continuation. ibid. and b. 211. a. b. Found fault with concerning Radulphus Flaviacenſis. 824. b. 825. a. b.

Haſenmullerus (Elias) left the order of the Jeſuits, to turn Lutheran. III. 555. a. b.

Hatred. That of ſiſters more violent than that of brothers. II. 701. b. A long digreſſion on the accuſation of a new Hereſy, relating to the hatred of our neighbour. V. 642. a. b. & ſeq. An abſtract of that accuſation. ibid.

Hautefort (Madam d') Calumniated by a ſatirical author. V. 83. b. 84. a. But vindicated by the Abbot Faydit. 84. a. The ſequel of her Hiſtory. ibid. b.

Hazart (A Jeſuit) his intereſt againſt the Janſeniſts. III. 245. b.

Head, a paſtboard head ſent every year by the Egyptians to Byblus. I. 116. a.

Heads brazen, an account of ſeveral that are alledged to have ſpoken. I. 182. b. 183. a.

Heads of garlic and poppies offered in ſacrifice inſtead of the heads of children. II. 163. a. b.

Health: better a little learning than no health. III. 342. a. Ought not to be neglected through a miſtaken zeal for the ſervice of the public. ibid.

Hearſays ought never to be reported, but in two caſes. I. 615. b. We ought to be diſtruſtful of ſtories which have no other foundation. II. 475. b. What ought to be done with regard to ſuch ſtories as are only grounded upon Hearſay. IV. 379. a.

Heart, the marks of a kind one. I. 464. a. b. It is malicious to ſearch the intention of the heart, in order to judge of an action that is good in itſelf. IV. 571. a.

Heaven, the great men of Rome make a lottery of it. II. 713. b.

Heavens, objection againſt their motion. II. 29. b. Whether they are animated. IV. 872. a. b.

Hebe, what employment ſhe had among the gods, and why ſhe loſt it. III. 131. a. 637. a.

Hebraicians, according to them all the gods of the Pagans were taken from the Jewiſh tradition. II. 431. b. The proof which they alledge for it. ibid.

Hebrew text of the bible, when and why it was altered by the Jews. I. 173. a. b.

Hecatomythium, what it is. I. 47.

Hedge-ſparrow, Juvenal gives that name to a young fellow whoſe wife was unfaithful to him, and why he does it. III. 631. a. n. †.

Hegeſippus attempted perhaps to enſnare the oracles. I. 132. b. 133. a.

Hegira, what that word ſignifies. IV. 27. b. 28. a. Is the Æra or Epoch of the Mahometans. V. 780. n. (10).

Hegius (Alexander) teaches at Deventer. II. 242. Declines the direction of the ſchool of Munſter, and propoſes J. Cæſarius. ibid.

Heidegger did not well underſtand the thought of Father Merſenne concerning Hottinger. III. 525. b. Relates a pleaſant ſtory concerning St Germain and Loyola. 897. a. b.

Heidelberg, diſorders committed in that town, when Tilly took it by aſſault. I. 239. and a. b. Its profeſſors retire to Newſtad, and why. III. 173. n. (a). The univerſity there is reſtored. ibid. n. (b). The plundering of the Electoral library there. 252. a. The Pope's Commiſſioner has orders to tranſport all the manuſcripts from thence to Rome. ibid. Ruined for oppoſing the Emperor, and for being faithful to him. IV. 475. a. Sacked by Tilly's troops. 492.

Heifer: a brazen heifer which raiſed luſt. V. 769. and a. b. 770. a. b.

Helen, a conduct worſe than her's. I. 669. a. A thouſand people talk of her, who know nothing of her being hanged. III. 367. a. Is guilty of a monſtrous inceſt, which few writers have mentioned. IV. 402. a. b.

Heleneion. The qualities of that herb. III. 367. a.

Helinand, a Monk of Fromond, when he lived. IV. 824. n. (b).

Heliogabalus gave beautiful youths to his Magicians to be ſacrificed. I. 348. a. Often eat peacocks and nightingales tongues. 370. b. 371. a.

Hell, the road to it as ſhort from one place as from another. I. 308. b. All that was ſaid concerning the torments of Hell called fables and dreams by Cicero. II. 418. b. III. 743. b. And by Urceus. V. 515. b. Leſs than its porch. IV. 501. a. b. Prudentius believed that the damned have a day of reſt every year, and that it is the day on which Our Saviour came out of Hell. IV. 787. a. If Spinoza had reaſoned conſequentially, he would not have treated the fear of it as a chimera. V. 216. a. b. Ruyſbroeck's reſignation with regard to its torments. IV. 942, 943. and a. b. Whether Trajan's ſoul was delivered from Hell by the prayers of St Gregory. V. 397. a. b.

Hellebore taken to render the conception free and ſerene. II. 328. a. b. A kind of it called Melampodium. IV. 183. a.

Helviſa, the greatneſs of her grief, when ſhe heard of Abelard's loſs. III. 75. b. 76. a. What the Nuns of Paraclete do, that it may not be forgot, that ſhe underſtood Greek. IV. 470.

Hemithea purſued by Achilles, and how the deſigns of the latter were prevented. V. 315. and a.

Hemſbach, on what occaſion the Reformation was ſettled there. IV. 472. a. d.

Henao (Gabriel) his conjectures on the happineſs of Paradiſe. III. 895. a.

Hennius, an head-dreſs of a prodigious height, which the women of the Low-Countries wore in former times. II. 544. a. b. What means a preacher made uſe of to put it out of faſhion. ibid. b.

Henry IV Emperor deprived of the Imperial Dignity by the Pope. III. 229. b. Forced to ſubmit to the moſt unheard of indignities. 230. b. 231. a. Depoſed a new. ibid. a. b. But at laſt prevails over his enemy. 231. and b. 232. and a. b.

Henry II, King of France ſends his proteſtations againſt the Council of Trent. I. 257. a. b. In vain courts the Swiſs to renew an alliance. II. 195. Makes himſelf maſter of the city of Metz. 445. b. Undergoes interrogotaries in favour of the Duke of Eſtampes. 843. Takes the title of Protector of the German liberty. III. 397. b. 403. b. Burns the fine houſe of Binche. 530. b. 531. a. And why. ibid. Is willing to give one of his daughters in marriage to John Sigiſmund. 533. b. Particulars relating to him. IV. 160. a. b. 161. a. His Differences with Pope Paul IV. 632. b. 633. a. b. Makes an edict againſt clandeſtine marriages. 636. a. b. To whoſe counſels the perſecution of the Reformed under his reign ought to be attributed. 699. a. Employs againſt the Pope, a man whom he would have cauſed to be burnt in France. V. 457. a. According to John Bouchet, and the Baron du Villars, he was not the firſt who broke the truce of 1556. II. 104. a. b.

Henry III, King of France, a diſcourſe on the juſtice of deſpoſing him. II. 100. b. Reprimands the Divines of Paris. 102. b. Provokes the Ducheſs of Montpenſier by his indiſcretion. 257. b. Endeavours to diſcover the author who diſguiſed himſelf under the name of Stephanus Junius Brutus. III. 201. Some curious pieces relating to the action brought againſt him. 294. b. 295. a. b. Called nothing but Brother Henry in a certain Conclave. 410. a. Myſteries which were found in the circumſtances of his death. 412. a. b. Particulars concerning the houſe where he was aſſaſſinated. 413. a. b. Forty-five gentlemen choſen for the ſecurity of his perſon. 857. a. Knew how to ſhew reſolution and greatneſs of mind. ibid. b. 858. a. Was obliged to recompenſe the treaſons of his ſubjects. ibid. b. 859. a. No Prince ever became more unlike himſelf than he did. IV. 132. b. 133. His inconſtancy in point of religion. 333. a. Puts a barbarous affront upon his ſiſter Margaret Queen of Navarre. 337. b. 338. a. A ſatire on his court, under the fiction of an iſland of Hermaphrodites newly diſcovered. V. 33. b. One of the moſt ſhameful paſſages of his reign. 254. a. b. An account of his death. II. 459. a. Acquaints the King of Navarre that his wife's behaviour had given him ſome uneaſineſs, and removes from about her the Ladies de Duras and de Bethune. IV. 341. a.

Henry IV, King of France, the apology that was wrote for him, called a libel by the Leaguers. I. 739. a. b. Perefixe's miſtake in ſaying that this Prince entered into Geneva. 793. a. Ceremonies of his abſolution. II. 100. a. b. III. 418. a. The Sieur d'Aubigné's railleries upon it. II. 100. b. Seditious ſermons made againſt him. 101. b. 102. a. How he was prevailed upon to follow the advice which had been given him to go ſpeedily to Paris. 553. a. His apology on account of the edict of Nantes. III. 209. b. A witty ſaying of his upon the Venetian Embaſſador's burning ſome papers before him. 317. b. 318. a. Brings the Duke of Savoy to reaſon. 406. b. His converſation with Mr de Roui, about the qualities he thought proper in a wife. 417. a. b. What he is made to ſay concerning his wife. IV. 334. a. 339. b. 340. a. Did not deſerve a faithful one. 336. a. Demands ſatisfaction for the affront given his queen. 338. a. b. And does not obtain it. ibid. 339. a. b. Through what motives he pardoned ſome of the Leaguers that deſerved death. V. 27. b. Could not procure from his ſubjects the liberty of ſerving God according to the light of his own conſcience 35. a. A parallel between Cæſar and him. I. 631. Wounded by John Chaſtel. II. 456. What he ſaid when he heard that that aſſaſſin was a diſciple of the Jeſuits. ibid. Looked upon as an excommunicated and relapſed Prince, a profaner of things ſacred, a public enemy, an oppreſſor of religion, and conſequently a tyrant and an uſurper. 458. a. The abſolution of the Pope not ſufficient to re-inſtate him. ibid. b. How many degrees he was diſtant from the crown. ibid. John Guignard refuſes to acknowledge him for King of France. III. 276. and a. b. Accuſed of negligence and even of fear with reſpect to the accuſations againſt Guignard. 278. a.

Henry II, King of England, in what manner he promiſed to expiate his ſhare of the crime committed in the murther of Thomas, Archbiſhop of Canterbury. III. 425. b. Breaks his promiſe, and why. ibid. 426. a.

Henry VI, King of England, proclaimed King of France. IV. 730. a.

Henry VII, King of England, a mad freek of his. III. 835. b. Deſires Polydore Virgil to write the Hiſtory of England. V. 496. b. 497. a.

Henry VIII, King of England, cenſured in a paſſage of The vanity of Sciences. I. 150. a. Proteſtants and Papiſts ran equal hazard in his reign. 272. b. Opinion of the Divines of Wirtemberg, on his divorce. 657. b. 658. a. The deſign which Francis I. had to cauſe the Sorbonne to give a favourable opinion for it. 716. a. b. 717. a. b. Calvin complains of his being called the ſupreme head of the Church. II. 273. b. 274. a. He and Charles V, divide France between them. 435. a. Francis I is ſenſibly affected with his death, which he ſhould have looked upon as very lucky to him. III. 94.

Henry d'Albert II, King of Navarre, begins to like the Reformation. IV. 318. a. b. 320. a.

Henricias, a judgment of that work. IV. 808. b.

Henricus (Lewis) his thoughts on the pleaſures which the ſaints enjoy in Heaven. III. 895. a.

Hens, what people firſt introduced the cuſtom of cramming them. III. 6. a.

Heraclides, a paſſage of his treatiſe of Republics explained. I. 427. a.

Heraclidæ were forbidden to have children by a foreign woman. I. 135. a.

Heraclitus ſaid that one and the ſame thing is and is not. I. 507. a. Conceals his writings in the temple of Diana, and why. II. 865. a. Says that the parts of the world live by the death of each other. IV. 525. a. Admits only fire for the principle of all things. V. 323. b. n. (23).

Heraclius recovers by a treaty of peace the croſs which the Perſians had carried off. III. 425. a. What he did to vex Coſroës, King of Perſia. IV. 350. a.

Herbelot (Mr de) Regius Profeſſor of Syriac, who it was that ſucceeded him. I. 756.

Herbert (Baron) a great deiſt. I. 383. a. Scandalous annotations borrowed from a manuſcript of his. ibid.

Hercules, different accounts given by the Antients, of what he did with Diomedes and his mares. I. 17. b. 18. a. His ſtature judged of by the length of his foot. 104. a. Is called The Lion of three Nights, and why. 206. a. A Greek Poet introduces him decrying virtue. II. 164. a. b. An idol of him put into the fire by an Atheiſt. 654. a. The zeal which the Agrigentines had for his ſtatue. III.

158. b. The prodigious bigneſs of his cup. 206. a. b. There have been ſix heroes of this name according to Cicero, and forty-four according to Varro. 426. a. b. 427. a. Upbraids the Argonauts with their giving themſelves over to their pleaſures. 754. a. Whilſt he digs the ground, he cauſes the head of a river to ſpring out of it. V. 76. b. The places where he was honoured moſt. 350. b. 351. a. b.

Heretical Teachers, whether it ought to be imputed as a crime peculiar to them, that they make uſe of methods ſuited to the capacities of the ignorant, in inſtructing them according to the falſe lights of their conſciences. I. 478. a. b.

Hereſy, whether obſtinacy be its character. I. 477. b. 478. a. A contradiction, into which writers, who undertake to ſpeak of converſions, are apt to fall in this reſpect. ibid. What Hereſies were formerly the moſt dangerous in the opinion of the court of Rome. II. 545. Faults which are found in the catalogue of thoſe of the XVIth century. V. 231. a. A common-place to aſſign them as the cauſe of the heavy ſtrokes of Divine Juſtice. 473. a.

Heretics, all ſtories reported to their diſadvantage are ſwallowed down, and numberleſs fables are raiſed about them among all ſects, an hundred pious frauds are practiſed at their death, and many reflexions made thereupon. I. 51. a. b. 198. a. b. 726. b. 727. a. 780. a. 796. b. II. 373. b. 374. a. Heretics who jumbled together the doctrines of the goſpel and of the Philoſophers. I. 253. Some people are ſatisfied, provided they can defame them. 290. b. Whether orthodox Princes can make alliances with them for the ſecurity of their States. 407. a. b. What methods were uſed againſt them by the orthodox Emperors. 476. b. 477. a. The ignorance or contradiction of a Proteſtant Divine, in relation to this point. ibid. It is dangerous to diſpute with Heretics that are ſubtile and eloquent. 563. b. 564. a. Whether the Magiſtrates ought to puniſh them. 789. a. b. The reproaches which the French and Spaniards mutually fling upon each other concerning their alliances with Heretics. II. 338. a. b. Upon ſeveral occaſions a man appears to be an Heretic only by his manner of expreſſing himſelf. 455. a. Reflexion on the puniſhments which ſome pretend ſhould be inflicted on them. III. 147. a. b. Whether they ought to be tolerated in the ſame manner as Infidels are. 220. a. b. Scruples of the Church of Rome about the praiſes beſtowed upon them. 438. b. 439. a. Thoſe who write catalogues of them are commonly guilty of three pieces of injuſtice. 443. b. 444. a. b. Tolerated by the Emperor Jovian. 585. a. b. The uſe of penal laws againſt them. IV. 96. a. b. 97. a. A diſpute between Mr Jurieu, Mr Maimbourg, and Mr Ferrand, concerning the number of their martyrs. 108. b. as far as 112. a. Examination of all the pieces of this diſpute. ibid. The uſefulneſs of ſuch an examination. 112. a. b. An account of the methods put in practice to convert Heretics. 373. b. as far as 376. a. Cuſtomary to ſuppoſe that they all come to a tragical end. 349. a. Whether they ought to be excuſed by the compariſon taken from Judges and Phyſicians. 930. a. b. 931. a. b. Whether it be permitted to write againſt them in a fair, genteel manner, and to acknowledge their good qualities. V. 258. a. Princes do not preſerve a conſiſtent conduct with regard to Heretics. 457. a. Hoſius would have them extirpated. III. 501. Accuſed of having corrupted the manuſcripts of the Scriptures. 733. Accuſed of being almoſt continually guilty of ſome enormous crime. V. 388. and a.

Hermandovilla (Henry de), chief Phyſician of Philip the Fair. II. 399.

Hermaphrodites; whether Adam was one. I. 102. a. b. Their origin, and the moral reflexions which may be drawn therefrom. V. 31. a. b. 32. a. An Hermaphrodite Monk that was brought-to.bed. 4. b. 5. a.

Hermaphroditus, an abominable piece. IV. 468. b. 469. a.

Hermeſianax, an antient Poet, writes love-verſes. III. 779. a. And a Poem upon the city Colophon. ibid.

Hermit, one that let fall his Breviary at the ſight of a couple who were diverting themſelves at the ſport of love. III. 63. b. 80. b.

Hermonymus took upon him to explain authors which he did not underſtand. II. 186. a.

Herodotus never indulges his imagination more than when he makes Artabanus argue. I. 510. a. b. 511. a. Attributes envy and jealouſy to the Divine Nature. IV. 574. b. 575. a. b. 576. a. b. 577. a. b. What Cicero ſays of him. V. 330. a.

Heroines, thoſe of romances are very often raviſhed. III. 365. a. b.

Heroiſm, Homer had no idea of it. I. 81. b.

Herold (John) publiſhes Marianus Scotus from the original ſent him by Latomus. IV. 728. a. n. (28). And Martin Polonus. 709. a. Accuſed raſhly and ignorantly by Florimond de Remond of having thruſt the ſtory of the She-Pope into his edition of that author. ibid. and b.

Hero of an Epic Poem ought not to be buried in the Poem itſelf. I. 81. b. Antient Heroes, dangerous fellow-travellers. V. 305. b.

Herwart (John-Henry) encourages Xylander to tranſlate Dion Caſſius into Latin. V. 588. b. 589. a.

Heſhuſius, a man of a turbulent ſpirit. I. 98. The diſtich which was handed about againſt him. ibid.

Heſycaſtes, Monks of Mount Athos. I. 89, 90. Are like the Quietiſts. ibid.

Heſiod becomes a Poet whilſt he feeds his ſheep. IV. 818. a. His genealogy of the gods. III. 649. a. b. 650. a. b.

Heſſe, Fr. Lambert was one of the principal inſtruments employed to introduce the reformation there. III. 709. b.

Heſſe (Philip, Landgrave of) his conſtitution obliges him to aſk permiſſion to have two wives at the ſame time. III. 942. a. b. The conſequences of that affair. ibid. b. 943. a. b.

Heſſe (Maurice, Landgrave of) rewards the dedication of a book of epigrams with an epigram. III. 880. b. See Maurice.

Heucourt (Marquis of) diſclaims a letter which was wrote in his name againſt Mr Arnauld. I. 485. a.

Hyccara (a town of Sicily) taken, and its inhabitants ſold. III. 699. a.

Hide (Profeſſor at Oxford) has wrote upon the religion of the antient Perſians. V. 635. a.

Hierarchy, Bucer did not condemn that in England. II. 171. a. b. 172. a.

Hieres, iſles, called the golden iſles. I. 407. Erected into a marquiſate by Henry II, for Gabriel d'Aramont. ibid.

Hierocles, why he gives Ammonius the name of Theodidactus. I. 269. a. Draws a parallel between Jeſus Chriſt and Apollonius. 380. b.

Hiero, King of Syracuſe, founder of the city of Ætna. II. 823. a. 825. b.

Hyginus, a paſſage of that author propoſed to the readers, in order to find out the meaning of it. III. 633. a. What advices he would have it Minerva gave to Penelope. IV. 543. b.

Hilarion de Coſte, his omiſſions in relation to Queen Margaret. V. 532. b. 533. a. b. Quoted. III. 185. b. 186. n. (a). and a. n. (2). b. n. (6). 187. a. n. (1). 188. n. (c). and a. n. (7). b. n. (13). 189. n. (b). (d). and a. n. (1). ibid. n. (5). 530. a. n. (5). b. n. (13). 531. b. n. (26), (27), (28), (30), 532. b. n. (4), (6), (7), (8). 533. a. n. (10), (13). b. n. (15), (17), (18). & paſſim alibi.

Hylobians. A ſort of Indian Philoſophers. II. 117. a. Why ſo called. ibid.

Hyperius; John Pincier was his brother-in-law. IV. 647.

Hypocrites. Nothing is to be got by drawing their pictures and making them known. III. 204. b. 205. a. The moſt impious find Apologiſts. V. 58.

Hypoſtaſis, the modern Apothecaries have profaned that word by applying it to the urine of their patients. III. 136. b.

Hippias, all he had about him was his own handywork. II. 779. a.

Hippocrates, whether the letters that concern Democritus, which are among his, be genuine or not. II. 638. a. A paraphraſe upon one of his letters by Alardus. V. 583. a. n. (105). Owns that he was miſtaken. 791. n. (aa).

Hippodamia, the wife of Perithous. I. 538. a. b.

Hippomanes. A diſſertation on that ſubject. V. 766. &c.

Hipponax. A Poet of a contemptible figure. II. 202. Repreſented in a ridiculous form. ibid.

Hippon, its inhabitants oblige Pinianus to promiſe them that he would embrace the prieſthood in their city. I. 229.

Hired mourners who cried more than the relations of the dead. III. 842. a.

Hirpi, a people that walked upon fire. III. 466. and a. b.

Hiſſers, regulations to reſtrain their fury. IV. 646. b.

Hyſtaſpes, father of Darius, applied himſelf to Magic. V. 631. b.

Hiſtory, its privileges. I. 103. b. III. 460. a. V. 747, 748. &c. Qualifications requiſite for writing a good one. IV. 861. b. 862. a. b. 863. a. Writers of Hiſtory are diſpenſed from taking an oath, their word being ſufficient. I. 343. a. V. 748. Might clear up a great variety of particulars, without conſiſting of many pages. I. 422. b. 423. a. The undertaking of a general Hiſtory a very difficult matter. 594. b. A proof of this. ibid. 595. a. b. The common fault of thoſe who write one. V. 1. a. b. Whether it be permitted to relate infamous and abominable actions in a Hiſtory. II. 31. a. b. A ſmall matter ſuffices to metamorphoſe it into ſatire. 160. b. 161. a. The knowledge which is acquired by travelling, is very uſeful to thoſe that compoſe a Hiſtory. 168. a. b. In many caſes Hiſtorical truths are not leſs impenetrable than Phyſical ones. 543. b. We ought not to truſt one written by a Domeſtic that has received great favours. III. 148. b. What rules ſhould be followed in order to diſtinguiſh true and falſe facts in a Hiſtory. 269. a. The inconveniencies of writing that of monarchs lately dead. 334. b. 335. a. In what caſes it is lawful to write a Hiſtory already handled by others. ibid. Reflexions on ſome facts that render it uncertain in a thouſand things of importance. 856. b. Wherein the art of writing it well conſiſts. IV. 126. a. b. Whether flatterers corrupt the truth of it more than ſatirical writers. 142. b. 143. a. Is nothing elſe but a repreſentation of the miſery of mankind. 424. and b. Whether the art of Oratory be of uſe in its compoſition. V. 328. a. b. There are authors who never would have dreamed of writing one, if they had not been prompted to it by perſonal diſcontent and modiſh paſſions. 362. b. By whom it ought to be written: great abuſes in this reſpect. 747. 748. & ſeq. The reſpect which the antient Romans had for it. 752. The difficulty of writing it. II. 310. a. b. A paſſage of Salluſt on this ſubject. 311. a. More particularly that of our own country, and of our own times. 310. b. 311. a. If he who compoſes one ought to be void of all paſſion, he who judges of the work ought to be ſo too. 311. a. b. Books of Hiſtory above all others verify that obſervation, pro captu lectoris habent ſua fata Libelli. ibid. b. Cannot give pleaſure in deſcribing thoſe things which gave pain when they happened. ibid. Is quite otherwiſe true than the reports of the people. 770. b. Writers of romances are obliged to follow it when they tell in a preface the foundation of their fictions. III. 166. b. Ought not to be handled, but by clean hands. 345. b. Its perfection conſiſts in being unacceptable to all ſects and nations. V. 846.

Hiſtory Eccleſiaſtical. There is little order and exactneſs in it. I. 476. a.

Hiſtory fabulous, full of contradictions. I. 78. a. b. 79. a. b.

Hiſtory of France, who was the firſt that compoſed a body of it in French. III. 334. a. b.

Hiſtory (Genealogical) commonly preceded by fabulous times, is often interrupted by ſome periods of obſcure times. I. 750. a.

Hiſtory (Roman) Paterculus's abridgment of it is very curious. IV. 495. a.

Hiſtorian Commentator, we ought never to cenſure one, till after being inſtructed in the laws of Hiſtory, and the privileges of a Commentary. V. 799.

Hiſtorians. Thoſe who ſuppreſs certain facts, ought to be treated like thoſe ſellers who conceal what they ought to acquaint the buyers with. I. 13. Do not always ſtick cloſe enough to the truth. 16. II. 763. b. 764. a. The antient Hiſtorians took too great a liberty in altering and embelliſhing their memoirs. I. 39. b. III. 19. b. And accuſtomed themſelves too much to relate things only in the groſs. I. 422. b. An Hiſtorian ought to diſtruſt pious frauds. 780. a. Hiſtorians deny all the facts by which they find themſelves incommoded. II. 55. b. The laws which are preſcribed to them are impracticable. 65. b. It is dangerous for them to ſpeak truth. 284. b. There is little Chronology in moſt of the Greek and Latin Hiſtorians. 309. b. Are found to have contradictory opinions ſometimes. 351. a. b. Which the Commentators have neglected to clear up. 352. a. Fall oftner into the ſophiſm à non cauſa pro cauſa, than the Peripatetics. 403. b. 550. a. b. Particular Hiſtorians of a province are more to be credited than others, except in what is Apologetic. 463. a. Hiſtorians by their neglecting to circumſtantiate things aright, throw us into inextricable uncertainties. 615. a. b. III. 485. a. b. The antient Hiſtorians do not equal ſome of our Moderns. II. 550. a Hiſtorians ſometimes contradict one another ſo much, that it is difficult to chuſe the beſt account. 635. b. Ought never to ſuppreſs any thing that may ſerve to diſcover their Actors characters, and mark the extent of their virtues and vices. 685. a. It is good to accuſtom young readers to ſeek among their variations for the ground of the greateſt probabilities. 727. a. Are guilty of an unpardonable crime by ſuppreſſing ſome facts. 759. b. Deſerve but little credit when they relate prodiges. 771. b. There are people among them as well as among the populace. 850. b. It fares with them as with travellers. III. 121. a. Their duty in relation to facts which they do not believe to be true. 226. b. 227. a. Have been very bold as to the ſpeeches mentioned by them. 274. a. One of the cauſes of the variations which creep into their accounts. 314. a. b. The true character of an Hiſtorian. 336. a. b. IV. 861. b. 862. a. b. 863. a. Moſt of them are credulous and liars. III. 416. a. b. Very often vent the fancies of their own brain, in order to make uſe of their collections. 418. a. b. 419. a. Love to deſcribe great events. 433. b. People ſeldom diſpute about what religion they were of. IV. 104. a. b. 105. a. Ought to be diſintereſted. 258. a. b. Their variations about the moſt memorable adventures. 746. a. Ought not to diſguiſe things through an affected modeſty. V. 420. a. b. 421. a. b. That which charms moſt in an Hiſtorian. 263. a. b. And what is the moſt difficult part of his taſk. 264. b. Whether he ought to ſuppreſs the obſcenities of thoſe whoſe Hiſtory he writes. 265. a. b. 266. a. b. When their miſtakes ought to be excuſed, and when not. 359. b. 360. a. b. A ſatirical genius is incapable of diſcharging the duties of an Hiſtorian well. 362. a. b. Sometimes miſrepreſents the moſt eſſential qualities of an action. ibid. b. The modern ones are too prolix, and the antient ones too conciſe. 744. Many of them perpetuate falſities. 748. and a. b. One of the cauſes of their illuſions. ibid. Whether they ought to have gratitude. 531. a. b. Are often accuſed of being partial for no other reaſon, but becauſe thoſe who accuſe them are remarkably ſo themſelves. II. 310. a. b. It is more difficult to appear a faithful Hiſtorian, than to be ſuch in reality. ibid. b. The imprudence of an Hiſtorian, who ſhould dedicate his book to a monarch, whoſe miſconduct he had taken the liberty to cenſure. 311. b. 312. a. b. Ought not to follow popular opinions, when they agree not with authors. 770. b. Ought to be perfectly diſintereſted. III. 345. a. b. Whoever conceives a reſentment againſt a nation, ought to abſtain from writing its Hiſtory. ibid. b. An exact Hiſtorian always chuſes his words with ſo much care that he does not leave his readers to gueſs. IV. 211. a. Morally and even naturally impoſſible, that they ſhould all be ſilent upon ſome remarkable adventures. 734. b. Ought to relate not only the actions of Heretics, but likewiſe the ſtrong and the weak ſide of their opinions. V. 810. Ought to deſcribe people as they really were, and to ſuppreſs nothing. 812. Their higheſt glory is to do juſtice to their greateſt enemies. 801. A great many people know no difference betwixt them and Encomiaſts. 804.

Hiſtories general, it is the cuſtom of thoſe who reprint them, to add ſuch things as have happened between between the former editions. IV. 210. b. And when they find a continuation ready done, they chuſe rather to copy it, than be at the trouble to compoſe a new one. ibid.

Hiſtories Sacred, at the ſame time that the people were forbidden to ſee them in the book which contains them in purity, they were allowed to ſee them upon the ſtage, ſullied with a thouſand groſs inventions. II. 477. b. 478. a.

Hiſtoriographer, is not to be truſted to. II. 131. b. A famous one who confeſſed ingenuouſly, that he did not know in what age Philip the Fair lived. 374. b.

Hobbes, his principles of Philoſophy were not proper to rid him from the fear of the apparitions of ſpirits. III. 471. a. b. What he did to put the Engliſh out of conceit with the republican ſpirit. 467. and. a. b. 468. a. IV. 581. b.

Hofman (Caſpar) cenſured with reſpect to du Laurens. III. 746. b. n. (12).

Hofman (Melchior) Prateolus and Gualtier pretend that he was the founder of an imaginary ſect, called Melchiorites. IV. 193.

Hog (Trojan) what the antient Romans underſtood by that. V. 387. b.

Holland (Philemon) tranſlates Bauderon's Pharmacopœia into Latin. I. 677. b. 678. a.

Holland, if Horace had ſeen the exceſſive care that is taken by the people of that country, in keeping their houſes clean, he would have called it a falſe neatneſs. I. 187. b. Its ſtates order a theſis concerning the ſovereignty to be condemned. II. 688. a. Holland and Zeland offer to acknowledge Queen Elizabeth for their ſovereign. 753. The Roman Catholics are promiſed a free exerciſe of their religion there. III. 675. a. It is the great ark of the Fugitives. 688. What a Turkiſh Emperor ſaid of it. 806. a. It is difficult to find Printers there, except in two caſes. IV. 476. b. 477. a. b. n. (7).

Hollanders, how vindicated from the accuſation of having ruined the French army. III. 822. a. b. Had rather have the Spaniards for their neighbours than the French. 829. b.

Homœomeries. The true idea that ſhould be formed of them. I. 296. b. 297. a. b. Have conſequences full of difficulties. 297. a. b. The very foundation of this hypotheſis may be deſtroyed. 297. b. It implies many contradictions. ibid. Whether their formation requires an intelligence. 304. b. 305. a.

Homer cenſured for the ſpeech of Phœnix. I. 79. b. One of his epiſodes has ſerved Virgil as a model for one of the beſt paſſages of the Æneid. 80. b. Had no manner of idea of Heroiſm. 81. b. Obtains by his offerings a ſight of Achilles, but cannot bear the ſplendor of the glory which ſurrounds him. 85. b. There are three verſes in the Iliad which it is pretended are not his. 157. Anaxagoras was the firſt, who ſuppoſed that his poems were moral works. 306. He was too talkative and too downright. 333. b. Myſteries which are ſaid to be contained in the two firſt letters of his Iliad. 374. a. Recourſe is had to Magic, in order to diſcover his country. ibid. Arceſilaus called him his miſtreſs. 408. a. His poems reviſed by Ariſtarchus the Grammarian. 450. and b. 451. a. And his two great works divided by the ſame author. 451. b. 452. a. The tradition concerning his death. 473. b. The Poets that have come after him, have made uſe of his inventions. II. 58. a. b. The ideas of reaſon were very much confuſed in his time. 139. b. Introduces a thouſand miſchiefs by his poetical impieties. III. 134. b. Deſcribes no body by names borrowed from the mothers. IV. 232. a. His ſimplicity. 344. b. Does not make Telemachus ſpeak with reſpect enough to his mother. 540. b. Two great provinces ſtrive which ſhall have him. 594. a. Compares men to the leaves of trees, to birds and to flies. 657. a. b. Whence it happens that there has been ſo much difficulty in fixing upon the place of his birth. 924. a. b. Whether he has mentioned the Jews. V. 309. a. b. Was very ignorant of the globe. III. 787. J. Spondanus is the firſt that writes notes upon him in Latin. V. 224. a.

Homonymi, the meaning of that word. I. 232. a. Antient authors have wrote de Homonymis as well as Allatius. ibid.

Honey, who invented the ſecret of extracting it. I. 455. a. Its virtue for preſerving health. II. 638. b.

Honorius, Alypius preſents to him the requeſt of the Clergy of Africa. I. 229. a. b. 230. a.

Honour, its laws looked upon as mere chimeras by a lady. I. 496. a. Some people want to enjoy it, and to have the glory of deſpiſing it at the ſame time. 680. b. What power the point of honour has over women. IV. 502. a. b. &c.

Honſdorf, or Hondorf, compiler of examples of the Divine Juſtice. III. 573. b. 574. a. Cited. 165. n. (a), (d), (1).

Hoornbeeck, that Divine's juſt complaint againſt the Antitrinitarians. II. 19. b.

Horace gives elogies to Homer which he does not deſerve. I. 79. b. Cited with regard to Poets, that write in their old-age. 120. a. n. (2). Juſtified in his cenſuring Agamemnon for having left Ajax unburied. 161. a. b. Whence it is that he was ſo ingenious as to confeſs that he fled from battle, and threw down his arms. 189. a. b. Ridicules a Poet that made two hundred verſes in an hour. 665. a. Makes uſe of a pitiful argument. II. 139. b. 140. a. 342. a. Is miſunderſtood concerning the laws againſt ſatires. 355. a. b. Whether, being himſelf an Epicurean, he could laugh at his brethren. 388. b. 389. a. Falls upon the admirers of the Antients with a Sorites. 494. a. Why he inſults the Jewiſh nation, where he ſpeaks of the miraculous ſtone at Egnatia. 745. a. b. A paſſage of this Poet concerning Fannius very difficult to be underſtood. III. 8. a. b. 9. a. b. A thought of his applied to the Guiſes. 292. b. n. (3). What he would have preferred to the reputation of being a fine writer. IV. 743. a. n. (16). What he ſays of thoſe who affected to make uſe of old words. 830. b. n. (49).

Horantius writes a piece againſt Baius. I. 609. a.

Horne (John van), his notes upon Botal's works. II. 99.

Hornius, a miſtake of that author's. II. 16. b. 17. a.

Horns (metaphorical), the Antients prayed that they might light upon evil-doers. II. 247. b. A very curious diſpute about them. III. 631. a. b. 632. a.

Horoſcopes, Aſtrologers who made that of Jeſus Chriſt. I. 164. b. II. 319. b. 320. a. Their uncertainty. III. 401. a. b.

Horſe which Pliny ſpoke of. I. 120. b. Mares which neighed at the ſight of a painted horſe. 369. a. b. A fatality which was ſaid to attend the horſe of Sejanus. II. 348. b. 349. a. Horſes that grew better as they grew older. 309. b. A brazen horſe that ſtirred up luſtful deſires. V. 767. A horſe thirty-eight years old, whoſe maſter leaves him a penſion, with a meadow, and his liberty. IV. 917, 918. Other examples of gratitude to horſes. 918. a. b. Others. ibid. A contrary example. ibid.

Hoſmannus, a chimerical Hereſiarch which Moreri has given us, having been deceived by an error of the preſs. IV. 193.

Hoſpinian (Rodolphus) gives a very large detail of the variations of the Confeſſion of Augſburg. II. 122. b.

Hoſpital (Michael de l'), his maſs becomes a proverb. III. 506. b. Called an Atheiſt by ſome men. 510. a. Approved the doctrine of the Proteſtants in his heart. ibid. b. Diſcharged the duty of a Chancellor well. 513. b. 514. a. Supported the French monarchy by his extraordinary qualities. 865. Reſembled Ariſtotle. IV. 504. b.

Hoſt, a miracle which is ſaid to have been manifeſted upon a hoſt. III. 840. a. b.

Hoſtienſis, the advice which he gives to midwives, touching the women they inſpect. IV. 800. b.

Hôtel de Flandres, the place where they exhibited dramatical repreſentations of the ſtories of ſacred Scripture. II. 477. b.

Hot-headed men, how apt they are to judge raſhly. III. 42. a. b.

Hotman (Antony) affirms, that the method of waſhing women who are to be inſpected at a congreſs is deceitful. IV. 800. b.

Hotman (Francis) ill-defended by Beza. III. 523. b. 524. a. Turns into ridicule a queſtion which Calderini aſked his wife, and the anſwer that ſhe gave him. I. 325. b. Criticized concerning an epigram upon Julius II. III. 610. b. 611. a. His complaints againſt Stouppa for want of religion. V. 247. a. b. Thoſe that anſwered his Franco-Gallia. 417. a. b.

Houliere (Madam. des) cited. III. 393. a. What ſhe ſays of Reaſon. IV. 440. a. n. (69). A ballad of her's. 503. b. 504. a. n. (64). The elevation and depth of her morality. 687. a. b. Gives way her ſelf to the vanity which ſhe blames in others. ibid. a.

Houſes (Noble), a book of John le Feron upon that ſubject. III. 27. and a.

Houſſaie (Amelot de la) refuſes to reform Oſſat's language. IV. 427. a. b.

Howard, Admiral of England, is the cauſe of the Earl of Eſſex's death, and why. II. 759. a. b.

Huber, his apology for the Hollanders in anſwer to the accuſations of Cavalier Nani. III. 822. a.

Huberus (Samuel), Miniſter of a village near Bearn, gets himſelf expelled by his boldneſs in contradicting ſome of the doctrines of Beza. III. 535. a. b. Retires to Wirtemberg, and is expelled from thence for teaching that God has elected all men to eternal life. ibid. b. Retires to Ratiſbon, where, continuing obſtinate in his errors, he is deprived of his place. ibid. Had the two chief qualifications of a good Diſputant. V. 102. a.

Huet, Biſhop of Avranches, why he did not finiſh his Latin tranſlation of a Greek romance. III. 866. a. What he thinks of the character of theſe kind of writings. ibid. and b.

Huguenots, what ſort of ſermons they like beſt. II. 520. b. Party-Huguenots, and State-Huguenots. III. 39. a. n. (7). What opinions they were of each of them in the aſſembly of Saumur, and who the heads of thoſe opinions were. ibid. a. An Abbot of the monaſtery of the order of Citeaux, who was a Huguenot. I. 737. b. 738. a. b.

Humility is not always found with the ſtaff and the wallet. II. 665, 666. and b.

Humouriſts, how much their academy is eſteemed at Rome. IV. 531. a.

Hunaud ſubmits to Charles Martel, and has the Duchy of Aquitain granted him. II. 851.

Hungary (Lewis, King of), loſes a battle againſt the Turks, and is ſmothered in a bog. III. 871. a.

Hungary (Andrew, ſon of Charles, King of), ſtrangled, how, and for what reaſon. IV. 300, 301. a. How uſed after his death. 305. a. b.

Hunting, the Biſhops of the XVIth century gave themſelves to it very much. IV. 819. b. It was forbid them by the canons. ibid.

Hurtado, his writings are full of ſolecisms. IV. 829. a.

Hus (John), the advice that was given him before his condemnation. I. 165. a. b. By whom he was condemned to death. ibid. An account of his puniſhment given by Poggius. II. 277. a. b. Alledges the adventure of the She-Pope before the Council of Conſtance, and is not cenſured for it. IV. 710. b.

Huſband, in what caſe it is a piece of leudneſs in him to come near his wife. IV. 761. a. A huſband that is an author, may be either an eaſy huſband, or a troubleſome one. V. 380. b. 381. a.

Huſbands: our laws do not ſuffer them to revenge the unfaithfulneſs of their wives, by putting them and their galants to death. II. 133. b. Should not be too long abſent from their wives. 743. b. Antiquity repreſents thoſe who were diſhonoured by their wives as extremely good-natured. III. 306. a. Are very often unacquainted with the galantries of their wives when they are the town-talk. 381. b. 382. a. Are no longer affected with their wives beauty at a certain period of time. 646. a. b. Love their wives beſt when they do not approach them but by ſtealth. 964. a. b. Are kind to their ſpouſes. IV. 220. b. Thoſe who are impotent ſhould, at leaſt, be civil and complaiſant to them. 760. b. The right which they had over their wives in antient times. V. 427. a. b.

Huſſites reproach the Roman Catholics with the ſtory of the She-Pope. IV. 710. b.

Hutten (John) killed by Duke Ulric of Wirtemberg. III. 539. Is digged up four years after his murther, and bleeds when they touch him. ibid. a. b.

Hutten (Ulric) publiſhed an invective againſt Alcander. I. 215. b.

Hutterus loads Bucer with reproaches for his ſentiments concerning Juſtification. II. 178. a. b.

J.

Achæus, a ſubtle Peripatetic, brings the queſtion concerning ſubſtantial forms into great repute in the univerſity at Leyden. III. 361, 362. and a.

Jacobins of Cologn, how they were forced to give ſatisfaction to the Count of Nevenar. III. 473. a. b. Launoi ſaid that he feared the Jacobins penknife more than their pen. 742. b. Thoſe of Florence make a ſtout reſiſtance when their convent is attacked in order to take Savonarola from thence. V. 66. a. b. The Council of Piſa promiſed them the canonization of this Monk, provided that they would declare themſelves againſt Pope Julius II. 69, 70, 71. Their behaviour in the affair of Savonarola, when challenged to the trial of fire. 62. a. b. &c.

Jaldabaoth, what that is, according to ſome antient Heretics. II. 851. b. 852. a.

Iambics, a ſort of verſe, by whom invented. III. 464. a.

James (Epiſtle of St), what Luther called it. III. 939. b. Was ſuſpected by a great many in the antient Church. 941. b. Althamerus attacks it with the utmoſt brutality. I. 235. and a. b. 236. a. b.

James I, King of England, is extremely angry with Thuanus for his Hiſtory. II. 281. b. Commands Camden to ſend him a catalogue of errors concerning the troubles of Scotland. ibid. Whether Camden's Annals were patched and curtailed by his order. 280. b. 281. a. Cauſes Pareus's Commentary on the Epiſtle to the Romans to be burnt by the hands of the hangman. IV. 473. a. b. Is cruelly treated in a ſatire. 795. a. b. His zeal againſt the Heretics. V. 509. a. b. How he uſed. Lipſius's book concerning N. D. of Hall. III. 847. b.

Jane of France, prodigies which Father de Bony ſays were obſerved upon the diſſolution of her marriage. III. 810. b.

Janſeniſm, what place it proceeded from in Holland, and who was its apoſtle. I. 499. b. What is its weak ſide according to the Moliniſts. IV. 846. b. n. (6).

Janſeniſts, the complaint that one of them makes againſt the Archbiſhop of Aix. I. 35. b. The reaſon of this complaint. ibid. and 36. a. b. Publiſh a pamphlet againſt Father Adam. 106. a. Thoſe who cenſured Odoricus Raynaldus are themſelves liable to cenſure. 179. b. 180. a. b. War raiſed betwixt them and the Jeſuits. 498. a. b. 499. a. Some of them are drawn into Noordſtrandt, which is attended with great law-ſuits. II. 111. a. The origin of their war with the Jeſuits. III. 133. a. b. The bulls of the Popes do not hinder them from proceeding in their diſputes. 390. b. Their Deputies, in their return from Rome to Paris, paſs by Zurich, where they viſit Hottinger. 526. a. Are very zealous in cauſing two decrees of the court of Rome to be printed. 567. a. b. Father le Tellier's Reflexions thereupon. ibid. The Janſeniſts compared in a ſermon to bull-dogs. IV. 64. a. b. De Marca oppoſed them greatly. 101. a. b. 102. a. Are accuſed of Calviniſm, for what reaſon. 123. b. Denote themſelves commonly in French by on, and why. 492. a. b. Are looked upon as the beſt Moraliſts. V. 847.

Janua (Joannes de), whether he and Jacobus de Voragine are one and the ſame author. I. 614. a. Miſtakes about this. ibid. and b.

Janua Cœlorum reſerata, what is made to appear in that book concerning Arianiſm. I. 476. b. Its author attacks The Syſtem of the Church in the ſtile of a Peripatetic Philoſopher, and quite overturns it. II. 540. b. What pretence was made uſe of for leaving it unanſwered. ibid.

Janua Linguarum reſarata, how many times printed, and in how many languages. II. 536. a. b.

Japoneſe, whether there is any thing ſurpriſing in their having perſecuted the Chriſtians. III. 551. a.

Jaqueline of Bavaria. Her Hiſtory. II. 211. b. 212. a. Marries Francis de Boiſel. 90. a. b. Gives all her dominions to the Duke of Burgundy to ſave her huſband's life. ibid. Died in 1436. ibid. b.

Jaquemot (Theodore) tranſlates ſeveral of Joſeph Hall's books into French. III. 342.

Jardins (La Demoiſelle de) cited. I. 460. b.

Jarrige cited. I. 108. b. 109. a.

Jaſon chief of the Argonauts. III. 465. a. b. The conqueſt of the Golden Fleece is propoſed to him. IV. 532. b. 533. a.

Jaſon, a Civilian, has given the Doctors of Law a very bad example. I. 196. a.

Javerſac, railleries on him. IV. 284. b.

Jaureguy (John) aſſaſſinates the Prince of Orange. II. 459. a. n. (27). A Jacobin chuſes rather to be ſtrangled than reveal his confeſſion. 460. b.

Ibycus, why he called the Lacedæmonian maids Phænomerides. III. 968. b.

Ibis: no piece ever diſcovered more gall than Ovid's poem againſt Ibis. IV. 451. b. 452. a. b. The beſt commentary extant upon that ſatire is Mr Boiſſeu's. 452. a. The Abbé de Marolles dedicates his tranſlation of that Poem to James Pinou. ibid. b. 651.

Icarius erects a ſtatue of modeſty. IV. 538. a. b.

Iche (d') Governor of la Motte is taken off by a canon-ball, whilſt he defends it. IV. 278. a.

Icon Baſilike, the author of that book. IV. 221. a. b.

Iconoclaſts. Their proceedings againſt images, leſſen the cruelty of the revenge which their enemies took. II. 512. a. b. Thoſe that have wrote againſt them, have made the truth of their Hiſtories ſuſpected by their idle ſtories. 587. a. b.

Ideas: Mallebranche's doctrine, that our ideas are diſtinct from our underſtanding, is an old one. I. 255. 555. a. II. 642. b. What difference there is between our ſenſations and our ideas. 781. a. b. Nothing is more difficult for a Prince than to anſwer the high ideas which a whole people have preconceived of him, and nothing more blaſting to his reputation, than not to anſwer them. V. 654.

Idem; that word is ſometimes uſed for ſimile. V. 214. a. b.

Idolaters, it is more ſurprizing that they have done good actions, than that Atheiſts have lived like honeſt men. V. 811.

Idols, who was the firſt that made them of clay. I. 44. b. What Democritus and Epicurus underſtood by that word. II. 388. a.

Jealous, thoſe that are moſt ſo, truſt their wives to the care of eunuchs. I. 31. b.

Jealouſy, a ſingular example of its force. II. 277. a. The jealouſy of men is not ſo copious in inventions as the love of women. 533. a. Diſpoſes men to rail againſt the fair ſex in general. 857. a. b. The rack which thoſe who are poſſeſſed with it ſuffer. III. 643. b. Whether it be neceſſary in ſociety. 965. a. Is not always uniform, in its cauſes and effects. IV. 48. a. Some conſiderations on this paſſion. V. 110. a. b.

Jeniſon (Robert) a Jeſuit, challenges Sir Humphry Lynde, and anſwers his Safe Way. III. 971. a. b.

Jeremiah, a paſſage of his letter, as it is inſerted in the book of Baruch. I. 597. a. n. (14).

Jerom, his friendſhip for Paula, makes ill-natured people ſlander him. I. 31. b. Said that the ſnares of beautiful women ought to be avoided by flight. III. 65. a. b. His maxims concerning marriage in general, and ſecond marriages in particular. 192. a. How he explains what is ſaid of David's taking the Shunamite to bed with him. 281. a. b. What he affirms concerning the ſhame that people ought to have of their own nakedneſs. V. 130. b. Was againſt young girls being ever abſent from their mothers, in devotional watchings. 337. a. His invectives againſt Vigilantius. 471. a. b. Whether we ought to truſt the repreſentation which he gives us of that man's opinions. ibid. b.

Jeruſalem, its deſtruction is a powerful argument againſt the Jews. I. 173. b. Its temple is tried to be re-built in vain. 228. The deſcription of its temple is a very difficult thing. 618. a.

Jeſſe, the ſtory which the Rabbins tell of him. II. 605. a. b.

Jeſters, what thoſe who have wit do. I. 128. b. 701. b. Prefer their jeſts to their frauds. 187. a. Never ought to rally upon a falſe fact. II. 527. a. Thoſe who ſet up for Jeſters, find themſelves obliged to divert people at their own coſt. 599. a. Sacrifice every thing to their paſſion for putting off a jeſt. III. 137. a. b.

Jeſting: the power of the habit of jeſting. I. 751. a.

Jeſts: a jeſt ſaves a ſoldier's life. I. 709. a. Some jeſts examined. II. 527. a. b. See Railleries.

Jeſuits, why they are more diſagreeable to the Senate of Venice, than the other Monks are. I. 30. b. Some of them ſpeak diſreſpectfully of St Auſtin. 106. a. 109. a. b. Entice away young men, whoſe education is committed to them. 169. 642. The anſwer made by their Provincial. 169. a. b. Their ſociety has been hitherto the moſt learned of all regular ſocieties. 220. a. Authors of a great many libels. ibid. b. Whether they are as learned now as formerly. ibid. 221. a. b. Very ſevere ſpeeches made againſt them. 251. From whoſe pen their Catechiſm came. 484. b. Were formidable, notwithſtanding the decree of their baniſhment. ibid. The war betwixt them and the Janſeniſts breaks out again. 498. a. Whether they acted imprudently in cauſing the elogies of Mr Arnauld and Mr Paſcal to be ſuppreſſed. ibid. and b. 499. a. It is doing them ſervice to publiſh calumnies againſt them, which may eaſily be confuted. 726. b. 727. a. The ſmall number of Anti-Moliniſts which they ſuffer in their great body is of ſome uſe. 728. a. b. Who was the firſt of their order that taught Philoſophy at Paris. II. 590. A certain Jeſuit does a kind thing to a Proteſtant. 663. a. There are very few univerſities with which the Jeſuits have not had ſome diſpute. 700. b. n. (2). Their cabals to hinder the examination of their books. III. 133. a. b. A ſatire againſt them. 563. b. 564. a. b. Diſpute with the other Catholics concerning Epiſcopal juriſdiction. 665. a. b. Whether their inſtitution, as well as that of other Monks, be founded on Fanaticiſm. 885. b. Were called Theatins, and why. 887. a. b. Have been calumniated from their firſt eſtabliſhment. 888. b. The moſt horrible things that can be ſaid againſt them become probable without any proof. 891. a. b. 892. a. b. They turn the hatred of the world againſt them to their advantage. ibid. b. 893. a. b. The doctrines which have rendered them odious, were hatched before their time: they have only raiſed conſequence upon conſequence. ibid. b. 894. a. Why they have been formally and expreſsly charged with theſe doctrines. ibid. b. Whether there be two ſorts of them, the one married and the other unmarried. 897. b. 898. a. b. And whether they have great credit with the Imperial Court. 898. a. b. What their motive is for teaching the immaculate conception of the Holy Virgin. 932. a. How they attacked Stephen Paſquier, concerning his plea againſt them. IV. 80. a. b. How far ſome of them have carried the love of chaſtity. 125. a. b. 126. a. And by what means they ſaid in Spain, that they kept themſelves always chaſte, though converſing familiarly with fine women. 125. b. 126. a. How the faults in the government of their ſociety were publiſhed. 131. b. They decry the fathers of the Oratory in Mons and Liege, as Neſtorians. 350. a. b. How they vindicate themſelves from the accuſation of corrupting Chriſtian Morality. 475. a. b. Very few of them turn Proteſtants. 855. b. 856. a. Their plea, that the knowledge of the true God has laſted among the Chineſe, for a great many ages, and that the Divine honours paid to Confucius, were purely civil, may be ſupported by what Mr Hyde affirms concerning the Perſians. V. 637. b. 638. a. Their Chamber of Meditations, what it is. II. 457. a. Say that it is lawful to kill the King, as being out of the Church, and not approved of by the Pope. ibid. Suſpected of having had a hand in the aſſaſſination committed by Chaſtel. 456. a. b. 457. a. 459. b. The difference there is in the accounts of this aſſaſſination. 460. b. 461. a. b. Baniſhed from France by an arrêt of the Parliament of Paris. 457. Spread about an advertiſement in Latin and French againſt that arrêt. ibid. b. It is from their ſchool that Aſſaſſins proceed. 459. b.

The hardſhips to which they reduce their Father William Criton. 577. a. b. Articles propoſed to Lewis XIII, for their reformation. ibid. a. Joſeph Hall bore a great hatred to them. III. 342. a. b. Their colleges riſe every where. ibid. b. Fare beſt when they are moſt curſed. ibid. A prophecy concerning them. ibid. An examination of what Salmaſius ſaid touching the edition of Anaſtaſius, publiſhed by the Jeſuits of Mayence. IV. 726. b. 727. a. b. Their diſputes with the Proteſtants were never ſo violent, as during the firſt thirty years of the XVIIth century. 727. a. A conjecture upon one of the reaſons which obliged the Parliament of Paris to involve them in the cauſe of Chaſtel and Guignard. III. 279. and b. 280. and a. b. What they anſwered when they were reproached with giving J. Guignard a place in their Martyrology. 277. a. b. Extenuate the outrageouſneſs of his tenets. ibid. b. 278. a. b. Do not pretend to vindicate him as to his propoſition about killing the King. ibid. Antimonarchical maxims are attributed eſpecially to them. 279. b. 280. a. Four brothers who were Jeſuits. I. 747.

Jeſuiteſſes, a ſociety of certain women and maids who took that name. IV. 26. a. b. Aboliſhed by the bull of Urban VIII. ibid. b.

Jeſus Chriſt, according to Antoinette Bourignon, his human nature was produced by Adam. I. 102. b. 103. a. Whether his birth and his miracles could have been foretold by Aſtrology. 164. b. 165. a. II. 319. b. 320. a. b. Explication of his remaining three days and three nights in the bowels of the earth. I. 174. a. b. The Pagans drew a parallel between him and Apollonius Tyanæus. 380. b. They compared his miracles likewiſe with thoſe of Apuleius. 392. a. b. The Carpocratians had his image, which they ſaid was procured by Pilate. 472. a. Whether his birth impoſed ſilence on the oracles of Paganiſm. 592. a. What authors have prophanely attempted to calculate his nativity. II. 319. b. 320. a. In what ſenſe he is called the Word and the Image. 434. b. Arnobius ſays that he ſpoke but one language, which every one of his auditors took to be his own natural tongue. 517. a. b. The hiſtory of his life written in the Perſian language, by the Jeſuit Jerome Xavier. 663. b. Some have taught that he died both as to his human and divine nature. IV. 288. b. Whether he be our Mediator only as he is man. V. 228. b. 229. a. b. 230. b. His ſoul did not underſtand the numbers of Daniel. II. 122. a. b. A pretended letter of Lentulus, containing a portrait of Jeſus Chriſt, is given as an authentic piece by J. Huarte. III. 528. Ruſſilian ſays that he was ſubject to the influences of the ſtars. IV. 940. a. b.

Jewels. The Apoplexy of which the Emperor Leo IV, and Pope Paul II, died, was occaſioned by their weight or coldneſs. IV. 512. a. b.

Jews, the fabulous accounts which they have publiſhed upon the ſtory of Abimelech's diſtemper. I. 38. b. 39. a. Are obliged to the number of three hundred thouſand, to depart out of the diminions of the Catholic King in one day. 41. b. Believe that Adam, Abraham, and David, have had the ſame ſoul, which will likewiſe be that of the Meſſiah. 46. Their fantaſtical opinion about Adam's creation. 102. a. b. Plutarch pretends that their religion, their feaſts, their ceremonies were much the ſame with thoſe practiſed in Greece to Bacchus. 115. a. Think that an huſband ought not to cohabit with a woman after he has found her barren, for the ſpace of ten years. 122. b. The people of Alexandria complain againſt them to Caligula. 374. and b. Are the only ſubjects who refuſe to honour that Emperor as a God. ibid. There were ſome who gave them the ſame original as the Gymnoſophiſts. 466. a. What proof of their courage thoſe that followed Barcochebas were obliged to give. 648. a. Are diſturbed on account of circumciſing their children. 647. a. Their cuſtom at the birth of a ſon or daughter. ibid. and b. The great ſlaughter of this people. 649. a. b. Their abhorrence for the fair of the turpentine-tree. 648. b. Are prohibited from returning to Jeruſalem. ibid. And even from coming near it. ibid. And which is ſtill more from entering into the country of Judea. ibid. Have their ears cut off, and are tranſported into Spain. ibid. What they ſay of Ariſtotle. II. 644. a. Their abſurd whims concerning Elijah and Eliſhah. 752, 753. and b. And concerning Ezekiel and his tomb. 879. and a. b. 880. and a. V. 544. b. 545. a. The invocation of the ſaints has been long ſince practiſed by them. II. 879. b. The Jews of the VIth Century who only quote traditions handed down by word of mouth, are no more to be believed, than the Jews of the XVIIth, in things which concern the Patriarchs and Prophets. 829. b. Are all ordered by Tiberius to depart from Rome, and why. III. 119. b. Forced to be baptized. 220. a. What ſynagogues the laws permit them to poſſeſs. ibid. Driven from Francfort by popular commotions. 387. Are falſely accuſed of having pricked an hoſt with needles, in order to draw blood from it. 840. a. b. The diſputes which they pretend Alexander determined in their favour, are chimeras. IV. 8. b. Why the Turks deteſt them above all other people in the world. 50. b. 51. a. Are made to wear the letter Thau. 309. b. Whether they believed the doctrine of a future ſtate as an article of faith. V. 8. a. b. Had a Sadducee ſometimes for their high-prieſt. 12. b. What a Rabbin has related concerning their antient library. 544. b. 545. a. The Hiſtory of the Jewiſh religion by J. Baſnage. I. 672. a.

Ignatius (St), Vedelius's notes upon his letters, what character they bear. V. 445. b.

Ignatius (de Loyola) his conformity with St Auguſtin. IV. 1. a. b.

Ignorance. What Heſiod ſays of it. I. 411. a. Is one of the impenetrable ſhields againſt the darts of the Pyrrhoniſts. IV. 654. a. Whether that which they call invincible will excuſe. 874. a. b. 875. a. b. 929. a. b. 930. a. May do a great deal of miſchief. V. 229. b. 230. a. Diſtinguiſhed from error. 372. b. &c. Is the cauſe that Ruyſbroeck is looked upon as inſpired. IV. 942. a. b.

Ignorance (invincible) a Monk who excuſes it. V. 25.

Iſlands Cyclades, Dicæarchus attacks them againſt all right and juſtice. II. 662.

Iliad, Andromache's dialogue with Hector, is one of the beſt paſſages in it. I. 333. b. Which however has too much ſimplicity. ibid. Myſteries contained in the two firſt letters of this Poem. 374. a. Obſervation upon the two Poems of the Iliad and the Odyſſey. ibid. and b.

Iliad (leſſer) Pindarus Thebanus is the author of it. I. 81. b.

Illyricus, his omiſſion in his Catalogus Teſtium Veritatis, made amends for by other compilers. III. 687. a. Would not have ſacrificed a ſurplice for the ſake of peace. IV. 185. b.

Images, the objects of devotion are repreſented by theſe in the air and ſhape which workmen pleaſe to give them. II. 729. a. b. III. 57. a. b. John du Tillet, Biſhop of Meaux, inveighs with great force againſt the abuſe of them. V. 356. a.

Images of wax, made uſe of to cauſe love or ſickneſs. IV. 936. a. b. 937. a. b. 939. b. 940. a. b.

Imma, daughter to Charlemagne, her amours with the Secretary of the Emperor her father. II. 744. a. b. 745. a. b.

Immenſity. The received opinion of the Immenſity of God, productive of many empty and conceited notions. III. 100. a. b. 101. a. b.

Immortality, it is not the quantity of a man's works, that procures it. IV. 598. a. Increaſes miſery. III. 643. b. Whether the Immortality of the ſoul can be proved by Ariſtotle's principles. V. 593. a. See Soul.

Immutability, the idea we ſhould form of it. V. 219. a. b. &c.

Impiety; acts of impiety. I. 160. b. 161. a. 701. a. b. Impieties touching the miracles of Moſes, and generally touching the whole Scripture. II. 156. a. Great piety and great impiety are equally uncommon. 451. b. Dicæarchus erects an altar to it, upon which he celebrates the Divine ſervice. 662. The Fathers of the Church relate the impieties of Heretics. III. 135. b.

Impious men bely their courage, when they lie on their death-bed. II. 12. b. 13. a. 647. and b. 648. a. b.

Impoſition of hands, burleſqued in the Acts of the Apoſtles in verſe. II. 479. a. b.

Impoſſible: whether all that is not, all that never was, and all that never ſhall be, is impoſſible. II. 495. b. 496. a. b.

Impoſtors (public) the puniſhing them ſeverely would have a good effect. I. 790. a. b. The advantages which factious people make of Impoſtors. II. 721. a. b.

Impotency reckoned a very great misfortune. II. 315. a. b. A wife who concealed this infirmity in her huſband, and comforted him under it. III. 187. a. b. How diſhonourable it is for women to enter proceſſes of impotency. IV. 799. a. b. &c.

Impotent, whether the devil can make people impotent, by doing what in French is vulgarly called nouer l'aiguillette. I. 38. b. 39. a. A French Phyſician pretends that there is daily experience of this, and injudiciouſly quotes Tacitus thereupon. IV. 385. a. b.

Imprecation: a ſingular effect of an imprecation. I. 560. a. b.

Imprudence: ill ſucceſs ſhould not be always attributed to imprudence. I. 365. b.

Impunity makes ſome people more fierce and inſolent. II. 195. a. b.

Impurity, Diogenes the Cynic endeavoured to juſtify this vice. II. 669. b. 670. a. Its connexion with good chear. 822. a. b. A method made uſe of at Rome to hinder its exceſs. V. 268. a. See Leudneſs.

Impurities; there are ſome that ought never to be deſcribed under any pretence. V. 39. a. b. 40. a. b. 41. a. b.

Impute: a rule which thoſe ought to follow who impute certain things to an author. I. 652. a.

Inattention: remark upon the effects of inattention to which even the greateſt men are liable. II. 388. b. 389. a. b. 390. a. b. &c.

Incarnation, the firſt prelude to it. I. 102. a. Whether Ariſtotle had glimpſes of it. 471. a. b. An argument ad hominem in favour of the incarnation againſt the Rabbins. IV. 94. a. b.

Inchanters are more rare than ſorcerers. II. 243. b.

Incivility, whether the inſerting of obſcene things in a book deſerves that name. V. 848, 849.

Incomprehenſibility of things taught by Arceſilas more expreſly than was ever done before. I. 410. b. How far puſhed by the Academics. II. 325. a. b. 326. a. b. 327. a. A ſtory which is told in oppoſition to this doctrine. III. 697. b. 698. a. It is not men of a mean capacity who give into this opinion. V. 587. b. A remark which may ſtrengthen this opinion. 610. b. & ſeq. It is not a ſufficient reaſon for rejecting a doctrine. 820, 821. See Pyrrhoniſts, Pyrrhoniſm.

Incontinency is the ſtrongeſt pillar of the empire of gallantry. II. 602. a. Is a quality of conſtitution. IV. 332. a. See Chaſtity.

Incontinent: an example which is propoſed to all incontinent perſons. I. 686. b.

Incredulous: there are two ſorts of incredulous people, with reſpect to the exiſtence or the non-exiſtence of a Deity. II. 648. a. b. The myſteries of the goſpel being above reaſon, the objections which they make thereto cannot be anſwered. V. 815. Our confeſſing this gives them no manner of advantage. 818, 819. 829.

Incubus's, hypotheſes concerning thoſe ſpirits. II. 113. b. 114. a.

Independants are againſt the Church's having the power of Excommunication. I. 96. a.

Index of the Inquiſition of Rome; the wrong judgment of its cenſors. IV. 719. b. Ordereth to expunge all praiſes given to Heretics. III. 438. b. 439. a. See Inquiſition.

Indexes have been called the ſoul of books. I. 319. b. A thought on Indexes. 362. a. Should be compoſed by the authors themſelves. ibid.

Indians, their inclination for wine. IV. 7. a. The Indian Hermits drive away all impure thoughts, by a cane which they hold in their hands. 126. a.

Indies, how far known before Ptolomy's time. IV. 808. a. b. 809. a.

Indifference in point of religion ſhocks more than a falſe worſhip, and why. I. 97. b.

Indiſcretion of boaſting to have received favours is never forgiven. I. 315. a.

Indolence: what Crantor ſaid againſt the indolence which was a doctrine of the Stoics. II. 561. b. 562. a.

Indulgences, a ſtanza on that ſubject. I. 139. a. Their credit is very little leſſened in the Romiſh Church. III. 87. a. How far the abuſe of them was carried in the court of Rome. 766. b. Were the firſt thing which Luther attacked. IV. 772. a.

Infallibility of the Church cannot be maintained as to facts. I. 494. a.

Infamy: Magiſtrates ought to be extremely cautious in inflicting a note of infamy. IV. 500. b.

Infant Baptiſm; in what manner Caſſander proves the doctrine of Infant Baptiſm to be apoſtolical. I. 288. a.

Infatuated Agents are a neceſſary evil to a party. II. 708. a.

Inferni (gli), a book of Doni with this title, where the different conditions of life are repreſented. II. 688. b. 689. a.

Infidels leſs dreaded than the promoters of Orthodoxy. I. 199. a. b. Whether Chriſtian Princes ought to make alliances with them for the good of their States. 407. a. b. Whether they ought to be converted by force as the Heretics are. III. 220. b. 221. a.

Informers, the only victory that an innocent and wiſe man ſhould deſire over them, is to eſcape whole and ſafe out of their hands. I. 777. a. Their character. ibid. Some of them will neither retract nor make good their accuſation. II. 253. a. Compared to dogs, who for the ſake of the public good are left to bark againſt every body. 372. a. b. Which makes the fate of mankind to be lamented. ibid. b. Take notice of the manner how people talk of news. II. 627. a. See Accuſers.

Ingratitude chiefly appears in the behaviour of children towards their fathers. II. 439. b. Produced by ſervices which cannot be acknowledged. 737. a. b.

Injuries: a treatiſe about the bearing of injuries, wrote by Donzellinus. II. 690. a. b. It was a rule of Bion's, that we ſhould bear injuries and civilities with the ſame tranquillity. 15. a. Princes are extremely nice and punctilious on this head. 445. b. An injury that is deſpiſed, falls of itſelf. V. 746.

Injurious reflexions which occaſioned the deſtruction of a town. IV. 278. a. b.

Injuſtice; it is uſual for thoſe who commit one to juſtify it by another. I. 718. a. Whether it be a means of proſperity. II. 165. a. b. Argued for by Carneades. 330. a. b. Dicæarchus erects an altar to it upon which he celebrates the Divine ſervice. 662.

Inlaudatus, Grammatical remarks on that word. II. 234. a. b.

Innocence proved by the fiery trial. I. 405. Oppreſſed innocence ſooner or later finds defenders. II. 783. No innocence can be proof againſt the choice of judges. III. 212. b. Is the moſt neceſſary qualification of an accuſer. IV. 781. a.

Innocent X, the Duke of Guiſe ſaid that he was a very great diſſembler. II. 472. b.

Innocent XI, his ill humour againſt the court of France was ſufficient to make him ſay that he did not approve of dragooning. II. 475. b. Feared the increaſe of the power of France more than he deſired the progreſs of the Catholic religion. 758. b. His partiality againſt France has done infinite ſervice to the Proteſtants. IV. 430.

Innovations are prejudicial to the public and academical tranquillity. I. 242. b. 243. a. People ſhould be contented to oppoſe fundamental innovations. 243. a. There are ſome which laſt long, and ſome which do not. IV. 353. b. 354. a.

Innovators boaſt of doing nothing but in imitation of the Antients. III. 230. b. A terrible maxim againſt them. V. 315. b. They are ſometimes neceſſary. I. 577. a. They affect to have devotees, and to make uſe of their intrigues. IV. 27. b.

Inquiſition has been ſilent with reſpect to a book full of abſurdities. I. 138. b. How people ought to behave towards this tribunal, whenever they paſs a ſentence like that which was paſſed by it upon Carranza. II. 337. a. b. Is a real abomination introduced into the holy places. ibid. b. Its unjuſt proceedings are ſometimes condemned. 656. a. b. 657. a. b. Hindered from being introduced into France. III. 506. b. 507. a. A certain author proves proves the juſtice of this tribunal by ſcripture, and places the firſt inſtitution of it in the terreſtrial paradiſe. IV. 3. b. On what account chiefly it may be always turned into ridicule. 782. a. Its conduct is by no means uniform. V. 551. b. Condemns the book of the Taxe de la Chancellerie Romaine only as it is corrupted by the Heretics. I. 628. b. Brochard ſays that it is the abomination of deſolation foretold by Daniel and St Paul. II. 145. a. b. See Index.

Inquiſitors, of whatſoever religion they are, make all the cities where they grow powerful, enemies to learning. I. 147. The people will not ſuffer any recrimination to be uſed againſt them. 154. b. Their partial indulgence. ibid. It is a great triumph to eſcape out of their hands. 777. a. A reflexion of Mr Arnauld's on their behaviour with reſpect to certain books. II. 37. a. b. Whether indulgence ſhould be uſed towards them for the ſake of the public good. 372. a. b. Their immenſe power. III. 473. b. 474. a. Are often impoſed upon with reſpect to ſuch books as people have a mind to put out. V. 293. a. b. The quarrels which Valla had with them. 435. a. b. 436. a. b. Their villany and injuſtice. 453. b. 454. a. b. Their Directory by Nicolas Emeric, of which Francis Pegma publiſhed two editions. II. 749.

Inſcription, a proud one. III. 237. b.

Inſcriptions, the jealouſy which they have occaſioned ſometimes. V. 552. b. 553. a. b.

Inſects, their organs are infinitely more nice than thoſe of men. II. 636. a.

Inſpiration, whether it muſt be allowed with regard to the expreſſions in Scripture as well as the doctrines. I. 106. a. b. 107. a. b. Thoſe perſons who pretend to it are dangerous to a ſtate. 647. b. 648. a. No coherency muſt be expected from one that aſcribes every thing to inſpiration. II. 112. Exceſſive pride is the general fault of thoſe who pretend to it. 538. a. b. There is no great glory acquired by confuting them. III. 388. a. b. Ruyſbroëck, by reaſon of his ignorance, was looked upon as one who wrote by inſpiration. IV. 942.

Inſtability, an example of the inſtability of human things. I. 566. b.

Inſtitution (Calvin's), the Epiſtle Dedicatory of that book is one of the three or four prefatory diſcourſes that are admired the moſt. II. 261. b. An account of its different editions and corrections. 262. a. b. 263. a. For which Bolſec inſults Calvin. 262. b. Compared with Martyr's Common-Places. V. 86. b. The extraordinary eſteem which people have for it. ibid. 87. a. Abridged. ibid. A ſupplement to what has been ſaid of its different editions. ibid. b. & ſeq. Variations that are fouud between them. 87. a. b. Marlorat makes Indexes of them. 88. a. It has been printed an infinite number of times. ibid. a. b. Faults of the author of the Eſſay on Learning, touching this Inſtitution. ibid.

Inſtitutes of Juſtinian, the beautiful order, and the ſymmetry of that work are deſervedly admired. V. 87. b.

Intellect, its unity in all men taught by ſome Philoſophers. I. 553. b. 554. a. b. 555. a. b. II. 411. a. b. 412. a. b. 565. b. 566. a. b. The abſurdity of that doctrine. I. 554. b. 555. a. b. Which nevertheleſs could only be invented by great genius's. ibid. a. Averrhoë's opinion on its unity maintained by Vernias and Auguſtin Niphus. IV. 377. and b. See Spirit.

Intelligence: Anaxagoras ſuppoſes an intelligence to be the firſt mover of all things. I. 299. a. b. 300. a. b.

Intelligences charged with different employs throughout the univerſe. II. 251. a.

Intereſt of party, is generally predominant over the love of truth. II. 24. a. b. The public intereſt is the law of Policy, and the law of State. 755. b.

Interim, by whom drawn up. I. 141. and b. It was neither ſatisfactory to the Proteſtants nor the Catholics. ibid. Couragiouſly rejected by the Miniſters bordering upon the Earldom of Hanaw. III. 875. A new interim. 672. and a. b. 673. a.

Interpreters, the Merchants of Rome kept a hundred and thirty of them in one of the towns of Colchis. II. 678.

Interpreters of the Canon-Law, Cinius was no friend to them. II. 507.

Intrigues, an inſtance of ſome of the beſt contrived ones. II. 417. a.

Invectives, authors who have made them. V. 438. a. b.

Invention: two perſons may pretend to the invention of the ſame thing, though the one is not aſſiſted by the other. III. 62. b.

Inventions, it is agreeable to know their original and progreſs. IV. 879. a. b.

Invocation of the dead very much uſed among the Pagans. II. 716. b.

Joan II, Queen of Naples, the manner in which ſhe diſcovers her love. II. 312. a. The fable of the mare may be applied to her. IV. 309. b.

Joannes Januenſis, ſee Janua.

Joconde, the judgment of a good Critic upon two pieces which bear that name. I. 752. a. n. (31).

John (St) would not enter into the bath where an Arch-heretic was. II. 405. b. The beginning of his goſpel cited by Amelius. I. 252.

John the Faſter, Patriarch of Conſtantinople, his ambition gives riſe to a very great quarrel betwixt the Biſhop of Rome and him. III. 223. a.

John XXII, Pope; the taxes of the Romiſh Chancery began under his Pontificate. I. 629. b. Excommunicates Marſilius of Padua. IV. 198.

John XXIII, Pope; his depoſition propoſed in a Council, V. 590.

John without Land ſuccours his mother, who was beſieged in Mirebeau, takes Prince Arthur priſoner, and murthers him ſome time after. III. 797. a.

John Caſimir, Duke of Saxony, erects a famous ſchool at Coburg. III. 660.

Joy, a ſingular effect of that paſſion. II. 676. a. They who die of it, die ſuddenly. III. 766. a. Joys of this world, a pleaſant thought of a Princeſs thereupon. V. 383. b. 384. a.

Joyeuſe (Admiral de) gave an Abbey for a ſong. I. 428. n. (c).

Joinville, they have done us an injury in changing many of the old words in his book. IV. 428. a.

Joke: an obſervation on a Latin joke. II. 702. a.

Joly (Claudius), his reflexions on the life of Lewis XI are very judicious. III. 809. and b. 810. a. Seems to think that the Rozier des Guerres was compoſed by Lewis XI. ibid. and b.

Jon (William du) ennobled for his good ſervices. III. 623. a.

Jon (Denys du) performs a bold action, for which he incurs the hatred of the Franciſcans, and is, at laſt, maſſacred. III. 623. a. b.

Jonas, in what manner he remained three days and three nights in the whale's belly. I. 174. a.

Jopoli, a city in Calabria; Auguſtin Niphus was a native of that place, and not of Seſſa. IV. 377. a.

Jordan (William) tranſlates ſome of Ruyſbroëck's books. IV. 942.

Jornandes, his hiſtory of the Goths tranſlated into French. III. 581.

Joſeph (the Patriarch), the place where it is ſaid he was buried. I. 37. b.

Joſeph (St) had the gift which they call infrigidation. II. 108. b. Has been made a martyr of a new kind. 338. b. 339. a. Refutation of ſome impious opinions vented thereupon. 339. a. b.

Joſephus, a Jewiſh Hiſtorian, contradicts Moſes. I. 39. a. b. Several Critics riſe up againſt his Jewiſh Antiquities. 374. b. 375. a. Aſcribes an anſwer to Samuel's mother quite different from what the Scripture aſcribes to her. 342. b. Mr d'Andilli's tranſlation of him. 487. b. Has ſuppreſſed a miracle in the book of Numbers. 2. b. Reaſons like a Jew that ſeems to have forgot the elements of his religion. II. 248. Thinks that a ſtory of Moſes is not ſufficiently circumſtantiated. IV. 133. a. Cenſured for having compared the paſſage of Alexander with that of Moſes. 608. b. 609. a. Says that God commanded Sarah to put Hagar in Abraham's bed. V. 51. a. What he relates concerning a quarrel between the Jews and Samaritans. 314. b. n. (10).

Joram (King), whether Elijah wrote a letter to him from heaven. II. 752. and b.

Joubert (Claudius) forgets himſelf when he fancies that he knew Camden at Padua. II. 284. b.

Joubertus (Laurence) what he ſaid concerning his learning. III. 582. b. Reſtores Cauliac's Surgery. II. 399. b.

Jovian (Emperor) whether before him neither Emperor nor Conſul gave up an inch of ground to the enemy. III. 317. b. The Chriſtians endeavour to clear him, and the Heathens to condemn him with reſpect to the ſcandalous peace which he made. 585. b. 586. a.

Jovius, refuted in relation to the Magic of Agrippa. I. 150. b. 151. a. Condemns Savonarola with moderation enough. V. 62. a. See Paul Jovius.

Journal, it is neceſſary to conſult a good one, in order to rank things according to their dates. IV. 211. b.

Journal des Sçavans, cenſured. I. 48. a. b. Has ſpoken of the treatiſe de Equuleo too haſtily. III. 620. a. b. Who its authors are. IV. 505. b.

Journal de Trevoux, the remarks which is made in it concerning the analyſis of quantities infinitely ſmall. V. 620. b. 621. a. Cited. 596. a. n. (37). & paſſim alibi.

Journaliſts cited in relation to a book of the life of the Holy Virgin. I. 136. a. b. 137. a.

Journey: a journey remarkable both for ſpeed and ſlowneſs. II. 716. a. b.

Iphigenia, was not a virgin when offered in ſacrifice to Diana. I. 84. a. Two cities of Cappadocia boaſted to have her true knife. II. 530. b.

Ireland, what a certain perſon ſaid after it's reduction. I. 366. a. b.

Iron (hot) in what manner it was made uſe of to find out the truth of an accuſation. II. 767. a. Reflexion upon that cuſtom. ibid. b.

Irregularity, is ſometimes a happy fault in an ingenious work. IV. 619. b. 620. a.

Irreligion, its ſource. I. 639. a. Robs us of a thouſand comforts. II. 786. a. b.

Iſaac makes his wife paſs for his ſiſter, and why. I. 40. His trick found out. ibid. and a. St Auſtin juſtifies his behaviour. ibid. b.

Iſabel of Bavaria, Queen of France, her ill reputation. II. 209. a. b.

Iſabella Villamarini, Princeſs of Salerno, the love ſhe bore her huſband. II. 297. b.

Iſdegerdes, King of Perſia, favourable to the Chriſtians. I. 13. Perſecutes them at laſt, and why. ibid. and a. Reflexion thereupon by the author of this Dictionary. ibid. b. 14. a. b.

Iſelanders calumniated by Bloſkenius. III. 580. a. b.

Iſhmael, of what kind of people he was an emblem. I. 123. a. Conjectures upon the mocking, by which he offended Sarah. ibid. b. How old he was when baniſhed by Abraham. ibid. 124. a. There is a difficulty attending what the Scripture ſays of him. ibid. There is a ſtone at Mecca which paſſes for his ſepulchre. 125. b. It is ſaid that a ſpring of water was produced under his feet, when he was dying with thirſt. IV. 179. a.

Iſhmaelites: what deity the antient Iſhmaelites worſhipped. I. 124. a.

Iſocrates the reaſon he gave for not ſaying ſomething when he was deſired. I. 453. a. Never had a deſign of making a Panegyric on Buſiris. II. 235. a. b. Servius's want of Exactneſs with reſpect to this. ibid. b.

Iſraelites, ſtories which ſome Ægyptian writers tell of them. IV. 679. and a. b.

Iſſel. Who it was that joined that river to the Rhine. II. 717. a.

Iſſoudun, the ſuperior of the Franciſcans of that town, preaches impudently againſt the Queen of Navarre. III. 622. a. In what manner he was puniſhed. ibid. The Catholics there commit a thouſand violences againſt the Reformed. ibid. b. Its walls are ordered to be demoliſhed, but Cipierre by his intereſt gets the decree changed. ibid.

Italy, was the Land of Promiſe, which the Deſtinies commanded Æneas to go in ſearch of. I. 316. Who was the firſt who reſtored the purity of the Greek tongue there. 434. a. The greateſt part of the Monks in Italy think of nothing leſs than of God. II. 649. b. 650. a. When Leandro Alberti's deſcription of it was publiſhed. IV. 165. b.

Italians ſent into France by the Pope, their leudneſs. I. 675. a. b. Some of them have made themſelves ridiculous by an affected way of making uſe only of ſuch terms as are to be found in the beſt Latin authors. 741. a. b. 742. a. II. 68. b. Do not in the leaſt degrade themſelves by being merchants. IV. 791. b.

Ithacius, his character. IV. 780. b. 781. a. b. Declared innocent in a conventicle. ibid. b.

Jubilate, what a Jubilate religious among the Monks is. I. 753. b. A Jubilate author. ibid. and 754. a.

Jubilee. It was Paul II, who reduced it to twenty-five years. IV. 511. Guy Patin ridicules Jubilees. V. 751. b. 752. a. b.

Judicium, the letters of that word, which are all numeral, and make 1613, induced ſeveral Divines to think, that the laſt judgment would be in the year 1613. II. 124. a.

Judith, a woman who took it into her head to imitate her, is puniſhed with death. IV. 723. a. b.

Judge: there is a vaſt number of people, who judge of their neighbour by themſelves. I. 744. b. 745. a. b.

Judge: a Judge who fell aſleep ſometimes on the bench. I. 757. a.

Judgment (laſt) a great many make their wills, tho' they firmly believed that this was to happen in the ſame year. III. 780. b. Several Divines thought it would be in 1613, becauſe they found that number in the word Judicium, all the letters of which are numeral. II. 124. a.

Judgments (raſh) the two ſources from whence they proceed. I. 550. b.

Judges are not all of the ſame humour. I. 61. b. Whatever pains a man takes in ſtudying the Civil-Law, it will avail nothing againſt the raſhneſs of a corrupt Judge. 224. Men of honour always decline the office, when they are excepted againſt by the parties accuſed. 489. b. How rigid judges were called. II. 347. a. b. Ought to be miniſters of the law. III. 802. b. People have no great opinion of the integrity of ſuch as are created by commiſſions. 212. b. IV. 142. a. b. &c. 241. a. b. Whether thoſe whoſe ſentences are unjuſt contrary to their intention, deſerve excuſe. 929, 930. and a. b. 931. a. Judges in point of wit, diſagreed formerly as well as now. V. 360. a. b. 361. a. b. Learning diſplayed profuſely in a plea, ſerves but to withdraw their attention, and hide the true ſtate of the cauſe. II. 105. b. 106. a. b. Judges who are men of honour, exclude themſelves when they are intereſted in a cauſe. III. 345. b. A Judge, that meeting with a ſharp conteſt between Bartolus and Baldus put in the margin of his book, a queſtion for a friend. IV. 733. b.

Julius II. Pope, compared to Julius Cæſar. III. 615. a. b. An enemy of France. 814. By what artifices he ſaved himſelf after the French had won the victory at Ravenna. 812. a. b.

Julius III. Pope, ſummons Henry II, King of France to appear before God, who anſwers that he would appear there, but that the Pope would not appear. III. 405.

Julia, the origin of that family. II. 424. a. b.

Julia, wife of one Marc Antony, unhappy in huſbands. I. 354. b. What ſhe did to ſave her brother. ibid.

Julia, daughter of Auguſtus, her anſwer to thoſe who were ſurprized, that her children ſhould be like her huſband. V. 78. b. Had like to have been drowned in a river. ibid. Was ſeveral years gone from Rome, and become the object of her father's indignation, before he baniſhed Ovid. IV. 443. a. b. 444. a. b. 445. a. b.

Julia. Grand-daughter of Auguſtus, her exile, and that of Ovid happened much about the ſame time. IV. 444. a.

Julian the Apoſtate, endeavours to rebuild the temple of Jeruſalem, but is obliged to deſiſt from the undertaking. I. 228.

Julis, a town of the iſle of Cea, has been the native-country of many great men. III. 608.

Julius (Canus) what Seneca relates of him. II. 66. a.

Junia, Cicero's raillery in relation to her. II. 347. a. b. 348. a.

Junianus Majus, was the Artemidorus of his age. I. 47.

Junius, the praiſe which Joſeph Hall beſtows on him. III. 343. a. n. (20).

Juno, her temple at Argos, wholly burnt. II. 498. What ſhe did out of affection for Combabus. 535. b. Juno Lacinia, the wonders of her temple. III. 640. a.

Ivory, whether it can be made of any thing beſides Elephants teeth. V. 350. a.

Jupiter, which was the firſt, and which the laſt mortal whom he lay with. I. 206. b. What was his employment according to Æſop. II. 832. a. Stole away Ganymede to gratify his pederaſty. III. 130. a. The Celtic Jupiter is the moſt antient of the Jupiters. 433. a. Where and how Jupiter calmed the tranſport of his paſſion. 630. a. b. Jupiter Hammon, why he had horns upon his head. ibid. b. 631. a. What Stratagem Jupiter uſed to make Juno return to him. 632. b. That which made his adulteries more inexcuſable. 646. a. Whether he turned the whole rabble of the gods out of heaven. 739. b. How he acted in the caſe of benefits and rewards. IV. 355. a. b. 572. a. Moſt people knew his Divinity better by thunder and lightening than by the diſtribution of benefits. III. 651. a. b. IV. 572. a. Throws Saturn from Mount Niphates into Tartarus, orders that mountain to be called Caucaſus, and faſtens Prometheus to it. II. 82. b.

Juret, criticiſed by Father Sirmond, and defended in relation to Hildebert. III. 454. a. b.

Jurieu, his ſentiments concerning the inſpiration of the Prophets, criticiſed. I. 107. a. b. Difficulties to which he has reduced himſelf in his True Syſtem of the Church. 476. a. b. In his Preſervative againſt a Change of Religion. ibid. b. 477. a. And in his Paſtoral Letters. 477. a. b. Has very well refuted the Calumniators of Theodorus Beza. 546. n. (c). Changed his opinion concerning Penal Laws againſt Heretics. 566. b. 567. a. Why he changed it. ibid Declamation of Father Tellier againſt him. 784. a. b. Supplies the Infidels with weapons by his manner of rejecting a certain miracle. II. 587. a. b. What he thinks of the ſentiments of the Remonſtrants, and of their condemnation by the Synod of Dort. III. 174. a. His Paralogiſm touching the authority of Councils, for the deciſion of controverſies. IV. 65. a. Diſpute between him and Mr Maimbourg, concerning the pretended martyrdom of Heretics. 108. b. 109. a. b. 110. a. b. What he thinks of thoſe who give the title of Mother of God to the Holy Virgin. 351. a. Is involved in a thouſand difficulties, relating to ſin and the Preſcience of God. 518. a. b. Ridicules in a very ſmart manner, thoſe who write chimerical things concerning relics. V. 252. b. Aſcribes to the Fathers a ſentiment as impious as that of Spinoza. 588. b. n. (165). His prophetical calculations refuted. II. 124. b. Finds miracles every where. 552. a. May cry out as long as he will, Princes will not ſtir an inch in the matter. ibid. b. Criticiſed touching the time when perſecution was hotteſt. IV. 158. a. b. &c. Touching the manuſcripts, and the editions of Martinus Polonus. 709. a. b. His doctrine concerning the love of our neighbour, (V. 642. a. b. & ſeq.) is one of the looſeſt maxims of the Jeſuits. 645. a. n. (51). His anſwer to the accuſation that was brought againſt it. ibid. b. 646. a. b. Commends his own great feats. 643. a. Favoured by the Walloon Synods. ibid. b. The Walloon Conſiſtory grants him every thing. 644. a. His letters to the Duke of Montauſier, and how they became public. 645. b. 646. a. A choleric, paſſionate, and dangerous enemy. ibid. His policy. 648. a. Chimerical conſpiracies of which he accuſes his adverſaries, and which he does not fail to make his advantage of. ibid. a. b. The hypotheſis of Auguſtin and Calvin concerning Predeſtination, is to him an inſupportable burden, and yet he ſticks to it. 822. A libel of his under this title, The Judgment of the Public, &c. concerning the Dictionary of Mr Bayle. 797. to 809. Part of his character. 800. to 804. Character of his books. 802, 803. He paſſed his judgment on the Critical Dictionary, without having read it. 805. His malice to the Bookſellers. 808.

Juſtice. Whether in war it gives reaſon to hope for ſucceſs. I. 280. a. The ſeverity of the laws ſometimes tranſgreſſes the bounds of juſtice. 313. a. b. IV. 502. a. Enjoins all things which become proper to the times. I. 616. b. 617. a. b. Whether it is a real being, and not a fantom. II. 164. b. 165. a. How Carneades argued againſt it. 330. a. b. IV. 752. a.

Juſtified: Bucer's judgment of this theſis, that we are juſtified by faith alone. II. 172. a. b. 173. a.

Juſtin Martyr, an apology for him, with relation to Ariſtotle's death. I. 473. a. b. 474. a. b.

Juſtin is an Hiſtorian of little judgment. I. 510. a. Vindicated from the accuſations of Freinſhemius. 763. a. b. Is guilty of an Anachroniſm, with regard to the famous battle of Cnidus, and the time when the Athenians began to recover their liberty. II. 547. b. 548. a. b. &c.

Juſtinian compared to an aſs, and why. III. 429. b. 430. a.

Juvenal a paſſage of his ſatires explained. I. 191. a. Another. 768. a. b. His ſatires more apt to put one out of conceit with leudneſs, than the moſt chaſte diſcourſes againſt it. V. 487.

Juvenile works, obſervations concerning them. V. 340. a. b.

Ixion, for what reaſon and in what manner puniſhed by Jupiter. III. 636. b. 637. a.

K.

Kalendar. In what it has moſt need to be reformed. III. 739. b. 740. a. Reformed. V. 247. a. b.

Kamea, what the Jews mean by that word. III. 126. a.

Karmatians, a ſect which having riſen in Arabia, laid waſte Mecca, and profaned its temple. I. 48, 49. Intend to raiſe ſcruples in mens minds. 49. and b.

Καθανμὸς, the ſignification of that word. IV. 182. b. 183. a.

Καταφυγὼν, ought not to be preferred before Καταφαγὼν, in a paſſage of Nicander. I. 116. a. b.

Keys, the power of them never falls to the petticoat in the Church. I. 442. b. Thoſe of St Peter thrown into the Tyber. III. 610. a. b.

Kempis (Thomas à) his imitation of Jesus Christ tranſlated into Arabic, and by whom. III. 171. a.

Kill: whether it be lawful for a man to let himſelf to hire, to kill thoſe who have done him no wrong. II. 196. a. In how many caſes a celebrated author pretends that people may kill themſelves innocently. V. 14. a.

Kingdom divided againſt itſelf, &c. How far that maxim of Jesus Christ is true. IV. 271. a.

Kingdoms, thoſe which fall to the diſtaff are ſubject to ſeveral inconveniences. IV. 309. a. V. 519. b. It generally happens that a kingdom which acquires great glory abroad, is exhauſted and miſerable at home. 656.

Kings, a great many have aſſumed the title of the great King. I. 513. a. b. 514. a. b. The pride of eaſtern monarchs was not ſo well flattered with the title of King of Kings, as with that of the great King. 514. b. Their very enemies have had a veneration for them. 273. a. Their authority very little regarded ſometimes in France. 720. a. b. A people that could not be without them. II. 303. b. 304. a. The reaſon we do not ſee them oftener dethroned, is, becauſe the people have not been ſollicited to revolt by intrigues well enough managed. 608. a. The ſervices which they cannot acknowledge commonly make them ungrateful. 736. b. The facility and goodneſs of Kings is more prejudicial to their kingdoms than rigour and auſterity. III. 403. b. 404. a. 409. a. b. A King whoſe condition was very miſerable. IV. 276, 277. a. b. It is hard to judge of their conduct. 328. b. See Sovereigns. It is more difficult for a King who has brothers and children to govern his family, than to govern his kingdom. 558. a. b. People change their principles concerning the right of Kings. V. 740. A practice which has been obſerved for a long time towards thoſe who aſſiſt at a ſiege. III. 718. a.

Kircher. A conteſt between him, and Father Maignan. IV. 61. b. 62. a. b.

Kiſs: in ſome countries it was ſuppoſed that the firſt kiſs a maid received from her galant, was that of her betrothing. IV. 87. b. The Romans had a cuſtom of kiſſing their kinſwomen, to know whether they had drunk wine. 756. a. b. 757. a. The power which Socrates aſcribed to a kiſs. 796. b. 797. a. b. When, and on what occaſions, it is allowed to kiſs other peoples wives, and maidens. ibid. Parallel between the cuſtom of kiſſing and dancing. V. 24. b. 25. a. b.

Knight (William) publiſhes Joſeph Hall's Mundus alter & idem. III. 345. a.

Knight: by what means, and at what time the Roman Knights were admitted to the Senatorial dignity. II. 712. b. Their order diſhonoured two manner of ways. III. 696. b. A Knight who confers the title upon another. 282. a. An Italian author did not acknowledge any out of the Romiſh communion. V. 388.

Knobius (Chriſtopher) praiſes the King of Denmark for having thrown the book of Concord into the fire. III. 391. a. b.

Know: the manner in which we know things is very obſcure. I. 555. a. b. Whether it be likely that any Philoſopher could be ſo extravagant as to maintain, that he knew not whether any thing exiſted. IV. 206. a. b.

Knowledge: it is a crime to have more knowledge than the people. I. 307. b. Knowledge puffeth up, but there is another talent which puffs up yet more. 479. b. The bounds of human knowledge. III. 582. and b. It rendered people ſuſpected at the court of Rome. II. 187. and b. 188. a. Is the principal characteriſtic and privilege of the gods. V. 587. b. 588. a.

Knox accuſed of inconſtancy in the diſpute concerning the government of women. III. 670. a. b.

Konig cenſured for referring his readers to books which he had not ſeen himſelf. I. 547. b. Has made three men of one. II. 243. b. n. (13). Cenſured in relation to Patricius. IV. 507. a. and Pereira. 546. a. Cenſured touching Rozarius, and his native country. 911. a. b. Blamed. I. 603. a. n. (i). Thinks oftentimes that a book is compoſed the year in which it is printed, or ſome tranſlation of it. IV. 919. a. b.

Konigſberg, when its academy was erected. I. 223.

Kortholt (Chriſtian), his book de tribus Impoſtoribus magnis. V. 208. b.

Kortholt (Sebaſtian) quoted. V. 206. a. n. (66). 216. a. n. (140).

Κύριος, a Pagan author has given that name to God. II. 833. a.

L.

LAbbadie, a ſchiſmatic preacher, and followed as if he had been another apoſtle. I. 4. b. By what ſpirit he was led, according to Antoinette Bourignon. II. 111. a. b. A ſtory which is told of him. IV. 87. a. Aſſerts that God will and can deceive. 877. a.

L'abbé (Father), his Pharus Galliæ antiquæ almoſt ruined. I. 11. a. b. He exclaims againſt Rivetus. 21. a. b. Cenſured touching Ammonius. 269. a. b. A paſſage of Zanchius related by him. V. 602. a. n. (38). Puſhes Mareſius in an unmerciful manner, touching the curtailed edition of Anaſtaſius, with which the Jeſuits are reproached. IV. 727. a. b. A ſingular anſwer which is made to his objections by D. Francus. ibid. n. (23).

Laberius, reflexion upon the reaſon, which, according to him, moved Democritus to blind himſelf. II. 641. b. 642. a.

Labienus, his books condemned to be burnt. II. 355. b. Reſolves to die that he may not ſurvive the productions of his wit. ibid.

Labyrinths, four buildings of that kind. III. 750. b.

Labyrinth of the Free-will. IV. 390. b. 391. a.

Labyrinth of love, a new French tranſlation of that book. II. 37. b.

Laboureur (le), a paſſage of that writer criticized. I. 711. b. Cenſured in relation to Dolet. II. 684. a. b. Has not given an impartial account of the French Embaſſador in Poland. III. 264. a. What he ſays of the impertinencies of Genealogiſts. IV. 650. a. b. 651. a. Reflexion of his upon ſome preachers. 722. a. Says ſomething very remarkable concerning Poltrot's conſpiracy. V. 186. b. 187. a. Inveighs ſharply againſt thoſe who aſſume the name of Lands that their family does no longer poſſeſs. 187. a. b.

Lacedæmon, its Kings deſcended from Ariſtodemus. I. 130. a. The veneration which its enemies had for them. 273. a. b. The courage of the women of Lacedæmon. II. 522. b. 523. a. The cuſtom that was obſerved there with reſpect to their feaſts. 574. b. The reaſon why the women and girls of that city were ſo immodeſt. III. 962. a. b. 963. a. In what manner diſobedient children were puniſhed there. 965. b. &c. In what terms its decree for the deification of Alexander was conceived. IV. 405. a.

Lacedæmonians took away a crown for trifling reaſons. I. 128. a. b. Were the beſt huſbands in the world. 134. b. Their dialect was harſh. 205. b. Who was the only man of their country who had two wives at once. 312. When they began to conquer the Tageates. ibid. and a. b. and why. ibid. Pretended to be beholden to Apollo for their glory and proſperity, and yet joined in a confederacy with thoſe who plundered his temple. IV. 622. a. Had liberty to marry their ſiſters by the mothers, but not their ſiſters by the father. V. 49. b.

Lacquey: it is not without example that a lacquey has become a diſtinguiſhed author. IV. 173. a. b.

Lactantius produces a teſtimony in proof of the worſhip, which was ſtill paid to Apollonius, in the beginning of the IVth century. I. 381. b. What he ſays of Apollonius Tyanæus, and of Apuleius. 394. a. b. In what manner he pretends to deſtroy all Philoſophy. 411. a. b. 412. a. And particularly Acatalepſy. 411. b. Pretends to have demonſtrated that there is no ſcience among men, and confeſſes this with relation to Phyſics. 412. a. His anſwer to Carneades in the behalf of juſtice. II. 330. a. b. Upbraids the Pagans with paying infamous worſhip to a proſtitute. III. 53. and a. b. Makes uſe of a fallacious ſyllogiſm of Cicero's againſt Dicæarchus. II. 658. b. Is miſtaken as to an objection which he makes againſt the Heathens. III. 53. a. Rallies them upon the greateſt of the gods at laſt ceaſing to beget children. 431. b. How he anſwered Hierocles, touching the ſlanders which he had publiſhed againſt the Chriſtian religion. 444. a. b. 445. a. Does not ſeem to have underſtood the meaning of Ariſtippus in theſe words, Habeo & non habeor. 701. a. Makes bad objections to the ſyſtem of atoms. 789. a. b. 790. a. Had no reaſon to charge Lucretius with contradicting himſelf. 928. b. 929. a. His anſwer to Epicurus concerning the evil which happens in this world is weak and full of errors. IV. 513. b. 514. a. His opinion about the ſoul of beaſts. 903. b. n. (28). What he thinks of Cicero's book de Conſolatione. V. 411. b. 412. a. Finds fault with the thought which is in the beginning of it. ibid. Laughs at Xenophanes for believing that the moon is inhabited. 576. a. How he endeavoured to convince the Pagans that the mother of Jeſus Chriſt was a virgin. 772. b.

Ladies, when they fall in love with their inferiors, they are obliged to make all the advances. I. 315. a. It is uncommon for great ladies, who do not marry a ſecond time, to live without giving occaſion to cenſure their conduct. 358. a. The poetical deification of a lady. 398. a. b. 399. a. The tranſcendent merit of another. 781. a. b. 782. a. b. The Roman ladies dedicate all their jewels in order to make a veſſel of gold, which the Senate had reſolved to ſend to Delphos. II. 290. a. The honour that was allowed them in conſideration of this. ibid. One of the moſt dangerous principles wherewith ladies can be prepoſſeſſed, is, that there are conjunctures which permit them to neglect the outſide of their honour. 381. b. A Spaniſh proverb concerning them. 515. a. Explication of that proverb. ibid. The young ones do not commonly make the greateſt noiſe in the courts of Princes. 632. a. Whether they entertain thoſe well, who make them taſte the ſweets of love. ibid. When the cuſtom of their going to court was introduced, and the miſchiefs ariſing therefrom. III. 93. a. b. Corruption which they brought into the court of France. ibid. Our modern ladies are not of the ſame temper with Dido. 141. a. b. Are the plagues of a court, when they intrude into ſtate-intrigues. 304. b. 305. a. See Women. What kind of affront gives them the moſt ſenſible pain. 405. b.

406. a. Are addicted to all the fortune-telling ſuperſtitions with which the citizens wives are infatuated. IV. 200. b. 201. a. A ſcandalous cuſtom that was practiſed by the Roman ladies. V. 130. a. b. Immodeſt ladies turn devout women at laſt; and the effect which this produces. 533. b. 534. a.

Ladoder, an Engineer that betrayed the Governour of Landau. III. 721. a. b.

Lælius, his chaſtity. IV. 745. b. 746. a.

Laërtius (Diogenes) not very exact in his reaſonings and narrations. II. 777. b. 778. a.

Lætus (John) cenſured. II. 17. n. (b). IV. 803. a.

Layette (a Drawer) taken for a man. IV. 2. a.

Laymen diſguiſed like Prieſts, and ſent to confeſs criminals. II. 459. b. 460. a. Whether it ought to be believed that recourſe was had to this artifice in the proceſs againſt J. Chaſtel. 460. b. Have no buſineſs with things appertaining to the altar. V. 62. a.

Laïs, a famous Courtezan, was a model for the fineſt Painters to copy after. I. 367. b. The anſwer Apelles gave in relation to her. ibid. In what manner ſhe uſed Diogenes. II. 670. a. Her favours to Diogenes the Cynic. ibid. Whether Apelles got her maidenhead. III. 702. b. 703. a.

Lakes, whoſe water bore up men that could not ſwim. III. 158. a.

Lallemant (John) borrows a good deal from Rataller, in his Latin verſion of Sophocles. IV. 848, 849.

Lamb (Paſchal), when it was ſlain according to Lewis de Leon. III. 772. b.

Lambert (St) murthered, by whom, and for what reaſon. I. 233. and a. b.

Lambinus corrects a paſſage of Plutarch unneceſſarily. I. 129. b. Had no very nice taſte upon the ſubject of modeſty. III. 920. b. Did not underſtand a paſſage of Pauſanias concerning Sappho. V. 48. a.

Lame man in the Acts of the Apoſtles, his cure, and what followed after it, burleſqu'd in the Acts of the Apoſtles in rhime. II. 479. b.

Lamy (William) accuſed of Hereſy becauſe he diſputed againſt the motion of the heavens. II. 29. b. In a lecture of Anatomy, ſpeaking of the virginity of thoſe whom his auditors ſhould marry, he fortifies them againſt all events. 370. a. Cited. I. 311. a. n. (200). Examination of a notion of his about the Epicurean hypotheſis. IV. 438. a. Gives an account of two ſigns by which one may know whether a woman has had any children. 503. a.

Lampagia, the wife of Aimon, King of Saragoſſa, whether ſhe was the daughter of Eudo, Duke of Aquitain. IV. 282. a. b. 283. a. b.

Lampridius, his judicious obſervation upon the duty of an Hiſtorian with reſpect to popular opinions. II. 770. b.

Lamus, King of the Leſtrygons, built the city called Formiæ. III. 786. and b.

Lancaſter (the Duke of) ſuſpected to be guilty of ſome ſiniſter deſign. V. 554. a. b. Whether he was ſuppoſititious. 555. a. b.

Lance, which became a tree. I. 274. a. The iron of the lance that pierced the body of our Saviour ſent to Rome. III. 566. and a. b. V. 469. and a. b. 470. a. b.

Lancelot (Mr), his remark upon the edition of Abelard's works. I. 249. a. b. n. (17). 651. n. (c). 740. b. n. (15). Memoir concerning William Bigot, communicated by him. II. 7. b. 8. a. b. n. (15). Informs the author of a memoir concerning Antony Cornelius. 556. b. Memoir concerning Simon Morinus communicated by him. IV. 269. b. 270. a. b. n. (13). Concerning Francis Hotman. V. 417. b. n. (2). Concerning James Sanſon. 43. a. n. (2).

Langius explains a paſſage of Cicero wrong. I. 80. a.

Langres, the King's council oppoſeth the eſtabliſhment of a Proteſtant Church there. II. 694. a.

Language, whenever the old is made uſe of now-a-days it is by way of pleaſantry. I. 63. a. b. Is impoveriſhed by being too much changed. III. 208. b. IV. 743. a. b. Nothing ought to be altered in that of the old French writers. IV. 428. The old ought not to be altered in the leaſt when antient works are publiſhed or republiſhed. II. 838. and b. The zeal of ſeveral Princes for the language of their country. I. 543. b. II. 516. a. b. 517. a. b. 518. a. Judgment of ſeveral languages. II. 436. b. There is not one which is not more or leſs barren. IV. 842. a. The judgment which Cicero paſſes on thoſe who deſpiſe their own language. I. 60. a. b.

Language (unknown), it is not true that the Fathers of the Church wrote the impieties and obſcenities of the antient Heretics in an unknown language. III. 136. a. b.

Language (Latin), authors who are fond of its oldeſt phraſes. I. 62. b. 63. a. b. 741. a. b. 742. a. Who was the Vaugelas of it. III. 319. b. Whether thoſe who ſpeak it eaſily, ſpeak it likewiſe politely. IV. 408. a. b. Greater liberty was taken in the uſe of the words of this language than there is in the French. II. 140. b. It is difficult to write very clearly in Latin. I. 644. b. II. 681. b. Plutarch affirms that there were few people in his time that did not ſpeak it. 517. a. From whence derived. III. 309.

Language (French) puzzles us when the uſual order of the words is altered. I. 602. b. II. 134. a. b. Has been a long time in vogue amongſt foreigners. 228. a. b. Is very much eſteemed. 436. a. b. Its advantage over the Greek. 628. b.

Language (Gothic) is the mother of all the other Teutonic languages. III. 628. a. b. 629. a.

Language (vulgar), whether it ought to be uſed in works of learning. I. 741. b.

Languages (dead) loſe a great deal of their force and grace in a tranſlation. I. 216. b. Are obſcure, and why. 602. b.

Languages living, their inconſtancy. III. 208. a. b. 209. a. b.

Lanſius (Thomas) declaims on the bad effects of travelling. III. 345. b.

Lanuvium, its inhabitants made Roman citizens. III. 639. b.

Laodice puts Danaë to death. III. 779. b.

Laodicea, daughter of Priam, falls in love with Acamas, the ſon of Theſeus, and finds means of enjoying him. I. 52. and b. 53. a.

Laomedon refuſes to recompenſe Neptune, and is puniſhed for it. III. 432. b.

Lapithæ, four modern authors affirm that Phlegyas was their King. IV. 626.

Larebonius demonſtrates, in his Janua Cœlorum reſerata, the faults of the new ſyſtem of the Church. IV. 363. b. Had he thought of Mr Saurin's reflexion, he would have charged his adverſary home. 414. b. 415. a.

Laſcus (John), Miniſter of the Flemiſh Church at London, is baniſhed from thence. V. 550. a.

Latin, the want of that tongue hinders Bourſault from being Sub-preceptor to the Dauphin. II. 115. The Spaniards are generally too negligent when they write in Latin: an example of it. III. 774. a. b.

Latin (antient), Victorinus of Feltri was one of its firſt reſtorers. IV. 408.

Latomus compared the Chriſtian Church to a bear's cub. V. 294. a.

Lavardin, a noble family of Vendomois. III. 455. b.

Lavement, ſignifications of that word. III. 136. b. n. (57). Formerly ſignified only gargles. ibid. b. Ridiculous delicacy of Garaſſe about it. ibid.

Laudice poiſons five of her ſons. II. 305. a. 308. a.

Launoi (John de), clamour of the Provençals againſt him. I. 362. Some miſtakes of that learned man. II. 9. a. b. He did not underſtand Greek. ibid. b. The unſucceſsfulneſs of his labours for crying down falſe devotion. III. 742. b. 743. a. b. 744. a. Is very much to blame for having beſtowed ſo many encomiums upon a prelate who had made the Amende honorable. IV. 917. and a. b. n. (a). He, and ſome other writers who oppoſe ill-grounded traditions, diſpleaſe many, and do credit to their Church. 739, 740.

Laurea, Cardinal. III. 390. b.

Lauſanne, the Synod held there makes regulations with which Calvin refuſes to comply. II. 264. b.

Law: there were but three cities in the Roman empire, which had ſchools of law. I. 771. a. b. Who was the firſt that renewed the profeſſion of the Roman Roman law, interrupted ever ſince the invaſion of the Barbarians. III. 593, 594. The Civil-Law has been debaſed ſometimes. II. 846. b.

Law of Lamego, Princeſſes of the royal blood of Portugal are excluded from the crown by virtue of that law, IV. 762. b.

Law (Salique) is founded on good reaſons. IV. 406. a. Whether it was inſtituted by Pharamond. III. 336. a. b. Thoſe kingdoms where it is not of force, are ſubject to great diſturbances. V. 519. b.

Law (unwritten) who it was that taught it the Jews. I. 173. b. 174. a.

Lawyers, their qualifications deſcribed in verſe. II. 309. a. b. 310. a. Write down at length robberies which they neither approve nor practiſe. III. 135. b.

Laws, there are none which factious perſons will not evade to come at their ends. I. 128. a. b. Compared to bread and eggs. 223. a. And to the maxims of Phyſicians in their mutability. 616. b. Exceed the bounds of juſtice ſometimes. 313. a. b. Were the ſpring and origin of moral good and evil, according to ſome Philoſophers. 416. Their power. 446. a. b. There was a very odd one at Babylon. 597. a. b. There are three ſorts of men, who make almoſt no uſe of the laws they preſcribe to others. II. 38. a. b. When, by whom, and with what deſign that called Lex Agraria was propoſed. 344. a. b. That called Lex Tabellaria, what the deſign of it was, and by whom propoſed. 345. a. n. (6). The laws by permitting ſome particular things, do not free from blame thoſe that commit them. 501. b. 502. a. b. 503. a. b. 504. a. What pretence was made uſe of at Rome, to abrogate ſuch as were diſliked. 713. b. The benefit of laws ſhould not be ſtopped under pretence of ſome inconveniences. IV. 500. b. 501. a. 637. a. b. Laws are overturned for a little time, in order to make them laſt a very long time. 881. b. Are oftentimes not executed, becauſe of the greatneſs of the evil. V. 17. b. A preamble makes them inſipid: they ſhould not diſpute but command. 833.

Laws (Penal) in matters of conſcience, are the Ratio Ultima of Divines. I. 285. a. b. 286. a. Whether the Church never made uſe of them againſt Heretics. 476. b. 477. a. Enacted againſt the Papiſts in England. III. 345. Odious concluſions drawn from them. 501.

Laws (ſumptuary) how they were hindered from paſſing. III. 492.

Laws of the Union of the ſoul and the body, diverſities which they occaſion in men. II. 451. b. 452. a. b.

Lead, Philetas put ſome to his ſhoes, leſt the wind ſhould carry him away. IV. 616. a.

League, who was called it's Poſtillion. I. 718. a. Violence of the preachers of the League. II. 95. 101. a. b. What ſerved as a pretence for it. III. 407. b. 408. a. That which the Deputy of the League was ordered to repreſent to the Pope. 411. b. 412. a. b. 413. a. The crime of James Clement, was the crime of the whole League. 412. b. 413. a. Puts it into Cardinal de Bourbon's head to ſet up for the lawful ſucceſſor to the crown of France. 520. a. b. Who were its Advocate-Generals. ibid. Who was called its Lacquey. IV. 243. a.

Leaguers in France, call the apology for the King of Navarre an infamous libel. I. 739. a. b. In the time of Henry IV, obtain more preferments than his old ſervants. II 443. b. Make the Duke of Mayence their head. III. 297, a. b.

Leah, whether ſhe committed Adultery the firſt time that Jacob knew her, and whether Jacob did not. IV. 540. a.

Learned: a perſon may be learned, tho' he cannot give an immediate anſwer to a great many queſtions. II. 374. b. n. (57). Reflexion upon the poſterity of learned men. III. 155. a. b. Sometimes deny things the moſt eaſy to be known. I. 76. a. People through policy may affect not to paſs for learned men. 353. a. b. Learned men, poor or unfortunate. 600. a. b. II. 365. b. 366. a. 617. b. 686. a. b. III. 50. b. 862. a. IV. 17. a. b. 294. b. 295. a. V. 400. a. b. 401. a. b. 402. a. b. 403. a. b. 589. and a. b. It is the miſfortune of thoſe who make themſelves eminent, that ſooner or later they will be publickly reproached with the leaſt faults of their youth. I 615. b. One that was famous while he was a beardleſs boy. 664. b. They ought to print books. II. 96. a. b. A perſon is not the more fit to negotiate nice affairs, becauſe he is one of the moſt learned of his age. 188. b. Some of them are niggard of their learning. 287. a. It is a common thing enough for thoſe who are born in ſome village, to pretend themſelves natives of the next neighbouring city. 367. b. No perſons are more to be feared by them, than great lords who love learning. 374. b. Some of them will not confeſs, that they are indebted to their cenſors for a little information. 503. b. One whoſe only daughter is reduced to a miſerable condition. 707. b. 708. a. Which of them may be compared to rough diamonds. 646. a. Few of the learned will expoſe themſelves to raſh judgments. 708. a. They never ought to have a curioſity for the town news. III. 254. b. Marks of a ſtudious diſpoſition in ſome of them. 322, a. b. Learned men diſappointed in their hopes of gratifications. 328. a. b. In their elogies and epitaphs, it is generally affirmed, that they lived well with their wives, but this is not to be depended upon. 437. a. Women may fall in love with them upon account of their learning, without being in love with learning itſelf. 460. b. What value they ſometimes ſet upon their productions. 658. a. It is a great miſfortune for them to have to do with the intendants of the Finances. ibid. and b. There are learned men who know every thing but what they ought to know beſt. 882. a. Moſt of them are only fit to cultivate the lands, which have been already tilled. IV. 104. b. Why ſome learned men decline the ſpeaking of Latin. 409. a. b. Too many trifling circumſtances are inſerted in the journals of their lives. 493. b. Who are the authors of the Journal of the Learned. 505. b. Learned men diſhonoured by the impurities of their wives or their daughters. V. 240. b. 241. a. Hunt after remote things, and neglect that which they have as it were under their very noſes. 734. What ſort of writings ought to be conſulted in order to find the particulars of their lives. II. 8. b. To excel both in buſineſs and learning, is a very rare talent. 314. b. Thoſe who write the lives of learned men, never fail to praiſe their wives for conjugal affection. I. 796. a. Arrogance is ill-becoming them. II. 50. a. Their mercenary ſpirit. III. 339. b. 340. a. b. It is a great happineſs for them to be free from ambition and avarice. IV. 187. b. See Authors and Writers.

Learning, whether it be in a declining condition. I. 220. b. 221. a. b. The character of a braggadocio in learning. 373. a. b. The decay of learning. IV. 209. a. b. Some men would be glad that the key of learning ſhould not be imparted to the people. 629. b. A thing that muſt needs create a contempt for it. 859. a. Learning cannot diſpel the darkneſs of Idolatry. V. 77. b. 78. a. Complaints againſt it. 229. b. Accuſed of having a bad influence on religion. 286. and a. b. France ſeems to have too great an averſion for every thing that looks like learning. 428. a. b. Too much learning diſplayed at the bar, only ſerves to withdraw the judges attention. II. 106. b.

Leer. The ſchool there becomes more famous than that of Norden, and why. II. 768.

Legate. The ignorance of the Legate, who condemned Abelard. I. 760. b. A Doctor's raillery upon it. ibid.

Legendaries, their falſe zeal has ſtuffed the Hiſtory of the ſaints with fabulous ſtories. III. 708. b. The judgment which Melchior Canus gave about them. IV. 554. b. Aſcribe extraordinary actions ſometimes to one ſaint, ſometimes to another. II. 770. b. Ought to follow the example of Lampridius in what regards popular opinions. ibid.

Legends. The origin of the falſe Legends of martyrs. V. 432. a. b. 433. a. b.

Leger (John) reproaches Quichenon with having ababjured the Proteſtant religion. III. 275. b. n. (5). Juſtifies his uncle Antony Leger. ibid.

Legiſlators order and forbid the ſame things according to times and ſeaſons. I. 616. b. Are more worthy of admiration than the greateſt conquerors. IV. 669. b. Intended the good of the public, when they made it be believed, that they converſed with the deity. V. 69. b. A thought of of Machiavel's concerning that which makes them ſucceed or miſcarry. 73. b.

Lehman (Chriſtopher) obſerves that there are abundance of lies in William Eyſengrein's Centenarii XVI, againſt Flacius Illyricus. II. 750. a. b.

Leibniz. Is a very extraordinary man. IV. 535. a. It is ſurprizing that he writes ſo good French as he does. ibid. Whatever fine inſights he has given us into the ſouls of beaſts, his Hypotheſis cannot well be preferred to that of Des Cartes. 909. b. 910. a, b. 911. a. Obſervations upon his reflexions. 914. a. b. as far as 916. a. b. Reflexions upon his anſwers. ibid. His letter concerning the divining wand. I. 8. b. 9. a.

Leiceſter (Earl of) forms a faction in Holland, and aſpires to the ſovereignty. II. 687. b. 688. a.

Leyden, the judgment which its Divines gave. I. 242. and b. 243. a. When its univerſity was founded. III. 241. See Univerſity. The Curators of that univerſity make a decree that is criticized. III. 358. a. b. When the college of Divinity there was erected. 574. A preſent of rarities made to the univerſity of Leyden. V. 561. and b.

Leipſic, its univerſity at variance about the Philoſophy of Ramus. II. 696. The great Guſtavus calls an aſſembly at Leipſic, of Lutherans and Calviniſts, in order to endeavour at an accommodation. III. 476. a. The Journal of Leipſic, or Acta Eruditorum Lipſienſia, its praiſe. I. 493. a. Quoted. V. 202. a. n. (25). & paſſim alibi.

Lela, a name which is commonly given to the great ladies of Africa. III. 17. a. It is alſo the title of honour which the Mahometans gave to the bleſſed Virgin. ibid.

Lemnos. A maſſacre of all the men of that iſland, and the cauſe of it. III. 465. and a.

Lent, a thing which the Clergymen that preach during that time, are often reproached with. IV. 616. A ſuppoſition that would ſhorten it a little. V. 777. Does not begin at Milan till four days after Aſhwedneſday. 778. b.

Lentulus, a pretended letter of that Proconſul's containing a portrait of Jeſus Chriſt, given as an authentic piece by John Huarte. III. 528.

Leo Judæ, what Thuanus meant by thoſe words. I. 802. b.

Leo the Hebrew, what he ſays of the two ſexes of Adam. II. 856. a. b. 857. a.

Leo I, (Pope) confutes an opinion which had been approved by the Church in St Auguſtin. IV. 782. b.

Leo IV and Benedictus III. The She-Pope cannot be placed between theſe two Popes, the one of which was elected immediately after the death of the other. IV. 726. a. b. 738. a.

Leo X. Whether it be true that he publiſhed a threatning monitory againſt the Elector of Saxony. III. 272. b. By what means people got into his favour. 327. a. He was ſometimes preſent at a Comedy. IV. 11. a. Was the firſt that threatened thoſe with excommunication, who read a prohibited book. 13. b. His bull againſt ſuch as affirmed that there was but one ſoul in all men. V. 214. b. 215. a.

Leo Iſauricus, abuſes the credulity of the Calif of the Saracens by a remarkable trick. II. 586. b. 587. a.

Leontium, a Courtezan, her letter to Lamia is a forged piece. II. 781. b. 782. a. Was at worſt the concubine of Metrodorus. 782. a.

Leontius ſuffered martyrdom in Veſpaſian's reign. III. 316. b.

Leopoldſdorf (Jerome Beck of) brings the Turkiſh Annals from Conſtantinople. III. 774. b.

Leotychides, the Lacedæmonians exclude him from the crown with great injuſtice. I. 128. a. b.

Lepanto, Raſario receives an order from the Doge of Venice, to make an oration upon that victory. IV. 848. and a. b. Zarlino compoſes airs which are ſung at the rejoycings made for it. V. 602.

Lepreus, a great eater. III. 427. b. 428. a.

Lerida (the Biſhop of) makes a clamour againſt the congregation of the Index, on account of a Spaniſh Catechiſm. II. 337. b.

Lerma (the Duke of) Paul V, in favour of him, departs from the cuſtom of not ſending the red hat to the Cardinals newly elected. I. 604. b.

Leſbia is the ſame with Clodia, the wife of Metellus Celer. IV. 202. a. b.

Leſcalopier (Father) alledges a fact which is nothing to the purpoſe, and reaſons againſt himſelf, whilſt he is reaſoning againſt Diogenes. III. 357. b. What he means by the ſacred diſeaſe. 789. a. n. (10). His remark upon God's Incomprehenſibility. V. 144. a. n. (42).

Leſdiguieres, by what intrigues he endeavoured to deprive the Proteſtant aſſemblies of a good head. II. 433. b.

Leſna, a town, burnt by the Poles, and why. II. 539. b.

Letter (Paſtoral) ſuppreſſed. V. 748. b.

Letters, the antiquity of their uſage among the Aſſyrians. I. 595. b. 596. a. The changing of one ſingle letter has diſhonoured the memory of a great man. 611. b. 612. a. The ſuppreſſion of two by an error of the print has robbed an author of four years glory. 633. a. A treatiſe of their proportions by Jeffery Tori. V. 388. The capital letters of the Greek, by whom brought again into uſe. III. 732.

Letters: too great a correſpondence by letters, overpowers the learned. I. 625. b. Difference between thoſe that are wrote to a perſon's ſelf, and thoſe that are wrote to others concerning him. 330. b. IV. 276. b. V. 566. b. Letters that paſs between friends, ought to be kept in inviolable ſecrecy. III. 553. a. 844. b. The ſlavery which thoſe are under, who have the reputation of writing fine letters. IV. 707. b. Even the Pagans deteſted the practice of publiſhing of what people wrote to one another in confidence. V. 797. It was not uſual in England before the year 1613, to publiſh diſcourſes in form of letters. III. 344. An author that inſerts letters in a book, which are not of his own writing, leaves room for the authors of thoſe letters to arrogate the merit of the whole performance to themſelves. II. 688, 689.

Letters (men of) a reflexion upon their faults. IV. 859. a. b. A diſcourſe on the marriage of men of letters by Claudius Baduel. I. 603. a. b. 604. a. b.

Letters (Hiſtorical) quoted. V. 753. a. n. (28). & paſſim alibi.

Letters (Provincial) divers particulars concerning that book. IV. 489. b. 490. a. b.

Lettres (the Belles) charged with cauſing a great deal of confuſion. V. 286. b. Their revival in Italy. III. 258. a. b. Their decay. IV. 209. a. b. The reſtoration of them opened the way for the Reformation. V. 286. b.

Leucas, people were cured of the paſſion of love, by leaping from the top of its promontory. III. 787. b. 788. a. Names of thoſe that took the leap. ibid. Its promontory was called the Lover's leap. V. 47. a.

Leucophyllus, a plant which hinders women from committing Adultery. IV. 609. Its effect upon drunken people. 610. a. Its virtue more remarkable than that of the Agnus Caſtus. ibid. b.

Leve (Antony de) whether he had a correſpondence with Agrippa. I. 151. a. b. From whence he took money to pay his ſoldiers. IV. 456. b.

Levis, the houſe of that name is one of the moſt noble in all France. IV. 585. a.

Leviathan, what the deſign of that book is. III. 469. a. b.

Levites, why they were ſo called, according to Plutarch. I. 115. a.

Leudneſs, whether it prevails more in hot countries than cold. II. 820. a. b. 821. a. b. &c. The toleration granted at Rome for this ſin, compared with that granted in other countries for drunkenneſs. 820. b. 821. a. The way to baniſh it. III. 186. a. b. 814. a. b. V. 98. b. 99. a. b. A Queen recovers by her leudneſs, a crown which ſhe could not preſerve by her courage. II. 523. See Incontinency.

Lewis VII, King of France, his ſcruples of conſcience. III. 797. b. 798. a. Diſpoſſeſſes himſelf entirely of the territories of his divorced Queen. V. 518. a.

Lewis IX, King of France, the ſtrange ſervitude to which he ſubmits himſelf, in order to pleaſe the Queen his mother. II. 382. b. 383. a. The oath which it ſeems they would have required from from him. III. 92. a. n. (43). And which he refuſes to take. 98, b.

Lewis XI, King of France, his inclinations always oppoſite to thoſe of Charles, Duke of Burgundy. II. 215. a. b. Would not marry his ſon to the heireſs of Burgundy. 221. a. b. 222. a. Had leſs courage than policy. 221. b. 222. a. His little pad carried him and all his court. 131. b. Let many years paſs, before he re-imburſed the ſums which were advanced for the funeral of Charles VII. 464. a. A very good thought of his. 737. a. b. Is afraid leſt the Engliſh ſhould repent of their having made peace. 740. a. Threatens the Parliament of Paris. V. 443. a. b. Is not the firſt who made it a capital crime to conceal a conſpiracy. IV. 346.

Lewis XII, King of France, a generous ſentiment of his. I. 421. b. III. 896. b. Kills himſelf by careſſing his Queen too much. 88. a. A witty ſaying of this Prince's. 814. b. For what reaſon he ſaw the forces of England, Swiſſerland, and Spain againſt him. 613. b. 614. a. Is preſent at a lecture of Civil-Law, and embraces the Profeſſor. IV. 67. a. His hiſtory wrote by John d'Auton, and printed by Theodore Godfry. I. 589.

Lewis XIII, King of France, exhorts the Catholic Princes of Germany to forſake the Emperor. II. 134. b. 135. a. b. His conduct towards the Queen, his mother. 400. a. b. 401. a. b. Who it was that undertook to take away the barrenneſs of the Queen, his wife. 401. b. And to reconcile him with her. ibid. III. 816. a. b. His ſervitude under the Marſhal d'Ancre. II. 542. a. b. Declares that he did not mean to comprehend the Proteſtants in the oath made at his coronation, of employing his ſword for the extirpation of Hereſies. III. 209. b. Is very much afraid of the Devil. 212. a. b. Confuſions to which the kingdom was expoſed under his minority. 301. a. A witty ſaying of his. 823. a. b. The hiſtory of him promiſed to us. IV. 257. b. A falſe prediction concerning the day of his death. 260. b. Has a fall, and will not let it be told to his Aſtrologer. ibid. Reſpects his miſtreſs, and is jealous of her at the ſame time. V. 84. b. Capriata beſtows ſo much praiſe on his conduct that he has been copied by a Frenchman. II. 311. a.

Lewis XIV, makes himſelf protector of the Heretics at the capitulation of Landau. III. 721. b.

Lewis of Bavaria, Bzovius razes him out of the catalogue of Emperors. II. 238. He, and Frederic Barbaroſſa: an apology for thoſe Emperors by Hungerus. III. 534. a. b. Marſilius of Padua writes an apology for him. IV. 198. and a. b. Perſecuted by three Popes. ibid. b.

Liar: the ſophiſm called the Liar, is a mere childiſh ſubtilty. IV. 616. b. 617. a. b.

Liars, their ordinary fate. I. 198. a. b.

Libanus, a mount where Venus had a temple. II. 4. b.

Libels (defamatory), it is a favour to believe writers of them even upon their oath. I. 343. a. An advice to thoſe that write libels. ibid. b. 344. a. What was ſaid concerning thoſe of Aretin. 436. a. Auguſtus was the firſt that ordered information to be taken againſt this kind of writings. II. 355. a. b. 356. a. And who involved them under the crimes of high-treaſon. V. 743. & ſeq. For what cauſe. 744, 745. Tiberius continues this innovation of Auguſtus. ibid. Why it is unlawful to publiſh them. II. 389. a. b. They do a great deal of miſchief. III. 290. b. 291. a. Moſt of them are compoſed by perſons very little known, and of bad characters. 291. a. It is of great uſe to diſplay the impudence of thoſe that write them, and the credulity of thoſe that read them. V. 103. a. A thing which the authors of them do not conſider. 459. a. See Slanders. Thoſe of ſome private perſons diſowned. 738, 739. Diſſertation concerning defamatory libels. 743. as far as 765. Should never go unpuniſhed. 746, 747. The anſwer which ſhould be made to thoſe that write an apology for them. 747. All Legiſlators have agreed in puniſhing them ſeverely. 758. The Council of Trent aſcribes the puniſhment of them to the tribunal of the Church. 762. Whether they be the cauſes of ſedition and war. 763, 764. Remarks againſt thoſe that ſpread them about, or approve them. 764, 765. It is ordinary for all factions to produce libels. III. 517. b.

Liberality; ſingular effects of liberality. I. 412. b. 413. a. III. 317. b. 318. a. Should be practiſed towards our enemies. I. 559. a.

Liberty: there are ſome who love not liberty, but the perſon of him who declares for it. II. 167. a. The liberty of indifference is not an eſſential attribute of creatures. IV. 907. a. b. 908. a. b. 909. a. b.

Liberty (human), ſee Free-will.

Liberties of the Gallican Church, the hiſtory of that book. IV. 98. b. 99. a. b. 100. a. b. Receive a terrible blow. II. 125. a. b. All that was done for ſupporting them under Innocent XI, overturned in 1693. ibid.

Libertines, in the affair of religion, are of two kinds. II. 648. a. b. Thoſe who write againſt them ſhould be very careful not to afford them any ſubject for laughter. III. 132. a. A reflexion on the complaints of ſome perſons, againſt thoſe who repreſent the objections of the Libertines with all their force. V. 537. a. b. See Mockers in point of Religion.

Library: by whom the library of the college of Navarre was built. I. 164. a. Reflexion on the fate of ſome libraries. 319. a. b. 320. a. A ſpeaking library; who was called ſo. II. 646. a. A library erected by Auguſtus in one of the temples of Rome. III. 8. a. A library that had as many books as there are ſtars in the firmament. 110. b. A fault which the overſeers of public libraries are guilty of. 950. b. Some very noble libraries. IV. 555. a. b.

Libraria del Doni, how it is divided, and what it contains, according to Teiſſier. II. 689. a. b.

Librarii, the ſignification of that word. V. 798.

Lyceus, miracles which are related concerning that mount. IV. 205. a. b.

Lycæum, Ariſtotle's ſchool, its doctrines will always triumph over all others. I. 469. a. It is taught in Perſia, and in the dominions of the Great Mogul. ibid. b.

Lychettus (Franciſcus) treats Niphus with good manners. IV. 380. b.

Lycians loved to wear long hair. IV. 174. a.

Lycophron, his Caſſandra is very obſcure. IV. 598. a. Different readings of a paſſage in him. I. 538. b.

Liebaut, his work on the diſeaſes of women is not a tranſlation of that work of Marinello's, which has the ſame title. IV. 148. a. b. Accuſed of plagiariſm by Lazarus Pe. ibid.

Liebler (George) tranſlates a homily of Martin Eyſengrein, and writes notes upon it in order to refute it. II. 749. a. b.

Liege, a town, treated cruelly. II. 216. b. 217. a.

Lies: there is no lie, how abſurd ſo ever, but will be handed down from book to book, and from age to age. II. 296. a. There are ſome lies which make people angry, and others which make them laugh. 181. a. b. Whether it be permitted to tell a lie. V. 748. and a. b. How they are perpetuated. ibid. & ſeq.

Life, reaſonings of an uncommon nature upon the ſhortneſs of it. I. 511. a. b. Philoſophical ſentiments about long life. II. 185. b. The principle of Chriſtians, touching the chief end of life is only a principle in Theory. 200. b. A few years of life remaining, are not worth the making a falſe ſtep. 384. Was a ſtate of penance and puniſhment for a ſin committed before men came into the world, according to ſome Philoſophers. 561. a. b. 562. a. b. IV. 441. b. V. 412. a. b. &c. Democritus laughed at human life. II. 642. a. Whether the good things of life ſurpaſs the evil. 832. a. b. IV. 844. a. b. V. 414. b. 423. b. 424. a. 576. a. b. 577. a. The limits of its duration, according to Heſiod. III. 348. b. 349. a. The immoderate deſire which Lewis XI, King of France, had to prolong his life. 803. b. 804. a. 806. b. 807. a. b. 808. a. Life is ſhort and miſerable. ibid. Few wiſe men would chuſe to begin the race of life afreſh. V. 423. b. 424. a. Life does not conſiſt in living, but in enjoying health. III. 342. a. Perſons who delighted ſo much in retirement as to ſay, that during the whole of their life before, they had by no means lived. II. 430. and b.

Life to come, what the Japaneze believe about it. III. 550. and a. b. According to Lucas Brugenſis, the Jews had the doctrine of it from the Pagans. V. 8. a. b.

Light of nature: Divines will always be worſted in a diſpute that is carried on upon no other principles than thoſe of the light of nature. V. 815. The myſteries of the goſpel neither can nor ought to be ſubjected to its dictates. 816. 829. It is eaſy to reconcile the moral precepts of JESUS CHRIST with it. 815. n. (z).

Likely: Agathon's aphoriſm concerning what is likely. I. 126. a. b.

Lilly: a ſtory that is told of a lilly which Charles V had planted. II. 444. b. 445. a.

Limbo of children, is the porch of hell. IV. 501. a. b. Virgil owned it. ibid. b. 502. a.

Limbourg, to whom it belongs. II. 223. a.

Lindanus created a great many ſects. I. 790. a. b.

Lindenbrouch was enraged againſt Wouwer. V. 565. b. 566. a.

Lionne, by what means he mounts to the chiefeſt places in the government. IV. 807. a. b. 808. a.

Lions, whether they are without marrow. I. 75. b. 76. a. The Hiſtory of the Lion of Androcles is known only by the relation of Apion. 375. a. Notwithſtanding what Tertullian ſays, lions are more than once fathers. 448. a. b. Who was the firſt among the Romans that yoked lions in his chariot. III. 959. b. In Africa ſome of them were nailed to a croſs, in order to frighten others. IV. 908. b.

Lipſius (Juſtus), advice which he gives to young men. I. 61. a. And to Baudius. 678. a. b. 680. b. His judgment of Paul Emilius's Hiſtory of France. II. 763. a. b. What is thought to be one of the principal reaſons of his having turned Papiſt. III. 673. b. Is ill-uſed in a book, and anſwers nothing. 838. a. b. Is ſaid to have compoſed books to convince the world that he was not lukewarm and indifferent in religion, as many ſuſpected he was. 842. a. Addreſſes verſes to the planet Venus in behalf of his garden. 922. b. Writes a letter full of malice againſt Holland. IV. 795. a. Approves of Roulliard's Capitulary concerning the validity of a marriage. 804. a. b. 805. a. His miſtakes with regard to Tacitus. V. 281. b. 282. a. b. His declaration touching his reading of Petronius. 485. b. Approves of travelling, and has given very good inſtructions concerning it. III. 345. b.

Lyre, the Embaſſadors of the Getæ preſented themſelves playing upon the lyre. I. 83. a.

Lyſander, his character. I. 128. a. b. Wreſts the ſenſe of an oracle. ibid. b.

Lyſerus conceals himſelf under the fictitious name of Theophilus Alethæus. III. 973.

Lyſimachus, the ſon of a daughter of Ariſtides, got his living by interpreting of dreams. I. 521. a.

Lyſimachus puts two Princes to death for deſtroying their mother. II. 676. b.

Lyſimachus fights with a lion, and receives ſeveral wounds. III. 713. a. b.

Liſle, the ſiege of that town. III. 718. a. b.

Liſola (Baron) affirms, that the States of the empire are obliged to defend the circle of Burgundy. II. 223. and b.

Lyſtrius, his commentary upon the praiſe of Folly is diſliked by a great many, and why. II. 810. a. b.

Litanies, the expreſſions which indiſcreet zealots had inſenſibly introduced into them, condemned by Bellarmin. I. 728. b.

Live: to live a quiet life is all we ſhould aſpire at. II. 200. a. b.

Lives, thoſe who write them ſhould write the lives of great criminals. V. 519. a. b.

Lives of learned men, where we are to ſeek for the particulars of them. II. 8. b.

Livia (Empreſs) carried her complaiſance to Auguſtus too far. I. 332. a.

Livia, daughter of Nero Claudius Druſus, her Hiſtory. II. 718. a. b.

Livilla, her death. I. 358. b. 359. a.

Livius (Titus), ſee Titus Livius.

Lizet (Peter) is Advocate-General in the Parliament of Paris. II. 429.

Lloyd aſcribes to the Scholiaſt of Apollonius, a great many things concerning the iſland of Taphos, which are not to be found in him. V. 307. a.

Locke, his anſwer to thoſe who blamed him for having ſaid, that natural reaſon does not prove the immortality of the ſoul. IV. 592. b. 593. a. Wherein he makes the difference between men and beaſts to conſiſt. 912. b. 913. a. Cited. V. 616. b.

Locrians, how they appeaſe Minerva. II. 340. b. In what manner they expiate the crime of Ajax. ibid. 341. a. b.

Locuſts: the water-locuſts at Minturnæ are as large as thoſe upon the coaſts of Africa. I. 372. b. A pleaſant ſtory concerning this. ibid.

Loeffenius makes collections of the ſeditious things that are to be found in the writings of the Jeſuits. III. 656. b.

Logic is a great help to the other ſciences. I. 163. a. b. IV. 189. a. b. It would be of great uſe to criticize on the falſe Logic of authors. I. 394. b. 395. a. Logic compared to Penelope by Chryſippus. II. 495. a.

Logicians, a good Logician is ſcarcer than is imagined. II. 655. b. The Iriſh and Spaniſh Logicians make diſtinctions that are too obſcure and abſtracted. V. 645. b.

Loiſel reſigns the canonry of Notre Dame at Paris, to Claudius Joly. III. 577.

Lombard (Peter), the firſt who was made Doctor of Divinity, in the univerſity of Paris. III. 594. How much Stancarus eſteemed him. V. 227. b. 228. a.

Londel (Father du), his Faſti criticized. V. 755. a. b. The uſefulneſs of his Chronological Tables. IV. 211. b.

Longiano (Fauſto da), his criticiſm upon Quevara's Marcus Aurelius, is good and learned. III. 270. b. He promiſes the life of that Prince, compoſed from the teſtimony of the antient Hiſtorians. ibid. The ſtudies to which he applies himſelf. ibid.

Longinus, his judgment of ſome Philoſophers. I. 255. a. Had an exquiſite judgment and penetration. IV. 690. a. b. What he ſays of Theopompus. V. 328. b. A paſſage where his good taſte does not appear. 360. a. b.

Longitude, a great many have believed that they had diſcovered it. IV. 262. b. 263. a.

Longolius, his oration concerning the praiſe of the French, compared with the Romans. V. 417. He praiſes Peter Turel in it. ibid.

Looking-glaſs was one of the principal parts of Otho's equipage of war. I. 392. a. Fables concerning looking-glaſſes. IV. 672. a. b. &c. A ſtory concerning one in which Cardinal Mazarin ſaw every thing that paſſed in Portugal. 676. b. The faſhion which women had of wearing them over their bellies. II. 400. a. b.

Looſe ſheets, it is their fate to be thrown aſide among the rubbiſh of libraries. V. 800.

Lopez (Dominicus), a fictitious name which Fauſtus Socinus aſſumed, when he publiſhed his treatiſe de Auctoritate S. Scripturæ. V. 180. b.

Loredana (Leonard), Navagiero makes his Funeral Oration. IV. 315.

Loredano, his work of the life of Adam. II. 857. b. 858. a. b. Cenſured. V. 432. a. b.

Lorenzo (John) writes libels againſt Alexander VI, in Greek, his brother tranſlates them into Latin, and is thrown into the Tyber. IV. 89. b. 90. a. b.

Lorrain approves the revolt of ſubjects, and the attempts of the court of Rome againſt the temporalities of Princes. I. 642. b.

Lorrain (Charles, Cardinal of), what has been ſaid of him. I. 121. b. 704. a. b. What Brantome ſays of him. III. 287. a. 874. b. Glories in being hated by the Huguenots. 290. a. A ridiculous deſcription of this Cardinal's tribulations. V. 29. b. 30. a. His behaviour with reſpect to J. du Tillet. 353. b. 354. a. b.

Lot: a Painter in Pruſſia having read in Luther's tranſlation of the Bible, what Lot did to his daughters, behaved in the ſame manner to his own. IV. 723. a.

Lotharius allows the Stellingi to profeſs Paganiſm, and turns Monk to do penance for it. V. 233. a. b. 234. a. b.

Lots: the book of the Acts of the Apoſtles in rhime ſuppoſes that the drawing of lots was made uſe of in the election of St Matthias. II. 478. a.

Loudun (la Cordonniere de), a libel againſt Cardinal Richelieu. III. 212. a.

Loudun: all the devils-craft of the nuns of Loudun confounded by Quillet. III. 212. b.

Louvain, who founded the college of three languages in that univerſity. II. 236. and b. And who was the firſt that taught the Hebrew tongue there. ibid. b.

Love, its origin according to Plato. I. 102. b. Who was the firſt that introduced the cuſtom of ſinging love-ſongs in company. 205. When love adventures began to be brought upon the ſtage. 313. The purſuits of ambition, ſecure women againſt the follies of love, better than they do men. 523. a. A lively deſcription of love. II. 1. b. 2. a. b. 3. a. Reigns in the moſt icy climates. 80. a. Is the cauſe of the blackeſt treacheries. 333. a. Of all declarations of love, none coſts a Queen ſo dear as a verbal one. 312. a. Heroic love, what is called ſo. 318. a. Love of women, why people ſtumble much more in that regard, than in all the other duties of Chriſtianity. 382. a. And why this holds true with reſpect to Princes, much more than to private perſons. ibid. How exceſſive ſoever the jealouſy of men may be, yet it is not ſo copious in inventions as the love of women. 533. a. The work of love deteſted by Democritus. 638. b. The pleaſure of love has been called a little epilepſy. 644. a. b. III. 81. a. b. 82. a. A man who has always his pen and books in his hand cannot find time to devote himſelf to it. II. 814. a. b. 815. a. The extent of its empire. 822. b. 823. a. b. One of its caprices. 857. a. b. What is its great mover. III. 13. b. 14. a. b. The Heathen Poets philoſophized upon nothing ſo profoundly as upon love. 28. a. b. Its rage and brutality. 56. a. b. 57. a. An inſtance of its triumph and power. 165. b. 166. a. Commonly leaves honour in poſſeſſion of all its rights. 383. a. People were cured of this paſſion by leaping from the rock of Leucas. 787. b. 788. a. b. Names of thoſe that took the leap. ibid. The difference between a poetical love and a real one. IV. 82. a. b. V. 420. b. 421. a. b. There is no need of any other witchcraft to make people guilty of a thouſand diſorders. IV. 454. b. Creeps in every where. 635. b. Whether all would go to ruin in its empire if women were to attack, and men to ſtand upon the defenſive. V. 31. b. 32. a. b. Love is a divine fury, which produces the moſt violent Enthuſiaſm. 45. b. The evils which this paſſion draws after it. 110. a. Guido Cavalcante's ſong on terreſtrial love, has been commented on by ſeveral learned men. II. 398. b. 399. a. b. An explication of the doctrine of Cavalcante, touching the nature of love, by Marſilius Ficinus. 399. b. A very ſingular character of that of A. Niphus. IV. 378. b. 379. a. A book of Parthenius, concerning this paſſion. 482. The diſtemper of love ſometimes ends in madneſs, or a conſumption. ibid. a. What a Spaniſh author ſaid of virtuous love. V. 225. b.

Love (ſelf-) a refinement upon ſelf-love. I. 134. a. Reflexion upon ſelf-love. 460. a. b. Makes people deſpiſe riches ſometimes. ibid.

Love of our neighbour. A Portugueze Monk preaches that we are bound to love all men, of whatſoever religion, ſect, or nation, they be, even the Caſtilians. V. 319.

Lovers ought to make uſe of the key of the heart to come at the enjoyment of their miſtreſſes. I. 454. a. b. Their impertinent gallantries. III. 867. b. The Hiſtory of two married perſons, who were always called the two lovers. 386. a. b. A lover who by his amorous embraces cured his miſtreſs that was infected with the Plague. 3. a. b.

Low-Countries loſt by the jealouſies, and other hidden paſſions of Philip II. I. 588. a. A project of peace which is propoſed to them. III. 120. a. b. 121. a. Have furniſhed a theatre of war for two ages. 806. a.

Lubbertus brings fifty heads of accuſation againſt one of his Colleagues before the Synod of Dort. IV. 75. a. b. A great enemy to innovations. 474. a.

Lubec, the ſchool there decays, and why. III. 663. b.

Lubin (Father) his complaints againſt the gentlemen of the French academy. V. 234. b. And againſt the Dutch. ibid. 235. a.

Lucan affirms in a profane manner, that the Gods are only angry with the unfortunate. II. 418. b. For what reaſon he imagined that in Greece and Italy, the Deity was better known than at Marſeilles. 678. a. b. His miſtake in this reſpect. ibid. Why he joined with the conſpirators againſt Nero. IV. 597. a.

Lucar (Cyril of) a great many of his letters were depoſited in Rivetus's hands. V. 560. b.

Lucian, the anſwer which he puts into the mouth of a Courtezan. I. 54. b. 55. a. What he affirms to have ſeen at Byblos. 116. a. What he ſays of the thunder that was darted at Anaxagoras. 307. b. 308. a. Cenſured for a blunder, in relation to the picture of Calumny, which is attributed to Apelles. 367. b. 368. a. b. Let a man turn himſelf all ways imaginable, he will never avoid the ſatirical ſtrokes of ſuch a man as Lucian. II. 117. b. Does not ſhew much judgment on the ſubject of Sthenobæa and Phædra. 535. a. Tells a pretty ſtory concerning Democritus. 638. a. The character which he gives of that Philoſopher. 639. b. 640. a. Tho' he ridicules falſe gods, he deſerves notwithſtanding to be deteſted. IV. 584. b. A dialogue which has been accounted one of his pieces. V. 446. b.

Lucilius, a Satiric Poet did not get ſatisfaction of the Comedian who had offended him, by naming him on the ſtage. I. 61. b. Did not deſire that his readers ſhould be altogether ignorant, or very learned men. IV. 593. a.

Lucretius, one of the arguments which he uſes againſt the doctrine of the Homœomeries. I. 297. a. b. Was not aware of an objection, which would have deſtroyed the very foundation of that hypotheſis. ibid. b. Refutes an anſwer of Anaxagoras tolerably well. 303. b. His ſentence, that men pull off the maſk, at the point of death, is not always true. III. 288. b. n. (26). What he ſays about ſeeing a ſhipwreck. IV. 34. b. n. (93).

Lucullus courts a lady of pleaſure, in order to obtain an employment. II. 426. a. b.

Lucumon, from what preſage his wife aſſured him of good fortune. V. 287. a. b.

Lude (Count de) what kind of ſhots he ſhot upon the government. III. 265. a.

Ludolphus (Job) acquired a wonderful knowledge of Æthiopia. III. 527. a.

Lufnen (Herman) a Phyſician of Rotterdam, his letter upon the ſympathetic virtue. I. 9. b. n. (76).

Lugoly, the Provoſt de l'Hoſtel's lieutenant, diſguiſed as a prieſt, and ſent to confeſs John Chaſtel, plays his part ill. II. 459. b. 460. a. b.

Luſignan (Brother Stephen of) rallied upon his extraordinary learning. I. 53. a.

Luſſon (Biſhop of), ſee Cardinal de Richelieu. He writes a letter to Marſhal d'Ancre in very ſubmiſſive terms. III. 209. a. b.

Luſt: whether courage and luſt flow from the ſame principle in the conſtitution. III. 414. a. b. 415. a. b.

Luther. His reputation was every body's concern in Saxony. I. 140. a. b. Looked upon as a Hero by ſome great Geniuſes of the Romiſh communion. 149. b. Accuſes Aleander of being a Jew. 215. a. b. Called thoſe Divines Anaxagoriſts, who find every thing in every text of Scripture. 304. a. Diſapproves of the rebellion of the Anabaptiſts. 284. a. b. 285. a. What he reproaches the Divines of Cologn, and thoſe of Louvain, with. 470. b. Reflexions upon what ſome people affect to ſay, that Luther marrried a very handſome Nun. II. 72. a. b. 73. a. Facts relating to his marriage. 73. and a. b. 74. and a. b. 75. and a. b. 76. and a. b. 77. and a. b. A reſolution is taken of anſwering him in a vigorous manner, to make him more moderate for the future. 195. and a. b. 196. a. His tranſlation of the Bible. 705. a. In what diſpoſition he was, when he ſaw himſelf put to the ban of the empire. III. 272. b. The efficacy of his preaching foretold about thirty years before it happened. 456. a. b. Accuſed by Cochlæus of having publiſhed prefaces that were injurious to the Scripture. 942. a. Whether it became him to divert himſelf with jeſts and banters. 954. a. He diſperſes the ſchools of Magic in Spain and Germany. V. 385. b. His conferences with Vergerius. 452. a. b. Favoured by the enormity of abuſes. II. 126. a. A book intituled, Luther with ſeven heads, in which Cochleus relates all his impurities. III. 136. a. b. Compoſes a preface to Fr. Lambert's book de Minoritarum regula. 709. b. Silveſter Prierias ſucceeds very ill in writing againſt him. IV. 772. a. Controverſial writings between that Monk and him. ibid. and b. Reflexion upon what Mr Claudé has ſaid concerning his conference with the Devil. V. 73. a. b.

Lutheraniſm: what made Caſtellan ſuſpected of Lutheraniſm. II. 372. b. Who was called its ſword and ſhield. III. 218. b. Its preſervation amidſt the ſchiſms which diſtracted it. IV. 271. a. b. When, and how introduced, and eſtabliſhed in Dortmund. II. 121. a. b. Introduced into Carinthia, Carniola, and the territories of the Grand Seignior by the Sclavonian tranſlations of Truberus. V. 405.

Lutherans, a great number of them refuſes to communicate with the Church of Ireland. I. 718. a. b. The hiſtory of their eleventh ſchiſm. III. 442. a. b. Meet at Leipſic with the Calviniſts, by order of the great Guſtavus, to endeavour at an accommodation. 476. a. What gave riſe to the thirteenth ſchiſm which happened among them. 478. a. b. What was the cauſe of their fourteenth ſchiſm. 535. b. The opinion which the rigid Lutherans have of Calviniſm. 841. a. Treat the Calviniſts, that were baniſhed out of England, very ill. V. 550. b. Join with the Catholics to reſiſt the Calviniſts. II. 121. Their doctrine concerning the Euchariſt, ſeemed to Bucer to attribute too much to the Real Preſence. 177. a. The diſturbance which their book of concord produces, and how it is treated by the King of Denmark, and by Queen Elizabeth. III. 390. a. 391. a. b.

Luxury, by what Gradations it crept in among the Romans. II. 710. a. When it is at the heighth, they treat what is ſaid of the antient frugality as fabulous. ibid. Pope Innocent XI attempts to reform it. III. 569. a. b. An author wiſhes that all thoſe women who addict themſelves to luxury were called whores. II. 400. b. People are readier to give it over at the commandment of the King, than that of God. ibid.

Luz, the incorruptibility of that bone, according to the Jews, and its virtue towards the reſurrection of the body. I. 649. b. 650. a. b.

Luzara, the winning of that battle very much controverted by the writers of both ſides. III. 719. b. n. (24).

M.

M That letter's being ill printed, occaſions a great error. II. 42. a. b.

Mabillon (Father) his indignation at ſeeing a famous man buried without an epitaph. II. 277. b. 278. a. b. A curious fact which he has related to us, and which had been cut off from a manuſcript. 633. a. b. Cenſured for praiſing Epiſcopius. 795. a. b. There is an untruth concerning the Turks in the Hiſtory of the Holy War publiſhed by him. IV. 41. a.

Macarius, four of his Homilies tranſlated by Daniel d'Ange. I. 562. a.

Macerata, at what time its academy was founded. V. 167. b.

Machiavel cited. III. 798. b. What he ſays of Peter and Jerome Riario. V. 163. a. b. A thought of his concerning that which makes Legiſlators ſucceed or miſcarry. 73. b.

Macrinus ſends Caracalla's aſhes to Julia, and writes a very obliging letter to her. III. 606. b. But at laſt orders her to depart from Antioch. ibid.

Macrobius conſigns over all ſuch romances as the Golden Aſs, to nurſes. I. 395. a. Confounds the places of the Knights with thoſe of the Senators. III. 695. b. 696. a. b. What judgment ought to be made of the ſtories which he relates. IV. 769. b.

Madneſs. The greateſt wits have all a mixture of madneſs. II. 321. a. As likewiſe madneſs has ſometimes a mixture of great wit. ibid. It is wiſdom to feign it on ſome occaſions. V. 373. b.

Madmen, perſons who have feigned themſelves to be ſo. I. 422. b. They have a privilege to ſin with impunity. II. 254. a.

Mæcenas, what argument he made uſe of to perſuade Auguſtus to keep the empire in his own hands. IV. 564. a.

Mænius puniſhes his freedman ſeverely, for having kiſſed his daughter. 797. a.

Maeſtricht ſubdued in the year. 1673. IV. 211. b.

Maffeus (the Jeſuit) repeated his Breviary in Greek, for what reaſon. IV. 409. a. b.

Magalotti, Cardinal Mazarin's nephew, beſieges la Motte. IV. 278.

Magdeburg, whether the ſacking of Magdeburg was foretold by a Poet. III. 877. b. 878. a. b. 879. a. A book publiſhed under the name of the inhabitants of this town. V. 736.

Magdalenes (the convent of) deſigned for receiving debauched women, who ſhould be reclaimed. IV. 888. a. b.

Magi of Perſia, the impoſtures which they uſed, to engage their King to deſtroy Chriſtianity. I. 13. a. b.

Magia Diabolica, Elich maintains a public diſpute, and writes a book upon that ſubject. II. 750.

Magic. Perſons that have been accuſed of it. I. 145. a. 182. a. b. 384. b. 385. a. b. 392. b. 393. a. b. 598. and a. b. II. 51. b. III. 211. 231. b. 232. a. b. 233. a. IV. 369. a. b. 370. a. 533. b. 534. a. V. 100. Whether books of Magic be neceſſary. I. 182. b. Who are thoſe that have touched upon natural and lawful Magic. 192. Their was a time when Magic required that beautiful youths ſhould be ſacrificed. 347. b. 348. a. Who was the inventer of it, and how it was tranſmitted from the old world to the new. II. 431. a. b. 432. a. n. (15). Illuſtrious names are prefixed to books, eſpecially to ſuch as treat of Magic. 640. b. A good many Chriſtians laugh at it, and yet continue to own the Divinity of the Scriptures. V. 12. b. Called Ars Atracia, and why. I. 538. a. See Witchcraft.

Magicians: whether a man's poverty may be uſed as an argument to prove that he is a Magician. I. 152. a. b. Their accuſers fall into contradictions ſometimes. 385. b. 386. a. Are very guilty of romancing. II. 639. a. b. Attack one another's reputations. 641. a. b. Whether they can be accuſed without any danger, and when this may be done. III. 211. b. 212. a. Whether the ſtories which are told of them be true or chimerical. V. 100. What difference there is between them and ſorcerers. 385. b.

Magiſtrates: the Magiſtrate has a right to puniſh fornication. I. 222. a. b. 223. a. Illuſtrious Magiſtrates, and good Catholics called Heretics, in the Bibliotheque of the ſociety of the Jeſuits. 220. a. Make ſeveral edicts againſt the Anabaptiſts. 285. a. b. 286. a. Whether they ought to puniſh Heretics. 789. a. b. Their readineſs in letting themſelves be led away by cabals. II. 141. a. b. There is no better way to gain the applauſe of the mob than to declaim againſt them. 357. a. Mankind could not poſſibly ſubſiſt without them. III. 671. a. Ought to be extremely cautious in inflicting a note of infamy. IV. 500. b. and why. ibid. Thoſe who maintain that men ought to be puniſhed by the Magiſtrate for their opinions, fall into a thouſand contradictions. 782. a. When authors have recourſe to them, to get their adverſaries writings ſuppreſſed, it is a plain ſign that they are convinced of having the worſt in the diſpute. V. 343. a.

Magni (Valerian) his Judicium de Acatholicorum & Catholicorum regula credendi. V. 741. a. b.

Mahomet of glorious memory, whether a Chriſtian can ſpeak of that impoſtor in ſuch honourable terms. II. 760. A treaty of peace between him and the Chriſtians. IV. 38. b. Was not of a baſe extraction. 176. b. Subdues Mecca. 177. b. 178. a. Could neither read nor write. 177. b. Commands his followers to go in pilgrimage to Mecca. 178. a. b. Propheſies upon his death-bed, and not at all like a falſe prophet. 349. b. Lewis de Leon applies the predictions of the apoſtles concerning Antichriſt to him. III. 772. b. Some hold him to be Antichriſt, and appropriate to him the number 666, in the Revelations. 733. A book intituled, the ſect of Mahomet demoliſhed. I. 326.

Mahomet II. His letter to Pope Pius II. I. 54. b. Reproached with illegitimacy. 338.

Mahometans, their religion ſuffers a great calamity. I. 49. a. Cannot think it poſſible that a man of genius ſhould die a Chriſtian. 51. a. b. Some of their ſectaries call themſelves men of truth. 52. a. Whether it be true that their women have no hopes of entering into Paradiſe. IV. 34. b. 35. a. b. Are greatly alarmed by a certain prediction. 43. a. b. 44. a. b. 45. a. Leave legacies to an unknown Prophet, who is to come and deliver the world from the tyranny of Antichriſt. 123. a.

Mahometiſm honours the aſſumption of virgins as well as the Romiſh Church does. III. 17. b. Muſt be deſtroyed very ſoon, according to the prophecies of a great many perſons. IV. 43. a. b. 44. a. b. 45. a. Through what motives theſe prophecies were publiſhed. 44. b. 45. a. There is ſome reaſon to wonder that it ſhould be ſo little advantageous to the female ſex. 48. b. The influence which that ſex had upon its foundation. ibid.

Maid: the advantages of a maid above a widow. I. 393. a. b Old maids are pleaſed with telling that they have been courted for marriage. II. 109. b. The Greeks and Romans called a married woman, or one that had children, by that name. 140. b. Whether maids ſhould be allowed to marry very young. III. 965. b. The Romans would not ſuffer them to be preſent at feaſts. 966. a. &c. Signs by which one may know whether a woman that paſſes for a maid has had any children. IV. 52. a. b. 53. a. b. &c. See Ladies. A maid, when ſhe is deflowered, is like palled wine that has loſt its value. III. 112. a. What Agur ſays about a maid. II. 369. b.

Maid of honour to a Queen, is a function very difficult to execute. III. 832.

Maid of Orleans, her hiſtory. III. 336. a. b. 337. a.

Mayenne (Duke of) makes himſelf the ſtrongeſt in the council of the League. III. 297. a. b.

Mayer (John Frederic), Profeſſor of Divinity, his Diſſertation upon Catherine Bore. II. 76. a. b. 77. a. Cited. I. 730. a. n. (37). 732. a.

Maimbourg, a great falſity of his. I. 709. b. Cenſured on what he ſays concerning Beza. 795. a. n. (80). Anachroniſms of this author. II. 17. a. His violence againſt the Calviniſts in relation to Cayet. 244. b. Is guilty of a great fault, in point of Chronology, concerning Gregory the Great. III. 219. a. Animadverts upon a fault of Peter du Moulin concerning the ſame Pope. ibid. and b. His character. 224. b. Confutes a falſity of Davila's, in relation to the Duke of Guiſe, that was murthered at the caſtle of Blois. 292. b. 293. a. An exceptionable witneſs in whatever concerns the Proteſtants. 397. a. Cenſured injudiciouſly by the author of the News from the Republic of Letters, in relation to the hatred which the ladies bore Henry III. 405. b. 406. a. Stuffs in an epiſode upon the affair of the Regale, in his hiſtory of Lutheraniſm. 454. b. 455. a. Cenſured in relation to John Sigiſmund. 533. b. Is miſtaken in a notable fact concerning Luther's burial. 947. a. Falls into the ſame contradiction with Paul Jovius, whom he tranſcribes, concerning the Atheiſm of Mahomet II. IV. 52. b. Cenſured in relation to the miſchiefs which the Greeks ſuffered under Mahomet II. 55. a. b. Has not acquitted himſelf like a faithful Hiſtorian, with regard to Joan I, Queen of Naples. 304. a. b. Is by no means exact in what he ſays of Ochinus. 388. b. Criticized in relation to thoſe among the Calviniſts that were accuſed of having betrayed their cauſe. 924. b. And in relation to Lelius Socinus. V. 167. b. A paſſage of his Hiſtory of Calviniſm examined. 474. a. b. 475. a. b. Cenſured and defended, touching the manuſcripts and the editions of Martinus Polonus. IV. 709. a. b.

Maimonides (Moſes) ſhews himſelf too nice in rejecting the proofs of the unity of God alledged by the ſect of the ſpeakers. V. 828.

Maine (la Croix du), Daurat's opinion of his works. II. 617. b.

Mainferme (Father de la), a She-Pope would find her apology in that which he has made for the founder of Fontevraud. III. 63. a.

Major (John) writes verſes againſt the Divines of Wittemberg, for which he is expelled the univerſity. III. 972. b.

Majorca (James, Infant of), his wife cauſes his head to be ſtruck of for adultery. IV. 302. a. b.

Maire de Belges (John le) quoted. III. 609. a. b. 645. a. IV. 156. a. b. Teaches Marot the eliſion of the e feminine. ibid. b. 163. b.

Maitland (John), Chancellor of Scotland, hinders the Biſhop of Dublin from ſucceeding in his negotiation for the marriage of James VI, with the Infanta of Spain. II. 577. William Criton endeavours to engage Robert Bruce to kill him, but cannot bring it about. ibid.

Malateſta (Paula), a lady of learning. III. 185. a.

Maldonat cenſured for the wrong he does the Calviniſts in ſaying that their principles lead to Atheiſm. V. 440. a. b. 441. a. b. 445. a. Sent to Metz to make proſelytes. IV. 921.

Malefactors, there is not an Atheiſt to be found among ſo many who paſs through the hangman's hands. V. 813.

Malherbe, a miſtake of his imitated by Sarrazin, and corrected in the latter by Menage. I. 80. b. 81. a. Expreſſes himſelf like one who is well ſatisfied that Achilles had but one preceptor. 78. b. Introduces the god of the Seine curſing Marſhal d'Ancre. II. 543. a. Never praiſed, nor hardly eſteemed any body. III. 855. a. A blunt expreſſion of his concerning a book of Meziriac's. IV. 208. a. b. Would have been offended at ſome verſes where Boileau mentions him. 596. b. On what account he was moſt inconſolable. 82. b. V. 384. a. His epitaph. 402. b.

Mallebranche, his doctrine that our ideas are diſtinct from our underſtanding, and that we ſee all things in God, is an antient one. I. 255. It is Democritus's doctrine unfolded and mended. II. 642. b. He eſtabliſhes a principle of which Chryſippus had given the firſt draught. 496. b. 497. a. Refutes thoſe who deny the creation. 789. b. What he ſays of the exiſtence of bodies. V. 614. a. b.

Malo, a Miniſter, refuſes to adminiſter the ſacrament to the lady of Montpenſier. III. 864. b. And why. ibid.

Mamaca, an imaginary caſtle into which it is ſaid the Kings of the Merovingian race retired through ſlothfulneſs. II. 744. a.

Mamilians, there were two ſaints of that name, according to Maraſcia. IV. 98.

Man: the Pagans owned that man was compoſed of two parts, each of which re-unites itſelf to its principle. I. 275. a. b. The opinion of ſome Philoſophers concerning the formation of the firſt men. 416. a. b. II. 411. a. b. 412. a. b. III. 649. a. b. 650. a. b. 651. a. It is the nature of man to run into extremes. I. 527. a. In what manner he may be defined. II. 126. a. Men ſold very cheap. 303. b. How diverſified by the laws of the union of ſoul and body. 451. b. 452. a. b. They give their neighbours falſe reaſons for their conduct, reſerving the true ones to themſelves. 726. b. Man is an undiſciplinable animal. 832. b. To how high a degree men are wicked. III. 469. a. Their paſſions render the fineſt ſyſtems of politics uſeleſs. ibid. By what method a man may become a god. IV. 572. b. Man is like a little republic, that changes its Magiſtrates often. 657. b. His ſtate and condition is one of the moſt incomprehenſible myſteries. 187. a. 468. a. b. His deplorable condition. V. 230. a. 287. a. Suffers a perpetual conflict within himſelf. IV. 440. a. b. 441. a. Whether he be leſs perfect than the plants, as to the manner of producing his like. V. 4. a. b. Nothing is more mortifying than to conſider that one is a man. 145. a. b. 146. a. His prerogatives deſcribed by Socrates. 583. b. 584. a. Great men do not like to ſpeak of their mean extraction. I. 256. a. b. Their memory fails them very often. 369. b. The ſtars of ſome men have power to immortalize a ſtory, however improbable it be. II. 7. a. Men deſerve ſatire more than women. V. 426. b. 427. a. The two handles by which man is moved, are the fear of puniſhment, and the deſire of reward. 812.

Mancionus (Jerom), Cæſar Borgia orders his tongue to be cut out for his ſatirical ſtrokes. IV. 90. b.

Mandeville, the account of his travels is fabulous. I. 46. b. 471. b.

Manducation (oral), J. Poinet does not allow of it, though he allows of the word Tranſubſtantiation. IV. 693. a. b.

Manducus, what uſe the Romans made of that word. I. 63. b.

Manes fleed alive, and why. IV. 90. b. 91. a.

Mania, a goddeſs to whom children were ſacrificed. II. 163. b. Her effigy hung up at the doors of the houſe to avert dangers. ibid. Preſided at births. ibid.

Manichees revive one of the principal tenets of Zoroaſter. I. 444. Become powerful under the name of Paulicians. IV. 512. Are grievouſly perſecuted. ibid. Their Hereſy ſpreads itſelf into all the parts of Europe. ibid. They cannot eaſily be refuted, except by reaſons à poſteriori. 512, 513. and a. An explanation, as to what the author had ſaid concerning them. V. 815. to 829. Their objections are unanſwerable, ſo long as they are diſcuſſed only at the bar of reaſon. 815. Why the author has not refuted them. 825. People cannot but abhor their hypotheſis: it goes upon a ſuppoſition which is repugnant to our moſt diſtinct ideas. ibid. 829. Their doctrine is deſtructive of all religions. 827. Reaſonings againſt their tenets. ibid. and 828, 829. Objections of Simplicius. 826, 827.

Manicheiſm aroſe from the contrariety of paſſions which toſs and pull men ſometimes one way, ſometimes another. III. 261. a. People have been ſurprized to find it ſaid, that they could raiſe puzzling objections. IV. 187. a.

Manilius degraded. IV. 755. a. 757. a.

Mankind, proofs of their bad taſte. III. 433. a. b. 434. a.

Manlius expelled from the Senate by Cato, and for what reaſon. I. 40. b.

Manlius, how he believed that the gods aſſiſt us. V. 373. a.

Manners, whether they change with our fortunes. IV. 571. a. b.

Manſfield (Count), how delivered from the trouble of a moſt unlucky marriage. III. 696. a. b.

Manſur, whether he is the ſame with Meſue. II. 587. b.

Mante: the conference of Mante between Perron and Berault. I. 756.

Mantineans, what ſort of laws they had, and who it was that framed them. II. 654. b. 655. a.

Mantua, by whom founded. IV. 98. b.

Mantreville put for Eſmandreville. II. 828. b.

Mantuanus, his poem intituled Alphonſus, what it is. V. 157. b.

Manutius (Aldus), an inſcription which he cauſed to be put upon the door of his ſtudy. V. 521. b. Cenſured touching the cauſe of Ovid's diſgrace. IV. 443. b. 444. a. And touching the time of his death. 447. a.

Manutius (Paulus), refutation of his opinion concerning the meaning of this phraſe, Quærere conditiones. III. 116. b. 117. a. b. Is under a miſtake when he ſays that Atius and his daughter were not of Aricia. IV. 397. a. Troubles which his daughter brought upon him. V. 241. a.

Manuſcripts are the ſport of fortune. I. 525. a. IV. 833. b. People alter the reading of manuſcripts, according to the model of their own underſtandings. I. 543. b. Some antient ones do not contain all that is to be found in others, and yet no blanks have been left in them. II. 572. b. Catalogue of thoſe of the Emperor's library at Vienna. III. 707. b. Application of Peraxylus in the ſearch of them. IV. 544. Conſideration on the cauſes of their difference. 710. a. b. &c. Are corrupted by additions and ſubſtractions. 710. a. Want of ſincerity does not always occaſion their difference; ſeveral innocent cauſes may contribute towards it. 711. b. A rule whereby to judge whether they are altered from motives of intereſt. ibid.

Manuſcripts of the Scripture altered and corrupted by the Heretics. III. 733.

Mar, the ſignification of that word. I. 51. b.

Marais (Mr), extracts communicated by him to the author, concerning the affront which the Queen of Navarre received. IV. 341. a. b.

Marble, a diſpute betwixt Arnauld and Jurieu, whether it may be worſhipped. III. 100. b. 101. a. b.

Marca, the judgment which has been paſſed on him with regard to one of his books. IV. 100. b.

Marcellus (Claudius-Marcus) his untimely death, Virgil's reflexion thereupon. III. 921. b. His elogy, and the conſequence inferred from it. ibid.

Marcellus, by his venerable preſence hinders the common people from killing the Heretic Manes. IV. 111. a.

Marcilius Ficinus ſends an account of himſelf from the other world. II. 65. b. 66. a.

Marcion, neither he nor his followers did well underſtand the ſtrength and weakneſs of the orthodox. IV. 113. a.

Marcus Aurelius (Emperor), the ſpurious life of that Prince by Guevara. II. 770. a. III. 270. a. b. Fauſto da Longiano writes a criticiſm upon it. ibid. b. And promiſes a life of M. Aurelius, compoſed from the teſtimony of the antient Hiſtorians. ibid.

Mare Hiſtoriarum, or the ſea of hiſtories, a work under that title compoſed by John Columna. II. 529. a. b. Called by miſtake Mater Hiſtoriarum, and the mother of hiſtories. ibid. a. Divers things have been inſerted into it, and the œconomy of it has been changed. ibid. b.

Mareſcot, for what things he was indebted to the profeſſion of Phyſic. IV. 504. b. 505. a.

Mares, their exceſſive luſt. V. 768. Some ladies paſs a whole night in watching a mare. 773. Mares that took wind, and which people believed to be with foal. 771. a. b. 772. a. b.

Mareſius (Samuel), his method of teaching, and his authority. I. 242. Prolegomena of his diſpute againſt Daillé. II. 583. a. b. 584. a. b. His Hydra Socinianiſmi expugnata. V. 505. b. &c. Blames the Engliſh for their indulgence to the Socinians. 506. b.

Mareſts (John des) a viſionary, his tricks to draw another viſionary into a ſnare. IV. 268. a. b. 269. a.

Margaret of Anjou, Queen of England, falls into the hands of a company of highway-men. II. 131. a.

Margaret de Valois, Queen of Navarre, ſiſter to Francis I, intercedes for a Franciſcan who had preached againſt her. III. 623. a. Transformed into a Fury in a comedy. IV. 318. b. Her Heptameron. 321. b. 322. a. b. Her Heroiſm. 323. a. b.

Margaret, ſiſter to Henry II, and wife to the Duke of Savoy, was a learned woman, and loved learned men. III. 200. b. Suſpected to have imbibed the new opinions. 397. b. 398. a. Suſpected likewiſe to have feigned herſelf with child. 398. a. She bubbles the court of France very advantageouſly for her huſband the Duke of Savoy. ibid. and b. Every body murmurs at it. ibid. b.

Margaret de Valois, Queen of Navarre, ſiſter to Charles IX, was very averſe to the marrying Henry IV, by reaſon of the difference of religion. IV. 333. b. Her temper. 334. a. b. Common fame makes her loved criminally by two of her brothers. 335. a. b. Almoſt did the office of a midwife to her huſband's miſtreſſes. 336. a. The counterartifice which ſhe employed againſt Catherine de Medicis. III. 419. b. Her gallanting humour. IV. 339. b. 340. a. b.

Margaret, daughter to the Emperor Maximilian, who was her actual huſband. III. 323. a.

Mariamne, a tragedy which coſt a Player his life. V. 400. a.

Marianus Scotus, what he ſays of the She-Pope. IV. 725, 726, 727, 728. Many think that he is the firſt who ſpoke of the She-Pope; others maintain he ſaid nothing about her. 727. b. 728. a. From what manuſcript the edition of Marianus was printed. ibid.

Mary Stuart, Queen of Scotland, how we ought to judge of the ſatires that were wrote againſt her. II. 181. a. That which encourages hiſtorical Pyrrhoniſm in relation to her adventures. 282. a. b. Buchanan publiſhes a book concerning her leudneſs. V. 857.

Mary of Burgundy had a deſire to be married to the Dauphin of France. III. 805. a. Dies of a fall from her horſe at hunting. II. 222. b.

Mary de Medicis, Queen of France, ſcruples raiſed in the mind of Lewis XIII, with relation to the hardſhips exerciſed towards that Princeſs. II. 400. a. b. Thoſe who formed factions with her were altogether inexcuſable. IV. 143. b. Anſwer which ſhe cauſes to be publiſhed. 256. a.

Mary Magdalene, whether ſhe be the ſame with Mary the ſiſter of Lazarus, and the woman who was a ſinner. III. 47. b. 48. a.

Mariendal, Marſhal Turenne is defeated there. IV. 917. b.

Marigni gives teſtimonies very favourable to the Prince of Condé's virtue. II. 137. b. The inſenſibility which he attributes to a governour of the Low-Countries, with reſpect to the ladies. V. 421. b.

Marillac, Keeper of the Seals, ſeconds Cardinal Berulle in oppoſing Cardinal Richelieu's deſign of humbling the Houſe of Auſtria. I. 786. a.

Marillac (Marſhal de) whether he was put to death for any other cauſe, than his having diſpleaſed Cardinal Richelieu. III. 818. a. b. IV. 141. a. b. 142. a. b. 143. a. b. &c.

Marini (Chevalier) his thought concerning the ſpots in the moon. I. 113. b.

Marius (Hieronymus Vicentius) the fictitious name that Maſſarius gives himſelf, and which Placcius has not mentioned. IV. 173. a.

Marlorat makes Indexes for Calvin's Inſtitution. V. 88. a.

Marolles (the Abbé de) tranſlates Ovid's Poem againſt Ibis into French, and accompanies it with notes. IV. 452. b. Dedicates this tranſlation to James Pinon, and a long paſſage in praiſe of that man. 651. a. b.

Marot declares that he had learned in Italy never to ſpeak of God. IV. 154. a. b. Whether the Proteſtants ought to be reproached with the public uſe of his verſion, ſuppoſing he had been puniſhed for his adulteries. 154. b. 155. a. What Cayet ſays of him is not probable. 154. b. His falſe propheſy. II. 29. b. 30. a.

Marpurg: when the univerſity of Marpurg was founded. III. 709. b. n. (10). And when opened. 148. b.

Marry: whether a wiſe man ought to marry. I. 633. b. Formerly people were prohibited to marry after a certain age. 120. a. Thoſe who marry a ſecond time excluded from the miniſtry by the canons. II. 174. b.

Marriage joined with continency. I. 34. a. What is its principal character. ibid. and b. Formerly the Legiſlators prohibited it to women of fifty, and men of ſixty years of age. 120. a. Its efficacy. 223. a. b. 446. a. b. What it is a remedy for. 390. b. 391. a. Gives an opportunity of making experiments. 549. b. 550. a. Sentiments of Socrates, Diogenes, and Euripides, concerning marriage. 549. a. b. Reflexion upon the beauty and riches, or the uglineſs and poverty of the woman that one deſigns to marry. 549. b. 550. a. b. A falſe dilemma againſt marriage. II. 13. b. 14. a. Whether it is forbidden to make choice of a handſome wife. 72. a. b. 73. a. Whether it was a recommendation among the party, at the beginning of the Reformation. 174. b. 175. a. III. 13. a. b. 14. a. b. Is a neceſſary troubleſome ſtate. II. 384. a. Speech of Metellus to recommend marriage. ibid. The Athenian laws allowed a man to marry his ſiſter by the father, and forbid him his ſiſter by the mother, the Lacedæmonian laws permitted the latter, and prohibited the former. 503. a. b. 504. a. b. Several extravagant fancies concerning the marriage of Adam and Eve. 853. a. b. Deluſion of Heretics that profeſſed to abſtain from it. III. 63. b. The Theory of it is well known before a woman be marriageable. 187. a. Whether it is convenient and proper for Philoſophers. 382. b. The Divinity that preſided over it, according to the Poets. 641. a. b. A cuſtom relating to it which was obſerved among ſome nations. 773. a. b. Strange ſuperſtition of the Roman ladies, in ſeeking after omens for marriage. IV. 200. b. 201. a. Is ſometimes ſo irkſome, that a man to free himſelf from it would go to the end of the world. 313. b. Clandeſtine marriages ſhould be declared void. 636. a. b. 637. a. The Canon-Law countenances the abuſes of marriage. 748. a. b. Thoſe who marry a poor wife to be quiet at home, do not obtain their ends. 753. a. Reflexion on its conſequences. 844. a. b. Reflexion on St Paul's words, wherein he ſeems to command the Biſhops to marry. 856. b. 857. a. Could not be contracted between brother's and ſiſters by adoption. V. 49. b. Scandalous cuſtoms which were obſerved in relation to it. 129. b. 130. a. b. 131. a. b. What are the inconveniencies of marriage. 425. a. b. 426. a. b. Whether it be a good remedy againſt incontinence. 426. a. It is dangerous to men of learning. 604. a. Edict of Henry II, concerning clandeſtine marriages. IV. 636. a. b. Is the moſt difficult of all things to determine with judgment. I. 603. a. The impatience of youth hurries us into it without reflexion. ibid. It is neceſſary to begin with earneſt prayer, when we deliberate upon a point ſo nice and hazardous. ibid. b. William Bigot promiſes a treatiſe to prove the neceſſity of marriage. ibid. a. A diſcourſe on the marriage of men of learning, by Claudius Baduel. ibid. a. b. This diſcourſe full of good inſtructions. ibid. b. And tranſlated into French by Guy de la Gard. 604. a. b. A common argument, that marriage diverts too much from ſtudy. III. 344. a. It does not deaden the ſpirits nor ſlacken the hands. ibid. There ought to be marriage-makers in a well ordered commonwealth. 529. b. Leontium wrote a book againſt Theophraſtus, becauſe he had publiſhed ſeveral good things relating to marriage. 779. Fine pieces on the ſubject of marriage, muſt diſpleaſe a Courtezan. ibid. b. The anſwer which ſome ladies made to thoſe that propoſed a ſecond marriage to them. III. 189. a. 191. a. b. 192. a. Thoſe who gave their daughters in marriage, demanded a wedding-preſent from their ſons-in-law. IV. 180. b.

Marriages: the primitive Chriſtians declared ſtrongly againſt ſecond marriages. I. 533. a. b. That which St Jerome ſaid againſt them. III. 192. a. They have been ſubject formerly, and are ſtill to canonical penalties. ibid. b. Sentences againſt ſecond marriages. IV. 747. a.

Married. The firſt woman in Peloponneſus that was married a ſecond time. III. 194. The advantage of thoſe that are ill-married. II. 14. a. Whether thoſe who are not married ſtudy better, and write more good books than thoſe that are. V. 524. b. &c.

The Disadvantage — Vol. 5. 524. a.

Marrow, viz. whether lions have any. I. 76. a. b. It is in the marrow, that the ſpecific parts of the animal are contained. ibid. b.

Mars was the Patron of the countries which the Alains inhabited. I. 177. b. In what action the Romans pretended that this god had fought viſibly for them. III. 1. b.

Marſaglia, the ſucceſs of that battle is not doubtful, Marſhal de Catinat gained it. IV. 211. a.

Marſeilles. A poiſoning liquor was kept there for thoſe who wanted to kill themſelves. V. 628. a. b. The people of Marſeilles could not but know what Narbonne was. I. 11. b. They rejoiced at Cæſar's having ordered a ſacred wood to be cut down, thinking that ſo great an impiety would not remain unpuniſhed. II. 418. b. A profane thought of Lucan's with regard to this. ibid. They were inſpired with greater reverence and fear for their unknown deities, than for thoſe whom they fancied they knew. 678. a. They are queſtioned concerning Britain. I. 10. a. IV. 677. a. b.

Marſus (Octavius) a wretched Roman Senator. II. 680. b. 681. a.

Marteau (Peter) obſervation concerning the books printed by that chimerical Printer. II. 441. b.

Martel (Charles) and his ſon Pepin found it a very hard matter to ſubdue the Duke of Aquitain. I. 16. a. The ſuſpicion of having invited the Saracens into France, ſhould fall upon him rather than upon this Duke. ibid. and b. It has been publickly affirmed that he was damned. III. 707. b.

Martel, Profeſſor of Divinity at Montauban. II. 518.

Martia goes to Cato, after Hortenſius's death, to whom Cato had lent her, and intreats him to take her again. III. 495. b.

Martia, puniſhed with the utmoſt rigour, for having violated her veſtal vow. III. 830. a. b.

Martial ſuppoſes a falſe fact in relation to Catullus. II. 395. b. 396. a. Juſtly laughs at the behaviour of Cato with regard to the Floral Games. III. 54. a. n. (9). A Venetian Gentleman burns his works in a ſolemn manner, as a ſacrifice to the Manes of Catullus. IV. 433. a. Martial's wiſh in relation to a wiſe. 793. a. Who was the firſt that that took it into his head, to clear him of his obſcenities. V. 136. a. b. Navagiero had a great averſion againſt him. IV. 315.

Martin (John) a famous Phyſician. I. 171, 172.

Martin (St) refuſes to communicate with ſome Biſhops, and why. IV. 781. and b. He yields to it at laſt, and why. ibid.

Martin (Bernardin) author of ſeveral books on Phyſic, alſo wrote a relation of his travels. V. 442. b.

Martyr (Peter) conforms himſelf for ſome time to Bucer's ambiguous way of ſpeaking, concerning the Euchariſt, but at laſt leaves it. II. 177. b. 178. a. His account concerning Caraccioli, different from that of Beza. 313. b. Invited into England to aſſiſt in the Reformation. IV. 381. b. His Common-places compared with Calvin's Inſtitution. V. 86. b.

Martyrdom is a doubtful ſign that truth is on the ſide of that religion, which it is ſuffered for. IV. 108. b. 109. a. b. 110. a. b. &c.

Martyrology, there are ſome Anabaptiſts in that of Geneva. I. 287. b.

Martyrs, many pious frauds are handed about concerning their death. I. 780. a. There is one who was a Comedian. IV. 487. b. n. (37). The origin of the falſe legends of martyrs. V. 432. a. b. &c. Diſorders which happened in their churches, whilſt the Faithful were aſſembled there. 472. a. Acts of the Proteſtant martyrs publiſhed by Claudius Baduel. I. 603. Savonarola has been looked upon as one. V. 66. b. 67. a. Whether he deſerves that title. 69. a. b. Some Proteſtants give it him. ibid. The public records ought to be carefully conſulted before ſuch and ſuch a perſon, is declared to be a martyr. 70. a. b. & ſeq.

Martius goes from the burial of his ſon to the Senate. I. 683. a.

Maſcati. The advantage which its inhabitants have over the other Mahometans. IV. 48. a. b.

Maſs, called the public error, and by whom. II. 252. b. Whether thoſe who have no faith in it may be preſent at it, as at a Comedy. IV. 391. a. It is the Lord's Supper diſguiſed, which has turned a Nun. ibid. What Stuppanus thought of it. V. 247. a. b. A book intituled the Anatomy of the Maſs. 461. a. b.

Maſſacre of St Bartholomew. See Bartholomew.

Maſſo (Papyrius) ill tranſlated by le Laboureur. V. 392. b.

Mathematicians are not commonly well verſed in the knowledge of matters of fact. III. 461. a. They are not very devout. IV. 487. b.

Mathematics: perſons that learned Mathematics without any one's reading lectures to them in that ſcience. IV. 61. a. b. 63. b. Have their defect as well as other ſciences. V. 621. a. Their object. 622. a. b.

Mathias (Corvinus) King of Hungary, invited all ſorts of learned men to come to him without excepting the Magicians. II. 68. a. Roughly treated by Bonfinius. 67. b. 68. a.

Mathilda (Counteſs) her liberality to the Popes. III. 593. a.

Matignon puts a garriſon into Bazas, and ſome other places near Nerac, where the King of Navarre reſided. IV. 341. a.

Matrimonial duty, precepts concerning it. I. 504. a. b. 505. a. b. II. 80. b. 81. a. 447. b. Whether it was ſuperſeded and ſuſpended in the ark. 431. a. b.

Matrons (ſworn) curious atteſtations made by them, in obedience to an order of the judges. III. 581. a. b. 582. a.

Matter, a compariſon of its three dimenſions with the Trinity. I. 29. b. What Philoſopher ſuppoſed firſt that an intelligence put it into motion. 299. a. b. Thoſe who maintain it to be increated, are very much puzzled. 300. a. III. 447. a. b. Is uncapable of thinking. II. 661. b. 662. a. b. III. 649. a. b. 650. a. b. 651. a. 790. b. 791. a. b. IV. 718. a. b. 719. a. b. All the Philoſophers of antiquity believed it to be increated. II. 786. b. V. 218. a. Upon the ſuppoſition of its eternal exiſtence, natural Philoſophers cannot admit of a providence, without reaſoning worſe than thoſe that deny it. II. 786. b. 787. a. Ariſtotle acknowledges the ſuppoſition of its eternal motion to be abſurd. 787. b. Had a real defect, according to the Platonics, which was an obſtacle to God's project. 788. a. b. Had likewiſe, according to the ſame Platonics, a ſoul before the formation of the world. 792. b. If it is ſelf-exiſtent, we cannot well conceive that God either could or ſhould give it motion. IV. 436. b. And if it moved itſelf independently of God, there is no need for employing him in the conſtruction of the world. 437. a. Whether phyſical evils be an unavoidable effect of the diſpoſition of matter. 525. a. b. Whether one can comprehend that it is eternal and diſtinct from God, and that it was created out of nothing. V. 211. b. 212. a. b. In what ſenſe diviſible in infinitum. 609. a. b. Abſurdity of this opinion. 611. b. Its exiſtence cannot be proved by any good demonſtration. 614. a. b. 615. a.

Matthias (St) the apoſtle, his election burleſqued in the Acts of the Apoſtles in rhime. II. 478. a. b. 479. a. b.

Matthieu (Peter) his reflexions upon the holy Scripture, in relation to the conference of Ratiſbon. III. 536. a.

Matthiolus, it is believed that Fauſtus de Longiano had tranſlated Dioſcorides before him. III. 861.

Maucroix, his French French verſion of Sanderus's Hiſtory of the Schiſm of England, is a very polite one, and has undergone three editions. V. 43. a.

Maurice, Emperor of Conſtantinople, is delivered to Phocas. III. 222. a. b.

Maurice, Landgrave of Heſſe, makes verſes in honour of the youth, who took the degree of Bachelor. II. 818. a. What healths he drank with other Princes. ibid. and b.

Mauſoleum, was one of the ſeven wonders of the world. I. 524. and a.

Mauſſac cenſures Dalechamp juſtly upon the tranſlation of a paſſage of Athenæus. II. 558. a. 563. b.

Maximilian I, deceived by Pope Leo X. III. 540. a. Fights a duel. IV. 184. a.

Maxims claſh with each other no leſs than errors and truth. I. 784. b. II. 27. b. A collection of ſome. IV. 778. a. b.

Maxims of ſtate. Their appurtenances. I. 682. a.

Maximus is defeated by Theodoſius, and killed by the ſoldiers at Aquileia. IV. 781. b.

Maximus Tyrius, what he relates concerning Achilles, and the place where he reſided. I. 85. a. His explication of the origin of evil. IV. 525. a. b.

Mazarine (the Ducheſs of) an expreſſion in her memoirs imitated, and properly applied. II. 692. a. b.

Mazarine (Cardinal) deſires to be acquainted with Amyraut. I. 264. a. b. One of his maxims. 619. b. Juſtified as to the accuſation of having made an auction of books in the palace d'Eſtrée. IV. 172. a. b. Uſed to ſpin out the execution of his promiſes to a great length of time. 417. a. His readineſs to forgive an injury. 808. a. Why he did not anſwer all the letters which were wrote to him. V. 94. b. 95. a. Would not be complimented with a falſe genealogy. 469. a. b. Cauſes Father Cauſſin to be baniſhed into Britany. II. 403. There was not one ſtory which people did not believe, when it defamed him. IV. 511. a.

Meaux (the Biſhop of) ſeems to have tranſcribed a paſſage of Mr Daillé, and made it the principle of one of his books. II. 583. a. V. 294. a. See Boſſuet. A paſſage of his examined. II. 708. a. b. A reflexion of his. III. 390. b. Upon the prodigal ſon. V. 534. b. Takes a great deal of pains to ſet forth the alterations of the Lutheran confeſſion. II. 122. b.

Mecca, who began to build its temple. I. 46. a. And who profaned and laid it waſte. 48, 49. Upon what model the Oratory of the temple of Mecca was built. 46. a. A ſtone which hung in the air there. 49. 124. b. 125. a. b.

Mechanics, a ſurprizing effect of that ſcience. I. 474. a. b.

Mechlinius was a diſciple of Albertus Magnus. IV. 940. b. His opinion concerning the deluge. ibid. 941. a. b.

Medals, there are authors who forge falſe ones. III. 195. b. Medals which have two faces upon the ſame neck, what they ſignify. V. 314. a.

Mede (Joſeph), a Viſionary: his prophetic calculations ſeem inſpired to Jurieu. II. 124. b. 125. a.

Medea, what ſhe did with her children. II. 874. a. The enchantment which ſhe uſed in order to make people young again. IV. 533. a. b. 534. a.

Mediana, how a prieſt of that village behaved himſelf in the ſedition that was raiſed in Caſtille. IV. 457. a. b.

Mediators ſometimes hurt the parties which they endeavour to reconcile. I. 578. a. b.

Medicis (Cardinal John de) diverted himſelf with the feuds of the learned. I. 202. a. Was but fifteen years of age when he was named to the Cardinalate. II. 97. a. By what accident he was choſen Pope. III. 761. and a. b.

Medicis (Cardinal Julian de), a conſpiracy is formed againſt him. IV. 11. b.

Medicis (Lorenzo de) filled with confuſion and deſpair, how, and for what. IV. 232. b. 233. a. His library. III. 729. a. b. 730. a. He, and his brother Julian attacked by aſſaſſins in a church, in the middle of divine ſervice. V. 157. a. b. J. Savonarola ſent for to prepare him for death. 57.

Medicis (Peter de), what he did to make his equipage appear the more magnificent. III. 151. b. Contrives a plot againſt the government. IV. 346. and a. b. Perſons that were executed for being concerned in it. ibid. a. b. Driven out of Florence. V. 59. a.

Medicis (Alexander de), Duke of Florence, aſſaſſinated. V. 251. b. 252. a. And when. IV. 379.

Medicis (Catherine de) cured of her barrenneſs, and how. III. 24. and a. Her huſband's liberality in rewarding this cure. ibid. Cauſes the Duke of Alençon, and the King of Navarre to be kept at Vincennes, and why. III. 416. b. 417. a. Did not puniſh the debauchery of her maids of honour, but the want of art to conceal it. 832. a. b. 833. a. Was very near being a Calviniſt. V. 186. a. b. Bore with ſatires. 760, 761. Deſpiſed injurious reflexions. IV. 278. b. Introduces the firſt Rucellai into France. 410. Frightened with a ſermon of de Menot's. V. 298. a. Baniſhes the lady de Mortemart for having given her advice. ibid.

Medicis (Mary de), during the four years of her Regency, ſhe never kiſſed, not ſo much as once, the King, her ſon. IV. 544. b. Diſtruſted by her ſon. III. 816. a. Jealous of her authority. IV. 143. b. Rinuccini, a gentleman of Florence, in love with her. 878. a.

Medina (Michael) ſuſpected for having defended Ferus. III. 43. b. 44. a. Retrenches ſeveral things from the writings of that Franciſcan. 44. a. b.

Megabyzes reproved for having talked of a thing which he did not underſtand. I. 367. a.

Megrin (St), by whom aſſaſſinated, and why. III. 296. a. b.

Meibomius, his collections concerning tyranny. IV. 564. a. n. (26).

Meynier, the Jeſuit, an harangue which he was thought to be the author of. II. 877. a. b. Accuſes the gentlemen of Port-Royal of holding intelligence with Geneva. V. 16. b.

Melac, whether he had a dog that was a familiar ſpirit. I. 151. a. Suſpected of dealing with the Devil. III. 718. b. A witty anſwer which he made in relation to this. ibid. His behaviour at the ſiege of Landau. 720. a. b. 721. a. b.

Melampus, how he acquired the gift of underſtanding the language of birds. II. 340. a. IV. 182. a. V. 381. b.

Melanchthon, whether it became him to divert himſelf with jeſts and banters. III. 954. a. Was of a peaceable diſpoſition. IV. 185. b. 186. a. b. 187. a. b. 188. a. b. 189. a. b. Determines to retire into Paleſtine. 188. b. His opinion concerning Grace, was contrary to that of Luther and Calvin. V. 151. a. b. 152. a. b. Wiſhed to die. 250. b. Prints the Confeſſion of Augſburg in Latin and German, and varies from the original. II. 122. a. The long friendſhip between him and Simon Grynæus. III. 255. Pezelius publiſhes ſome extracts of his works, in which he puts the objections and anſwers in a very good method, and interlards ſome ſhort obſervations. IV. 606. b.

Melanopus, an Athenian, ſuffered himſelf to be gained over to Calliſtratus by money, and ſaid to the people, that he ſubmitted to him for the good of the public. II. 259, 260.

Meliſſus could not have anſwered the objections of Zoroaſter againſt thoſe who acknowledged but one principle of all things. IV. 519. a. Argument which he made uſe of againſt the exiſtence of motion. V. 615. b. 616. a. b.

Melchiorites, an imaginary ſect. IV. 193.

Melchites, a name which the Eutychians gave the Catholics, and for what reaſon. IV. 349. b.

Mellerſtat, a celebrated Phyſician to Frederic, Elector of Saxony. V. 562. a. b.

Melos, all the people of that iſland had the reputation of being Atheiſts, and why. II. 653. a. b.

Melvil quoted. V. 273. a.

Melun, Amyot was mortified at that city. I. 256. b. Some Prelates and Doctors aſſemble there to prepare the inſtructions of thoſe who were to be deputed to the Council of Trent. II. 372. Varillas refuted in relation to this aſſembly. 375. b. 376. a. b.

Memoirs of Mr L. C. D. R. publiſhed in the year 1687; their author cenſured. II. 136. a. V. 84. a.

Memory: the ſurprizing memory of Alcander. I. 215. a. That of hearers is to be dreaded by Lawyers who contradict themſelves. 352. a. Men of the greateſt memory often forget what others remember commonly enough: an inſtance of this. 551. a. Examples of a great many, who for want of memory were at a ſtand. II. 191. a. b. People whoſe memory was much decayed in the laſt years of their life. 624. b. Perſons of a prodigious memory. I. 215. a. II. 22. a. b. 23. a. 265. a. b. 645. b. 646. a. 747. b. 748. a. 769. b. III. 60. a. 491. b. IV. 196. b. 197. a. b. 198. a. 248. a. 289. a. b. 290. a. V. 140. b. Is the firſt thing that dies in a learned man. IV. 196. b. 197. a. May create us enemies. 248. a. Local memory, to whom the invention of it is aſcribed. V. 140. b.

Men of Letters, ſee Authors, Writers, Letters.

Menage has made a falſe obſervation on Malherbe's Poems. I. 78. b. Juſtly cenſures Malherbe for the ambiguity of an expreſſion. 80. b. His genealogy. 168. b. Knew how to make the moſt of his reading. 441. a. b. Thinks it ſtrange to ſee a preacher in the pulpit with a hat on his head. II. 93. b. Forms a criticiſm upon Horace that is very well grounded. 139. and b. Accuſes Mr Baillet wrongfully in relation to Daurat's age. 621. a. Quoted as to the proofs produced againſt Robert d'Arbriſſelles. III. 66. b. 67. a. Did not know all the Eccleſiaſtics who have written love-verſes, and of whom he has publiſhed a liſt. 106. and a. b. Says it is falſe that Father Sirmond ever repented the publiſhing a letter of Geoffry of Vendôme to Robert d'Arbriſſelles. 66. b. Cenſures Voſſius in relation to the Poet Hermeſianax. 779. a. Sounds the alarm againſt Montmaur. IV. 246. a. 251. a. Excuſes himſelf for having compoſed a ſatirical piece. 248. b. Judgment concerning ſome of his Poems. 250. b. 251. a. Cenſures Marſilius Ficinus with great reaſon, in relation to Prodicus. 782. b. Beſtows two chapters to prove, that Poets, after they have ſwore to write no more, do ſtill write on. II. 83. b.

Menagiana, thoſe who publiſhed it forgot a good jeſt. I. 605. a. A witty ſaying in that book. II. 534. b. 535. a. Elogy of that work, and of thoſe who publiſhed it. IV. 195. a. b. That collection cited in relation to a congreſs. 803. a. n. (43). Cited again. V. 112. a. n. (1), (2). What is related there of one Blunet. 381. a. n. (8). A fault in the Continuation of that work. 739, 740. A good many things are miſerably confounded there. ibid.

Menetrier (Father) cited. III. 302. b. n. (37). IV. 134. a. n. (8). ibid. b. n. (11). V. 269. a. n. (1).

Menjot, a celebrated Phyſician, expreſſes himſelf in very obſcene terms, in his treatiſe de Sterilitate. III. 920. a. Character of his diſſertation upon the Furor Uterinus. V. 799.

Mennonites, ſee Anabaptiſts.

Menot, one of his ſermons frightens Catherine de Medicis, and makes her cry. V. 298. a.

Mentz receives a French garriſon; and the French loſe it after a long ſiege. IV. 211. b. Deſtroyed by the Pope. V. 541. a.

Mercerus underſtood nothing but Hebrew books. IV. 842. b.

Mercure Galant, ignorance of the author of that book. III. 718. b. 719. a.

Mercure Suiſſe, a book wrote by Frederic Spanheim. II. 551. a. A paſſage of it concerning the pretended miracles which happened during the ſiege of Conſtance. ibid. b.

Mercure Hiſtorique & Politique, its author has acted like an honeſt man, and ought to be imitated. V. 84. a. b.

Mercury, a deſcription of his rod, and its virtues. I. 4. b. 5. a. Gets a woman with child. II. 652. a. b. His memory ſlips him in a ſurprizing manner. IV. 542. b.

Mercurialis cited. III. 782. b. 783. a.

Mere (the Chevalier de), obſervation upon one of his letters. V. 621. a. b. Cited. III. 374. a. n. (150). 376. b. n. (172).

Merit is very often prejudicial to thoſe who aſpire to great offices. I. 354. a. 733. b. II. 436. a. Examples of extraordinary merit. I. 580. a. b. 581. a. b. 781. a. b. 782. a. b. The being ſuperior to another in merit, does not make one ſuperior likewiſe in reputation. 459. a. b.

Merklinus, an error of that author's in Lindenius renovatus, touching Myrepſus. IV. 764. b.

Meſſias, according to the Jews, he ought to diſcern by the ſmell, whether a perſon accuſed be innocent or guilty. I. 650. Whether he is not yet come under the principal characters which the Prophets attribute to him. II. 175. b. A collection of paſſages which ſhew, that the antient Jewiſh Church believed his Divinity. IV. 880. a. What Laurentius Valla ſaid of him. V. 437. a.

Meſſina, whether it be true that the holy Virgin wrote to the inhabitants of that town. III. 563. a.

Meſtrezat, his treatiſe concerning our communion with JESUS CHRIST, tranſlated into Italian by Vincent Paravicin. IV. 471.

Meſue, whether he be the ſame with Mauſur. II. 587. b. When, where, and under what name his books were printed. ibid.

Metamorphoſis, Ovid threw that book into the fire; but there were ſome copies of it in private hands. IV. 447. b. 448. a.

Metaphors: whether there is nothing real in metaphors. II. 434. b.

Metaphoriſts, a chimerical ſect. II. 434. b.

Metapontines, their ſacrifices were eſteemed to belong in common to Apollo and Ariſteas. I. 459. a.

Metals and minerals, how formed in the earth. V. 117. b. 118. a. b.

Metempſychoſis, ſome Jews believed it. I. 46. n. (f). Different from that of Pythagoras. 52. a. Is at the bottom the ſame thing with Spinoziſm. 52. and a. b. Deſtroys hell. IV. 669. a. Pythagoras learned it of the Egyptians. 674. a.

Metharme, wife of Cinyras, and mother of Adonis. IV. 641.

Methodius, his revelation is a mere invention. I. 23. a.

Methods: divers methods of converting Heretics. IV. 373. b. 374. a. b.

Metz deprived of its liberty by Henry II. II. 445. b. The King permits the demoliſhing of its temple. 525. The juriſdiction of the Judges, which were called the Thirteen, is ſuppreſſed there. III. 33. a.

Meurſius confounds two Pygmalions together. IV. 642. a.

Mezerai criticized in relation to the ſiege of Aiguillon. I. 162. b. 163. a. Judgment of the firſt and ſecond edition of his abridgment. 319. b. Conduct altogether unworthy of this ſamous Hiſtorian. 794. b. 795. a. Is often miſtaken in Chriſtian-names. II. 828. b. Rejects, as a mere ſtory, the reaſon which is alledged why Charles V was not ſtopped in France. 841. a. His obſervation upon a quality that recommends us to the fair ſex. III. 296. b. 415. b. Is miſtaken about Munuza and Abderama. IV. 284. b. Criticized in relation to Joan II, Queen of Naples. 307. a. Perhaps it will be wondered ſome time hereafter how he came to be ſo much eſteemed. 319. b. His miſtake in relation to the Baron du Pont, and the ſuit of impotency which he had upon his hands. 482. b. 799. a. Cenſured in relation to the Ducheſs of Valentinois. 699. a. b. Injudiciouſly blamed for obſcenity. V. 841. Did not mind politeneſs of ſtile. ibid. n. (24).

Meziriac anſwers weakly to an objection which he raiſes himſelf, concerning the praiſes which Homer beſtows upon Penelope. IV. 543. b. Conduct of the author in quoting paſſages from his writings. V. 805.

Michael (Captain), Arquebuſier to Charles IX, his behaviour towards the Preſident de la Place. IV. 682. a.

Mycillus dies Profeſſor of Greek at Baſil, in 1558. V. 589.

Midwives, why called Sages-Femmes in French. V. 46. b. A midwife hanged at Paris for having made ſeveral women ſuffer abortion. IV. 498. b. 499. a.

Migonitis, a name given to Venus, and why. III. 368. b. A temple built to Venus under that name. ibid.

Milan (the Duke of) ſhut up in an iron cage, without having ſo much as the comfort of being able to read or write. III. 814. a.

Milaneſe abandoned by the French. III. 611. b.

Milaneſe look upon the Cardinals of the aſſembly of Piſa with averſion. III. 761. a. Ruin their deſign of ſetting themſelves at liberty. V. 128. a.

Mileſians enter into one of the mouths of the Nile, make a deſcent, and build a wall there. IV. 342. a.

Miletus, ſtrange madneſs of the virgins of that town. I. 19. b.

Milichius cited. V. 630. b. n. (12). 783. n. (ww).

Millenarians have no other aim than to ſtir up the people. II. 539. a. Whether their doctrine is conducive to this. IV. 122. b. 123. a. Loſe nothing of their credit though they deceive the people a hundred times. II. 539. a.

Millennium: Cerinthus's doctrine touching the Millennium. II. 405. a. b. When the reign of the Millennium ought to begin, according to Comenius. 539 a. b.

Milliæus, his deſcription of Moſes's ſong. IV. 134. a. b.

Milo vexed at loſing the ſtrength of his arms. I. 82. a. b.

Milton, his toleration-principles. IV. 223. a. b. Excludes the Papiſts from the benefit of it. ibid. b.

Mimes, what they were deſigned for. III. 695. b.

Mind liable to epidemical diſtempers as well as the body. I. 19. a. And to ſtrange extravagances. 103. a. III. 315. a. Its inequalities and caprices. II. 210. b. 211. a. b. A particular turn of mind. 317. a. b. 318. b. 319. a. The mind undergoes the ſame viciſſitudes with the body. IV. 689. a. It is not in our power to calm it. 811. a. b. Some heavy minds unfold by little and little. II. 500. b. Whether by denying that Free-thinkers have any ſtrength in their turn of mind, they might be brought to acknowledge it. 452. b.

Minerva, the virtue of her rod. I. 5. a. Who educated her. 178. and a. How ſhe took revenge upon a woman. 200. Cotys pretends to marry her. II. 557. a. b. Gives advices unworthy of a goddeſs, to Penelope. IV. 543. b. Miraculous image of this goddeſs. I. 6. and a. b.

Miniſters, ſeveral of them, recommended only by the credit of their eloquence or learning, have married to great advantage. I. 503. a. b. Taken to taſk whenever they took upon themſelves the title of Paſtors. 544. a. b. II. 39. b. 40. a. b. In what caſe it is permitted them to go to war. 433. a. They could not be beloved by their churches, and pleaſe the court of France at the ſame time. ibid. They looked upon all propoſals of diſputes or conferences, that were made to them in France, as a ſnare. 520. b. The Miſſionaries did ſooner vex a Miniſter of great parts and learning, than one of leſs note. III. 36. a. A paſſage which has been ſtrained to make the world believe that the Proteſtants deſpiſe them. IV. 288. b. 289. a. Miniſters accuſed of going about a deceitful project. 923. b. 924. a. What qualities Miniſters of the Goſpel ought to have. I. 241. b. 242. a. b. 321. a. b. II. 200. b. 201. a. b. Nothing can blacken them more than a proud and vindictive ſpirit. IV. 272. a. b. When thoſe of France began to read the Fathers. I. 756. A book where it is maintained that they have a call to bear arms. ibid. a. b. Are always in the wrong to meddle with politics, but chiefly in a ſtate which is divided into factions. V. 61.

Miniſters of State, whatever intrinſic greatneſs they may have, it is an advantage for them to live at one time rather than at another. II. 414. a. b. Their duty. III. 513. b. 514. a. When they are hated by the people, it is ſcarce ever believed that thoſe whom they puniſh are guilty. IV. 20. b.

Miniſtry of the Goſpel, they who devote themſelves to it ſtand in need of all their time. I. 321. a.

Minutius Fælix, what he ſays of the nature of God. V. 146. a.

Miracles, credulity multiplies them, and their multiplication deſtroys them. I. 87. a. b. The Romiſh Church has behaved in this reſpect juſt like the Pagans. ibid. A mere relation of ſome miracles makes their falſity evident. 245. The Pagans compared thoſe of JESUS CHRIST with thoſe of Apollonius and Apuleius. 380. b. 382. a. 394. and a. b. A miracle of humility oppoſed againſt all the miracles of Leſſius. 607. b. What Montagne ſays of ſome miracles. II. 149. a. b. A falſe miracle refuted by an argument which holds as good againſt the true miracles of Moſes and JESUS CHRIST. 587. a. b. One half of the world laughs at the other on this head. IV. 49. a. b. Whether thoſe of the antient law were produced upon occaſion of the will of a creature. 609. b. What we ought to underſtand by them, and if they are poſſible. V. 215. b. 216. a. Thoſe which are ſuppoſed to have happened during the ſiege of Conſtance. II. 551. a. Criticized upon by the author of the Swiſs Mercury. ibid. and b. In all religions, people are ſtrangely inclined to think themſelves favoured by them. 552. a. There are ſome Miniſters who ſee a miracle in all events, and who find one every where. ibid. Are an object of faith, and conſequently an obſcure object. ibid. b. How the Fathers of the Church proved the miracles of the Scripture againſt the Pagans. III. 578. a. b. 579. a.

Myrepſus (Nicolas), his antidotary. IV. 764. a. b. Confounded with Nicolas Alexandrinus by Merklinus. ibid.

Myron, what he did to obtain favours from a Courtezan which had been already refuſed to him. III. 705. b. 706. a. b.

Myrhha, ſome ſay ſhe made uſe of the artifice of Lot's daughters, in order to lie with her father. I. 113.

Myrtle forbid at the feaſt of the good goddeſs. II. 237. a. b.

Misfortunes, whether there be any in human life that are not occaſioned by imprudence. V. 366. a. b. 367. a. b. 368. a. b. 369. a. b. 370. a. b. 371. a. b. 372. a. b. 373. a. b. That which ought to be aſcribed to imprudence is called by this name, and aſcribed to fortune. 372. a.

Miſitra, the dogs do not enter into the moſques, nor into the churches of that city. III. 430. b. 431. a.

Miſſionaries, the great length which they go in their knavery. II. 585. a. b. From whence they draw their ſharpeſt invectives againſt the Proteſtants. III. 218. a.

Myſteries, the greateſt part of allegorical myſteries ought to be unknown to the world. I. 40. b. Myſteries expoſed to the railleries of profane men, by the impertinence of ſome Divines. II. 338. b. 339. a. b. Whether the anſwers of a Divine about myſteries may be as clear as the objections of a Philoſopher. 456. b. The explication of them increaſes their obſcurity. 588. b. The Pagans would not ſuffer them to be divulged. III. 216. b. Whether the rejection of them be a good way to get a great many followers. V. 172. a. What the Pagans ſaid of them. 173. a. Above, or even contrary to, reaſon. 815. Ought not to be ſubmitted to the rules of natural reaſon. 816. 829. There would be no more myſteries if reaſon could ſolve the difficulties of them. ibid. The Fathers of the Church did not examine them by the principles of Logic and Metaphyſics. 817. n. (17). The Catholics and Proteſtants equally reject reaſon, in their controverſies concerning them. 817, 818. The explications of myſteries have rather perplexed than cleared them. 819. Neither Hereſy nor Heatheniſm can draw any advantage from the unanſwerableneſs of their objections againſt myſteries. 825.

Myſteries (dramatical), the life of JESUS CHRIST acted and repreſented by myſteries and perſonages at Poictiers. II. 104. The myſtery of the Acts of the Apoſtles, and of the Apocalypſe printed and acted at Paris. 477. a. b. &c. Full of groſs inventions, and expreſſed after a low manner, they were ſuffered upon the ſtage, at the ſame time that the people were forbidden to read the Bible. ibid. b. 478. a. Devils are very often introduced in them. 478. a. b. 479. a. b. Origin of this kind of theatrical pieces. 480. b. 481. a. b. Italy had public theatres for the repreſentation of theſe myſteries about the middle of the XVIth century. 481. a. b.

Myſtics took their unitive way from the Platoniſts. IV. 690. b. There is no doctrine for which they are ſo much exclaimed againſt as for that of conſenting to their own eternal damnation. 943. a.

Miſtreſs: a lover excuſes the imperfections of his miſtreſs. I. 77. a. The addreſs and arts of a miſtreſs between thirty and forty will ſecure her empire far better than the artleſs beauty of a girl of fifteen. II. 256. a. b. A lady who would think it a ſcandal to be a private gentleman's miſtreſs, will glory to be the miſtreſs of a King or Emperor. I. 586. a. Thoſe who marry the miſtreſſes they have diſhonoured are nevertheleſs ſubject to ſatire. II. 503. a. Marks of bravery in a lover are very acceptable to a miſtreſs. III. 296. b. 297. a. 415. a. b. The quality of miſtreſs is more grateful than that of wife. 385. a. b. A great many are loved merely for their name and quality. IV. 201. a. b.

Mythology: in what manner facts borrowed from the Pagan Mythology ought to be confuted. I. 75. b. 76. a. Is very uncertain. 160. a. b. IV. 180. b. 533. a. b. 534. a. The principal difference betwixt it and our modern romances. III. 465. b.

Mythological obſervations, the author's reaſons for thoſe which he has made. V. 805.

Mythologiſts, their moſt common faults. III. 348. a. b. &c. Their varying from one another. 364. b. 365. a.

Mithra, how honoured by the antient Perſians. V. 637. a. b.

Mithridates, his treachery. II. 305. b. 306. a.

Miziere (Francis) gives us the beſt edition of Marot's works. IV. 163. b. 164. a.

Mockery, what that of Iſhmael was. I. 123. b. 124. a.

Mockers find ſome ſubject of ridicule in every thing. II. 117. b.

Mockers in point of Religion, a ſerious refutation does not near ſo much harm as their jeſts do. II. 12. b. When they fall ſick, they run into another extreme. ibid 13. a Moderate meaſures ordinarily diſpleaſe both parties. III. 506. b. 507. a.

Moderns, a reflexion upon the parallel between the Antients and the Moderns. II. 553. a. b. The difference between them and the Antients, with regard to comedies. IV. 743. a. b.

Modes have their ebbing and flowing. II. 544. a.

Modes, what the Philoſophers underſtood by that word. V. 221. a.

Modeſty, a virtue rarely to be found among men of great abilities. I. 717. a. b. Is of no uſe to the making of one's fortune in the world. III. 624. b. When it is once turned out of doors it ſeldom returns again. II. 110. a. There is a kind of modeſty, which, carried to exceſs, deſerves our admiration. 222. b. Icarius erects a ſtatue to it, and why. IV. 538. a. b. 539. a.

Modifications (inconſiſtent) require diſtinct ſubjects. V. 209. a. b.

Moien de parvenir, the title of a book cited. III. 386. a. n. (74). IV. 574. a. n. (100).

Moyne (Etienne le) goes out of France with leave from the court. II. 42. a. His remarks concerning Scaliger and Salmaſius. III. 603. b. 604. a.

Mole (la), his crime and puniſhment. IV. 935. a. b. 936. a. b. &c. His anſwers when he was put to the rack. 939. b. 940. a. By whom his head was buried. V. 526. a. b.

Moliere, author of Polyxena, aſſaſſinated. I. 548. n. (a).

Moliere preferred to Plautus for his fine turns. I. 283. a. b. His own genius could eaſily furniſh him with inciden[illegible] IV. 234. b. 235. a. Cited. V. 485. b. n. (18[illegible]

Molinifm oppoſed by three ſorts of people, who, though unwilling to own it, are at the bottom of the ſame mind. III. 548. a.

Molinoſiſm, the abjuration which a Monk who was guilty of it was obliged to make. III. 853. a. b. Its conformity with carnal Origeniſm. IV. 420. b. 421. a.

Mollerus, his reflexion againſt thoſe who make their enemies ſuſpected of Atheiſm. III. 671. b.

Monarchy, the weak ſide of that form of government. II. 211. a. b. Which a mixed monarchy cannot help. ibid. To be preferred before Democratical government in certain caſes. 165. b. 166. a. Compared with a Republic, as to diſorders and confuſions which may happen. III. 467. a. b. 468. a. Whether it be the public intereſt that parliaments ſhould have a great deal of authority in a monarchy. 512. b. 513. a. b.

Monarchy (French) on the brink of ruin, by the fault of the Princes of the blood. II. 462. b. 463. a. The Queens there preſerve almoſt always the foreign heart which they bring with them. 542. Which has very near overthrown it a great many times. ibid.

Monarchy of women, there was a diſpute concerning it in the XVIth century. III. 670. a. b.

Monarchs, contradictory doctrines concerning their authority. II. 51. b. 52. a. b. Are ſubject to a furious jealouſy towards thoſe of their own blood. 717. a. b. Whether it be a good thing that the power ſhould be divided between them and the great Lords. III. 301. a. b. 302. a. Inconveniences in writing the Hiſtory of Monarchs lately dead. 334. b. 335. a. Their ill qualities are ſometimes compenſated with others. 801. b. 802. a. Their paſſions do not always turn with the wind of their intereſt. 805. b. When a Monarch is hated by the people, it is ſcarce ever believed that thoſe whom he puniſhes are guilty. IV. 20. b. How Monarchs ought to behave themſelves, with reſpect to the puniſhments which they inflict, and the favours which they diſtribute. 354. b. 355. a. 573. b. See Princes and Kings.

Monaſteries, their ſtrange corruption in the XVth century. II. 276. a. b. 277. a.

Monconis in his travels, names an hundred perſons who taught him receipts and ſecrets for cures. I. 78. b. Cited. 104. a. n. (40). Finds out the cheat of the ſuperior of the Urſulines of Loudun. III. 213. b. 214. a. The idea which he had of God. 471. a.

Money compared with pitch. III. 596. a. An unlawful means of getting it. V. 163. b. 164. a. b. A piece of money changed into a ſerpent, which wreathes itſelf about a gentleman's neck, and why. III. 487. a. b.

Mongifore (Antony) cauſes Maraſcia's book concerning the two St Mamilians to be printed. IV. 98. a. b.

Monks, what Pliny ſaid of the Eſſenians is every day applied to them. I. 34. b. There have been ſome Monks who wore nothing but a girdle, and who made themſelves inſenſible to women. 112. a. b. The Monks of the XVIth century were ignorant and voluptuous, and would not ſuffer that any one ſhould ſtudy polite literature. 149. b. The habit of a Monk does not alter the inclinations of him that wears it. 345. b. The falſe zeal of the Monks was the firſt cauſe of fabulous traditions. II. 94. a. b. A Monk of St Sabas at Jeruſalem, orders one of his diſciples to keep a perpetual ſilence. 587, 588. How he puniſhed him for not obſerving that order. 588. Good offices which they mutually do one another. III. 87. a. b. Perſuade their Devotees to whatever they have a mind. 331. a. Parallel betwixt thoſe of the Eaſt and thoſe of the Weſt. 549. a. They have no privileges by virtue of which they ought to refuſe to acknowledge the juriſdiction of Biſhops. 739. a. What muſt be done in order to obtain teſtimonials of a good life from them. 797. a. There is no example of any converted Monk, who continued a bachelor for want of finding a woman whom he might marry. IV. 393. b. Compile the chronicles of their orders with very little judgment. 394. b. Some of their impoſtures. 393. b. 394. a. b. It does not belong to them to put their hand to the helm of government. V. 61. b. 62. a. b. The life which they led in the convent of St Sulpice at Belley, and the difficulties which the Biſhop of that city met with, in endeavouring to make them reform it. I. 737. b. 738. a. b. 739. a. b. There have been Monks who have paſſed whole nights with women, in order to get a complete victory over their concupiſcence. III. 66. a. b.

Monkey, what Cardinal was called by that name, and for what reaſon. III. 616. a.

Monkeys ſometimes ſmother their young ones with careſſes. I. 113. b. A fable of a monkey. IV. 600. a. b.

Monliard the Hiſtorian, a paſſage which he had been forced to ſuppreſs, is reſtored. III. 413. a. b.

Monluc, Marſhal of France, compared with Des-Adrets. I. 711. a. b. His impudent ſayings concerning the Queen of Navarre. IV. 327. b. 328. a. Makes a great ſlaughter at Mont de Marſan. 328. b. 329. a. Quoted. III. 415. b.

Monluc, Biſhop of Valence, what means he made uſe of in his negotiations with the Poles about the election of the Duke of Anjou. IV. 839. a.

Monmouth (Duke of) There were people in England who maintained that he was not taken. II. 721. b.

Monod (Father) confeſſor of the Ducheſs of Savoy. II. 401. a.

Mons (the verſion of) cenſured by Mallet. III. 576. a. b.

Monſters, there are five which ought to be proſecuted to the utmoſt. IV. 669. b.

Montagne (Michael de) cited in relation to Mahomet II. I. 54. b. Cited again in relation to du Bellai's memoirs. 722. a. Cited again. II. 366. a. 677. b. 737. b. 823. a. III. 81. b. V. 368. a. His reflexion upon the education of children. I. 80. a. His judgment on an elogy given to Aretin. 436. a. A good obſervation of this writer's againſt falſe miracles. II. 149. a. b. Had an intimate affection for Charron. 448. a. b. What he ſays of the ill effect of diſputing. 848. b. What he thinks of women who marry old men. III. 64. b. How he ridicules the Catholics, in relation to certain maxims that change according to the times. 521. b. Did not well know the origin of an adventure which he takes from Plato. 633. and b. 634. a. Had naturally an averſion for a lie. IV. 778. b. n. (42). What he ſays of kiſſes of civility. 797. b. And of the power which the ſoul has to put itſelf alternately in oppoſite ſituations. V. 272. b. Laughs at thoſe who called the epiſtles of Guevara golden ones. III. 270. b. In what manner the faculty of Divines in France dealt with his eſſays. V. 810. Dedicated to Cardinal Richelieu, and kept in all libraries. 798. There is not near ſo much licentiouſneſs in this Dictionary, as there is in his Eſſays, either with regard to Scepticiſm or obſcenities. ibid.

Montagne (John de la) tranſlates two books of Sir Humphrey Lyndes, intituled the Sure Way, and the Wrong Way. III. 971. and a. b.

Montalto (Cardinal de) ſaid that he would never deſpiſe a man in a caſſock and little band. I. 361. His letter to the council of the holy Union. II. 459. a.

Montalto, a famous Jew, reſolves to make an open profeſſion of Judaiſm at Paris. III. 125. a.

Montargis. The Proteſtants find harbour there. III. 30. a. b. But however are obliged to leave it. ibid.

Montauzier (the Marquiſs of) his elogy in two verſes. I. 397. b. Wants to know from whom Balzac had what he ſays of Penelope. IV. 543. b. 544. a. Has a great affection for Bourſault, and recommends him for Sub-Preceptor to the Dauphin. II. 115. How his letters to Jurieu, and that miniſter's letters to him, came to be publiſhed. V. 645. b. 646. a.

Montauzier (Mr de) compared with A. M. Aquaviva. I. 397. b.

Montbelliard, the conference which was held there proceeded from political reaſons more than from any thing elſe. I. 792. a.

Montbriſſon, the ſoldiers of the garriſon there thrown down headlong. I. 709. a.

Montecuculi (Sebaſtian) poiſons the eldeſt ſon of Francis I. II. 94. b.

Montecuculi diſappoints all the deſigns of Mr de Turenne. V. 191. b. What he brought about by the taking of only one town. ibid.

Monte-Major cited. I. 354. a.

Montenay (Matthew de) a great and experienced Magician. III. 126. a.

Monteferrat, two wars carried on there. II. 311. a. Its miſerable condition in the year 1551. &c. V. 440. a. b.

Montgomery recovers the dominions of the Queen of Navarre. IV. 327. b. An article of the capitulation which he made was not obſerved. 328. b. 329. a. b. Paſſionate verſes made on his puniſhment, by John des Caurres. II. 399.

Montjoy (William) a great friend of Eraſmus's. III. 456. a.

Montmaur worſe treated by Feramus, than by any other who wrote againſt him. IV. 246. b. 247. a. People were not able to make head againſt him with their tongue. 248. a. His good and bad qualities. 250. b. 251. a. b. 252. a. b.

Montmor, or rather Mommor, an epigram which he made on a Poet. V. 410. a. b.

Montmorenci, from whom that family is deſcended. I. 341. a.

Montmorenci (Anne de) Conſtable, his want of abilities, and the miſchief he did to France. III. 395. a. b. 396. a. b. His conduct with regard to the Ducheſs de Valentinois, very much blamed by Thuanus. IV. 699. a. Was of opinion that learning made men effeminate, and gave riſe to Hereſies. V. 354. a.

Montmorenci (Francis de) ſollicits a diſpenſation of marriage at the Court of Rome. IV. 631. a. b. 632. a. b. His unfair dealing. 634. a. b. 635. a. b. Is croſſed by the Houſe of Guiſe. 637. b.

Montmorenci (Henry de) Conſtable, his wife hearkens to propoſitions of marriage while he is alive. III. 184. b.

Montmorenci (the Duke of) deſires unuſual honours for his wife. III. 210. a. Beheaded at Toulouſe for treaſon. 817. a. b. To how high a degree he was beloved. ibid. Whether his judges could have done otherwiſe than condemned him. 819. a. b.

Montmoriſme, that which is called ſo. IV. 246. b.

Montpellier is one of the principal cities of France, in which the Roman law was read publickly. I. 68. a. b. Its univerſity obliges du Laurens to paſs through all his exerciſes again, in order to take his Doctor's Degree a ſecond time, before he is admitted. III. 745. a. This Phyſician founds a Phyſic garden there, where he places this inſcription, Argos eſto non Briareus. ibid. and b.

Montpenſier (the Duke of) in what manner he uſed his priſoners. I. 592. a. b. Cauſes a conference of Doctors and Miniſters to be held, in order to reclaim his eldeſt daughter. III. 864. b. His daughter Charlotte eſcapes into Germany, where ſhe abjures Popery. 864. He uſes the Proteſtants with the utmoſt ſeverity. 865. Believes that the Ducheſs of Bouillon would renounce Calviniſm, provided ſhe would hear Dr Vigor. IV. 920. b. 921. a.

Montpenſier (the Ducheſs of) the true cauſe of her hatred to Henry III. II. 257. b. It was ſaid that ſhe was in love with her nephew the Duke of Guiſe. III. 299. a.

Monuments (public) particular care ought to be taken not to let Printers falſify them. II. 698. b. There are abundance of ridiculous ſtories which people endeavour to prove by them. III. 165. a. b.

Moon, a thought of the Chevalier Marini, concerning the ſpots that are ſeen in it. I. 113. b. The women of that region lay eggs, from whence are bred men fifteen times bigger than thoſe who inhabit the earth. III. 369. b. Whether it be true that people can read in it what is written on a looking-glaſs. IV. 672. b. Whether it be inhabited. V. 576. a.

Moors, a prodigious number of them are converted by the ſermons of John Andreas. I. 326.

Mopſus: Ammianus Marcellinus confounds one Mopſus with another. IV. 253. a.

Moral: combination of Moral and Phyſical things. II. 16. a.

Morale Pratique: whether Mr Arnauld be the author of the ſecond volume of the Morale Pratique. I. 493. b.

Moralis Diabolica, the title of a book, which the author was obliged to alter. III. 122.

Moraliſts ought to be very reſerved in their reflexions on the ſickneſs and death of illuſtrious perſons. I. 88. a. b. Ought not to regulate their opinions by the practice of the Civil-Law, in points concerning the relaxation of manners. III. 944. b. Extream into which the too rigid ones fall. V. 797, 798.

Morality, maxims which overthrow it. I. 35. b. 36. a. b. Abominable morality publickly taught among Chriſtians. III. 54. a. b. It is a blot on the perſon who is the firſt that introduces a relaxation in the practice of morality. 194. In what manner people ought to ſtudy it, in order to know it aright. 894. b. It is neceſſary that all men ſhould be taught a morality, which admits of the direction of a good conſcience, acknowledged by the Heathens themſelves. I. 35. b.

Morals: Silveſter Prierias carries the relaxation of morals too far. IV. 772 and b. 773. a. We muſt not judge of a man's morals by his writings. 595. They are not at all concerned in the obſcenities which the author relates. V. 846. Whether ours be more chaſte than thoſe of our Anceſtors. 855. &c.

More (Sir Thomas) his verſes againſt an Aſtrologer who was a cuckold. V. 322. a. b. Favours which he grants to Grynæus, at the recommendation of Eraſmus. III. 255. a. b.

Morel (Frederic) reviſes and augments P. Bellier's tranſlation of Philo's works. IV. 623.

Morellus was of the cabal which wanted to change the diſcipline of the Church. V. 738.

Moret (the Counteſs de) a diſtich on the loſs of her ſight. I. 206. b. n. (17). On what condition ſhe marries the Count de Ceſy-Sancy. III. 266. a. b.

Morgues (Matthew de) what opinion a fine wit had of him. IV. 257. b. Was very unfit to write the Hiſtory of Cardinal Richelieu. 258. a. b.

Morhoff, his words are not rightly underſtood in an extract that is given of his book. IV. 795. b.

Morgard (Leon) an Almanack-maker, condemned to the Gallies on account of his predictions. III. 955. b.

Mornac: the leaps of Mornac. I. 709. b.

Mornai (Du Pleſſis) cited. II. 594. b. Refutes in a ſolid manner the anſwer of Coëffeteau, in relation to Gregory VII. III. 232. a. His letter to Montagne. IV. 338. b. Cruelly uſed in a ſatire. V. 93. a. The wrong which d'Aubigny does him 733.

Morocco (the King of) admires a petition which was preſented to him by the Ambaſſador of the United Provinces. III. 171. a. Shews himſelf particularly well pleaſed with the preſent which Erpenius ſent him. ibid.

Mortemar, ſee Rochechouart.

Morus (Alexander) a witty ſaying of that Miniſter's. II. 520. b. n. (30). A paſſage of his againſt the Univerſaliſts, and particularly Amyraldus and Spanhemius. V. 822, 823. Quoted. 786. n. (i).

Moſchus, whether he was the inventer of atoms. III. 788. a.

Moſcovy (the Czar of) in what manner the choice of the maid, whom he is to marry, is made. III. 117. b.

Moſes, what the Poets have feigned of a great many rods, was all borrowed from the Hiſtory of his rod. I. 5. a. Accuſed of overthrowing the religion of nature. 96. a. What wood he made uſe of to ſweeten the bitter waters. 105. a. Some aſſert that he was maſter of the profoundeſt ſecrets of Chymiſtry. 2. a. It is ridiculous to penetrate beyond the deluge, without the aſſiſtance of this Hiſtorian. II. 854. b. A parallel betwixt him and Hercules. III. 432. b. In what manner his mother was choſen to be his nurſe, by the daughter of Pharaoh. IV. 133. a. Stories which ſome Egyptian Hiſtorians relate of him. 679. According to Machiavel, in order to give force to his laws, he was obliged to put to death a vaſt number of men, who oppoſed him in it. V. 73. b. n. †.

Mothe le Vayer. See Vayer.

Mother, one who hindered her ſon and her daughter-in-law, from performing the conjugal duty. II. 382. b. 383. a. A mother, who never ſuckles, breeds the more readily. IV. 449. b.

Motion: objections againſt motion. I. 82. b. V. 608. b. 609. a. b. 610. a. b. 613. a. b. To which Ariſtotle makes an inſufficient anſwer. 610. a. b. Cannot be produced but by creation. I. 304. b. 305. a. If God was not the firſt and the only principle of it, there would be no need for ſuppoſing that his interpoſition was neceſſary in the conſtruction of the world. IV. 436. a. b. 437. a. b. 438. a. b. 439. a. b. Reflexion upon the conſequences of its eternity, or of its beginning, with reſpect to the exiſtence of God. V. 594. a. Whether its eternity be the only thing that can prove the exiſtence of a mover diſtinct from matter. ibid. a. b. 595. a. b. There has not been a right definition of it as yet. 610. a. b. Reflexions upon the incomprehenſibility of motion. 614. a. b. A proof from the impoſſibility of a vacuum, that there is no real motion. 617. a. b.

Motive: thoſe who deſpiſe riches are more commendable than thoſe who are covetous, tho' they act from the ſame motive. I. 460. a. b. Motives ſingular and refined againſt giving charities. II. 110. a. b. 112. a. b.

Motte-Aigron declares that he could not endure to have his books made for him. I. 624. b. Elogy of this author. IV. 279. a. b.

Moulin (Peter du) his conference with Cayet. II. 244. b. 245. a.

Moulin (Peter du), the ſon, cited. V. 426. a. n. (72).

Moulin (Lewis du) what he affirmed concerning the Hiſtory of Camden. II. 280. b. 281. a. Cauſes a letter of Dury's, to Peter du Moulin his father, to be printed. 732.

Mountain dug quite through, by the orders of Francis I, to open a paſſage into Italy. III. 97. b. 98. a. b. Mount Genevre more convenient. 98. a.

Mufti the fate of the Sultans depends upon him. IV. 425. b. 426. a. b.

Mugwort, whence that herb had the name of Artemiſia. I. 523. a.

Mules which were not barren. II. 302. A mule kept by the Athenians at the public expence. III. 701. b.

Mulhuſinus, a Jeſuit, inſults David Paræus. II. 173. b. n. (14).

Mulieres non eſſe homines, a diſſertation which raiſes a terrible outcry. I. 88. and b. 89. a. b.

Mulius killed by Neſtor. IV. 585.

Munckerus (Philip) publiſhes a Poem of Marcus Muſurus. IV. 295. a.

Mundus alter & idem, an allegorical book of Joſeph Hall's: the Court of Rome is not ſpared in it. III. 345. a. b. Mr Naudé's opinion concerning it. ibid. b.

Munitus, his birth, and by whom he was brought up. I. 52. and a. b. Is made known to his father. ibid. a. His death. ibid. b.

Munſter: facts relating to the peace of Munſter. II. 472. a. b. Its Canons pique themſelves upon their nobility, and ſkill in war. V. 13. a. A ſchool founded in that city about the end of the XVth century. II. 242. A ſchool and library eſtabliſhed in that city. III. 724. This ſchool ſerves Germany as a nurſery of literature. ibid.

Munus Adventitium, what that book contains. IV. 122. a. b.

Munuza, a Mooriſh General, revolts againſt the Saracens, who had truſted Cerdagne to him. II. 850. Is reduced to the neceſſity of killing himſelf. I. 14.

Muretus makes Scaliger believe that a copy of verſes, which he had compoſed himſelf, were compoſed by Trabeas. V. 394. a. b. 395. a. His invective againſt Sueton. 264. b. 265. a. A trick which he puts upon Scaliger. 394. a. b. 395. a. b. 396. a. b. His funeral oration by Bencius, who was his ſcholar. I. 747. b. Dedicates his Latin verſion of Ariſtotle's Rhetoric to Bencius. ibid.

Murtola, how he revenged himſelf upon the Chevalier Marini, for a ſatire which he wrote againſt him. III. 464. b.

Muſceus (John) a Lutheran profeſſor, why he took upon him to refute an Atheiſt. III. 671. a. b.

Muſarium, the anſwer which Lucian puts into the mouth of that Courtezan. I. 54. b. 55. a.

Muſcovites, their courage enervated by the Germans and Livonians. II. 42. b.

Muſculus his books are no longer read by any body. II. 286. b.

Muſes ſometimes procure large penſions for thoſe who engage in their ſervice. I. 329. b. 330. a. The men of learning in the city of Alexandria met in their temple. 534. b. The ſervice of the Muſes is in many things like the ſervice of the ladies. II. 620. a. Ought to inſpire their votaries with a true generoſity. III. 340. a. Great warriors and the Muſes ſtand in need of one another. 434. a. b. To whom they owe their birth. 652. a. Let out for hire. V. 148. a. b. 751, 752. Naturally tatlers, but moſt of all ſo in adverſity. IV. 449.

Muſhrooms: four perſons die by eating muſhrooms. II. 868. b.

Muſic, who it was that invented its ſix notes. I. 433. And from whence they were taken. ibid. Its ſurprizing effects. III. 197. a. b. The paſſion which Nero had for it. V. 466. a. b. Rinuccini, or Caveleri, looked upon as the inventers of Theatrical pieces ſet to muſic. IV. 878. and a. b. 879. and a.

Muſicians, what a Muſician ſaid one day to Philip. I. 448. b. Are lucky fellows. IV. 398. b.

Muſſo was called the Chryſoſtome of the Italians. IV. 290. b. Looked upon as the right arm of the Council of Trent. ibid. 291. a. b.

Muſtapha, Emperor of the Turks, how raiſed to the throne. IV. 425. a. b. And why depoſed. ibid. b. and 426. a. b.

N.

N*Aerden* ſacked by the Spaniards. III. 498.

Nagelius, a viſionary who foretold ſurprizing revolutions. V. 237. a. b.

Naked: there have been Solitaries who went naked. I. 112. a. Why the impudence of going naked is ſo often put in practice again among Chriſtians. V. 415. a.

Nakedneſs: opinion of ſome Solitaries about nakedneſs. I. 112. a. A ſort of nakedneſs of ſome women. II. 593. a. 645. a. A horror for nakedneſs even in a picture, inſtilled into the female ſex by all civilized nations. III. 963. b. 964. a. The curioſity of women to view nakedneſs in the original. 964. a. Scandalous cuſtoms with reſpect to nakedneſs. V. 129. b. 130. a. b.

Name: what Altingius ſays of the name Tetragramma. I. 244. b. 245. a.

Names: the Kings of certain countries affected all to take the ſame name. I. 40. a. The leaſt miſtake in proper names, is enough to lead the reader into an error. 108. a. The ſmalleſt change of the letters in proper names, multiplies writers without reaſon. III. 534. Milantia ſaid, that if names were to be ſold, the fineſt ought to be bought. I. 325. Names untractable with reſpect to rhiming. 620. a. b. Unfit for Poetry. II. 866. a. b. A plain name may prejudice an author. I. 622. a. b. A name changed through vanity. II. 367. a. b. The cuſtom which people formerly had of taking a name to themſelves. I. 170. a. b. 171. a. And of changing it. ibid. and IV. 477. There are ſome names which ought to be changed. III. 202. b. 203. a. b. And there are ſome which ſeem to have an influence upon the manners of the perſons that bear them. 604. b. Prohibition of changing names. IV. 853. b. 854. a. b. Ought to be made uſe of in a free manner, according to the Stoics. 706. b. The French authors diſfigure proper names. III. 722. a. b. 723. a.

Nangis (William de) inſerts all the chronicle of Sigebert into his own. IV. 728. b. 729. a. b.

Nani (Chevalier) judges of the manners of the Hollanders, by the manners of the Italians. III. 821. a. b. 822. a.

Nannius (Peter) Juſtus Velſius gives lectures for him in the college of the three languages at Louvain. V. 450.

Nantes (edict of), who it was that drew it up. II. 433. and b. What Cardinal Mazarin ſaid concerning this edict. I. 264. b. See Edict.

Napkin wore about the left arm, was the ſignal taken by the maſſacrers at St Bartholomew. IV. 682. a.

Naples (Joan II, of that name, Queen of), by what ſervices people obtained great employments from her. II. 312. How ſhe diſcovered her paſſion one day. ibid. a.

Naples, (Ladiſlaus, King of) dies of poiſon which he received in the boſom of pleaſure. IV. 308. a.

Naples, who firſt began to practiſe Printing there. IV. 71. a. An attempt to ſet up the Inquiſition there occaſions troubles. 387. a. b. What was called the Portico there. 466. b. 467. a. Fables concerning that city. V. 489. a. b. 490. a. b. Some Libertines have appeared there. IV. 719. a. b.

Narni (Father), who is the author of the tranſlation of his ſermons. II. 90. and a.

Naſſau (Maurice of) had great ſkill in Mathematics. V. 236.

Nations, there are ſome that one would take for brute beaſts. I. 177. b. Their boundaries have been often altered. 537. Free nations are eaſily accuſtomed to ſlavery, provided it have not that name. II. 420. a. In what all nations are alike. III. 172. b.

Natural Philoſophers did not admit of an intelligent Being for the firſt mover before Anaxagoras. I. 301. b. 302. a. b. 303. a. The reaſon of it. 302. b. 303. a.

Natural Philoſophy, it would be ridiculous to pretend to confute, from the principles thereof, the fables of Antiquity. I. 76. a. An event which is explained thereby cannot be the preſage of a future contingent. IV. 565. a. b. See Phyſics.

Nature obſerves no laws. I. 313. b. Where ſhe ſtrongly inclines to any one thing, the Monk's habit never cures a man of it. 345. b. Corrupt nature, when ſhe cannot plunge men into pleaſures, frequently makes it up by other faults. III. 223. a. The effects of nature cannot be preſages of future contingents, unleſs they be appointed for that end by a particular intelligent Being. IV. 565. a. b. 566. a. b. Her ſecrets are impenetrable. 653. b. She ought not to be forced by ſtudy. III. 342. a.

Navagiero, or Nangier, dies of the ſpotted fever at Blois. IV. 316. He follows Bartholomew d'Alviano to the wars, and makes his Funeral Oration. 315.

Navailles (the Duke of), his behaviour to the Deputies of the Imperial towns of Alſace. III. 717. a. b.

Navarre (the King of) had law-ſuits and a Council in three of the Parliaments of France. III. 37. b. See Henry IV.

Navarre (Margaret, Queen of), how far her novels are to be condemned. V. 837.

Navarre (Jane, Queen of) calumniated and ill defended. II. 224. a. b. 225. a.

Navarre (Margaret, Queen of), ſpouſe to Henry IV, charms the Embaſſadors of Poland with her beauty. IV. 40. b. Loved Mathematics. V. 297. a. See Margaret.

Navarre opens a way through a mountain for the French army to paſs into Italy. III. 98. a. b.

Naudé, it does not appear that he ever believed the tales of Sorcerers and Magicians. II. 243. b. Quoted. 432. b. V. 755. n. (w w). What he relates touching the exaltation of Pope Hadrian VI. III. 324. b. Cenſured on the head of Alexander's deification. IV. 405. b. 406. a. Who was his favourite author. 465. He cenſures highly the conduct of Savonarola. V. 60. b. 61. a. b.

Navicula ſtultarum mulierum: a book improperly aſcribed to Badius by Valerius Andreas. I. 602. b.

Navis Narragoniæ or Stultorum of Sebaſtian Brandt. I. 602. b.

Nazianzen (Gregory of), the opinion which he entertains of Councils. IV. 348. a. See Gregory.

Nearchus, tyrant of Elea; the different ſentiments of authors touching what happened to him with Zeno. V. 606. a. b. 607. a. b.

Necklace fatal to all that wore it. II. 257. a. b. By whom it was made, and of what matter. ibid. a. The fatal effects of that which Menelaus conſecrated in the temple of Delphos. III. 372. b. 373. a.

Nectanebus, when driven out of his kingdom. IV. 404. a.

Nemean Games were games inſtituted in honour in Archemorus. I. 446.

Nemeſis, why called Adraſtea. I. 118. and b.

Nemours (the Duke of), a Prince of an admirable talent to win men over to his ſide. I. 710. b. He leaves France, and for what reaſon. III. 141. Is recalled and ſerves againſt thoſe of the Reformed Religion. ibid. In what manner he was rewarded for it by the court of Rome. ibid.

Nepenthes, what it was. III. 373. a. b. 374. a.

Nephelococugie, or The Cloud of Cuckolds, a comedy wrote by Father le Loyer, where there are abundance of coarſe expreſſions. III. 882. a. 883. b. It is full of invention and ſpirit. ibid. a.

Nepos, what it ſignifies in good Latin. I. 632. b. III. 194. a. It may have the ſame ſignification in Italian as in good Latin. 258. b.

Nepotiſm; there are times when the greater and the leſſer Nepotiſm are not both in vogue at once. I. 343. When it gathered all its force. IV. 430. a. b.

Nero, ſeveral perſons have falſely taken that name. I. 513. a. b. The laſt dying words of thoſe whom that Prince had put to death, by whom compoſed. III. 9. a. b. He did not himſelf compoſe the Funeral Oration of Claudius, which he recited. 317. a. For what reaſon wiſe men connived at his diſorders. IV. 398. b. Whether the four verſes, beginning with Torva Mimalloneis, are of his compoſition. 596. a. b. 597. a. b. His paſſion for Muſic. V. 466. a. b. He bore libels ſomewhat patiently. 745, 746.

Nerva, his reign worſe than that of Domitian, and for what reaſon. III. 109. a. A very ſolid apophthegm of which he made a good uſe. ibid. He dies a little after he had adopted Trajan, Pliny's reflexion upon that head. 431. b. n. (67).

Neſtor, what the ſize of his cup was. III. 205. b. 206. a. He kills Mulius. IV. 585.

Neſtorianiſm, the Sieur de Moni believes that it is only a verbal Hereſy. I. 105. a. b. IV. 356. a.

Nevenar (the Count of), the pleaſant manner in which he obliged the ſuperior of a convent to give him ſatisfaction. III. 473. a. b.

Nevers (the Duke of) is reproached with affecting to ſignalize himſelf at the King his maſter's coſt. III. 398. b. Who was the firſt Duke of Nevers. 518. a.

Neuſville (la) affirms that Grotius had begun to mold his work anew in Holland. III. 248. b.

Neuſville; Marot was page to one Nicolas de Neuſville. IV. 162. b. He dedicates the temple of Cupid to him. ibid.

Neuhauſel yielded to the Turks by a treaty. III. 793. a. b.

Neuilly (Stephen de), after being poſſeſſed of the Preſident de la Place's office, ſtrives in vain to hinder his being reſtored to it again. IV. 682. a. Made Preſident au Mortier by the Duke of Mayenne. ibid.

Neutrality; the inconveniences that attend it during the civil wars either of church or ſtate. II. 799. b. The Imperial towns of Alſace cannot obſerve it. III. 717. b. 718. a. It does not not hinder an Hiſtorian's favouring one party more than another. II. 310. a. b. 311. a. b. 312. a. b.

New Abſalom, &c. to whom that libel is aſcribed. V. 731. a. b.

Newburg, what motives induced a Prince of that family to change his religion. IV. 854. a. b.

News; a falſe piece of news, believed for three days, is capable of deſtroying a ſtate, or of ſaving it. II. 216. b. V. 749. a. b. There are people who know all the news of a town, except what diſhonours their own family. III. 381. b. 382. a. Compared to the bidding at an auction. 414. a. It is a vice to know too much news. V. 820.

News-writers are not to be credited. I. 15. b. IV. 51. a. 179. b. Do not ſtand in need of being exhorted to acknowledge the goodneſs of God. III. 3. a. Magnify things. IV. 536. b. V. 493. b. Ought to remember a ſentence of Agathon. I. 127. a. Carry on a kind of war with their Arma Anſerina. V. 750. a. b. The artifice they make uſe of to inſpire people with a pleaſing credulity. III. 718.

718. b. 719. a. b. 720. a. The perplexities into which their inſincerity throws them. 719. a. b. The ſiege of important places will always be a troubleſome rock for them. 719. b. 720. a. b. 721. a. b. Their prepoſſeſſion and partiality. IV. 737. b.

Nicarete, a Courtezan; illuſtrious for her birth and learning. V. 239. a.

Nice; the moderation of the Council of Nice, with reſpect to Arius. I. 475. a.

Nicephorus is a fabulous and injudicious writer. III. 572. b.

Nicias, the fright he was in on account of an eclipſe of the moon. IV. 566. a.

Nicodemites do ſometimes more harm than an open enemy. II. 48. b.

Nicolas, Biſhop of Mirra, gives Arius a box on the ear in the Council of Nice. II. a. n. (15).

Nicolas Tollentin, the particular devotion which Philip de Bergamo had for him. I. 769.

Nicolle makes uſe of all the ſame objections as the meaneſt miſſionaries. III. 945. a. Why he only anſwered one part of a book of Mr Jurieu. IV. 535. a. b. His objections lead to Pyrrhoniſm. ibid. It is not true that the author has blackened him as having wrote certain doctrines which he did not believe. V. 804.

Niem (Thierry de), what he adds to the ſtory of Pope Joan. IV. 729.

Niger (Peſcennius), what he ſaid to an Orator who preſented himſelf before him to ſpeak a panegyric in his praiſe. III. 335. a.

Nymphs, there were ſome that ſurpaſſed for length of life all other mortal natures. III. 348. b. 349. a. b.

Ninus, which was the laſt of his victories. V. 630. a.

Niphates, a mountain where Saturn took refuge, and from whence he was thrown into Tartarus. II. 82. b. Jupiter orders it to be called Caucaſus, in honour of a ſhepherd of that name whom Saturn had killed there. ibid.

Niphus was of a very amorous complexion. I. 399. b. Is cenſured for the want of judgment. ibid. And for contradicting himſelf. ibid. He writes againſt Pomponatius. IV. 715. a.

Niſmes, the Synod of that place gives all manner of explications to the Church of Zurich. II. 196.

Noah, by what means he could know that it was Cham who had diſcovered his nakedneſs. II. 431. b. What was the injury which he received from Cham, according to Mr Vonder Hardt. 432. b.

Nobilis Familia, how theſe words are to be underſtood in Latin elogies. I. 250. a.

Nobilis and Plebeius were not inconſiſtent words in antient Rome. III. 490. a.

Nobility, an invective againſt thoſe who value themſelves upon it. I. 360. b. It is generally more eaſy to prove that of the father, than that of the grandfather or great grandfather. 750. a. An oration of Philo, on true nobility, tranſlated by Daniel d'Auge. 562. a.

Noble (le) confounds all in his romance of Zulima, or Pure Love. III. 166. b. 167. a. b.

Noble families generally give chimerical accounts of their firſt founders. IV. 888. a. b.

Noel le Compte blamed. I. 402. b.

Noyon, the Canons of that place make a ſolemn proceſſion to thank GOD for Calvin's death. I. 783. b. n. (8). II. 265. a.

Nonnus, the Hiſtory of the Adultereſs, which was wanting in his Paraphraſe, has been ſupplied by Father Abram. I. 47. a.

Nonnus or Nonnes (Duard), particulars touching that man. V. 319. b.

Non-toleration, in affairs of religion, the Lutherans exerciſed it againſt Altingius. I. 240. b. 241. a. The advantage that accrues from it is ſmall, in compariſon of the evils which it produces. 789. a. b. Condemned. III. 675. a. 676. a. b. 677. a. b. In what caſe it ought to be allowed. IV. 522. a. b. &c.

Non-toleration (the Advocates for), the inconveniences which they expoſe themſelves to. I. 13. b. 14. a. b. They reſemble Cæſar, who could bear no maſter, and then Pompey, who could ſuffer no partner. ibid. a. They would have been very glad that JESUS CHRIST had allowed them to follow Elijah's example as a precedent. II. 750. a. b. Their unjuſt extravagancy. IV. 337. a. See Laws (Penal) in matters of conſcience. Being reduced to a non-plus, they have recourſe to unfair means, in order to render their adverſaries odious. V. 28. a. b. Their principle overthrows all the rules of natural equity. III. 238. a.

Noradin, his daughter falls in love with a Prince of Weſtphalia, makes her eſcape with him, and becomes his ſecond wife. III. 166. b.

Norden, why its ſchool was ſurpaſſed by that of Leer. II. 768.

Notables aſſembled at Fontainbleau. IV. 138.

Notary; in the XIVth century a Notary's place was not reckoned unfit for a gentleman. III. 747.

Notes, or Scholia, added to a book in order to confute it. II. 749. a.

Not long ſince, we ought never to make uſe of that phraſe, without ſetting down the year in which we thus expreſs ourſelves. IV. 165. b.

Novara (John of), General of the Auguſtins. I. 769. b.

Novella, why John Andreas calls one of his Commentaries by that name. I. 325. a.

Novella, daughter to a Profeſſor of Civil-Law read lectures for her father. I. 325. a. She hid her face while ſhe was in the chair. ibid. Which may occaſion a diverting problem. ibid.

Novelties: as Princes are diſpoſed, they rarely embrace the ſame novelties, when they hate one another. V. 652.

Novice: what a novice ſaid one day to Charles V. II. 438. b.

Nȣ̃ς, why Anaxagoras was ſo called. I. 297. b. 298. a.

Numa Pompilius forbad all leud women to enter into the temple of Juno. III. 639. b. Reſtrained maids to the decency of their ſex better than Lycurgus. 962. b. Whether he introduced the community of women. 965. a. He would not have the Deity to be repreſented by any images. IV. 675. a.

Number (Golden), who is the author of that cycle. III. 254. a.

Numenius ſays that Arceſilas fixed himſelf in the Pyrrhonian inconſtancy. I. 408. a. And abuſes him very much. ibid. He has nevertheleſs ſaid very advantageous things of him. 412. b.

Nuns, whoſe diſorders Pope Sixtus IV endeavoured to correct. II. 97. a. For what ſum they obtained abſolution from fornication. I. 628. a. The direction of Nuns by Monks is held in abhorrence at Rome, for reaſons which experience ſufficiently evince. 785. a. Monks who maintain that the Pope cannot give the direction of Nuns to any but Monks of the ſame order. ibid. b. A Biſhop was obliged to nip their dugs in order to examine their virginity. III. 344. b. 345. a. The ſingular anſwer of a Nun to the Biſhop of Belley, and his reply. I. 738. b.

Nuns, whethey they may be allowed to hear a lecture of Anatomy, on thoſe parts which ſerve for generation. I. 109. a. They ought to be divided into two claſſes according to ſome Fathers. III. 61. b. What condition thoſe who have had to do with Nuns are in after their death. IV. 125. a.

O.

O*AK of Mamre*, what has been ſaid of it. I. 46. b.

Oaths, one of a ſingular form. I. 70. b. Whether the oaths of dying perſons ought to be taken for proofs. II. 55. b. 57. b. They ought to be made without equivocations. 871. b. 872. a. The Magiſtrates of Athens exempt Xenocrates from an oath. V. 570. a. An author who had ſworn never to have any thing to do with Bookſellers, breaks his oath, and compares himſelf in this to women in the pains of child-birth. II. 82. a. b.

Obedience; how perſons may be ſaved in two diſtinct kinds of obedience. I. 179. a. b.

Obedience (Paſſive) ſtrongly defended. I. 264. b. 265. a.

Objections, it were to be wiſhed that we had a general rule to diſtinguiſh thoſe which proceed only from fleſh and blood. I. 708. b. Complaints were made that Bellarmin propoſed thoſe of the Heretics better than he confuted them. 730. b. The anſwers of a Divine cannot be ſo clear as the objections of a Philoſopher. II. 456. b. An objection founded upon very diſtinct notions remains alike victorious, whether no anſwer is made to it, or ſuch an anſwer as no body can underſtand. V. 815.

of

Obliged; there are few men who can love thoſe to whom they are too much obliged. IV. 22. b.

Obſcenities, whether it be not allowable to relate them. II. 684. a. b. 685. a. V. 132. b. 133. a. b. 264. b. &c. An apology for thoſe which are to be found in ſome parts of this Dictionary. III. 460. a. b. IV. 803. b. 804. a. b. 805. a. b. 806. a. b. Neceſſity obliges a man to ſpeak of them ſometimes, but decency requires him to ſpeak of them with circumſpection. III. 135. b. 136. a. b. The Fathers of the Church have related thoſe of the antient Heretics. ibid. The greateſt part of the Poets ſucceed beſt when they turn their Poetry this way. IV. 156. b. Obſcenities writ by a wiſe and virtuous Queen. 322. a. b. A preſervative againſt thoſe of the antient Poets. V. 99. b. La Mothe le Vayer makes an apology for thoſe which he had diffuſed through his works. 420. a. b. &c. Accords is reproached with them, and juſtifies himſelf. I. 65. a. b. Groſs obſcenities are leſs dangerous than ſuch as are delicate. ibid. b. V. 845. to 848. Give one a diſguſt at the pleaſure with women. I. 65. b. Garaſſe cenſured for quoting them, and how he defended himſelf. III. 135. b. 136. a. b. There are obſcenities in the Examen des Eſprits of John Huarte, and in the tranſlation which Chappius has made of it. 528. Naudé endeavours to excuſe thoſe of Niphus. IV. 380. a. b. The boundleſs liberty which many authors have taken in this reſpect. ibid. An explanation touching thoſe made uſe of by the author. V. 837. to 858. The different ways they are made uſe of in books. 837. General remarks on thoſe which are to be met with in books. ibid. and 838. &c. Obſcene writings do not diſtinguiſh between honeſt and diſhoneſt men. 838. Honeſt authors who have writ of ſuch. 807. 837. 839. Two parties with reſpect to theſe authors. 838. Remarks upon thoſe which are to be found in this Dictionary. 840, 841. &c. What method the Inquiſition uſes in proſecutions, where obſcenities have a place. 848. a. b. It is impoſſible to exclude them abſolutely. 850. Examples of thoſe which are in the Bible. 851. and a. b. &c. And in profane Hiſtorians. 852, 853. And in the Fathers of the Church. ibid. Whether they ſhock modeſty the leſs for being writ in Latin. 854, 855. The author's apology is to be found in divers parts of his work immediately after thoſe which he relates. 858. Whether our modern Poets are leſs guilty this way than the antient Poets were. 388. a. b.

Obſequens (Julius), a prodigy which he relates. V. 269. a. b.

Obſtinate men, what is their fate when they fall into groſs miſtakes. IV. 80. b.

Ocean (Northern), who was the firſt Roman General that embarked upon it. II. 715.

Ochin: ſome of his books tranſlated by John Poinet. IV. 693.

Ocriſia; how ſhe was got with child, and of whom ſhe was brought to bed. V. 288. a.

Octavius ſwears that he had not conſummated his marriage with Fulvia's daughter. III. 112. a.

Octavius of Minutius Felix; that book has been aſcribed to Arnobius. I. 502. a.

Odes; a law-ſuit carried on about ſome odes that were ſtolen. IV. 895. a.

Odium Theologicum: that paſſion finds Hereſies wherever it pleaſes. I. 605. b. One of its moſt cunning touches. 644. b.

Oecolampadius, his advice to Farel. III. 10. a. b. He did not trouble himſelf about the honour that is to be gained by the public exerciſes in univerſities. IV. 400.

Oenomaus reproaches Apollo for acknowledging Archilochus as a ſon of the Muſes. I. 427. a.

Officers: hiſtory of the great officers of the kingdom of France by John le Feron. III. 27. a.

Offices; merit, credit, power, are often great obſtacles in a man's way to them. I. 354. a. b. 733. a. b. II. 436. a. It is better to renounce them, than to obtain and exerciſe them at the expence of one's conſcience. I. 224. a. b. 540. a. 587. a. The mercenary ſpirit of thoſe who poſſeſs them. III. 339. b. 340. a. b. 341. a. b.

Ogier (the Prior) cenſures Father Garaſſe. I. 798. a. II. 190. a. b. One of his funeral orations quoted. IV. 40. b.

Ogier (Charles) what he ſays about the incontinence of the people of the North. II. 821. b. The relation of his voyage to Denmark and Sweden is curious. V. 503. b. That relation quoted. IV. 247. a. b. 928. a. n. (1).

Old age; there are few people who find it ſo agreeable as Eraſmus did. II. 814. a. It finds comfort in reading. IV. 630. a. b. Some of the inconveniencies that attend it. V. 147. b. 148. a.

Old men never incline to die. I. 121. b. 122. a. Marry as much for the benefit of their neighbours as for their own. II. 618. b. Their bed is contagious to a young woman. III. 869. a. The imprudence of thoſe who marry. IV. 88. a. b. A law which ordered them to be thrown headlong from a precipice. V. 347.

Older: few people like to be accounted older than they are. V. 333. b.

Olympias, what ſhe ſaid to a pretty lady that Philip was in love with. I. 392. b.

Oliva, a treaty of peace carried on there. III. 901.

Olivarez (the Duke d') favours the amours of Philip IV. I. 589. b. Compared with the Cardinal de Richelieu. V. 373. b.

Olive-tree: how and upon what occaſion Minerva produced an olive-tree. I. 445.

Olivier, Chancellor of France, ſaid that the French reſembled apes. III. 515. a. A funeral oration on that Chancellor by Daniel d'Auge. I. 562. a.

Olivier (Antony) Biſhop of Lombés, brother to the Chancellor. I. 562.

Olonne (Madam d') her amours afforded matter to the authors of the XVIIth century. IV. 202. b.

Omiſſions; there are ſome which are unpardonable crimes in an Hiſtorian. II. 759. b. Pure omiſſion, ſeveral Philoſophers maintain that it is never free. V. 372. b.

On, why certain French writers generally denote themſelves by that word. IV. 492. a. b.

Oneſicritus was much eſteemed by Alexander, followed him in his wars, and had great poſts beſtowed upon him. II. 669. b.

Opera; the firſt eſſay of Opera's. II. 557. b. Who was the firſt author of them. V. 269. a. b. In the XVth and XVIth centuries the Opera's were the pſalms and the proſe devotions of the Church. II. 481. b. Rinuccini, or Caveleri, looked upon as the inventers of them. IV. 878. and a. b. 879. and a.

Opiniators, what ſort of people they are. IV. 362. b. 363. a.

Opinions, their diverſity very often occaſioned by miſtakes. I. 284. a. b. It is by opinion alone that we judge of all things in this world. III. 57. b. The infatuation of men, in favour of the opinions commonly received. II. 141. b.

Oppidum; that word is equivocal, and ſignifies ſometimes a borough, ſometimes a town. I. 747. a.

Oracles of Paganiſm, ſeveral of them were conſulted upon the ſame points. I. 132. a. And the greateſt of the gods did not preſerve his ſuperiority in this reſpect. ibid. The difference between ſoothſayers that foretold things after the manner of an Oracle, and other ſoothſayers. 276. b. Plutarch obſerves that all thoſe of Bœotia were ceaſed. ibid. 277. a. That of Amphiaraus was very much revered. 276. a. b. 277. a. Whether they ceaſed upon the planting of Chriſtianity. 281. a. Whether one ought to acknowledge any diabolical operation in them. 594. a. b. They did nothing gratis. II. 258. a. They were full of balderdaſh. III. 783. a. b. An oracle ſilenced. V. 386. Oracles that were conſulted among the Pagans. 350. b. 351. a. b.

Orations (Funeral) when and upon what occaſion the honour of them was granted to the Roman ladies by the Senate. II. 290. a.

Orange, the cruelties that were exerciſed in that town preceded the leaps of Mornac and Montbriſſon. I. 709.

I. 709. b. The horrible cruelties that were commited there, when Serbellone took it by Aſſault. V. 120. a. b.

Orange (William I, Prince of), Brantome improperly alledges the apology of that Prince with reſpect to Philip II, and his ingratitude towards his father. II. 441. a. b. Goes to Straſbourg to ſell all his plate and moveables there. V. 82. b. 83. a. Twice aſſaſſinated. II. 458. a. 459. a. n. (27). How he was treated by Richard Hall. III. 345. a. b.

Orange (Frederic Henry, Prince of) how he ſtood affected to Cardinal Richelieu. III. 821. a. The Princeſs, his wife, being diſpleaſed with Cardinal Mazarin, labours to procure a ſeparate peace with Holland. II. 153. a.

Oratory (the fathers of the) cried down at Mons and Liege. IV. 350. a. b. The founder of that order in France. I. 785.

Orators, whether they ſhould affect to paſs for learned men. I. 353. a. b. They are not much concerned whether the facts they advance be true or not. II. 166. b. 167. a. Were rare in Cappadocia. 309. b. They make no ſcruple of extenuating or amplifying things according to the intereſt of their cauſe, to which they make whatever they can ſubſervient. 343. b. 502. b. Are often guilty of falſifications. 406. b. Have great influence in cauſing a war to be begun or continued. 547. b. Are not ſubjected to ſuch narrow rules as Hiſtorians are. 548. a. An Orator who made a ſtrange pother to ſatisfy the deſire he had to harangue. III. 151. a. b. Their art depends almoſt wholly upon action. IV. 567. b. The definition of an Orator. 581. b. 863. a. They are eaſily bribed with money. III. 355. Their tongue can do a great deal of miſchief in a commonwealth. ibid. It is a kind of a miracle, when two famous Orators live together as good friends. 492. b. 493. a. b. They are always ready to declare for the party that is uppermoſt. 647. a. Thoſe who are vehement, excite ſtorms for nothing. IV. 479. a. b.

Orchomenians: two nations ſo called. IV. 626. b.

Order; it is very conſiſtent with order that ſome things ſhould be done out of order. I. 126. a.

Order of the Holy Ghoſt, who drew up the office of that order. I. 258. b.

Orders (Holy), who were thoſe that might be admitted into them according to the antient canons. III. 221. a. b.

Orders of Knighthood, a treatiſe on their origin and inſtitution by Peter de Beloy. I. 740. b.

Oreſtes, the length of his tomb and bones. I. 312. b. 313. a. The founder of the city of Adrianople, to which he gave his name. 331. a. b.

Organization, whether the general laws of motion are ſufficient for it. V. 114. b. 115. a.

Orichovius confeſſes that he had married a wife while he was a prieſt, but not that he had broke with the Church of Rome. V. 232. b. 233. a.

Origen, his opinion touching the hidden works of the Prophet Elias, rejected by St Jerome. II. 751. b. 752. a. What he anſwered to the Manichees concerning the origin of evil. IV. 112. b. 113. a. 416. a. b. 417. a. b. 418. a. b. 419. a. b. 420. a. b. 421. a. b. 422. a. Had a grain of Spinoziſm. 421. b. Whether it be proper to put him in the hands of all the world. 422. b. He and the other Fathers looked upon the queſtion concerning the origin of evil, as one of the moſt perplexing. 524. b. He choſe his proofs ill to maintain the virginity of the Mother of Jeſus Chriſt. V. 772. b. His anſwer to Celſus, who laughed at the faith of the Chriſtians. 816, 817. Nemeſius eſpouſed ſome of his errors. IV. 346.

Origeniſm; there were two ſorts of it, the one carnal and the other ſpiritual. IV. 421. a.

Original pieces, the confuſion that thoſe fall into who do not conſult them. II. 229. a. b.

Original: whatever helps to ſhew the original and progreſs of things, deſerves to be taken notice of. II. 99. b.

Orleans, the ſtrange diſorders of the prieſts that were in that dioceſe. II. 373. a. b. Who was the firſt that ſettled the German library there. III. 158.

Orleans (Lewis of France, Duke of) aſſaſſinated in Paris by his uncle the Duke of Burgundy. III. 810. a.

Orleans (Lewis d') the Advocate of the League, what he makes the Engliſh Catholics ſay. III. 521. b. 522. a.

Orleans (Father d') much more reaſonable than Sanders. II. 57. a. b. Quoted. 736. b. n. (25), (28). 737. n. (g). a. n. (31), (32). 738. n. (b), (i), (k), (l), (o), (q), (r), (s). a. b. n. (42), (43), (45). What he ſays of a late repentance. V. 556. b.

Oropus was a long time a matter of diſpute between the Athenians and the Thebans. I. 274. b. Its inhabitants were the firſt who deified Amphiaraus. 276. a. b. Pillaged by the Athenians. II. 329. b.

Orpheus torn in pieces by the women of Thrace, and for what reaſon. I. 115. a. b.

Orthodox, every orthodox perſon ought not to engage himſelf in diſputes. I. 564. a. Nothing makes a man ſo much out of conceit with being ſo, as to ſee himſelf perſecuted by other orthodox men. V. 513. a. In what ſenſe the Orthodox ſeem to admit of two firſt principles. IV. 520, 521.

Orthodoxy, the great inconveniencies to which thoſe people expoſe themſelves who make uſe of the ſecular arm to eſtabliſh it. I. 14. b. The Promoters of it are ſometimes more to be feared than Infidels. 199. a. Three things, none of which can be a mark of Orthodoxy. 287. a. Whether it be a right maxim that provided Orthodoxy triumphs, it matters not by what means, or how. II. 451. a. b. There is a Philoſophical Orthodoxy and a Theological one. 662. a. b. By what means it is preſerved againſt the attempts of Hereſy. III. 902. a. b.

Orthography, how neceſſary it is to obſerve it exactly. II. 838. and b. The antient Orthography ought to be preſerved in the firſt or following editions of old books. IV. 427. and a. b. 428. and a.

Orthography (French) Laurence Joubertus was the firſt that innovated in it. III. 582.

Oriz, one of the Pope's Penitentiaries ſent to Ferrara on purpoſe to convert the Ducheſs. III. 31. a.

Oſanna, a ſaint who is held in great veneration at Mantua. III. 32. b.

Oſiander, what he taught concerning the mediation of Jeſus Chriſt. V. 230. b. 231. a.

Oſiris, where his tomb was. I. 37. There was no Muſic employed in the ſacrifices that were offered to him. ibid. a. b. They ſacrificed all the red-haired people, that they could find to his ghoſt. II. 233.

Oſorius (Jerome) takes John Metel, his friend, and Antony Auguſtin for interlocutors in his dialogues de Gloria. IV. 200.

Oſorius writes the life of Jerome Oſorius, his uncle. IV. 426.

Oſſat (Cardinal d') prevailed with the Jeſuits to ſide with him in the affair of Martha Broſſier, who pretended to be poſſeſſed by the devil. IV. 883. a. b.

Oſtentation, few learned men keep themſelves free from it. II. 338. a. b.

Oſtraciſm, who was the inventer it. I. 73, 74. Why that puniſhment was inflicted. II. 501. b. 502. a.

Otho, the Roman Emperor, his looking-glaſs was one of the principal parts of his equipage of war. I. 392. a. Overcome by Vitellius. V. 262. a. b. The inequality of his life. 273. b. A maxim which he quoted at his death. 628. b.

Otho I, Emperor, died in the year 973. II. 90. b.

Otho III, Emperor, loved pilgrimages. II. 58. a. b.

Otho IV, Emperor, was charmed with the chaſte anſwer of a girl. III. 258. a. IV. 87. b.

Ottoman: the word Ottoman does not ſtrike the common people ſo much as that of Turk; Jurieu's artifice in the uſe he makes of theſe words. V. 803.

Ottoman Emperors, nothing can be more precarious than their authority, although it ſeems to have the ſureſt foundation. IV. 426. a. b. A hiſtory of them in medals promiſed. V. 223. n. (c).

Overcome; there are captains who know how to overcome, but not how to make uſe of their victory. II. 413. a. b. 414. a.

Ovid quoted with reſpect to Alcmena's lying-in. I. 207. b. Was a maſter Painter in the affair of love. II. 1, 2. Does not ſufficiently obſerve the rules of probability in ſpeaking of Oenone. IV. 401. a. What he ſays of Ceneus and of Hippodamia. I. 537. a. b. 538. a. Cenſured concerning Pygmalion, whom he is not careful to prevent his readers from taking for a meer ſtatuary. IV. 641. a. b.

a. b. What he ſays of the proſtitution of the women of Cyprus. ibid. b. 642. a.

Our lady of Hall and of Zichem, judgment which Joſeph Hall forms of them, as well as of their Hiſtories wrote by Lipſius. III. 846. b. 847. a. b.

Oxenſtern (Axel) made Great Chancellor of Sweden by Guſtavus Adolphus. V. 654. One of the ableſt men that ever appeared in Europe. ibid.

Oxford, who was the firſt profeſſor of Hiſtory in that univerſity. II. 283. The title of Maſter of Arts is conferred there on thoſe who have run through a courſe of ſeven years. 278. a. The foundation of its college. V. 554. b.

Oil, who invented the ſecret of making it. I. 455. a.

Oyſters ſent to Trajan into Parthia. I. 371.

P.

PAdua is obliged to ſubmit to the Republic of Venice. V. 590.

Paets, his great merit. I. 787. a. b.

Paganiſm is founded on notions of the Deity as falſe as Atheiſm. I. 132. a. The Philoſophers and not the Prieſts writ in favour of it. 255. b. Whether it be a leſs evil than Atheiſm. 382. a. Who was the cauſe of its oracles being put to ſilence. 594. a. Its prieſts feared nothing ſo much as the eyes of the incredulous and curious. ibid. and b. It preſerved a monſtrous alliance between the worſhip of the gods and the moſt filthy paſſions. 597. a. b. Was formed upon the witty conceits of ſome Poets. 65. a. b. III. 642. a. b. 652. b. 653. a. b. Nothing worſe concerted than its ſyſtem. II. 339. a. Wherein it made part of its Divine ſervice conſiſt. 531. b. Who were the Phariſees of it. 780, 781. Arnobius gives it a home thruſt. III. 647. a. The venality of its oracles. IV. 405. a. Its religious ceremonies were rather appointed to avert miſfortunes, than to draw down favours from Heaven. 572. a. Its prieſts heartily received the offerings of Courtezans. 869. a. b.

Pagans underſtood the nature of virtue thoroughly. I. 278. b. 279. a. b. What ſeveral have believed concerning the ſalvation of Pagans. 471. b. They reaſoned very inconſequentially on the reality of virtue. II. 164. b. 165. a. Their doctrine with reſpect to guardian angels. II. 249. b. 250. a. Reflexions upon their ſyſtem of a multitude of gods. ibid. a. b. They could anſwer the objections of the Manichees better than the Chriſtians. 251. a. b. IV. 519. a. b. 520. a. b. 521. a. b. The greateſt part of them lived as the Chriſtians do, who have faith without charity. II. 418. b. 419. a. b. Their diſtinction between the known and unknown gods, reſembled very much the diſtinction that was made in the ſchools of Ariſtotle, between occult and manifeſt qualities. 677. b. Their gods were ſo ridiculous, that a man might laugh at them without being an Atheiſt. 872. b. The contradiction that appeared in their conduct, with reſpect to theſe ſame deities. 873. a. They have been juſtly reproached, on account of the utmoſt villany of the greateſt of their gods. III. 130. a. They are afraid leſt Chriſtianity ſhould be publickly tolerated, and for what reaſon. 320. b. 321. a. b. One of the effects of their prepoſſeſſion. 578. a. b. 579. a. It may be ſaid to their honour, that ſeveral of them were wiſer and purer than their gods. 649. a. Thoſe who pretended to the pureſt Orthodoxy, were at bottom no better than Atheiſts. 654. a. b. They could not throw the blame upon the Poets of thoſe abominations, which were publiſhed of their gods. 653. a. b They have been more eaſy to be converted than the Turks. IV. 41. a. The notions which the antient Pagans had of the Deity, agree with ſound Theology. 572. b. The Pagans committed as great a ſin, in plundering the temple of Apollo, as the Jews would have done, in plundering the temple of Solomon. 622. b. 623. a. They can boaſt, as well as Chriſtians, of having had Kings who cured diſtempers. 664. b. 665. a. Muſt have taught the Jews the doctrine of a life to come, according to the Hypotheſis of Lucas Brugenſis. V. 8. a. b. Took advantage of thoſe paſſages of Scripture, which ſeem to aſcribe ſome imperfection to God. 13. b. Their opinion about the ſtatues of the gods. 239. b. It does not appear that they aſked the gods to forgive their ſins, when they were at the point of death. 628. b.

Page, the bold action of a page. I. 712. a.

Page (- - - le) miniſter at Dieppe, and afterwards at Rotterdam; author of the book intituled, L'Impieté des Communions forcées, dies in the year 1701. IV. 243. a. n. (2).

Pain; the diſpute between the Stoics and Peripatetics about the nature of it, a meer diſpute of words. III. 423. a. One may feel pain, without having ever felt pleaſure. IV. 514. a. b.

Painters, whoſe pictures deceived men and beaſts, are not the more excellent on that account. I. 369. a. b. V. 624. b. 625. a. b. Who made the goddeſſes like their miſtreſſes. III. 57. a.

Palace (Engliſh) a houſe near the Vatican, why ſo called. III. 322. b.

Paladins, the fables that are writ of them, have been introduced into religion. I. 166.

Palatine (the Elector) reſtored to his dominions by the treaty of Munſter. III. 247. a. Promiſes a retreat to the Socinians in the town of Manheim. 903. Cauſes the acts relating to the affair of the Landgrave of Heſſe, to be publiſhed, on account of the need in which he himſelf ſtands of them. 943. b. 944. a. b.

Palatinate, where the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of that country is to be found. I. 241. a. The revolution which happened there upon the death of Frederic III. V. 521.

Palavicin (Cardinal) a thought which he borrows from Ariſtotle. I. 126. b. 127. a. What he acknowledges with reſpect to the deciſions of the council of Trent. 704. a. A diſappointment that happens to him. II. 473. a. b. Much leſs prudent in refuting Father Paul, than Baronius, in refuting the Centuriators of Magdeburg. 643. b. He did not know that Preſident Ferrier had changed his religion. III. 38. b. Several of his maxims cenſured in the New Goſpel. 326. b. He pitied the Popes, when they had no other aſſiſtance, beſides that of the Holy Ghoſt. V. 826.

Paleſtine, ſome Monks there had abandoned the cloaths and ſentiments of men, I. 112. a. There is a mountain of gold promiſed there to the Chriſtians, when they ſhall have conquered the Turks. V. 95. a.

Palingenius (Helias) a name which John Pincier borrowed. IV. 647. a.

Palladium, by whom made, and of what materials. I. 6.

Pamphlets; ſmall Pamphlets, however good they be, are eaſily diſſipated. IV. 652. a.

Pan puniſhed by Venus, for giving the prize of beauty to another. I. 74. a. His birth. IV. 541. a. b. 542. a. Whoſe ſon he was, and how he comes to have goat's feet. ibid. b.

Panætius, a great Philoſopher of the ſect of the Stoics. III. 7.

Pancrates, the baſe complaiſance of that Poet for Hadrian, and the reward which he received for it. I. 348. a.

Pandects: firſt book of the Pandects neglected by the Doctors. I. 477. a. Contains the fineſt laws of nature, and of Moral and Civil Philoſophy. ibid.

Panegyrics, an eaſy way of compoſing one. II. 819. b. A multitude of them only ſerves to diſfigure Hiſtories. III. 708. b.

Panegyriſts; extravagant Panegyriſts do more harm than good to thoſe whom they praiſe. I. 469. a. Are too apt to make uſe of great words. 646. b. 647. a. b. Diſguiſe what is diſadvantageous to the memory of their heroes. 690. a. Thoſe who praiſed the murtherers of Kings, rewarded by the Spaniards. II. 103. a. b. Panegyriſts who praiſe wicked things, Iſocrates not one of their number. 235. a. b. The modern Panegyriſts carry their ideas farther than the Antients did. 715. a. Are very apt to contradict themſelves. IV. 495. a. Love to exceed one another. 589. a. See Encomiums. Panegyriſts are much more ingenious than the Princes whom they praiſe, in heightening every thing that may tend to their honour. IV. 608. a. We ought not to imagine that the diſcourſes of a Panegyriſt, ſhould influence either his converſation, or the Moral and Hiſtorical books he writes. V. 331. a. b.

Pangloſſia, Balzac expreſſes ſome contempt for a book which had that title. IV. 531. b.

Pannonius (Johannes), his verſes concerning the ſearch which the Popes were obliged to undergo before their election. IV. 730. b. And upon the baſtard daughter of Paul II. 510. a.

Panſophia, the author of that book, and the ſubject it treats of. II. 536, 537.

Panſtratia, a book of Chamier's, how called by the author of the Bibliotheque de Dauphiné. II. 434. a. b.

Pantaleon corrects his error with reſpect to Bibliander's death. I. 803. b.

Pantomimes, when introduced upon the ſtage. I. 676. a. Zoſimus places the introduction of the dances of the Pantomimes, among the cauſes of the deſtruction of the Roman empire. ibid. They were great provocatives to luſt. 676, 677. It was under Auguſtus that theſe dances came to perfection. IV. 646. b. How the Antients have repreſented the manual language of the Pantomimes. 647. a. b.

Papacy, how difficult it is to exerciſe it. III. 564. b.

Papebroch has ſtruck ſeveral ſaints out of the Kalendar. II. 740. a. Quoted. III. 330. a. 441. b. V. 467. a.

Papers torn in pieces and thrown into the ſea, preſerved by a very ſingular accident. II. 577. a.

Paper-wars are ſometimes violent and of a long continuance. I. 322. b.

Paphnucius converts a woman of pleaſure. V. 321. b.

Papiſts formerly joined with the Turks and Pagans in the public prayers of the Proteſtants. IV. 199. b. Their diviſions. III. 343. b. n. (30).

Pappus, Profeſſor at Straſburg, what he aſked of God for the Proteſtants of France, and for all the perſecuted churches. V. 258. a.

Paracelſus, his notion about our firſt parents. I. 103. b.

Paraclete, how that word ought to be pronounced. IV. 470. a. b. 471. a. b.

Paradiſe, the great men of Rome diſtribute the places thereof for money. II. 713. b. It is pretended that Machiavel ſaid in one of his works, that he had rather be ſent to hell after his death, than go to Paradiſe. IV. 15. b. Whether that which Mahomet promiſed, was one of the cauſes that drew ſo many followers to him. 30. b. 31. a. b. What has been ſaid concerning the occupations of Paradiſe. III. 895. a. What town was called the Paradiſe of Germany. II. 816. a.

Paradiſe of Seneca, a kind of union which may be ſo called. II. 119. a.

Paradiſe Loſt, an Engliſh Poem which is greatly eſteemed. IV. 219. a. b.

Paraſite, one that runs after a good bit. II. 469. b. 470. a. The moſt famous Paraſite of his time. IV. 246. a. b. 247. a. b. 248. a. b. 252. a. b. What is the compaſs and polar-ſtar of a Paraſite. ibid. b.

Parchment, the invention of it. IV. 555. a.

Pardaillan (Segur) undertakes a deputation to the Proteſtant Princes, and the cauſe of that deputation. II. 143. a.

Pardies (Father), why it was ſuſpected that he had no real deſign to confute Des Cartes. IV. 902. b.

Pardon; people do not ſo eaſily pardon reflecting words as injurious actions. V. 364. b. 365. a.

Parent (Francis), his Majeſty's Greek Profeſſor in the univerſity of Paris. I. 562.

Pareus (Daniel) his Medulla Hiſtoriæ Profanæ is a work of Altingius. I. 241. a. The Devil expreſſes all his malice in that author's Calvinus Orthodoxus. III. 539. a. b.

Pareus (David) inſulted by the Jeſuit Mulhuſinus. II. 173. b. n. (14).

Paris was very effeminate. III. 297. a. His judgment concerning the beauty of the three goddeſſes. 644. a. b. He grows jealous of Corythus and kills him. IV. 401. b. 402. a.

Paris, the Comedian, was killed by Domitian's orders. II. 684. a.

Paris, what is ſaid of that city in the Saint-Evremoniana. IV. 439. b. How far the corruption of it goes with reſpect to the women. 498. b. 499. a. b. & ſeq. It is nevertheleſs thought to be leſs impure than the greateſt part of the capital cities in the Weſt. 500. a. The fabulous ſiege of it by the giant Iſaurus. 738. b.

Pariſhes; every pariſh ſhould be ſummoned to produce the proofs of its devotions. IV. 556. a.

Pariſians, what judgment they paſs upon books that are compoſed by an author who never went out of his province. IV. 458. a. The ſedition which they carried on in the year 1648. 488. b.

Parliament of Paris; the order which that Parliament made againſt the Chymiſts. I. 469. b. And concerning the theſes which attacked Ariſtotle's doctrine. ibid. An act which was purloined from its records. III. 297. b. 298. a. Refuſes to regiſter the edict of January. 509. b. 510. a. 512. b. In what ſtile Charles IX harangues it. I. 256. a. III. 512. b. Severely mortified. 825. a. b. Makes a very remarkable decree with reſpect to commiſſions. IV. 241. b. Remonſtrances which it makes to Lewis XI. V. 443. a. b. A conjecture upon the reaſons which moved that Parliament to involve the Jeſuits in Chaſtel's affair. III. 279. b. 280. a. b. Its conduct juſtified in that reſpect. ibid. In what manner it treated Francis Surgier, a ſeditious preacher. V. 273. and a. b. 274. and a. b.

Parliament of Bourdeaux, Chancellor Hoſpital gives that Parliament a ſmart reprimand. III. 512. a. b.

Parliaments have too much grandeur for the trifling cauſes which are decided therein. II. 724. b. Parliaments of France, their ſtiffneſs is ſometimes prejudicial to the ſtate. III. 825. a. b. V. 443. b. Ought never to differ from the King in affairs of ſtate. 444. a. b. Whether the intereſt of the kingdom requires that they ſhould have more power than at preſent they enjoy in France. III. 512. b. 513. a. b. They have been long excluded from a ſhare in the ſovereignty. 825. b. 826. a.

Parma (the Duke of) endeavours to amuſe Queen Elizabeth with ſecret propoſals of peace. II. 662. a.

Parmenides, his opinion about the univerſe. V. 575. b. What his ſyſtem was. 587. a.

Parrhaſiana quoted. III. 248. b. n. (91), (92). An examination of what is advanced there that an Origeniſt can reduce a Manichee to ſilence, in diſcourſing upon the origin of evil. IV. 416. a. b. 421. a. b.

Parry (William) being convicted of having deſigned to kill the Queen, is puniſhed with death. II. 576. a. b.

Parthians, a piece of conduct which ſhews, that they deſerved the name of Barbarians, that the Greeks and Romans gave them. V. 273. a. Beſiege Antioch, raiſe the ſiege, and their General is killed. II. 348. Fought as they fled. III. 521. b.

Party; it is difficult to preſerve the affection and eſteem of two contrary parties. I. 538. a. b. If any one fairly repreſents all the force of the oppoſite party's arguments, he draws down reproaches upon himſelf. 730. a. b. II. 456. b. 487. b. Whether a man ought to ſet the arguments of the oppoſite party in a weak light. ibid. 488. a. b. Whether it does ſervice to a party to employ, in its defence, all ſorts of reaſons, good or bad. 708. a. Each party makes falſe ſteps which reciprocally ſerves to ballance and ſupport the other. III. 954. b. The ſame things appear to us true or falſe, according as they favour our own or the oppoſite party. IV. 733. b. 734. a. b. 735. a. b. 736. a. b. 737. a. b. A ſtrange effect of the ſpirit of party. 711. b. Party at all times determines the fate of dramatical performances. I. 867. a. b. Its ordinary artifices. 774. a. b.

Partial, oftentimes people accuſe an Hiſtorian of being partial for no other reaſon but becauſe they are remarkably ſo themſelves. II. 310. a. b.

Particles, thoſe which are termed cauſales expoſe people to great illuſions. V. 184. b.

Particular perſons are no more exempt from diviſions than communities. III. 343. b.

Particulariſm, a great diſpute raiſed on that ſubject. I. 261. a. b.

Partridge, a ſtory that is told of the partridge. II. 725. a.

Parts (James des), Nicolas Præpoſitus ſteals from his Diſpenſatory. IV. 764. and a. b. Particulars which concern him. ibid. and n. (1), (2).

Paſcal, the happy turn which he had naturally for the Mathematics. IV. 61. a. What the Abbot du Mas ſays of him. 491. a. One of his apologiſts would perhaps be puzzled by ſeveral remarks in the hiſtory of the five propoſitions. 492. a. Why, after having confeſſed himſelf in a diſtemper, he delayed communicating. 537. b. n. (24). What he eſteemed moſt in Mr Des Cartes's Philoſophy. 548. b. He deſpiſed Mathematics even before he gave himſelf up to devotion. V. 621. a.

Paſchalius quoted. I. 577. b.

Paſquier cenſured for ſeveral conſiderable blunders. I. 25. b. Did not at all underſtand a paſſage of Abelard. ibid. A quarrel that was commenced with him. 670. a. b. Quoted. 792. b. n. (58). III. 399. b. n. (52), (53). 411. a. n. (82), (83), (84), (85), (86). V. 405. a. b. n. (a), (1), (2). 443. b. n. (4), (5), (6). Cenſured for the manner after which he tries to excuſe Dante, with reſpect to the word Butcher. II. 296. b. He does not reaſon juſtly in the application he makes of a general theſis to Pyrrhus and Cæſar, to Pope Leo and Pope Nicolas. 414. a. His ſons revenge his quarrel on a Jeſuit who had traduced him. III. 132. b. 133. a. His judgment concerning thoſe who have writ upon the Civil-Law. 201. b. He ridicules a man who was ſoon after canonized. 896. b. What account he gives of the Jeſuits. 897. b. Is guilty of an anachroniſm which is cenſured by Garaſſe, and but ill defended by his ſons. 908. b. 909. a. A paſſage of his plea againſt the Jeſuits confuted. IV. 80. a. b. 81. a. b. 82. a. Cenſured by Garaſſe with reſpect to the word Paraclete. 470. b. 471. a. b. What he ſays of clandeſtine marriages, and of rapes. 636. a. b. 637. a. b. What he anſwers in defence of Mercerus who was accuſed of being a caballing man. 842. b. He diſapproves of Tabourot's making additions to his Miſcellany. I. 64. a. b. The judgment which he paſſes on le Feron's books of Heraldry. III. 27. a. b.

Paſſage: a remarkable paſſage left out in a ſecond edition, but preſerved by Uſher. II. 94. a. b. The fate of paſſages which people copy from the firſt modern writer that comes in their way. 334. b. A curious paſſage of a manuſcript left out in the printed edition. 633. a. b. One ought to diſtruſt ſuch as are cited by halves. V. 350. a.

Paſſaw (the treaty of) gave full liberty of conſcience to all the States of the empire. V. 672.

Paſſelaigne (John de), Biſhop of Belley: Lewis XIII grants him the antient privileges of his dioceſe. I. 737.

Paſſer, what the Paſſer of Catullus ſignifies in Martial. II. 396. a.

Paſſeratius, what he ſays againſt a certain faction of Grammarian Antiquarians. IV. 830. b. And againſt thoſe who contemned Ovid. 432. b. 433. a.

Paſſions reſemble animals which ſeek their food. II. 3. a. Cover themſelves with a ſpecious pretext. 30. a. b. Whoever deſigns to cure them muſt take a proper time for it. 564. b. Their firſt motions are not voluntary. 676. a. Their uſefulneſs after ſin. 855. a. b. They make us ſuppreſs circumſtances which we do not like. III. 304. a. The greateſt part of them, as well as their effects, are involuntary, and reaſon is too weak to deſtroy them. 376. a. IV. 440. b. 441. a. b. 442. a. b. 857. b. There is almoſt as much neceſſity for being above the paſſions to come to the knowledge of ſome kind of truths, as to act virtuouſly. 323. b. If they were once rooted up people would find no difficulty in the practice of virtue. 441. a. b. 442. a. b. Beaſts are not capable of them, according to the opinion of the Stoics. 552. b. 553. a. b. 554. a. b.

Paſtor Fido has produced bad effects. III. 259. b. 260. a. b. 261. a.

Paſtorals (Tragi-Comic), pieces invented contrary to the rules of antient Poetry. III. 259. a.

Paſtorals, a romance upon the amours of Daphnis and Chloe, what are the faults of it. III. 866. a. b.

Paſtors, wicked Paſtors abuſe their authority to bring about their own ends. III. 772. b. Good Chriſtians are perſuaded that they ought to hide their faults. V. 648. a. See Miniſters.

Paſtoureaux, the name of certain Fanatics; people did not at firſt diſcover their pernicious errors. II. 383. a. The moſt judicious reflexion of an Hiſtorian, upon that head. ibid.

Patience; examples of an extraordinary patience. I. 559. a. II. 674. a. IV. 487. b. 488. a. A patience which went beyond the neceſſary bounds. I. 734. b. 735. a. b.

Patin (Guy) his Cynical Liberty. I. 171. b. His miſtake touching certain verſes of Paſquier. 792. b. Quoted. II. 138. a. b. 268. a. n. (101). 650. a. n. (23), (24), (25). IV. 89. a. n. (8). His judgment with reſpect to Calvin's wit and learning. II. 268. a. We are obliged to him for the publication of that Reformer's life writ by Papyrius Maſſo. ibid. a. b. In what manner he ſpeaks of Mr Tardieu and his wife. III. 40. b. 41. a. The neceſſity of rectifying his letters by notes. 266. a. A confutation of what he has ſaid of Thuanus's death. 827. a. b. His invective againſt Joſeph du Cheſne. II. 468. b. Cenſured for a particular he relates of Auguſtin Niphus's Life. IV. 380.

Patin (Charles) the cauſe of his diſgrace. IV. 505. b. 506. a. b.

Patriarch of Conſtantinople, ſtrangled during the ſeſſion of the Council of Florence. I. 266.

Patricius is an equivocal word. IV. 638. b.

Patrimony: there were Philoſophers that renounced their patrimonies before the preaching of the Goſpel. I. 294. a. b. The contempt of one's patrimony, is a more valuable poſſeſſion than the patrimony itſelf. 390. b. The laws of Abdera put a mark of infamy upon thoſe who had ſpent it. II. 635. a. b.

Pattins, women that wore very large ones. II. 599. a. b.

Pavia: the battle of Pavia foretold to the Queen-Regent by Turrel, according to Paradin. V. 417.

Pavia (the Cardinal di) obliged to ſign briefs which he had not ſeen. IV. 511. a. b.

Pavin (St) a famous Libertine, whoſe converſion has been put among the moral impoſſibilities. II. 650. a. b.

Paul (St) whether he pretended that a huſband had power to diſpoſe of his wife's body, in favour of another man. I. 91. b. Accuſed of ſtraining his expreſſions. 106. a. b. 107. a. b. Compared to a great ſea which ſwells by the impetuoſity of the wind. 109. b. And treated with great irreverence by the Italians. ibid. 110. a. b. How Bembus treated his epiſtles. 743. a. He ſtood in need of a ſtrong check and ſevere mortification, leſt the excellency of the revelations that were communicated to him, ſhould have puffed him up with pride. V. 367. b. Simon Simonius affirmed that he could propoſe objections, which that apoſtle would not have been able to anſwer. 150. b. 151. a. He acknowledges that his doctrine is obſcure, and that he knows it but imperfectly. 816. Gets out of the difficulties of Predeſtination, no otherwiſe than by aſſerting the abſolute power of God over his creatures. 821. This Apoſtle's aim, when he forbids us to name any thing that is filthy. 857, 858.

Paul (Father) his extream joy in beholding Mr Sommerdyk at Venice. I. 3. a. His jeſt upon one of the ſeſſions of the Council of Trent. 469. b. More imbued with the Proteſtant than the Catholic faith. 717. a. His friendſhip for Mr Daillé. II. 580. b. 581. a. Criticized by Palavicini with reſpect to the letters, which the Council of Trent was to diſpatch. III. 51. a. b. A thought of his concerning the circumſtances which favoured the reformation. 948. a. A ſtrange maxim of this great man. V. 14. a. His narrative of the interview, which Vergerius had with Luther. 452. a. b. And of the former's aſſiſting at the aſſembly of Worms. 453. a. b. It is ſaid that he made great uſe of Vergerius's libels. 456. a. b. His Hiſtory of the Council of Trent, tranſlated into Latin by Adam Newton. IV. 360. Conſiderations which hinder him from confuting the Squittino della Liberta Veneta. V. 449. a. b.

Paul Jovius, takes too much pleaſure in collecting together popular traditions. II. 878. a. Quoted impertinently on the ſubject of Hadrian VI. III. 327. b. 328. a. Cenſured by Nonnius with reſpect to the pillars of Hercules. 431. a. His faults with reſpect to the book intituled, Obſcurorum Virorum Epiſtolæ.

Epiſtolæ. 474. b. 475. a. Cenſured for the characters he gives Ajacetus and Alamannus. IV. 11. b. Blamed for his negligence, on the ſubject of Alphonſo, King of Naples. IV. 311. b. 312. a.

Paul II (Pope) treats a company of learned men cruelly, and for what reaſon. II. 877. Turns all the abbreviators out of their places. IV. 683. They preſent a petition to him, but he returns a very rough anſwer. 684. and a. In what ſenſe he condemned the word Academy. 685. a. b. Laments the rigour of the law which binds prieſts to celibacy. 411. a. b.

Paul III (Pope) his indignation againſt the whole order of the Capuchins. IV. 388. b. What Alciatus ſays of him. III. 590. b. 591. a. Accuſed of Magic, and of holding intimate converſation with Magicians. II. 499. a. b.

Paul IV (Pope) refuſes a diſpenſation of marriage from a regard to the private intereſt of his family. IV. 632. b. 633. a. b. The acknowledgment which he made. ibid. b. 634. a.

Paul V (Pope) in favour of the Duke of Lerma, departs from the cuſtom of not ſending the hat to Cardinals newly elected. I. 604. b.

Paula Malateſta, a very eminent lady. III. 185. a. b.

Paullina wore in her dreſs and on her head, jewels to the value of four millions of Crowns. III. 861. b.

Paulus Samoſatenus protected by Zenobia. V. 604.

Pauſanias aſſaſſinates Philip, King of Macedonia. IV. 404. a. What were the conſequences of that aſſaſſination. ibid.

Pauſanias, a paſſage of that author miſunderſtood by Romulus Amaſæus. II. 826. a.

Pe (Lazarus) tranſlates Marinello's book on the diſeaſes of women, and accuſes Liebaut of Plagiariſm. IV. 148. a. b.

Peace; there are circumſtances, in which each of the Princes, that conclude a peace, incur a general blame. II. 740. a. A puniſhment which in antient times was imprecated on thoſe who ſhould violate a treaty of peace. 742. a. Is eaſily concluded, when both parties find themſelves under a neceſſity of ending the war. III. 90. a. They break the peace, not who firſt make war, but who fraudulently carry on ſecret practices. II. 104. a. b. The proper time for a Prince to make peace, is the time of his enemy's ill-fortune. V. 661.

Peacocks, who was the firſt among the Romans, that introduced the cuſtom of eating peacocks in entertainments. III. 492. Thoſe birds were extreamly valued by the antient Greeks. IV. 569. b. n. (44).

Pedant, his character. I. 373. a. b. 376. a. b.

Pederaſty, in antient times, that ſort of love was not branded with infamy. I. 292. The Heathen gods reproached with it. II. 482. a. b. 483. a.

Peers of France, whether the creation of them ſhould be aſcribed to Charlemagne. III. 336. a. b.

Pegna (Francis) publiſhes two editions of the Directory of the Inquiſitors. II. 749.

Peyrat reproaches the Lutherans with ſuppreſſing all the copies they could find of a certain Miſſal. III. 558. b. 559. a. The reaſons which he alledges to ground that reproach upon, are not ſolid. ibid. a. b.

Pelagians, ſevere decrees againſt them. I. 229. a. b. 230. a. Nothing can be more acceptable to them, than to ſay, that the fear of the falſe gods, was able to induce men to repent. V. 812.

Pelagius II (Pope), ſends to Conſtantinople to demand ſuccours againſt the Lombards. III. 219.

Pelaſgi carry off the Athenian women. III. 754. b. 755. a.

Pelion, the height of that mountain. II. 659. a. b.

Peliſſon, a reflexion upon four verſes of his making. II. 420. b. What he ſays of the difficulty there is in compoſing with an eaſy air. III. 262. a. b. His reflexion upon the injuſtice of thoſe who condemn the occupations of others. IV. 843. a. While he was at Toulouſe, he formed the plan of a club of wits. V. 394. a.

Pellevé (Cardinal) an unlucky thing that happened to him with reſpect to an harangue which he had prepared. V. 778.

Peloponneſus, the expedition in which the Heraclidæ retook it, precedes the Hiſtorical time. I. 241. a. Whether all the cities thereof were maritime cities. 657. a. b.

Peloponneſian war, the cauſe of it was not known. IV. 570. b. 571. a.

Pelops, the wonderful qualities that are aſcribed to one of his ribs. V. 289. a.

Pen, one that had laſted forty years. I. 231. b. 232. a. A pen dipt in good ſenſe. 469. a. Pens conſecrated to the Holy Virgin. 617. b. III. 841. b. There is nothing ſo execrable, which mercenary pens will not attempt to juſtify. II. 100. and b. 101. and a. b. The great effects of the pen. I. 720. b.

Pen of gold: a witty jeſt of Henry IV, upon an Hiſtorian who boaſted that he had a pen of gold. III. 339. b.

Pen by way of bravado, ſaid to be made with a ſword, I. 548.

Penance: an example of a rude penance. I. 96. a. b.

Penates (Dii) children were ſacrificed to them. II. 163. b.

Penelope governs herſelf much more prudently than Helen. III. 367. b.

Penetration: ſeveral people make themſelves ridiculous by their affecting too great a penetration. IV. 687. a. b.

Penitence put off to death-bed, as well as extreme unction. I. 701. b. Is liable to be ſuſpected. V. 556. b. A remarkable abuſe of this ſacrament, and the complaints that were made of it. II. 459. b. 460. a. b.

Penitentiaries, their complaints to the firſt Preſident of Paris. IV. 499. a.

Pennafort, General of the Dominicans, cauſes it to be decreed in a chapter held at Toledo, that they ſhould apply themſelves to the ſtudy of Hebrew and Arabic. IV. 167. Is deſirous of purging Spain from Judaiſm and Mahometiſm. ibid.

Pennetier (Henry) an apoſtate Miniſter. III. 735. b.

Penſioners: State-Penſioners do not enjoy their penſions without care and trouble. III. 176. a. b.

Penſions aſſigned on the revenues of the Church. I. 751. a. b. Whether large penſions procure eſteem to men and their productions. III. 340. a. b.

People; their folly. I. 154. b. Often puniſhed for the faults of Princes. 158. b. 159. a. II. 340. a. b. 341. a. b. Have a ridiculous fondneſs for every thing which they find eſtabliſhed. I. 349. Would be formidable to the Clergy, in caſe they had a ſufficient capacity to demand of them an account of their doctrine. 564. b. 565. a. Demand nothing but bread and public ſhews. 573. b. 574. a. Stand in need of being nouriſhed with a blind and artificial hatred to the enemies of the ſtate. 681. b. 682. a. Their rights ſtrongly maintained by Bodin. II. 46. b. 47. a. b. 48. a. They ſometimes do juſtice to oppreſſed innocence. 337. a. There are certain things in which they love to be deceived. 539. a. When they are mutinous, there is no poſſibility of making them hearken to reaſon. 542. a. There is no ſtreſs to be laid on their fidelity. 608. a. They will remain quiet, if not agitated by ſome external force. 741. a. b. Their capricious and uneven diſpoſition. III. 452. a. b. 467. a. b. 468. a. IV. 603. a. b. They are fated to ſuffer for the follies of many others. III. 530. b. How far their weakneſs goes, when they are prepoſſeſſed and impoſed upon by perſecutors. 626. and a. Their ordinary diſpoſition, with reſpect to treaties of peace, and to war. V. 104. a. b. The people likened to coquets. III. 798. a. b. Are more tender of their private intereſt than of the fundamental laws of the State. IV. 603. b. The rights of the people have fair ſides, they have likewiſe ugly ones. V. 740. What a Cardinal ſaid of the people. 748, 749. They eaſily believe what flatters them. 749. a. b.

Pepin, whether he divorced Plectrude and married Alpaïde. III. 707. b. 708. a.

Peraſia, the prieſteſſes of that place boaſted of being able to walk on burning coals without hurt. II. 531. a.

Perault (Charles) is miſtaken with reſpect to Cardinal Berulle. I. 786. b. His judgment concerning Homer and his dialogue between Hector and Andromache. 333. b. He is obliged to ſuppreſs ſome elogies. 498. a. b. Laughs at a place of the Iliad. II. 481. a. b. His lines upon the diſadvantage our lawyers lie under, compared with thoſe of antiquity. 724. b. As yet there has been no anſwer made to his parallel. IV. 741. b.

Perhaps: it is a very common fault to change into an affirmation what an author has only delivered with a perhaps. IV. 381.

Pericles aſſiſted Anaxagoras with his riches. I. 295. b. The ſuſpicion of irreligion is faſtened upon him. 307. a. The anſwer he made when he ſuffered an old woman's remedy to hang about his neck. II. 649. b. Being thrown upon the ground in wreſtling, he perſuaded the ſpectators that he did not really fall. III. 390. b. IV. 567. b. An offer which he makes to the Athenians. V. 552. b.

Perimede, according to the Scholiaſt on Theocritus, is the ſame with Agamede. IV. 585.

Peringſkioldus (John) cauſes the Hiſtory of Theodoric by Cochlœus to be reprinted with additions and notes. II. 523. a.

Periods: two periods bordering upon one another, and beginning with the ſame word eaſily eſcape the tranſcribers. IV. 711. b. There are half-periods, which may be taken out of a book, and ſtill leave a tolerable ſenſe behind. ibid.

Peripatetic Philoſophy, why it finds ſo many protectors. I. 472. b. Could not prove the immortality of the ſoul. IV. 717. a. b. & ſeq.

Peripatetics, reflexions upon their ſubſtantial forms. II. 251. a.

Perjury unpuniſhed changed a ſuperſtitious man into an Atheiſt. II. 652. b. 653. a.

Perpetuity of the Faith, who is the author of that book. I. 493. a. b.

Perron (Cardinal du) always had his works twice printed. I. 318. b. What he thought of Bellarmin's controverſial books. 730. a. b. His excuſe to a Princeſs before whom he was obliged to ſpeak ſitting. II. 422. b. Particulars concerning him. IV. 240. a. b. His invidious reflexion upon the Proteſtants. III. 42. b. He gives Mrs de Gournai a moſt ſatirical rub. 206. b. 207. a. He had notwithſtanding a regard for her. ibid. a. b. Diſputes with Michael Berault in the conference of Mante. I. 756.

Perſecution for religion's ſake, how unjuſt it is. I. 240. b. 241. a. A fine paſſage of St Auguſtin againſt perſecution. 287. b. 288. a. Whether in time of perſecution it be not neceſſary to make outward profeſſion of the truth. 663. a. b. Perſecution ſharpens the wit, and makes a man wonderfully clear-ſighted in diſcovering the myſtical ſenſe. III. 772. b. See Non-toleration in affairs of religion.

Perſecutors of religion, their cunning. II. 30. a. b. The fineſt maxims of Chriſtian morality, when alledged by them, become trifling. III. 289. a. b. The conformity between Pagan and Chriſtian perſecutors. 446. a. b. An inſtance of their perfidy. 623. b. 624. a. Their different conduct according to the difference of times. IV. 815. a. b. They are very much puzzled how to juſtify their conduct, eſpecially when they themſelves complain of the perſecutions that they have ſuffered. V. 22. b. 23. a. According to Jurieu we fulfil the command that enjoins us to love our neighbours, when we wiſh ſpiritual felicity to them. 648. b.

Perſepolis, who was the cauſe of its deſtruction. V. 320. a. b.

Perſia, the Chriſtians are perſecuted there. I. 13. a. b. The artifices made uſe of by the Magi in that country to deſtroy the Chriſtian religion. ibid. The epithet that was given to the King of Perſia. I. 130. b. 514. a. b. II. 513. b. n. (11). What the Kings of Perſia did for their language. III. 172. a. n. (14). The women there are handſome. IV. 35. b. What notion the learned men in that country have of the Supreme Being. V. 201. a. b.

Perſians, whence ſo called, and what was the origin of their firſt Kings. I. 72. a. b. They are indebted to Zoroaſter for their Philoſophy. 444. What was the happineſs that they expected from their principal deity. ibid. They very much eſteemed thoſe who could bear a great deal of wine. II. 598. a. They believe that Mahomet Mahadi is not dead, and that he is one day to reunite all men in the ſame belief. IV. 123. a. Their antient religion. V. 635. a. b. 636. a. b.

Peſcia (Dominic de) a Jacobine, hanged with Savonarola, and for what reaſon. V. 64.

Petavius (Father) why he refuſed to anſwer a Miniſter. II. 578. a. Has contradicted himſelf in repreſenting the doctrine of the three firſt centuries. IV. 601. b. 602. a.

Peter (Saint); a viſionary pretends that he was the Janus, the Æneas, the Romulus, of whom the Sibyl ſpoke. III. 529. a. b.

Peters (Father) a ſatire againſt him. I. 344. a.

Petition of the Dictionaries, Menage ſuppreſſed that petition. I. 620. a. Quoted. III. 208. a. b.

Petitions: an infinite number of petitions of the Proteſtants of France, have been printed without ever being preſented to the King. I. 532. a. b. The qualities with which they muſt be accompanyed, if the petitioners would obtain any thing at court. III. 341. a. b.

Petra Sancta (Sylveſter à) a Jeſuit, his notes upon a letter of du Moulin to Balzac, &c. IV. 280. a. b.

Petrarch was not born when Guido Cavalcante died. II. 399. He may paſs for Cinus's Scholar, and ſteals ſome thoughts from him. 508.

Petronilla. Abbeſs of the order of Fontevraud, ſometimes accompanyed Robert d'Arbriſſel in his travels. III. 64. a. b.

Petronius leſs dangerous with all his groſs obſcenities, than he is in the nice dreſs of Count de Rabutin. V. 847.

Peucer, what he ſays concerning the death of Paul II. examined. IV. 510. a. b. 511. a.

Phalaris, the letters which bear his name are a ſuppoſititious work. I. 5. a. V. 607. a. On what conditions he was willing to abdicate. IV. 563. b. The advice which he gave Steſichorus. V. 149. b. His bull. 358. b. At what time he lived 607. a.

Phalerum was the port of the Athenians before the Piræus was built. II. 832. b.

Phantoms, there were ſome that haunted a houſe. I. 225. Another appears to Brutus. II. 350. a. b. May occaſion a mortal diſtemper. 715. b. 716. a. Whether it be not poſſible that a man may believe, when awake, that he ſees one. III. 741. a. b. A ſtory concerning them. IV. 725. b. Whether Spinoza had reaſon to deny that there were any. V. 215. a. b. See Spirits.

Pharamond; whether he inſtituted the Salic Law. III. 336. a. b. We have but little certainty that there ever was ſuch a man in the world. 338. a.

Phariſees were leſs honeſt men than the Sadducees. V. 11. a. b.

Pharus; A cunning device of him that built it. V. 553. b.

Pharſalia torn in pieces by ſome young men. IV. 623. b.

Phavorinus, the raillery which he made uſe of againſt a young man that was a great lover of old-faſhioned words. IV. 830. a.

Pharſina, the feigned name of a maid of honour to the Princeſs of Salerno whom Auguſtin Niphus was in love with. IV. 380. b.

Pherecydes died of a pedicular diſtemper. I. 211. b.

Pheroras was in love with a ſervant maid. II. 140. a.

Phidias, his maſter-piece. III. 756. a. Under what pretence, and with what view he drew the ladies to his houſe. IV. 569. b.

Philammon, killed by the Phlegyans, while he ſtrove to defend the temple of Delphos. IV. 626. a.

Philelphus, the advice which he gives to Laurence Valla. V. 435. a.

Philetærus; the Hiſtory of him. IV. 554. b. 555. a.

Philip, King of Macedonia, the dream which he had after marrying Olympia, differently expounded by his Diviners. I. 448. a. b. Whether one has reaſon to ſurmiſe, that he had read the holy Scriptures. ibid. He is praiſed as a great drinker. II. 598. a. A joke of demoſthenes on that head. ibid. An author undertakes to write his Hiſtory for the uſe of the United Provinces. 768. a. By whom killed, and for what. IV. 404. a.

Philip, another King of Macedonia, an Ode writ againſt him. I. 191. How he defended himſelf againſt Alcæus. ibid. a.

Philip, the Conſul has a great violence committed upon him. II. 711. b. 712. a.

Philip, the Emperor, whether he was a Chriſtian. I. 593. a. b.

Philip I. King of France excommunicated in the councils of Autun and Clermont, and for what reaſon. III. 62. a.

Philip de Valois, King of France, confirms a knighthood conferred on another perſon by a knight. III. 282. a.

Philip of Burgundy, natural ſon to Philip the Good, was not very chaſte. III. 148. a. b.

Philip II, King of Spain, his jealouſy and his myſterious politics did him harm ſometimes. I. 588. a. What people thought of him after he had cauſed Conſtantius Pontius to be burned in effigy. II. 336. b. Upon what conſideration, after having thus tarniſhed his father's memory, he would not however ſuffer him to be indicted as a Heretic. ibid. His anſwer to Cardinal de Granville touching the retirement of Charles. V. 439. a. His ingratitude towards his father. ibid. b. He cauſes his father's ſcourge to be brought to him, and gives it to his ſon. ibid. Makes a diſhonourable peace. III. 419. b. 420. a. b. Aſpires to the Imperial crown. II. 223. Conquers Portugal from D. Antonio. V. 319.

Philip III, King of Spain, cenſured as a lazy Prince. IV. 127. a. Renounces all his rights to the hereditary countries of the houſe of Auſtria, ſituated in Germany. V. 673.

Philip IV, King of Spain falls in love with an actreſs. I. 589. b.

Philipſburg is left in the poſſeſſion of France by the treaty of Munſter. III. 720. a.

Philiſtines muſt have been terrible folks in love-matters. I. 40. b. Had nevertheleſs a great regard for marriage. ibid.

Phyllarchus, the original of his quarrel with Balzac. III. 204. and a.

Philo would diſcover myſteries which we ought not to pry into. I. 122. b. His embaſſy to Caligula. 374. b. He condemns three ſorts of legiſlators with reſpect to marriage. II. 504. b. His oration on true nobility tranſlated by Daniel d'Auge. I. 562. a.

Philologers are eaſily provoked, and difficultly appeaſed IV. 476. a. b. V. 92. a. b.

Philoſophers: the antient Philoſophers had tenets for the vulgar, and tenets for diſciples initiated into their myſteries. I. 472. b.

Philoſophers (Heathen) were not impious men. I. 255. b. Were the only writers whom the Chriſtians had to oppoſe. ibid. Some of them parted with all their worldly goods. 294. a. b. 295. a. b. The antient Philoſophers went back as far as the Chaos, and the firſt origin of all things. 302. b. Complain that every thing is involved in darkneſs. 305. b. Who was the firſt Philoſopher that publiſhed books. 309. b. It is an axiom with the ſchoolmen that a Philoſopher ought not to have recourſe to God in order to explain the effects of nature. 310. a. Are not qualifyed to judge of the machine of the world. ibid. b. 311. a. Whether the Philoſophers who uſed all their induſtry to come at the knowledge of the true God, and to honour him religiouſly, had that faith by which the juſt live. 323. b. The true deſcription of a perfect Philoſopher. 383. b. Among their diſciples, there was always one that was his maſter's favourite. 408. a. The antients have left the Hiſtory of the Philoſophers in a wretched ſtate. 415. b. 416. a. A Philoſopher by practice and not by profeſſion. 464. a. They ſhould dip their pen in good ſenſe. 469. a. It has been ſaid that there is nothing ſo abſurd but has been maintained by ſome Philoſophers. II. 31. b. Antiquity had two ſorts of Philoſophers; ſome were like the advocates, and others like thoſe who report a cauſe. 487. b. Their Hiſtory has been intermixed with as many prodigious adventures as that of the knights errant. 637. Nothing was more worthy a Philoſopher, fully perſuaded of the exiſtence of the true God, than to laugh at the ſuperſtitions of the Pagans. 670. a. Philoſophers and Rhetoricians expelled from Rome. III. 6. a. There are ſeveral things which the laws tolerate in the people, and which would not be allowed in a Philoſopher. 312. b. 313. a. b. Bore the puniſhment of the folly of the prieſts. 642. b. The difficulty they have in explaining the conduct of providence. 919. a. b. The antient Philoſophers believed the ſouls of men to be material, as well as thoſe of beaſts. IV. 548. b. 549. a. b. 550. a. Some of them made no diſtinction between thought and ſenſation. ibid. b. The people would not ſuffer them to treat of natural cauſes. 566. b. Philoſophers who were of no particular ſect. 860. a. Philoſophers always accuſed of irreligion. V. 286. a. b. Undertake to give an account of their doctrine to all the world. 815, 816. St Paul does not challenge them to a diſputation, on the contrary he exhorts believers to ſtand well on their guard againſt Philoſophy. 816. Their diſputes looked upon by the Fathers as great obſtacles to faith ibid.

Philoſophers (Indian) the auſterities of ſome among them. II. 115. a. b. 116. a. b.

Philoſophy will deſtroy both errors and truths, if ſhe be allowed to have her full ſcope. I. 97. a. II. 848. a. b. III. 459. a. b. 460. a. b. In what ſenſe it ought, and ought not, to have recourſe to God in order to explain the effects of nature. I. 310. b. 311. a. By what means Lactantius pretends to deſtroy all Philoſophy. 411. a. b. 412. a. And particularly that of the Acataleptics. 411. b. Who was the firſt that brought it over to Athens. 414. a. b. &c. Philoſophy and Divinity are not well agreed upon their proper boundaries. 472. b. Philoſophy can carry a man no farther than to make him confeſs at laſt that he is only aſſured of one thing, viz. that he knows nothing. II. 202. a. Whether Divinity can ſubſiſt without it. ibid. b. It's diſputes reſemble that about the oyſter. 485. b 486. a. Strabo ſays it could not lead us to faith. 832. a. It has been ſometimes debaſed. 845. b. 846. a. Whether a doctrine that is falſe in Philoſophy can be true in Divinity. III. 479. a. 951. a. b. 952. a. 970. a. b. See Reaſon. The Peripatetic Philoſophy is only fit to foment the diviſions of the Divines. 558. a. Whether Theology ought to be ſubjected to it. IV. 419. b. Philoſophy is at a ſtand in anſwering the objections of the Manichees, with reſpect to their two principles. 522. a. It is a remedy for impiety and ſuperſtition. V. 287. b Is disfigured by the vain ſubtleties of the ſchoolmen. 339 a. b. It is eſſential to the truths of the Goſpel, not to be conſiſtent with Philoſophy. 815.

Philoſophy (Civil and Political) a book of Politics by Arrerac. I. 505. a. b. Judgment which is paſſed upon it. ibid. b.

Philoſophy (Soldier's) a work of Audiguier's. I. 548. a.

Philoſophy (Occult) the Hiſtory of that book. I. 154. a. And the key to it. ibid. and 155. a. b. 156. a.

Philoſophize: it is impoſſible to philoſophize juſtly without the evidence of ideas. I. 470. b. One ought to obſerve a juſt medium in it. II. 847. a. b. 848. a. b. The natural conſequences which a diſputing and dialectician ſpirit produces. 848. a. b. 849. a.

Philtre prepared for one perſon and taken by another. III. 876. and a.

Phineas, whether he be ſtill living in the terreſtrial paradiſe. II. 750. a. Kills a Midianitiſh woman whom he ſurprized in the act of fornication. V. 133. a.

Phyſic, it's ſucceſs depends on the bleſſing of Heaven. III. 664. b. The Faculty of Phyſic at Paris were formerly very moderate in the practice of drawing blood. II. 99. a. They oppoſe the practice of frequent bleeding introduced by Botal. ibid. b.

Phyſical: a Phyſical receipt. II. 197. a. b. 198. a. b.

Phyſical: combination of moral and Phyſical things. II. 16. a.

Phyſicians ought to profit by the ſentence of Agatho. I. 127. a. An oath which they take upon receiving their degree. 399. b. What are the privileges of their profeſſion. ibid. a. Formerly exerciſed the Apothecaries trade. 465. a. A Phyſician who laid a ſurprizing wager. 526, 527. and a. In what manner the common people made uſe of Phyſicians formerly. III. 23. a. n. (5). Their conſtant practice in the XVIth century was to bleed in the oppoſite ſide to where the pleuriſy was. II. 141. A civil war raiſed among the Phyſicians of Portugal to ſupport that practice. ibid. a. The Emperor's inclination to favour it, if it had not been for the death of Charles III, Duke of Savoy. ibid. b. Who was the firſt Phyſician that ever came to Rome. 353. a. The practice of the Paris Phyſicians is to bleed very much. 696. a. b. They had formerly a public library in their ſchools. III. 497. The Phyſicians formerly were wont to aſcribe much to the influence of the ſtars, in diſcourſing upon diſtempers. 621. b. A multitude of Phyſicians kill the patient. 318. b. Baniſhed from Rome. IV. 752. a. b. Whether thoſe whoſe remedies prove mortal, notwithſtanding their honeſty and learning, deſerve to be puniſhed. 931. a. b. It is an infamous thing in a Phyſician to make himſelf work. II. 259. b. 260. a. b. The three qualities of a good Phyſician. III. 487, 488. Reflexions upon the queſtion whether they have good or bad fortune. 488. a.

Phyſicians who wrote in verſe: a liſt of them publiſhed by Bartholinus. III. 351. b.

Phyſics; it is thought Alcmæon was the firſt who wrote upon that ſcience. I. 210. Lactantius confeſſes that with reſpect to Phyſics, there is no ſcience. 412. a. What is the ſource of the defect in Ariſtotle's Phyſics. 470. a. b.

Phocas, his uſurpation and cruelties. III. 222. a. b. The praiſes which the Pope beſtows upon him. ibid. b.

Phoceans ſeize upon the temple of Delphos, to enable them to make war with the Thebans. IV. 621. and a. b. &c. They are ſupported in that war by the Athenians and Lacedæmonians. ibid.

Phocion, what he ſaid to the officers that attended him when a fellow ſpit in his face. I. 460. b. His integrity. III. 355.

Phæacians led a voluptuous life. I. 201. b.

Phorbas, King of the Phlegyans, his cruelty: he is conquered by Apollo. IV. 626. a. Divers perſons of that name. ibid. a. b.

Φορτικώτερον, ill rendered by the word importunius. II. 12. a.

Photius, what he relates concerning a man, whoſe name was Oe. I. 101. a. He makes Joſephus ſay things, which he has not ſaid concerning Antipater. 349. a. b. 350. a. His tranſlator has not entered into his thought, with reſpect to the chaſte loves of Theagenes and Chariclea. III. 379. a. b. Who firſt publiſhed his Bibliotheca. 478. a.

Phraſes; young ſcholars take more notice of ill phraſes, and barbarous expreſſions, to divert themſelves, than of ſuch as are polite. II. 555. a. b.

Phrygians adored a plain ſtone for the mother of the gods. I. 124. b.

Phryne, a Courtezan, makes an offer to the Thebans. V. 553. a. b. Could not triumph over the chaſtity of Xenocrates. 568. a. b.

Pianeſſo (the Marquis de) obliges Guichenon to inſert in his works whatever he thinks fit. III. 275. b.

Pibrac, his ſpeech ill received in the Council of Trent. I. 235. Was in love with Margaret de Valois, the Queen of Navarre III. 419. b. IV. 340. b. 341. a. Extracts of a ſpeech which he made to Henry III, to juſtify the King of Navarre's conduct. III. 341. a. b.

Picardy, all put to fire and ſword there. II. 217. a.

Picighitone: the caſtle where Francis I. was ſhut up after the battle of Pavia, before he was carried into Spain. III. 97. b.

Picinin maſſacred by the order of Ferdinand, King of Naples, and with the conſent of Paul II. IV. 509.

Pictor (Fabius) his negligence, with reſpect to Tanaquil and two of the Tarquins, cenſured by Dionyſius Halicarnaſſenſis. V. 290. a.

Picture: Ageſilaus II, by his laſt will, forbad his picture to be drawn. I. 130. What people conjecture to have been his reaſon for it. ibid. Other perſons that would not ſuffer their pictures to be drawn. II. 191. a. V. 97. b. 98. a. 449. b. 450. a. b.

Picture of Adam and Eve, two verſes writ in praiſe of it. II. 728. a.

Picus (Johannes) Count of Mirandola, is reproved for having entertained a favourable opinion of Origen's ſalvation. IV. 412. a. b. 413. a. Ruſſilianus tries to imitate him, and renews ſeveral of his propoſitions. 940. a. b. He dies, notwithſtanding the contrary prediction of Savonarola. V. 61. a.

Picus (Johannes Franciſcus) writes the life of Savonarola, and is extreamly warm in his defence. V. 66. b. 67. a. Divers extracts of that life, diffuſed through the whole article of SAVONAROLA. Father Quetif publiſhes it in the year 1674, and Dr Bates cauſes it to be reprinted. ibid.

Piety; it does not belong to a profane perſon, to compoſe works of piety. I. 439. a b. Great piety and great impiety are equally uncommon. II. 451. b. To labour at bringing about a coalition of religions, is an undertaking that requires a great deal of piety. I. 689. a. b.

Piety (liberal) the artifices which the Clergy make uſe of, in order to raiſe it. I. 738. b. 739. a. b.

Pigenat, how far he carried his ſeditious fury againſt Henry III. III. 293. b. 294. a.

Pighius falls upon the Council of Conſtantinople, and for what reaſon. IV. 350. a. Whether he was orthodox on the article of Juſtification. 638. b. 639. a. b. 640. b. 641. a. b.

Pignerol, France was happy in poſſeſſing that place, at the time of the alliance which the Duke of Savoy entered into with the houſe of Auſtria, &c. in the year 1690. III. 407. a. Beſieged by the allies, who were not able to take it, and whoſe bombardment did no great miſchief to it. IV. 211. a.

Pylades, he and Bathyllus were inventors of a new manner of repreſenting all ſorts of Dramatic pieces in dances. I. 676. a. b. An anſwer which he made to Auguſtus. 677. b.

Pilate, the ſentence that is aſcribed to him, found at Aquila. II. 556. A book in which they have taken a great deal of pains to prove that the ſaid ſentence is fictitious. ibid.

Pylatus (Leontius) what he was. II. 34. a. b.

Pilgrims gave occaſion to the devout repreſentations that were exhibited on the ſtage, in the XVth and XVIth centuries. II. 480. b. 481. a. b.

Pillar: the pillar of fire which went before the Iſraelites, had nothing in common with the fire which Timoleon ſaw in a dream. V. 364. a. b.

Pin, Secretary to the King of Navarre, how he treated the Catholics. IV. 336. b.

Pin (Lewis Ellis du) the judgment which that Doctor paſſes on the miracles related by St Gregory. III. 226. a. b. His diſpute with the Abbot Antelmi, touching ſome of St Proſper's writings, that were aſcribed to Pope Leo. 760. b. His recantations. IV. 356. a. Some people were offended with Mr du Pin, for publiſhing in French, a new Bibliotheque of Eccleſiaſtical writers. 457. b. Cenſured for ſome obſcure expreſſions, which he makes uſe of in ſpeaking of Hœſchelius and Perſona. 599. a. He believes that the ſtory of Pope Joan has been added to the chronicle of Martin Polonus. 709. a.

Pinczovia was looked upon as the Athens of Poland. IV. 825. b. Two reformations in that city. V. 233. b.

Pindarus Thebanus is the author of the leſſer Iliad. I. 81. b.

Pine: a pine-tree adored by the Eſthonians, a people of Livonia. IV. 928. a. b.

Pineda, a Spaniſh Jeſuit, his ſcandalous reflexion upon Job. III. 573. a.

Pinedo cenſured for his explication of a proverb. I. 17. a. b.

Pinet (Antony du) makes two Roman gentlemen of two ſorts of marble. IV. 651. b. Cenſured. V. 135. a. b. His edition of the taxes of the Romiſh Chancery, is different from the others. I. 628. a. The author's conjecture on that head. ibid. b.

Pinianus, a promiſe is extorted from him, but he does not keep it. I. 229.

Piracy (Literary) is not in all things like to that of Privateers. II. 773. b.

Piræus, when built. II. 832. b.

Pyramid: a pyramid or pillar, raiſed to perpetuate the memory of the parricide, attempted on the perſon of Henry IV, by John Chaſtel. II. 457. b.

Pyramids, the principal one was built before the reign of Amaſis. IV. 869. a.

Pyrenean peace was concluded without the Pope's intervention. II. 474. a.

Pirot (Father) it is eaſier to perceive that his book intituled, Apologie des Caſuiſtes, contains dangerous doctrines, than to anſwer the objections contained therein. III. 894. b.

Pyrrho, it has been objected that his article in this Dictionary, contains Libertine principles; the author's anſwer. V. 830. to 836.

Pyrrhoniſm is ſometimes poorly attacked, and as poorly defended. I. 462. a. b. Prevails in moſt diſputes. II. 27. b. Pyrrhonian objections. III. 416. a. b. 424. a. b. What is ſufficient to make one give into it. IV. 188. a. b. 189. a. The advantages it draws from the New Philoſophy, and from Divinity. 653. b. 654. a. b. 655. a. b. Whether it be a good means to make us ſubmit to the authority of faith. 655. b. 656. a. What ſeems to have given birth to it. V. 586. b. Seneca relates all the degrees of it. 607. b. 608. a. See Incomprehenſibility of all things.

Pyrrhoniſm (Hiſtorical) obſervations that might ſtrengthen it. I. 118. a. b. II. 260. a. III. 485. a. b. V. 608. a. In what caſe it is the wiſeſt courſe. II. 829. a. b. An abuſe that favours it. V. 753. Battles are more ſubject to it than ſieges. III. 719. b. Why we are ſo often obliged to adopt it. IV. 562. b. 563. a. b. 564. a. b.

Pyrrhoniſts are expoſed to the raillery and inſults of banterers. I. 410. a. Had a theory favourable to virtue. 413. b. Took advantage of an invention of Chryſippus. II. 495. a. An example which they make uſe of. 630. a. b. Democritus ſupplied them with all that they ſaid againſt the teſtimony of the ſenſes. 642. People have always endeavoured to turn them into ridicule. III. 698. b. Favoured by thoſe who demonſtrate a vacuum. 793. a. b. Sometimes forgot themſelves in the exerciſe of their doctrines. IV. 657. b. 658. a. Under pretence of confuting only the arguments of the Dogmatiſts, they actually undermined the doctrine of the exiſtence of a God. 935. b. An explanation concerning what the author has ſaid of them. V. 830. to 836. Their character. 830. Divines ought not to be aſhamed of refuſing to enter the liſts with them. ibid. The author's anſwer to thoſe who aſk what need there was to ſet forth their difficulties. 833. to 836.

Pyrrhus, what he ſaid upon his viewing the Roman army. I. 511. b. Compared to thoſe gameſters, to whom chance gives a fair game, but who know not how to make uſe of it. II. 414. a. Beſieges Lacedæmon without ſucceſs. 522. His Phyſician makes an offer to the Romans of poiſoning him: the different accounts which authors give of that affair. III. 2. a. b. How many battles were fought between that Prince and the Romans. ibid. b. The chimerical foundation of his hopes. IV. 662. a. b.

Piſa: the Council of Piſa ſends Cardinal Cajetan's book to the Faculty of Divinity of Paris, to be confuted by them. I. 232. That Council declared to be a pretended Council by Lewis XII. III. 611. a. b.

Piſaurum: the Colony of Piſaurum was not ſettled till four years after that of Bologna. I. 62. b.

Piſcopia Cornara (Helina) ſtudied to tread in the ſteps of Minerva. III. 662. b.

Piſqueton. See Picighitone.

Pythagoras extorts a confeſſion from Abaris by a trick. I. 4. b. His prophetical ſpirit, and his power to work miracles. 6. b. What he ſays of the tranſmigrations, in which he had a ſhare. IV. 580. b.

Pytheas, what he was. I. 10. b. IV. 676. a. b. & ſeq.

Pytheas the Orator, his quick repartee. IV. 678. b.

Pythias, a woman ſervant, the anſwer ſhe made to Tigellinus. IV. 398. b.

Pithois had been a Friar Minime, and was profeſſor of Philoſophy at Sedan: he is the author of the Apocalypſe de Meliton. V. 57. a. n. (2).

Python is commended at Athens for a murder which he had committed, but he aſcribed all the glory of the action to a deity, pretending that he had been no more but the inſtrument. II. 558. a.

Pittacus, his moderation. I. 190. b.

Pius II (Pope) his letter to Mahomet. IV. 55. b. 56. a.

Pius IV (Pope) why he refuſed to terminate himſelf a diſpute about Precedency. IV. 574. a. Of what family he was. V. 118. a.

Pius V (Pope) had a mind to ſignalize the beginning of his reign, by the puniſhment of ſome famous Heretics. IV. 463. n. (ſ). His brief touching children baptized by the Innovators. V. 27. a.

Placcius has only judged of the Rabelais Reformed, by its title; which has led him into a miſtake. III. 133. b. 134. a. Was ignorant of ſeveral things, touching diſguiſed names. IV. 832. b. 833. a.

Place (Preſident de la) cenſured with reſpect to John du Tillet's book of the King's Majority. V. 352. b. 353. a. b.

Place (John de la) approves of Laurence Joubertus's anſwer, with reſpect to the faſting of Moſes, Elias, and Jeſus Chriſt. III. 582. b.

Place (Native) why that of great men who are meanly born, is uncertain. I. 570. a.

Places (important) their ſiege will always be a troubleſome rock for the News-Writers. III. 719. b. The taking of them is not ſubject, like the gaining of battles, to Hiſtorical Pyrrhoniſm. ibid.

Placette, his judgment upon Mr Nicolle's method. IV. 536. a. n. (13).

Plagiary, that term taken in an improper ſenſe. II. 39. a. b. The faults which Plagiaries are commonly guilty of. 685. a. b. 686. a. b. The Plagiary of a book who got a penſion by it. V. 474. a. b.

Plagiariſm in the affair of books, when is a perſon guilty of it, and when not? II. 168. b. 169. a. Obſervations upon the various ways of it. 773. b. 774. a. The juſtification of a perſon that was accuſed of Plagiariſm, conſidered. IV. 375. b. 376. a. Plagiariſm approved of by Strigelius. V. 250. b. The remarkable Plagiariſm of Alcyonius. I. 202. b. Of Alſtedius. 234. Of Daniel Pareus. 241. a. Of John Andreas, of Durandus. 326. b. Of Leonard Aretin. 435. Of Gerard Voſſius. II. 276. A great law-ſuit about a theft of that kind. 682. a. b. Whether it be a ſin, and if an honeſt man may be guilty of it. IV. 294. a. b.

Plague, Philip de Bergamo believes that he was cured of it by the interceſſion of Nicolas Tollentin. I. 769.

Player: a Player puniſhed for having mentioned Accius on the ſtage. I. 61. and b. The extravagance and luxury of another Player. II. 835. and a. b. & ſeq. The riches he left at his death. 836. To what pitch he ſuffered himſelf to be tranſported. ibid. b. Players may be buried in holy ground. I. 328. a. b. Have furniſhed a martyr to religion. IV. 487. b. n. (37).

Plays: what ſort of men are moſt affected with the repreſentation of Plays. I. 19. a. b. The Romans were very apt to apply particular ſentiments of a Play to the preſent times. 60. b. Politian's verſes againſt thoſe who condemned the Plays that were acted in colleges. V. 752. b. 753. a.

Planche (Regnier de la) what ſort of a man he was. IV. 699. b.

Plane: a plane-tree, from which every body deſired to have plants. II. 876. a. b.

Planets: thoſe perſons confuted, who ſay that every planet is a god. V. 571. b. 572. a. b. 573. a.

Plantin reproached with a piece of negligence. III. 779. b.

Plants, the ſecret of raiſing an appearance of them from their aſhes. II. 467. a. b. 468. a.

Planudes, his groſs ignorance in a point of Chronology. II. 829. b.

Platina, his miſtake in ſpeaking of the Councils of Soiſſons and Sens. I. 29. b. 30. a. Quoted. III. 223. b. n. (60). IV. 51. b. n. (22). What he adds to the ſtory of the She-Pope. 729. 712. a. n. †: Some pretend that the ſaid ſtory has been added to his book. 711. b. 712. a. That pretenſion ſifted. ibid.

Plato, a very tender diſtich which he compoſed. I. 127. a. b. His doctrine confirmed by the beginning of St John's Goſpel. 255. He alledges the doctrine of Anaxagoras as a ſymblol of the chaos. 304. a. Why he never cited Democritus. II. 643. b. He ſuppoſes that matter had a ſoul even before God had framed the world. 792. b. V. 634. a. b. 635. a. What he ſays of the licence which the Poets take. III. 134. b. 634. a. b. Whether he admitted two principles collateral, eternal, and independant of one another. 447. a. b. His contempt for the dexterity of Anniceris. IV. 10. a. b. Quoted. 568. a. n. (29). His laws concerning the two ſexes. 802. b. His judgment of Ariſtotle and Xenocrates. V. 568. He is in the wrong to accuſe Zeno of having been Parmenides's Minion. 605. a. For which he is cenſured by Athenæus. ibid. a. b. His ſentiments touching Palamedes. ibid. b. 606. a. He admitted two ſouls of the world. 634. b. 635. a. Demoſthenes quits his academy to attach himſelf to Calliſtratus. II. 259. His Republic tranſlated and reduced to a more diſtinct order by John Sozomenes. V. 193.

Platoniſts, the agreement between that ſect and the Ariſtotelians, I. 268. a. b. Aſcribed to good Genii what people now a days only aſcribe to bad ones. 390. a. Said that there was in matter a real defect, which was an obſtacle to God's project. II. 788. a. b. Their hypotheſis about the origin of evil. IV. 524. b. 525. a. b. &c.

Plautus, an unluckly alternative for him. I. 207. a. Quoted. V. 577. a. n. (54).

Pleadings: there are ſome which, without counting the Greek and Latin verſes, have almoſt as much Latin as French in them. II. 104. b. 105. and a. b. When too much learning is mixed with them, it can only ſerve to withdraw the judge's attention. 106. b.

Pleaſure: one may feel pleaſure without having ever felt pain. IV. 514. a. b. Pleaſures of the ſenſes, whether they can be ſpiritual. II. 781. a. b.

Plebeians, in what year of Rome they obtained to be admitted to the Conſular dignity. I. 343.

Plebeius and Nobilis were not inconſiſtent words in antient Rome. III. 490. a.

Pleiad imagined by Ronſard. II. 619. a. b. Who are the perſons that were comprehended in it. ibid.

Pleix (du) his recantation touching Antony Arnauld the Advocate. I. 484. b. 485. a. He is ill rewarded for having been ſo partial to the Jeſuits. ibid. What he has publiſhed concerning the wife of Henry IV. V. 530. a. b. Vindicated in that point againſt thoſe who cenſured him. ibid. b. & ſeq. Cenſured with reſpect to what John Chaſtel replied to his judges. II. 460. b. 461. and a. b.

Plenipotentiary, one at the age of ninety-five years is a much rarer thing than a man of a hundred years of age. II. 464. b.

Pleſſis Mornay (du) writes to Father Paul, and recommends his grand-children and their governour to him. II. 580. b. 581. a. He meets with a very cold reception at the court of England, and for what reaſon. 754. a. b. Quoted. III. 231. b. n. (30). 232. a. n. (32). & alibi paſſim. Reflexions on one of his Epiſtles Dedicatory. II. 126. b. 127. a. b. Cenſured, and ill defended by Rivet. ibid. Looked upon as an incendiary. ibid. Deputed by the King of Navarre to Henry III. IV. 341. a. Held intelligence with all the Proteſtant world. 727. a. The weak confutations of his book on the Euchariſt cauſe it to be eſteemed. V. 179. b. His extracts from Mutius touching the Celibacy of Prieſts. IV. 296. a. b. 297. a.

Pleſſis Pralin (du) for what enterprize he was made a Marſhal of France. IV. 919.

Pliny, quoted. I. 306. a. n. (138). II. 253. n. (a). 254. b. n. (4). V. 579. b. n. (73). & paſſim alibi. Only glanced upon the ſubjects which he treated of. I. 212. A paſſage in him corrupted. 595. b. 596. a. b. Hermolaus Barbarus corrects near five thouſand paſſages of that author. 633. and b. 634. a. b. The place of his birth. 637. a. What he calls Magical romancing. II. 639. a. b. Ought not to have believed that Democritus was the author of ſeveral works that went under his name. ibid. b. In what manner he ſpeaks of the Aſtronomers. III. 462. a. b. What he relates concerning Apelles. 836. b. And concerning the cauſe of Sappho's love for Phaon. V. 47. a. He ſeems to condemn thoſe who write annals. 133. a. Cenſured with reſpect to the time in which he places Zeuxis. 622. b. Several of his faults in a few words. 781, 782. Six books of him tranſlated into French by Peter de Changy. II. 435. a. The ſummary of his firſt ſixteen books by the ſame de Changy. ibid.

Pliny the Younger has almoſt exhauſted in his panegyric all the ideas of the perfection of a Prince. II. 819. b. 820. a. Very poſſibly he may have gone beyond the truth in ſome things which we find there. IV. 691. a. b. Was one of the greateſt wits, and one of the worthieſt men of his age. V. 840. His juſtification with reſpect to ſome looſe verſes which he had writ. ibid. Quoted. I. 121. b. n. (10).

Plutarch relates two ridiculous facts. I. 54. b. Applies facts ſometimes one way and ſometimes another. 83. a. The reaſon he aſſigns for the Jews abſtaining from ſwine's fleſh. 115. a. Makes a reflexion that is both impious and contradictory. 300. a. Contradicts himſelf touching the death of Caſſius. II. 349. a. Is no good guide in Chronology. 506. b. Quoted. 414. a. n. (14). 785. b. n. (148). 786. a. n. (150), (151). He aſcribes to a King of Libya things which only concern Dejotarus. 630. a. Made the ſame Hiſtory ſerve ſeveral ends. 869. a. b. His judgment concerning the Poets. III. 135. a. How he came to underſtand the Latin Hiſtorians. 195. b. He did not underſtand a paſſage in Livy concerning Camillus and Juno. 638. a. b. Wherein he contradicts Ariſtotle, while he is ſpeaking of the laws of Lacedæmon. 967. b. 968. a. Full of ſophiſms. ibid. His paralogiſm with reſpect to Sylla, and the reaſon for which he had divorced Cælia. IV. 201. b. 202. a. He pretends that it would be better to ſay that Jupiter wants power, than to ſay that he wants goodneſs. 519. b. Solidly confutes the paradox of the ſtories concerning the uſefulneſs of vice. ibid. 520. a. b. He was of opinion that beaſts do reaſon. 550. a. b. That paſſage examined where he ſays poſitively, that, in the opinion of Diogenes, beaſts had no ſenſe. ibid. a. 552. b. 553. a. He defends the vulgar opinion concerning preſages in a ſpecious manner. 565. a. b. His reflexion on the difficulty of finding out the truth in Hiſtory. 570. b. 571. a. He aſcribes only a bountiful providence to God. ibid. b. 572. a. But his opinion in this reſpect was not the moſt common. ibid. He accuſes Herodotus of Impiety. 574. b. 575. a. b. &c. Plutarch cenſured, with reſpect to certain monuments that were to be ſeen in the temple of Sancus. V. 288. b. 289. a. What idea he gives of Zeno's Logic. 605. b. James Pinon procures an edition of his works tranſlated by Amyot. IV. 651.

Plutarch (French) who had that name given him. V. 419. a. And for what reaſon. ibid.

Pocock, it is hard that we cannot depend upon him as a ſure guide in the eaſtern learning. I. 49. b. What he relates concerning the black ſtone which the Saracens honoured. 124. b.

Poem, one rewarded with a bag of money which the author had much ado to carry upon his ſhoulders. I. 329. b. Poems in which there was wanting but one ſyllable. 330. a. A Poem muſt be very good when it is aſcribed to an excellent Poet. II. 572. b. A Poem for which the author received no more than half the price that was agreed upon. V. 140. a.

Poems (French) the Bookſellers are very ready, to make collections of ſuch as had the good fortune to pleaſe ſeparately, but they are not ſo with reſpect to Latin Poems. IV. 652. a. b.

Poet (Heteroclite) to Monſeigneur only brother to his Majeſty, who ſtyled himſelf ſo. IV. 357. a.

Poeta Regius, who was honoured with ſuch a title. II. 618. a.

Poetry, contrary to the acquiſition of riches. II. 33. a. b. A new kind of Poetry which has been added to the antient. I. 752. b. Whether its only aim ſhould be to divert us. II. 377. a. b. The judgment that Daſſouci made of the moſt impertinent Poetry. 603. b. 604. a. It has introduced a thouſand impieties. III. 134. a. b. 135. a. b. Impieties expreſſed in Poetry are as criminal as thoſe which are expreſſed in proſe. ibid. The antient Pagan Poetry burnt at the inſtigation of the Prieſts. IV. 345. b.

Poetry (genteel) who was looked upon as the father of that kind of Poetry. I. 205. and b. Its profane licence. 752. a. Was not in Auguſtus's time an enemy to all groſs ideas. V. 768.

Poetry (Iambic) by whom invented. I. 427. and b.

Poetry (Italian) is greatly obliged to Cavalcante. II. 399. a. Lyric Poetry receives a grace from Cinus. 508. Enriched by the inventions of Rinuccini. IV. 878. a. b. 879. a. b.

Poetry (Epic) Homer did not keep up the majeſty of it. I. 79. b.

Poets: the antient Poets adjuſted their Chronology very ill. I. 80. a. They ought to quit betimes the ſervice of Apollo. I. 120. a. b. II. 620. a. b. Formerly carried their fictions very far on the ſtage. I. 158. b. A Poet who furniſhes a ſingular example. 329. b. 330. a. All thoſe who are lovers of Poetry are not Poets. 375. b. They every where find flowers to crown Princes with. 516. b. Whether they formerly recited their verſes in a hired houſe. 535. a. b. The poverty of their trade. ibid. b. Their are ſeveral of them who have a two-handed pen. 653. a. They very often exaggerate their neceſſities. II. 9. a. b. The affection which they have for their works. 232. b. The liberties which they take in them. 234. b. 235. a. Give themſelves a great juriſdiction over time. 388. b. Their fondneſs for their own productions. 395. a. They are not fit authors to prove a fact. 502. b. They give themſelves the liberty to touch upon great myſteries under too bold metaphors. 543. How Charles IX treated the Poets. 617. b. A French Poet who prepared ſonnets for books that were to come out. 620. b. n. (58). A court Poet does not avoid fabulous hyperboles, but when he does not want them. 715. a. A Poet whoſe verſes did a ſignal ſervice to ſoldiers that had been overcome. 866. b. 867. a. They ought never to ſet up for Prophets. III. 29. b. 30. a. Gambara lays a heavy yoke upon them. 128. They produce bad effects in France. IV. 322. b. They are eaſily put in a paſſion. 323. a. Are always ready to declare for the party that is uppermoſt. III. 647. a. Their fictions were tranſplanted into the Pagan ſyſtem of Divinity. 642. a. b. 652. b. 653. a. b. Whence it comes that they appear to be ſo much inflamed with love in their verſes. 876. b. 877. a. b. Poets that are natural Philoſophers have a greater liberty than others, to ſpeak of natural things. 920. a. b. What judgment we are to form of their miſtreſſes. IV. 82. a. b. 83. a. They have always taken the liberty of praiſing themſelves. 86. a. b. The greateſt part of them never ſucceed better than when they lay aſide all modeſty. 156. b. The oſtentation of learning has often drawn impertinent things from them. 181. a. Make no ſcruple of anachroniſms. 183. b. They ſometimes boaſt of their good fortune in love intrigues, which are only fictions of their brain. 332. a. Poets that hit upon making the ſame verſes. 822. a. b. Can write paſſionate verſes, without being in love with the perſon that is the ſubject of them. 894. a. It often falls out that their ſecond thoughts are not ſo good as the firſt. 896. b. 897. a. The antient Poets were not aſhamed of praiſing their own wives. V. 76. b. A preſervative againſt their obſcenities. 98. b. 99. a. b. It is a common thing to jeſt upon their poverty. 400. a. b. &c. What it is that reduced ſeveral of them to poverty. 402. b. 403. a. Whether ſuch whoſe verſes are not chaſte, ought to be looked upon as leud perſons. 420. a. b. &c. There are no authors more ſubject to forget that they promiſed to print no more. II. 83. a. La Fontaine's verſes on that ſubject. ibid. a. b. Two chapters of Menage on the ſame ſubject. ibid. b. Good Poets reſerve the moſt exquiſite ſtrokes for the fifth act of their tragedies. III. 720. b. The vicious liberty which they take to write obſcene verſes. V. 840. and n. (16).

Poets (Chriſtian): there are ſome, who, though they are baniſhed for their religion, do not not ceaſe their leud courſes. IV. 448.

Poets (Greek and Latin) the reading of them neceſſary towards forming the refined taſte of a complete Poet. II. 399. a. b.

Poets (Latin) there were ſome famous ones in Germany before Conrad Celtes. III. 724. b. 725. a.

Poets (Italian) there once reigned a great licentiouſneſs among them. IV. 235. a. b. 236. a.

Poggius (John) writes a book upon the falſe predictions of Savonarola. V. 61. a. b.

Poggius (Florentinus) one of his facetious ſtories. I. 324. b. 325. a. Laſhes on all ſides in his dialogue againſt hypocrites. II. 275. a. b. Gives an account of John Huſs's puniſhment. 277. b.

Poyet (Chancellor) the cauſe of his diſgrace. II. 841. a. Accuſed of having baſely offered incenſe to Fortune. 761. A ſevere ſatire againſt him. ibid.

Point: ſome have pretended to ſhew that it is not poſſible to find the fixed point, which determines preciſely the nature of every thing. II. 493. a.

Pointing: the falſe pointing of a paſſage has given occaſion to its being ſaid that Ariſtotle was a Jew. I. 466. b. A perſon cannot be too exact in it. II. 703. a. b.

Points; whether the points of the Tetragramma are proper to that name. I. 244. b. 245. a. b.

Poiret, what he has writ on the diſpute about the eternity of the world. V. 596. a. b. Quoted. IV. 910. a. b. n. (82), (83), (84), (85), (86).

Poiſſy, See Conference of Poiſſy.

Poitiers beſieged by the Proteſtants. II. 300. a.

Poitiers (Diana of) the chief of a faction oppoſite to that of the Ducheſs of Etampes. III. 401. a. See Diana of Poitiers.

Poitiers (Apology of the Biſhop of) who is the author of that piece, and how it was called. V. 13. a. b.

Pol (St) killed by the Duke of Guiſe. III. 299. and a. b.

Poland erected into a kingdom. II. 58. and b. Intrigues formed to place the crown of Poland on the head of the Duke of Longueville. I. 171. a. b. Thoſe who began the work of the reformation there, made a ſtrange falſe ſtep in oppoſing the marriage of Sigiſmond Auguſtus. III. 847. a. b.

Poland (the Queen of) takes upon her to elect a ſucceſſor in the King's life-time. III. 852. a. She gives two thouſand crowns towards the charge of publiſhing a book of Aſtrology. IV. 265. a. b.

Polemo, his converſion. V. 570. a. b.

Polyander, Profeſſor of Divinity at Leyden, was the moſt moderate adverſary that the Arminians had. I. 654. a. b.

Polyanthea, the Hiſtory of that work. III. 725. a. b.

Polybius, what he relates of Pruſias. IV. 556. a. b. The judgment which Caſaubon paſſes on Perot's tranſlation of that author. 585. b. 586. a. What he ſays of the duty of an Hiſtorian. V. 359. b. Peraxylus publiſhes an edition of him. IV. 545. b.

Policy makes uſe of the moſt ridiculous pretences. I. 54. a. b. Frequently occaſions the breach of promiſe. 419. b. It is oftentimes the trueſt policy to pay one's court to perſons in diſgrace. 422. a. Every thing is ſacrificed to it. II. 103. a. b. The policy of Princes, has ſomething that is capracious, when it conſiſts in debauching each other's ſubjects. 360. b. It requires ſometimes that perſons ſhould declare themſelves betimes enemies to the ſtrongeſt party. III. 569. a.

Polycrates cauſes Smerdias to be ſhaved. I. 292. a.

Polygamy: there is a ſpiritual Polygamy which churchmen fall into. I. 56. a. Polygamy allowed by a Pope. III. 166. a. Made a capital crime by Henry II. 404. b. 405. a. b. The nations which practice it, have a frightful idea of the Chriſtian doctrine in this point. IV. 57. a. b.

Polygamia Triumphatrix, how the author of that book explained theſe words, increaſe and multiply. III. 709. a. b. It was condemned, and the author baniſhed from Denmark. 973.

Polygamites never formed a ſect. IV. 392. b. 393. a.

Polynices, by his fall Amphiaraus obtains the victory. I. 446. a.

Politian, his retrograde Latin verſe. II. 248. a. A thing which John Laſcaris reproaches him with. IV. 705. b. How his vanity was checked. V. 165. a. Quoted. 265. b. 266. a. n. (29).

Politeneſs very much neglected. V. 540. a.

Politicians have a language peculiar to themſelves. V. 753. a.

Politics: a diſorder unavoidable in Politics. II. 224. b. Why the fineſt ſyſtems of Politics fail in practice. III. 469. a. How defined by ſome body. V. 751. b. &c.

Politics of the Clergy of France, a character of that book. I. 490. a. b.

Polyxena took care to ſpread her gown about her feet, that ſhe might fall decently. II. 56. a.

Pollio (Aſinius) his judgment of Cæſar's Commentaries. II. 417. b. By pleading well he acquired the facility of pleading, and by pleading often, he rendered himſelf the leſs capable of pleading well. IV. 408. a. b.

Polonus (Martin) enlarges upon the ſtory of Pope-Joan. IV. 728, 729. Takes his materials from the Otia Imperialia of Gervaſe of Tilburi. 738. b. 739. a. b. Remarks upon the editions and enlargements of his Chronicle. 708. a. b. The manuſcripts of his Chronicle very different: ſome of them contain the ſtory of the She-Pope, others not, the teſtimony of celebrated authors on that head. ibid. b. to 712. a. b.

Pompey, it was thought that he would not have made a good uſe of the victory, in caſe he had obtained it. II. 167. b. From a deſire to ſpare blood-ſhed, he loſt an opportunity of putting an end to the war. 416. a. It has been obſerved that he did not begin to be unfortunate, till ſuch time as he defended the beſt cauſe. 565. a. What Flora ſaid of him. III. 56. The women were fond of him. 57. Marc Antony orders his goods to be ſold by inch of candle. 119. a. He knew nothing of his wife's intrigues, tho' they were publickly talked of. 382. a. What he did in order to aggrandize himſelf. IV. 281. a. He was not very happy in his marriages. ibid. b. Flies to Egypt for refuge. 282. a. b. His ability, as a General, was eclipſed in the battle of Pharſalia. V. 372. a. b. Cæſar ſaid that he had acquired the ſirname of Great, for having vanquiſhed ſome people, that knew nothing of war. 180. a. b.

Pompeia placed Cæſar in the ſame category, wherein he had put ſo many other huſbands. II. 424. b.

Pomponacius treats Auguſtin Niphus, with a great deal of reſpect and good manners. IV. 380. b.

Pompone, Anne of Auſtria liked the fruit which came from that place. I. 487. b.

Pomponius Lætus, impeached at Rome, for changing the names of young men. IV. 685. a.

Ponceau (James) cauſes the works of James des Parts to be printed. IV. 484. a.

Ponect, what he preached at Paris againſt a new fraternity. III. 410. a.

Poneropolis, a city which a King of Macedonia cauſed to be built. II. 248. a.

Pons (the Biſhop of St) eſteemed by the Proteſtants, and for what reaſon. IV. 243. a.

Pons (Antony de) Count de Marennes, the change that appeared in him, after the death of his firſt wife. IV. 480. a. b. His family deemed as antient as that of Aeſt. ibid. b.

Pontanus (Jovian) the ſtory that he tells of a Spaniſh Monk. II. 386. b. 387. a. b. What he ſays of Fortune. V. 371. b. 372. a. Verſes which he made upon a lady that ſhewed her breaſt. 421. b. 422. a.

Ponthieu, who is the author of the Genealogical Hiſtory of its Counts. I. 11.

Pontifical, Graſſis is ſorry at its being made public. III. 217. a.

Pontifs, who enjoyed a very great power among the Heathens. II. 531. a. b.

Pontius (Conſtantius) his conviction gave ground for ſome ſuſpicions relating to Charles V. II. 336. b. Whether he was that Emperor's confeſſor. ibid. His death. ibid. Facts that concern him. 440. b. 441. a.

Pontius (Herennius) what he declared in relation to the conduct of his ſon. I. 732. a.

Poor; Michael Savonarola took no fee for preſcribing to them. V. 57.

Pope Joan, the book which Blondel publiſhed concerning her, gave offence. II. 24. a. b. Matters of fact concerning that book. ibid. 25. a. b. Mr Spanheim writ a book, to re-eſtabliſh Pope Joan. 25. a. Verſes in old French about her. III. 77. a. b. 78. a. b. John des Caurres, a Roman Catholic author, tells the ſtory of Pope Joan, without the leaſt doubt of the truth of it. II. 400. A little part of the controverſy concerning that woman. 530. b. The Proteſtants now-a-days write books to maintain the ſtory of Pope Joan. IV. 732. This Controverſy has been thought an affair of the utmoſt conſequence, but when all is done, it is a trifle. 733. Conjectures about the origin of the ſaid ſtory. 738, 739. It was forged by Prieſts and Monks in the breaſt of Popery. 728. b. 736. a. b. 737. a. 709. a. b. And adopted by a vaſt many others. 709. a. b. &c. The ſtory of Pope Joan, according to the moſt circumſtantial account that is given of it. 730. a. b. 731. a. b. Proteſtant authors who maintained the truth of it, after Florimond de Remond's book, and that of Father Labbe, came out. 732. a. b. 733. a. Proteſtant authors who have not believed it. 733. a. b. Whether the ſaid adventure, reflects ignominy on the Church of Rome. 736. a. b. The moſt antient author that has mentioned it, is poſterior by two hundred years, and inconſiſtent with the cotemporary authors. 738. a. b. It was a proper ſtory for all ſorts of authors. ibid. b. The Proteſtants are accuſed of obſtinacy, with reſpect to it. 739. b. 740. a. b. It is to be found in the Chronicle of Martin Polonus; although ſome learned men do not believe that part of the Chronicle to be his. 708. and b. 709. a. b. & ſeq. Peter du Moulin did not believe the ſtory of Pope Joan. 280. and a. b. Its partizans reckon Radulphus Flaviacenſis among their evidences. 824. a. b.

Popeliniere (la) draws a bad parallel. II. 764. a. b. Had like to have been cruſhed to pieces, for ſome things which he had related. IV. 862. b. Quoted. V. 496. a. b. n. (38). Promiſes to publiſh the memoirs of Villegaignon's life, and does not do it. 478. b.

Popery has repaired one of its breaches in France. II. 125. a. b. The conduct of the Romiſh Clergy, contributed much to its deſtruction. V. 482. a. A digreſſion againſt thoſe who have ſo often foretold its fall in vain. II. 122. a. b. 123. a. b. 124. a. b. 125. a. b. 126. a. b. 127. a. b. No body imagined that it would fall by its own crazineſs. 123. a. b. It has not been weakened in the laſt ten years of the XVIIth century. 125. b. The intrigues and plots of the Jeſuit William Criton, to re-eſtabliſh it in Great Britain. 576. Joſeph Hall was very zealous againſt it. III. 342. a. b. Two authors both alike fooliſh, wrote the one upon the deſtruction of Popery, and the other upon the deſtruction of the Proteſtants. V. 237. a. b. 238. a. b.

Popes; how perſons may be ſaved, that obey two different Popes. I. 179. a. b. Privileges which their flatterers aſcribe to them. 231. a. b. An inſtance of great ſubmiſſion to their cenſurers. 606. a. b. It is an article of the Roman faith, that the Pope may depoſe ſovereigns. 656. a. b. The medium which Bellarmin choſe, with reſpect to the Pope's power over the temporalities of Kings, pleaſed no party. 731. b. 732. a. Whether it be neceſſary that a Pope ſhould be ſcrupulous and devout. 732. b. 733. a. The interval of time between the death of one Pope, and the election of another, produces a thouſand diſorders. II. 238. b. 239. a. They concur with the Princes, in extending the Latin tongue. 517. a. Ought not to oppoſe the Emperors with temporal arms. 588. a. Nor uſurp a power over the temporalities of Kings. 594. a. b. 595. a. b. As ſovereign Princes, they follow the principles of the religion of a ſovereign. 758. b. The authority which they have acquired in Rome, is much more ſurpriſing than that of its antient Emperors. III. 228. a. b. Who it was that freed them from a ſervile dependance on the Emperors. ibid. b. Whether the eſtabliſhment of their exceſſive power, muſt have been a difficult undertaking. ibid. 234. a. b. 235. a. b. 236. a. b. To be a good Pope, it is not enough to have all the virtues of a good Clergyman. 326. b. The corruption of morals that appeared in the perſons of ſome Popes. 328, 329. What glory they may promiſe themſelves, if they ſet up to reform abuſes. 330. b. Who was the firſt Pope that gloried in having baſtards. 565. a. They can do nothing againſt againſt the Canons of Councils. 741. a. The cuſtom of kiſſing their hand, changed into that of kiſſing their feet. 760. a. The acknowledgment which a Pope made. IV. 633. b. 634. a. When a perſon may lawfully exhort the Princes who are not Catholics, to make war upon the Pope. II. 127. b. Their authority reſtored to its firſt ſplendor. 125. a. b. Verſes upon the ſearch, which they were formerly obliged to undergo, before their election. IV. 730. b.

Popes and Cardinals accuſed of making a jeſt of the Chriſtian religion. II. 274. b. 275. a. b. Prieſts of the Pope's palace, make a jeſt of it likewiſe. ibid.

Poppæa, Nero kills her by a kick on the belly. II. 256. a.

Populace: to what lengths the populace, when in a mutiny, are capable of carrying their fury. III. 39. b. 40. a.

Porcien (the Prince of) what he deſired of his wife, not long before he died. III. 296. a.

Porphyry, his prepoſſeſſion. I. 268. a. Upon what it was grounded. 269. a. He ſpeaks only of Ammonius's Philoſophical doctrine. ibid. a. b. Whether he believed that beaſts were no more than Automata. IV. 553. a. Having reſolved to kill himſelf, his maſter diſſuaded him from it. 690. a. He believed that beaſts had the faculty of reaſoning and ſpeaking. 911. b. What he ſays of Theopompus. V. 332. a. b. He accuſes the Chriſtians of forging ſeveral books. 638. b.

Portail (Mr) Advocate-General in the Parliament of Paris, marries Mr Roſe's daughter. IV. 917. b.

Portico: there went a proverb, that without Chryſippus, there would be no Portico. II. 492. a.

Port-Royal, Hiſtorical facts relating to that monaſtery. I. 485. b. 486. a. b. Whether the children of quality, of twelve or thirteen years of age, were ſuffered there to read the Socinian books. 492. b. What arguments the gentlemen of Port-Royal made uſe of to perſuade Mr de Turenne, to change his religion. II. 518. a. b. 519. a. They had once ſchools, but thoſe have been ſuppreſſed. IV. 364. a. b. Accuſed of having intelligence with Geneva, by Father Meynier the Jeſuit. V. 16. b. Reflexions on the Controverſy between the gentlemen of Port-Royal and Mounſier Claude, about the Devil's conference with Luther. 73. a. b.

Portugal (Sebaſtian, King of) upon the perſuaſion of the Jeſuits hazards a battle with the Moors, who were three times ſtronger than he. III. 871. b.

Portugal (the Infanta, daughter to Dom Pedro, King of) dies a maid in the year 1690. IV. 762. Her marriage with the Duke of Savoy, had been concluded upon, reaſonings which that occaſioned, and a confutation on that head pointed out. ibid.

Portus (Francis) his anſwer to Peter Charpentier, contains many particulars that are greatly to the ſhame of the latter. II. 447. b.

Poſidonius, we muſt not rely on his teſtimony, as to what concerns the invention of the Atomical ſyſtem. III. 788. a. b. What honours he had paid to him by Pompey. IV. 67. a.

Poſſeſſed perſons, who neither underſtand Greek nor Latin. II. 148. b. 149. a. An obſervation upon the knowledge of tongues, that is aſcribed to them. III. 211. a. b.

Poſſevin, an anachroniſm which that author is guilty of. I. 651. a. He gets a book, which he had never read, to be condemned by the inquiſition. IV. 13. b. 14. a. Sets up for a Converter in the vallies of Piedmont. III. 944. a. b. Sometimes judged of books which he had never read. V. 68. b. Cenſured. I. 769. a.

Poſſible: whether a thing that never was, nor ever ſhall be, is poſſible. I. 759. a. 760. b. 761. a. II. 495. b. 496. a. b.

Poſtel, a learned man, and a fool. III. 883.

Poſthumous: a model propoſed to thoſe who publiſh poſthumous books. IV. 594.

Poſts, who ſettled them in France. III. 801.

Poverty obliges ſeveral perſons to cultivate learning. V. 589. a. b.

Pours (Jeremiah de) a Walloon miniſter, quoted. I. 1. a. n. (3). III. 330. a. n. (92). IV. 158. a. b. n. (82), (83), (84). 159. a. b. n. (85), (86), (87), (89), (91), (92), (93). 160. a. n. (94), (95).

Power: the Civil and Eccleſiaſtical power, ſtand in need of each other. I. 244. a. V. 514. b.

Power (Regal) Althuſius quoted as one that had ſpoken diſreſpectfully of it. I. 237. b.

Powerful: the benefit of mankind requires that no Prince ſhould become too powerful. V. 670.

Powers (Eccleſiaſtical) deſigned by the Watchmen of the city, in the Song of Solomon, an explanation occaſioned by the author's impriſonment. III. 772. a. b.

Poxed: who is the Patron of ſuch as are poxed in the Church of Rome. III. 573. a.

Pragmatic Sanction, the abuſes under it, were not fewer than they have been ſince the Concordate. IV. 766. a. b.

Pray: it was the cuſtom of the Eaſtern people, to turn their faces towards one particular point of the heavens when they prayed. IV. 176. a.

Prayers are oppoſed by counter-prayers. I. 161. a. The doctrine of the Peripatetics, concerning prayers and ſacrifices. 468. a. The prayers of the ſlothful are unacceptable to God. II. 691. a. There are difficulties to be examined touching their efficacy. V. 181. a. b. A perſon ſhould begin with them, when he is deliberating upon ſuch a dangerous point as that of matrimony. I. 603. b.

Praiſe: the deſire of praiſing people, occaſions many faults. III. 489. a.

Praiſe is ſeldom the only end of thoſe, who are not ſatiſfied with the teſtimony of their own conſciences I. 279. a. Extravagant praiſes do more hurt than honour to a perſon. 601. a. b. It is not an eaſy matter to renounce praiſe. II. 298. a. b. 299. a. A perſon cannot be ſaid to be worthy of praiſe, when he only abſtains from doing a perfidious action. 437. b. We ſhould delay beſtowing praiſes on people till they are dead. IV. 431. b. The praiſes that are beſtowed on people, are not always in a juſt proportion to their merit. II. 515. b.

Praſſicius (Luke) behaves handſomly to Auguſtin Niphus. IV. 380. b.

Prateolus cenſured in point of Chronology. I. 90. a. b. Aſcribes an extravagant doctrine to the Anabaptiſts. 290. a. b. He put in his alphabet a great many ſects that never exiſted. 790. a. Trumps up an imaginary ſect of Melchiorites. IV. 193.

Pratum Spirituale, its viſions. IV. 415. b. 416. a.

Preach: a ſingular manner of preaching. II. 287. b. Formerly it required a prodigious deal of learning to preach very ill, and now a man needs but little to preach well. 105. b.

Preacher: the ignorance of a Preacher. I. 101. a. Another is mortified at being told that he ~~hired~~ tired the patience of his hearers. II. 287. b. Another produces ſurprizing effects. 299. a. b. 374. b. 375. a. One that was prodigiouſly followed. 544. a. A Preacher, who upon an extraordinary occaſion, preached ſeven times in one day. 695. b. One who coughed exactly at ſuch and ſuch a period. III. 18. a. One who compoſed in Latin, the ſermons he was to preach in French. 839. a. b. A turbulent and factious Preacher, does not deſerve the name of Orator, and why. IV. 581. b. One that drinks in the pulpit. 725. a. Another whoſe way of preaching was ſomewhat comical. 722. b. Preachers have a great advantage over Lawyers. I. 61. b. Are to be feared. 89. b. They are very ill uſed. 654. a. Nothing more fatal to a State, than hot-headed Preachers. II. 95. and a. b. 96. a. Preachers like much to ſee the churches full of hearers. 112. b. They get nothing by being obſtinate againſt the torrent of the faſhions. 544. b. 545. a. b. Whether one ought to take every thing they ſay in a literal ſenſe. III. 895. b. 896. a. There are ſome of them who may be compared to the nightingale. IV. 290. b. Whether thoſe that are famous ſhould print their ſermons. 315. b. Tycho Brahe wiſhed that a good many of them were Mathematicians. 680. a. Preachers who can enter into the intereſt of the people, are to be feared. 722. a. The moſt famous Preachers, generally ſpeaking, are not very profound Divines. 757. b. 758. a. b. There are ſome of them, who rather chuſe to be baniſhed, or not to preach at all, than to cut ſhort their ſermons. 759. b.

Preachers (ſeditious) France was full of them in the year 1594, and in the year 1595. II. 95. and a. b. 96. a. 101. b. 102. a. A paſſage of Cardinal d'Oſſat, d'Oſſat, and of his Commentator, on that head. III. 279. b. Supported by the people, they are capable of bringing about any revolution whatſoever. ibid. The adventure of one who had foretold the end of the world. V. 236. and a. b. 237. and a. b.

Pre-Adamites, ſome of their difficulties. II. 246. a. b. 247. a. b.

Pre-Adamites, who is the author of that book. IV. 529. a. And what happened to him and it. ibid. a. b. &c.

Predeſtination; there is no Hypotheſis, touching the doctrine of Predeſtination, which removes all difficulties. I. 481. a. b. 482. a. The doctrine of St Auguſtin, of Janſenius, of Calvin, and of the Thomiſts, is entirely the ſame on that ſubject. 564. a. b. Bellarmin did not follow the doctrine of the Jeſuits on that ſubject. 728. a. b. Bolſec inveighs againſt it. II. 59. a. b. The diſputes about the conſequences of Predeſtination, had a being among the antient Philoſophers. 332. b. 333. a. Had the diſputes which it occaſions at this day, prevailed in the time of the Manichees, they would have given great advantages to them. IV. 517. a. b. 518. a. b. 519. a. Abſolute Predeſtination is not a fit ſubject to begin with, in preaching the Goſpel to Infidels. 846. b. 847. a. One may err in that point, through a good motive. V. 153. a. b. 154. a. It is a ſcandal, that the diſputes about Predeſtination, ſhould produce ſuch an invenomed hatred. 154. a. St Paul has no other way to get rid of the difficulties that attend it, but by having recourſe to the abſolute power, which God has over his creatures. 821. It is one of the myſteries that bear hardeſt upon reaſon. 822. The diſputes on that ſubject have only proceeded from this, that people have handled them, as if they could be reconciled with reaſon. ibid. and 823. Paſſages of Morus and Mr Pectet, touching the incomprehenſibility of it. ibid. and 824. See Grace.

Predictions: what Poetical predictions reſemble. I. 794. a. Aſtrological predictions, tho' in themſelves they be no more than chimera's, do nevertheleſs produce real evils. II. 380. a. b. Philoſophy is nonpluſſed by what is ſaid of them. 392. a. b. Thoſe who cry them up have too much neglected to guard againſt an incredulous reaſoner. ibid. b. 393. a. A Dilemma againſt the authors of predictions. III. 232. a. b. The moſt chimerical have had ſome parts of them confirmed by the event. 481. b. What is the univerſal ſpirit of the makers of predictions. IV. 116. a. b. The anſwer that one of them made to an objection, ſtarted by the Queen of Poland. ibid. b. The weakneſs of the argument that is made uſe of to prove the certainty of them. 182. b. Reflexions on what is ſaid of them. 369. b. 370. a. It would be of great uſe to keep a regiſter of ſome predictions. 431. b. We ought not to be ſurprized, if ſeveral of thoſe which have been made by falſe Prophets, come to paſs. 899. a. Whether Savonarola's predictions were grounded upon his knowledge in Scripture and human reaſoning, or on Divine revelation. V. 64. b. 65. a. b.

Prefaces and Epiſtles Dedicatory, ought never to be left out in the editions of books, cum Notis Variorum. I. 225. b. Should be dated with exactneſs. V. 256. a. There are falſhoods in prefaces, which ought not to paſs for venial ſins. I. 496. b. 497. a. It is a greater fault than is commonly believed, not to read them. II. 142. b. There is nothing more neceſſary to be conſulted by the author of ſuch a work as this. 8. b. Prefaces that are moſt admired. 261. b. They ought not to be left out in the new editions of books. I. 225. b. IV. 164. a. b. A piece of raillery upon thoſe who affirm in their prefaces, that they have been forced to publiſh their works. 173. b. 174. a. b. Peliſſon's preface to the works of Saraſin, is a maſter-piece. 538. Excellent prefaces. ibid. n. (c).

Prejudices: things are praiſed or blamed, according to the different prejudices of men. I. 294. b. How difficult it is for a man to get the better of them in his ſearch after truth. IV. 537. a. Their bad conſequences. V. 153. a. b. 154. a. The ſtrange effects of prejudice. IV. 46. a.

Prejudices in religion, their bad effects. I. 784. a. b.

Prejudices: who is the author of the book intituled, Lawful Prejudices againſt the Calviniſts. I. 493. b.

Prelates: the advice that was given to a Prelate one day by his miſtreſs. I. 743. b. At what time they began to frequent the Court, and the ill effects it produced. III. 93. b. Their reſidence in their Dioceſes, has no manner of influence towards the reformation of manners and abuſes. 591. b. They are often made a ſacrifice to the Pope, in the quarrels that Princes have with him. 611. b.

Premonſtratenſes, the founder of that order, converts a great many Heretics. V. 292.

Preſages, the vanity of them. II. 445. a. b. Reaſons againſt the doctrine of Preſages. 629. a. b. 630. a. Reflexions on what people commonly think of them. IV. 565. a. b.

Preſcience: God's Preſcience is no-ways inconſiſtent with the liberty of the creature. I. 661. b.

Preſcription is ſometimes an invincible proof that a fact is falſe. II. 61. a.

Preſence (Real): John Poinet admits a Real Preſence, but he will have it to be no more than ſacramental at the ſame time. IV. 693. b.

Preſents ought to be made by the perſons who love, and not by thoſe who are loved. II. 508. a.

Preſs: famous men that have been correctors of the preſs. II. 293. and a. b. III. 731. b. 732. a. IV. 295. a. 843, 844. The abuſes of the preſs. V. 764.

Preſter John, why the Emperors of the Abyſſines have been called by that name. I. 36.

Pretorſhip, when that office was inſtituted in Rome. II. 290. a. Whether a Conſul ever deſcended to that employment. 346. a. b. In what caſe this happened ſometimes. ibid.

Preuil (St) whether he was put to death for no other reaſon, but becauſe he had diſpleaſed Cardinal Richelieu. III. 818. a. b. 819. a.

Priam, wherein his happineſs conſiſted, according to Tiberius. II. 719. a. Where, how, and by whom he was killed. IV. 659. a. b.

Pride, it may have ſome ſhare in our moſt commendable actions. I. 460. a. b. It is the ordinary paſſion of thoſe who are not addicted to pleaſures. III. 223. a. Called the Sacred Diſeaſe. 789. a. It is the failing of moſt great wits. ibid.

Prideaux, Quoted. IV. 47. b. n. (267), (269), (270). 48. a. b. n. (271), (273), (274), (275). 176. a. b. n. (1), (2), (3), (4), (5), (6), (7). 177. a. b. n. (8), (9), (10). 178. a. b. n. (11), (13).

Prierias (Sylveſter) confounded with Ferrarienſis. III. 32.

Prierio, a village in Italy, where ſituated. IV. 772. n. (a).

Prieſt: a reflexion on the Jewiſh High-Prieſt not being allowed to marry unleſs with a virgin. I. 533. a. b.

Prieſthood: what excluded people from the prieſthood, even at the time when married perſons were not excluded from it. I. 533. a. b.

Prieſts are the moſt terrible of all accuſers. I. 468. a. According to Montagne, there is nothing more ridiculous than their ſquare caps. II. 93. b. A Prieſt turns informer againſt an Abbeſs whom he was in love with. 277. a. There are a great many of them who go about, and offer themſelves from door to door, to ſay Maſſes at a low rate. 373. a. b. What they oppoſed to Farel's eloquence. III. 11. a. b. The Prieſts of the North are more difficultly brought to undergo the yoke of Celibacy than thoſe of the South. 229. a. There was a time when concubinage was not looked upon as ſhameful among them. 887. a. A Prieſt who beat Viret in ſuch a violent manner that he was left for dead. V. 481. a. b. George Braun's oration againſt the Prieſts that kept concubines. II. 121.

Prieſts (Salian) what Quintilian ſaid of them. IV. 161. b.

Princes, A reply that a Prince made. I. 130. b. A Prince cannot expreſs any ſort of a command more abſolute than that of a requeſt. 583. b. People pay dear ſometimes for attacking a Prince by libels. II. 216. b. Their goodneſs contributes more than their wickedneſs towards dethroning them. I. 273. b. II. 100. a. b. 739. a. They are not acquainted with every thing that is contained in books dedicated cated to them. I. 338. People ought to be cautious how they behave to young Princes. 377. b. What we look upon as their unhappineſs, is only a leſs evil. II. 220. a. We ought not to be ſurprized at their being leſs deſerving than they ſhould be. 256. b. 257. a. Their politics have ſomething that is capricious, when it conſiſts in debauching one another's ſubjects. 360. b. The neceſſity to which they are reduced of doing certain things is more the cauſe of their unhappineſs than glory. 416. b. 417. a. They have no greater enemies than Flatterers, Poets, Panegyriſts, Soothſayers, and Aſtrologers. 437. a. They neglect thoſe whom they think themſelves ſure of, and labour chiefly to gain thoſe whom they diſtruſt. 443. a. b. III. 421. a. One word from them will have a greater influence towards reforming the faſhions, than all the ſermons in the world. II. 545. b. It is not ſufficient to make our court to them in order to obtain ſomething from them, if we do not likewiſe make our court to their favourites. 602. a. b. 603. a. They are ſerved with more zeal than God, and are nevertheleſs very often the ſlaves of their ſlaves. ibid. The moſt part of great Princes are unfortunate in their own families. 607. b. 608. a. They play upon the Public. 675. b. They govern the people, but intereſt governs them. 754. b. 755. a. A man ought to wiſh for good Princes, and bear with thoſe that are bad. 785. a. Their honour is very often ſacrificed to the intereſt of a Miniſter. III. 59. b. Their perſecuting edicts expoſe them to great inconveniences. 397. a. Their inſincerity diſapproved of by Henry the Great. 422. a. b. They ſeldom end their quarrels with the Pope, but to their own confuſion. 611. a. b. They have few enemies whom they ought to look upon as inconſiderable. 715. b. They have had a power to make laws concerning the obſtacles of marriage, and no body has taken it from them. 741. b. Whether it is proper that they ſhould be ſcrupulous. 797. b. 798. a. Their interviews do more harm than good. 809. a. b. Their jealouſies. 816. b. 817. a. n. (22). They cannot always govern their ſtates with their beads in their hand. IV. 13. a. It may be ſaid with reſpect to them that people generally forſake the ſetting ſun, and ſhew reſpect to the riſing ſun. 21. a. b. Their edicts often contain honourable things which are nothing but lies. 147. b. There are Princes, who are much more at a loſs than other men, what reſolution to take when their wives are unchaſte. 339. a. b. They ought never to expoſe their Majeſty unguarded. 429. May ſhare the cares of the government with a Miniſter. 494. b. 495. a. It is ſcarce poſſible to be ſincere when we ſpeak of thoſe that are living, or of thoſe whoſe ſons do ſtill reign. ibid. Good Princes take pleaſure in diſtributing their favours themſelves, and intruſt their Miniſters with the care of puniſhing people. 573. b. They make war upon one another, and are reconciled when they pleaſe. 698. a. See Kings. It is dangerous to adviſe them. 795. a. They ſhould never offend any body with railleries. V. 278. a. b. 279. a. b. A book where there are ſome good things concerning the qualities which they ought to have. II. 403. Different authors who have writ for their inſtruction, and the different methods which they have taken. IV. 918. a. b. People rather chuſe to commit a ſin than to diſpleaſe thoſe who have it in their power to make or ruin their fortune. V. 811. We cannot form a certain judgment of them from the writings that are publiſhed againſt them in the heat of factions. III. 516. a. b. The attachment of their enemies to a new religion, is to them a ſtrong argument of the falſhood of it. V. 652. There are a great many occaſions, when they have the diſadvantage, without deſerving to be blamed for it. 655.

Princeſſes are obliged to make the firſt advances in love to their inferiors. II. 312. a. b. Cannot conceal their age. IV. 333. a. Could never ſucceed in any intrigue of gallantry, if they had not their confidents. 335. a.

Principalities (Elective) generally thoſe who are raiſed to them are men of very aſpiring minds. I. 364. a.

Principle: divers opinions concerning the principle of all things. II. 298. b. 299. a.

Principles; to embrace one we muſt not wait till it be free from all difficulties. I. 241. b. Moſt perſons alter their principles as they change their country and intereſts. 642. b. Men are little governed by their principles. IV. 39. b.

Principles (the doctrine of two) the one good, and the other bad: the origin of that doctrine IV. 517. a. b. 518. a. b. to 522. a. 571. b. 572. a. Empedocles was the firſt who ſuppoſed two principles. IV. 584 b. See Evils.

Printers (famous). I. 602. a. b. Their errors are ſometimes of great conſequence. 633. a. How they multiply writers. II. 541. b. Which may lead compilers into ſtrange miſtakes. ibid. The confuſion that one of their blunders occaſioned. 734. b. 735. a. b. Authors are greatly diſturbed thereat. V. 582. b. They are not to be charged with all the faults that are to be met with in books. III. 661. a. b. Authors ſhould not apply to a Printer the moment they are paſſed their childhood. IV. 164. b. 165. a.

Printing, when it was invented. I. 166. a. Was not uſed in Europe, till about the middle of the XVth century. 578. b. Illiterate perſons judged incapable of exerciſing that art. 755. b. 335. b. 336. a. Tori contributed greatly to the bringing the Printing types to perfection. V. 388. A book which he writ on that ſubject. ibid.

Prints: authors ought not to put falſe prints into their books. II. 100. b.

Priolo (Benjamin) what he ſays of the Princeſs of Condé. II. 137. b. 138. a. And of the lady de Guebriant. III. 265. a. b. 266. a. And of four court ladies. 265. b. 266. a.

Priorato (Galeazzo Gualdo) what he ſays with reſpect to the conſequences of the victory of Avein. III. 829. b.

Priſcianenſis (Franciſcus) publiſhed the firſt edition of Arnobius's works. I. 503. a.

Priſcillian is put to death for his hereſies. III. 758. a. b.

Privileges to Books, why the States of Holland grant them. V. 804. The privilege to this Dictionary was not granted, till after a long examination of the oppoſition which the Printers of Moreri made to it. ibid.

Probity, how Seneca the Father defines it. I. 185.

Proceſs: A ſingular proceſs raiſed about a penſion left to a cat. IV. 918. b.

Proceſſion: A proceſſion made by Francis I, to expiate the wicked attempt of the Heretics. II. 191. a.

Proclus, whether he believed that beaſts were no more than Automata. IV. 553. a. b.

Procopius, who firſt publiſhed his Hiſtory in Greek. III. 478. a.

Proculus, his laſciviouſneſs. III. 415. a.

Prodicus was the founder of the ſect of the Adamites. I. 110. a. b. 111. b.

Prodigies multiplied through the facility of the Pagans. I. a. b. Frequently make more noiſe in remote countries than in thoſe where it is pretended that they happened. III. 487. b.

Προηροσίαι, ſacrifices which the Athenians offered in behalf of all the Greeks. I. 5. a. And for what. ibid.

Profanation: an horrible profanation of ſeveral holy things under Hadrian. I. 648. b. 649. a.

Profeſſions: an important advice to thoſe who exerciſe any particular profeſſion. I. 337. a. A man ought to keep himſelf within the bounds of his profeſſion. V. 367. b. The Germans learn but one. I. 64. b. The French apply themſelves readily to ſeveral. ibid.

Profeſſors, the meanneſſes of ſome, and their ſordid love for gain, which makes them run from one poſt to another. I. 56. a. b. 193. b. 195. a. b. II. 622. a. b. A profeſſor who makes an extraordinary acknowledgment. I. 488. a. b. The profeſſors of Philoſophy in the univerſities of France do not explain Politics. II. 6. b. The death of one profeſſor may reſtore peace to the ſocieties. 29. b. There are ſome profeſſors who reſerve the ſolution of the greateſt difficulties, for thoſe who give them moſt money. 287. a. The greateſt part of them have their writings under their eye, when they read a lecture. 722. a. What ſome of them put over the doors of their ſchools.

ſchools. 861. a. Some of them permit their boarders to do what they pleaſe, and for what reaſon. III. 663. a. b. A book which contained nothing but the reproaches which two famous profeſſors divulged one againſt another. IV. 122. a. Complaints againſt the multitude of profeſſors. V. 229. b. 230. a.

Prognoſtics, the credulity with which people collect and apply them. III. 811. a.

Prometheus, how puniſhed by Jupiter, and for what. III. 630. a. Faſtened to mount Caucaſus. II. 82. b.

Promiſes, which are often made, but very rarely kept. V. 659.

Pronunciation: a profeſſor whoſe pronunciation was exceeding agreeable. IV. 477. a. The country pronunciation does prejudice to a man's eloquence. V. 183. and a. b.

Propœtides, women that Venus inſtigated to proſtitute themſelves, becauſe they would not own her to be a goddeſs. IV. 642. a.

Properties of things, no reaſon can be given for them, but when theſe things have been made freely by a cauſe, that had ſome reaſons and motives in producing them. II. 644. a. There are many natural properties which are aſcribed to miraculous cauſes. III. 645. b. 646. a.

Propertius criticized. IV. 181. a.

Prophecies, thoſe who explain them will never own themſelves to have been in the wrong. I. 7. b. What excuſe St Bernard made for his falſe prophecies. 774. b. Are trumped up for political ends. II. 387. a. b. An example of prophetic cheats. ibid. A ſpecimen of the frauds which are committed by the help of prophecies. 444. a. b. The moſt chimerical may bring about great revolutions. 693. b. Prophecies have at all times been forged by thoſe who had a mind to induce people to a revolt. III. 684. a. Braunbom's new diſcoveries on the explication of them. II. 122. To talk of accompliſhing them is endeavouring to introduce ſlaughter and maſſacre every where. 127. b. Thoſe who have the ſovereign authority among the Proteſtants have no regard to the vain interpretations that are put upon them. ibid.

Prophets, the imperfection of their knowledge. I. 280. a. In the colleges of the Egyptian Prieſts, they were called prophets, who were in the nature of Deans or Superiors. 347. a. The illuſions and evaſions of the modern prophets. II. 692. b. The Princes who laugh at them moſt, do nevertheleſs make uſe of them with great ſucceſs. 693. b. How they come to be ſo often miſled. III. 436. b. A good touch-ſtone to know whether they be true prophets. IV. 36. a. b. Some people endeavour to vindicate the new prophets, at the expence of the old ones mentioned in the Scripture. 889. b. 890. a. Their end and deſign in balloting the numbers of the Apocalypſe. II. 123. b. Are as bold as ever, when they find themſelves contradicted by the event. 124. a. One of their artifices. V. 72. 73. Thoſe who are not ſupported by the ſecular arm, are expoſed to terrible changes of fortune. 73. and b.

Propoſitions that are condemned ſhould be each of them particularized. I. 340. a. b. A reflexion on the indeterminate way of cenſuring them. ibid. and 607. a. The method of extracting them when there is a deſign to have a book cenſured. 606. a. b. Whether two contradictory propoſitions are ſometimes true and ſometimes falſe. 506. b. 507. a. Whether it follows that every propoſition being either true or falſe, all things happen by the force of deſtiny. II. 790. b. 791. a.

Proſperity, whether it be a mark of the true church. IV. 31. b. 322. a. b. 33. a. b. 50. b. 51. a. b. 52. a. An inſtance of the vanity thereof. III. 815. b. 816. a. The inconſtancy of mens reaſonings with reſpect to adverſity and proſperity. IV. 51. a. The falſe conſequences that are drawn from proſperity and adverſity. 55. a. b. 216. a. b.

Protagoras looked upon religion as a problematical thing. II. 652. b.

Protection, gratitude towards a Prince that affords it, renders a man unfit to write of thoſe things in which that Prince is intereſted. III. 345. and a. b.

Protector, a name given to Hugh Capet's ſon-in-law, and for what reaſon. I. 9.

Protectores Domeſtici; to enter into that body, it was neceſſary for a man to be of a good family. IV. 104.

Proteſtant Religion, there are ſome perſons, who could wiſh that we had the Hiſtory of the growth and progreſs of it, written neither by a Roman Catholic, nor by a Proteſtant. IV. 862. a. b.

Proteſtants; when and where their ruin was projected. I. 119. a. b. It has been ſaid that after they had ſhaken off the Pope's yoke, they found that the yoke of the Secular Power is not eaſier. 214. They have always maintained, that there was no need of miracles to juſtify the Reformation. III. 737. b. An aſſembly of them is detected at Paris, in the year 1557, to the number of four hundred perſons, ſeven of whom were burnt. I. 790. a. They obtain almoſt every thing they pleaſe, after the flight of Charles V, before Duke Maurice. II. 440. a. Thoſe whom the Emperor had baniſhed out of his dominions, were always in hopes of being reſtored. 691. b. Their affairs cannot fail to be in a happy ſituation, and why. 758. b. How uſeful the emulation of Charles V, and Francis I, proved to them. III. 94. a. b. The Duke of Orleans, Francis the firſt's ſecond ſon, offers to allow them the free exerciſe of their religion. 96. a. b. Favoured by the Roman Catholic Princes. 94. a. b. 397. b. 403. a. b. Their deſign to form a kind of league againſt the enterprizes of the Jeſuits. 504. a. They do not calumniate the Catholics, when they reproach them with the miracles that are to be found in their Legends. IV. 28. b. Their re-union is treated of. 286. b. Should leave off writing controverſial books againſt one another. 680. a. b. 681. a. b. They very much miſtruſt the Jeſuits that are willing to embrace their religion. 855. a. Informations againſt ſome of their meetings at Paris. 882. a. b. There was nothing captious in the clauſe of the confeſſion, which they preſented to the King at Poiſſy. V. 28. a. Why a Pope prognoſticated that their religion would be of no long continuance. 172. a. Penſioned by the Cardinal of Lorrain. III. 874. b. Every one of them has received an order like that which Ehud received. II. 123. a. They become maſters of ſeveral cities. ibid. b. Weakened and oppreſſed by the Catholics, during the laſt ten years of the XVIIth century. 125. b. When a man may lawfully exhort them to make war upon the Pope. 127. b. Thoſe who have the ſovereign authority among them, do not meaſure their conduct by the predictions of their writers. ibid. They ſtill write books to maintain the ſtory of Pope Joan. IV. 732. Have not underſtood the intereſt of their party, in relation to that ſtory, which is of little moment to them. 739. Are not equitable in their behaviour to Blondel, whom they ſhould have imitated. ibid. Their diſputes with the Jeſuits were never ſo violent, as during the firſt thirty years of the XVIIth century. 727. a. Proteſtant authors, who maintained the ſtory of Pope Joan, after Florimond de Remond's book, and that of Father Labbe came out. 732. a. b. 733. a. Proteſtant authors who have not believed it. 733. a. They ſpeak very diſadvantageouſly of Pope Paul. II. 509. Did not add the ſtory of Pope Joan, to the Chronicle of Martin Polonus. 709. a. Eſteem Ruyſbroeck's works. 942. b. Their way of proceeding, with reſpect to the obſcenities related by their own writers, or by the Papiſts. V. 857. Have declared for Savonarola, but they only conſidered him on his fair ſide. IV. 67. a. b. 68. a. b. Gave him the title of Martyr. 69. a. b. 70. a. b. Accuſed of a violent and ſeditious humour. 89. a. b. Two authors, both equally mad, write the one upon the ruin of the Proteſtant religion, the other upon the ruin of Popery. 562. and a. b. 563. and a. b. They make uſe of Windeck's maxims, as a handle to throw the blame of the wars in Germany, upon the Court of Vienna. 263, 264. a. b.

Protogenes, a Painter who was never ſatisfied with his own works. III. 836. b. V. 135. b.

Provençals, their clamours againſt Mr de Launoi, upon his attempting to cure them of ſome errors. I. 362.

Provence; Peter de Quiqueran, writes a book on the praiſes of that Province. IV. 818.

Proverb, the original of the Proverb Græcum eſt, non poteſt legi. I. 67. a.

Providence, the vanity of man makes him doubt of it. I. 24. a. The axiom of a modern author on Providence. 94. b. Is ſuperior to all our deſigns however well concerted. 361. b. Whether a man may be virtuous, without fearing it. 541. II. 783. b. 784. a. People diſpoſe of it a little too raſhly. I. 776. a. And are too ready to ſearch into its counſels. IV. 55. a. b. 73. a. Whether the Providence that made the world, made alſo the diſeaſes and vices to which men are liable. II. 496. b. 497. a. The Poets ſpeak of it under too bold metaphors. 543. The proſperity of wicked men, never makes thoſe queſtion a Providence, who ſhare in that proſperity, or who at leaſt receive no damage from it. 652. b. The reaſons which are drawn from the common courſe of Providence to prove it, are not good for all ſorts of unbelievers. 655. b. It has been ſaid that the puniſhment of ſome impious perſons, was a ſentence of abſolution for Providence. 670. b. n. (93). We very often ſee thoſe, who fancy themſelves inſpired, diſtruſting it. 691. a. b. Providence does not hear the prayers of the ſlothful. ibid. Whether ſuch as deny it are not capable to live in ſociety. 776. a. b. 777. a. b. In what reſpects it is eaſy for Providence to pleaſe every body. III. 2. b. 3. a. Its decrees break through all obſtacles. 293. a. A complaint againſt it, on account of the proſperity of the wicked. 357. a. b. A ſect which denies it, and goes even farther than Epicurus. 550. and a. b. How far Providence raiſes and depreſſes men, when it pleaſes. 747. The ill qualities of men, are at ſome ſeaſons more proper than their good ones, to execute the decrees of Providence. 945. a. Whether it can be ſaid that Providence overthrows worldly greatneſs and proſperity, to ſhew it is a power. IV. 575. a. b. 576. a. Is called in queſtion, on account of the proſperity of wicked men. II. 670. b. n. (93). IV. 932. b. 933. a. b. 934. a. b. 935. a. b. Conſidered one way, it is of no great uſe to lead worldly people to virtue. V. 181. a. b. 182. a. How much the doctrine of Providence can contribute towards making us virtuous and happy men. 326. a. b. It ſometimes blinds men. 373. a.

Province: on what the glory of a Province depends at certain times. I. 482. a. It is a ſign that a man is of a mean extraction, when he bears the name of his Province. IV. 173. a. b.

Provinces, their boundaries have often been altered. I. 537.

Provinces of the Low-Countries, together with Franche Comté, formed the circle of Burgundy. II. 222. Charles V had a deſign to erect them into a kingdom, and give it the name of Regnum Leoninum. ibid. 223.

Provinces (United) who was their firſt Ambaſſador at the Court of France. I. 3. And what rank was given to their Ambaſſadors there, after that time. ibid. The affairs of the United Provinces went on better and better every day, from the time that a Viſionary had threatened them with the vengeance of heaven. III. 690. b. They are the bulwark of the empire, the ſtrongeſt ſupport of the Netherlands, and the mediators and guarantees of peace. 851. b. Very ill treated in a ſpeech, under the name of Herimannus Conrad. II. 550. See States General.

Provincial (letters to the) See Letters (Provincial).

Provincials (or country Squires) ridiculed by Moliere, and for what. I. 188. a. Are great fumblers. IV. 461. b.

Prudence, whether it allows us to reſiſt violent ſpirits. I. 195. b. Human prudence is, properly ſpeaking, the ſport of the Providence of God. V. 678.

Prudentius, a ſhort account of that Poet's life. IV. 786. b. 789. a.

Pruſſia erected into a kingdom. V. 194. a.

Pſalms tranſlated into French verſe, to what tunes they were ſung. I. 478. b. Facts concerning Marot's tranſlation of them. IV. 157. a. b. 158. a. b. 159. a. b. 160. a. b. 161. a. b. And concerning Beza's tranſlation. ibid. The church of Geneva, which was the firſt that made uſe of Marot's and Beza's verſion, was alſo the firſt that forſook it. 161. b. 162. a. Reckoned inferior or equal to Pindar. 704. b. 705. a. Sainte-Aldegonde's tranſlation had the ſame fate with that of Conrart. V. 20. b. An alteration of taſte, with reſpect to theſe ſpiritual ſongs. 446. a. b. Tranſlated into Italian verſe by Giulio Cæſare Paſchali. IV. 492.

Pſalms and proſe devotions of the Church: they were the Opera's of the XVth and XVIth centuries. II. 481. b.

Pſalter, the Proteſtants reproached with an alteration which they had made in their's. IV. 164. a. b. When the Pſalter of the Proteſtants was printed with a licence. ibid.

Pſammenius weeps not for the misfortune of his children, but weeps for that of his friends. IV. 570. b. n. (52).

Pſammitichus brings the whole kingdom of Egypt under ſubjection to himſelf. IV. 343. a.

Pterelaus, obſervations on his cup. V. 307. b. 308. a.

Ptolomy, the intricacy and confuſion of his ſyſtem, with reſpect to the celeſtial ſpheres. II. 379. b. Who firſt publiſhed his Almageſt in Greek. III. 255. b.

Public was impoſed upon, long before the invention of the Gazette. I. 129. The ingratitude of the Public. 212. a. b. For the inſtruction of the Public, it is neceſſary to diſcover both the good, and the bad, of great men. 564. The capricious humour of the Public, with reſpect to the works of the learned. 625. b. II. 523. a. b. 524. a. Deſerves reſpect. I. 668. b. Whether vices are ſometimes more beneficial to the Public than virtues. III. 293. b. The mercenary ſpirit of thoſe who ſerve the Public. 339. b. 340. a. b. 341. a. b. With what boldneſs people impoſe upon the Public. V. 643. a. A girl married at the public expence. I. 56.

Publican; the character of a Publican decried in the Goſpel, and profane authors. V. 465. a.

Puer; in good Latin authors, a perſon goes ſometimes under that denomination, at twenty years of age. IV. 171. b.

Puis (Madam de) leaves a penſion to her cat, and thereby occaſions a remarkable law-ſuit. IV. 918. b.

Pulmo Marinus, what it is. IV. 677. b. 678. a.

Pulpit, formerly a prodigious deal of uſeleſs reading was diſplayed there. II. 105. b.

Puniſh: a whole people puniſhed for the crime of a particular perſon. I. 158. b. 159. a. What Bion ſaid with reſpect to the common obſervation, that Divine juſtice puniſhes the faults of the Fathers in their children. II. 12. b. The Pagans, repreſented their gods under the idea of Beings, who puniſh one crime by inducing the offender to commit another. IV. 229. and b.

Puniſhment: conſideration on the eternity of puniſhment. V. 175. b.

Puns are at preſent quite out of doors. II. 616. a.

Purgatory: what a banterer ſaid of Francis I, with reſpect to Purgatory. II. 372. b. 373. a.

Puriſts have impoveriſhed the French language too much. III. 208. a. b. 209. a. Their ſtrange principles. V. 840, 841, 844, &c. Do not conſult the intereſt of modeſty in their affected expreſſions. 846. There have been ſome ſuch in all ages. 851. The inconſiſtency of their conduct. 856, 857.

Puritans, whence ſo called. I 256. a. b.

Purum Putum, the meaning of that expreſſion. I. 227. a.

Puteanus (Erycius) has written concerning the point of day. V. 779. Has expreſſed himſelf ill in ſpeaking of thoſe who go round the world eaſtward. 780. Confuted by Michalor, who forgets to object one thing to him. ibid.

Q

Q, A beneficed man is deprived of his revenues, for his manner of pronouncing that letter. IV. 837. a. b.

Qualities: the effect of the proportions and diſproportions, between the qualities of one and the ſame man. I. 698. a. b. The difference there is between manifeſt and occult qualities. II. 677. b.

Qualities (Corporeal) are not in the objects. IV. 654. a. b.

Quarters: an anſwer which has been made at different times, concerning the King's Quarters. III. 718. a. b.

Queen of France: a title given to Elizabeth, Queen of England; and Beza ridiculouſly charged with it as a crime. I. 800. a. b.

Queens, what they ought to do, in order to place their ſex upon a good foot. III. 814. a. Conſiderations upon their unlawful amours. IV. 308. b. 309. a. A Queen that was nurſe to her ſon. II. 382. a. b.

Queens Dowagers often raiſe cabals to the prejudice of their children. IV. 558. a.

Queens of Spain, that have been educated in France or Germany, fall into a kind of ſervitude. IV. 368. b.

Quercetanus has a very bad character given him by Patin. IV. 58. a.

Querela Infantium, there are divers copies of that book in the libraries of Paris. II. 556. a. b.

Quernus promoted to the dignity of Poet Laureat, and ſolemnly crowned. III. 763. a.

Queſtion: it is almoſt impoſſible to determine any queſtion by verbal diſputes. IV. 688. b.

Queſtion Roiale & ſa Deciſion: an explanation touching that book. V. 15. b. 16. a. b.

Quæſtorſhip, perſons that had been Conſuls, did not decline that office, though it was a dignity inferior to that of a Prætor. II. 346. b.

Quid pro quo: nothing is more frequent among authors, than Quid pro quo's. I. 78. b.

Quick commended for his collection of the Synods of France. I. 671. b. n. (6).

Quietiſm, notions that come very near it. I. 155. a. b. Its conformity with ſpiritual Origeniſm. IV. 421. a. We find the ſeeds thereof in Plato. 690. b. Taught in the eaſt as well as in the weſt. V. 202. b. 203. a. 302. a. b.

Quietiſts, a ſpecimen of their viſions. II. 118. a. b. 678. a. b. They pretend that their principles are as antient as myſtical Divinity. ibid. b. What they ſay of the falſity of the notions, under which the Deity is commonly repreſented, approved of by ſome Philoſophers. ibid.

Quinaut, verſes wrote upon him. V. 400. a. b.

Quintilian, the judgment that he paſſes on Pacuvius and Accius. I. 61. a. Has preſerved a reflexion full of good ſenſe. ibid. b. What he ſays of a profeſſed accuſer. II. 356. b. And of facility in writing. III. 262. b. And of a writing which the author is continually mending and new-molding. 837. a. n. (21). He cenſures thoſe authors who can never be ſatisfied with themſelves. IV. 85. b. n. (49).

Quintin (John) his judgment of the annals of Aquitain, by John Bouchet. II. 103. a. b. 104. a.

Quintus Curtius had a greater effect in curing a ſick perſon, than Avicenna, and the other writers upon Phyſic. IV. 311. a. A tranſlation of that author into the Turkiſh language promiſed. V. 223. b. n. (c).

Quiſterpius blamed without reaſon by Mr Arnauld. III. 246. a.

Quotation: ſometimes thoſe who undertake the correction of a work, ſtrike out certain things in one place, and leave elſewhere a quotation of the very ſame things. V. 276. b.

Quotations, reflexion on thoſe that are falſified. III. 203. a. It would be a very uſeful thing to make a collection of falſe quotations. IV. 108. b. It is dangerous to truſt them, when they have not been compared with the original. V. 255. b. The ridiculous practice of thoſe who heaped quotations on quotations, and intermixed the ſacred and profane. II. 105. b. 106. a.

Quote: people ſhould ſtick religiouſly to the words of the authors whom they quote. I. 338. a. b. 610. a. V. 307. b. 308. a. It is a bad cuſtom not to quote authors. I. 453. a. II. 324. b. Balzac's artifice in this point. 398. b. What a perfect exactneſs requires of us in quoting a book. 634. a. The impertinence of thoſe who quote Plato and Ariſtotle, to prove a thought common to all ages and nations. IV. 209. b. n. (24). An advice to thoſe who quote authors. 231. b. A reflexion upon a certain way of quoting. 376. a. Rules to be obſerved in quoting. 770. a. b. A wrong way of quoting authors. V. 325. b.

Quoters reduced to two claſſes. II. 778. b. 779. a. Whether they have more trouble in compoſing, than authors that do not quote. ibid.

R.

R*ABBI:* a famous Rabbi converted by a learned woman in a regular diſputation. V. 298. b.

Rabbins, their idle ſtories with reſpect to Adam's lamenting the death of Abel, and abſtaining from any carnal commerce with Eve. I. 23. a. How ſome of them explain the ſeventh verſe of the 51ſt Pſalm. II. 612. a. Their explication of that verſe does not well agree with the doctrine of Original Sin. ibid. What they have imagined in order to explain the variations of nature. IV. 94. a. b. What they ſay about a ſmall bone which is in the human body, and which they call Luz. I. 649. b. 650. a. b. IV. 376. b. 665. b. Thoughts of ſome Rabbins upon the ſouls of beaſts. 904. b. 905. a. b. 906. a. b.

Rabec ſuffers martyrdom. V. 197. a. b.

Rabelais, what Girac ſays of him. IV. 542. b. The author was not much pleaſed with him: he is nevertheleſs read and eſteemed by many people of honour and worth. V. 802.

Rabelais Reformed, what that book is, and by whom compoſed III. 133. b. 134. a.

Rabutin (Buſſi) quoted. I. 446. a. n. (2). V. 76. a. n. (8). What an Abbot wrote to him. III. 166. a. A Latin epigram writ againſt him. IV. 196. a. Facts that concern him. 753. b. &c. What he ſays about the contrariety of ingredients in the human compoſition. IV. 441. a. Whether he be author of the book intituled Amours du Palais Royal. V. 753. b. 754. a. An acknowledgment that he makes. 756. His Amours des Gauls more dangerous than the ſatire of Petronius. 847.

Racan, what thing about him he ſet the greateſt value upon. V. 384. a.

Rack, the inconveniencies that attend the uſe of it. III. 238. b.

Racovia, when and upon what occaſion the college which the Unitarians had erected there, was demoliſhed. V. 168. a. 173. b. 174. a.

Ragguagli di Parnaſſo, who is the author of that book. II. 38.

Ragotſki (Sigiſmond) what commiſſion he received in the name of God. II. 691. b. His perplexity with regard to the war that he was ſollicited to make. 692. Revelations are publiſhed after that Prince's death, which ſuppoſed him ſtill alive. ibid. a.

Ragotſki (George) initiated into the myſteries of Drabicius, II. 693. a. b.

Raguenau, a ſatire againſt him. II. 604. a.

Railleries of perſons that were burnt in effigy. II. 85. b. Cannot be good if they have no other foundation but lies. 527. a. III. 378. b. 379. a. 631. b. See Jeſts. There are ſome raillieries ſo ingenious that though a perſon be nettled at them, he has not a good pretence to complain. IV. 777. b.

Raynaud (Theophilus) concealing himſelf under the name of S. Emonerius, writes againſt John Barnes's treatiſe of equivocations. I. 660. a. Accuſed of having cenſured the Apoſtles creed. III. 144. a.

Raynoldi (William) what is reported of him and his brother. V. 275. a. b.

Ralph Higden, a Benedictin Monk, confounded with Radulphus Flaviacenſis. IV. 824. a. b.

Ralph the Black, otherwiſe called Radulphus Flaviacenſis. IV. 824.

Rambouillet-Houſe, an encomium upon it. III. 177. a.

Rambouillet (Madam de) her virtue. IV. 83. a.

Ramiſm involved in Theological diſputes. II. 696. a. b. 697. a. Flouriſhes in Swiſſerland. IV. 842. b.

Ramiſts, their diſputes involved in the diſputes of Divines. II. 696. a. b. 697. a. We juſtly laugh now-a-days at their quarrels wtih the Peripatetics. 697. a.

Rampalle (the Sieur de) what he tells us of a King of Lydia. IV. 563. a.

Ramus, an epigram writ againſt him. IV. 474. b. 475. a. He was one of the heads of the cabal which endeavoured to change the form of church diſcipline. V. 738. His method greatly eſteemed by William Adolphus Scribonius. 100.

Rapes puniſhed with death in France. IV. 636. b. Cannot be juſtified. ibid. 637. a. b. Reflexion upon the rapes of fair damſels in romances. III. 365. a. b. 366. a.

Rapin (Nicolas) Lieutenant of the ſhort robe, his converſation with the Jeſuit Guignard, as the latter was going to be executed. III. 276. b.

Rapin (Father) is of opinion that the XVIIth century is ſuperior to the XVIth, in knowledge and ingenuity. I. 92. b. Cenſured for ſeveral errors touching the ſtudies and different employments of Ariſtotle. 464. a. b. 465. a. b. He did not give himſelf the trouble of conſulting originals. 472. a. A fine reflexion which he makes upon great men. 619. b. His error with reſpect to a paſſage of Plutarch where Epicurus is mentioned. II. 775. b. 776. a. Quoted. 849. a. b. n. (40), (42).

Ratan, a very malignant ulcer. I. 39. a.

Ratiſbon: the Hiſtory of the conference of Ratiſbon. III. 535. b. 536. a. b. 537. a. Baillet's judgment upon what paſſed in that conference. 536. a. b.

Ravaillac, whether he could have been induced by the doctrine of the Jeſuits to aſſaſſinate Henry IV. IV. 128. b. 129. a. b. 130. a. What moved him to commit ſuch a Parricide. 131. a.

Ré, the confounding of that iſle with the iſle of Rié, occaſions an anachroniſm. V. 188. a.

Readers are ſeldom mortified when they do not underſtand an author, and why. I. 218. a. b. The moſt part of them are ſeldom ſenſible of an error in reaſoning. 419. a. What ſort of readers are moſt prone to criticize. III. 337. a. b. An author ſhould wiſh for ſuch as are neither ignorant nor very learned. 905. b. 906. a. Are ſometimes more prejudiced than the author whom they accuſe of partiality. II. 310. a. b. Are not candid enough. ibid. b. 311. a. There are ſome readers ſo warm that they tear out of their copies ſuch things as are ignominious to their ſect. IV. 711. b. Many of them do not compare one whole book to another whole book. V. 180. a. There are ſome who in the margin of their books write abuſive reflexions, or give the authors the lie. 846.

Reading; one of the greateſt uſes that may be drawn from it, is to learn the weakneſſes of the heart of man, and the ill effects of prejudices in point of religion. I. 784. b. Too profuſely diſplayed towards the beginning of the XVIIth century. II. 105. b. 106. a. b. A paſſage of la Bruyere on that head 105. b. A paſſage of Balzac on the ſame ſubject. ibid. 106. a. An advocate who pleaded thus, pleaded more for himſelf than for his Client. ibid. b. It could only ſerve to withdraw the Judge's attention. ibid.

Real (the Abbot de St) unjuſtly cenſured, with reſpect to the Squittinio della Libertà Veneta. V. 449. a. b. Quoted. III. 808. a. b. n. (124), (125), (126), (127), (128), (129). IV. 657. a. n. (36). V. 366. a. b. n. (26), (27), (28).

Reaſon has different faces. I. 681. b. Whether the light of reaſon ought to be conſulted. II. 111. b. The vanity and weakneſs of it. 799. a. b. IV. 95. b. 96. a. 323. a. b. 513. a. b. 514. a. b. 515. a. A reflexion upon its weakneſſes. III. 459. b. It can only diſcover to us our ignorance and weakneſs, and the neceſſity of a revelation. IV. 96. a. It wages a continual war with the body and the ſenſes. 440. a. Is not able to make us do what ſhe makes us approve. 442. a. The Philoſophers obſerved the ſlavery of reaſon, and ſuſpected the cauſe that produced it; they were not ignorant that the power of reaſon is loſt, and its light nevertheleſs preſerved. 441. a. b. How deplorable its fate is. 514. b. 515. a. It is uſeful to humble it. 519. a. Its weakeneſs ſhould conduct us to the light of revelation. ibid. What Cotta ſays of it. 516. b. 517. a. Is a ſource of deception as well as the ſenſes. 592. a. V. 441. a. b. It is not reaſon but faith that makes us Chriſtians. IV. 591. b. 592. a. Whether evidence which is the Non plus ultra of reaſon can be what they call Criterium Veritatis. 654. b. V. 586. b. Whether by following the light of reaſon, and ſhaking off the yoke of tradition a perſon is led to Atheiſm. 441. a. b. See Philoſophy. The beſt reaſons loſe their weight, when they are alledged by a perſon in miſerable circumſtances. IV. 852. b. 853. a. The myſteries of the Goſpel are above it, or even contrary to it. V. 815. Divines will always have the worſt in a diſpute where they ſhall only appeal to the light of reaſon. ibid. It cannot furniſh anſwers to its own objections, we muſt have recourſe to the authority of God. ibid. The Catholics and Proteſtants agree to reject it in the controverſies about the myſteries of religion. 817. Such Proteſtants as ſtudy to make more room for it in Divinity, are ſuſpected of Socinianiſm. ibid. Its ſtrange miſtakes, when it treats of divine matters. 820. A perſon ſhould renounce it, in order to receive faith. 834. The ludicrous way in which this reflection has been expreſſed, and the authors confutation. ibid. Reaſon ſhould be ſilent when the word of God ſpeaks. 817. 830.

Reaſonings, there are ſome which one may elude by turning them into a jeſt. I. 639. b. 640. a. b.

Re-baptize: whether children, baptized by a woman, ſhould be re-baptized. I. 704. b.

Rebellion: the head of the rebellion, requires a greater ſubmiſſion than the true maſter. III. 299. b.

Rebels, whether they do all that they can, whereas thoſe who fight for their Prince do no more than they ought. I. 711. a. b. Their artifices. 265. a. Their common proteſtation that they have no deſign againſt the King. II. 735. a.

Rebenſtock, his Colloquia Menſalia, the Hiſtory of that book. III. 938. b.

Recollects; Aloiſio de Leon draws up their rules. III. 772.

Recommend: it is very dangerous to recommend an abler perſon than one's ſelf. II. 372. a.

Reconciliation, a feaſt which the Jews ſolemnize by the oblation of a cock and other ceremonies. III. 125. a. b.

Red-hair'd People ſacrificed to the ghoſt of King Oſiris. II. 233.

Redi, his book on the generation of inſects, quoted. IV. 517. a. n. (38).

Reform: an attempt to reform abuſes may ſometimes have criminal motives. V. 459. b. 460. a.

Reformation of the Church, what it was that gave ſeveral perſons a diſlike to it. I. 139. a. b. And retarded the progreſs of it. 285. a. Perſons who all their life-time made profeſſion of the Catholic religion, though they wiſhed for a reformation. 659. Baudouin writes a treatiſe of the means of attaining to a good reformation. 697. b. Cameron found many things in the Reformed Church, which wanted a farther reformation. II. 288. and a. b. A perſon may believe that the Church ſtands in need of reformation, without approving a certain manner of reforming it. 374. a. What judgment ſome paſſed upon it in the beginning. 799. a. b. 810. b. 811. a. b. Perſons that were not far from it in their hearts, but who diſapproved of the conduct of thoſe that were eſtabliſhing it. 799. a. It was ſupported by the emulation of Charles V, and Francis I. III. 94. a. b. The reformation which Queen Elizabeth eſtabliſhed. II. 754. b. Attacked in Holland. III. 675. a. b. It could not have been undertaken at a more favourable time. 947. b. 948. a. b. 954. b. V. 482. a. b. Inconveniencies that ſprung up at its birth. IV. 46. and a. b. What faults Eraſmus obſerved in the meaſures that were taken againſt it. III. 954. b. Melanchthon did not approve all the manners of it. IV. 185. b. Favoured by Margaret de Valois Queen of Navarre. 317. b. 318. a. b. 319. a. b. 320. a. 321. a. b. And by Joan Queen of Navarre. 324. b. 325. a. b. 326. a. b. 327. a. b. &c. The progreſs it made by means of the King and Queen of Navarre. 325. b. 326. a. b. 327. a. b. The reſtoration of polite literature made way for the Reformation. V. 286. b. The project of reformation which was drawn up at Cologn. 557. a. b. 558. a. b.

Reformation of Manners is of a ſhort continuance. IV. 353. b. 354. a.

Reformed; Thuanus calls them a ſuſpicious people. I. 119. a. Some of them would have adopted the ſlanders that were publiſhed againſt Beza, if he had written againſt their party. 797. a. b. They had very near got the upper hand in France. III. 507. b. 508.

b. 508. a. b. Whether they behaved at that time in too oſtentatious a manner. ibid. b. 509. a. To what they aſcribed the perſecution which they ſuffered under the reign of Henry II. IV. 698. b. The libel which George Boſquet writ againſt them condemned to be burnt. II. 95. a. b. They laughed at Brocard's Prophetical viſions. 144. b. Acknowledged Caraccioli as a Biſhop, after he had publickly embraced their religion. 313. a. b. 314. a. b. An Arrêt of the Parliament of Paris, by which any one is permitted to kill them. 458. b. Cenſured with reſpect to an alteration made in their Pſalter. IV. 164. a. b. Their affairs were not in a bad ſituation at the time of the conference of Poiſſy. ibid. a. Baniſhed out of England, and cruelly perſecuted in Germany. V. 550. b. They are very jealous in the point of a total ſubmiſſion to the myſteries of religion, and defend it zealouſly againſt the Socinians. 817. Accuſed of a violent and ſeditious humour. 89. a.

Reformers; they clamoured loudly againſt the Peripatetic Philoſophy, and for what reaſon, according to Father Rapin. I. 472. b. 473. a. The keen ſtyle of two among them did them great ſervice. II. 60. b. 61. a. A reproach caſt upon them, as if they warred againſt Rome for the ſame reaſons the Grecians did againſt Troy, for the ſake of a woman. 266. b. The violent diſpoſition of ſome of them has been looked upon as neceſſary. III. 11. a. The calumnies publiſhed againſt them are deſtitute of all probability. 935. a. b. 936. a. b. 937. a. b. 938. a. b. 939. b. 945. a. b. 946 a. b. 947. a. b. 948. a. b. 949. a. The fabulous impertinencies that were publiſhed againſt them. ibid. b.

Refuge, See Aſylums.

Refugees, Abraham is their Patriarch. I. 44. a. They hoped that their re-admiſſion would be made an article of the peace of Munſter. II. 691. b.

Refutation: a ſlight refutation of a book does only ſerve the more to recommend it. V. 179. b.

Refutations: certain refutations have contributed to the increaſing of Socinus's ſect. V. 179. a. b. There is no refutation ſo pitiful as not to diſcover ſome defects in the book of an adverſary. 180. a.

Refute: there are people who take a much greater pleaſure in refuting what was advanced by others, than in laying down any thing certain of their own. I. 620. and b. The moſt frank and fair way of refuting an adverſary's book. V. 505. b. 506. a.

Regius, his maxim, when the queſtion is to ſpeak of God exactly. IV. 876. b.

Regiſter to the Parliament of Paris, that office was enjoyed by the Tillet family for above a century. V. 354. and b.

Regius Profeſſor at Utrecht, brought into trouble for a Theſis concerning the union of the ſoul and body. III. 195. and a. b. 196. a. b.

Regius (Raphael) frequents Greek lectures at ſeventy years of age. IV. 292. a. b. 293. a.

Regnier, ſome of his verſes. III. 517. b. 518. a. An examination of what he ſays, that every one is the author of his own fortune. V. 368. b. 369. a. b. &c. Quoted. 402. b. n. (26).

Regnier Deſmarets (the Abbot) quoted. V. 582. b. n. (102).

Regnum Leoninum; Charles V, had a deſign to erect the provinces of the Low-Countries into a kingdom under that name. II. 222. 223.

Regulus, his maxim ought to be followed in a ſpecial manner when the queſtion is how Heretics are to be dealt with. I. 789. a. b.

Reign: it is not always ſure to judge of the reign of a Prince by the firſt years of it. V. 655.

Reign: the deſire of reigning ſtifles all ſentiments of humanity. II. 381. and b. Why it is a difficult matter to reign well. I. 573. b.

Reineccius compoſes the elogy of James Horſtius. III. 487.

Relations; whether ſuch truths as may appear ſhocking to modeſty ſhould be ſuppreſſed in them. II. 30. a. b. 31. a. b. After what manner people flouriſh upon them. II. 405. b. 406. a. b. &c. The falſe relations that are given of public miſfortunes ſerve as a foundation to Hiſtorians. 749. a. b.

Relations in Proſe, it would be often neceſſary to give notice that they are ſet off with poetical fictions. I. 747. b.

Relicks, ſeveral Pagan cities boaſted of having the ſame. II. 530. a. b. 531. a. What Pomponatius ſaid of them. IV. 716. b. Certain relicks loſt, and others ſubſtituted in their place. 826. a. b. 827. a. A collection of relicks that was made with great pains: the price of them falls after Luther's reformation. V. 457. b. 458. a. Calvin's advertiſement concerning the general inventory that it would have been proper to make of them. II. 274. b. The deſtruction that was made of them in France. ibid.

Religio Medici, the religion of a Phyſician; a book which according to ſome might be intituled: The Phyſician of Religion. V. 835. Paſſages of that book. ibid. The author of it: what his notion was concerning the manner after which men propagate their ſpecies. 6. a.

Religion is ſo far from making the ſovereigns maſters of their ſubjects, that it gives their ſubjects a power over them. I. 13. a. It is not a mere human invention. ibid. Diſputes in religion cauſe terrible diſorders. 23. b. 24. a. Policy dares not commit the ſupport of it to God only. 94. a. b. Indifference in the point of religion is a very odious thing. 97. b. It is the fate of all religions to be the worſe for age. 223. a. b. Religion often ſerves for a pretence to accuſers. 307. a. Mockers at religion are apt to miſlead young perſons. II. 12. b. Whether a man deſerves praiſe for reſiſting temptations to change his religion. 27. a. b. It comes in every where, and even in the moſt fierce duels. 128. b. The ill cuſtom of intereſting religion in the diſputes of the learned. 141. b. The goodneſs of a religion is not to be judged of by the good or bad ſucceſs of a battle. 195. What Charron ſaid of it. 453. b. 454. a. A piece of a parallel between different religions. 465. 466. It cannot be concluded whether a man has any religion or not, from his witty ſayings either for or againſt it. 670. a. b. 671. a. It is a more common thing than people imagine, to be wholly ignorant in matters of religion. 677. b. 678. a. b. Revolutions in religion ſeldom happen, but when people at firſt aſk for themſelves a toleration which they refuſe to others. III. 147. a. b. Religion is divided into factions, juſt as commonwealths are. 172. b. The inconveniences that attend the diſputes which Divines raiſe about religion. 360. a. b. 361. a. Religion alone can furniſh us with ſtrong weapons againſt the Sophiſtry of the Cynics. 459. b. Many people leave their country for it, without renouncing their vices. 586. b. An inconveniency ariſing from the unity of religion. 642. b. Diſputes about religion that were carried on in Holland. 675. a. b. 676. a. The maxims of a Latitudinarian on that head. ibid. b. 677. a. b. There are nations which have no religion at all. 781. a. b. Whether the great changes that happen ſometimes in religion ſhould be attributed to the conſtellations. 948. a. b. Controverſies about religion make but few Sceptics. ibid. b. 949. a. Who thoſe are, that ought carefully to conſider the miſchiefs which are produced by civil wars on account of religion. IV. 18. a. b. 19. a. In the affair of religion heaven has been repreſented as reſembling the earth. 354. a. b. A man ſhould never change his religion, unleſs he can be a gainer by the change. 375. a. b. It is more advantageous to believe than not to believe what it teaches. 489. a. n. (55). The diſorder in which it leaves the hearts and minds of men, when it is falſe. 562. a. b. There is one which is called the religion of prudent men. 859. b. 860. a. Falſe religion in ſome ſort degrades a man to the condition of a brute beaſt. V. 77. b. There are ſome men whoſe religion is in their mind, and not in their heart, and there are others whoſe religion is in their heart, and not in their mind. 208. a. b. Perſons accuſed of abſtaining from the public exerciſes of religion. 257. and a. b. 258. a. The deſign of changing one's religion carries with it ſomething aſtoniſhing, and even thoſe who are fully reſolved to execute it, can hardly bring themſelves to do ſo. 539. a. How remarkably Lucius Junius Brutus mitigated an article of religion. II. 163. a. b. The United Provinces accuſed of taking no care of religion, but as far as it appears uſeful to them to aggrandize themſelves. 550. a. b.

We ought not to affect ſubtilties in matters of religion. III. 343. b. Perſons who have fled for their religion: nothing is more common, than to ſee them ringing the alarm againſt the ſects. 758. Perſons that have no religion, by what they are excited to a good moral life. V. 811. The end and ſubſtance of religion, is to imitate God. 812. Without the true religion, there is no true virtue. ibid. Reflexions upon the ſlanders that are publiſhed againſt thoſe who change their religion. 225. a. b. 226. a. The extravagancies of romances have crept into religion. I. 166.

Religion (the prevailing) has its ſtate-tricks as well as temporal Princes. III. 948. a. b. A maxim againſt a man, who goes about to oppoſe it. V. 314. a b.

Religion of the Sovereign. See Sovereign.

Religion (Natural) a falſe way of reaſoning, may bring a man to deny it. I. 97. a. What it is. ibid. a b.

Religion (Chriſtian) the Celſus's and Porphyry's would have attacked it with the weapons which Mary d'Agreda furniſhes them with. I. 137. b. What Hierocles wrote againſt it. III. 444. a. b. 445. a. The Popes and Cardinals accuſed by Calvin, of making a jeſt of it. II. 274. b. 275. a. Eraſmus quoted on that head. ibid. a. b. n. †. (189). There are good proofs of the truth of it, in Socinus's treatiſe de Auctoritate S. Scripturæ. V. 180. b. Its principle. 830. Its diſcuſſions, diſputes, and controverſies cannot be carried to the Tribunal of Philoſophy, but only to that of Revelation. ibid.

Religion (Romiſh) the exerciſe of it is abſolutely forbid in Bearn. IV. 327. a. b. See Church of Rome.

Religion (Reformed) the teſtimony which a Libertine finds himſelf obliged to give to it. II. 649. b.

Religion (Jewiſh): Bodin in his dialogue concerning religions, gives the advantage to the Jewiſh. II. 45. a.

Religion (Mahometan) profaned. I. 49. a. How much larger the extent of it is, than that of the Chriſtian religion. IV. 26. a.

Religions: a treatiſe on the toleration of Religions by Mr de Beauval. I. 672. a. A work deſigned to effect the coalition of Religions. 689. a. b. In all Religions, people are ſtrangely inclined to think themſelves favoured by miracles. II. 552. a.

Remedy: it is a remedy for ſome people to diſcharge their choler upon paper. I. 43. There are remedies which do more harm, than the diſorders which they are deſigned to cure. IV. 578. a. A Phyſician who implored the bleſſing of God upon his remedies. III. 486. a. b.

Remond (Florimond de) what he relates touching a project, to re-unite Sweden to the Church of Rome. III. 138. b. 139. a. Quoted with reſpect to the Pſalms. IV. 157. a. b. n. (69), (70), (71), (72), (73). The anſwer that was made to him concerning the conformity of the tunes of ſome Pſalms with thoſe of ballads. 159. a. b. 160. a. Is the Purveyor-General of the Roman Catholic writers, who ſpeak of the Reformers of the XVIth century. 393. a. What he ſays of Brocardus. II. 144. a. b. 145. a. A groſs blunder which Blondel reproaches him with. IV. 106. a. b. What he ſays with reſpect to what Beza had advanced, concerning the She-Pope, at the conference of Poiſſi. 736, 737. The Proteſtants were not confounded at his work concerning the She-Pope, they deſpiſed it. 732. a. b. & ſeq. The work is not bad, but too full of digreſſions and declamations. 733. b. Many aſcribe it to the Jeſuit Richeome. ibid. He unjuſtly accuſes Heroldus, of having added the ſtory of the She-Pope, to the Chronicle of Martin Polonus. 709. a.

Remonſtrants, their five articles are no fundamental Hereſies. III 174. a. Accuſed of having troubled the Church. 343. a. b.

Renatus, King of Sicily, was a Painter. IV. 307. and b. 308. a.

Renaudie (la) harangues his accomplices. III. 285. a. b. The cauſes of John Du Tillet's averſion for him. V. 353. and a. b. 354. a. b.

Renaudot (the Abbot), reflexions upon his judgment concerning this Dictionary. V. 797. to 809. The characters of him, and of the judgment which he paſſes. 797, 798. There are falſities in that judgment: the reaſon for which the author does not point them out. 804. What ſorts of faults he imputes to the author. ibid. and 805.

Rennes, the diſorders of that dioceſe occaſioned by the Clergy. III. 60.

Renou (John de) his Antidotary quoted. I. 677. a. b. n. (1), (2). He pretends that there are certain words, which prevent a man's enjoying a woman. IV. 385. a. b. n. (2). Cites Tacitus ill. ibid. The cenſure which he paſſes upon Nicolas Præpoſitus. 764. a. b.

Repentant maids: a houſe where perſons are ſhut up, who very often are neither the one nor the other. II. 373. a.

Reports: town reports are little conſiſtent with truth. I. 243. a. Hiſtorians ought not to follow popular reports, when they agree not with authors. II. 770. b. A judicious obſervation of Lampridius upon that ſubject. ibid. Truſting too raſhly to common reports, is the general fault of thoſe who ſuffer perſecution for their religion. V. 42.

Repriſals neceſſary in war. I. 709. b. 710. a.

Reprobation (abſolute) why Arminius would needs inſiſt upon it, in his diſpute with Gomarus. III. 174. b.

Republic of Rome, to what Cæſar had reduced it. II. 420. a.

Republics become corrupt as they grow old. I. 223. a. b. Cannot endure a diſtinguiſhed merit. II. 547. b. Have an advantage which kingdoms want. III. 420. b. Are liable to horrible confuſions. 452. a. b. 467. a. b. 468. a. IV. 581. b. How it is poſſible to retain ſome ſhadow of liberty in them, after they have been reduced to a Monarchical form of government. 204. b. We ought not to be curious in a foreign Republic. V. 820. See Commonwealths.

Reputation: a ſtratagem, to ſhew of what conſequence a good reputation is. I. 432. b. A great reputation for integrity in a perſon, diſpleaſes many. 460. a. Its influence is of great efficacy, either in advancing or retarding events. 498. b. Is an incumbrance to men of letters. 626. b. It is difficult to have a great reputation, without being expoſed to the laſh of cenſorious tongues. V. 337. b. 338. a. b.

Res, what was the ſignification of that word, among the Latins. III. 691. b. 692. a.

Reſcius (Staniſlaus) publiſhes the works of Cardinal Hoſius, and affirms that they had been printed thirty-two times. III. 501. b.

Reſentment: whenever a man conceives a reſentment againſt a nation, he ought to abſtain from writing its Hiſtory. III. 345. b.

Reſident: the Reſident of a Court, who quarrels with a perſon, and ſends him a challenge. II. 408. a. b.

Reſtitution: whether any pretence whatſoever, can excuſe a man from making Reſtitution. I. 13. a.

Reſurrection; the Jews reckon that there is a ſmall bone in us, out of which God will reſtore our bodies at the Reſurrection. I. 649. b. 650. a. b. IV. 376. a. b. 665. b. The poſſibility of it taught by Chryſippus. II. 496. b. It ſeems that Democritus promiſed a Reſurrection to bodies buried in honey. 638. b. A ſingular notion concerning it. IV. 376. b. Believed by learned men among the Heathens. V. 332. a.

Retreat: few perſons know how to retreat in time. I. 120. a. Poets and Orators ought to be moſt careful of doing it. ibid. a. b. II. 620. a. b.

Reuchlin, the Hiſtory of his differences with Hochſtratus. III. 473. b. 474. a.

Revelation, without it, reaſon can avail us nothing, with reſpect to our getting over difficulties in point of religion. IV. 95. b. 96. a. The diſputes of Chriſtians ſhould be carried to its tribunal only. V. 830. Accuſations againſt the author, with reſpect to it, and his juſtification. 807.

Revelation of St John, what we have ſeen concerning an explication of that book. I. 7. b. Thoſe who promiſe the greateſt ſucceſſes, as if they were foretold there, are apt to be miſtaken. 127. a. It would be difficult to find ſureties to warrant the explications of it. 188. a. b. The needleſs labour of the Commentators upon it. ibid. Calvin's opinion concerning this book. II. 265. b. Some have believed that St John was not the author of it. 405. b. III. 595. a. The Commentators upon it loſe nothing of their credit, though they have deceived people an hundred times. II. 539. a. The reaſon of it. ibid. The moſt chimerical explications of it, may be of great uſe to ſtir up the people. 693. b. Sovereigns generally manage the interpreters of that book. III. 476. b. The judgment that we ought to paſs upon thoſe who vary in their explication of it, according to the different turn which affairs take. IV. 47. a. b. The whole ſtory of it embroidered upon a garment. 430. There has always been people, who pretended to know the ſecrets of this book. 899. a. Thoſe who pretend to explain it, would have Miniſters of State neglect all their affairs, to hear them, or read their writings. V. 94. b. 95. a. The firſt Reformers did not underſtand it. II. 122. a. b. The deſign of thoſe who ballot the numbers of it. 123. b. The ill ſucceſs of the Commentators on it, does not reſtrain the temerity of others. 124. a. The explications of it are oil to the fire. 127. b. Put in French rhime, and fitted for the ſtage. 477. a. b. &c.

Revelations (Divine); Savonarola pretends to partake in them. V. 57.

Re-union of the Lutherans and Calviniſts, attempted in vain. II. 731. a. Dury ſaid that only ſome miniſters oppoſed that work. III. 34. b.

Re-union of the Catholics and Proteſtants, a book wrote for the bringing it about. III. 595. a. b.

Re union of the religions, perſons who have been full of that ſcheme. IV. 213. a. b. 214. a. b. 215. a. 231. a.

Re-united: the new re-united were ſcandalized at the weak and timorous cenſure that was paſſed upon the myſtical city of Mary d'Agreda. I. 138. b. 139. a. b.

Revolutions of State, the greateſt commonly proceed from a trifle. II. 711. b. Their principles and ſprings. 741. a. b. 742. a. b. The ordinary preparatives towards them. III. 138. b. 139. a. b. What is almoſt continually the chain of the greateſt revolutions. IV. 281. a. The tricks that are employed to make them ſucceed. IV. 467. b. 468. a.

Reward: a man muſt ſeek the reward of a fine action in the action itſelf. I. 559. a. b. How an author ought to behave, in order to obtain rewards from the Public. III. 339. b. 340. a. b. 341. a. b.

Rhadamanthus marries Alcmena, who was tranſported for that end, to the fortunate iſlands. I. 208.

Rhan (George) his apology for the confeſſion of Augſburg, publiſhed by Chytræus. II. 122. b.

Rheſcuporis, his perfidiouſneſs. II. 559. a. b.

Rhetoric has rules that are little conformable to the laws of Hiſtory, or to ſincerity. II. 341. b. 342. a. Demoſthenes quits Philoſophy, to apply himſelf to Rhetoric. 259.

Rhetorical: a Rhetorical figure occaſions the loſs of a cauſe. I. 185. a. b.

Rhetoricians: who was reckoned the moſt famous Rhetorician of the XVIIth century. II. 499. An example of their Legerdemain. 678. a. b. Commentators ſhould take notice of their artifices. 679. a. The Rhetoricians and Philoſophers expelled from Rome. III. 5. 6.

Rhimes: a Dictionary of French Rhimes. I. 65. b. 66. a.

Rhinfeld: John de Wert taken priſoner at the battle of Rhinfeld. V. 539.

Rhodes; an error in computing the weight of its Coloſſus. II. 390. a. Its form of government changed by the authority of Mauſolus. III. 359. The Hiſtory of the violences and debaucheries that were committed there afterwards. ibid. and a. b. 360. and a. b. Its Democracy changed into an Ariſtocracy, during the confederate war. IV. 174.

Rhodians ſend Ambaſſadors to King Ptolomy. I. 71. a. Thought themſelves ſo ſure of defeating the Romans, that they had prepared chains for thoſe they ſhould take priſoners. II. 349. b. Their temples pillaged by Caſſius. ibid.

Rhodiginus (Lewis Cœlius) uſes the labours of Eraſmus with ingratitude. II. 813. a. b. Convicted of a falſity with reſpect to Euripides. 874. b. Commits a groſs ſoleciſm. V. 624. a.

Riario: what has been ſaid of Peter and Jerome Riario. V. 163. a. b.

Riario (Cardinal) aſſiſts Marſus in the reviſal of his Commentary on Tully's Offices. IV. 165. a.

Ribadeneira retracted what he had ſaid about the miracles of the founder of the order of the Jeſuits. III. 889. a. b. 890. a. b.

Ricaut, his error touching the hopes of Mahometan women. III. 341. b. He miſunderſtood Buſbequius with reſpect to the ignorance of the Turks, in point of Chronology. 572. b.

Richard (the Abbot) quoted. II. 589. a. b. n. (8), (9). III. 954. b. n. (173), (174), (175), (176), (178), (179). V. 542. b. n. (18). His anſwer to Jurieu, with reſpect to the taxes of the Romiſh Chancery. I. 629. b. The inſufficiency of that anſwer. ibid.

Richardus (Stephanus) Nivernenſis deſigned to have compoſed forty-two chapters upon Ovid's invective againſt Ibis. IV. 452. a.

Richelieu (Cardinal de) deſires to confer with Amyraut. I. 261. a. Did not love to be aſked. 418. b. Never forgave any one. 488. It is reported that he was continually reading the Argenis. 645. 5. He paid an author well for his elogy. 653. b. n. (3). It is ſurprizing that he ſhould lay any ſtreſs on Bertelier's pretended act, with reſpect to Calvin. 783. b. 784. a. II. 62. a. And on Bolſec's calumnies againſt the ſaid Calvin. 265. b. He makes uſe of ſome of the rhapſodies of Beza's calumniators. I. 800. and a. Required a great deal of complaiſance from thoſe who belonged to him. II. 134. b. Secret practices to expel him from the court. 401. a. b. His method. 518. a. What Lewis XIII ſaid to him, after the Marſhal d'Ancre's death. 542. b. His amours with Marion de Lorme. 647. a. His deſign to reconcile both religions, hindered by his death. III. 34. a. His friends and enemies loſt battles, the latter with a view to hurt, and the former with a view to ſerve him. 59. b. The Miniſters of Languedoc wait upon him, and tell him that they ſaw but little probability of effecting a re-union in matters of religion. 123. a. He was very liberal to the Muſes. 176. a. The reproaches he caſts upon the Proteſtants, with reſpect to the majeſty of Kings, and the anſwers which have been made to theſe reproaches. 668. a. b. 669. a. Whether under his miniſtry people were put to death, whoſe only fault conſiſted in their misfortune to diſpleaſe him. 818. a. b. 819. a. IV. 141. a. b. 142. a. b. 143. a. b. 144. a. His power laſted longer than his life. III. 827. and b. He was vaſtly hated. IV. 141. a. b. &c. Was of a delicate taſte and haughty ſpirit. 85. a. How he employed himſelf, after he had ſpent ſome hours in ſettling affairs of ſtate. 114. a. It was for the good and ſervice of Lewis XIII, that his troops ſhould be commanded by the friends of that Cardinal. 146. a. He was extreamly affected by ſatires. III. 212. IV. 256. a. Was obliged to ſpread his ſnares every where. 257. a. The ſpeech which Gueret puts in his mouth. ibid. b. Thoſe who have had to do with that Cardinal, have left us wretched pictures of him. 258. b. All the misfortunes of Europe are imputed to him. 260. a. He makes uſe of Silvius's writings, for finding out the Philoſopher's ſtone. 262. b. What he ſaid to a Captain of the guards. V. 370. b. He would not allow any other cauſe of unhappineſs than imprudence. 373. b. Procures a penſion to a plagiary Genealogiſt. 474. a. b. Oppoſed in his deſign of humbling the Houſe of Auſtria, by Cardinal Berulle. I. 786. a. Charged with having poiſoned that Cardinal. ibid. b. Mr le Vaſſor does not adopt this calumny. ibid. There was no ſtory which people did not believe, when it defamed him. IV. 511. a.

Richeome commits a miſtake advantageous to his deſign. IV. 79. a. b. Quoted. III. 956. a. b. n. (18), (19). IV. 81. a. n. (51). 930. b. n. (8). Looked upon as the author of Florimond de Remond's book, intituled, l'Anti-Papeſſe. 733. b. The Jeſuits looked upon him as their beſt French writer. ibid. Diſguiſes himſelf under the name of Francis de Montagnes, in his anſwer to the plea of Antony Arnauld. III. 278. b. n. (24). Divers extracts from his books touching the affair of John Guignard. 277. a. b. 278. a. b. 279. a.

Richer, John Boucher was one of his adverſaries. II. 103.

Richerians, a chimerical ſect. IV. 870. b. 871. a. b.

Riches, there were Philoſophers who renounced them, before the doctrine of Jeſus Chriſt. I. 294. a. b. &c. Some deſpiſe them from a principle of ſelf-love. 460. a. b. It requires a great deal of magnanimity to deſpiſe them. II. 269. b. It is much eaſier for us to renounce riches than praiſe. 298. b. They have ſometimes been the cauſe of the perſecution of great men. 351. b. 352. a. An anſwer of Simonides, wherein he ſaid that riches were better than learning. V. 146. b. 147. a.

Ride: the only thing young Princes are inſtructed in, is how to ride the great horſe. II. 334.

Ridiculous: a perſon can never be ridiculous who follows only the common cuſtom. II. 527. a. b.

Riga, the capital city of Livonia, beſieged and taken by Guſtavus Adolphus. V. 657, 658, 659.

Right: the only meaſure of right (or law) in ſtates is the advantage they can get by it. I. 130. a. b. Some Philoſophers did not admit a natural right. 416. What it is. II. 30. a. b. Whether there is a natural impreſſion which enables all men to diſtinguiſh between right and wrong. III. 581. a. b. 604. a. b. Certain nations are ignorant of it. 781. a. b.

Rigoriſm, what it is. IV. 874. and a. b.

Ring; the reaſon why the Antients wore a ring on the finger next to the little finger of the left hand. I. 375. a A ring ſold at an auction had almoſt occaſioned the ruin of the Roman Republic. II. 711. b.

Rio (Martin del) cenſured for ſeveral falſities touching Agrippa. I. 152. a. b. Quoted. V. 597. n. (a). and b. n. (2).

Riolan writes ſome books againſt Joſeph du Cheſne. II. 468.

Ripeneſs: when the regulation of the ripeneſs of girls and boys by inſpection, was forbidden. IV. 802. b. See Maidenhead.

Riſe: the Egyptians or Phœnicians uſed to ſay, that they who recovered from a great fit of ſickneſs roſe again out of the grave. I. 116. b.

Riſhton (Edward) publiſhes Sanders's Hiſtory of the Engliſh Schiſm, and adds a preface of his own to it. V. 41. b. 42. a. Dies at St Menehou in the year 1585. ibid.

Riſwick: the treaty of Riſwick advantageous to the Allies. III. 683. a.

Ritual, that of the Jews contains rare obſervances. I. 174. a. b.

Riverius, Phyſician to Henry IV, treated as a mountebank by John de Renou. IV. 864.

Rivers: a river whoſe water makes thoſe immortal who drink of it, but which is always covered with a dark night. II. 465. Rivers at this day may be very unlike what they were in antient times. V. 78. b.

Rivet (Andrew) harſhly cenſured by Father Labbe. I. 21. a. b. His opinion about Abimelech's diſtemper. 38. b. 39. a. His reflexion againſt St Auguſtin for his looſe morality. 91. b. It is ſurprizing that ſuch a man as he ſhould have been ignorant that Calvin was a father. II. 267. a. His judgment upon a work of Sedulius. III. 84. a. How he refutes Coëffeteau's anſwer to du Pleſſis Mornai, with reſpect to the praiſes which Langius beſtows on Luther. 723. b. He has not exactly traced Campian and Whitaker's diſpute. 940. a. Is one of thoſe who quote from the modern writers, without conſulting the originals. V. 183. b. Was the depoſitary of ſeveral of the Patriarch Cyril's Letters. 560. b. An incident of his diſpute with Grotius, where he cavils ridiculouſly. I. 235. a. b. 236. a. b. His defence of the two Epiſtles and Preface of Mr du Pleſſis. II. 127. a. b. He does not bring him off in one particular. ibid. b. Endeavours to juſtify Robert Stephens. 173. a. b. Is miſtaken with reſpect to the ſtatue of Pope Joan. 530. b. Quoted, and cenſured, for what he ſays of Harchius. III. 352. b. n. (8). A partizan of the tradition of the She-Pope. IV. 280. b. The moſt curious man in the world about books of controverſy. 727. a.

Rivinus makes his complaints to the magiſtrates againſt Reineſius. IV. 858. b. 859. a.

Robbers, two famous ones. V. 198. a. Phyſically ſpeaking, they may deſerve ſome eſteem. IV. 843. a.

Robert, the King's Attorney at the Chatelet of Paris, his letter concerning James Aymar's wand. I. 8. a. b.

Robert d'Arbriſſel; ſee Arbriſſel.

Roberval anſwers the objections of Des Cartes againſt a piece of Mr de Fermat. IV. 485. a.

Rochechoüart, perſons of note in that family. V. 298. and b.

Rochefoucaut (the Duke de la) his memoirs will ever be eſteemed better than thoſe of Cæſar. II. 418. a.

Rochelle, its national Synod. II. 196. b. That city is not allowed to have any others paſtors than ſuch as are born there. 694. a. It is beſieged by the Duke of Anjou. III. 178. a. The tumultuous reſolutions of its aſſembly. IV. 212.

Rochemaillet took care to have the arrets of George Louët printed, from the manuſcript which Antony Seguier had given him. III. 882.

Rocheſter (the Earl of), a famous Atheiſt, converted by Dr Gilbert Burnet; particulars that concern him. V. 820, 821. n. (35).

Rochus (John), General of the Auguſtins. I. 769. b.

Rock of the accuſed, who and what was ſo called. I. 167. II. 345. a.

Rod, that of Moſes was the model of the Devil's apiſh tricks. I. 5. a.

Rodon (David de) taught certain ſophiſms only to thoſe who paid him for it. IV. 783. b. n. (18).

Rodriguez; his book of Chriſtian Perfection tranſlated by d'Audiguier. I. 548. a.

Rodriguez (John), ſee Gabay Faro.

Rohault deſcribes the natural conſequence of the method of philoſophizing contracted in the ſchools. II. 848. b. 849. a. What he ſays of the Guiſes. III. 298. b. 299. a. b.

Roi (Lewis le), Greek-Profeſſor in the univerſity of Paris, his death. I. 562.

Royalty is a very chargeable thing. IV. 755. a.

Roye (Eleonor de) dies of grief. III. 833. a.

Roland, where ſtatues are erected to him. III. 256. b.

Romance of Theagenes and Chariclea, an original and plan for almoſt all other romances. III. 377. a. The author of it ſeverely rallied. 378. a. b.

Romances, their extravagancies have crept into religion. I. 166. Reflexion upon the rapes of fair damſels in romances. III. 365. a. b. 366. a. IV. 636. b. 637. a. b. Wherein conſiſts the chief difference between Mythological authors, and the writers of romances. III. 465. b. Thoſe of the new faſhion ſpoil the taſte of young people. 552. a. b. IV. 365. b. 366. a. The authors of them very often ſhew a want of judgment in their fictions. III. 296. a. n. (32). The new romances make true hiſtory extremely obſcure. IV. 366. a. How tender the author of a romance ſhould be of his heroine's virtue. 114. b. The heroine of a romance, with a big-belly, or lying-in, is a ſtrange image. III. 866. b. The writers of them are obliged to follow Hiſtory, when they tell in a preface the foundation of their fictions. 166. b. Thoſe of the Counteſs d'Aulnoi have been univerſally read. I. 569. b.

Romans were very apt to apply particular ſentiments of a play to the preſent times. I. 60. b. Their firſt conqueſts compared with thoſe they made afterwards. 163. a. b. They did not approve, that a ſuperior magiſtrate ſhould be accuſed by his Subaltern. 186. a. b. Are cruelly inſulted by the Parthians. 515. Who were called the laſt Romans. II. 164. a. What perſon had this encomium given him, that he was called the laſt of the Romans. 347. The antient Romans had not laid down thoſe polite rules in point of debauchery, which prevail now-a-days. 394. They ſhewed much leſs regard to thoſe who gained battles, than to thoſe who finiſhed a war. 413. b. It was for that reaſon a part of their good policy to change their Generals often. ibid. Their ambition with reſpect to the propagation of their language. 516. a. b. 517. a. b. By what gradations they paſſed from frugality to luxury. 710. a. b. Would rather have choſen to loſe their lives than their virility. III. 75. b. Were not very religious obſervers of treaties. 584. a. b. Allowed the honour of a triumph only to thoſe who extended their frontiers. ibid. 586. a. Their policy to extend their conqueſts. ibid. Called Ravenous Wolves, by Teleſinus, General of the Samnites. 686. b. The antient Romans were as ridiculous in point of Genealogy, as people are at preſent. 711. a. The difference between the antient and modern Romans, and the occaſion of that difference. IV. 50. b. To ſave Italy, the Romans carry the war into Africa. 193. a. They forbad the Poets to abuſe their magiſtrates, and permitted them to ridicule their gods. 568. b. 569. a. When they attempted the abolition of certain nocturnal feaſts. V. 336. b. Called forth the tutelar gods of the towns which they beſieged, and which they expected to take. 185. a. b. Their cruelty to the Britons. 260. a. b. They had recourſe to Venus Verticordia, that a ſtop might be put to the prevailing leudneſs of the times. 268. and a. b. Were more jealous of their honour, than of the honour of the gods. 761, 762.

Rome, the end of a war is ſooner heard of there, than the beginning of it. I. 340. a. Who was the firſt Senator there that embraced the goſpel. 341. a. Changed from a monarchy to a commonwealth. II. 161. Its firſt inhabitants had need of a monarch. 163. a. It could not be any longer without one, when Julius Cæſar was murthered. 165. b. Who was called her ſecond founder. 289. Who firſt practiſed Phyſic there. 353. a. Who was the firſt of its Generals that embarked upon the northern ocean. 715. The limits of its empire ſhrink contrary to the preſage of idolaters. III. 317. a. St Auguſtin's raillery on that head. ibid. a. b. It ſubmitted to the will of Cæſar at the very firſt. IV. 203. and a. b. 204. a. The conformity between the foundation of Rome, and that of the univerſe. 424. b. A judgment concerning the moſt celebrated writers of antient Rome. 778. b. 779. a. b. The ſtatues of its deities in the beginning were made of baſe materials. 925. b. It had two names, the one known, and the other unknown. V. 184. a. b. 185. a. b. Was ſcarce known to the Greeks in Alexander's time. 329. b. Why the maids who married there, were followed by a perſon who carried a diſtaff and ſpindle, with wool and yarn upon them. 288. b. To what an exceſs they had carried the vice of Drunkenneſs there. 387. a. b.

Rome (Chriſtian), who was the firſt Greek that taught Philoſophy there. I. 443. and a. The harſhneſs of that court with reſpect to the Patriarch of Babylon. 105. The rewards wherewith the court of Rome pays the zeal of thoſe who declare for her. 157. b. Thoſe who had been courageous enough to exclaim againſt the uſurpations of that court overthrown. II. 125. a. b. The ſtrange corruption of its Popes and Cardinals deſcribed by an unſuſpected author. 370. b. 371. a. That court is no leſs concerned than others to preſerve the ballance of power between all the powers of Europe, whether Catholic or Proteſtant. 758. b. 759. a. Its avarice and impurity. III. 76. a. b. The monarchy of the Popes there is more to be wondered at than that of the Cæſars was. 228. a. b. We may apply to New Rome what Virgil obſerves concerning the Old. 235. b. That city alarmed at a bull that was going to be publiſhed againſt Sodomites. 327. a. b. A very ſmart letter writ againſt the court of Rome. 455. a. A deſcription of that city in verſe. ibid. The mode, with reſpect to women, has very much changed there. 458. a. The court of Rome has as much to fear from certain Catholic Princes, as from the Proteſtant ones. 568. b. Rome, notwithſtanding the reſidence of its Biſhops, is more corrupt than other cities. 591. b. Rome ſacked by the troops of Charles V. 615. a. The court of Rome maintains its rights with greater policy than the court of France. 742. a. A conſternation cauſed at Rome by the victory of Ravenna. 812 a. The partizans of the court of Rome alarmed at the volume of the liberties of the Gallican Church. IV. 98. b. 99 a. b. 100. a. That city preſents a woman with the privilege of its freedom, on account of her rare qualities. 237. and b. 238. a. b. To what the yearly income which the Pope draws from the Courtezans there, amounts. V. 162. b. Its acquiſitions in the Indies, by the vaſt number of Chriſtians that were in that country. 267. a. b. With what violence its inhabitants diſcovered their partiality for the Emperor or France. II. 310. b. n. (5). No peace with Rome, a treatiſe of Joſeph Hall under that title. III. 342. b.

Romiſh Divines, Cardinal Bellarmin reckons up two hundred and thirty-ſeven contrarieties of doctrine among them. III. 343. b.

Rommelin (James de) takes Simonetta, a gentleman of Milan, priſoner, and afterwards gets the better of him in a duel. V. 139.

Romorantin, the edict of that name. III. 506. and a.

Romulus, laws which he eſtabliſhed for divine ſervice, according to Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus. III. 914. b. 915. a. His retrograde horoſcope. V. 295. and a. b.

Rondel (du), the author of this Dictionary propoſes a point of Chronology for him to clear up. II. 15. a. What is his profeſſion, and what his works are. 782. b. He deſerves the praiſes of all the Journaliſts. ibid. Two obſervations that he makes examined. III. 914. b. 915. a. b. 916. a. b. He ſends a memoir touching the ſouls of beaſts to the author of this Dictionary. IV. 547. a. b. n. (20). His objection againſt the neceſſity of believing a providence, in order to embrace virtue and ſhun vice, and the anſwer to that objection. V. 180. a. b. 181. a. b. 182. a. His judgment of Balzac. 345. b. 346. a. b.

Rondelet truſts Joubertus, his favourite diſciple, with his manuſcripts, and deſires him to publiſh them. III. 582.

Ronſard, his ſonnet on the privileges which Phyſicians have with the fair ſex. I. 400. a. His Trowel Croſiered. III. 868. a. b. On what occaſion he wrote a poem againſt the Atheiſts. IV. 845. b.

Roque (the Abbot de la) aſcribes to Father le Tellier a thing which he does not ſay of Quintus Curtius. IV. 809. a. b. n. (6). Cenſured. 242. a. b. Quoted. V. 122. b. & alibi.

Roquelaure, what he ſaid upon hearing a ſatire againſt Henry IV read. IV. 482. b.

Rorenco, his books againſt the Vaudois. III. 162. a.

Roſe (the romance of the), who is the author of it. I. 28. b. Was written an hundred years after Abelard. III. 381. b.

Roſeo (Mambrin) makes an imperfect tranſlation of Guevara's Dial of Princes into Italian. III. 270. b.

Roſes, whence they ſprung. IV. 45. a. b.

Roſier (du), a Miniſter, changes his religion during the maſſacre of Paris. IV. 76. b. And contributes a great deal to the abjuration of ſeveral perſons of the firſt quality. 77. a.

Roſni does all he can to diſengage Henry IV from Mademoiſelle d'Entragues. V. 391. a.

Roſſano (the Princeſs of), widow to Prince Borgheſe. II. 471. a. b.

Roſweide aſcribes to Druſius a letter of Broughton. II. 150. b. His miſtake cenſured by Sixtinus Amama. ibid.

Rothe (John), a Fanatic, who was firſt a proſelyte of Labadie's, but afterwards ſeparated from him. III. 689. a. b. 690. a.

Rovere, an illuſtrious family in Piedmont, which poſſeſſed a ſtrange prerogative there. V. 162. b. 163. a.

Rouillard (Sebaſtian) confuted, as to what he ſays of Amyot, and his journey to Trent. I. 257. a. b. His capitulary concerning the validity of a marriage. IV. 804. a. b. 805. a. b. 806. a. b.

Rozier des Guerres, what that book is. II. 838. a. b. A remark concerning it. III. 809. b. 810. a. b.

Ruarus, his conjectures about the pretended Mahometiſm of Alciatus. I. 198. a. b.

Rubenus (Leonard), what he ſays of Blandrata's death. II. 20. b.

Rudolph II, his weakneſs in giving credit to the predictions of Tycho Brahe. V. 672.

Rufinus (Cornelius) degraded from the dignity of Senator for his luxury. II. 710. a. b. III. 2.

Ruys (the Monks of) their poſſeſſions ſeized on by a Britiſh Lord, on account of their vicious lives. I. 31. a.

Rule of equity which thoſe ought to follow, who impute certain things to an author. I. 652. a. A rule to know whether it is out of weakneſs or contempt, that a perſon does not anſwer an adverſary. II. 90. b. 91. a. The application of rules is more difficult than the art of diſcourſing well of them. 38. a.

Rumours: the ſecret ſprings which excite certain rumours. II. 721. a. b.

Ruſbach and Ruſberus, two chimerical authors formed from the corrupted name of Ruyſbroeck. IV. 944. a. b.

Rutilius, his generous way of thinking, with regard to his countrymen who had baniſhed him. II. 259. a. b.

Ruzé (Dr) would not allow ſome Miniſters to begin a conference with a prayer. IV. 921. a.

S.

SAbbathi Tzebbi, a falſe Meſſiah, a book where we find ſome very extraordinary particulars touching his impoſtures. V. 539.

Sabbatical Aſſemblies, a confutation of thoſe who doubt of people's being really carried to them. II. 750. a. b.

Sabina (a Roman Empreſs) poiſoned by her huſband's orders. V. 266. b. 267. a.

Saci (Mr de) ſucceeds Mr Roſe in the French academy. IV. 917.

Sacraments, ſome people put off that of Penitence to their laſt hours. I. 701. b. Laymen have a right to adminiſter them in certain caſes of neceſſity. III. 267. and a. b. When the cuſtom of uſing wafers in the ſacrament of the Lord's Supper was aboliſhed at Geneva. 343. a. n. (16).

Sacrifices: the Pagans boaſted that fire from heaven fell upon their ſacrifices. I. 25. b. A tenet of the Peripatetics concerning ſacrifices and prayers. 468. a. See Victims.

Sadducees, whether they wholly denied a providence. V. 9. a. b. 11. a. b. 12. a. b. The Jewiſh High Prieſt was ſometimes one of their ſect. 12. b.

Sadi, the Prince of the Perſian and Turkiſh Poets. IV. 872. a.

Sadolet (Cardinal) writes a letter to the people of Geneva. II. 264. n. (d).

Sagacity: proofs of an extraordinary ſagacity. II. 636. a. b. 637. a. If there were any ſuch thing as a certain ſagacity, it would be odious to all man kind. 636. b.

Sage of the Stoics exiſts only in idea. II. 310. b.

Sayings: remarkable ſayings are aſcribed ſometimes to one perſon, ſometimes to another. II. 770. b. People cannot bring themſelves to loſe a witty ſaying. 671. a. People are apt to report a good ſaying, not as it was ſpoken at firſt, but according to the form which they believe to be the beſt. I. 460. b. Perſons that excelled for witty ſayings. 308. a. 699. a. 753. and a. IV. 754. b. 755. a. Bion's witty ſayings. II. 12. a. b. The general fault of moſt witty ſayings. ibid. b. V. 152. b.

Saints: a ſaint created by ignorance and chance. I. 230. b. 231. a. b. There are numberleſs ſaints in Turkey, who have each of them a particular office. II. 466. a. b. The invocation of them has been long ſince the practice of the Jews. 879. b. They are always beautiful according to their pictures. III. 57. a. b. Their credit is very little diminiſhed in the Church of Rome. 87. a. b. The precipitation wherewith miracles upon miracles are crowded in their legend. 95. b. 96. a. IV. 556. a. The compilers of their lives have been the boldeſt of authors. III. 577. b. Not long ſince the queſtion was diſcuſſed at Rome whether the ſaints of the Old Teſtament deſerved the worſhip that is paid to the canonized ſaints. 573. b. There is leſs certainty in the antient than in the modern ſaints. 740. a. It is not by their miracles, but by their charity that we are to judge of their ſanctity. 889. b. An unlucky inconvenience which ſometimes attends the worſhip that is paid to them. 896. b. How the worſhip of ſaints has been introduced. IV. 353. b. 354. a. b. 355. a. b. A notion upon the invocation of ſaints. 376. a. b. There have been ſaints of all profeſſions, excepting that of an attorney. 487. b. The invocation of them is ſtill exceſſive. II. 126. a. n. (40).

Sainte-Aldegonde writes to the States the falſe news of the Duke of Alençon's marriage with Queen Elizabeth. V. 19. a. See Aldegonde.

Saint Brigitt: the fort of St Brigitt was beſieged in form, and the French defended it many days. IV. 211. a.

Saint-Evremoniana. See Evremond.

Saint Romuald (Peter de) brings a ridiculous charge againſt Beza. I. 800. and a. b. His errors. ibid.

Saint Sulpice, an abbey of the order of Citeaux at Belley: the diſorders which the Biſhop of that city found there. I. 737. b. 738. a. b. The pious fraud that was publiſhed concerning the foundation of it. ibid. b. 739. a. b.

Saïs, a city, where ſituate. IV. 342. a.

Saladin, his gallantry with Eleanora of Guienne ſpouſe to Lewis VII. III. 794. b. 795. a. b.

Salamina, a town in Cyprus, why ſo called, and when the cuſtom of ſacrificing men to Jupiter was ſuppreſſed there. V. 318. a. b.

Salamis, how that iſland came to be the property of the Athenians. V. 304. b.

Salernitana: the Schola Salernitana forbids the eating of beans. IV. 671. b.

Sales (Francis de) propoſes the elephant for an example of chaſtity. I. 641. b.

Salian (Father) cenſured for ſeveral epitaphs. I. 105. b. Cenſured by Noldius for what he ſays of Juba. III. 164. a.

Salian Prieſts, what Quintilian ſaid of them. IV. 161. b.

Salic Law condemned to caſtration ſlaves taken in adultery and theft. III. 77. a.

Sallo, what he ſays of Allatius's taſte. I. 232. a. A thought of that Journaliſt. II. 643. b. His reflexion on that book of the Liberties of the Gallican Church. IV. 100. a.

Salluſt, the lie given to one of his maxims by the manner in which Sanches King of Caſtile exerciſed an uſurped authority. II. 378. b. How he was treated at Fauſta's houſe. IV. 201. a. Has been cenſured perhaps too ſeverely for making uſe of old words. 831. a. It does not become him to declaim againſt the corruption of his age. V. 420. a. b. Why Accurſius called him his countryman. I. 69. a.

Salmaſius has learnedly corrected an epigram inſerted in Plutarch. I. 205. a. Is often miſled by truſting too much to his memory. 369. b. Cenſures Solinus for one blunder, and falls himſelf into another. 424. b. 425. a. A great miſtake which he mentions. 656. b. Did not anſwer Blondel's treatiſe concerning Pope Joan, after he had promiſed to do it. II. 25. a. Was of opinion that Æſchylus is more obſcure than the Holy Scripture. 827. a. His contradictions with reſpect to Grotius. III. 246. b. 247. a. To whom he was a ſcare-crow. 310. b. He chuſes rather to reaſon ill than to loſe his diſcoveries. 319. a. How one of his adverſaries boaſted that he had made him loſe his life. IV. 217. a. b. His Latin verſes on a thing that has been ſaid of monkeys. 600. a. b. He believed that Brutes were endowed with reaſon. 912. a. An examination of what he ſaid touching the edition of Anaſtaſius by the Jeſuits of Mayence. 726. b. 727. a. b.

Salmeron accuſed of Plagiariſm. III. 44. b.

Salmuthus (Henricus) cenſures a very obſcene epigram of John Antony Campanus. II. 293. b.

Salt of Agrigentum, its qualities, and the uſe that St Auguſtin made of them. III. 157. b. 158. a.

Saltatricula, that word of Aulus Gellius is very ill rendered Graſhopper. III. 491. b.

Saluces (the Marquiſate of) is a part of Piemont. II. 16. a.

Salvian, his opinion touching the impurities of the ſtage. V. 40. b.

Samaël falls in love with Eve. II. 855. b.

Sammarthani ſuppreſs in their Gallia Chriſtiana the elogy which they had made on the Abbot of St Cyran. V. 16. b.

Sammarthanus (Abelius) writes an elogy on the family of Schomberg. V. 83. n. (b).

Samos, iſland, why called Parthenia. III. 635. a.

Samoſatenians ſolidly confuted by Laſicius. III. 732. a. b.

Sanar, Sultan of Egypt, diſpoſſeſſed by Dorgan. IV. 383.

Sancerre, the memorable Hiſtory of that town by John de Leri. III. 781.

Sanchez counts it a venial ſin to ſee one's own nudities, and a mortal ſin to ſee thoſe of another perſon. I. 112. b.

Sanction: there were as many abuſes under the Pragmatic ſanction, as there have been ſince the Concordate. IV. 766. a. b.

Sanctuary, whether it be more exempt from the caprices of fortune, than other things. I. 607. b.

Sancus, whoſe were certain monuments that were to be ſeen in his temple. V. 288. b. 289. a.

Sanders, his calumnies againſt Anne Bullen. II. 56. a. b. 57. a.

Sandis (Edwin) quoted. I. 109. b. n. (35.) 730. b. n. (46).

Sandoval is not comparable to Thuanus in the praiſes which he beſtows on Charles V. II. 442.

Sannazarius, his Poem intituled Chriſti Lamentatio is printed with notes by Daniel d'Auge. I. 562. n. (d).

Sanſeverino (Robert de) invites Auguſtin Niphus to Salerno. IV. 378. a.

Sanſon (Nicolas) his miſtake touching the capital of Ponthieu. I. 10. a. Attacked by Father Labbe. ibid. b. 11. a. b. Cenſured on a point of Chronology, in relation to Pytheas. IV. 677. a. b. Anſwers Father Labbe. ibid. b.

Santeüil writes verſes which bring him into a quarrel with the Jeſuits and Janſeniſts. I. 497. a. b. 498. a.

Saocondarius, how his chief city was called. II. 628. a.

Sapores, King of Perſia, his ſon dies in the arms of Manes. IV. 91. a.

Saracens, how vaſt their dominion was. I. 14. a. A prodigious victory which they obtained over the Chriſtians. 15. a. They honour a ſtone, which they call Brachtan. 124. a. Are defeated before Thoulouſe. II. 850. Deſtroy the city of Aix. ibid. b. Spilt leſs blood in all their perſecutions of the Chriſtians, than was ſpilt in the maſſacres alone on St Bartholomew's day. IV. 39. a.

Sarah, her diſſimulation commended by the Fathers of the Church. I. 38. a. b. It is pretended that ſhe was a converter. 45. a. Compared with the wife of Dejotarus. II. 630. a. b.

Saramita (Andrew) an impious fanatic. III. 281. b.

Sarraſin, his famous ſonnet. II. 857. a. Quoted. III. 366. a. n. 38. The preface to his works by Peliſſon is a maſter-piece. IV. 538.

Sarravius ſuppreſſes a circumſtance that was not favourable to the Count de Coligni. III. 304. a. Concludes, after a careful examination of the manuſcript Anaſtaſius in the King's library, that the ſtory of the She-Pope had been tacked to it. IV. 726. a.

Satires want commentaries from the time that they are compoſed. I. 35. b. n. ‡. It is a favour done to the writers of them, when they are believed upon their oath, confirmed by witneſſes. 343. a. The fatal effects which they produce. 426. a. III. 464. a. b. 465. a. b. Satire may eaſily be metamorphoſed into Hiſtory. II. 160. b. 161. a. Is one of the plagues of Hiſtory. IV. 142. b. Who were the firſt authors of ſatire. III. 905. b. They publiſh a thouſand things in them, which it was impoſſible ſhould have come to the writers knowledge. V. 755. A general anſwer to thoſe perſons who complain of the ſatires that are publiſhed in Holland. ibid. and 756. As to the profit which may ariſe from the art of being formidable by ſatire, it is a diſputable point. 225. b.

Satirical: it is a ſatirical ſtroke to mention the particulars of ſome peoples eſtates. II. 543. b.

Satiriſts are too ſparing in the article of ſpy-money. I. 682. b. Neceſſary qualifications for a good ſatiriſt. 727. a. They often vent ſlanders which may very eaſily be confuted. II. 56. a. b. 57. a. Their impudence in lying. 136. a. Their method. 148. a. They ſhould not be let go unpuniſhed. 528. a. b. Ought to be no leſs ſubject to the laws of reaſoning than others. IV. 136. a. Do not pretend to any exactneſs. ibid. b. Are not to be depended upon. ibid. It often happens that magiſtrates who neglect to puniſh them, are puniſhed for their unconcernedneſs. 251. a. They put criminal interpretations upon the moſt pious actions. V. 459. b. See Calumny. A true picture of theſe writers. 756. All legiſlators concur in puniſhing them ſeverely. 758. They would attempt upon the lives of their adverſaries, if they had the ſame opportunities which they have to attempt upon their honour. 765.

Saturn was dealt with according to the Lex Talionis, in being dethroned. III. 646. a. His leudneſs. IV. 617. a. b. He eſcapes to the mountain Niphates, and kills there the ſhepherd Caucaſus, from whom that mountain afterwards took its name. II. 82. b.

Saul, King of Iſrael it was thought ſtrange that he did not know David, when he was going out againſt Goliah. II. 606. a.

Savoy, one of its Dukes ſpent an hundred thouſand crowns to find inchanters. II. 243. b. There is a diſpute concerning the precedence between the Duke of Savoy and the Republic of Venice. III. 216.

Savoy (Charles Emanuel Duke of) a medal which he cauſed to be ſtruck. III. 406. b. 407. a.

Savoyard (the) a famous ſinger of the Pontneuf. II. 600. a. b. V. 540. b.

Saurin (Elias) quoted. I. 107. a. n. (12). 501. b. n. (9), (10). 502. a. n. (11), (12). Cenſured. V. 155. a. b. His diſpute about the principle of faith. I. 706. a. b. n. (12), *, (13), (14). 707. a. n. (18), (19), (21). 708. b. n. (28). What he ſays of invincible ignorance. IV. 875. b. n. (10), (12), (13). The particulars of his diſpute with Jurieu. V. 642. a. b. to 648. a. b. Declared orthodox by the Synodal aſſembly of Brill, notwithſtanding Jurieu's accuſations. 800.

Saxon (John) Rector of the univerſity of Wittenberg, publiſhes in a Programma, lies unworthy the Gazette. III. 93. a.

Saxons: Lotharius grants leave to thoſe Saxons who were called Stellingi, to make profeſſion of the Pagan religion. V. 233. and a. b. 234. a. b.

Scaliger (Julius Cæſar) does not ſpeak in a very complaiſant manner of the Neapolitans. I. 237. b. 238. a. The judgment which he paſſed on Cardan. II. 317. b. 318. a. He is cenſured for writing only to gratify a ſpirit of contradiction. 321. b. 322. a. And for ſeveral other conſiderable faults. ibid. The original of his hatred to Dolet. 683. a. A book which he boaſted to have read. 765. a. b. His extreme warmth in defending the Ciceronians. 804. b. 805. a. b. 806. a. b. He valued himſelf upon having been in the wars. 805. b. The Hiſtory of his orations againſt Eraſmus. ibid. 806. a. He did not well underſtand Horace's meaning, with reſpect to Laberius's Mimes. III. 695. b. His invective againſt the government of Athens. IV. 582. b. In the letters of his naturalization he bears only the character of a Phyſician born at Verona. V. 463. n. (c). and a. b. Confounds himſelf in ſpeaking of thoſe who ſurround the world eaſtward and weſtward. 781. Confutes Cardan's book de Subtilitate. II. 322. b.

Scaliger (Joſeph) has collected a great deal of curious learning touching Jacob's Stone. I. 124. b. Every thing that he ſays is not to be depended upon. 139. b. His temerity in judging of the thoughts of the heart. 731. b. His prediction proves falſe. 794. a. b. His inattention when he computed the weight of the Coloſſus of Rhodes. II. 390. a. He commits groſs faults in ſpeaking of Helen. III. 371. b. 372. a. Is called the top-critic. 837. b. His judgment was not always to be relied upon. ibid. Being ready to give up the ghoſt he declares the abhorrence he had for an affected ſtyle. 846. b. A thought of his examined. IV. 331. b. He is miſtaken when he ſays that after the paſſage of the Rubicon Cæſar went no more into Gaul. II. 394. b. Tells a ridiculous ſtory. 707. b. He relates things of his father, which are confuted by public and original pieces. 805. b. 806. a. b. Is to be commended for ſuppreſſing certain of his father's letters againſt Eraſmus. ibid. a. Has writ about the ſquaring of the circle. III. 50. a. Cenſured by Father Morin and Mr de Mauſſac, for what he ſays of Raymond Martini. IV. 168. b. He writes with his own hand ſeveral groſs abuſes in Junius's books. III. 627. b. What Scioppius reproached him with. V. 99. b. Intrapped by Muret. 394. a. b. 395. a. b. 396. a. b.

Scaligerana, there is little exactneſs in that book. II. 617. a. b. Several things are miſerably confounded in it. IV. 727. b.

Scandalize: people are not ſcandalized enough at the writings which authors publiſh againſt one another. I. 244. b.

Scanderbeg lays ſiege to Belgrade. IV. 313. a.

Scarron quoted on ludicrous ſubjects. I. 315. a. b. III. 644. b. 645. a.

Scazons, a kind of verſe, who was the inventer of them. III. 464. a.

Sceptics, Scepticiſm. See Pyrrhoniſts Pyrrhoniſm.

Scepuz, the Baron Gregory Horwath, ſets up a new college there. III. 218. a.

Scevola (Mutius) his jeſt. I. 185. a. b.

Schedia, a town, where ſituated. IV. 342. a.

Schegkius, his diſputes with Simon Simonius. V. 151. b.

Schenk ſurprized by the Count of Embden. III. 820. b.

Schluſſelburg (Conrad) calls the change from a Lutheran to a Calviniſt, apoſtacy. III. 841. a. Quoted. I. 790. a. n. (27). III. 600. b. V. 258. a. n. (26).

Scholars, maſters who deſire to have a great many, ſhould not ſet up for authors. I. 337. a. A ſcholar who has wit, and loves diſputing, gives a great deal of trouble to his maſter. II. 622. a. Formerly a ſcholar, that learned Philoſophy before he was twenty, was thought very forward. III. 26. a. A good leſſon to encourage their ſtudying hard. IV. 103. b.

Scholaſtic: who among the Greeks began to handle a ſubject according to the Scholaſtic method. II. 587. b. 588. a.

Σχολαϛικὸς in Ariſtotle's time, was not uſed to ſignify a Scholar, a Diſciple, or a Student. I. 465. b.

Schomberg, his memorial. III. 411. a. b.

Schomberg (the Marſhal de) a ſtory that is told of him. IV. 676. b.

Schoockius (Martin) proſecuted by Des Cartes for groſs ſcandal. I. 327. a. Cenſured for a miſtake. 618. b. Quoted on the ſubject of dancing. V. 23. a. n. (63), (65), (67), (68). 24. b. n. (81), (82), (25). a. b. n. (83), (84), (86).

School-maſters, who did not become Pedants. II. 183. b. The ſervitude of their condition. V. 738. b. 739. a. A School-maſter, who does a courageous action. II. 645. a.

School-men: what Democritus and Epicurus call εἴδωλα, the School-men call intentional ſpecies. II. 388. a. Religion does not ſtand in need of their Jargon, for the defence of its fundamental doctrines. III. 196. a. Their chimerical qualities baniſhed. 790. a. They debate very needleſs queſtions and things that never happen. V. 41. a. Retort againſt the Carteſians, the arguments about ſubſtantial forms. 116. b. They only ſtudied the art of raiſing objections and anſwering them. 339. a. Their wrangles neglected by OEcolampadius. IV. 400. Their ſubtleties on Tranſubſtantiation, the Trinity, &c. V. 819. Have more confounded than explained the myſteries of religion. ibid. The ſtrange perplexity to which the Abbot Faydit has reduced them. 620. n. (30). Their anſwers only ſerve to render difficulties more obſcure. 821.

Schools, thoſe who teach and diſpute moſt in them, are not the moſt ſtrongly convinced of the truths of Chriſtianity. I. 51. a. b. In order to raiſe a great ſchool, a man muſt apply himſelf entirely to his profeſſion. 337. a.

Scotch: a Scotchman beaten for Paſſive Obedience. II. 286. a. b.

Scotland delivered from the Daniſh yoke, by the valour of a countryman. III. 332. How many Kings have reigned there, and what treatment they met with. 669. a. The Catholics of that country form a deſign. II. 577.

Schottus (Andrew) ridicules the Frenchmen for eſteeming Guevara's works. III. 270. b.

Schucker cuts off his brother's head. I. 286. a.

Schultingius (Cornelius) publiſhes a letter of Broughton to Theodore Beza, and ſeveral other things. II. 151. a. b.

Schurman, the modeſty of that lady. IV. 148. and a. b.

Science or Learning: better a little of it than no health. III. 342. a.

Sciences: Lactantius pretends to have demonſtrated, that there is no ſcience in men. I. 411. a. An attempt to run down all ſcience, is the boldeſt that ever was formed. 412. a. The trial of wits proper for the ſciences, a book of John Huarte. III. 528. and a. b. See Knowledge and Learning.

Scientia Media does not mend the matter againſt the objections of the Manichees. IV. 518. a. b. A reflexion upon that head. 519. a. How it was looked upon by Pope Clement VIII. 824.

Scioppius acts the part of a Divine unſeaſonably, with reſpect to a witty ſaying that is aſcribed to Charles V. II. 438. a. Rallies Strada for ſaying that the whip of Charles V, is yet ſtained with his blood. 439. b. Inſults the two Scaligers. V. 99. b. Was very ſatirical. II. 817. b. 818. a. b. 819. a. b. His tricks and plagiariſms with reſpect to Giſanius. III. 161. a. b. His exaggerations. 169. b. His blaſphemy againſt the Holy Scripture. 500. a. His jeſt upon a part of Peter Deza's ſermon. 896. a. He writes a moſt abuſive ſatire againſt King James I. IV. 795. b. Is traduced by Ogier. V. 91. a. b.

Scipio, Abderame is compared to him in point of continence. I. 14. b.

Scythians, what they told Alexander. IV. 572. b. A ſtupid people, needed only to deſpiſe pleaſures, or not to know them. V. 814.

Scythianus, an Arabian, his impieties. IV. 90. a. b. 91. a.

Sclavonian: the Bible tranſlated into the Sclavonian tongue by George Dalmatin, and Adam Bohoritſch. II. 585. Truberus was the firſt who taught the art of writing in it. V. 405. A book which he tranſlated into that language. ibid.

Scotiſts, their opinion concerning the nature of Univerſals, is only a diſguiſed Spinoziſm. I. 26. a. II. 412. b. 413. a. b.

Scotus, his ſubtilties deſpiſed by OEcolampadius. IV. 400.

Scourge: who was called the Scourge of Princes, and for what reaſon. I. 435. and a. b.

Scribere, what is to be underſtood by that word. I. 351. a. b.

Scripture (Holy): a doctrine, which attacks the authority of it. I. 106. a. b. 107. a. Alabaſter's method of explaining it. 174. a. b. 175. a. Whether the materials and principles of all arts and ſciences may be fetched from it. 234. and a. b. Whether in the intention of the Church of Rome, the Laity were excluded from reading it. 495. a. The ſimplicity of its ſtyle, diſguſts St Auguſtin. 563. Whether the Laity are obliged to underſtand it in the originals. 599. a. b. According to certain Controverſiſts, the interpretation of it ſhould be accommodated to the time. 616. b. 617. a. b. Whether the Divinity of it can be proved. 706. a. b. 707. a. Bedell ſets on foot a tranſlation of it into the Iriſh language. 718. a. Salmaſius declares that the Holy Scripture is leſs obſcure than Æſchylus. II. 827. a. Unworthily treated by ſome Roman Catholic Doctors. III. 500. a. b. A thought of the Hiſtorian Peter Matthieu, concerning the manner of teaching it. 536. a. How a viſionary would have had it read to the people. 672. a. b. 673. a. It is not always to be explained according to the rules of Grammar. IV. 857. a. Has been handled by the Chriſtians, much after the ſame manner as Juſtinian's Code. ibid. There are certain things and expreſſions in it, which will confound the deepeſt Metaphyſicians. 876. a. b. What freethinkers ſay of the ſpirit that dictated the Holy Scripture. V. 35. a. Is not afraid of ſhocking modeſty, by expreſſing things naturally, and without circumlocution. 133. a. See Bible. A ſingular example, to prove that the letter of it killeth. IV. 723. a. b. The Socinians ſhould be attacked by it, ſince they acknowledge its authority. V. 820. Should be the principle of the diſputes among Chriſtians. 830. The variations and corruptions which the Heretics have introduced into the manuſcripts of the Holy Scripture. III. 733.

Scriverius, what he cites from Scaliger. V. 395. a. b. &c.

Scuderi, his complaints that his penſion was ill paid. III. 176. a. b.

Scuderi (Madam de) writ all her works out of her own head. II. 778. b. Delivered romance from an œconomy injurious to her ſex, and to decorum in general. III. 867. a. What ſhe ſays of authors who love to dedicate their books. IV. 843. b. Is called the Sappho of our days. V. 44. b.

Scullion: the ſtory of a Scullion's converſation with Lewis XI, King of France. III. 803. a.

Sculptors who were never pleaſed with their own works. V. 134. a. b.

Scultetus was extreamly deſirous to ſee the Lutherans and Reformed re-united. IV. 681. b.

Sea, whether it ought to be ſubject, as well as the earth, to the dominion of ſome States. III. 217. a.

Sea of Hiſtories. See Mare Hiſtoriarum.

Sebaſta changes its name into that of Eleuſa. I. 421. b. A conjecture concerning that alteration. ibid.

Seckendorf, a particular which he found concerning Aleander. I. 215. b.

Secret: a ſecret diſcovered, which was pleaſing to many. I. 36. b. It is a great misfortune to know ſecrets that are diſagreeable to one's ſovereign. IV. 443. a. b. &c. The beſt courſe a man can take is to behave, as if he had entirely forgot them. 444. b.

Sect: a new ſect think themſelves happy at firſt, if they can obtain liberty of conſcience, but they ſoon want to be upon an equal footing with others, and laſt of all to be maſters. I. 13. b. 14. a. b. II. 121. a. b. Nothing is more common than to ſee perſons, who have fled for their religion, ringing the alarm againſt the ſects. III. 758.

Sectaries, when they quarrel, hate one another more than they hate thoſe from whom they have ſeparated themſelves. I. 198. b.

Sects, a prejudice which prevails in all ſects. I. 51. and a. b. A ſect may very ſoon become unlike its founder. III. b. The means employed to hinder their growing powerful, are pretty much alike every where. 288. a. b. 289. a. b. 290. a. Why tolerated by the States-General. 288. b. 289. a. The deſire of revenge may induce a man to embrace a ſect. III. 29. b. Sects that are tolerated, have generally this injuſtice done to them, that they are ſuſpected of ill deſigns. 42. b. It is natural for a ſect that is ill uſed, to rejoyce at the troubles in which the State is involved. 396. b. 397. a. There is no ſect which entirely triumphs over the others. IV. 908. b. They change their ſpirit and maxims, in proportion as they change their ſtate and condition. V. 454. a. b. 473. a. The diviſions that reigned among thoſe which are ſeparated from Popery. 450. b. Several ſects are formed among the Proteſtants at Lyons. 483. and b. Viret employs the authority of the Papiſts to curb them. ibid. and n. (25).

Secular Games, when the fifth were celebrated. II. 397. a. Voſſius affirms without any foundation, that they were celebrated in the beginning of the VIIIth century of Rome. 396. b. 397. a.

Seditions: a ſedition quelled by the ſilence of a Pythagorean. I. 379. a. b. 380. a. What they are in Republics. V. 62. n. (f).

Seditious: how criminal ſeditious perſons are in the ſight of God. IV. 488. a. b. The Catholics and Proteſtants mutually accuſe one another of a ſeditious ſpirit. V. 89. a. b.

Seed, whether that of all living creatures be animated. V. 114. a. b. 115. a.

Seem: perſons who rather choſe to be virtuous, than to ſeem virtuous. I. 278. b. 279. a. b. II. 420. b. 421. a. III. 697. a. b. 729. and a. b.

Segrais quoted. V. 488. a. n. (39). 490. n. (d).

Seguin (Peter) a famous Phyſician in the faculty of Paris. I. 172.

Segur-Pardaillan deputed to the Proteſtant Princes. II. 142. b. 143. a. b. &c. He revered Brocard as a ſecond St Paul. 144. b.

Sejanus, a fatality which was ſaid to attend a horſe of that name. II. 348. b.

Sejanus kept up a criminal correſpondence with the wife of Druſus. II. 718. a. b. His artifices. 719. a. b. 720. a. Is praiſed immoderately. IV. 494. b. 495. a.

Seine, the god of that river curſes the Marſhal d'Ancre. II. 543. a.

Self-murther. III. 911. a. b. 912. a. b. 913. a. b. A furious doctrine concerning it, and the murther of our neighbours. V. 14. a. b. Authorized by the laws of a country. 627. a. b. 628. a. b.

Selim, Emperor of the Turks, was a Painter. IV. 387. b. 308. a.

Seller, we ought not to take advantage of his ignorance, when he does not know the juſt price of his merchandize. III. 440. a. b. A law to puniſh thoſe ſellers who conceal what they ought to acquaint the buyers with. I. 13.

Selvaggi (Ricciarda de') we are obliged to her for the preſervation of Cinus's Canzoniere. II. 508. n. (d).

Semiramis was prodigiouſly laſcivious. I. 523. a. Whether ſhe built Babylon. 596.

Senate (Roman) diveſts two conſuls of their office, for the diſreſpect which they had ſhewn to a letter from them. II. 291. a. Makes Cæſar proud by the honours which they confer upon him, and then hate him for being proud. 422. a. Was ſubject to all the laws made by the people. III. 490. a. b.

Senators cenſured for appearing in an unbecoming dreſs. II. 384. b. 385. a. b. Deprived of all their tribunals of juſtice. 711. b. Reſtored to the poſſeſſion of them. 712. b.

Senef: particulars of the battle of Senef. V. 190. b. 191. a.

Seneca makes uſe of a thought of Agathon. I. 126. b. How he defines probity. 185. An excellent rule which he preſcribed. 278. b. 279. a. A thought of that Philoſopher. 453. a. Is cenſured for having aſcribed to Ariſtides what he ſhould have applied to Phocion. 460. b. Recommended poverty in the midſt of opulency. 751. b. A judicious criticiſm of his. II. 483. a. b. 484. a. He looked upon what the antients have ſaid of Jupiter's thunderbolt as a pious fraud. 573. b. His anachroniſm, with reſpect to Alexander, and his converſation with Diogenes. 667. a. What he ſays of Ephorus, and in general of all Hiſtorians. 771. b. 772. a. Quoted. 847. b. 848. a. n. (31). How he could lay it down for matter of fact, that no Roman had applied himſelf to write fables. 833. b. His rules concerning the chaſtity of women. III. 601. b. 602. a. In what caſe he thinks a man commits adultery in lying with his own wife. IV. 540. a. He has refuted himſelf in his writings, as to what he ſays of the ſouls of beaſts. 549. b. According to him, none can be a good man without the aſſiſtance of God. 573. a. b. He laughs at the great number of books which had been writ on the Sophiſm called the Liar. 617. a. b. Diſplays all the degrees of Scepticiſm. V. 607. b. 608. a. Some fine maxims which he lays down. II. 259. a. b. His works tranſlated into French by Matthew de Chalvet. 430. and a. The judgment that was made of that tranſlation. ibid. a.

Seneca (Chriſtian): a good piece of Joſeph Hall under that title. III. 345.

Seneſcay, Prevoſt de l'Hotel; his behaviour to Preſident de la Place. IV. 682. b. 683. a.

Senſation: why cuſtom blunts the edge of our ſenſations. IV. 514. a. b. If it be a modification of body, then all bodies are ſenſible ſubſtances. II. 658. a. b. 660. b. 661. a. b. It cannot be the effect of the ſole diſpoſition of the organs. ibid. b. Is diſtinct from all the modifications of body that are come to our knowledge. ibid. and 779. b. Whether it depends upon our free will. V. 764. 765.

Senſe (common) there are perſons who loſe it with regard to ſome things, and who nevertheleſs ſhew their judgment through all the reſt of their conduct. V. 405. b.

Senſe (Myſtic) perſecution makes a man wonderfully clear-ſighted in diſcovering it. III. 772. b.

Senſes: whether the pleaſures of the ſenſes are not ſpiritual. II. 781. a. b. Whether the evidence of the ſenſes is proved by theſe words of JESUS CHRIST, Handle me, and ſee. V. 614. b. 615. a.

Sentences ſtrongly affect the mind. I. 461. a. Should be incorporated with the thread of the diſcourſe in an imperceptible manner. V. 327. and b.

Sepher Jezirah, a book of great weight with the Cabaliſts. I. 173. a.

Sequar, a ſtrange accident occaſioned by the pronunciation of that word in a tragedy. I. 175.

Serarius (Nicolas), a Jeſuit; Broughton communicated to him copies of very harſh letters which he writ to Beza, with full liberty to publiſh them. II. 150. b. 151. a. b.

Serarius (Petrus) depoſed from the miniſtry for his errors. IV. 123. a.

Series, diſcourſes ſuppoſed to have paſſed in evening converſations; a book writ by William Bouchet. II. 103.

II. 103. There is a good deal of learning in it, mixed with many jokes, puns, and groſs obſcenities. ibid.

Serena (Stilicon's wife) marries her two daughters to the Emperor, who both die maids. III. 482. a. b. 483. a. b.

Sermons, what Peter Aretin ſaid of them. I. 436. a. What kind of ſermons are moſt approved by the Proteſtants. II. 520. b. Bloody ſermons. III. 874. a. b. Sermons preached upon the letter O. IV. 828. b. The great ſucceſs of Savonarola's ſermons. V. 57. a. b.

Serpents: divers reflexions on the ſerpent which tempted our firſt parents. II. 851. a. b. 852. a. b. A faculty that is aſcribed to them. IV. 182. a. Serpents that grew tame and familiar with women and children. 403. b. Several have paſſed for the fathers of ſeveral great men. 407. b. 408. a. b. A ſingular ſtory about a piece of money that was changed into a ſerpent. III. 487. a. b.

Serranus (Joannes), a falſe name taken by Francis Lambert. III. 709. a. b.

Serres (John de) adds a particular to the ſtory of Pope Joan. IV. 731. b.

Serres (Lewis de) tranſlates into French John de Renou's tracts. IV. 864. and a. b. Was of Dauphiné. ibid. b.

Servant-Maids: perſons that have married their own ſervant-maids. I. 446. a. b. II. 139. b. 140. a. 618. b. V. 403. b. Are more liable to be debauched than other women, and are likewiſe in great danger of being puniſhed. IV. 503. a. One that lies with her maſter, is not puniſhed, but rewarded. II. 508. a.

Servetus, in what year he was burnt at Geneva for his Hereſies. IV. 388. a. Strange conſequences are drawn from an axiom of his concerning the preſence of God. III. 100.

Services, that cannot be rewarded, produce ingratitude. II. 737. a. b.

Servien (Mr) loſes his temper in an aſſembly of the States-General. II. 153. a.

Servin (Lewis) Advocate-General of the Parliament of Paris, treated in a brutal manner. II. 459. a. Cenſured for diſplaying too much reading and learning in his pleadings. 106. a. b.

Seſterce, its value reduced to the French Coin. II. 837. a. b.

Sethians, Heretics, vented an Apocalypſe of Abraham. I. 46. a.

Severus (the Emperor) complains to the Senate of the honours paid to Clodius Albinus. I. 395. a. What enquiries he chiefly made, when he reſolved to marry again. III. 603. a. Why he ſo patiently bore with his wife's leudneſs. 604. b.

Severus (Sulpicius) highly diſapproves the puniſhment of Heretics. III. 758. a. b.

Severity: the ſtrange ſeverity of a father to his own ſon. II. 343. b. 344. a. Different accounts of that matter. ibid.

Seville, when the admiralty was eſtabliſhed there. I. 362.

Sexes, a Monk that had both ſexes. V. 4. b. 5. a.

Sforza (Lewis) his wickedneſs and cruelty. I. 403. b. 404. a. He falls into the hands of the French. III. 811. a. n. (17). 814. a. Would have no ſoldier that ſet up for a wit in his ſervice. IV. 460. a.

Sforza (Bona), Queen-Dowager of Poland, dies in poverty and infamy. I. 405. b. Rewards a dedication with a penſion of 300 crowns. II. 462.

Sforza (Galeazzo) aſſaſſinated, by whom, and for what. III. 715. and a. b. 716. and a. b.

Sforza (Blanche) is killed by a fall from her horſe while ſhe was a hunting. III. 530. a.

Shame is no leſs ſubject than other things to the caprice of the faſhion. III. 453. a. b. 454. a. b.

She-Pope, if ever the Church of Rome ſhould make one, ſhe will find her apology ready drawn up in Father Mainferme's works. III. 63. a.

Ship: what the antients ſaid of the tree that ſerved to build the firſt ſhip. IV. 363. a.

Shipwreck: it is pleaſant to ſee a ſhipwreck, which we are not in fear of. IV. 34. b.

Shock: men know not whom they ſhock when they reprehend the ignorance of thoſe, who would paſs for artiſts in the preſence of greater maſters. I. 377.

Shunamite: how we are to underſtand the Hiſtory of the Shunamite, according to St Jerome. III. 281. a. b. 869. a.

Siam (the King of) is pulled down from the throne for having too much favoured the Chriſtian miſſionaries. I. 13. a. and n. (6).

Siameſe acknowledge no Deity, though they believe the apparition of ſpirits. IV. 939. a. By what motives they may be prevailed upon to embrace virtue and fly from vice. V. 180. a. b. 181. a. b. 182. a. They believe that Jesus Christ and Thevathat are the ſame. 183. b.

Sybil of Cumæ tempted by Apollo. II. 339. a.

Sicharbas marries his niece Dido, and is killed by his brother-in-law Pygmalion. IV. 642. and a.

Sick People, the tricks which are put upon them ſometimes. III. 614. b. Whether we ought to pray to God for their recovery, when ſickneſs makes them better men. IV. 487. b.

Sickneſs: there are people who put off believing in God till ſickneſs preſſes them. II. 12. b. 13. a. 647. b. 648. a. b. 649. a.

Siege: a cuſtom which has been obſerved for a long time with reſpect to Kings, who aſſiſt at a ſiege. III. 718. a. b.

Sigebert, what he ſays of the She-Pope. IV. 728. b. 729. a. b. It is not to be found in ſome manuſcripts. 728. b. Spanheim owns that it is a parentheſis, which may be taken away without injuring the thread of the diſcourſe. 729. a. b.

Sigeth beſieged and taken by Sultan Solyman, in the ſight of the Emperor. III. 780. a.

Sigiſmond (Auguſtus) gives over his project of a reformation in Poland. III. 848. 849. Whether he baniſhed all the Antitrinitarians out of Poland. 901.

Sigiſmond (John) embraces the doctrine of the Socinians. II. 17. a.

Silence quells a ſedition. I. 379. a. b. 380. a. Juſtified by ſhameful nonſenſe. 758. a. Whether we ought to keep ſilence, when we have to do with people of an impetuous temper. II. 195. b. It is the moſt difficult thing in the world to an author that is attacked. IV. 839. a.

Silenus, what he thought of life. V. 414. a. b.

Silk-worms, who invented the art of ſpinning their production. V. 627. a.

Sylla ſends Apellicon's library to Rome. I 335. a. His library-keeper permits the Bookſellers to get Ariſtotle's works tranſcribed. ibid. b. What he ſaid of Cæſar. II. 417. a. Though he was very far from Atheiſm, he paid no regard to things ſacred, when his intereſt was concerned. 419. a. He knew nothing of the gallantries of his wife, when they were the town-talk of Athens. III. 382. a. Treats the city of Athens very harſhly, and for what reaſon. IV. 200. Boldly tranſgreſſes the Sumptuary laws which he himſelf had enacted. 202. Thought fit to aſſume the ſirname of Fortunate. V. 366. b. 367. a.

Syllogiſm, what is the foundation of it. II. 327. b. Carneades ſtrongly oppoſed it. ibid. Chryſippus undermined the foundation of it. 494. b. 495. a.

Sylva Nuptialis, the Hiſtory of that book. IV. 358. and a. b. 359. and a. b.

Sylvanus (Plautius) being accuſed of the murther of his wife, puts himſelf to death, in order to eſcape condemnation. V. 516. His wife being accuſed of having occaſioned his diſtraction by witchcraft, is declared innocent. IV. 385. and a. b.

Sylveſter II, Pope, his genealogy. II. 240. b. 241. a.

Sylveſter of Florence, a Jacobin Friar, hanged with Savonarola, and for what reaſon. V. 64. 65.

Sylveſter de Laval, a Capuchin, reproaches the Proteſtants with their obſtinacy in the article of Pope Joan. IV. 739. b. 740. a. b.

Sylvius, a Chymiſt, condemned for his crimes. IV. 262. b. Cardinal Richelieu makes uſe of his writings. ibid.

Sylvius (Æneas) who was afterwards Pope under the name of Pius II, is the firſt who called the ſtory of the She Pope in queſtion, and that too very faintly. IV. 731. and b. 732. a. 710. b.

Similis, his epitaph. II. 430. b.

Simon (Richard) quoted concerning the Dutch tranſlation of the bible. I. 246. a. His judgment of St Auguſtin. 565. a. b. 566. a. And of le Fevre's commentaries commentaries on the Bible. III. 48. a. b. And of a book of Father Petavius. IV. 601. a. b. What he ſays of the Benedictins. III. 126. a. b. 127. a. b. And of a pretended diſciple of Port-Royal. V. 178. b. 179. a. Quoted. IV. 77. b. n. (20), (22). 78. b. n. (26). 79. a. n. (32), (34). 391. a. n. (56). & paſſim alibi. Praiſed and afterwards abuſed by Jurieu. V. 802.

Simoneta adviſes the Pope not to ſend a new Legate to Trent, and why, III. 499. a. b.

Simonides, one of his ſayings. II. 726. b. IV. 654. a. n. (9).

Simonis Religio; a conjecture concerning that book. V. 151. a.

Sympathy: an inſtance of a ſurprizing ſympathy. III. 305. b. 306. a.

Simplicity without elegance is much better than a fine Latin ſtile which corrupts the ſenſe of the original. V. 60. a.

Simplicius, the difficulty about the origin of evil was thought by him to be of great importance. IV. 527. b. His reaſonings againſt two principles. V. 826.

Sin, a whole nation puniſhed for that of a particular perſon. I. 158. a. b. 159. a. What was Eve's firſt ſin. II. 856. a. b. 857. a. How the ſin of uncleanneſs is ſucceſsfully reſiſted. III. 64. b. Whether it be an accident of the ſoul. 558. a. b. The unnatural ſin. 612. b. The origin of ſin explained by a new hypotheſis. 904. a. The difficulty of finding the origin of it. IV. 513. a. b. 514. a. b. 515. a. b. 516. a. b. 517. a. What uſe is to be made of the diſpute on that ſubject. 519. a. There is no ſect which does not abhor the doctrine that makes God the author of ſin. 522. b. 523. a. b. The queſtion about the ſin of ignorance is ſurrounded with precipices on all ſides. 874. a. b. 875. a. b. People rather chuſe to commit it, than to diſoblige a Prince who can make or ruin their fortune. V. 811. See Ignorance.

Sin (Original) an explication not agreeable to that doctrine. II. 605. a. b. 606. a. A tenet which differs from the doctrine of Original Sin, in its circumſtances only. V. 412. a. b. &c.

Sin (Philoſophical) a maxim that would carry it to the utmoſt point. III. 705. a.

Sin againſt nature, who is ſaid to have been the firſt inventer of it. V. 325. a.

Sin: whether a man that ſins mortally, ceaſes to believe the truths of the Goſpel. II. 176. a.

Synagogue, a ſpecimen of its ceremonies. I. 96. a. b. What are the ſynagogues which the laws ſuffer the Jews to poſſeſs. III. 220. a. b.

Synagogue of Amſterdam is ſuppoſed to have writ a letter to Mr Jurieu. II. 175. b.

Syneſius, his inſtitution of a Chriſtian Prince tranſlated by Daniel d'Auge. I. 562. a.

Singers: a famous ſinger of the Pontneuf at Paris. II. 600. b. 601. a. How they lived in former times. III. 224. a.

Synod of Dort, its deciſion. IV. 64. b. 65. a. Its correſpondence with the court. V. 513. b. 514. a. b. The Arminians except againſt it. II. 793.

Synod (Walloon) complains to the Synod of the iſle of France, and for what. II. 583. a. b. No longer looks upon the doctrine of Univerſal Grace as a dangerous opinion, and why. 584. b.

Synodicon in Gallia Reformata, remarks on that book. I. 671. a. b.

Synods attempts made to ſtrip them of their authority. IV. 839. b. 840. a.

Synods of France; their decree relating to the Oriental tongues. I. 246. b. 247. a. There were four perſons in them, who formed what was called the Table. 265. b. The national Synod of Charenton gives a particular charge to its deputies, not to deliver their ſpeech to the King on their knees. 261. a. And after ſeveral conteſts an audience, ſuch as they deſired, was granted. ibid. A great difference between the Synod of Rochelle in the year. 1581. And that which was held at Middelburg in the ſame year. II. 144. a. Calvin refuſes to comply with the regulations of the Synod of Lauſanne. 264. b. The Synod of the iſle of France makes an act, forbidding all flights of imagination, in expounding the word of God. IV. 274. b.

Sinope, a city of Paphlagonia, and a city of Pontus at the ſame time. IV. 113. b.

Sionita (Gabriel) a Maronite, his quarrel with one of his brethren. II. 733. a. Whether it could be of any ſervice to Mr Claude in his diſpute with Mr Arnauld. ibid. b. 734. a. When he was a profeſſor at Paris, he had not three auditors, though his reputation was great in foreign countries. IV. 493. a.

Syracon cauſes Sanar to be aſſaſſinated, and makes himſelf maſter of Egypt. IV. 383.

Syracuſe, confuſions that happened there. III. 452. a. b. 467. b. 468. a.

Syracuſians put two tyrants to death. V. 365. a.

Syricius; Orichovius remonſtrates to Pope Paul III, the injuſtice of his law touching the celibacy of Prieſts. IV. 296. a. b. 411. a. b.

Sirmond (Father) what he called Blondel. II. 27. a. Whether he repented of having publiſhed a certain letter of Geoffroy of Vendôme. III. 66. b. 67. a. unjuſtly attacked by Mr Tollius, and defended by the Jeſuits. 853. a. b.

Syrnacham was an interpreter of dreams. I. 87.

Sirname, what was the uſe of it among the Romans. I. 357. a. Several families have taken their ſirname from ſome defect. 610. a.

Sirvela (Martin Vaſques) had a fine library at Seville. IV. 615. n. (c).

Siſenna, an Orator affected to make uſe of obſolete expreſſions. I. 63. a. n. (62).

Syſtem of the Church, that book fully juſtifies the Church of Rome. I. 476. a. b.

Syſtems: falſe ſyſtems are incoherent. I. 210. If we depart from the ſyſtem of a God who freely created the world, we muſt neceſſarily admit of a multiplicity of principles. II. 644. a. What it is that makes the ſyſtem of Atoms leſs abſurd than Spinoziſm. ibid. The uſefulneſs of the ſyſtem of occaſional cauſes to ſolve certain difficulties. 767. b. The inconveniences and motives of the reformation of ſyſtems. III. 863. b. They require two things to make them good. IV. 94. a. Their reaſonableneſs conſiſts in including nothing repugnant to evident ideas. V. 825.

Siſters, their hatred is more violent than that of brothers. II. 701. a.

Sixtus IV, Pope, one of his firſt cares after his exaltation. II. 97. a. b. His anſwer to Weſſelus, who cnly aſked him a copy of the Bible. V. 545. b. 546. a.

Sixtus V, a witty ſaying which is attributed to him. I. 34. b. His bull againſt the King of Navarre and the Prince of Condé. II. 71. a. b. His eſteem and deſire with reſpect to Queen Elizabeth. 758. a. b. How he ſtood affected to the King of Spain and the League. ibid. b. 759. a. What he ſaid of Henry III, III. 408. b. He choſe rather to countenance Henry IV, and Queen Elizabeth, than to ſuffer the King of Spain to grow too powerful. 568. b. Introduced the cuſtom of not ſending the hat to Cardinals newly elected. I. 604. b. Cauſes an offer to be made of the Infanta of Spain to James VI, King of Scotland, and upon what conditions. II. 577.

Sizé (Francis) tranſlates the Anatomical Hiſtory of Du Laurens. III. 745. b. Why that tranſlation has no figures. 746. a.

Slander does not even ſpare the greateſt actions. I. 14. a. That of Archilochus occaſions proverbs. 425. a. b. Every body has reaſon to be afraid of it, and why. 490. b. It is impoſſible that perſons of different ſexes ſhould have frequent converſations together, without being expoſed to it. II. 767. a. The mortal effects of it. III. 464. a. b. 465. a. b. It ſpares certain women. 601. b. 602. a. b. Great men deſpiſe it out of policy and a greatneſs of ſoul. IV. 569. a. b. It is a very difficult matter to confute ſlanders that have the air of probability. 692. a. b. Slanders ought not to be ſlightly credited. V. 334. a. b. See Satires. Princes that have deſpiſed them. 759. &c. They are to be feared when they are accompanied with witty ſayings. 759. Reflexions upon thoſe that are publiſhed againſt men who change their religion. 224. b. 225. a. b. 226. a.

Slanderers do not even ſpare themſelves ſometimes. I. 426. a. b.

Slaves, the practice of the antient Romans in enfranchiſing them. II. 100. a. Slaves who gave occaſion for a proverb. 302. b.

Sleidan juſtified againſt Father Maimbourg's accuſations. I. 721. a. b. His Hiſtory. V. 255. b. n. (10). 293. a. Cenſured on the head of Gauricus's country. II. 499. b. Confuted as to what he ſays of Gropper's having once inclined to Lutheraniſm. III. 240. and a. b. Tranſlates ill a paſſage of Philip de Comines. V. 60. a. Pezelius writes a Commentary intituled, Mellificium Hiſtoricum, on his treatiſe de Quatuor Monarchiis. IV. 606. b.

Sloane (Sir Hans) a Phyſician of London; his fine library. II. 477. a. n. (1).

Sloth offends Heaven, which does not hear the prayers of the ſlothful. I. 94. b.

Smalcalde (the League of) their army overcome by Charles V, at the battle of Mulberg. III. 878. a.

Smerdias ſhaved by an effect of jealouſy. I. 292. a.

Smetius (Martin) runs over all Italy, to make a collection of inſcriptions. III. 251. a. Is hanged at Bruſſels by the ſoldiers. ibid. a. b.

Smiglecius, a Jeſuit, unjuſtly ranked among the Socinians. III. 661. a.

Smith (Richard) Biſhop of Chalcedon, being ſent into England, is obliged to leave it, and for what reaſon. III. 665. a.

Smyrna, a woman of that city poiſons her huſband, and for what reaſon. II. 681. a. b. There is a wild cherry-tree there, which the Greeks ſay was the ſtaff of St Polycarp. III. 431. a.

Sober: whether a man may be ſo, and yet drink a great deal. I. 567. a. b. 568. a. V. 576. a.

Sobieſki, King of Poland, two or three hundred leagues off, deſtroys a book which was juſt ready to be put to the preſs. III. 680. a.

Societies: in all Societies there muſt be a tribunal, to give ſentence without appeal, in the diſputes of private perſons. IV. 65. a.

Societies (Religious) how they are kept pure. III. 903. a. b.

Socinianiſm begun to take root in Poland and Tranſilvania. II. 16. a. Why there is no reaſon to fear that Princes will embrace it. V. 171. b. It is only fit for ſome perſons. 172. a. b. Whence it took its riſe in Poland. 229. a. b. Thoſe who are for making uſe of reaſon in matters of Divinity, become ſuſpected of it. 817.

Socinians, the difficulties into which they involve themſelves by denying the creation. II. 789. a. b. Their ſect not calculated, to anſwer the objections of the Manichees, touching the origin of evil. IV. 419. b. By denying the Preſcience of God, they reduce him to a pitiful form of government, without removing the grand difficulty, which makes him the author of ſin. 518. a. They have drawn great advantages from a book of Father Petavius. 601. a. b. Their ſentiments touching the ſouls of beaſts. 905. a. They commend in the Dutch, a conduct which Socinus had very much blamed. V. 170. b. 171. a. A general objection that is raiſed againſt them. 178. They take advantage of their adverſaries forbidding the reading of their writings. 506. b. Their ſentiments touching the mutability of an eternal nature. 588. b. Keſler ſucceſsfully employed Logic in refuting them. III. 660. a. b. 661. a. b. The difficulty of confuting their Philoſophical objections: we muſt attack them by Scripture, the authority of which they acknowledge. 820. What their God is, according to Jurieu. 824.

Socrates played with his Children. I. 131. b. The way that he propoſes for attaining to virtue. 279. a. He ridicules the Sophiſts of his time. 294. a. b. Says that the Fanatics reſemble Poets. 303. a. His cenſure on a book of Anaxagoras. 309. b. 310. a. And the anſwer to that cenſure. ibid. a. b. 311. a. His way was to diſpute pro and con. What he ſays on occaſion of the palace of Archelaus being beautified. 417. b. 418. a. He refuſes to go to the Court of Macedon. ibid. a. b. His maxim, quod ſuprà nos nihil ad nos. 462. a. The faults of ſome of his ſcholars unjuſtly imputed to him. II. 569. b. 570. a. Why ſirnamed the Melian. 653. a. b. What he did to obey the god of dreams, who had ordered him to apply himſelf to the Muſes. 830. a. b. Whether Euripides had an eye to him in his Palamedes. 874. a. b. What he ſaid of Beauty. III. 65. a. What he did, in order to lay in a good ſtock of patience. 312. b. What he ſaid of a kiſs given to a fine face. IV. 796. b. 797. a. Why his marriage with Xantippe did not interrupt his lectures. V. 165. a. The deſcription which he gives of the prerogatives of human nature. 583. b. 584. a.

Sodomy committed in temples, as a pious action. III. 773. b. Whether it be true that a petition was preſented to Sixtus IV, for leave to exerciſe it, during certain months of the year. V. 157, 158. and b. 159. a. b. 160. a. b. &c. Whether John della Caſa intended to make an encomium upon it in his deteſtable Capitolo del Forno. 422. a. b. 423. a. b. Abſolution from that crime, what it coſts. I. 628. a. b. The Dominicans take a reſolution to exclaim loudly againſt it. 855. a. b.

Soldier, one who ſaves his life by a jeſt. I. 709. a. Women prefer ſoldiers to all other men. V. 664.

Solyman cuts in pieces Ferdinand's army, which beſieged Buda. III. 532. Puts to death his favourite Ibrahim Baſha. 588. b.

Solipſians, or Monarchia Solipſorum. III. 563. b. and n. (§ a). 564. a. b.

Solitar, an abbey in the county of Hanaw, how reformed. III. 875.

Solitude (the love of), what judgment ſome people have made of it. I. 583. a.

Sollicitors in the affair of love, generally pay themſelves with their own hands. II. 632. b.

Solomon, the Jews and ſeveral Mahometans maintain that he underſtood the language of birds. V. 382. a. His views in cauſing Adonijah to be put to death. 803.

Solon, his anſwer to Piſiſtratus. II. 384. b. Unacceptable to Crœſus, and why. 831. a. His anſwer to thoſe who repreſented to him, that his tears could be of no ſervice. III. 73. b. One of his maxims examined. 777. b. 778. a.

Son: a ſon reproached on his expoſing his mother's love-letters. I. 388. a. Sons, to whom their father left no portion of inheritance, and why. II. 32.

Son of God; a man burnt for taking that title. IV. 269. b.

Song of Songs (the book of) Caſtalio's judgment upon that piece. II. 361. b.

Songs may be uſeful to States. V. 20. a. b. A ſong rewarded with an abbey. I. 428. n. (c). Thoſe of which John de Wert was the burthen, have been revived ſeveral times, and the original of them. V. 540. a. b.

Songs (ſpiritual) ſet to the moſt burleſque ballad-tunes, by whom compoſed. I. 478. b. Whether we are to condemn ſuch as are ſet to the ſame airs with prophane ballads. ibid. a. b.

Sonnet, what Boileau ſays of it. III. 177. b. The Sonnet of Job compared with that of Urania. I. 752. a. b. Sonnets prepared for books that were to come out. II. 620. b. A devout Sonnet. 647. a. b. Sonnet of the Abortive, by whom compoſed III. 392. a.

Soothſayers. See Diviners.

Sophiſms, that called the Liar, was only a vain ſubtilty. II. 846. b. 847. a. IV. 616. b. 617. a. b.

Sophocles, the circumſtances of his triumph over Æſchylus. II. 825. a. b. Why he brought none but good and honeſt women on the ſtage. 868. a. He eſteemed it a great pleaſure, that old age had delivered him out of the hands of the fair ſex. IV. 84. a. n. (24), (25). Rataller makes a fine Latin tranſlation of him. 848. a. b. 849. a. b.

Soracte, a mountain where the Hirpi walked once every year on fire. III. 466. b. 467. a.

Sorberiana, a falſe thing advanced there concerning Bagni. I. 604. b. 605. a.

Sorbiere quoted. II. 87. a. b. n. (13), (14), (17). Complaints occaſioned by his account of England. 278. b. He ſees nothing at Rome but what edifies him. 475. b. An extract of a letter which he wrote on that ſubject, ill told by the author of the Preſervatif contre le changement de Religion. ibid. 476. a. What he ſays of the abſence of mind, for which Poets are remarkable. V. 402. b. 403. a.

Sorbonne: the cenſure which the Sorbonne paſſed on the works of Mary d'Agreda, betrays a want of reſolution. I. 137. a. A little book on that ſubject. ibid. b. 138. a. Had not the courage to publiſh the cenſure without qualifying it. ibid. a. b. Cenſured by Agrippa, on occaſion of Henry the eighth's divorce. 150. b. Taught as an article of faith, the immaculate conception of the Bleſſed Virgin. IV. 77. b. 78. a. Cenſures the book intituled, Curioſitez inoüies, &c. III. 122. b. Its decree againſt Henry III. 294. b. Strongly cenſures three ſermons, upon the beatification of Loyola. 895. a. b. 896. a. b. Marot's verſes againſt that ſociety. IV. 153. a. b. Who are allowed to propoſe arguments againſt the Theſes that are maintained in the Sorbonne. 276. b.

Sorcerers are much more numerous than Inchanters. II. 243. b. What is the difference between them and Magicians. V. 385. b. A diſcourſe on their impoſtures. I. 64. b. See Inchanters, Magic, Magicians, Witchcraft, and Witches.

Sorcery, what a Roman citizen, that was accuſed of it, did. V. 524. a.

Sorel, the cenſure which he paſſes on the obſcene collections of the Poets. I. 65. b. And upon Paulus Æmilius's Hiſtory of France. II. 763. b. 764. a. He blames thoſe who alter the language of the old French authors. IV. 427. b. 428. a. Quoted. I. 65. b. n. (18), (19). His judgment of d'Audiguier. 548. and a. n. (1). And of John Huarte. III. 528. b. 529. a. b.

Sorites, a ſophiſm which puzzled the Philoſophers much. II. 492. b. 493. a. b. &c. What that ſophiſm was. 846. b. 847. a.

Sotades, an antient Poet treated with contempt, and why. I. 478. a.

Sotuel [or Southwell] (Father) latinizes a name after a wretched manner. I. 108. a. Read but few books of Controverſy. ibid. Is inferior to Alegambus. 219. a. b. Confounds two Jeſuits, Father Fevrier with Father Ferrier. III. 43. a. b.

Souches (de) was a Frenchman indeed, but not General of the French. III. 793. b.

Sovereigns, religion enervates their authority. I. 13. a. III. 624. a. Whether a perſon be obliged to reſtore to them what he has taken from them. I. 13. b. A good book might be wrote on the religion of ſovereigns. 130. b. 460. a. II. 440. a. They commit faults, for which their ſubjects are puniſhed. I. 158. b. 159. a. In puniſhing tranſgreſſors, are not directed by the ſinfulneſs of the action. 223. a. The taking up arms againſt them condemned by Amyraut. 264. b. 265. a. b. We ought never to ſlight thoſe, who have a chance for riſing to that dignity. 421. b. 422. a. Authors engage them in their petty quarrels. 670. b. An article of their religion. 721. a. What their religion is. II. 754. b. 755. a. III. 94. a. b. They are often tricked by their Generals. I. 764. a. The neceſſity of the times diſpenſes them from the obligation even of an oath, according to the laws of policy. II. 213. a. III. 182. a. IV. 698. a. Their unavoidable dependence on the clergy. II. 149. b. Whether a private perſon may lawfully bear arms againſt his ſovereign. 196. a. A caſe wherein it is lawful to depoſe ſovereigns. 254. a. They are often unfortunate in their families. 607. b. 608. a. Whether they ought to depend upon the fidelity of their ſubjects. ibid. Their gratitude is not ſubject to the ſame laws, with the gratitude of private perſons towards one another. 755. b. There is a great difference between their paſſions and thoſe of private men. III. 182. a. IV. 698. a. They ſacrifice to their temporal intereſt that of their religion. III. 234. b. 235. a. 397. b. 403. a. b. V. 457. a. They do not always ſuit themſelves in their rewards, to the extent of their dominions. III. 275. a. Have at all times been curious to know the ſecrets of families. 320. a. b. The Proteſtants and Catholics have been obſerved to change maxims with reſpect to the right of ſovereigns. 670. a. b. See Monarchs. They may be good, if we conſider them as ſovereigns, and bad, if we conſider them as men. 767. b. 768. a. It is a crime to conſult the future events of their lives. 955. a. b. They are generally unhappy at home. IV. 691. b. Whether they have children, or no children, their condition is ſtill to be pitied. 758. b. 759. a. What their prerogative is, when their lives are concerned V. 501. a. It is become cuſtomary to flatter them in dedications. II. 312. b.

Sovereignty, whether the rights of it belong to the people. I. 236. a. b. 237. a. b. 499. a. b. 500. a.

Soul (human) converted into a ſtar by the Pagans. I. 348. b. 349. a. b. Is an aëreal being according to Anaxagoras. 311. And according to Diogenes, the Natural Philoſopher. II. 672. b. Is part of the ſubſtance of God according to Ceſalpinus. 412. b. The doctrine of the propagation of ſouls, ſubſiſted to the end of the XIth century. I. 345. a. An inquiry into the original of the ſoul, is a very obſcure ſubject. 555. a. b. The mortality of the ſoul taught by Averrhoës. 557. b. 558. a. What it is acccording to the ſame Averrhoës. II. 316. b. What St Bernard believed concerning the ſtate of the ſoul, when ſeparated from the body. I. 774. The nature of the proof, drawn from the apparition of a ſoul, to evince the immortality of it. II. 66. a. b. 67. a. b. All the world does not admit of a neceſſary connexion between the immortality of the ſoul, and the providence of God. 450. b. 451. a. b. Notable diverſities of the ſtrength of the ſoul. ibid. b. 152. a. b. The ſtrongeſt proofs of its immortality, are taken from the word of God. 455. a. Whether the eternity of it can be maintained, in caſe Ariſtotle's opinions were to be followed. 567. a. b. An invincible objection againſt Dicæarchus, who would not allow the ſoul to be diſtinct from the body. 658. a. b. Objections to the objection againſt Dicæarchus. 660. b. 661. a. Is diſtinct from all the modifications of body, that are come to our knowlege. ibid. b. Where you muſt find the principles of the greateſt ſouls, without the help of Revelation. 673. b. Whether it be poſſible for a ſoul, ſeparated from the body, to feel the ſame pain that a perſon feels when burnt. 781. a. b. Impious ſentiments touching its mortality. III. 392. b. Moſt of the Pagan Philoſophers ſuppoſed that it was material. 650. b. Was compoſed of ſeveral parts, according to the doctrine of Epicurus. 790. b. 791. a. Other Philoſophers are divided on that head. ibid. b. He who denies it to be a ſubſtance diſtinct from matter, reaſons childiſhly, unleſs he ſuppoſes that all the univerſe is animated. 919. b. What becomes of it, when the man dies, according to Epicurus's ſyſtem. 929. a. Luther's opinion touching the ſtate of the ſoul. 949. a. Whether it be ſubject, as well as the body, to certain diſtempers. 948. b. Whether it ſeparates locally from the body, at the moment the man expires. IV. 320. b. It has ſtrange inequalities. 322. b. The antient Philoſophers believed that the ſouls of men, as well as thoſe of beaſts, were material. 548. b. 549. a. b. Reflexions concerning the immortality of the ſoul. 591. b. 592. a. b. Whether God creates a new ſoul, or re-produces the ſame. 655. b. Whether its immortality can be proved by good natural reaſons. 714. a. b. 715. a. b. 720. a. b. Whether the doctrine of its mortality, would induce men to all manner of crimes. ibid. What idea the Pagans had of it. 787. b. 788. a. Whether the ſoul, being united with matter, can form to itſelf an organized habitation. V. 114. a. b. 115. a. Its unity in all men taught by ſome Philoſophers. 214. b. 215. a. Whether a Spinoziſt ought to believe that it is immortal, and ſubject to the caprice of ſome inviſible perſecutor. 216. b. 217. a. Its capacity, whereby a man may turn his mind ſometimes one way and ſometimes another. 272. b. Francus pretended, that not only beaſts, but the inanimate creation partook of a general ſoul, that was Divine. III. 100. Too much ſubjected to corporeal qualities, by John Huarte. 528. b. 529. a.

Soul of the world, the doctrine of it is not new. It made the principal part of the ſyſtem of the Stoics. V. 200. b. 201. a. b.

Souls of beaſts, Anaxagoras ſaid they were intelligences, and gave them the ſame name which he gave to the firſt mover of matter. I. 301. a. Ceſalpinus affirmed that they were part of the ſubſtance of God. II. 412. b. Authors who believed that they are endowed with reaſon. IV. 911. b. 912. a. b. 913. a.

Space, whether it be nothing elſe but the immenſity of God. V. 616. a. b. Suarez endeavours to explain how God may be preſent in imaginary ſpace. III. 100. b.

Spain, ſeveral falſe Chronicles have been publiſhed there, to impoſe upon the credulity of people. I. 362. b. The women of that country are very glad to be alone with a man, who deſires the laſt favour of them. II. 27. b. A ſmart repartee which an Ambaſſador of that Court made to the Pope. 474. b. Its Ambaſſador ſollicits ſuccours in England, for the Duke of Rohan. III. 397. b. There is a certain convent in that kingdom, which every year furniſhes a Monk that ſhuts himſelf up in a hot oven, and comes out in the ſight of a multitude of people. 467. b. Its aſcendant over France in the XVth and XVIth centuries. IV. 310. a. b. Who were the firſt that diſcovered the darkneſs of Spain. 723. a.

Spanheim (Ezekiel) his learning and conſiderable employments. V. 194. a. 793. n. (ii).

Spanheim (Frederic) his Swiſs Mercury. II. 551. a. b. He refutes there the pretended miracles, which were ſaid to have happened during the ſiege of Conſtance. ibid. b. 552. a. b. If he had wrote the Hiſtory of a ſiege, ſuſtained by a Proteſtant town, perhaps he would have made obſervations, not unlike thoſe which he confutes. ibid. a. Inherits the books of Samuel Durant, whoſe ſermons he prints. 727. He does not anſwer the queſtions which Father Labbe propoſed to Mareſius, touching the maimed edition of Anaſtaſius, which the Jeſuits were reproached with. IV. 727. a. b.

Spaniards, their complaints againſt France, for concluding alliances with the Proteſtant powers. II. 338. a. b. And the anſwer that was made to their complaints. ibid. They are reproached with doing the very ſame thing, which they had found ſo much fault with in France. 755. a. The cauſe of the antipathy between them and the French. III. 809. a. b. The ſtratagem they made uſe of, when they re-took Maeſtricht. IV. 373. a. The Spaniards taken for gods by the Americans. 572. b. Are ſtill more to blame than the French, on account of their eſteem for Guevara. III. 270. b. The barbarity with which they treat Chriſtopher Marcellus. IV. 106. An expreſſion which diſcovered Texera's ſtrong hatred againſt them. V. 319. They are generally negligent, when they write in Latin: an inſtance of it. III. 774. a. b.

Sparrow, one that gives notice to the other birds, by his ſinging, that a cartful of millet was broke near Porta Maggiore. III. 232. b. n. (40).

Sparta, Spartans. See Lacedæmon, Lacedæmonians.

Speakers, a ſect of Philoſophers, who give five proofs of the Unity of God. V. 828.

Speech, one abridged in a very ſhort time. I. 633. a. b. Another ſtruck out from the catalogue of the fair of Francfort. III. 169. b.

Species (Intentional) how called by Democritus and Epicurus. II. 388. a. Are the ſhame of the Peripatetics. 643. a.

Spectacles of Devotion. See Myſteries (Dramatical).

Spectres, how the Pagan Exorciſts uſed to drive them away. II. 775. a. b. That trade was looked upon as mean and mercenary. ibid.

Sperlingen (John) defends du Laurens againſt the extravagant cenſure of Colladon. III. 746. a. b.

Speuſippus, his zeal for Plato. I. 467. a.

Spies have at all times taken notice of the manner how people talk of news. II. 627. a.

Spigelius tranſlates into High-Dutch the Turkiſh Annals which Jerome Beck of Leopoldſdorf brought from Conſtantinople. III. 774. b.

Spinoza, his conformity with Ariſtotle. I. 470. II. 412. b And with the Scotiſts. ibid. What he ſays of a man that ſhould be in the condition of Buridan's ſhe-aſs. 227. b. There is no ſyſtem which can leſs diſpenſe itſelf from acknowledging, what is ſaid of good and bad angels, among the people, than his. 251. a. 412. b. There is ſcarce any age, wherein his doctrine has not been taught. IV. 688. b. 689. a. A liſt of thoſe perſons who had the ſame opinion with him. V. 199. a. b. 200. a. b. 201. a. b. And of thoſe who have confuted him. 207. a. b. 208. a. b. 213. a. b. His ſhifts and equivocations. 208. b. 209. a. b. 210. a. b. 211. a. b. 212. a. According to him, God and Extenſion are the ſame thing. 208. b. 209. a. b. &c. He deprives us as much as in him lies, of a principle, without which all our reaſonings would be inſignificant. 223. b. A demonſtration againſt his ſyſtem, taken from the principles of Xenophanes. 574. b. 575. a. b.

Spinoziſm: a diſguiſed Spinoziſm. I. 26. a. Hypotheſes which differ not at all, or very little, from it. 52. a. b. II. 672. a. b. III. 550. a. b. V. 186. a. b. 574. a. b. 575. a. b. An opinion that is more dangerous than it. 587. b. How it is unanſwerably confuted. I. 553. b. 554. a b. 555. a. b. Is more abſurd than the ſyſtem of atoms. II. 644. a. Was at bottom taught by ſome Philoſophers, and almoſt in all ages. III. 649. b. 650. a. b. 651. a. IV. 688. b. 689. a. Origen had a tincture of it. 421. b. It is incompatible with the hypotheſis of a vacuum. V. 617. a.

Spinoziſts, wherein their fallacy lies. I. 26. a. An abſurdity to which their hypotheſis reduces them. II. 496. b. A thought of Seneca, which they would eaſily approve. 573. b. They would be ſtrangely puzzled, if they were forced to admit Mr Newton's demonſtrations. III. 793. b. Have no ſolid conſolation againſt death. 928. b. May take advantage of the doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation, nay perhaps, they will have recourſe to the myſtery of the Trinity. V. 223. a.

Spirits: perſons who lodged in rooms that were haunted with ſpirits. I. 225. II. 522. and a. b. 638. a. Whether it may be ſaid that there are ſpirits of a more limited nature than man. I. 520. b. In what their motion conſiſts according to the Carteſians. IV. 288. a. b. Hobbes's principles are no ways proper to make one deny the exiſtence and operations of ſpirits. III. 471. a. b. 919. b. 920. a. Nor yet Spinoza's principles. V. 215. a. b.

Spirits (familiar); what was Plato's doctrine concerning ſuch ſort of ſpirits. IV. 689. b. 690. a.

Spiritual ſubſtances, whether among ſuch as are created, the ſoul of man only is ſubject to change. II. 767. The Carteſians maintain that we can form no idea of a ſpiritual ſubſtance. V. 144. a. See Soul, underſtanding.

Spiritualia (Heteroclita) the title of a book. IV. 833. b.

Spizelius, what he tells of an impious perſon, to give ſome idea of his impiety. V. 138. b.

Spon (Dr) was unwilling to have it believed, that he made the ſtudy of antiquity, his principal employ. I. 337. a.

Spondanus (John) his anſwer to Calvin, touching the ſmall regard which the Popes and Cardinals had for the Chriſtian religion. II. 275. a.

Spondanus (Henry) confuted, as to a premeditated deſign, which he imputes to Theodore Beza. I. 776. a. Is as much accuſtomed as any one, to diſpoſe of the particular providence of God. ibid. What he did, when he perceived the artifice of the Spaniſh Hiſtorians, with reſpect to Charles V, and Carranza. II. 336. a. Appears altogether Ultramontane. 594. a. His miſtake touching Illyricus, and his Catalogus Teſtium Veritatis. III. 559. b. 560. a. He goes beyond the bounds of an Hiſtorian, as to what he ſays of the advice which King James gave to his ſon. 667. a. His negligence with reſpect to Ochinus, and his adventures. IV. 388. a. b.

Sponges: three holy Sponges ſent by the Pope to Eudes Duke of Aquitain, and for what uſe. I. 16. b.

Squittinio della Liberta Veneta, opinions concerning the author of that book. V. 448. b. 449. a. b.

Staff, whether the Devil has choſen it for one of his occaſional cauſes. I. 4. b. 7. a. b.

Stage: it was neceſſary to condemn the impurities of the ſtage, without deſcribing them. V. 40. b. When they began to introduce love-adventures on the ſtage. I. 313. Who firſt practiſed the rule of not ſtaining it with blood. II. 824. b. No piece could be recited on the ſtage at Rome, without being firſt approved. V. 295. and a. The French ſtage is more nice than that of Athens. 304. a. St Auguſtin is unjuſtly cenſured, with reſpect to the licentiouſneſs of the ſtage. IV. 568. a. b.

Stage (French) ſome fragments that ſhew what it was in the time of Francis I. II. 477. a. b. 478. a. b. 479. a. b. 480. a. b. A paſſage of Boileau on that head. 480. b n. (18).

Stancarus, Calvin and he gave one another the ſame hard words. V. 230. b. He married a wife being a Prieſt. 232. b. 233. a. Staniſlaus Orichovius diſputes againſt him. IV. 411.

Stars, the antient Poets made them often the ſubject of their metamorphoſes. I. 348. b. 349. a. In what part of the world the ſcience of the ſtars had its beginning. III. 311. What the longitude and the latitude of the ſtars are. 461. b. Whether revolutions in religion are to be imputed to them. 948. a. b. The ſtar which led the wiſe-men to Bethlehem has nothing in common with the burning torch which Timoleon ſaw in a dream. V. 364. b.

State of Innocence, the duration of it. I. 22. a. b.

State-Catholic, a book highly eſteemed, who is the author of it. III. 41. a. b.

States: it is generally ſpeaking the maxim of ſtates to obſerve no other law but what tends to aggrandize them. I. 130. a. b. Thoſe who govern them find themſelves oftentimes obliged to commit acts of injuſtice. 448. a. b. The great revolutions which happen in them often proceed from a trifle. II. 711. b. A temperature that is often to be obſerved in the government of ſtates. III. 506. b. 507. a. Their temporal good is generally preferred to religion. IV. 621. a. b.

States-General of France limit the royal authority in ſome reſpects. III. 409. a. Whether it be for the intereſt of France that they ſhould meet. IV. 139. a. b.

States General, or the United Provinces of the Low-Countries, make an edict, prohibiting the public exerciſe of the Romiſh religion in Boiſleduc. III. 548. a. A diſpute which that edict occaſioned. ibid. and b. Send an Ambaſſador to Muley Zidan King of Morocco. 170. b. 171. a. What they did in favour of the Grecians. 172. a. How they juſtify themſelves with regard to libels. V. 755.

Statics, Stevin's treatiſe on that ſubject is excellent. V. 236. b.

Statius congratulates himſelf on having writ 278 Hexameters in two days. I. 664. b. A commentary on that author, in uſum Delphini. 756. Navagiero's averſion againſt him, which was ſtrange and full of prejudice. IV. 315. a. b. 316. a.

Statius (Achilles) may very poſſibly have made the ſame trial of the public taſte, that Muretus made of Scaliger's. II. 353. a.

Statues: A ſtatue which appeared with a quite different countenance to thoſe who came into the temple, than it did to thoſe that went out. II. 203. It was a very rare privilege for great men to have their ſtatues placed in the Forum, during the firſt ages of the Roman Republic. 290. b. Cities have been ravaged for inſulting the ſtatues of a ſovereign Prince. 665. b. Statues hung in the air by virtue of the load-ſtone. IV. 41. b. 42. a. Cato the cenſor's anſwer to ſome who wondered that there was no ſtatue erected to him. 750. a. Pygmalion falls in love with one, and how he behaved to it. 641, 642. Clemens Alexandrinus and Arnobius alledge that, to ſhew the Pagans the vanity of their idols. 641. a.

Stature: perſons that were of a very ſmall ſtature. I. 184. a. 326. b.

Step-Mothers, there is a certain fate which inſpires them with a great deal of ill-humour. III. 189. a.

Stephens (Charles) paſſes an error upon us, which has been bandied from one Dictionary to another. II. 258. b. Dies in the Chatelet, greatly in debt. III. 830. b. His miſtake concerning Pyrrhus. IV. 660. a. b. Did not underſtand a paſſage of Philoſtratus. 784. a.

Stephens (Robert) his houſe was always full of people who ſpoke nothing but Latin. I. 602. a. b. Protected by Caſtellan againſt the Sorbonniſts, and afterwards given up to them. II. 372. b. Being perſecuted by the Sorbonniſts, he retires to Geneva. III. 830. b. Accuſed of having altered a paſſage in Bucer's commentary on the ſecond Pſalm. II. 173. a.

Stephens (Henry) how he expreſſes himſelf, in ſpeaking of the good tables of the Clergy. II. 815. a. b. His cavillings on the death of Lucretia. III. 911. b. 912. a. b. He a makes bad defence for Herodotus, who had aſcribed envy and jealouſy to God. IV. 575. a.

Stephens (Nicole) a learned woman. III. 830. a.

Steſichorus loſes his ſight, and recovers it again, for what, and how. III. 368. a.

Stetin beſieged in vain by the troops of the Emperor and thoſe of Brandenburg. III. 901. a.

Stevinus (Simon) cenſures Peter Nonius, whom he nevertheleſs acknowledges to be a great Mathematician. IV. 382. a.

Stews, Cayet accuſed of having writ an apology for them. 242. b. 243. a. 246. and a. b.

Style: affectations in point of ſtyle. I. 63. a. b. There was a time when a barbariſm of ſtyle was much in vogue. 432. a. b. An author does not much entertain the world, when by changing his ſtyle, he gets out of his element. 438. a. b. The pompous ſtyle is generally not the ſtyle of a man of quality. 722. a. b. Who boaſted that his ſtyle was of a high ſtrain and glittering. II. 191. b. The deceitfulneſs of proofs drawn from a likeneſs of ſtyle. 808. a. We ought to avoid a ſtyle that is too conciſe, and for that very reaſon obſcure. III. 248. b. There are ſeveral degrees of decency with reſpect to the ſtyle. V. 841. The author declares that he did not pretend to politeneſs of ſtyle, which was likewiſe neglected by Mezerai and le Laboureur. ibid. and n. (24).

Stock-fiſh; ſome people at Rome valued that fiſh, in complaiſance to the Pope. III. 327. a.

Stoics, no Philoſophers were farther from the truth than they. II. 63. b. Confuted with reſpect to religion. 331. a. b. Accuſed by Plutarch of perverting the common conceptions, more than the Academics. 495. a, Said that Cyniſm was the ſhorteſt way to attain to virtue. 671. b. The pain which they feel from their evils, is the beſt objection that can be made to them. III. 423. a. They ſpoke too pompouſly of the empire of Reaſon. IV. 441. a. b. Are ſtrongly refuted by Plutarch, with reſpect to the uſefulneſs of vice. 520. a. b. Were more orthodox than Arnobius, with reſpect to matter conſidered as one of the principles of all things. 521. a. Their maxim concerning the uſe of words. 706. b. Their ſage exiſts only in idea. II. 310. b. They laughed at the diſtinction of words. V. 847. An objection which they made uſe of. 858.

Stones: a black ſtone carried away out of the temple of Mecca by the Karmatians. I. 49. The ſame ſent back. ibid. How it was proved to be genuine. ibid. The author's reflections upon that head. ibid. a. b. A ſtone honoured by the Saracens 124. a. b. Another worſhipped by the Arabians. ibid. b. Falls of ſtones foretold and reverenced. 306. a. b. Tranſparent ſtones. II. 303. a. b. Miraculous ſtones which people formerly pretended to have in ſeveral places. 745. and a. b. 746. and a. b. The Ligurians are knocked on the head by a ſhower of ſtones. III. 434. a. b. 435. a. b.

Stories: little ſtories are very proper to entertain a company pleaſantly. I. 666. b. Some men have the power to immortalize any ſtory, whether it be true or falſe. II. 7. a. However ridiculous the ſtory may be that a perſon confutes, he ought to be exact. 267. a. Stories that were forged in the times of ignorance, for good ends. IV. 615. a. b. It is not allowed to alter any thing in thoſe that are to be found in the beſt antient writers. ibid. b. How a perſon ought to behave, with regard to ſuch ſtories as are grounded only upon hear-ſay. 379. a. b.

Stoupp, author of a book intituled La Religion des Hollandois. V. 203. a. Was killed at the battle of Steinkerken. ibid.

Strabo, what he ſays of fables. II. 832. a. His judicious reflexions on the miraculous ſtatues which cities boaſt of having. V. 156. a. b.

Straſburg, the indulgence of its Magiſtrates for fornication. I. 222. a. Its ſchool. V. 256. a. b. 257. a. That city neither will, nor can always preſerve its neutrality. III. 718. a. b.

Stratagems of the Devil, what is ſaid of that book and the author of it. I. 92. a.

Stratocles perſuades the Athenians to offer a ſacrifice to the gods by way of thanks for the defeat of their enemies, the news of which he knew to be falſe. V. 749. b.

Stratonice, Queen of Syria; what reaſons induced her to make herſelf drunk. II. 533. a.

Stratonice adviſes Dejotarus, her huſband, to make uſe of another woman. II. 630. a. b.

Streinius, why his book, intituled, the Anti-Anicianus, has never been printed, I. 341. a. b.

Strong: there is nothing more advantageous than to be always for the ſtrongeſt faction. V. 250. a.

Strozza (Charles) dies, notwithſtanding Savonarola's cap and contrary prediction. V. 61. a.

Stuart (Mary), Queen of Scotland; the Hiſtorical Pyrrhoniſm that one has reaſon to chuſe, with reſpect to her adventures. II. 282. a. b. How ſhe eluded the deſign which her uncle had of keeping her jewels. III. 873. b.

Study, the moſt libertine youths, and thoſe who have no inclination for it, do not fail to ſucceed therein ſometimes. I. 562. a. b. 563. a. Extreme application to ſtudy. II. 370. b. 637. b. 638. a. The ſtratagem that a father made uſe of to make his ſon reſume his ſtudies. 687. and a. Whether ſtudy raiſes leud thoughts. III. 260. a. b. Happy are they who can ſtudy fourteen or fifteen hours a day, without being ever ſick. 342. a.

Studying: a method of ſtudying. I. 319. b. 320. a.

Stupid people, a man of wit is ſometimes uncapable to deceive them. V. 147. a.

Stupidity is not ſuch a great misfortune as people imagine. I. 480. b.

Sturmius writes things to the diſadvantage of Hotman. III. 523. a. b. Had been ſeveral years without receiving the communion. V. 257. b. What he tells us of Cæſarius, and ſome other Saxons. II. 242. a. b.

Suarez went through his courſe of Philoſophy with ſo little ſucceſs, that he thought he never ſhould be able to attain to any competent knowledge in it. II. 802. b. Endeavours to explain how God may be preſent in imaginary ſpace. III. 100. b.

Subjects are not pleaſed to ſee their prince beſtow his treaſures and favours on his friends, in an extravagant manner. I. 571. a. The doctrine of their obedience propoſed with too much indiſcretion. 687. a. Whether they ought to take up arms to deliver themſelves from tyranny, or wait till their neighbours come and deliver them from it. II. 52. b. Maxims about their obedience. 423. a. b. Loyal ſubjects are generally neglected. 443. a. b. III. 421. a. It would not be a hard matter to make them approve of conqueſts and battles, provided they coſt them no money. V. 656. A ſubject cannot make himſelf formidable to his maſter, without having committed a thouſand acts of injuſtice. II. 541. a. b.

Subſtance: the idea which the Philoſophers form of a ſubſtance. V. 221. a. b. &c.

Subtilties (ſophiſtical) are only fit to corrupt the mind. V. 241. a. b. 242. a. b. We ought not to affect ſubtilties in matters of religion. III. 343. b.

Succeſs, that of an enterprize is not always anſwerable to appearances. I. 365. b. 366. a. b. Vanity does not hinder men from allowing God to have been the cauſe of a good ſucceſs. II. 298. a. b. 299. a. Several have aſcribed the glory of a happy ſucceſs to God, only for a political end. V. 366. a. b. 367. a. b. People often judge of matters by the ſucceſs. 369. b. 370. a. b. &c.

Sueſſa, there were two towns of that name. III. 905. a.

Suetonius (Tranquillus) his candour and ſincerity. V. 263. a. b. 264. a. b.

Suffridus Petri, his credulity. I. 36. II. 769. a.

Suidas, that author is ſo mutilated and corrupted that there is no depending upon him. I. 44. b. His groſs ignorance, with reſpect to Dejotarus. II. 628. b. He is ill underſtood, as to the cauſe which obliged Æſchylus to retire into Sicily. 825. b.

Sulmo reſpected by Alphonſo, King of Naples, and why. IV. 433. a.

Sulpitius (Servius) exceeded his maſters. I. 613. b.

Sultans, who was the only one amongſt them that durſt ſend a body of regular troops into Italy. IV. 50. a.

Sun, what it is, according to Anaxagoras. I. 307. a. b. An example of a very particular ſympathy with the ſun. II. 402. b. 403. a. The Spaniſh Hiſtorians ſay, that the ſun ſtopped its courſe in favour of Charles V. 443. b. 444. a. There are ſeveral perſons to whom the ſun is a ſenſible god. 449. a.

Superfœtation, an inſtance of ſuperfœtation often quoted. I. 283. Who was a famous inſtance of it. ibid.

Superintendant of the Finances; the ſincere and ingenuous confeſſion of ſuch a ſuperintendant's wife. V. 16. b.

Superiors, their bad life is imitated, but not their good. III. 385. a.

Superſtition; nothing is accounted too coſtly, when once people are intoxicated with ſuperſtition. I. 2. How uſeful it is to a General, when he employs it either to rouze or moderate the ardour of his ſoldiers. 542. a. b. Thoſe who are infatuated with it, generally make no ſcruple to commit the greateſt crimes. II. 629. a. b. It is difficult to be extirpated when it is a ſource of gain to private perſons. IV. 178. a. b. It deſtroys good ſenſe. V. 77. b. It is a misfortune that we do not know all the ſuperſtitions of the antient Romans. III. 646. b. There are two ways of ridiculing it, the one good and the other bad. IV. 584. b.

Supplements: ſome readers write, in the margin of an Hiſtory or Calendar, a great many ſupplements. IV. 728. a.

Supralapſarians and Infralapſarians maintain the ſame thing at the bottom. IV. 524. a.

Sura compoſes orations for Trajan. III. 317. a.

Surena, what concluſion one may draw from his perfidious behaviour to Craſſus. V. 273. a.

Surius (Laurence) tranſlates all Ruyſbroeck's works. IV. 942.

Suſpicions: people are very ready to give the reins to ſuſpicion. I. 479. b. Prejudices againſt thoſe who are apt to entertain ſuſpicions. 745. a. b. Their bad effects. 588. a.

Sutcliffe is miſtaken, as to the time in which Ciechus lived. II. 499. a. b. Falſely aſcribes to Agrippa ſome things which he has not ſaid concerning Sixtus IV. V. 164. b.

Suſa; it is not true that Catinat was obliged to raiſe the ſiege of that place; on the contrary he took it, and kept it till the peace. IV. 210. b.

Sweating-Sickneſs in England, what kind of ſickneſs it was. I. 271. b. A dangerous diſtemper which has frequently made great havock in England. V. 42. b. Confounded with the pox by a perſon who tranſlated Sanders into French. ibid.

Sweden, what Maimbourg tells us of a treaty about the reduction of that kingdom to the obedience of the Church of Rome. III. 139. b.

Swedes invade Poland. III. 553. Make ſo many conqueſts upon the King of Denmark that they force him to give up to them three fine provinces. ibid. Had no good opinion of the Emperor's intentions, when he offered them his mediation. 851. b. Beſiege Conſtance without ſucceſs. II. 551. and a. b.

Swertius taken for a Calviniſt, and confounded with the author of the Athenæ Batavæ. IV. 942. b.

Swiftneſs in running was antiently an heroic quality. I. 77. a.

Swine's Fleſh, what reaſon Plutarch gives for the Jews not eating it. I. 115. a.

T.

T[illegible]ria: the deſign of the Lex Tabellaria. II. [illegible]45. a. n. (6).

Tabl[illegible]at of Alcinous paſſed into a proverb. I. 201. a.

Tableau de l'Amour conſideré dans l'état du Mariage, who is the author of that book. III. 581. b. Quoted. IV. 801. b. n. (24).

Tables (Alphabetical) See Indexes.

Tables (Aſtronomical) called Alfonſines, coſt the author of them the empire of Germany. II. 379. a.

Tables (Chronological) cenſured by Tanaquillus Faber. III. 388. a.

Tabourot (William) Father to Des Accords. I. 66.

Tabulæ Novæ, what they were among the antient Romans. II. 679. a.

Tachard quoted. V. 182. a. b. n. (12), (13), (14), (16), (17), (18). 183. b. n. (20), (21).

Tacitus, the difference of opinions with reſpect to a Spaniſh tranſlation of that Hiſtorian. I. 180. a. b.

What he ſays, on the ſtatues of Brutus and Caſſius not appearing at a funeral ſolemnity. 498. b. II. 94. b. n. (11). Swallowed the marvellous. I. 518. b. His ſtyle is too conciſe and obſcure. III. 248. b. What, according to him, is the ſtrongeſt inclination of the Deity with reſpect to man. IV. 572. b. 573. a. Whether he was much more ſcrupulous than Suetonius in deſcribing obſcene actions. V. 264. b. 265. a. b. 266. a. b. A judgment upon that Hiſtorian. 330. a. Althamerus publiſhes notes upon his Germania. I. 235.

Tacitus, Emperor, the ſpeech that he made in the ſenate. I. 575. b. 576. a.

Taffin, Miniſter of Metz, conſults the Miniſters of the conference of Poiſſy, touching the baptiſm of children baptized by women. I. 704. b.

Tagaut (John) enlarges and improves the chirurgery of Guy de Cauliac. II. 399. a. His Latin as pure as that of Cicero. ibid. b.

Tahureau (James) greatly ridicules the Aſtrological books of Peter Turrel. V. 417.

Talents: the ſtory of talents multiplied. I. 47. a. b.

Talents: there is a certain mixture, which hinders the fineſt talents from advancing us. I. 698. a. b. It is a very conſiderable and a very uſeful talent to be able to receive a languiſhing converſation. 701. b. 702. a.

Tallard (Count) takes Traerbach in the year 1702. V. 396.

Talmudiſts, their opinion concerning Adam's ſtature before and after he had tranſgreſſed. I. 103. b. They are ſo obſcure, that they are not to be underſtood. IV. 598. a.

Talon, Advocate-General, taxes the Janſeniſts with having zealouſly adhered to the cauſe of the Popes. III. 567. a.

Tamerlane cauſes his daughters to learn Magic, in order to facilitate his conqueſts. IV. 940. b.

Tammuz in Ezekiel was the ſame with Adonis, according to St Jerome. I. 125. b. 116. a.

Tandemus, the head of a ſect. IV. 629.

Tandler (Tobias) his harange de Faſcino & Incantatione, and his anſwer to Elich. II. 750. a. b.

Tapeſtry; Garaſſe ſharply cenſured for publiſhing the tale of the Tapeſtry of Queen Joan d'Albret. III. 134. IV. 332. b.

Tapyri had a law, by which the huſbands gave their wives to others, when they had two or three children by them. III. 495. a.

Tapper (Ruard) how he cried out one day, on account of Baius's doctrine. I. 608. a.

Taranto: Lewis, ſon to Philip Prince of Taranto, kills himſelf by immoderately careſſing his wife. IV. 301. b. 302. a.

Tareagnota, Mambrin Roſeo continues his Hiſtory of the world. IV. 918.

Tardieu, Lieutenant-Criminal at Paris, murthered with his wife. III. 40. b. 41. a.

Tarentines fall out with the Romans without a cauſe. IV. 662. b.

Targum of Jeruſalem relates to us what the diſpute was between Cain and Abel. I. 23. b.

Tarphan an interpreter of dreams at the King of Egypt's court. I. 87.

Tarquin, King of Rome, was a tyrant in two reſpects. II. 162. b. 163. a. He and his brother were very different in their manners. V. 290. a. He re-eſtabliſhes the Compital games. II. 163. b. Cauſes children to be ſacrificed in honour of the Dii Penates, &c. ibid.

Taſſo was ſubject to fits of madneſs, whi[illegible] not hinder his writing excellent verſes. II[illegible]. a. Spoiled his Poem by too much correcting. [illegible] 897. a. Whether he lived in lodgings. V. 401. a.

Taſſoni (Aleſſandro) quoted. III. 700. b. 701. a. n. (35). 773. a. n. (7). IV. 835. a. n. (8).

Taſte, an inſtance of its capriciouſneſs. V. 374. a. b.

Tatian reaſons ill againſt the Gentiles. II. 653. b.

Tavanes, Confident to the Duke of Orleans, brother to Henry II, performs a conſiderable exploit againſt the garriſon of Calais. III. 401. a. IV. 17. and a. b.

Taulerus praiſed immoderately by Luther. V. 301. b.

Taxation, that for which Cyrenian had a ſpecial commiſſion. IV. 820.

Taxes of the Romiſh Chancery, facts concerning that book. IV. 649. a. b. 650. a. The edition of it that was publiſhed by Laurence Banck. I. 627. b. 628. a. b. 629. a. b. Other editions of it, and among the reſt, that of Rome, in 1514. 628. b. The difference of thoſe editions. ibid. Put in the Index Librorum Prohibitorum. ibid. The juſt reproaches of the Proteſtants, with regard to that book. ibid. 629. a. The Romiſh Controverſiſts are much puzzled what to ſay about it. ibid. b. A Chancellor of Bois-le-duc, who promiſes to abjure his Catholiciſm, if any one could ſhew him thoſe abominations which the Proteſtants quote, as taken from that book. ibid. a. There are ſeveral obſervations upon it, in a work tranſlated by Laurence Tuppius. V. 415. a. b.

Taxites, a cuſtom that they obſerved, with reſpect to their daughters. V. 131. a. n. (39).

Teachers are obliged to avoid ambiguous maxims, and to prevent falſe gloſſes. I. 463. a.

Teeth, William Bigot was born with two. II. 7. b.

Teians built Abdera. I. 17. a. b.

Teiſſier (Antony) cenſured. I. 747. a. b. n. (1), (10). IV. 848. and a. n. (3). Should have added corrections to the paſſages, where Thuanus is miſtaken, in the elogies he beſtows on learned men. ibid. b.

Tekeli, the correſpondence which France carried on with him. I. 171. a. b. His misfortunes. III. 682. b.

Telamon never laughed. V. 317. a.

Telemachus, an eaſtern Monk ſo called, his adventure, his courage, and his martyrdom. I. 230. a. b.

Telemachus, the author of his adventures, cenſured for the character he gives to Pygmalion. IV. 643. a. b. 644. a. b. 645. a. b.

Teleſinus, General of the Samnites, for what reaſons he wanted to deſtroy the city of Rome. III. 686. b.

Tellier (Father) takes advantage of ſome ſtories, which are ſpread abroad, without knowing whether they be true or falſe. I. 727. a. His reflexions on the zeal which the Janſeniſts ſhewed to have two decrees of the Court of Rome printed. III. 567. b.

Tementhes adviſed by the god Hammon, to beware of cocks. IV. 790. a.

Temenus, one of the chiefs of the Heraclidæ in the expedition, in which they retook the Peloponneſus. II. 240. b. 241. a.

Temerity, whether a lucky raſhneſs deſerves that name. V. 370. b.

Temermans (Antony Antonine) ſuffers himſelf to be ſtrangled, rather than he would reveal the confeſſion of Jaureguy. II. 460. b.

Temper: a man's temper has a great influence upon his mind. II. 452. a. b. It is almoſt always the firſt and principal ſpring, even in perſons who are God's inſtruments. III. 11. a.

Temperance, a diſcourſe on that virtue converts a famous Debauchee. V. 570. a. b.

Tempeſt, an Atheiſt's anſwer to thoſe who reproached him with being the cauſe of one. II. 655. b.

Temple of Jeruſalem, Julian the Apoſtate could not rebuild it. I. 228. Ezekiel's deſcription of it is a difficult matter. 618. a.

Temple of the Earth, facts concerning it. II. 344. b. 345. a.

Temple of Epheſus, the reflexion which an Hiſtorian makes, on Diana's ſuffering it to be burnt. III. 59. a. b. IV. 405. b. V. 360. a. How the Epheſians eluded the deſire which Alexander had, to appropriate the whole inſcription of that temple to himſelf. 553. a.

Temporal: the Temporal character generally abſorbs the Eccleſiaſtical, when they are joined together. III. 768. a. b.

Tennis, the antiquity of that play. IV. 344. a.

Terah, ſome Fathers of the Church, have thought that he neither was a believer in his life, nor at the point of death. I. 45. b.

Tercera Iſles, a bloody affront which the French received there. V. 254. a. b. No ſatisfaction was required for it. ibid. b. Which is a ſhameful paſſage of Henry the third's reign. ibid.

Terebinthus, heir to the eſtate, money, and impieties, of Scythianus, comes to a tragical end. IV. 90. a. b.

Terence commended for having wrote no Tragedies. I. 59. b. Who is the author of the verſes, prefixed to his Comedies. 375. a. How he wrote his Comedies. II. 39. b.

Terentia divorced by Cicero. V. 380. b.

Terminus, a Heathen god, ſtands more in fear of Hadrian, than of Jupiter himſelf. III. 317. a. b. St Auguſtin's raillery on that head. ibid.

Tertullian makes uſe of a miracle of Achilles againſt the Epicureans. I. 85. b. His imaginary triumph over the wiſe Heathens, conſidering the fact he goes upon. II. 642. a. What he ſays of the connexion between gluttony and luſt. 822. a. And of the privileges which the Heathens granted to women, who had married but once. III. 192. a. An examination of a propoſition which he affirms, viz. That the meaneſt Chriſtian tradeſman, finds God and declares him. V. 141. b. & ſeq. A thing that he reproaches the Pagans with. 454. a.

Ter-Veer. See Vere.

Teſtament (the New) ſome body ſaid that there is not a jot in it, but what is taken from the Jewiſh antiquities. IV. 880. a. b.

Tetragramma: whether the points of the Tetragramma are proper to that name. I. 244. b. 245. a. Abuſive reflexions on that head. ibid.

Text (Hebrew) whether the Jews altered it. I. 173. a.

Tezelius (John) is the perſon who wrote firſt againſt Luther. IV. 772. b.

Thales, whether he acknowledged a God, who had formed all things. I. 300. b. V. 321. a. b. 322. a. He taught that water was the principle of all things. III. 650. a. An anſwer which is aſcribed to him, touching the definition of God. V. 141. b. 142. a.

Thalia, a Poem, what the matter and form of it are. I. 478. a. b.

Thames, in leſs than nine hours, ebbs and flows three times contrary to cuſtom. V. 42. b.

Thargalia gains the affection of the principal Grecians by her wit and beauty. IV. 578. b.

Thaumaſius (Mount) the wonders that were told of it. IV. 205. b.

Theagenes, the hero of a romance, gives his heroine a box on the ear. III. 378. a. b. See Romance.

Theatins, their quarrel with the Jeſuits. III. 887. a. b.

Theatrum Urbium, who is the author of that work. II. 121.

Thebans were forbidden to ſleep in the temple of Amphiaraus. I. 277. a. Paid Divine honours to Alcmena. 208.

Thebes called the City of the Sun, by the Egyptians. II. 233.

Theft was allowed among the antient Egyptians. I. 464. b.

Thelin, his Divine eſſays. I. 562. a.

Themiſtocles, his anſwer to an inhabitant of Seriphus. II. 414. b. The envy which people bore him, was one of the cauſes of Cimon's advancement. 504. b. 505. a.

Theocritus, his anſwer to the queſtion, why he did not write. I. 453. a.

Theocritus, the Poet, a paſſage in him, corrected by Mr de Longe-Pierre. I. 113. b.

Theocritus of Chios, his judgment of Anaximenes's ſpeeches pleaſantly expreſſed. I. 330. a.

Theocritus, the Sophiſt, his raillery upon hearing of Alexander's death. IV. 404. b.

Theodidactus, why that name was given to Ammonius Saccas. I. 269. a.

Theodorus, the Atheiſt, boldly denied there were any gods. II. 652. b. After what manner he anſwered the objection which a woman made to him at a feaſt. III. 460. a. b.

Theodorus Studita, his teſtament tranſlated by Father Sirmond, and by Livineius. III. 853. a. b.

Theodoret decides a point like a bad Divine. I. 13. b. 14. a. b. He ſhould have built upon the authority of Iſocrates, when he reproached the Pagans with the Divine honours which they paid to Helen. III. 368. a. Alledged an author who is againſt him, with reſpect to the impurities of Prodicus. IV. 784. a. b. 785. a. What he ſays againſt Plato's laws, concerning the two ſexes. 802. b.

Theodoric, King of the Oſtrogoths, his Hiſtory wrote by Cochlœus. II. 523. a. b.

Theodoſius, Emperor, was offended, when he found his ſon ſitting at his leſſon, while his maſter ſtood. I. 507. How St Ambroſe treated him. 593. a. An edict of this Emperor. V. 760.

Theodoſius the Younger, Emperor, his ſudden change with reſpect to Neſtorius, gives room to believe what Acacius of Berœa ſays of it. IV. 348. b.

Theology, what Accurſius ſays of it. I. 67. and b. Cannot ſubſiſt without Philoſophy. II. 202. b. Ramiſm and Carteſianiſm involved in its diſputes. 696. a. It ought not to be ſubjected to Philoſophy. IV. 419. b. See Divinity.

Theology (Pagan) what it made a tyrant expect. II. 557. a. b. 558. a.

Theon, the Sophiſt, a precept of Rhetoric which he gave. II. 341. b. What he tells us concerning Ephorus. 772. b.

Theophilus, a French Poet, reproaches Balzac with two or three unpleaſant adventures. I. 623. b. It is pretended that he was in love with Des-Barreaux. II. 646. b. Of what kind his impieties and obſcenities were. III. 135. b. 136. a.

Theophraſtus, a leud woman wrote againſt him, which occaſioned a proverb. III. 779. a. b. The reaſon which Vives gives, why Leontium wrote a book againſt him. ibid. b.

Theopompus, his double dealing, in ſaying one thing with the tongue and another with the pen. IV. 174. b. His vanity. V. 332. b. 333. a. b. He and Timæus are looked upon as a couple of ſatirical and fabulous Hiſtorians. 358. b.

Theory, oppoſite to Practice. I. 130. b. 131. a. A Theory which engages a Doctor to practice. II. 193. and a. b.

Theſeus, one of his wives has been multiplied into four. V. 305. a. He is obliged to prove his Divine original. ibid. b. 306. a.

Theſpeſius led a good life after his reſurrection. I. 282. b.

Theſſaly was very much cried down for witchcraft. V. 310. a.

Thetis pimps for her ſon. I. 84. a. Is at variance with her huſband the Ocean. III. 634. b.

Thevathat, the Hiſtory of that man. V. 182. a. b. 183. a. b.

Thevet confuted, as to the Magic art, of which he accuſes Agrippa. I. 151. a. b. 152. a. His want of judgment in recommending certain books. 165. a. His diſhoneſt proceeding. 736. a. He cenſures the ingratitude of great men, who overlook the miſery of ſeveral perſons of diſtinguiſhed learning. III. 50. b.

Thomas Aquinas, his authority among thoſe of the Church of Rome. I. 470. a. Cenſured. IV. 877. b. 878. a. b.

Thomas à Becket, his perſecutor becomes his votary. III. 797. b.

Thomaſius (James) his harangue concerning the predictions of the new Prophets. III. 436. b. 437. a.

Thomaſius (Chriſtian) is about an apology for thoſe who have been unjuſtly accuſed of Atheiſm. III. 671. b. V. 323. a. n. (16).

Thomaſſin (Lewis) one of his ſentiments examined. I. 302. a. b. His reflexion touching the original of the Manichees, Neſtorians, and Eutychians, that are in Aſia. IV. 513. a.

Thomiſts, their Hypotheſis about Tranſubſtantiation. V. 819.

Thonis, an Egyptian Courtezan, ſummoneth a young man before the Judges, and for what. III. 714. b.

Thornax, a mountain of Laconia, why called Coccygius, or Coccyx. III. 632. a.

Thorns (fabulous) whoſe flowers were of the ſhape of a crown. I. 37. and b.

Thought, the formation of it is a very difficult ſubject. I. 555. b. If it be a modification of the body, then all bodies are thinking ſubſtances. II. 658. a. b. 660. b. 661. a. b. V. 215. a. b. It cannot be the ſole effect of the diſpoſition of the organs. II. 661. b. Is diſtinct from all the modifications of body that are come to our knowledge. ibid. and 779. b. Can only be found in an indiviſible Being. III. 790. b. 791. a. b.

Thoughts, there is not leſs wit required in applying them right, than in being the firſt authors of them. II. 779. a. A thought muſt be true in order to be fine. 527. a. There are no thoughts ſo much to be ſuſpected, as thoſe which are put off in an aſſuming manner, and with a majeſtic tone. III. 809. a. There are thoughts, which being eſſentially good, are reliſhed every where, and at all times. IV. 741. b. 742. a.

Thoughts of Morinus, a book which brought its author to the ſtake. IV. 269. b. 270. a. b.

Throne, thoſe who ſit upon it, have more need than others of the aſſiſtance of a happy temper, to become ſaints. II. 767. a.

Thuanus (James-Auguſtus) a fault which muſt needs have crept into his Hiſtory, corrected. I. 22. b. He calls the Proteſtants a very ſuſpicious people. 119. a. b. His ſon was ſo ſharply reproached by King James, that it threw him into a fit of ſickneſs. II. 183. a. He forgets an eſſential thing, in ſpeaking of Buſbequius. 232. a. An examination of what has been ſaid, as to Camden's having furniſhed him with memoirs different from what he (Camden) publiſhed afterwards in his Annals. 283. b. 284. a. A precaution which he took to hinder his Hiſtory being ſuppreſſed. 283. a. b. He admired the judgment which Julius Cæſar Scaliger paſſed upon Cardan. 317. b. 318. a. One page of Thuanus, upon Charles V, is to be preferred before a volume of Sandoval. 442. He is miſtaken in his judgment of the Brutum Fulmen. III. 521. a. His contradiction with regard to Charlotte, daughter to the Duke of Montpenſier. 864. b. 865. a. He would not ſpeak Latin. IV. 409. a. b. Diſfigured proper names. III. 722. b. 723. a. He inveighs ſtrongly againſt the conduct of the Conſtable de Montmorency, with reſpect to the Ducheſs of Valentinois. IV. 699. a. Cenſured. II. 399. IV. 848. b. Did not ſufficiently enquire into what concerned the lives of the learned. ibid.

Thuanus (Francis), ſome particulars relating to his trial. III. 802. a. b. 827. a. b.

Thucydides, whether or not his ſtile was imitated by the writers of his time. II. 570. b. 571. a. He has gained immortal honour by doing juſtice to his greateſt enemies. V. 801.

Thuringia, the Archbiſhops of Mentz renounce their right to that country. II. 815.

Tyana, the inhabitants of it built a temple to their countryman Apollonius. I. 380. b.

Tiara (Pontifical), whether the word Myſterium was writ upon it. II. 708. a. b.

Tyard (Pontus de) cenſured. IV. 609. a. b.

Tyber, projects formed to prevent its inundations. V. 499. a. b.

Tiberius (the Emperor) conceals a moſt dangerous ſnare under the appearance of frankneſs. I. 422. a. b. Is very ill-uſed by Artabanus II, King of Parthia. 511. and b. 512. a. Puts an author to death for having praiſed Brutus and Caſſius. II. 355. b. Is flattered in full Senate. 356. a. One of his beſt-conducted intrigues. 559. b. Was deſtitute of all natural affection. 719. a. Lays aſide his ordinary diſſimulation. 720. b. 721. a. Rejects a petition very harſhly, and his ſeverity is diſliked by the Senate. III. 497. What he did to conceal his being the death of the accuſed. IV. 21. b. Praiſed immoderately. 495. and a. b. Grants the honour of a triumph to Blœſus, and refuſes it to Dolabella. V. 277. a. b. 278. a. His conduct with reſpect to Sejanus's daughters. 824.

Tiburnus was a Pagan deity. V. 350. b.

Tycho Brahe ſettles in Bohemia. III. 657. Wiſhed that the number of Mathematician Preachers was greater. IV. 680. a.

Tigranes put to death by Tiberius. III. 164. b. Another Tigranes made King of Armenia by Nero. ibid.

Tigre (Le), a ſatire which occaſioned the death of two perſons. III. 290. a. b.

Tilbury (Gervaſe of) quoted. IV. 738. b. 739. a.

Tilenus confers with Cameron. II. 285. a. His advertiſement to the aſſembly of Rochelle. IV. 212. a. b.

Tillet (Lewis de) engaged Calvin to compoſe ſhort exhortations, which were read as homilies in ſome pariſhes. II. 261. a. Was only Canon and Archdeacon of Angouleſme, and not a Biſhop or Archbiſhop. IV. 681. a. n. (1). V. 356. and a. b.

Tilly, General of an army, was very chaſte. III. 414. b. V. 357. Acquired honour, partly by his own good conduct, and partly by the bad conduct of his enemies. 180. a.

Timæus, what he ſaid of Ariſtotle's ſhop. I. 465. a. He does not do juſtice to Agathocles in his Hiſtory. V. 359. a. b.

Timanthus, how he drew the face of Iphigenia's father, in order to repreſent his grief. IV. 505. b.

Time; a Grammarian was of opinion, that diſputing on any material queſtions of Divinity, was ſo much time ill employed. II. 190. b. It is difficult to averr things which paſſed in remote times. 386. b. Whether time be diviſible in infinitum. V. 609. a.

Time to come, God has very wiſely covered it in thick darkneſs. II. 126.

Time (unſeaſonable), all thoſe who are to preſent their works to great men, ought to avoid unſeaſonable time. III. 281. a. b.

Timocrates, the calumnies which he vented againſt Epicurus. II. 782. b.

Timoleon, the elogies which Timæus beſtows upon him. V. 360. a. A dream that he had. 364. b. What anſwer he made when ſome perſons in Syracuſe publickly accuſed him. 365. a. b.

Timotheus, how he anſwered thoſe who reproached him with his mother's ſcandalous life. II. 548. b. What Plutarch relates concerning that Athenian General. V. 367. a.

Tyndarides, a ſtory that is told of their apparition. V. 140. a.

Tindium; whence it came that the thorns which grew about the temple of Tyndium, were thought to be always in bloom. I. 37. b.

Typographical errors in names multiply perſons. IV. 193. An error of that kind is the reaſon that Mr Moreri has given us a chimerical Hereſiarch. ibid.

Tyre, the cruelty which Alexander exerciſed upon the inhabitants of that city. IV. 7. a.

Tyranny; in deſtroying one, people very often eſtabliſh a greater. III. 452. a. b. 467. a. b. 468. a. Who invented moſt of the ways by which it is eſtabliſhed and kept up. IV. 562. a. One of the greateſt misfortunes that attend it is, that there is no way to renounce it. 563. b. 564. a. b. Tyranny exerciſed without arms. 566. b. 567. a. b.

Tyrants, whether faith is to be kept with them. II. 164. a. There are who hate the tyrant, but not the tyranny. 167. a. b. They would have us fear leſt the walls and floors of our chambers ſhould witneſs againſt us. 627. a. Can lay no ſtreſs upon the fidelity of their ſubjects. III. 139. a. It is lawful to put them to death. I. 237. b. Authors who maintain that doctrine. II. 458. a. b. 459. a.

Tiraquellus produced every year a book and a child. III. 662. b. 663. a. V. 380. a. Quoted. 129. b. n. (26), (27), (28). He was one of the moſt illuſtrious men of the XVIth century. 799. The character of his Commentary on the laws of matrimony. ibid.

Title of a book, which alarms the Court of Rome, and which the author reforms. III. 122.

Titles: how fond people are of pompous titles. II. 170. a. b. Titles given to Princes, are only according to the uſage. I. 800. b. A private perſon who gives Princes the titles which they uſually aſſume, does not ſet himſelf up as a judge of their pretenſions. ibid.

Titus Livius, what he ſaid of the Republic of Rome. I. 138. a. b. The difference there is betwixt him and Valerius Maximus, with reſpect to the marble tiles, which had been taken from the temple of Juno Lacinia. III. 640. a. b. 641. a. He contradicts himſelf in ſpeaking of Alexander. IV. 9. a. An eſtate ſold to purchaſe him. 467. b. 468. a. Quoted. 749. a. b. n. (18). His maxims incorporated in the body of the diſcourſe. V. 327. b. He and Ovid die in the ſame year. IV. 447. b.

Tobacco, when and by whom made known in Italy. V. 26. and a. A Poem on that ſubject. ibid. a. b. and 346. a.

Toledo, flies do not enter into the ſhambles there, and why. III. 430. b. The fifth Council of Toledo makes decrees againſt thoſe who are inquiſitive about the ſucceſſion, in a Prince's life-time. 955. a.

Toleration in point of religion, a juſtification of that which the States-General grant to the Mennonites. I. 288. b. 289. a. A compariſon between the toleration of the Mahometans, and that of the Chriſtians. IV. 39. a. b. 349. a. b. Milton's principles on on that head. 223. a. b. Whether the Roman Catholics ſhould be excluded from it. ibid. b. 224. a. b. That which the Jews granted to the Sadducees, was an exceſſive toleration. V. 11. b. 12. a. The Sieur de Beauval's treatiſe on that ſubject. I. 672. a. b. Oppoſed by Viret, who employed the authority of the Papiſts, to curb the ſects of Lyons. V. 483. and b.

Toleration (the Advocates for), it is not true that they pretend to take from Princes the power of the ſword, which they hold from God. III. 147. b.

Tollius, the blundering miſtake of that Critic, with reſpect to Father Sirmond. III. 853. a. b.

Tombs; ſome miraculous adventures have been related concerning Ajax's tomb. I. 161. b. And concerning that of Alcmena. 208. b. The Pagans believed that it was not ſafe to remove them. ibid. A memorable tomb. 210. b. Lightning falling upon them, is looked upon as a glorious accident. II. 870. a. Three famous Lawyers in the ſame tomb. 507. a. b.

Tongue: a boy who continued to ſpeak, after he had loſt his tongue. II. 410. b. It is a fine victory to be able to command it. 438. a. b.

Too much: the maxim too much of nothing ſuffers infinite varieties, when the queſtion is to fix the bounds between too much and enough. I. 766. a.

Tooth (golden): it was a meer impoſture. III. 486. a. Horſtius was groſsly deceived about it. ibid.

Top-knots, their antiquity. I. 333. a. b. II. 544. a. b. 545. a. b.

Torigni, confident to Margaret de Valois, Queen of Navarre, is removed from that Queen. IV. 335. a. b.

Torſtenſon beſieges Brin, loſes 4000 men there, and abandons the ſiege. V. 192. b.

Torture, whether the uſe of it ſhould be allowed. III. 238. and a. b. 239. a. b.

Torvobatius, the fictitious name of Des Accords. I. 66. b.

Totan (William) believed to be author of the Fortalitium Fidei, of which he publiſhed a new edition. V. 197. a.

Totila, the Hiſtory of him wrote by Cochlæus, was never publiſhed. II. 523.

Toulouſe, the Inquiſition there, puniſhes certain Heretics, on account of their leudneſs. III. 280. b.

Tour (Count la) ſeizes on the ſuburbs of Vienna, and beſieges the city. V. 677.

Tournament, it does not ſuit the majeſty of a King, to be one of the Combatants. III. 399. b.

Tourneur (le) was the name of the family of Verſoris, which is no more than that French word turned into Latin. V. 464. a.

Touronenſis (Gregorius) cited about a ſon Ham. V. 632. b. 633. a.

Tours was not plundered by Abderame. II. 851. a.

Touches. See Bigarrures.

Tower of wood, which defended the Pyreum. I. 424. a. b. And which was ſaid to have been proof againſt fire. ibid. An Architect who could tranſport an entire ſtone tower from one place to another. 474. and a. b.

Towns (Imperial) of Alſace, whether they can retain their immediate holding of the empire, under a protector or guardian that is King of France. III. 717. b. 718. a. Cannot preſerve a neutrality. ibid.

Tractatus de Libertatibus Ecceſiæ Gallicanæ, who is the author of that book. I. 157. a. b.

Trade, what is the ſcience neceſſary to make one ſucceed in it. II. 33. a. b.

Traditionaries, who was the chief of them among the Jews. I. 173. b.

Traditions, we cannot be too diſtruſtful of ſuch as are only grounded upon hearſays. II. 473. b. 474. b. 475. a. b. Whether they ought to be credited, when they concern things that are ſuppoſed to have happened a great while ago. 829. b. What weight the Pagans laid upon them, when they were to prove the exiſtence of a Deity. 872. b. Whether we ought to have any regard to fabulous traditions. III. 743. b. 744. a. b. The long duration of the moſt fabulous. 751. b. An author who carefully followed them in his Dramatical repreſentations of the myſteries. II. 480. b.

Traditions (ill grounded) Launoi and ſome other writers who oppoſe them, do credit to their Church, and diſpleaſe many. IV. 739, 740. Baronius and Bellarmin maintain with might and main, ſeveral traditions as ill grounded as the ſtroy of the She-Pope. 734. a. One does not much examine thoſe that may ſerve for an ornament to the ſubject one treats of. 738. b. Sometimes people blame and reject them, at the ſame time that they admit very childiſh ones. 864. and b.

Traditions of Slander are more to be miſtruſted than traditions of praiſe. IV. 511. a. At the end of three or four generations they ought not to be received. ibid.

Tragedy: the laſt word of a tragedy occaſions a terrible accident. I. 175. The alterations which the antients made in tragedy. II. 824. a. b. Several women with child miſcarried at ſeeing the tragedy of the Eumenides acted. ibid. b. What was the fineſt part of the antient tragedy. 872. a. It is unreaſonable to charge the author of a tragedy with all the ſentiments he puts in the mouth of the actors. 873. a. Plato is againſt any tragedies being acted, wherein the gods are abuſed. 825. a. We are not to place what we find there among Hiſtorical facts. IV. 660. a. How it was defined by Gorgias. V. 147. a. Tragedies upon religious controverſies. IV. 299. a. b. Rataller repreſents in a very noble manner the uſefulneſs of tragedy in the Epiſtle Dedicatory of his Latin tranſlation of Sophocles. 849. b. Some Poets do wonders in the four firſt acts of a tragedy, and ſucceed very ill in the laſt, for which good Poets reſerve their moſt exquiſite ſtrokes. III. 720. b.

Trajan, what was the moſt magnificent of all his buildings. I. 376. An extraordinary action attributed to him by Lampridius. II. 770. b. Though none of the Hiſtorians of that Prince ſpeak of it. ibid.

Tranſcribers: haſty tranſcribers fall into the greateſt miſtakes. I. 209. b. To how many faults they are liable. 536. a. The author mentions divers things only to ſerve for a warning to tranſcribers. II. 232. b. A ſtory that is told of the fault of a tranſcriber. V. 106. b. 107. a. They introduce alterations. I. 538. b. Confound facts with their own conjectures, &c. IV. 609. a.

Tranſlations; one ſingle point, either taken away, or added, or altered, produces quite oppoſite things in a tranſlation. I. 525. a. They require more capacity than one would think. IV. 873. and a. b. How difficult they are. V. 409. a.

Tranſlations of the Bible into the Vulgar Tongue, a ſurprizing inſtance of the abuſe that may be made of them. IV. 723. a. b. Blamed by Mr Ponect; his advice on that head to Peter de Gondy Biſhop of Paris. ibid. a. The book which Ponect writ on that ſubject is extremely trifling in Mr Arnauld's opinion. ibid. b. A collection of authors who have diſapproved them, and Mr Arnauld's judgment of that collection. ibid.

Tranſlators often aſſume a right which they have not. I. 77. a. Some times ſow diſſenſion, when they leaſt think of it. 205. a. A rule which they ought to follow. 510. a. They ought never to paraphraſe, nor depart in the leaſt from their original, without being thoroughly acquainted with the matter in queſtion. II. 43. b. Are generally the Panegyriſts of the authors whom they tranſlate. 590. Cannot well be truſted. IV. 169. a. b. How liable they are to commit great blunders. V. 384. b. Their miſtakes. 820.

Tranſitions, how difficult it is to manage them well. IV. 619. b.

Tranſubſtantiation, John Poinet admits that word, but ſo as not to include Oral Manducation. IV. 693. b. Thoſe who maintain it, confound the notion of things, and the ſignification of words. V. 219. a. b. 220. a. b.

Trappe (Abbot de la) his prodigious progreſs in the ſtudy of the Greek Poets. I. 293. a. b.

Travellers: what a traveller anſwered to thoſe who made a jeſt of his unſettled temper: and the anſwer that was made to another traveller. I. 540. a. Their relations ordinarily ſhew us what is their prevailing taſte, whether they are Antiquaries, Phyſicians, Geographers, &c. III. 342. b.

Travelling, the bad effects of it complained of. III. 345. b. Condemned by Joſeph Hall, Lanſius, &c.

Approvd

Approved of by Lipſius, who gives good inſtructions concerning it. ibid.

Treacle, who invented it. I. 334. and a. b. 335. a. b.

Treaties of Peace, it is their fate to be found fault with. III. 420. b. The antient Romans made no great ſcruple to violate them. 583. b. 584. a.

Trebonius treacherouſly put to death at Smyrna II. 680. b.

Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil, what the prohibition to eat of it ſignified. II. 856. a.

Trees: an extraordinary tree planted by Abraham. I. 46. a. b. The great age of certain trees. 281. b. b. The Gentiles had a religious veneration for ſuch as they believed to be very antient. III. 349. b.

Trent (the council of) they were willing to conclude it by acclamations. III. 870. b. 871. a. See Council of Trent.

Treſlon incenſed againſt the Duke of Alba, and for what reaſon. IV. 453. and n. (b).

Treus (Servilius) a Venetian Lawyer, excelled both in buſineſs and learning. II. 314. a. b.

Trezenians eat their fruits too green, that oracle explained. III. 965. b.

Tribes: one of the tribes of Athens was named Acamantis. I. 53. and b. Another of them bore the name of Ajax. 161. b.

Tribunals favourable to fornication. I. 222. a. b. 223. a. b. In all ſorts of tribunals men of honour decline ſitting as judges, from the moment that they are excepted againſt. 489. b. The people generally preſume in favour of tribunals. 610. b. A tribunal which was called the Rock of the Accuſed. II. 245. and a.

Tribunes of the people, the ordinances made at their requeſt, were not properly called laws but Plebiſcita. III. 490. a.

Tribuneſhip of the people, an employment peculiar to Plebeian families. I. 356. a. b.

Tribunitian Power, a name given by Auguſtus to the ſupreme authority. II. 718. a.

Tribute, it ſometimes has the ſpecious name of a penſion. I. 541. a. b.

Triceſſius (John) a man of learning and quality, clandeſtinely ſows the ſeeds of the Reformation at Cracow. III. 147.

Trifles; a perſon ought neither to dwell upon them, nor return to them: they ſhould be the amuſements of youth. I. 64. a.

Trifling particulars do not want their uſe. II. 309. a. b. Are inſeparable from criticiſm. 773. a.

Trimouille, the pretenſions of that houſe to the kingdom of Naples. IV. 313. b. 314. a. b.

Trinity, moſt people are not ſatisfied with words upon that myſtery. I. 29. a. The doctrine of the Trinity compared to the three propoſitions of a Syllogiſm. ibid. b. And to the three dimenſions of matter. ibid. According to ſome authors Ariſtotle was not ignorant of it. 471. a. What was the belief of the Fathers of the three firſt centuries concerning it. 477. a. b. A collection of paſſages, which ſhew that the antient Jewiſh Church believed it. IV. 880. a. The Spinoziſts will perhaps have recourſe to that doctrine, in order to ſave their hypotheſis. V. 223. a. b. What it was that opened a door in Poland for the overthrow of this myſtery. 228. b. 229. a. b. The ſubtleties of the ſchoolmen on this head. 819, 820, 821. Some Proteſtant Divines could wiſh that the whole doctrine of it had been expreſſed in five or ſix lines. 819. A ſtrong invective of the Abbot Faydit on this ſubject, againſt the explications of the ſchoolmen 820. and n. (30). There is no ſubject that has been more perplexed by the Spaniſh ſchoolmen. 820. The anſwer of the leſſer Catechiſm of the Reformed Churches on this ſubject. 826.

Tripoli beſieged and taken by the Turks. I. 406.

Triſtan falls into two groſs miſtakes in a paſſage of Lampridius touching the Emperor Hadrian. III. 318. b. His miſtake, with reſpect to Julia, wiſe of Septimius Severus. 603. a. b. Cenſured by Perizonius, for what he ſays of Marcellus's mother. IV. 397. a. b.

Trithemius (Abbot) his catalogue. III. 559. b. 560. a. Convicted of a falſehood with reſpect to Platina and his impriſonment. IV. 685. b.

Triumph: who was the firſt ſtranger honoured with a triumph at Rome. I. 611. b. A taſte different from that of an antient Father, who wiſhed he had ſeen a triumph at Rome. III. 646. a.

Triumph (Naval) who was the firſt Roman that had it decreed to him. II. 726.

Triumvirate diſpoſſeſſed of their lands, thoſe who had cultivated them. I. 319. a.

Triumvirate mentioned in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, of whom it was made up. III. 269. a. b.

Triumviri condemn 1400 Roman Ladies to declare what eſtates they poſſeſſed. III. 489. and a.

Trivulcio cauſes a paſſage to be made through a mountain for the introduction of the French army into Italy. III. 98. a. b.

Troy: all the miſfortunes of the war of Troy were occaſioned by women. II. 481. b.

Trojans, how they treated the daughters of the Locrians. II. 340. a. b. 341. a. b.

Trophy, religion forbad the violation of it. I. 525. b.

Truchſes (Gebhard) Elector of Cologn, under what name the Spaniards are employed againſt him. II. 224. b. His complaints on that head. ibid. Waramund writes in his defence, and Gonſalez Pontius de Leon confutes him. III. 774.

True: what appears true to us to day, may not appear ſo at another time. IV. 188. b.

Truquis (the Preſident) obliges Guichenon to inſert in his works whatever he pleaſes. III. 275. b.

Truth, is centered in an impenetrable abyſs. IV. 653. a. b. 654. a. Evidence cannot be the rule and meaſure of truth, or what they call its Criterium. ibid. b. V. 586. b. Whether it be not neceſſary to make outward profeſſion of it in time of perſecution. I. 663. a. b. There are truths againſt which the moſt prejudiced and the moſt paſſionate men will not diſpute. 708. b. The depoſitaries of truth compared to the dogs of the Capitol. 773. b. Thoſe truths, which are called maxims, no leſs claſh with each other, than errors and truths. 784. b. They are two very different things, to love truth in itſelf, and to love the party which one takes for the true one. II. 24. a. b. It avails little that there ſhould be ſuch a thing, if we have no rule to diſtinguiſh it from falſehood. 327. a. b. Whether it ought to be ſupreſſed. 451. b. We loſe it by diſputing too much. 485. b. It does not need to be ſupported by ill means. III. 55. a. b. There are ſome who preſerve it as they do a piece of China-ware. 902. b. The ſoul is more ſtrongly faſtened to it by the weight of the paſſions than by the charms of light. IV. 188. b. Whether we ought to own diſadvantageous truths. V. 824. 825.

Truths (Evangelical) it is eſſential to them not to be ſquared by the rules of Philoſophy. V. 815.

Truths (Hiſtorical) are not leſs impenetrable than Phyſical ones, on many occaſions. II. 543. b. Who were called the three pillars of truth in Spain. IV. 723. a. The ſuppreſſion of a truth is a real lie, when it is done with an intention to deceive him who aſks a queſtion. V. 51. b. 52. a.

Tudelenſis (Benjamin) makes David the co-temporary of Romulus. IV. 763. b.

Tudeſque, the ſignification of that word, according to Menage and Bouhours. V. 540. a. n. (2), (3).

Tullius (Servius) what was the preſage of his riſe to the kingly dignity. V. 288. a.

Tunic of JESUS CHRIST, Bajazet boaſted that he had it. V. 469. a. b. 470. a. b.

Turenne (the Marſhal de) is fond of re-uniting both religions. I. 705. b. The gentlemen of Port-Royal are very buſy to make him change his religion. II. 518. a. b. He did not pretend to learning. 520. b. The impertinence of a country ſquire in ſpeaking of that great Captain. 774. a. On what occaſion his gallantries were talked of. III. 265. b. 266. a. His meals reckoned too ſhort. V. 35. b. Killed. IV. 211. b. Maſcaron compoſes his funeral oration. 172. Beaten at Mariendal. 917. b. Puts Colonel Roſen under guard. ibid.

Turenne (Madam de) her character. IV. 331. b.

Turin, by whom and when its citadel was built. IV. 453. b.

Turk, that word ſtrikes the common people more than the word Ottoman; Jurieu's artifice in the uſe he makes of theſe words. V. 803.

Turks cannot forbear laughing, when they ſee the image of St George in the Chriſtian Churches. II. 466.

II. 466. Very much in conceit with their own language. 517. b. Are not ſo deſtitute of books as people imagine. III. 171. a. b. Some of them believe the tranſmigration of ſouls. 341. b. They introduce the miniſtry of religion into the deſign of making conqueſts. 586. a. Their defeat. 682. b. 683. a. They are defeated at the paſſage of Raab. 793. b. Have a greater averſion to the Jews, than to any people in the world. IV. 40. a. Several among them pull out their eyes, after having ſeen Mecca. ibid. b. Have a great veneration for a camel. ibid. Who was the firſt of their Emperors, to whom the weſtern nations gave the title of Grand-Seignior. 49. a. Who are thoſe called among them the ſons of the Holy Ghoſt. 346. They have no ſort of moderation in their paſſions, with reſpect to their Princes. 425. a. Sacrifice to the reigning Prince, the life or the liberty of all his brothers. 558. a. When and for what reaſon they ſolemnly curſe the Chriſtians. V. 390. b. Conceive a jealouſy againſt Fakkreddin, and put him to death. III. 3.

Turn: the turn which ſometimes popular injuſtice gives to things. V. 188. b.

Turnebus, in what ſuperior to Bodin. II. 44. b. Makes a ſpeech againſt an Atheiſt. IV. 845. b.

Turreau (Peter) Regent at Dijon, tried for a conjurer, but defended by Caſtellan, and abſolved by the Judges. II. 368. a.

Tzerelas, the family name of Tilli. V. 356, 357.

Tzetzes is too modern an author to deſerve to be followed in a matter of fact, which can neither be reconciled with Homer, nor with the antient authors. I. 79. b.

V.

Vacuum: a Vacuum, and the Hypotheſis of atoms, admitted by ſome Philoſophers in the Eaſt. III. 792. a. b. Gets the ſtart of Des Cartes's doctrine by degrees. ibid. b. Thoſe who demonſtrate a vacuum, do a pleaſure to the Sceptics. 793. a. b. Reaſons againſt the exiſtence of a vacuum. V. 615. b 616. a. b. 617. a. b.

Vayer (la Mothe le) cited upon the Pagan Oracles. I. 132. b. n. (3). Cenſured for what he ſays of Socrates and Alcibiades. 131. b. He commits ſeveral faults, in ſpeaking of Stratonice and Combabus. II. 535. a. b. His anſwer to Garaſſe's invectives againſt two Philoſophers. 667. b. 668. a. Cenſured with reſpect to Auguſtus's ſucceſſor. III. 816. a. He tranſlates ill a paſſage of Quintilian touching the contempt which Alexander had for a man of extraordinary ſkill. IV. 9. b. 10. a. Blunders in explaining a paſſage of Homer concerning Ulyſſes and Penelope. 540. a. b. Is miſtaken with reſpect to Pyrrho. 658. b. His blunders in ſpeaking of Tacitus, and his Anachroniſm with reſpect to Thucydides and Demoſthenes. V. 282. b. He makes a ſtrange clamour againſt Alciatus and Ferret, for what they ſay of Tacitus's Latin. ibid. 283. a. b.

Vair (du) one of the decrees pronounced by that preſident. IV. 747. a. What he quotes from St Jerome. 799. a. b.

Val (du) the Phyſician, ſent to the gallies, and for what reaſon. III. 954. b.

Valdagnia (Joſeph) a Phyſician in Breſcia, is driven from thence, together with his defender Donzellinus. II. 689.

Valenciennes taken by aſſault the eighth day of the ſiege, but not by treachery. IV. 211. a.

Valentina of Milan ſuſpected of practiſing againſt peoples lives by poiſon. II. 205. a.

Valentinian, (Emperor) although a very chaſte man, compoſes a moſt laſcivious Poem. I. 583. b. 584. a. b.

Valentinois (the Duke of) orders the hand and the end of the tongue of a man, who had ſpoken ill of him, to be cut off. IV. 89. b. Cauſes——— Lorenzo to be thrown into the Tiber. 90. b. Orders the tongue of Jerome Mancionus to be cut out. ibid.

Valera (Cyprian de) his Spaniſh tranſlation of Calvin's Inſtitution. II. 262. b. n. (39).

Valery: how the eſtate of Valery came into the family of the Princes of Condé. III. 832. a.

Valerian, Emperor, durſt not put his ſon under the direction of Aurelian. I. 570. b.

Valerius (Marcus) why ſirnamed Corvinus. II. 290. b. n. (6).

Valerius Maximus, we find a thought of his in a ſatire againſt the French Academy. I. 59. a. He is far from being an exact compiler. II. 343. a. b. Speaks too negligently of the temple of the earth. 344. b. Cannot be excuſed for what he ſays of the riches of Democritus's father. 635. a. Has taken Diagoras for Protagoras. 652. b. His miſtake concerning Ariſtophanes. IV. 577. b. What he does to improve a jingle of Antitheſes and Parallels for his purpoſe. V. 569. b. 570. a.

Valeſiana quoted. III. 569. a. b. n. (29). 740. b. n. (44). IV. 246. a. n. (4). & paſſim alibi.

Valeſius (Henricus) cenſured. I. 100. b. His defence of Herodotus, who had attributed to God a jealous humour. IV. 576. a. b. His character. V. 805.

Valette (the Duke de la) condemned to loſe his head, and for what reaſon. III. 59. b.

Valiere (Madam de la) what family ſhe was of. V. 390. a.

Valla (George) his tranſlation of Nemeſius's book de Natura Hominis, treated with the utmoſt contempt by Nicaſius Ellebodius. IV. 345. b. 346. a.

Valla (Laurentius) to be commended for his modeſty. II. 432. b. A ſtory that was applied to him. IV. 600. b. An ill-natured jeſt that was made upon him after his death. V. 434. a. b.

Vallier (St) what family he was of. IV. 694. a. Where and by what means he received his pardon, after being condemned to loſe his head. ibid. a. b. His puniſhment of death changed into a perpetual impriſonment. 700. a. b.

Valois (Prince Charles de) is prevailed upon by the Pope to compoſe the confuſions of Florence. II. 296. a.

Valour: the extraordinary valour of a young gentleman fighting againſt the Saracens. II. 136. a. b.

Van Dale, his anſwer to an objection. I. 281. b. He ſupplies the author with ſome remarks. IV. 424. b. V. 536. a.

Vanini, what he would have to be done in great cities. II. 627. b. A profeſſed Atheiſt. V. 813.

Vanity: the fooliſh vanity of men, with reſpect to providence. I. 24. a. In what the vanity of human occupations chiefly conſiſts. II. 671. a. b. It does but too much prevail among the moſt pious perſons. IV. 331. b. How many crimes it is the cauſe of. 684. b. A vanity that bought flattery by a teſtamentary legacy. V. 566. a.

Vanity of Sciences, a book which gave great offence to many. I. 153. a. b. 154. a.

Vannozzi ſays that the Italian writers ſhould not diſcover their mother's nakedneſs. III. 273. b.

Vardes, Governour of la Cappelle, condemned to death for contempt of the court, and afterwards declared innocent. III. 263. a.

Vardes (the Marquis de) diſgraced by reaſon of ſome intrigues mentioned in a book. III. 263. a.

Variations, the Hiſtory of the Xth century is quite full of them. IV. 429. b.

Varillas cenſured for his paraphraſe on a paſſage of Paul Jovius. I. 57. b. Commits ſeveral remarkable blunders in ſpeaking of Agricola. 144. a. b. And about the learned men whom he has mentioned in his Anecdotes of Florence. 201. b. What he ſays there concerning the book de Gloria, is inconſiſtent with what he has ſaid of it in the life of Lewis XI. 202. b. 203. a. b. He has tranſlated ill a paſſage of Jovius. ibid. Quoted. 403. a. b. n. (4), (5), (6), (7). 404. a. n. (9). 405. b. n. (18). III. 151. a. b. n. (2), (4), (5). & paſſim alibi. His moderation commended, and the liberty taken by the author of the ſecond edition of the Menagiana, cenſured. I. 586. b. 587. a. He is cenſured for ſeveral miſtakes, with reſpect to Calvin. II. 62. a. b. And to Luther. 75. b. 76. a. In the public confeſſion which he makes of a fault, he commits [illegible] others. 137. a. b. Cenſured for a miſtake [illegible] in a point of fact and in a point of right. [illegible] 185. a. His errors touching one of Calvin's books, 260. a. b. They are ſo enormous, that they are enough to make one renounce the ſtudy of Hiſtory.

ibid. a. He advances things that do not deſerve to be confuted. 266. b. Had not the courage to publiſh his ſentiments of a ſtory publiſhed againſt Calvin. 267. b. A paſſage of his concerning the life of that Reformer, wrote by Papirius Maſſo, examined. 268. b. 269. a. His manner of reading the books which he conſulted, muſt be unaccountable. ibid. His diſpute with Dr Burnet about Camden's Hiſtory, examined. 283. b. 284. a. He is cenſured for two faults, which he commits in ſpeaking of Caſtellan, and the Aſſembly of Melun. 375. b. 376. a. b. Reflexions on his account of the Calviniſm of the Ducheſs of Eſtampes. 843. a. His miſtakes touching the motive from which that lady's huſband cauſed a juridical enquiry to be made againſt her. 844. a. b. He is cenſured with reſpect to Calvin's going to ſee the Ducheſs of Ferrara. III. 28. b. 29. a. b. And with reſpect to the motives which engaged that Princeſs to renounce Popery. ibid. b. Commits ſeveral faults in ſpeaking of Mademoiſelle de Rohan, and the Duke of Nemours. 142. a. b. 143. a. b. He did not know all thoſe who have wrote the conſpiracy of the Count of Fieſque. 196. b. Makes a curious obſervation upon the maſſacre of Goudimel, whom he improperly calls Claudin. 197. and b. 198. a. Maintains againſt the Spaniſh Hiſtorians, that Charles V was not ignorant of the Latin tongue. 323. b. Cenſured with reſpect to the correſpondence which Henry II, while he was Dauphin, kept up with the Conſtable of Montmorency. 395. a. b. Is liable to cenſure, with reſpect to a certain ſpeech which is ſaid to have been pronounced by Pompey Colonna againſt the Popes. 614. a. b. Whence come all his different Hypotheſes. 864. a. He would have no reaſon to complain that his Hiſtory of Hereſy had been taken for a romance. IV. 192. b. His Romantic flouriſhes on the ſtory of Muſurus. 293. b. 294. a. He takes one Alphonſo for another, in the preface to his Anecdotes. 312. b. 313. a. He relates a very ſingular fact, tho' a little doubtful, touching Macrin. 19. a. b. Tells a great many falſities of Ochinus. 392. a. b. Did not know that a certain ſatire pointed at Henry IV. 482. b. Cenſured for what he ſays of Platina. 687. b. And of the reaſon why the Calviniſts hated the Ducheſs of Valentinois. 696. b. He is fit to ſpoil a great many authors. 697. a. Does not ſpare the mother of Charles IX. 803. a. It is not eaſy to apprehend why he has ſtruck the Count de Laval out of the houſe of Montmorency, after having once made him deſcend from it. 887. b. He has put in his Hiſtory of Hereſy a marginal note, which has been a ſnare to ſome learned men. 920. b. Is criticized with reſpect to Charles IX, and the cauſe of his death. V. 392. b. 393. a. Loves to ſay what is not to be found in common Hiſtories. 748. Did not publiſh all that people had ſeen in his manuſcripts, and why. IV. 712. a.

Variorum: the editors of books, cum Notis Variorum, ſhould never leave out the Epiſtles Dedicatory, and the Prefaces. I. 225. b.

Varro, what he ſaid of the nuptials of virgins, and of the nuptials of widows. IV. 192. b. Nigidius was reckoned not inferior to him. IV. 368. a. Stories that are attributed to him. 370. a.

Varus, the Tragic Poet, recites, for his own performance, a Tragedy compoſed by another. V. 485. a. n. (13).

Vaſſi, to whom the maſſacre, that was made of the Huguenots there, ought to be imputed. III. 287. b. 288. a.

Vaſſor (le) what he relates, concerning the Duke of Orleans, Francis the firſt's ſecond ſon. III. 96. a. b.

Vatican, its thunders highly contemned. II. 378. b. 379. a. Who was the founder of the Vatican library. V. 545. b.

Vavaſſeur (Father) the overſight that author falls into in his treatiſe of the burleſque ſtile. I. 350. a. b. He knew authors who would rather have loſt the greateſt advantages, than have given up the praiſe which they thought they had merited by their romances. III. 379. b. His reaſons againſt the liberty of inſerting obſcenities in an epigram. V. 839. n. (15).

[illegible] (Mr de) employs his whole ſkill in fortifying Landau. III. 718.

Vaudois, the Hiſtory of their Churches by Peter Gilles. III. 161, 162. Traduced by Guichenon. 275. b. Send Yſe into England. 597. Teazed by Poſſevin, and perſecuted by Caſtrocaro. 757. and a. b. 758. and a. b. Perſecuted by Marco Aurelio Rorenco. IV. 916. a. b. Calumniated by Samuel de Caſſini. ibid. b. And defended by the Sieur Valerius Gros. 917. b. Sums of money raiſed for them. III. 595. b. 596. a.

Vaugelas, his excellent advice, with reſpect to the French language. II. 775. b. Who was the Vaugelas of the Latin tongue. III. 319. b.

Vautier propoſes the erecting a place of Court-Aſtrologer. IV. 260. b. n. (26).

Uberti (Farinata de gli) lodged in the ſhades by Dante. II. 399. b. Guido Cavalcante married his daughter. ibid.

Ubiquity, who were the firſt authors of that doctrine. IV. 288. a. b. V. 549. b. The troubles which it occaſioned in Germany. III. 391. a. b.

Udalric, his letter deſerves to be rejected. III. 225. a. b.

Vedelius (Nicolas) confutes Elias Schiller, and does it in eleven days. V. 81. and b.

Venator, the deſcription he makes of Divines. III. 250. b. 251. a.

Vendôme (Geoffry, Abbot of) whether it be true that he put Robert d'Arbriſſel in mind of his faulty conduct, with reſpect to women. III. 63. a. b. 66. b. 67. a.

Vendôme (the Duke of) Henry IV deſigns him for his ſucceſſor. III. 184. a.

Venetians order their Ambaſſadors to make very advantageous offers to the Emperor Maximilian. III. 274. a. Several States confederate to humble them. 811. and a. b. &c. They repulſe the Emperor Maximilian, who had beſieged Padua. IV. 293. a. Being animated to wage war with the Turks, they hinder the peace which the Emperor was deſirous of concluding with the Porte. 430. It is not the cuſtom of their nobles to have private miſtreſſes. 775. a. b. Complained of being ill uſed by Capriata in his Hiſtory. II. 311. b. How he juſtified himſelf in that point. ibid. Digby takes ſeveral prizes from them, and beats their fleet near Scanderoon. 664.

Vengeance, that of men is oftentimes more dreaded than the vengeance of God. I. 435. b. 436. a.

Venice: why the Senate of Venice is pleaſed with the irregularities of the clergy. I. 30. b. That Senate is offended, becauſe Pope Innocent VIII, beſtowed the Patriarchate of Aquileia, without conſulting them. 634. The laws of that Republic forbid all her miniſters at Rome to accept any benefice. ibid. Its Senate inflexible on that head. ibid. The Republic of Venice diſputes the precedence with the Duke of Savoy. III. 216. Its Ambaſſador burns, before Henry IV, all the papers in which he owned himſelf indebted to that Republic. 317. b. 318. a. Its Ambaſſadors arrive in Holland, to congratulate King Williiam. IV. 505. a. n. (77).

Venus riſing out of the ſea, painted upon the model of one of Alexander's miſtreſſes. I. 368. b. Auguſtus remits the inhabitants of Coos an hundred talents, which they were indebted to him, for the purchaſe of that picture. 369. a. A doubt concerning the ſaid Venus. ibid. Fault found with the temple of Venus built by Hadrian. 377. a. She had a temple on mount Libanus. II. 4. b. How people were initiated in her myſteries. 507. a. b. What the Fathers ſaid of the Venus that was adored in Cyprus. ibid. The Paphian Venus, when, and for what reaſon her prieſthood begun to be in the hands of a Prince of the blood. 507. Her vengeance againſt Diomedes and Clio. 742. b. A continual miracle performed in one of her temples. 746. b. Incroaches more upon Bacchus in the North, than Bacchus does upon Venus in the South. 823. a. b. Venus Migonitis, where, and by whom, a temple was built to her. III. 368. b. 369. a. The original of the pretended Divinity of Venus. 375. b. She obtained the golden apple. 644. a. b. 645. a. There was a Venus ſirnamed Melænis. 700. a. b. Venus the beſt ſerved of all the Pagan deities. 701. b. The temple of Venus Homicide, what it was. 702. a. Venus Urania, her temple plundered by ſome Scythians. IV. 790. What is the proper way to mortify her. V. 98. b. 99. a. b. A ſacrifice which the Roman ladies offered to her. 130. a. b.

An honour which was done to her, that ſhe might put a ſtop to leudneſs. 268. a. b.

Vercel, the capitulation of that town faithfully obſerved. V. 504.

Vercail (Dulcineus of) an impious Fanatic. III. 281. b.

Vercingentorix comes to the relief of Alexia with 300000 men. II. 413. a. Defeated by Cæſar. ibid. A fine obſervation which Plutarch makes on that defeat. ibid.

Verdier (Antony du) Sieur de Vau-Privas, cenſured for his negligence, with reſpect to the Acts of the Apoſtles, wrote in French rhyme, and fitted for the ſtage. II. 478, 479, 480.

Verdier (Claudius du) Cenſor-General, is angry with Lycophron, for what he ſays of Penelope. IV. 542. b.

Vere, a Lordſhip in Zealand, vulgarly called Ter-Veer. I. 781. a. II. 90. a.

Vergece: See the article VERGERIUS (Angelus).

Vergerius (Peter-Paul) challenges an Apoſtolic Nuncio, to a public diſpute. III. 840. b The reaſon why it was declared to him, he could not take his place in the Council of Trent. V. 454. b. His abridgment of the Anatomy of the Maſs. 455. b. 456. a. His book againſt the proclaiming of the Council. ibid. His books quickly loſt their credit. 457. a. They very much galled the Court of Rome. 456. b. A book is dedicated to him, to congratulate him for having abandoned the party of Antichriſt. II. 749.

Vernias (Nicoletus) Profeſſor of Philoſophy at Padua, his dangerous opinions. IV. 377. He maintained the opinion of Averrhoës, on the unity of the Intellect. ibid. b.

Veron, a Miſſionary, according to Rivet, was ignorant both in Greek and in Hebrew. II. 40. b.

Verſes: amorous verſes, and well ſung, have a great efficacy in touching the hearts of women. I. 27. b. Verſes upon the loſs of a battle, which offended the victor as well as the vanquiſhed. 191. To be fond of verſes, is not enough to make a man a Poet. 375. b. Amorous verſes thrown into the fire. 560. b. Eccleſiaſtics who have wrote ſuch verſes. 630. b. It does not follow that a man who writes ſuch is a Pagan. 584. a. b. A wonderful facility in making verſes. 664. b. 665. a. III. 573. a. b. Ephorus writes a verſe in the ſame place, where he condemns the cadence and numbers of diſcourſe. II. 772. b. The recital of ſome verſes inſpired conquerors with humanity. 866. b. 867. a. Hexameter verſes were not uſed in Tragedies. IV. 596. b. The ſame verſes wrote by ſeveral Poets. 822. a. b. Verſes compoſed at four livres a hundred, and others at forty pence. 873. b. Profane and leud verſes, rewarded with church-benefices. 896. a. b. Making verſes which we can read to no body, and walking in the dark, is the very ſame thing. 450, 451. Who firſt begun to comment on the verſes of another compoſed in the vulgar tongue. II. 398. b.

Verſes for Interludes, Benſerade was an original in that kind. I. 752. b.

Verſions, there are authors who only conſult them. I. 205. a.

Verus (Ælius) Emperor, what were the books he read moſt. III. 260. a.

Veſalius (Andrew) Borgarutius finds the manuſcript of his Great Surgery, and publiſhes it. II. 83. and b.

Veſpaſian, Orators were pretty well paid in his time. I. 196. a.

Veſſels: ſome fine veſſels of earthen ware broke, and for what reaſon. II. 558. b.

Veſtal Virgins condemned for Inceſt. II. 345. b. A noble piece of Hiſtory on that ſubject, loſt. ibid. It was the cuſtom of the High Prieſts, to appoint certain ladies to take care of the veſtal virgins, that were obliged by ſickneſs to leave their convent. III. 5. b. It is ſurprizing that they ſhould ever have fallen into incontinence. 830. b.

Ughelli (Abbot) takes the chronicle of Martin Polonus from him, and gives it to one Martin, a Monk of the order of Citeaux. IV. 708. b.

Vial of Rheims, Paul Emilius has ſaid nothing of it. II. 763, 764. and a.

Vic (Mr de) his turn of mind. II. 817. a.

Vicentinus, the meaning of that word. III. 777.

Vices, there is a leſs affinity between them than people commonly imagine. I. 232. b. II. 719. a. The benefits which ariſe from them do not hinder their being in their own nature evil. I. 159. b. IV. 188. b. Some prevail in all countries, religions, and ages. I. 561. a. There are ſome which are vices of the climate, and not vices of religion. II. 820. a. b. Whether, without vice, there could not be ſuch a thing as virtue. IV. 519. a. b. 520. a. b. 521. a. b. Whether vice is always puniſhed with adverſity in this world. V. 11. a. b.

Viciſſitude of human affairs, how ſurprizing it is. III. 547. b.

Vico (the Marquis del) cauſes the Anatomy of the Maſs to be tranſlated from Italian into French. V. 461. a. b.

Victims (human) were acceptable to the gods. III. 651. b. See Sacrifices.

Victoria, or Victorina, called in her armies the mother of the camp. III. 531. a.

Victories, few of them can by their conſequences decide the diſputes of Gazetteers. II. 413. a. Many obtain victories, but few know how to make a good uſe of them. 414. a. b. IV. 3. a.

Vidal (Mr du) complains of the oppreſſion which the Proteſtants ſuffer in the Palatinate, &c. II. 125. b. n. (34).

Vienna: a Biſhop of Vienna changes his maxims, on his becoming a Miniſter of State. IV. 13. b.

Vigenere (Blaiſe de) tranſlates and comments on Cæſar's Commentaries. I. 631. Miſtakes the meaning of a paſſage in Martial. 18. b. And of another in Plutarch. 75. b. A curious paſſage of his concerning an enterprize of the Amazons. 85. b. 86. a.

Vigneul Marville quoted. III. 145. and a. b. n. (15). & paſſim alibi. What he tells us of a certain Philoſopher. IV. 913. b. Judges too harſhly of La Mothe le Vayer's works. V. 427. b. 428. a. b.

Vignier (Nicolas) not to be excuſed for a fact he relates concerning Franciſca. III. 99. b. Confounds Radulphus Flaviacenſis with Ralph Higden. IV. 824. a. Cenſured on that head. ibid. a. b.

Villars (Francis de Boyvin Baron du) his maxim, that they break the peace, not who firſt make war, but who arm privately, and uſe ſecret practices in prejudice of treaties and alliances. II. 104. a. b.

Villars (Abbot de), ſee Gabalis.

Villavicentius accuſed of plagiariſm. III. 456. b.

Villegaignon, his character. IV. 870. a. He puts three Proteſtants to death. V. 477. a.

Villena (Henry de), a ſtory that goes in Spain relating to that Marquis. V. 480. a. b.

Villennes (the Marquis de) pretended to Aſtrology. IV. 263. a.

Villeroi (the Marquis de) obliges the governour of La Motte to capitulate, and the Queen-Mother does not obſerve the capitulation. IV. 278.

Villeroi (the Marſhal de) priſoner in the caſtle of Ambres. II. 97. b.

Villiers (Peter de), Chaplain to William I, Prince of Orange, reckoned the author of the apology for that Prince, and of a letter againſt the book of Concord. III. 392. a. b. Gerard de Reneſſe reprints the ſaid letter with notes. 391. b.

Villon poſts up theſes againſt Ariſtotle's doctrine. IV. 262. a.

Vincent, Miniſter of Rochelle, his reflexion upon a comedy. IV. 324. b. 325. a. n. (13). V. 82. b.

Vindingius, a fault of his adopted by the author of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres. I. 657. b.

Vinnius (Arnold) writes notes on Peckius's Commentary ad tit. d. Nautæ, &c. IV. 528. a. b.

Violence; in what caſe violence ſhould be uſed towards people. IV. 526. a. b.

Viret (Peter), the method he made uſe of in attacking Popery. V. 482. a. b. He turned his arms likewiſe againſt Deiſm. ibid. b. 483. a.

Virgil has taken one of Homer's epiſodes for a model. I. 80. b. No Poet, before him, ever ſaid what he ſays concerning the dead body of Hector. 81. a. A precept of his applied to old authors. 120. a. b. He gave orders to burn the Æneid. 375. a. b. Is criticized and defended, with reſpect to the word illaudatus, II. 234. a. b. Cento's have been made of him. 298. and a. What ſect of Philoſophers he was of, and who was his maſter. 390. a. A deſign deſign to juſtify him at any rate. III. 127. a. It was pretended that ſome of his words had the power of driving out devils. 890. b. 891. a. A ſupplement to his Æneid. V. 446. b. Malateſta cauſes his ſtatue to be thrown down. 451. a. b. The honour which the Roman people did him one day. 487. a. Parthenius taught him Greek. IV. 483. a.

Virgil (Polydore) his book de Inventoribus Rerum contains ſeveral things which the Inquiſition diſliked. V. 495. a. b.

Virgin, the Antients uſed that word in a more general ſenſe than we do. II. 140. b. The Turks call certain perſons, born of a virgin-mother, the ſons of the Holy Ghoſt. IV. 346.

Virgin (the bleſſed) the Monks are not her only indiſcreet votaries. I. 36. A book full of viſions concerning her. 136. a. Whence it comes that no one has yet ſaid that ſhe governs the world alone. 137. a. b. To what danger they expoſe themſelves, who diſapprove the errors that magnify her honours. 138. a. b. Her epithet of Mother of God leads one to troubleſome conſequences. ibid. and IV. 356. b. One is ſometimes more ſpeedily ſaved by invoking her name, than by invoking that of JESUS CHRIST. I. 198. a. The expreſſions of her indiſcreet votaries condemned by Bellarmin. 728. b. She is put as a fourth perſon of the Godhead. II. 85. and a. b. Had a penetrative chaſtity. 108. b. Of what efficacy the prayers are, which are addreſſed to her, the firſt of April, at eight in the morning. 316. a. Her immaculate conception received as an article of faith, by the Faculty of Divinity at Paris. IV. 77. b. 78. a. 366. b. 367. a. b. Drawn after the model of women, ſuch as pleaſed the Painters. II. 729. a. b. III. 57. b. How much people are puzzled to defend her worſhip. 84. b. Whether ſhe wrote a letter to the inhabitants of Meſſina. 563. a. And to St Ignatius. ibid. A book wherein Oriſons are addreſſed to all the parts of her body. 569. a. Idle traditions concerning her father and mother. 570. and a. b. 571. and a. b. 572. and a. b. Whence proceed the extravagant honours which ſo many Chriſtians pay to her. 636. a. A contract made in her favour, by Lewis XI, King of France. 808. a. b. Whether exemption from Original Sin be comprehended in the quality of the Mother of God. 931. a. From what motive the Jeſuits teach her immaculate conception. ibid. The Proteſtants enter themſelves into one of her fraternities. IV. 121. a. The abuſes that have been committed, with reſpect to her, were equally to be feared, whether ſhe was called the Mother of JESUS CHRIST, or the Mother of GOD. 347. a. b. 352. b. 353. a. Conjectures upon the cauſes of the progreſs of her worſhip. 354. a. b. 355. a. b. People are obliged to her for all the benefits they receive, and not to God. 354. b. 355. a. b. What Clemens Alexandrinus ſays of her. 805. a. She has not been able to eſcape calumny. V. 84. a. It is not probable, according to Mr Patin, that St Luke drew ſo many pictures of her as he is ſaid to have done. 156. b. Stiled Generaliſſima, and by whom. 679. How the Fathers of the Church proved her virginity. 772. b.

Virginity, whether the loſs of it makes any alteration in the outſide. II. 636. a. b. A Biſhop that was fain to explore the virginity of certain Nuns by ſqueezing their dugs. III. 344. b. 345. a.

Virtue, a good reputation is not always the conſequence of it. I. 279. b. Virtue and vice are ſometimes in alliance. 413. b. A diſtinguiſhed virtue never fails to raiſe envy. 460. a. The candor of an Athenian in owning this. ibid. It muſt be acquired by the ſweat of our brows. 573. a. Whether it be no more than an empty name: the complaint of Brutus examined. II. 164. a. b. 165. a. V. 9. b. 10. a. b. 11. a. b. One of the greateſt victories which it can obtain over nature. II. 269. b. Cannot be without a conflict. III. 620. 889. a. It is ſometimes eaſier to have the reality than the appearance of it. I. 279. a. b. III. 602. b. There is no virtue but what proceeds from a victory diſputed with the paſſions. 889. a. It is diſcouraging virtue, to rob it of its temporal recompence. 814. a. Its bad conſequences on ſome occaſions. IV. 188. b. Who are thoſe who maintain, that virtue ought to be followed by reaſon of its excellency. V. 204. b.

Virtuous; it ſignifies nothing for a man to be virtuous, if he is not maſter of a noiſy bluſtering eloquence. I. 459. a. b.

Viſion: a viſion may occaſion a mortal diſtemper. II. 715. b. 716. a.

Viſion ratified, what is meant by it. II. 113. b.

Viſionaries (les) a dramatic piece, who is the author of it. IV. 114.

Viſionaries, the chimerical notions of a viſionary. II. 84. b. 85. a. Viſionaries and interpreters of prophecies are very often impoſtors and incendiaries. 143. and a. b. Their true character. 538. a. b. They will always be well received, provided they have cunning enough to accommodate themſelves to the paſſions of the times. 693. Are never at a loſs. 692. a. Our age ſeems to be more terrible to them than the preceding ones. III. 691. a. What lengths they carry their knavery or folly. ibid. b. And their extravagance. 692. b.

Viſits are an incumbrance to learned men. I. 626. b.

Vitellius foreſaw the advancement of thoſe whom fortune had a mind to favour. IV. 397. b. 398. a. Gains the battle againſt Otho. V. 261. and b.

Vitex, what name it has at preſent. V. 334. a.

Vitruvius, his ſepulchre found near Formium. IV. 311. a. Particulars concerning his book. V. 269. a. b. 270. a. b.

Vives (Ludovicus) what he ſays of the falſe zeal of the Legendaries. III. 708. b. His Inſtitution of a Chriſtian woman tranſlated into French by Peter de Changy. II. 434. and 435. a. b. Tranſlated alſo by Lewis Turquet. ibid. b. The reaſon he gives why Leontium wrote a book againſt Theophraſtus. III. 779. The tranſlation of his work de Fœmina Chriſtiana is defective. ibid. b.

Ulyſſes, what puniſhment he inflicted on Penelope's maids. IV. 542. b. 543. a.

Ulme ſurprized and taken by the Elector of Bavaria. III. 719. b. It is ſaid that Spinoza lived there, and there begun his Tractatus Theologico-Politicus. V. 225. and n. (c).

Ulmus (Marc-Antony) author of a treatiſe de Barba humana, quoted. III. 81. b. n. (21).

Unbelievers are not always induced to unbelief by the motives of ſelf-love. II. 350. Perhaps there never were ſo many as in the XVIth and XVIIth centuries. III. 267. a. See Libertines.

Uneaſineſs, a paſſage of St Evremond on that ſubject. V. 585. b. A criminal remedy that is often made uſe of to remove it. 584. a.

Unheard: no man ought to be condemned unheard. I. 757. b.

Unitarians excluded out of the amneſty granted to others that were not Catholics, in Poland. III. 901. The hiſtory of their eſtabliſhment, growth, and deſtruction in Poland. V. 168. a. b. 169. a. b. & ſeq. The different attempts which they made to ſettle in Holland. 173. b. 174. a. b. 175. a. b.

Unitarians, in what ſenſe the author takes that word. V. 825. and n. (67). Their ſyſtem preferrable to that of the Dualiſts. ibid.

Univerſalia, the danger there is in denying the reality of them. V. 542. a.

Univerſity of Paris, the Hiſtory of it. II. 106. a. Verſoris pleads for the Jeſuits, in the trial they had with that univerſity, and gains the cauſe. V. 464. and b. n. †. ‡.

Univerſity of Leyden revives the degree of Doctor. I. 239. Pronounces a judgment worthy to be taken notice of. 242. b. A reflexion upon that judgment. ibid. 243. a.

Univerſity of Upſal, Guſtavus Adolphus's liberalities to it. V. 660.

Univerſities, the debauchery which prevailed in ſome. I. 247. a. b. Their intereſt ſhould be preferred to that of the churches. 260. A good agreement there among the colleagues is a thing rarely to be met with. 261. A great many brag of a familiarity in the univerſity with ſuch or ſuch an one, who is grown into reputation for his writings. II. 284. b. The greateſt part of the quarrels which divide univerſities, are ridiculous. 697. a. There are very few with which the Jeſuits have not had ſome diſpute. 700. b. n. (2). Luther turned the univerſities and their doctors into ridicule. III. 953. a. b. Complaints againſt the multitude of them. V. 229. b.

Univerſities of England, an encomium on them. V. 513. b.

Voetius, his diſputes with Mareſius. IV. 121. a. b. 122. a. Quoted. 583. a. n. (3). 584. a. b. n. (7), (8). & paſſim alibi.

Vogelſang confutes an explication of Wolzogue. IV. 877. b. 878. a. b.

Voiture, it has been ſaid of him, that he had a ſimple look, but nevertheleſs agreeable. II. 617. a. The great eaſe which appears in his works coſt him no ſmall pains. III. 262. a. What he writ to the Duke of Enguien. 748. a. n. (2). What he would have done, if he himſelf had publiſhed his works. 939. a. His friends threatened with military execution thoſe who ſhould dare to cenſure him. V. 344. b. The liberty he takes in his Poems. 840. n. (16). Charged with uſing obſcene expreſſions. 844. a.

Voice; a fine voice has a great influence upon the fair ſex. I. 27. b. One of the fineſt in the world. 662, 663. and a. b.

Volaterran, what he relates of Franciſca, a Roman lady. III. 98. b. 99. a. The table of his book is not good. ibid. He roundly affirms that Savonarola was a cheat, &c. V. 60, 61.

Volumnius, facts concerning his life. III. 958. a. b. 959. a. b.

Voluptuous perſons, it is a matter indifferent to them what way they obtain pleaſure, provided that they do obtain it. IV. 30. b. 31. a. b. How they uſe their riches. 87. How they endeavour to juſtify themſelves. V. 30 a. They may be brave and laborious. 271. a. b. &c.

Voragine (Jacobus de) whether he and Joannes de Janua are one and the ſame author. I. 614. and a. b.

Vorſtius (Conrad) gives an account of his faith before an aſſembly of the Faculty of Theology at Heidelberg. IV. 606. Cauſes Socinus's treatiſe de Auctoritate S. Scripturæ to be reprinted, with his notes. V. 180. b.

Voſſius is very particular in his apology for the Abderites. I. 18. b. 19. a. Cenſures Pliny. 82. a. His inattention. 57. a. 62. a. b. He refutes himſelf in writing againſt Corradus. 59. a. b. Commits a fault in cenſuring that of Sigiſmund Gelenius. III. 711. Conſults Grotius about an objection againſt one's changing his religion. IV. 375. a. Cenſuring Quintilian, with reſpect to the queſtions that were put to Xenophon's wife, he is miſtaken in his turn. 580. a. Complains of the great number of overſights which he found in antient and modern authors. 594. a. b. Is cenſured for a thing which Sandius has taken no notice of. 600. a. b. Cenſured for the liberty he takes in quotations. 783. a. b. He follows Rhodomannus in what he ſays of Cointus, and commits the ſame miſtakes. 817. b. Very judiciouſly cenſures the perverſe humour of Julius Cæſar Scaliger. II. 321. b. 322. a. Advances a conjecture touching Craterus, which is not probable. 563. a. b. For want of attention he falls into a miſtake touching a paſſage of Lactantius. III. 55. b. Why he would not juſtify his father-in-law againſt the miſtakes of Thuanus. 627. b. 628. a. Quoted with reſpect to the ſeverity of the Lutherans againſt the Flemiſh Church baniſhed from London. V. 550. a. b. n. (24), (25), (26). Found fault with. II. 32. a. n. (6). 173. a. n. (10). 179. b. n. (72). IV. 713. and b. n. (69).

Voſſius (Iſaac), Francis Junius dies at his houſe. III. 629.

Vows made at ſea are too commonly forgot on ſhore. II. 83. a. An Italian proverb on that head. ibid.

Vows (Monaſtical) are prejudicial to the ſtate. II. 174. b.

Ur, that word has given occaſion to ſeveral fables. I. 45. a.

Urban VI (Pope) is pleaſed with the news of Charles of Durazzo's death. IV. 305. a.

Urban VIII (Pope) writes verſes in praiſe of Aldrovandus. I. 213. b. Cauſes a Poet to die with grief by reproaching him for his impudence. III. 465. a. b. Complains to the King of France of his alliance with the Swedes. 819. b.

Urfé (the Marquis d') cenſured by Aſtrea for expoſing her quite naked to the eyes of Celadon. III. 866. b. 867. a.

Urquiola (John-Baptiſt de), an inſtance of the ſingularity of his Latin orthography. III. 774. a. b.

Urraca, the eternal diſgrace of Spain. V. 518. b. 519. a. b The French Ambaſſadors would not chuſe for their maſter a Princeſs of that name. 519, 526.

Uſeful: people prefer what is uſeful to juſtice and religion. I. 130. b. 131. a. 460. a. IV. 618. 621. a. b. 622. a.

Uſher, his miſtake touching Lollia Paulina. II. 256. b.

Uſurper, it is ſeldom ſeen that thoſe who raiſe one to the throne, do long enjoy his favours. II. 737. a.

Utrecht, the French carry away a book out of its library. IV. 235. a.

Vulcan, upon what conditions he made a ſuit of armour for Achilles. I. 80. b. Is thrown headlong from heaven to earth. III. 751. a. b. What the veſſel was which he made a preſent of to Pelops at his marriage. 373. b.

Vulgar: the vulgar ſuffer themſelves to be eaſily impoſed upon. II. 148. b.

Vulgate, its authority is not preferred to that of the originals. I. 246. The author of it commended by Lewis de Dieu. II. 663. b.

W.

W*Afers*, at what time they left off making uſe of them in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper at Geneva. III. 343. a. n. (16).

Wagerers, what is a good bait to draw them in. I. 76. a.

Wagnerus (Tobias) Chancellor of the Univerſity of Tubingen, writes againſt Hottinger's book about the Re-union. III. 526. b. 527. a.

Way (Milky) how formed. III. 637. b.

Wand, the cauſe of ſeveral fine diſcoveries. I. 4. b. 5. a. A reflexion on its uſefulneſs. 6. b. 7. a. Whether that of James Aymar loſt its credit. ibid. b. 8. a. b. 9. a. b.

War, what are its uſual fruits. I. 239. a. b. The conſequence of a war raiſed in a communion. 241. b. Whether in a war juſtice gives us reaſon to hope for good ſucceſs. 280. a. Its laws are very cruel. 518. b. Which makes people deteſt the cauſes of it. ibid. An unfair war occaſioned by the vengeance of the Duke of Montpenſier. 591. One of its calamities. II. 159. b. An advantage poſſeſſed by the widows of thoſe who had been ſlain in the wars. 289. There is nothing like the tongues of orators to cauſe a war either to begin or to continue. 547. b. To conduct a war according to the laws of religion, is a Platonic idea. 511. b. Dicæarchus ſaid that it deſtroyed more men than any other thing. 657. b. Thoſe whoſe profeſſions ought to lead them to diſſuade from war, are often the inſtigators of it. 811. a. b. The wickedneſs of ſome particular perſons, and the folly of the people, are the ſource of almoſt every war. ibid. a. It is a diſgrace to return from a long war with empty hands. III. 396. b. Reflexions upon the wars which Clergymen adviſe. 871. b. The Cardinal's war, what it was. 873. b. A perſon that has learnt the art of war only by reading, ought to keep to the theory. IV. 14. b. The ſacred war, by whom occaſioned. 621. 622. War has maxims which become pernicious, when applied to the affairs of religion. 178. a. b. 179. a.

Waramund (Leonhart) writes in defence of Gebhard Truchſes Archbiſhop of Cologn, and is refuted by Gonſalez Pontius de Leon. III. 774.

Warriors, there are a great many who know how to conquer, but few who know how to make uſe of their victory. II. 413. a. b

Wars (Civil) ſometimes produce good effects. I. 577. a. b. Whether in civil wars the Prince's party gives itſelf more liberty than the rebels. 711. b. The ſcruples which Bongars had about the civil wars of the Proteſtants. II. 70. and a. b. The uſual proteſtations that attend them. 515. a. b.

Wars (Religious) are horrible. I. 648. a. From whence proceeded the firſt religious war in France. III. 513. a.

Wars (Literary) are ſometimes violent and of a long continuance. I. 322. b. The hoſtilities that are committed in them. II. 433. a. b. &c. Reſemble much thoſe of Princes. 798. b.

Warſaw, Guſtavus Adolphus makes incurſions to the gates of that city. V. 666.

Watchings: impurities were committed in the devotional watchings that were obſerved in the antient Church. V. 337. a. and n. (35). 472. a.

Watchmen of the City, in the Song of Solomon, explained by the Eccleſiaſtical powers: an explication occaſioned by the author's impriſonment. III. 772. a. b.

Water, who taught men to mix it with their wine. I. 284. b. A certain water, which had a wonderful property. II. 876. b. It was the principle of all things, according to Thales. III. 650. a. V. 323. a. b. A health drunk and pledged with a large glaſs of water. 346. a. b. The proof of water in the proſecution of witches held lawful by William Adolphus Scribonius. 100.

Wavre is a Priory of Benedictins, and not a monaſtery of Canons regular. IV. 943. b.

Weeks of Daniel, Peter de Beloy's expoſition of them. I. 740. b.

Were-Wolf: a diſcourſe on the ſentence that was paſſed on a man accuſed and convicted of being a were-wolf. I. 562. b. A man who transformed himſelf into one condemned to be burnt by an Arrêt of the Parliament of Dole. ibid.

Wert, a village of the province of Guelderland, to which the General, who bore that name, belonged. V. 539.

Weſſelus, his life is little known. V. 544. b. Albert Hardenberg writes his life. III. 353.

Whitaker retracts part of what he had advanced in giving Campian the lye. III. 940. b. 941. a. b.

Whole: the word all or whole has both a collective, and a diſtributive ſenſe. I. 298. b.

Whore, whether that word be more ſhocking than the word courtezan. V. 848.

Whore (Royal) what perſon was ſo called. II. 381.

Whoredom, whether the magiſtrate may and ought to puniſh it. I. 222. a. b. 223. a. b. What the abſolution of it coſt. 628. a. See Fornication.

Whores occaſion a general war in Greece. IV. 579. a. An author wiſhes that it were permitted to give that name publickly to all women who are guilty of luxury. II. 400. b.

Wicked Men, their proſperity has at all times made people murmur againſt the providence of God. IV. 932. b. 933. a. b. &c.

Wickedneſs, in what manner God reſtrains it. II. 736. a.

Wickliff expelled from the Univerſity of Oxford. V. 556. b.

Wicquefort, a thought of his. I. 129. a. n. (16). The judgment which he paſſes on the greateſt part of thoſe who attempt to write the Hiſtory of the United Provinces without permiſſion. 170. a. b. n. (1). His morality is a great deal purer and more evangelical than that of ſome Divines. II. 154. a.

Widows, how much of their riches muſt be abated, when they have had no children. I. 393. b. An advantage poſſeſſed by thoſe whoſe huſbands had been ſlain in the wars. II. 289. Such as would never marry again, have always been moſt admired. III. 191. b.

Widows of the Kings of France, what they were obliged to do, till ſuch time as their huſbands were buried. III. 874. a. 828. b.

Wierus, his teſtimony concerning a black dog which Agrippa had. I. 151. a. And touching a fourth book attribtued to the ſame Agrippa. 154. a.

Will: the will is not diſtinct from the underſtanding according to Spinoza, and has no liberty. V. 206. b. 207. a.

Will: ſick perſons put off making their will, as a bad omen. IV. 537. b. n. (24).

William the Conqueror, his laws condemned to caſtration thoſe who forced a woman. III. 77. a.

William I, Prince of Orange, conſults Baudouin. I. 692. b. His manifeſto. III. 674. b.

William III, never beſieged a place, the governour of which acknowledged him as a King. III. 718. a.

Willis, his doctrine concerning the ſouls of Brutes. IV. 912. a. b.

Wilmot (John), See Rocheſter.

Wimphen, when the Margrave of Baden was defeated there by Count de Tilli. V. 357. b.

Wincheſter, the foundation of its college. V. 554. b. 555. a.

Wind; it has been found by obſervation, that there reigns a conſtant wind from eaſt to weſt in the Torrid Zone. V. 782.

Windet cenſures the French and Engliſh tranſlations of the Alcoran. IV. 872. b.

Windſor, who had the direction of the building of that caſtle. V. 552.

Wine, who taught men to mix water with it. I. 284. b. Made ſerviceable in the cure of diſtempers. 526. The faculty of bearing much wine, is, phyſically ſpeaking, a good quality, but it is moſt commonly attended with a moral irregularity. II. 598. a. Prieſt-wine, what it is. 815. b. Effects of wine with relation to impurity. 822. a. The Romans forbid their women the uſe of it. ibid. a. b. 823. a. b. III. 967. a. IV. 756. a. b. 757. a.

Wings that a perſon made uſe of to fly with. II. 598. and a. b.

Winter of life, when it begins. I. 125. b. IV. 163. a.

Wirtemberg (Ulric Duke of) kills the Marſhal of his court. III. 539. Seizes the Imperial town of Reutlingen, which occaſions his being driven out of his dominions. ibid.

Wirtemberg (the Duke of) promiſes to abandon the Calviniſts of France. III. 287. b. 288. a. Kills a gentleman, whoſe wife he was in love with. 541.

Wiſe: whether none but wiſe men live free from ſervitude. II. 427. b. Whether a wiſe man ought to marry. III. 382. b. What the inſenſibility of a wiſe man ought to be. IV. 669. b. The different ſignifications of that word. V. 46. b.

Wiſh, one becoming a Philoſopher. I. 560. b.

Wiſigoths had a law which condemned Sodomites to caſtration. III. 77. a.

Wit: a bar ſhould be oppoſed againſt all the ſubtilities of human wit. I. 481. a. Whether leſs wit be required to apply than to invent a thought. II. 778. a. b. 779. a. Wit may prevent the effects of uglineſs. IV. 869. b. Your greateſt wits have a mixture of madneſs. II. 321. a.

Witchcraft, a woman accuſed of it, and put to the torture. I. 147. b. Little credit is to be given to it. 621. a. b. The moſt incredulous Philoſophers are puzzled on that head. III. 214. b. There are ſome people who believe nothing that is ſaid about it. IV. 716. a. b. A poſture that was taken for a kind of witchcraft. I. 207. b. 208. a. See Magic.

Witches: a witch ſtiled a broomſtick rider. I. 4. a. They ſteal children, and conſecrate them to the Devil. II. 838. a. A confutation of thoſe who doubt of the truth of what is ſaid of them by Elich. 750. a.

Witneſſes: what is ſaid of the witneſſes of ſome countries. II. 302. b. 303. a. There is a great difference between a hear-ſay witneſs and an eye-witneſs. 708. b. Their retractations ſhould not be admitted as an evidence, and why. IV. 761. a. A perſon is not obliged to produce more than one witneſs, after making uſe of the phraſe, there are who have ſaid, &c. I. 236. b.

Witneſſes of the Truth: a remark upon the character of authors, to whom the Proteſtants have given that title. II. 252. b. V. 71. b

Wittemberg, its Divines do not reaſon at all conſequentially upon the divorce of Henry VIII. I. 657. b. 658. a. b. Who firſt introduced the ſtudy of Chymiſtry into that Univerſity. V. 113.

Wives, there are ſome who make uſe of drugs to cauſe abortion. II. 314. b. A young and beautiful wife is not at all convenient for a traveller. IV. 282. a. Diſloyal wives generally make ſome amends for the injury they do their huſbands, by their flatteries and ſubmiſſion. 760. b. An uncommon inſtance of a wife's affection for her huſband. 379. b.

Wolfius (Jerom) cauſes the Rectorſhip of the new college of Altorf to be given to John-Thomas Freigius. III. 105.

Wolzogue advanced this propoſition, that God might deceive, if he would. IV. 876. b. &c.

Woman in Labour; the ſtory of one who cauſed the bleſſed candle to be put out, in order to make it ſerve her another time. II. 83. a. An author who compares himſelf to one, after having violated the oath which he had taken never to have any thing to do with the Bookſellers. 82. a. b. The reaſons which which very juſtly diſcharge a woman from any thing ſhe may have ſworn on ſuch an accaſion. 83. a.

Womb: a ſeal fixed to all the wombs of the houſe of Abimelech. I. 38. b. What the Scripture means by the opening and cloſing of the womb. 448. b.

Women have in all ages been the occaſion of ſeveral wars. I. 24. a. b. Are eaſily gained by verſes and muſic. 27. b. A woman who proſtitutes her honour, with her huſband's conſent, in order to ſave his life. 90. St Auguſtin's looſe principle of morality on that head. 91. and a. b. A woman put to the torture, purely becauſe ſhe was ſuſpected to be the daughter of a witch. 147. b. Women are ſometimes obliged to hear very diſagreeable things in certain judicial proceedings. 391. a. b. 392. a. b. 393. a. b. What are the parts of their happineſs. 392. b. 393. a. b. What is the moſt dangerous rock for their honour. 405. A doctrine more extravagant than the community of women. 290. a. b. The ſtory of the woman that was twice carried to be buried. 526. b. 527. a. A reflexion upon the qualities of handſome and rich, or poor and ugly, with reſpect to marriage. 550. a. b. What puniſhment the antient Romans inflicted upon women taken in Adultery. 592. a. b. They ſeldom fall into Atheiſm. 639. a. Were not permitted to aſſiſt at the Olympic Games. 761. and a. b. Are very fond of fine cloaths and ornaments. II. 98. a. b. 99. a. b. III. 185. b. 569. b. 570. a. Whether it be praiſing a woman, to ſay that ſhe rejected an immodeſt propoſal. II. 27. a. b. How a modeſt woman was revenged upon her ſeducer. 220. a. b. There are ſome who are neither young nor handſome, and who nevertheleſs inſpire men with as much or more paſſion, than thoſe who have theſe qualities. 256. b. Thoſe of high quality are forced to make the firſt advances in love to their inferiors. 312. a. b. They occaſion a great many misfortunes. 481. b. The courage of thoſe of Lacedæmon. 522. b. 523. a. It is a mortal offence to them, to ſee the advances which they make to men deſpiſed. 535. a. III. 20. b. 21. a. b. A woman that makes uſe of a ſtrange remedy to kill her concupiſcence. II. 556. a. b. 557. a. b. III. 99. a. Another bites her tongue off, and ſpits it in the tyrant's face. II. 557. a. A kind of nakedneſs for which ſome were blamed. 593. a. 645. a. Of a very ſmall ſtature. 599. a. b. The Romans forbid them the uſe of wine. 822. a. b. 823. a. b. III. 967. a. IV. 756. a. b. 757. a. And left the puniſhment of their crimes, to the diſcretion of their huſbands and relations. 756. a. Such of them as are cruel and ambitious, exceed men in thoſe two vices. II. 862. b. One muſt fly them, in order to avoid temptation. III. 65. a. b. 66. a. The complaint which one made at a time. 75. b. 76. a. One of the ſureſt ways to draw them, is to ſet up fraternities of an auſtere reformation. 103. a. b. Men who lay with them, in order to prove their continence. ibid. b. 104. a. In what manner the women of Mentz expreſſed their grief for the death of an author, who had beſtowed great praiſes on their ſex. 105. and a. b. It has been maintained that they are not of the human ſpecies. 144. a. b. And that they are not made after the image of God. 145. a. b. A Pope grants a diſpenſation for a man to have two at the ſame time. 165. and a. b. What influence they have towards eſtabliſhing or overthrowing religious opinions. 220. a. There are ſome very learned women. 249. a. b. Thirty things requiſite to make them perfectly handſome. 364. a. b. French women are leſs ſcrupulous in their child-births, than thoſe of other countries. 453. b. What is the greateſt encomium that can be beſtowed upon a woman. 601. b. 602. a. b. They are capable of reigning well. 530. a. A chaſte woman frights away calumny. 601. b. When they have a ſhare in the government, they are more honoured and reſpected, than their huſbands themſelves. 636. a. Who was the firſt woman that propheſied among the Greeks. 712. The antient Greeks would not ſuffer them to be preſent at feaſts. 966. b. Such as love ſtudy, ought not to marry. 815. a. They ſell their modeſty ſometimes at a very dear rate to their huſbands. 814. b. Are very ill taken care of by Mahomet's law. IV. 34. a. b. 35. a. b. Books publiſhed upon the excellency of their ſex. 147. and a. b. 148. a. b. The ſovereign power ought not to be lodged in their hands. 308. b. 309. a. 406. a. V. 519. b. A ſevere law againſt thoſe that ſhould conceal either their pregnancy, or their lying-in. IV. 499. b. &c. Whether religion has more power over them, than the point of honour, to engage them to Continency. 500. a. b. An admirable Plant which hindered them from committing Adultery. 610. a. b. They are ſuſpected of love-intrigues ſo ſoon as they ſhew their affection to a man. 692. a. A poor woman that a man marries, is very often not the leſs proud on that account. 753. a. The Romans were obliged to repeal a law which forbid the women to wear any ornaments. 769. b. 770. a. Privileges granted to them. II. 217. a. b. How they ſuffer themſelves to be ſeduced by leud Heretics. 779. and a. b. 780. a. b. An impudent action of ſome women. V. 131. and a. b. A woman that ſwam quite naked over the Seine. 393. a. b. A ſuppoſition concerning their ſouls. 139. a. b. A collection ſhould be made of ſuch as were a ſcandal to their ſex and country. 519. a. See Maids. They would ſeldom do evil, if they were not enticed to it by the men. 426. b. The confeſſion of their ſins is always defective. 533. a. b. A time when they wore looking-glaſſes over their bellies. II. 400. a. b. An author who wiſhes that it were permitted to call all thoſe Whores, who give themſelves up to luxury. ibid. b. They would rather abandon their luxury for the King than for God. ibid. b. There is ſuch a one, that debauches as many women as he can, that yet would cruelly uſe his ſiſters and ſiſters-in-law, and even his mother, if he catched them in the fact. IV. 609. b. They can ſo ſtraiten themſelves that no man can have to do with them: examples. 800. b. 801. a. A woman that lies with her footman, deſerves to be puniſhed. II. 508. a. Drunkenneſs, a common vice among them. V. 540. a. b. Why a virtuous woman is not offended with veiled expreſſions, and is angry with a filthy word. 850. 856. It is not for their honour, to enter into ſuch proceedings as the congreſs is. IV. 799. a. b. 800. a. b. &c. V. 799.

Wood, the price of it raiſed in England, by the great number of Heretics burnt there. I. 272. b. What thoſe Heretics were. ibid. Whether allum can make wood incombuſtible. 424. a. b.

Word of God is to Divines, the foundation and ſource of their proofs and ſolutions. V. 818. It ought to ſatiſfy every good Chriſtian, that his faith is founded on the Word of God. 829.

Words, people run more eagerly after the new than the old. I. 63. a. Words that were made uſe of to frighten little children. 63. and b. Their ſignification may vary from time to time. 568. a. Complaints which have been made againſt the change that happens to them, and which are very ill grounded. III. 208. a. b. 209. a. b. They will ſometimes go as far as the ſword. IV. 663. b. The ſtage is a good forge for new words. 743. a. b. A dialogue wrote to ridicule thoſe who make uſe of antiquated words. I. 69. b. 70. a. IV. 831. a. They ought to be ranged with great nicety. V. 327. b. Some of them are obſcene in certain books, and not obſcene in others. 844. What makes them obſcene. ibid. and 845. The Stoics laughed at the diſtinction of words. 847. The niceſt ſully the imagination, as much as the moſt obſcene. 849.

Workman: the Civil-Law requires that a workman who excels in any art, ſhould have his life given him, though he may have deſerved to loſe it. I. 197. b. 198. a.

Works, when an adverſary attacks them by way of the ſecular arm, it only ſtrengthens the good opinion which people had of them before. I. 544. There are ſome excellent ones which have great imperfections. 752. a. The poſthumous works of an author are ever faulty, when enlarged by means of his undigeſted memoirs. II. 429. b. A work, how ever ſtrong in itſelf, will hardly appear ſo in the fragments that an adverſary alledges out of it. 488. a. b. A work, the loſs whereof ought to be regretted. 562. a. b. They ought not to be compared with one another by bits, but a whole work compared with a whole work. 653. a. b. The firſt work that a man publiſhes may be a moſt accompliſhed piece. 582. b. We ought to ſpeak with great caution of a work, that we know only by the report of others. 589. a. b.

People are frequently miſtaken about the names of the true authors of them. 808. a. Works by which people are impoſed upon. III. 236. b. A man ſhould ſtudy the rules well, before he pronounces that a work is good or bad. 337. b. There are works of ſuch a nature, that there is no avoiding miſtakes in them. 622. b. Eaſier to be underſtood by the abſtracts which are given of them, than by themſelves. 344. a. b.

Works: of the merit of good works. II. 172. a. b. Bucer's ambiguous expreſſions and variations, on the merit of works. 178. a. b. 179. a. b. The difficulties to be met with in that matter. 178. People would eaſily agree on that ſubject, according to Grotius, if they would but baniſh Chicanery. ibid. b.

World, the calculation of its duration, according to the Greek Bible, preferred before the calculation of the Hebrew text. I. 165. a. How many great conjunctions there have been ſince its creation. 164. b. 165. a. The eternity of it taught publickly at Alexandria in the VIth century, by a Pagan Philoſopher. 270. b. We cannot demonſtrate by particular reaſons, that each body in the univerſe is in the beſt ſtate it could poſſibly be in. 310. b. 311. a. An egg had been employed in the production of it, according to the Pagan Theology. 444. a. b. Was too narrow for two brothers. II. 249. b. Hypotheſes touching its origin and production. 119. a. b. 672. b. 673. a. 786. b. 787. a. b. 788. a. b. 789. a. One half of the world laughs at the other. 697. a. The world is a true wheel of fortune. 832. a. IV. 435. a. b. Had not two principles collateral, eternal, and independent of one another. III. 447. a. b. A tradition about its end. 780. b. 781. a. b. A mark of its depravation. IV. 83. b. It does not grow worſe and worſe. 305. a. To reaſon well upon the production of it, we muſt acknowledge that God is the author of matter, and the firſt and ſole principle of motion. 436. b. & ſeq. Its end foretold on Jeſus Chriſt's being born under the watery triplicity. III. 780. a. An Aſtrologer foretels the end of it, after which he affirms that all the powers will fall into the hands of the Turks. V. 246. b. The principles of the Pagan Philoſophers, touching the production of the world, were incoherent. 324. a. Ambiguities that are to be met with in the controverſy, concerning the eternity of the world. 596. a. b. 597. a. b.

Worms, its council declares the election of Pope Hildebrand to be void. III. 229.

Worſhip: a religious worſhip that conſiſted in weeping. I. 114. a. b. And where the mourning ended in joy. ibid. b. and 116. a. What is the moſt acceptable to God. II. 315. b. 316. a. How difficult a matter it is to correct the abuſes of worſhip. III. 743. b. 744. a. b.

Worthies: the expedition of the ſeven Worthies. I. 117.

Wotton (Dr) convicts Thomas Elyot of a fraud. II. 770. a.

Wower diſliked ſeveral things in the reformation of Luther and Calvin. V. 565. a.

Write: an expedient which the antient Arabs made uſe of for writing. IV. 177. b. Perſons who could write a whole ſpeech, though the Orator ſpoke never ſo faſt. 811. b. Perſons who excelled in that art. 883. b. The reputation of writing well, is a great burthen upon a man. 707. b.

Writers: antient writers have been made to ſay ſeveral things, which they never thought of. I. 309. a. b. Several of them make uſe of the property of other men, without mentioning their benefactor. 396. a. II. 78. b. Give us inconſiſtent accounts of one and the ſame perſon. I. 525. a. b. Some of them pleaſe at firſt for their novelty, and at laſt for their antiquity. 556. a. They ſhould relate matters ſo, that there may be no need of having recourſe to conjectures, in order to underſtand them. II. 180. a. One of the faults of a writer. ibid. and n. (2). A writer is very negligent, when he only quotes the title of a book in a general manner. 136. b. Neither the French nor Spaniſh writers thought much of what was to come, in what they wrote againſt one another. 338 a. A line of Virgil applied on that head. ibid. Writers too fruitful, and who compoſe too haſtily. III. 69. b. 70. a. When paſſion governs them, they never think of the future, and thus they furniſh arms againſt their own party. 520. a. There are many of them who quoting an author, make him ſay whatever they think he ſhould have ſaid. 636. b. They often baniſh moderation and ſincerity from their writings, when they are of a different religion. IV. 54. a. How we ought to explain their complaints againſt the ingratitude of their own time. 459. b. 460. a. A judgment concerning the moſt celebrated writers of antient Rome. 778. b. 779. a. b. Some of them are glad to hear that their works have been put into the Index. 827. b. A ſpecimen of the fidelity of ſeveral. V. 569. b. 570. a. Many of them add divers things to the teſtimonies which they quote. 234. b. How thoſe ought to do, who are not bigotted to their own opinions. 811. See Authors.

Writing (Greek) which was made uſe of as an original or pattern, by thoſe who engraved the types of that language. V. 461.

Writings which may be called inlaid work. I. 188. b. How we ought to judge of ſome ſort of writings. II. 279. a. b. We cannot give much credit to poſthumous writings, eſpecially when they come from remote countries. IV. 833. b. The good fortune of ſome writings. V. 779. What ſort of writings are neceſſary to be conſulted by the author of ſuch a work as this. II. 8. b.

X.

X*Anthippus* is the firſt man to ſpeak ill of his own father. IV. 570. a.

Xeniades, what he ſaid, after he had bought Diogenes. II. 669. a.

Xenocrates, his continence occaſions his being called a ſtatue. III. 704. b. Rallied by Ariſtotle. I. 112. b.

Xenocrates (the Carthaginian) did not deny that beaſts had the knowledge of God. IV. 904. a. b.

Xenophanes, his principles in their natural connexion. V. 585. b. 586. a. b. 587. a. b. 588. a. b. His genius unjuſtly deſpiſed by Ariſtotle. 587. a.

Xenophon makes an end of the ſacrifice, notwithſtanding the news of his ſon's death. I. 683. a. Said that God humbles the great and raiſes the little ones. 575. a. b.

Xerxes, a witty ſaying of that Prince. I. 522. and b.

Xiphilin ſhould not have ſuppreſſed the feigned madneſs of Archelaus. I. 422. b.

Y.

Y*EAR,* the Engliſh do not begin it in their public records till the 25th of March. II. 576. a. n. (3). According to Albategni and Lucidus, every hundred and ſix years occaſions the difference of a day in the Solar and the Julian year. III. 904. b.

Young: whether it be the part of a wiſe man, to wiſh to grow young again. IV. 755. b.

Young men ought to have many ſuperfluities, which might be pruned. I. 61. a.

Youth; perſons that come to diſtinguiſh themſelves, are often upbraided with the follies of their youth. IV. 724. b.

Youths: a new author to be added to the famous youths of Mr Baillet. III. 33. a. A perſon who has been juſtly reckoned among illuſtrious youths. IV. 184. a. b.

Z.

Z*Abarella* (Francis) his book de Schiſmate. V. 591. a.

Zachary, (Pope) ranks the antipodes among the chimera's prejudicial to religion. V. 493. a. b.

Zaleucus, his law againſt thoſe who propoſed any innovation. V. 314. b.

Zamoſki (John) the greateſt Hero that was in Poland, chuſes Simon Simonides for his Secretary, and procures him the honour of Knighthood. V. 149.

Zanchius (Jerom) makes uſe of a mental reſervation, in ſigning a formulary. V. 599. a. b. 600. a. b. The confeſſion which he drew up. 601. a. A paſſage quoted by Father Labbe, where Zanchius ſpeaks very ill of the Proteſtant writers. ibid. b. 602. a. b.

Zapoliba (John) on the news of the birth of a ſon, drank to ſuch exceſs, as occaſioned his death. III. 532. and a. Soliman had an inclination to ſee that child, made him rich preſents, and careſſed him much. ibid. a. b.

Zeal: unſeaſonable zeal, how fatal to the Church. I. 13. b. 14. a. b. The effects of falſe zeal. 140. a. b. 545. b. 546. a. 790. a. b. II. 246. b. IV. 517. a. b. 518. a. b. 856. a. b. It ſometimes ſuffers real or pretended impieties to lie dormant a great while. I. 468. a. Religious zeal, to what a furious exceſs it proceeds ſometimes. 545. b. 546. a. Moſt of thoſe who have a great zeal, become credulous and ſuſpicious. 758. a. What zeal makes people believe to the prejudice of Heretics. II. 796. b. A reflexion upon the effects of falſe zeal. III. 624. a. Religious zeal, to what exceſs does it not proceed, when it is falſe. 947. a. b. What is ſufficient to moderate it. IV. 188. b. An inſtance of a furious zeal. 270. a. b. 271. a. A ſtrange inſtance of its extravagance. 698. b.

Zealots; in point of religion, are dangerous enemies. I. 29. b. 30. a. b. 31. a. Falſe Zealots have recourſe to accuſations of impiety, in order to ſupport themſelves in a moſt unjuſt authority. 374. b. The greateſt part of them fear nothing more than the Orthodoxy of thoſe, whom they accuſe. 491. b. The character of many of them. 716. b. They would have people to be determinate and reſolute, when the queſtion is about embracing or anathematizing an opinion. II. 706. a. The paſſions raiſed by them is more formidable to Princes, than the arms of the Infidels. III. 624. a. Their uſual artifice. IV. 815. a. b. They condemn in their neighbour what they themſelves do. V. 471. b. 472. a. The moſt honeſt find accuſers. 58.

Zemzem, the ſacred well of Mecca. IV. 179. a. b.

Zeno, chief of the Stoics, maintained opinions directly oppoſite to thoſe of Arceſilas. I. 409. b. 410. a. One of his tenets was far from being juſt. 462. b.

Zeno of Elæa, a difficulty which he propoſed againſt the reality of motion. I. 82. b.

Zeno, the Epicurean; it is pretended that the Poet Lucretius was his diſciple. III. 924. b. 925. a.

Zieglerus got nothing by curtailing Aventine's Annals. I. 549. a.

Zindikites (a Mahometan ſect) whence ſo called, and what their ſentiments are. V. 199. a.

Zocotora, an iſland, the religion of its inhabitants. II. 677. and a. b. 678. a. b.

Zones are all torrid with reſpect to love. II. 80. a. 823. b.

Zoroaſter teaches the Perſians Philoſophy. I. 444. He lays down two firſt principles, one of good and the other of evil. ibid.

Zoſtrianus, an antient Heretic. I. 255.

Zuinglians, to procure peace between them and the Lutherans, Bucer choſe general and ambiguous expreſſions. II. 177. Bucer thought their doctrine concerning the Euchariſt too narrow. ibid. a. b. John Schutze's rancour againſt them. V. 89. a. b.

Zurich, the diſputes occaſioned by the agreement, which the Lutherans and Calvininiſts entered into there. V. 548. b. 549. a.

Zuſki (Baſil) Great Duke of Muſcovy, is dethroned and confined in a monaſtery. V. 653.

MVSEVM
BRITAN
NICVM